The Stockport Sunday-school, which has this unique honour, is an undenominational one, or rather it embraces all denominations in its fold. As an institution it began far back in 1784, almost immediately after Robert Raikes had started such schools at Gloucester, which we shall speak of shortly. The school flourished greatly from the very commencement, so well was its government arranged and so efficiently was it carried out. The present building became the centre of the work in 1805, and that work has continued there ever since, and has much extended, too, to other buildings.

All sorts and conditions of men and women take their due share in the work and management of the great Stockport school. Some of them are officials, some teachers, some visitors, some helpers in other ways; but they all combine loyally and most effectively, thus proving the truth that Christian union is not a mere dream, but might be made a living reality throughout the world—for here in Stockport is a real example of it. As a proof of my contention I may say that at present there are thus working together in the school Anglicans, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Baptists, New Connexion Methodists, and Congregationalists, and such a thing as disputes or jealousy amongst these Christians is practically unknown. The reason is not far to seek; they put first "the kingdom of God and His righteousness."

At the end of last year there were on the roll of this wonderful Sunday-school, nearly 5,000 scholars and 450 teachers. Just picture to yourself what an immense school that means. Fancy the organisation, oversight, and care needed to-day to carry on such a stupendous school successfully. Then recall that Stockport has done this work for over a century, and you will begin to realise what the Cheshire town has to be proud of.

Each scholar, when admitted to the school, after his (or her) conduct and attendance have been deemed satisfactory, is given a number, called a "register number," which number runs progressively. The last number thus given reached a figure considerably over 100,000. So that so many thousands of scholars, at least, owe their Sunday-school training to the Stockport Sunday-school. Think of that number—upwards of 100,000! Why, those beings would make a great town almost as large as Croydon!

This school has made such enormous strides, and won so much success, because it is not antiquated in its methods; it is up-to-date, living, and active to a degree. It would be impossible to give here one-tenth of the interesting notes and events that have marked the long journey of this great organisation during the parts or whole of its career. It is now within its third century. Such famous ministers as Rowland Hill, John Angell James, Thomas Chalmers, Henry Allon, Hugh Stowell Brown, Norman Macleod, Dean Stanley, Newman Hall, John Cairns, J. Oswald Dykes, Dean Farrar, Dr. Marshall Lang, Mark Guy Pearse, Canon Fleming, and Dr. George Barrett have been amongst the distinguished list of men who have preached and spoken for it during the past century. This list in itself is enough to confer fame on any institution. But the chief fame of Stockport Sunday-school lies in its excellent work. Old scholars return from far and near, from America and other distant lands, to take part in its annual gatherings; to show their love for the place; to help others as they were helped. They are delighted to find that the school still increases yearly; that the sixty classes of the big school, and the various branch schools also, tend to become more numerous. They find as much pleasure as ever in joining the mighty volume of song that rises, Sunday after Sunday, from the throats of nearly 5,000 Stockportians in these schools, and they themselves sing with renewed fervour, and with a feeling of its truth, that grand hymn—

Digitized by Google

> Pleasant are Thy courts above,
> In that land of light and love;
> Pleasant are Thy courts below,
> In this land of sin and woe.

For God's courts in this Sunday-school are indeed pleasant, and have been, to more than 100,000 people! Surely the poet was thinking of such a body of Christians when he wrote, "Like a mighty army moves the Church of God."

I recollect asking a Gloucester native one day what his town was famous for and he replied, "For its lovely cathedral and for Robert Raikes!" I daresay he was not far out either. Robert Raikes has made Gloucester famous throughout the world. He began the first Sunday-school, as we know that institution to-day, in a small building in St. Catherine Street, Gloucester, and the date of that epoch in the world's history was July, 1780. It has been urged that we have traces of some Sunday-schools before Raikes's time. In any case such are very doubtful; but one thing is certain, and that is that to Robert Raikes belongs the credit of instituting a system of Sunday-schools, instead of confining efforts merely to some one local point.

Robert Raikes not only began this first Sunday-school in St. Catherine's Street, but he recommended the new enterprise to others in the pages of his father's and his own paper, the Gloucester Journal. He and his helper, the Rev. Thomas Stock, later started other schools and Raikes pioneered the school at St. Mary-le-Crypt, which afterwards became renowned. He went about to several towns advocating the necessity for starting schools, and in many such enterprises he was signally successful.

How the first idea of Sunday-schools, as they now exist, originated in the mind of Robert Raikes is doubtful, and has often been debated. One version says that he got wearied of seeing lazy lads lounge about the street corners of Gloucester on Sabbath days; another states that a woman called his attention to the bad influences that were affecting the minds of youths, and to the necessity of doing something to counteract such pernicious operations, but it may well be that even Raikes himself could not have told how the idea formed in his mind, for whatever the immediate cause which directed his thoughts into that channel, it was an inspiration from on high.

Raikes lived until 1811, and saw the system he had begun very widely extended. He saw the early beginning of the great school that I first spoke of in this article, though he could never have dreamed of what that school was afterwards to become. His name and fame will last for centuries. England and other countries have raised statues in his honour; that upon the Thames Embankment is perhaps the most celebrated of all.

His first Sunday-school was started in July, 1780, and had four teachers. Curious indeed to-day seems the old place—two ordinary houses to do duty as a Sunday-school; but this institution is not the first that began in a little way and grew to great things—the grain of mustard seed developing into a large tree. The Sunday-school in St. Catherine Street, Gloucester, must of necessity occupy a foremost place in any account of famous Sunday-schools.

Bristol can, on all ordinary occasions, claim to be one of the most interesting cities in these islands, and even in the matter of Sunday-schools it has a boast that none other can make. For Bristol can say, certainly without much fear of contradiction, that it has the largest Bible-class attached to any Sunday-school in this land. This Bible-class belongs to the Sunday-school section of the Wesleyan Church in Old Market Street, and may be said, compared with such institutions as the Stockport one, to be quite juvenile, for it only began in 1880, yet to-day it can point to over 1,000 names on its register, and to an average attendance each Sunday of hundreds upon hundreds, some 600 being no uncommon number! Churches are asking "Why don't men come to church?" and trying to answer their own query to their own satisfaction in their own way. But Bristol replies, "They do come, and they will come, if you go the right way to get them."

Digitized by Google

This class was started by Mr. Charles R. Parsons, who is still at the head of it, and most active in its work. He is beloved and respected in Bristol greatly. Mr. Parsons told the writer that it was in the Isle of Wight, in 1880, that he first felt called upon by God to start a Bible-class for men on his return to his own town. He resolved not to hold a meeting until fifty men had promised to join. As a matter of fact he got fifty-three to promise before the first meeting took place, and at that thirty-five turned up.

At the start, after the novelty had worn off, Mr. Parsons did not find it easy to keep them all together. But he had two schemes for so doing, and he found both thoroughly successful. The first was constant prayer for more members in the class itself, and a fixed resolve to obtain a greater number, which put the men on their mettle to reach that number. The second—note it, you ministers who complain in any church and chapel that men won't come to hear you!—was regular visiting. No man was allowed to slip lightly away once Mr. Parsons and his friends had got hold of him for the meetings each Sunday. Each man was visited again and again, and was made to feel that great interest was taken in him by all connected with the place. Hence arose that wonderful brotherly feeling which has kept this great class together, and made it such a power for God and good work.

Ten thousand men have belonged to this class during the past twenty years—ten thousand men! Think what such an army can do for the good of its fellows and for the spread of the Gospel! Think of the happy homes that means! Think of the evil temptations that have been kept out of men's way or avoided! It is like a fairy tale to read the account which Mr. Parsons has published of the progress and life-story of the Bible-class at this Wesleyan chapel during the past twenty years.

Especially have the men been looked after during times of sickness, trouble, or doubt. Tears stand in the eyes of many as they relate what their friends of the Bible-class have done for them during such days. One of the most pathetic and beautiful things I have seen for some time is the record kept by Mr. Parsons himself of the death of members belonging to his class, and in each case he has put down their words—often intended to be dying messages to their comrades—as their lives drew to the close.

Surely the Sunday-school where one who was Lord Chancellor of England taught regularly for forty-one years, even during the days when he sat on the woolsack, is entitled to an honoured place in any list of famous Sunday-schools. So let me put down the Sunday-school of St. Margaret's, Westminster, amongst such.

All Londoners know the ancient church of St. Margaret's in the Abbey grounds, but not everyone knows the more retired and less imposing Sunday-schools belonging to it, that stand back in the darker and dirtier streets of Westminster near the Royal Aquarium. In these schools began to teach, in the year 1836, a young barrister, one William Page Wood. He attended regularly to his duty there Sunday after Sunday. As he gradually rose to eminence in his profession it made no difference in his work at this Sunday-school. When he became a Minister of the Crown it was thought and even urged by some of his friends that he should resign his simple teaching duties at St. Margaret's, and take the Sunday rest after the week of trying work. But he refused.

And when at last, in 1868, this same barrister had risen to the very high rank of Lord Chancellor in Mr. Gladstone's administration, he astonished everybody by walking down simply to the Sunday-school on the following Sunday, and taking his class as usual, just as though he were not Baron Hatherley, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, but only the veriest ordinary Sunday-school teacher in some country village school.

All honour to such men; happy are those who sit at their feet. This school of St. Margaret's, Westminster, became a centre of example for the world, and what good has grown from that example, who shall say? Lord Hatherley continued his duties here after he had resigned the Lord Chancellorship, in fact until 1877. Then at last increasing age and illness compelled him reluctantly to give them up.

Digitized by Google

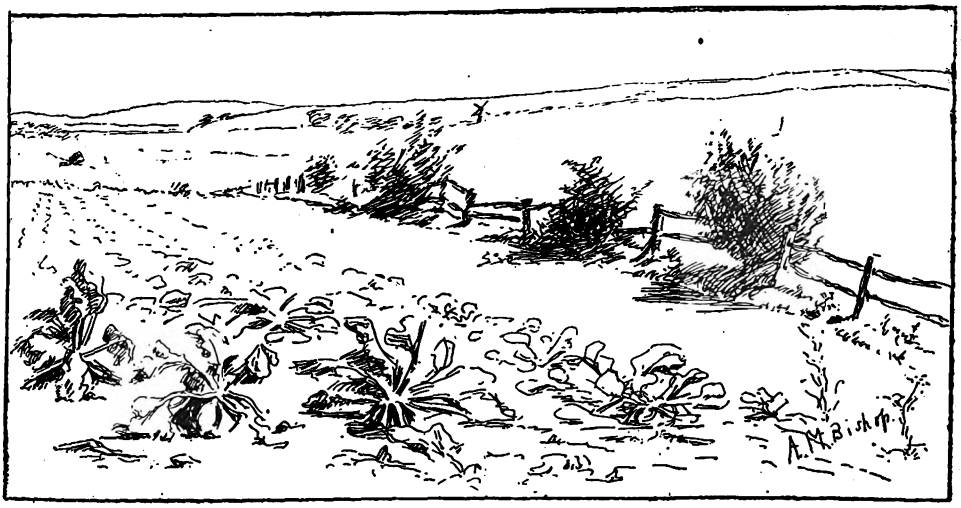
And he died four years later, amidst the sorrow and grief of thousands of young men who had learned to love him dearly for the help, sympathy, and kindness shown to them whilst they listened to him as their teacher in an ordinary Church Sunday-school.

There is another Sunday-school which must not be forgotten. It might well be called the "Sunday-school of the Bishops," for of the Vicars who have been at its head since 1837 not a single one has died without having been promoted first to higher honour as Dean or Bishop. I refer to the Sunday-school attached to the Parish Church of Leeds.

It is a great school—great in numbers, great in fame, great in its effect upon thousands of lives in the big Yorkshire towns, great in its offshoots. With it is connected the celebrated "Parish Church Football Club," the most celebrated of all "Church" athletic clubs in Britain, and one of the most famous Rugby clubs in the land. Connected with this famous Sunday-school have been the noble names of Dr. Hook, Dr. Atlay, Dr. Woodford, Dr. Gott, Dr. Jayne, Dr. Talbot and Dr. Gibson. What an unbroken succession of English bishops.

Still more revered by Yorkshire people is this school from the fact of what those connected with it did for Leeds. Yorkshiremen do not forget that when cholera raged in Leeds half a century ago, it was the curates (who taught in this school on Sundays) who braved the terrible scourge and went boldly to death, in order to help and wait upon the cholera victims in their own homes in the slums of Leeds. Two or three of these gallant clergymen died—as truly martyrs of the Church as any that ever burned at the stake. But their deaths were, indeed, not in vain, for they have since borne fruit one hundredfold in many ways. And the scholars at this Sunday-school have ever a true conception before them, in connection with their own school, of what "Duty" means, what "Christian love" means, what "true bravery" means. Is not such a Sunday-school properly ranked amongst the famous ones of our land?

GEORGE A. WADE.



Digitized by Google

In the Public Eye

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

THE name of Cutcliffe Hyne is one familiar to the great bulk of English-speaking people, for there are few now who have not read and revelled in the doings of that most extraordinary character, Captain Kettle. The clever author of this most entertaining series of stories was born at Bibury, Gloucestershire, in 1866, his father being the Rev. C. W. N. Hyne. He was educated at the Bradford Grammar School, afterwards going to Clare College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. Healways had a taste for writing, though his first book, "The New Eden," was not written, or at any rate published, until 1892. After this there followed in quick succession "A Recipe for Diamonds," "Honour of Thieves," "The Stronger Hand," and "The Adventures of Captain Kettle," this last being the one by which he is best known.

MR. C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE.
The creator of "Captain Kettle."
Photograph by Rosemont, Leeds.

His marriage with Elsie, the daughter of the late John Haggas, of Ingrow, took place in 1897, since which time he has lived in his pretty home, Oak Vale, Bradford. He has one little boy, but the pleasures of home life have in no sense diminished his great love of travel, his wife being generally with him as travelling companion. He makes a point of covering a certain number of miles every year, his instinctive desire for change making him willing to put up with any amount of hardship and inconvenience in his search after new ground and fresh ideas. His tramp through Russian Lapland in company with a well-known artist who supplied the sketches for his book on the subject was, perhaps, one of the hardest, but at the same time one of the most novel and difficult trips taken by this inveterate traveller, who can boast of having visited the Balearic and Canary Isles, the Congo Free State, Gold Coast, North America, Mexican Gulf Keys, Algeria, Tunisia, and other places.

Digitized by Google

His favourite recreations are yachting, shooting, driving and dancing, while within the last year he has become an ardent automobilist. Camping out, with all its attendant discomforts, is a matter of keen enjoyment to him, and no matter how cross grained surrounding conditions may be, he generally has a cheerful smile ready for his friends. He has most genial manners, and is a capital host and most entertaining companion. Added to this, he is industrious, studious, a hard worker and most business-like man, while his fondness for animals is such that he generally has a dog and a cat in close attendance upon him. Taking him all round, he is a strong healthy Englishman, standing fully six feet three inches high, with a wholesome enjoyment of life, and a great desire to make others as happy as himself.

AS the inventor of the telephone, the name of Dr. Alexander Graham Bell is one well known, but as a philanthropist and worker among that pitifully afflicted class, the deaf and dumb, he is little known outside his adopted country, America. Yet, before the claims of the telephone finally took his entire time, he had started an experiment of his own, whereby deaf children could learn by "visible speech" to hear, and thus be able to take their place in the world as speaking mortals. It may have been his decided leaning towards the study of acoustics as well as the sad deafness of his own wife, that first turned his thoughts in this direction, but, however that may be, he decided to try a system proposed by George Dalgarno more than 200 years ago, by which the sense of seeing should be used instead of hearing.

The mother with her baby would write down the loving little sentences, words and nursery rhymes that go to make up baby talk, and the child, using its eyes, would understand by sight instead of sound. Later, characters could be written down representing the sound of words; then these could be spoken with the lips, and the child seeing the form of sound, would try to imitate, and could be shown again and again until enunciation was perfect.

At that time there were no schools where deaf children could be taken from such an early age, and Dr. Bell becoming acquainted with a deaf child of five years of age, determined to try his scheme. Within a year the child was using writing materials and fully understanding speech in that way; then a course of "visible speech," as devised by Dr. Bell's father, followed, and wonderful progress was being made, when the need of developing the telephone completely absorbed its inventor's thoughts. For a number of years he had no practical connection with the instruction of the deaf; but the wonderful success of this particular case had aroused a great deal of attention, and Dr. Bell was the recipient of so many letters of enquiry from anxious parents, that in 1883 he determined to open a private experimental school where his principles could be carried out. The system of teaching was unique. Lessons were given by means of a phonetic alphabet invented by Dr. Bell's father, the children closely following the lips of the teacher and placing their own in similar position. No audible word was spoken at first, but by means of object lessons, they were gradually taught to understand the meaning of words, until at last the idea of speech was fully established.

The sense of touch was also cultivated, and the school was prospering greatly when litigation with regard to the telephone set in, and it had to be closed after three years of valuable work. Dr. Bell, in his generosity however, provided for the entire future education of the children he had had under his care. Since then other and newer schemes have been set on foot, but to Dr. Bell must be given the credit of first initiating the idea of teaching the deaf from their earliest babyhood and in the only sensible way.

VERY little is known in England of the Hungarian peasant and of his life in his native country. By the majority of people he is supposed to be of a turbulent, revolutionary nature, but this is far from being the case, and it is this erroneous idea that Mrs. Peirano has for long been endeavouring to overcome by introducing his beautiful industries into England, and striving to show the real side of his national character.

Digitized by Google

Born in Kalozsvar, Transylvania, a daughter of the Martonfy family, Mrs. Peirano has all her life had a strong emotional love for her country, which was in no sense diminished during her education in the convent of Notre Dame de Sion. After her marriage she came to England, but although she has made it her home, her heart still yearns after her own country, and every year she revisits it, making driving tours from village to village, and coming into close contact with the peasantry, by whom she is much loved. She tells some delightfully interesting stories about these people, their wonderful hospitality to the stranger, and the cordiality with which they will welcome him inside their doors if he shows any desire to see the interior of their homes with the simple treasures they contain. These they will display with an intense pride, which is not strange when it is considered that they are entirely the work of their own hands.

MRS. PEIRANO.
Who has done so much to encourage the growth of Home Industries in Hungary.
Photograph by Langfier.

Entering the front parlour or salle the visitor will find himself in what is almost a museum, for all round him is work of all kinds, beautiful hangings and carpets, cushions and rugs, made by the hostess and her family in their leisure moments; the colouring in many cases quite Oriental, rich blues and reds intermixed with tinsel thread. On the walls will be pottery of all shapes and sizes made by the men—jugs, plates, and dishes embellished with designs, crude perhaps, but founded on incidents in daily life, and showing much observation of detail.

Thus without educated skill have these simple peasants worked from time immemorial with no idea of monetary reward, and it was only by chance that the value of this work and industry was discovered. Some years ago an Industrial Exhibition was held at Buda Pesth, and the Baroness de Daniel, wife of the Royal Hungarian Minister of Commerce, organised a section devoted to home industries. The Empress Queen, visiting the Exhibition, desired to purchase some of the work, and was told it was not for sale. Public attention was thus aroused, and a committee of ladies formed to take the matter in hand. Later a Society was formed in England by Mr. Louis Felbermann, and Mrs. Peirano was asked to become one of the Vice-Presidents. Since then she has done much, by means of sales and exhibitions at her own house and elsewhere, to forward this industry, so that in course of time English people may be brought to realise the artistic worth and beauty of this peasant handiwork.

DR. LUDWIG MOND, Ph.D., the eminent chemist, was born at Cassel, in 1839, and educated at the Polytechnic School, Cassel, and at the Universities of Marburg and Heidelberg. In 1862 he came to England, where he engaged in the Leblanc Soda Industry, and introduced his process for recovering sulphur from alkali waste. In the year 1873 the partnership with Mr. Brunner was entered into, and their colossal works for the manufacture of ammonia soda by the Solway process—a process which the doctor greatly perfected—are the largest in the world.

Dr. Mond has made many other remarkable scientific discoveries—for instance, the combination of chlorine with the ammonia soda process; the consumption of ordinary fuel in gas producers with the recovery of ammonia as a bye-product, and a new mode of manufacturing pure nickel. But the greatest and most marvellous of his scientific achievements is the gas known by his name, and which promises to revolutionise English commerce. Dr. Mond claims that his gas will do anything that steam now does, at a minimum cost; when steam engines are propelled by Mond gas, millions of tons of coal will be saved. A valuable bye-product is obtainable from the fuel used in the production of Mond gas. Best of all, this marvellous discovery—which engages the interest of the whole scientific world—promises to abolish the smoke fiend from our atmosphere. Imagine London without coal-smoke! No more furnaces belching forth polluting coal smoke in our manufacturing cities; a clear, clean air to breathe.

Digitized by Google

Dr. Mond has a pleasant residence at Regent's Park, where he and his charming wife receive a literary and artistic circle.

Here may be seen a collection of objets d'art, including chefs-d'œuvre of the early Italian School of Painters.

His country seat is Winnington, Northwich; and he also owns the Palazza Luccari, Rome. He is a member of the leading London clubs, and it may be incidentally mentioned that it was owing to Dr. Mond's munificence that the Davy-Faraday Laboratory was formed and endowed at a cost of £100,000 at the Royal Institution, in 1896.

ONE of the staunchest and most valued supporters of mission work in Scotland is Mr. John Stephen, senior partner of one of the great shipbuilding firms in Govan. Mr. Stephen has done a splendid work in connection with the foreign missions of the Church. He is a member of the Foreign Mission Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland, and has done great service in giving his time and money in the consolidating of the various departments—industrial, educational, and evangelistic — in the mission field, and also in forming the Blythswood, Livingstonia, and Kilwezi Missions. As Chairman of the African Lakes Corporation he has been enabled by his position and his sympathy to render special aid by opening up the districts around Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika and by developing trade there; thus establishing commercial connections and means of communication for missionaries of the Established and United Free Churches of Scotland. Through his interest young men have been sent to perform a service which cannot be too highly recognised as Artisan Missionaries to Central Africa. The real practical interest taken by him in the civilisation and religious teaching of the African people has given him the name of "The Apostle of Africa."

Mr. Stephen's zeal for foreign missions has not interfered with his interest in home missions. As a member of the

MR. JOHN STEPHEN.
One of Scotland's staunchest supporters of Foreign Missions.

Digitized by Google

Ferguson Bequest Fund, the most important in Scotland for Church organisation, he does a good work. He is a member of the United Free Church Extension Committee, which has an admirable record in the erection of churches all over Scotland.

The site occupied by the Govan Y.M.C.A. was given by him, and the artistic and spacious building now owned by the Association was the result of his financial help and admistrative power.

This love for the welfare and future of the youth of Govan has always had a large place in his heart, and although busily engaged in business life, his time and gifts are always in demand, and he does all in the spirit of Jesus Christ with humility, and without ostentation, which marks him out as a true Christian gentleman.

MISS CLAYTON THOMAS, the composer of "A Japanese Love Song," was born in Boston, where she obtained her first musical knowledge. From an early age she had the gift of improvising and harmonising, and long before she knew a note on the piano, people would take a delight in watching the little child's fingers unerringly extracting a melody from the keys.

At fourteen she toured with an opera company and appeared in several principal characters. Among the souvenirs of this association is a handsome gold watch and chain, a present from some public body she had benefited by her services.

Then followed concert tours, when Miss Thomas met artists of repute, who, one and all, advised her to go to London for study.

Eventually she crossed the Atlantic, and became a pupil of Signor Randegger, subsequently appearing under the name of Salome Thomas at several concerts and At Homes. Possessing a high soprano voice of both purity and sweetness, she is, in addition, a good pianist. Miss Thomas decided to take pupils, but seeing how this field is overcrowded, and that it is only the specialist who can hope to succeed, the ingenious American struck out on the comparatively little worked path of teaching ladies to play their accompaniments to their own songs.

Meanwhile the practice of composition was going on, but so small an opinion did she hold of her own powers that she scarcely breathed her ambitions to herself. While staying with some friends in Wales, she was persuaded to sing some of her own songs, among others "A Japanese Love Song," when there was such frank admiration that, acting on the general advice, she sent the song to Mr. Boosey, who at once accepted it. Since then, the sale has reached 17,000 copies in England alone, and the American popularity is equally great. The same firm are shortly bringing out another song of the same quaintly humorous kind, which Miss Thomas composed a few months ago. After three years' hard work and study in England, she looks forward to taking a trip home to her own country next year. Like all Americans, she has seen all the sights of London, but in a more leisurely fashion than the ordinary tourist, and last summer visited Edinburgh and the Highlands and several noted places in the north, afterwards travelling to Paris and Belgium.

MISS CLAYTON THOMAS.
Composer of a "A Japanese Love Song," of which 17,000 copies have been sold in England.

Digitized by Google

MRS. MIRRLEES.
For 25 years President of the Glasgow Y.W.C.A.
Photograph by Brinkley and Son, Glasgow.

MRS. MIRRLEES, the generous lady who is President of the Young Women's Christian Association in Glasgow, has endeared herself to the hearts of the young women of that city and the West of Scotland generally. Wherever young women's Christian work is being done in the district Mrs. Mirrlees is always to be found, ready with her time, gifts, and finances to help on any good work for her sex. All is done, too, in that quiet, humble manner which enhances the gift and is a mark of its sincerity. Mrs. Mirrlees is happiest when engaged in this service for the Master, and her beneficence to institutions all over the country, but especially for those which help young women, is most valuable and much appreciated.

Mrs. Mirrlees has been for twenty-five years the President of the Young Women's Christian Association, a sufficient proof in itself of her popularity and devotion to the work.

The handsome apartments provided for the members, with every accommodation for boarding, and all the attractions of a home, with the social and religious advantages of a thoroughly equipped public institution, have been very largely the outcome of her efforts and self-sacrifice.

A young woman coming as a stranger to the city gets a hearty welcome, and is surrounded by a homely, religious atmosphere which is a safeguard from the many allurements of a large city.

Let us hope that Mrs. Mirrlees may be long spared to do this noble work of raising the womanhood of our country.

LORD OVERTOUN'S interest and sympathy with all branches of Christian work are well known and are manifested in the most practical fashion.

Nothing is known to the world of his private benefactions; these are hidden almost from himself, the left hand not knowing what the right hand doeth; but of the money given publicly to various bodies all over the country a few donations may be mentioned. The Christian Institute in Glasgow, erected at a cost of £30,000, was built as the outcome chiefly of his liberality. He gave £10,000 for the building of the Bible Training Institute, £5,000 to the Technical College, £5,000 to the Art Galleries, £2,000 for a Y.W.C.A. in Glasgow, and £10,000 to the town of Dumbarton. These are a few of the larger subscriptions given by this worthy peer, but it would take up too much space to give a full list of the Churches, Schemes, Schools, and all kinds of organisations supported by Lord Overtoun.

His munificence to institutions which aim at doing good is almost limitless. Many givers' interest ends with their bounty, but he gives of his time and talents ungrudgingly for the welfare of the people, and is as much at home in the pulpit as on the political platform. He was closely associated with Messrs. Moody and Sankey

LORD OVERTOUN.
All branches of religious work claim his sympathy and support.

Digitized by Google

during their visits to this country, and identified himself with all their work.

He conducts a Bible-class of 500 at Dumbarton every Sunday, is Chairman of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association, Chairman of the Christian Institute, Chairman of the Y.M.C.A. Club, and Convener of the County Council of Dumbarton. Religious denominations of all kinds throughout the country, but particularly in the West of Scotland, look upon him as a true friend. Amidst a very busy business life, every appeal for help receives attention and his numerous engagements are fulfilled with scrupulous care. His time, his wealth, and his opportunities are considered by him as grave responsibilities, for which he must give an account. Riches are quite as great a touchstone in testing character as poverty, and many a man has felt it so, the influence of wealth and power being too much for him. This danger is escaped when a man places himself unreservedly in the hands of God, as Lord Overtoun has done; indeed, the temptation of possessing riches seems to have made him all the more anxious to cultivate the humble and quiet spirit which should be conspicuous in all Christians.

His home life is simple and Christ-like, and many a hearty welcome has been extended to pilgrims to his beautiful seat at Overtoun, overlooking the Clyde valley, where conferences and societies have been entertained, and personal kindness shown them which they will not readily forget.

NOVELTY nowadays is one of the greatest charms of life, and perhaps this is why Miss Olive Christian Malvery has already succeeded so well, as she supplies this in an altogether exceptional degree. Young though she is, she has made an enviable name for herself as a performer of rare genius, talent, and graceful presence. Born in Lahore, India, the only child of a singularly beautiful mother, her childhood was a somewhat lonely one, and many were the poetical fancies and dreams she wove to herself as she wandered in the grounds surrounding her grandfather's house; while out of these early dreams has she fashioned most of the charming fairy tales and mystic Indian stories with which she now delights her English audiences.

MISS OLIVE MALVERY.
Whose Indian Stories have won her fame.
Photograph by Albert Salmon, Forest Hill.

Educated in her native country, she spent much of her time in travelling, during which period she acquired the knowledge of three Oriental languages, English and a little French. She visited Cashmere twice, and then the strange mysterious charm in her clear full voice prompted the suggestion that she should come to England to study singing as a profession. In her veins was running both Scotch and French blood, her paternal great-grandfather being a French officer who had married an Indian lady, while her great grandfather on her mother's side was a Scotchman, bearing a commission in the Company's service, who had also taken to himself an Indian bride; but during these four generations no member of her family had visited this country.

Thus it was that, armed with a few introductions but otherwise knowing no one and alone, she came to England as a very young girl just three years ago, and now she cannot speak with sufficient gratitude of the kindness, hospitality, and generosity which she, a stranger in a strange land, received at the hands of all those with whom she came in contact.

Digitized by Google

She went at once to the Royal College of Music, where she studied singing for two years under Mr. Henry Blower. At the close of this time she went to Miss Burt (Miss Fanny Heywood) to study elocution and dramatic art, and was then told that her gift for this was so great that she ought to take it up seriously.

The knowledge of her power and the difficulty of finding anything really original to do, suggested to her that some of her Indian fancies might be acceptable for recitation, and she determined to put the idea into effect. Since the age of six, she had been devoted to writing, her first story being published when she was only thirteen, and out of the inborn romance of her nature, she evolved the delightful Indian stories, legends and fairy tales which are rapidly making her name famous, and which have been set to suitable music by Mr. William Y. Hurlstone. These she gives with rare dramatic intensity and power, and though this is but her first season, she is in constant requisition all over the country.

MISS NANCY BAILEY.
Who has opened indexing as a Profession for Women.

Her few leisure moments are employed in writing, her Indian short stories being in much demand, while she is also writing a long novel to order. Further, she has several pupils for elocution, all of whom she describes as being delightfully devoted and enthusiastic. There is nothing she enjoys so much as being able to find time to re-visit her friends at the Royal College of Music, where she says with gratitude that many of her happiest hours were spent. One of her great delights is to recite and speak in some of the Halls set among the slums of London, where those who love the people gather then for social and religious benefits. Among many such audiences "Miss Malvery" is a name to conjure with. Working men and coster girls, street lads, children, and old women love the "little lady," as they call her, while her artistic work wins her a wide welcome from those who walk in the pleasant places of the world's garden.

MOST people have appreciated the usefulness of an exhaustive index, but probably few have given a thought to the labour involved in its compiling, and yet this is great. No one is more fitted to speak upon this point than Miss Nancy Bailey, who holds the unique position of having opened the position to women, and being herself at the head of the only indexing office in London.

When Miss Bailey first came to London as a very young girl intent upon earning her living, she had no decided plans, though her tastes lay in a literary direction. After a time, she obtained work on "The Year's Art," for which she compiled an index of artists' names gathered from various sources. She also did some article writing; but all this time her mind was running on indexing, for she saw the poverty and carelessness of indexes as they were, and resolved to try and evolve some better plan. Then by chance the editor of Hansard asked her to index the current numbers, and in fear and trembling she undertook the work. She had absolutely no knowledge of Parliamentary procedure, and many were the nights and days she spent wrestling with difficulties in the Speaker's ruling, and striving to give her index a satisfactory form. Now, she found the usefulness of her pre-conceived method, and from 1889 to 1891 she carried out the work with great success. Then for a time the contract passed into other hands, but, having made a start, Miss Bailey was not slow to act upon it.

Taking a room in Poet's Corner, Westminster, at five shillings a week, which served the triple purpose of bedroom, sitting-room, and office, she drew out an indexing circular, which she took to various offices, obtaining at last a post on Pearson's Weekly as indexer. From that time forward, success was assured. Indexing work flowed in, and she was again asked to undertake Hansard. But perhaps the greatest triumph of all was when she was given 356 volumes of old Hansard to index, beginning from the time of William IV. until the close of the late Queen's reign. Each volume contains from 1,500 to 2,000 pages, all of which she has read with unswerving diligence. She is now on the 349th volume, and she hopes to finish the task, which has already taken over five years, in about twelve months. On its completion, there will be four volumes of 2,000 pages of index in each.

Digitized by Google

Now, after ten years' work, instead of the five shillings a week room, she has a whole house at 12, Little College Street, Westminster, for which she pays £200 a year, and where she has twelve ladies in constant employment. She has already trained about 70 women in the work, many of whom are making a comfortable livelihood; and sitting in her pleasant room overlooking the Church House, surrounded by photographs of M.P.'s and other well known men, Miss Bailey can congratulate herself upon the result of the wonderful courage and determination to overcome obstacles, which have placed her in her present position. The large cheery room in which her workers are accommodated, with its nests of pigeon holes arranged round the walls, each containing slips placed in alphabetical order, testify to the method and care with which the work is carried out; while Miss Bailey can relate with pride that she has been invited to go to America to open the profession to women out there.

BRIGHT, sparkling, and original, it is little wonder that Miss Helen Mar, the American story-teller, took the heart of her audiences by storm when she came over to England on a flying visit just six years ago, or that her success should have been so great that she has stayed here ever since. Born in the Far West of America, among her earliest recollections are the lessons in recitation given her by her mother, who was an adept in the art, and the knowledge thus gained induced her, when she had finished her scholastic education, to go once a week to a Kindergarten school, to teach the children how to recite. Imbued with a keen sense of humour, her risible faculties were often severely taxed during the lessons by the extreme candour and extraordinary nasal earnestness of the children; and it gradually dawned upon her that others might be amused in the same way if she could reproduce something of the effect, and thus was laid the foundation of those American child stories which have since become inalienably associated with her name.

At the age of seventeen she went to Boston, and there resolved by one bold stroke to see of what she was capable. Without seeking advice or help from any one, she hired a hall from the Young Men's Christian Association, scattered tickets freely among the members and press of the town, and made her first appearance in a hall literally packed with paper. It was a bold stroke, but like all true artists, Miss Mar had confidence in her own ability and felt certain of success. Alone she held the attention of her audience, reciting scenes from Shakespeare, harrowing pieces such as "The Maniac," and various pathetic little stories; and then, with applause ringing in her ears, she awaited results. Her pluck was justified, as the Press the next morning rang with plaudits of the talented young girl who had so suddenly appeared. After this, success followed success, and when later she came to England and made her first appearance at a charity performance, it was repeated to such good effect that a well known dramatic critic called upon her the next morning and urged her to make a long professional stay in England, as he was sure she would never regret it. She took his advice, and though for some time she was only heard principally in benefit performances at which she gave her services, still the ice was broken at last, and she received her first English fee, since which time she has never had to complain of lack of work.

Her method of telling her child stories is so natural, and the charm of her personality is so great, that from Royalty downwards she has succeeded in winning golden opinions for herself, and making a place in the hearts of all those who have heard her.

Digitized by Google

THAT the love of science is hereditary is evidenced by the fact that the Rev. F. A. Walker, D.D., F.L.S., who possesses a fine private entomological and botanical collection, is the son of the late Mr. Francis Walker, of Elm Hall, Wanstead, who was the most voluminous and industrious writer on entomology of his time, and a Fellow of the Linnean, Entomological, and Geological Societies of London. His career as an author commenced in 1832, his principal work being catalogues of the National collection. Of the Lepidoptera Heterocera alone, he catalogued and described upwards of 23,000 species, these being contained in thirty-five volumes and taking eleven years to compile. Other catalogues, of nearly every order of insects, were drawn up by him, the whole constituting an amount of labour seldom, if ever, accomplished before by one individual. He died on October 5th, 1874, leaving the mantle of his wonderful love and knowledge of entomology to descend to his son.

Photo by REV. DR. WALKER. F. A. O'Neill.
The Celebrated Entomologist.

Dr. Walker, who received his early education at Highgate Grammar School, attributes his resolution some day to "do something" in Iceland to the report of a lecture he received which was given on that country by Marquis (then Viscount) Dufferin at the Highgate Institute in or about 1857. Later on he carried out this determination and settled the long vexata quæstio as to whether butterflies were to be found there or not, by the discovery—until fresh evidence is forthcoming to the contrary—that not a single butterfly occurs in the whole island. He only arrived at this conclusion after three times visiting at least fifteen fjords on the W., N. and E. coasts of the island, making a total of 45 visits in all. Many of the said fjords have never before been scientifically explored by any English entomologist, Dr. Walker being also the first to collect on and report upon the Westmann Islands, south of Iceland. A copy of his pamphlet on the botany and entomology of Iceland holds an honoured place in the public library at Reykjavik, and also on the two Danish mail steamers that ply between that town and Copenhagen.

During his ministerial career, Dr. Walker has done work in populous and arduous parishes in various parts of the metropolis under five Bishops of London. At one time he was rector for upwards of seven years of a Cambridgeshire parish, when his work as an author continuing uninterruptedly he compiled a most useful "History of the Parish of Dry Drayton." At the close of his ministry there, he paid two visits to Bible lands, forming antiquarian and scientific collections on each occasion and embodying the results of his travels in two works, printed for private circulation, entitled respectively "L'Orient" and "Nine Hundred Miles up the Nile."

THE ONLOOKER.

Digitized by Google

CURIOUS OFFICES HELD BY WOMEN IN THE PAST.

By CHARLOTTE CARMICHAEL STOPES.

WE are all accustomed to the idea of a woman holding the highest office in the State, that of the Sovereign, but comparatively few seem to remember how many other important offices women have held at some time or other since the Conquest.

Women have not played the same part in our history as Queens Regent and tutors of young kings as they have played in France and in Scotland, yet some queens have been left Regents of the Kingdom in the absence of their husbands, as Queen Philippa was, and Queen Katherine Parr.

Mary Tudor, daughter of Henry VIII. and Katharine of Arragon, was made the first Princess Regnant of Wales in 1525, when she was about ten years old—a beautiful and gracious girl. All the world shone bright on her when she was sent to hold her Court at Ludlow Castle, with her own Council and State officials and all royal formality, in order to conciliate the Welsh. After about eighteen months her father cast her down from her high estate, and her later life was marred, first by oppression and then by misfortune.

Women could be made nobles in their own right. Margaret, Countess of Norfolk, was made Duchess of Norfolk by Richard II.; Anne Boleyn, Marchioness of Pembroke by Henry VIII.; and Lady Mary Compton was made Countess of Buckingham by James I., during the lifetime of her husband, though he was not allowed to share the honour.

Not only in books of romances, or in Spenser's "Faery Queene," but in real life women could be knights. Abergavenny Castle was held by knights' service by Eva de Braose, daughter and heir of William Lord Braose. She married William, Baron Cautilupe, and her daughter Eva succeeded to the Barony and was made a knight. Her tomb in St. Mary's Church, Abergavenny, the date of which is 1247, is the only instance known in which the stone effigy of a woman has been preserved adorned with the insignia of knighthood.

Mary Tudor and Elizabeth were both made knights before they were crowned Queens. When all her people flocked to her standard at Tilbury at the time of the threatened Spanish invasion, Elizabeth knighted an enthusiastic lady, Mary, wife of the younger Sir Hugh Cholmondeley, of Vale-Royal, Cheshire. In his "Progress" in 1617, King James visited her, and called her "The bold Lady of Cheshire!" Two other ladies may be said to have acted as knights in the Royal service. Baroness Arundel of Wardour defended her castle for the King in 1643, until she had exhausted her resources, when she arranged terms of an honourable surrender. Charlotte, Countess of Derby, defended Lathom Castle for three months against the Parliamentary forces under General Fairfax in 1644, until she was relieved by the Royalists. She afterwards defended the Isle of Man, but a faithless servant betrayed her.

The old laws of inheritance had been changed at the Conquest, and the Norman customs prevailed almost unchanged for five hundred years. Estates being held by military service, all the sons succeeded in order of age before any of the daughters. But the daughters inherited before any male relative, uncle or cousin. There was this distinction made. The eldest son inherited to the disadvantage of his brothers, but the eldest daughter shared equally with her sisters. Sometimes a title or office, being an indivisible inheritance, was said to lapse among the daughters. But it generally was granted to the eldest daughter in association with the chief property.

Digitized by Google

When a woman found herself sole heir (and that seemed to happen oftener in these old times than it does now), she inherited, exactly as if she were a male heir, not only the family lands and titles, but all hereditary responsibilities, privileges, or public offices. However apparently unsuited to a woman, they had always rich perquisites associated with them, and these were secured to her, while she might do the service by deputy. Women have always been allowed the privilege of proxy.

Hence women have been Marshals of England. Isabel de Clare, the only daughter of Richard de Clare, Earl of Pembroke, brought the Earldom to the family of the Marshals of England by marrying Walter le Marshal. They had five sons, each of whom succeeded and left no heir, and five daughters, among whom the property was divided. The eldest of these, Maud, Countess of Norfolk, succeeded to the office of Marshal, and in the reign of Henry III. "received Livery by the King himself of the Marshal's rod, being the eldest, who by inheritance ought to enjoy that great office by descent from Walter Marischal, sometime Earl of Pembroke. Whereupon the Lord Treasurer and the Barons of the Exchequer had command to cause her to have all the rights thereto belonging, and to admit of such a deputy to sit in the Exchequer for her as she should assign." ("Dugdale's Peerage," I. 77).

Her son Roger exercised the office as her deputy during her life, and succeeded her at her death. Alicia de Bégod, his widow, succeeded him in the honour. Among the Parliament Rolls of Edward I., there is a petition from Alicia de Bégod, Countess Marshal, to be allowed to send two proxies to the King's Council at Carlisle. This must have been granted, for these two proxies appear in her name in the list of members. But she was summoned personally by writ, on January 22nd, in right of her office, to meet Edward II. and his bride at Dover, on or about the 4th of February.

The office of Marshal and the title of Earl of Norfolk were afterwards granted "intail general" to Thomas Brotherton, son of Edward I. and brother of Edward II. His daughter Margaret inherited office and title, and appears in the Parliament Roll of Richard II. as "Margaret Countess Marshal."

Women have held the office of High Constable, which now has been confided to Lord Roberts. Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford and Essex, held the Manors of Harlefield Newnam and Whytenhurst, County Gloucester, by the service of High Constable. He left two daughters, but the elder, Eleanor, succeeded to the office, which she conveyed to her husband, Thomas of Woodstock, who exercised it for her at the Coronation of Richard I.

A woman is even eligible to the office of Royal Champion. The manor of Scrivelly was held by the Dymocks, on condition of the possessor acting as King's Champion. When the heiress, Margaret, inherited the property, she inherited the office, which her son Thomas exercised for her at the Coronation of Henry IV.

A woman could also be High Steward. Henry, Earl of Leicester, held the Barony of Hinckley with the office of High Steward of England. He left two daughters, but, as the elder married abroad, the dignity fell to the younger sister, who married John of Gaunt. Through her right he exercised the office of Steward. The High Chamberlain of England has often been a woman. In a note concerning the Officers of the King, Maitland says "Deputy Chamberlains of the Exchequer . . . Of the two hereditary Chamberlainships one seems to have been vested in the Earl of Warwick, while the other had belonged to Isabella, Countess of Albermarle, and is in the King's hand."

Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick, was one of the Chamberlains of the Exchequer, in right of Anne, his late wife, sister and heir of Henry, late Duke of Warwick, Chamberlain of the Exchequer.

The interesting fact concerning this office is that it has been held even in our own times by a woman, Lady Willoughby d'Eresby, though she allowed her son to exercise it for her.

Not only in public or personal duties to their sovereign did women hold office. One dignity which has often been held by women is that of High Sheriff of the County. Ela of Salisbury was born in 1188, and her father, the Earl of Salisbury, died in 1196, leaving her sole heir, though he had three brothers. King Richard married her, as Royal ward, to his half-brother, William Longespée, the son of Fair Rosamond, who, through her, became Earl of Salisbury. He died in 1226, leaving four sons and four daughters. Though besieged with suitors, Ela preferred a free widowhood to choosing another Earl of Salisbury. When her eldest son came of age, he claimed the Earldom, but the King and Court refused it, because his inheritance was derived from his living mother and not from his dead father. The office of High Sheriff of Wiltshire she exercised in person until late in the reign of Henry II., when, probably to permit her son's entrance into responsible life, she retired as Abbess to Lacock Abbey, which she had herself founded. But even then the powers would not grant her son her titles, and she survived both son and grandson. In the list of the Sheriffs of Wiltshire in "Fuller's Worthies," we find Elizabeth, Countess of Wiltshire, entered for many years during the reign of Henry III., though she employed a deputy for most of her duties.

Digitized by Google

In 1305, the Countess Dowager of Cornwall was Sheriff of Rutland.

Isabella and Idouea de Neteripont held the office of High Sheriff of Westmoreland, and insisted on the burghers bringing their cases before them personally. Idouea married Roger de Clifford, and carried the office into his family. Years afterwards the office was held by a brave lady, at a critical period in the fortunes of women. Anne Clifford was born 1590, the daughter of George, Earl of Cumberland, and his noble but neglected wife, Margaret Russell. Her father died in 1605, and a woman being then considered of age for certain purposes at 14, she chose her mother her guardian, who forthwith instituted proceedings against her brother-in-law, the new Earl of Cumberland, which lasted till his death. The Earldom of Cumberland, a comparatively new creation, had been entailed in heirs male, but the Baronies of Clifford, Westmoreland, and Vesey, with all the lands and castles in Westmoreland belonging to them, he also seized, though entailed on the heir general, which means that they could fall to a daughter. Favoured by the King, and his powerful friends, the Earl was enabled to hold them against his niece, in spite of her private and public petitions. His son, her cousin, Henry, was even summoned to Parliament by the title of Lord Clifford, which she bitterly resented. In 1609 she married Richard Sackville, Earl of Dorset.

There was to have been a great trial of her case in the House of Lords in 1615, but her husband agreed with the Earl of Cumberland to submit the matter to the arbitration of the King, which she would not consent to do, standing upon her rights, though she was even brought before the King at Whitehall, to yield to his arbitration, "which I utterly refused to do, and was thereby brought to many and great troubles." Her uncle offered £20,000 as an equivalent for the Westmoreland estates, which offer she would not even consider. Her prodigal husband then attempted to strain his marital rights, and, backed by the King, signed the agreement with her uncle, which she refused to acknowledge, and, by her firmness, defeated the plans of the trio. She was determined to preserve her ancient inheritance. Her husband died in 1624, and the contest was pursued with renewed vigour. In 1628, there were laid before the Court, "Reasons to prove that, by the Common Law, dignities conferred by Writ of Summons to Parliament descend to females, when there is a sole heir, being the reasons alleged for Mary, Lady Fane, in her suit for the Barony of Abergavenny in 1587, with other reasons to show that such dignities by custom and reason descend to heirs female, produced on behalf of Anne, claiming to be Lady Clifford." But the reasons, accepted as valid in the earlier case, were not now in this transition stage sufficient to oust the uncle in possession.

In 1630 she married Philip, Earl of Montgomery, who shortly afterwards became also Earl of Pembroke by the death of his brother. In 1641 her uncle died, leaving one son and one daughter. Her cousin became the Earl of Cumberland, retaining the contested baronies, but died two years later without male heir, when, without further dispute, Anne stepped into her inheritance in 1644 in front of his heirs, thereby proving her original right. On the death of her second husband she went north to fortify her castles, but the Parliamentarians demolished them again and again. She said that, "As often as Cromwell pulled them down she would build them up again"; and at last, in admiration of her spirit, he gave orders that she should be let alone. At first she had some trouble with her tenants. A cloth-worker having bought a property under her, by the yearly rent of one hen, he refused to acknowledge her his Seigneuress by paying it. She sued him for it successfully, and though she spent £200 in expenses she secured that hen.

Digitized by Google

It was the symbol of a principle to her. In her youth she had not been allowed by her father to study classics, but she had made the best use of her studies under Daniel, the poet and historiographer. She was a great student of history, heraldry, and precedent, and thereby became aware of the illegal tendency to encroach on the ancient privileges of women, which she felt it her duty to preserve. In her Diary, she notes: "As the King came out of Scotland, there arose a strife between my father and my Lord Burleigh, who was then President, who should carie the sword, but it was adjudged to my father's side, because it was his office by inheritance, and so it is lineally descended to me." She was very jealous regarding her privileges, and, in virtue of her office, sat on the Bench of Justices in the Court of Assizes at Appleby, and instituted her own courts in all her manors. In 1651 she signed a patent, making Mr. Thomas Gahetis her Deputy Sheriff for Westmoreland.

In January, 1667-8, there was a bye-election at Appleby. From Anne's position as High Sheriff she had the right to nominate a candidate, and from her great goodness to the place, the corporation felt themselves bound to elect whomsoever she nominated. She wanted to have one of the young Tuftons, sons of her daughter, the Countess of Thanet. Joseph Williamson, then secretary to Lord Arlington, Secretary of State, had set his heart on that seat, and by all means in his power, open and underhand, he attempted to secure it. Friends wrote to tell him that the Countess said "that she would neither desire, seek, nor need anybody's help to make whom she would;" and "that if her grandson would not stand for it, she would stand herself." Lord Arlington wrote her again and again. The correspondence is preserved in the Record Office, except the last letter, which was, however, published by Sir Horace Walpole, in 1753, in an article on "Letter-writing."

"My Lord,—I have been neglected by a Court, I have been bullied by a usurper, but I will not be dictated to by a subject. Your man shan't stand."—ANNE, Dorset, Pembroke, and Montgomery.

On the 2nd day of March, 1667-8, her grandson, Mr. Thomas Tufton, much to her satisfaction, "was chosen Burgess for Appleby, to serve in the House of Commons." Her determination rose from no hasty temper or petty feeling. Hers was no purely personal struggle, but a firm protest against the infringement of the rights of her sex. She understood the danger of precedent, in drifting custom. If more women, with her knowledge, firmness, patience and opportunity, had been able to co-operate with her, more might have been done to arrest the progress of the "disabilities of women." She was loved by all good women, revered by all good men. Her death was a public loss. Bishop Rainbow, in her funeral sermon said, "this great, wise woman was the honour of her sex and her age, and her life is fitter for a history than a sermon." It may be noted that her motto was, "Preserve your loyalty, defend your rights."

Offices subordinate to Sheriffs have also been held by women.

Governors of Royal castles were also sometimes women. Isabella de Fortibus held the Borough and Camp of Plympton, and governed the Isle of Wight in the reign of Edward I., and more than one lady has filled that office during the centuries, as one does to-day. Perhaps the most interesting example was that of Nicholaa de la Haye. She was sole heiress to the Barony of la Haye, which always went with the Wardenship of Lincoln Castle and the Constableship of Lincolnshire. Nicholaa married Gerard de Camville, and both were devoted servants of King John. During his life her husband performed the duties for her, but on his death she had to resume them. In 1217 the partisans of Lewis the Dauphin laid siege to Lincoln. Though the town sided with the besiegers, and though 600 knights and 20,000 foot soldiers came to reinforce them, Nicholaa continued to defend the castle until the Earl of Pembroke came to her relief. She had saved the situation. After the war

Digitized by Google

John came to Lincoln, and Nicholaa went out to meet him, bearing the keys, which she presented the King, saying that she was a woman of a great age, and had endured many labours and anxieties in that castle, and she could bear them no more. But the King handed back the keys to her, saying sweetly, "Bear them, if you please, yet awhile." He made her also Sheriff of Lincoln, an office which Henry III. confirmed to her. But after humble petition she was allowed to end her days in peace and retirement in a country home.

When lands were held by any military service there was no escape from duty because the holder was a woman. There were fifteen ladies so summoned for military service against Wales in the reign of Edward I. Among these were Devorgilla de Balliol, founder of Balliol College. It is true that anyone, male or female, with reasonable excuse could send a substitute or commute his service by fines.

On their own lands women received homage, held courts baron, and exercised all jurisdictions, sometimes to life and death. Much interesting information is given in the Report of the Municipal Corporations in 1835, when the municipal franchise was taken from women until 1868.

Peeresses in their own right were liable to summons to Parliament. Sir Harris Nicolas says, "The usual form of a summons to Parliament is common." But peeresses had always a constitutional right of sending a proxy, an exemption intended as a privilege in those days of rough travelling. The Abbesses, especially those of the great Abbeys like Shaftesbury, Barking, Wilton, and St. Mary of Winchester, ranked as peeresses, and were summoned to Anglo-Norman Parliaments, as they had been summoned to Anglo-Saxon Witenagemotes. Henry VIII.'s Reformation only forced the Abbots to conform, and they could regain their powers under another name; but in the extinction of Abbesses commenced the downward gradient in the political and social position of women. While most of these ladies exercised their power through inheritance, sometimes they were also chosen. The Lady Margaret, Countess of Richmond, was made Justice of the Peace in the reign of Henry VII., and the Lady Berkeley held the same office under Queen Mary. The Lady Broughton was at one time Keeper of the Gatehouse Prison in Westminster. The Countess of Warwick in the 18th century was elected a Commissioner of Sewers.

The examples I have brought forward have been taken, it is true, from among upper-class women. But their sisters of less exalted rank had relatively the same privileges, the same laws of inheritance and of dowry. In the counties they could hold manorial courts, and be suitors at the County Courts. The duties of the suitors at these courts were to act as jury on the cases that came forward, and to elect the representative Knight of the Shire to send to Parliament. As owners of private boroughs they could send up their own member. As Freewomen in the boroughs they could share in the election of their borough-member, as well as in all the duties and privileges of Freemen. They could be free in many guilds. They attended the livery dinners and formed part of livery processions.

They have been elected Governors of Workhouses, Constables, Overseers of the Poor, Churchwardens, Gaolers, Sextons, and even Clerk of the Crown on the King's Bench.

In "Notes and Queries," 5th Ser., Vol. V, p. 269, we find that in the parish of Gorton, in Manchester, "Mrs. Waterhouse was Overseer of the Poor in 1748, and in 1826 Mary Grimston was Sexton. In 1775, Sarah Schofield played the flute in the Parish Choir, and in 1829, Ruth Walker broke stones." In Totteridge, Middlesex, there was buried in 1802, Mrs. Elizabeth King, who had been Clerk of the Parish for 46 years, and had attended every Sunday and read prayers in a clear loud voice.

Ancient Roman historians say that among the Britons "there was no distinction of sex in places of command or government." If we, through the centuries, had lived up to that higher level, and chosen our officials on account of their fitness for the office, independent of sex, it is quite possible that we might have had examples of feminine public servants relatively as distinguished as we have experienced among our women sovereigns. As it is, we can only muse with Gray as he stood by his country churchyard on the might-have-beens of lost opportunity.

CHARLOTTE CARMICHAEL STOPES.

Digitized by Google

A Tradition of the Simplon.

By MAX PEMBERTON.

TRAVEL luxury is the note of the Switzerland of our day. Even the new mountaineer is oftentimes hauled up the slippery places of the fashionable peaks as a sack may be hauled to a hayloft. The old time of rigour and of hardship, when travel was for the strong, when even the grand tour implied a man and a resolution, remains a tradition. Where our forefathers took sledges, we take waggons; where they found sheds for inns, we turn to palaces and lifts. The hospices which befriended them are show places for the son of Cook. Peasants flock afoot over the great passes; but the tragedies of those passes are written no more.

The following sketch is the result of a chat which the writer had some time ago with an aged Benedictine monk at Brieg. Possibly it was the story of the monk's own childhood. He told it with the pathos of one who has known neither father nor mother. And, at least, it illustrates some of the hardships to be encountered in the old days by those whom necessity drove across the famous Simplon Pass in the hour of storm and tempest.

. . . . . .

The storm, which for many hours had been threatening the upper heights of the Simplon, burst in its full fury as midnight drew near. All day the snow clouds lay upon the summits of the environing peaks, and the wind chanted its weird and plaintive song through the terraced gorge and snow-decked valley; ominous vibrations and the deep booming of avalanches warned the wayfarer to seek retreat or to turn his steps towards the welcome hospitality of the monastery.

For an hour before sunset, the blast had of a sudden ceased, and a terrible silence fell upon the great world of peaks and crags and valleys. The long rays of deep golden light, shining in the interlude of storm, searched the very depths of the fathomless abysses and darkened crevasses only to withdraw before the advance of night, and to leave all things to the greater fury of the elements. As the sun went down the wind again rose. Small flakes of hardened snow were blown in the air as feathers before a breath; scattered hither and thither, tossed at the fretful will of the blast, swept into mounds, rolled out as a whitened carpet to cloak the darkened pass. Or, as an attacking force that advances, not with a steady onslaught, but with the fierce vigour of freshly-gathered impulses, the torrent swept through gorge and pass, folding in its embrace every atom of unstable nature; hurling rocks and snow and ice against the unseen enemy of the night.

Fiereer and fiercer it grew—boulders, majestic in their mighty weight, were lifted and scattered as pebbles on the glaciers below; great banks of snow embedded themselves in any crevasse where they could find rest; avalanches discharged their mass upon tunnelled railway or down the face of the perpendicular precipice; the rattle as of a hundred batteries told of the ceaseless falling of the ice-bound earth. Nature had opened her heart to the terrors of the night, and a sympathy had knit their powers in one.

Few travellers dared the perils of the Simplon pass during daylight. Many peasants, waiting to cross to the warmer valleys and the sunshine of Italy, delayed their journey in the inns of Martigny, Sion, or Brieg. The solitary sledges that were still upon their journey at nightfall hurried to the shelter of retreat or hospice. When the sun sank, no human thing faced the tempest. So far as the eye could see, the spirit of the storm ruled alone; dead nature cried aloud; was tossed and broken on the billows of the blast.

Digitized by Google

The storm ruled alone; so said the sentinels of the night. Yet one there was to belie their words. At seven o'clock a sledge drawn by a pair of lagging and weary horses had crossed the Pont du Ganther, and commenced the ascent of the zigzag pathway beyond. The driver was a man of some height and strength, but his body was thickly wrapped in fur, and a cloth cap half covered his face. By his side, a young child nearly hidden in a great rug, sought still more warmth by closely hugging his companion; and, the one mutually encouraging the other, they faced the cutting storm and ploughed their way through the masses of drift now quickly blocking the narrow pathway of the gorge. At Brieg, some hours earlier the master of the Poste had used his interested eloquence in a vain endeavour to secure his guest for another night.

"The storm has yet to come," he said. "Milord surely will not attempt to reach the hospice to-night?"

"I have ordered the horses—get them," was the only response of the brusque Englishman.

"But milord considers his life?"

"Not at all."

"And the child—mon Dieu, the child, milord!"

"The child will not suffer—hold your tongue and get the horses."

The obsequious and offended host hastened to obey. In less than half-an-hour his guest was driving, with the child very close to him, up the road which leads to the Domo d'Ossola. Many were the speculations as to his probable fate. "He will never reach the Schalbet," said one. "He will die at the Béresal," said another; but in a few minutes fresh interests arose, and one by one the curious dispersed to their occupations or their pleasures.

For an hour or so, the "mad Englishman" proceeded upon the pass without inconvenience. Wrapping the child with much care in the many folds of the rug, he asked from time to time if he felt the cold, and, receiving answer in the negative, he cheerily encouraged the horses into a quick trot. At the third hostel the sledge was halted; only long enough, however, to allow for food and drink for horses and riders. Then plunging once more into the darkness, the battle, fiercely waged with the pitiless sleet and snow, again recommenced. Now the frail carriage tottered and balanced upon the very edge of a fathomless abyss; then the resounding echoes of runners and the dropping of water told its driver that he had entered one of the many tunnels which abound in this mighty monument to Napoleon and his engineers. Yet, drive as the man would, the snow gained upon him. At first, a vigorous assistance to the horses helped them over drifts and mounds; by-and-by the spade was used freely; later, even its assistance became of less and less use.

At length, emerging from a long gallery, a vast mass of the freshly fallen snow completely buried the fragile vehicle. In vain the horses plunged and fought at it with their chests; closer and closer the mound grew about them; the icy flakes fell with a sharper twinge against their faces; the wind pierced their very bones as it swept on its mad career, or laughed wildly in the hearts of the mountains, as if its own strength were its own great triumph. The driver, seeing further advance, at least with the sledge, was impossible, peered vainly at the hands of his watch. By his calculations he was not many minutes from shelter or the hospice. He looked at the boy, who was fast growing drowsy, and shook him vigorously.

"Jerome, wake up, wake up. You will soon be home, child, where we shall have fire and warmth. Come, rouse yourself!"

The appeal opened the child's eyes. He sat up and stared at his father wildly.

"May I not sleep, father? My eyes hurt me. Shall we be at mother's soon?"

"Yes, yes, my lad; as quickly as I can get you there. Come now, stand up and shake yourself. Stamp your feet as I do."

The little fellow endeavoured to obey, but the cold had robbed him of his strength. Rising up in the sledge, he would have stepped out and fallen in the snow had not his father caught him. It was evident that speedy help alone would save his life. Leaving him as he lay in his seat, the driver backed the animals to the tunnel and secured them there. Then, with a wrap about his head and face, and the little one in his arms, he plunged into the drift, and faced the icy torrent.

"God forgive me," he said as he went, "God forgive me and help us both!"

The darkness was intense at this time. The man's legs sank above the knee into the snow. The water, too, had now penetrated his clothes, and the cold linen hung damp and clammy against his body. His hands were rapidly becoming benumbed, and sharp pains in his legs warned him of what must be. The wind in its more angry gusts was so terrible that he could not stand against it, and he sought what shelter he might half buried in the snow. His coat had become white and heavy with the encrusted frost; he knew not at any moment whether he were yet on the path or at the brink of some gorge, where a false step would end the quest for ever. Before him lay the remote hope of the hospice, behind him the eternal sleep for him and for the child.

Digitized by Google

The thought spurred him to efforts surpassing his strength. He struggled with the phantom figure of sleep, not for his own sake, but for that of his son, who lay in his arms.

"Jerome, you hear me, lad," he cried, wildly, and, pulling aside the wrap to kiss the blue lips of the child, he plunged with a new measure of strength into the darkness of the pass before him.

At this moment there was a little rift of the clouds. They began to break and scatter. Great masses of them seemed to roll and speed across the surface of the heavens, leaving long lines as of attendant and lesser servants in their wake. When some minutes had passed, a ray of pale yellow light struck through a grey-black cloud and illumined the summit of the higher peaks. The cloud passed, and the moon stood out for an instant pale and clear. Its light ran swiftly from valley to valley and glacier to glacier until it fell upon the narrow way of the Simplon. The Englishman breathed a prayer of thanks; the path before him lay more open; the snow was less deep; he advanced with brisker steps; he knew that if he did not soon reach a shelter he would find one for ever on the heights of the mountains. And Jerome, he was again sleeping, it might be never to wake. With bursting heart and failing body his father pressed on until a turn of the path showed him a little châlet hanging as a nest above the roadway of the pass. He struggled up to the door and sank against it with the burden in his arms.

The refuge was old and deserted, save by some half-a-dozen wandering Zingari, who huddled about a charcoal fire, on which a pot of coarse soup was simmering. The light from the flaming embers alone illumined the apartment, and cast a weird glow upon the swarthy faces of its tenants, who seemed neither eager nor willing to assist the newcomer. The children, following their wonted pastime, pressed about the stranger crying "Mauro, mauro"—bread, bread. The others watched him curiously, as, standing away from the fire, he undid the shawl and laid the sleeping child on the wooden floor. Then, and then only, an old woman rose from her seat.

"He has brought a child to die," she cried, angrily; and, adding many imprecations on the folly of mankind in general, she began to chafe the little lad's hands.

"Have you any wine or brandy?" asked the Englishman, as, more active than the others, he worked to bring the light of returning vitality to the child's eyes.

"You'll get it at the hospice," said an elderly man, not rising from his seat, "and if you don't, you'll bury the child."

"God forbid!" answered the man, his voice choking with a great sob, as he looked at the restful face of the golden-haired baby. "God give him back to me! I will go to the hospice myself. Will you do your best for him until I return."

"You—you are half dead already; you will never get there!"

The Englishman thrust a handful of silver into the gipsy's palm, and, repeating his request, once more dared the path.

The wind had become still, but the cold was now intense. The moon shone clearly; a thousand jets of fire, playing upon the higher peaks, made beacons for the valleys below. A wondrous stillness fell upon the mountains, a calm, serene beauty as of the spirit of rest and of God's night. The snow was as a mighty mantle to cloak the darkness of ravine and gorge; the boulders stood up in their spotless habits as sentinels of some vast and forgotten kingdom of solitude.

The Englishman pressed on again, but hope and strength had left him. Often he stumbled; he seemed to walk without impulse. His faculties became numbed in a sensuous and overpowering desire to sleep; the boy's face shone as an image of the clouds and bade him return. Presently, a succession of pictures passed through his burning brain. The mounds around him took the forms and shapes of men; valleys and peaks disappeared, to give place to great flaming fires, before which thousands knelt, paying homage to the heat. And then the scene changed to a lake of polished gold. He saw fair gardens and houses by them, and bright pastures. A vision of summer haunted him continually. Forgotten faces appeared to him; it was as though friends of the dead past arose to help him on his pilgrimage. Then swiftly the scene changed; he was sure that a bell rang somewhere near him, he could hear its sweet note echoing in the ravines and valleys. A great flash of light passed before his eyes, and all was darkness.

Digitized by Google

. . . . . .

Early on the following morning, the monks of the Hospice of St. Bernard had a few moments' leisure to gather round a pretty boy who warmed himself by the refectory fire. The lad looked bewildered at the strangely garbed figures before him, and reiterated his oft repeated request to be taken to his father.

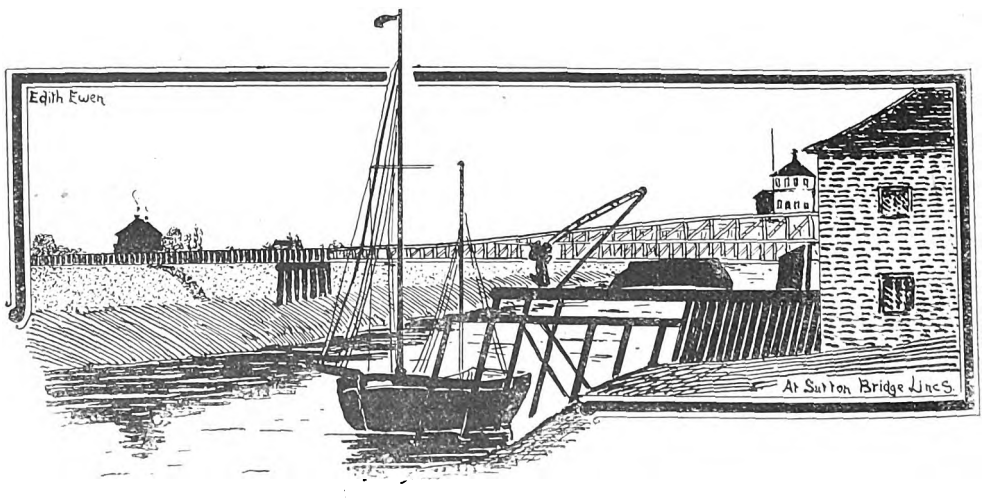
"Le pauvre," said the Prior, "how shall I answer him? But he will forget. That is God's gift to the children."

He turned away that none might see the tears in his eyes. There was no one there who dared to tell the child that his father had been found at daybreak, delirious and dying, beneath the monastery walls. The Angelus bell had been a passing bell for him. He died with his story untold. The gipsies, continuing their journey, related as much as they knew of the events of the previous evening. One thing only was clear, that the dead man had urgent business in Italy, and for that would face even the peril of the storm. It remained to learn if his wife were living.

As soon as possible, news of the story was forwarded to the towns of the Italian lake districts and to London, but in spite of earnest efforts no word reached the hospice which could elucidate the mystery. The little lad was claimed by none. He could tell no story of home or mother. His father had been all in all to him, and his father was dead.

"Heaven has so willed it," said the Prior, when it was evident that his charge must subsist on charity; "he is a child of the mountains, he will be one of us."

[THE END.]



Digitized by Google

THE WOMEN STUDENTS OF OXFORD.

By KENT CARR.

WHEN Charles Kingsley, in sweetest lyrical measure, pointed out that goodness is more to be desired than cleverness, certain girlish voices were heard to pipe a spirited rejoinder as to the possibility of combining the two. The idea had much to commend it, though to the Oxford of 1879 it came with something of a shock. But if the world of dons and undergraduates did not glow with any enthusiasm of welcome to the first feminine invaders, they at least made no very active opposition. Indeed, it was one of themselves—the Warden of Keble—who got together that historical meeting at which it was decided that accommodation should be provided for those women belonging to the Church of England who wished to study at Oxford. The idea took root, and it was only a few months later that a similar institution on undenominational lines was started.

A small but eminently picturesque building, standing amidst green lawns and shady trees, was chosen for the latter, and was called Somerville Hall. For the house in Norham Gardens, Miss Elizabeth Wordsworth, the Lady Principal, mindful of that Countess of Richmond "who was forward to secure by new foundations the alliance between the religious and the studious life," suggested that the name of "Lady Margaret Hall" should be given.

The invaders came in such small numbers at first that the importance of their advent might well be a little obscured to the masculine mind. Only a dozen students took up their residence at Somerville, while Lady Margaret Hall held scarcely more. But the little band started with high ideals and cheery spirits which went far towards carrying them through. True, the degree was not granted to them, but they were wise enough to realise that the degree was the smallest part of their three years' training.

And they were encouraged by the loyal support of men whose names have made the history of the nineteenth century. Where one was found to fling at them the disdainful advice: "Go spin, ye jades! Go spin!" there were twenty ready to hold out the hand of sympathy and encouragement. Ruskin delighted in the whole movement, and was a frequent guest at the Halls. "So glad that I am old enough to be let come and take tea at Somerville," he added laughingly to his signature in the Somerville birthday-book. And with his own hand he copied the mystical face of St. Ursula, the Bud of Flowers, and sent it as a free gift to adorn the dwelling-place of those girl friends of his.

But in spite of the pretty fancy, Ruskin, as well as anyone, realised that he had come in contact with real workers. Very few Oxford women can afford merely to play. Special permission must be obtained from the Council each term for those wishing to be excused examinations, but the permission is rarely demanded. In most instances on leaving College a girl hopes to make her own career. She has been given the same chances as her brothers, and, as a rule, within certain sex restrictions, makes the same use of them.

Happily, the fees are sensibly lighter than those of the men. At Lady Margaret Hall the charges are £75 per annum, exclusive of strictly personal expenses. To these must be added the fees for instruction, which rarely exceed £28 a year. At Somerville the fees average slightly less, coming in all to something like £92 6s. a year, although these fees can be reduced further by a choice of smaller rooms. At St. Hugh's Hall with strict economy they can be brought down to £70 a year. At St. Hilda's Hall, which was founded in 1893 by Miss Dorothea Beale, chiefly, though not necessarily, for the pupils of Cheltenham Ladies' College, the fees for board are £25 per term. In considering these figures it must, of course, be borne in mind that they only include the terms, and that vacation takes up practically six months of every year.

Digitized by Google

But there are many women studying in Oxford to whom, for pecuniary or personal reasons, residence in College is impossible. They are known as Oxford Home Students, and come under the supervision of a special Committee and Principal appointed by the Council of the Association for the Education of Women. They can be received in a private family at a cost of £1 5s. a week.

The glamour of history and antiquity which is the birthright of the Oxford man in his Alma Mater, has been denied by circumstances to the Oxford woman. But in the picturesqueness of her building Somerville has done what she could. The little old Hall of the early days has been added to largely, but much of the old charm remains. From the Woodstock Road an old-world drive leads to the ancient and creeper-covered porch. Through the entrance can be seen glimpses of the white dining-room, with its green-tiled hearth. In the drawing room above are little clusters of cosy chairs, and a litter of new magazines. The reds of the Indian rugs have faded to pink, and the indigoes have toned down to the blues of the old Worcester china, which has found a resting place in the old-fashioned corner-cupboards. And over the mantelpiece is that good gift of Ruskin's—the picture of the saint whose faith rose triumphant over the great Destroyer.

But the Hall is matched for quaintness by the three little cottages adjoining it, whose rooms are also taken up by College students. One set of rooms here is particularly coveted, as, owing to their liliputian dimensions, two rooms are rated as one, and the occupant becomes the proud possessor of a bonâ fide bedroom and sitting-room, in place of the extemporised bed-sitting-room of the rest. It was in these cottages that an old college servant —Jane by name—held undisputed and despotic sway. She was always much exercised in her mind lest the occupant of the above-mentioned bedroom should fall ill. "You see, miss, it would be so awk'ard to get a coffin down them stairs," she would explain cheeringly to every new occupant.

Between the old Hall and the new West Buildings stretch long lawns set round with the flowers which go to make old-fashioned posies. There are many tennis courts, and the hockey-ground reaches to the West Buildings, which, like the Hall itself, has added on wing after wing to its original dimensions to suit the growing requirements of its students. It is here that the Lady Principal — Miss Maitland — resides, and the fact naturally adds importance to this part of Somerville. Here, too, the books which have been presented in such generous measure are housed. There are many volumes which used to belong to T. H. Green, a friend whose memory Somerville holds very dear. There are Mark Pattison's gifts, and the greater part of the library of the late Miss Amelia B. Edwards. They line the large comfortable library, row upon row, to a height which explains the pity of the women of S. Phillip's Mission, who were being shown round the place, for the students who "had to read 'em all, pore things."

Digitized by Google

A GLIMPSE OF THE PICTURESQUE GROUNDS.

Lady Margaret Hall, as its prospectus states, has Church of England principles but liberty for others. Like Somerville, the original building has been considerably enlarged. This is not surprising when we read the names of those who have had its interests at heart. Miss Elizabeth Wordsworth, daughter of the late Dr. Wordsworth, has been its Principal from the beginning. Its Chairman of Council is the Dean of Christ Church, while for Hon. Treasurers it has Sir W. Herschel and Mrs. Arnold Toynbee. Alone of all the Halls it has a tiny chapel of its own, with a stained glass window, and a cast of the recumbent figure of the Countess of Richmond, to whom it owes its name. The badge of the Hall is three daisies, with the motto, "Ex solo, ad solem."

There is little reason to doubt that St. Hugh's Hall will take to enlarging her premises like the rest, in the future. At present there is only accommodation for twenty-four students.

St. Hilda's Hall is charmingly situated. It is in Cowley Place, and its sunny gardens slope sheer down to the river. It differs somewhat from the other Halls in that it was originally founded for former pupils of the Cheltenham Ladies' College. But there is no hard and fast rule, and anyone may apply for admission.

Perhaps the fact that there is a somewhat stiff entrance examination to be passed in every case makes the privilege of entry doubly prized. The standard of this entrance examination is that of Responsions, which, indeed, is accepted as an equivalent. Considering how short a career the Halls have had, these entrance examinations can show a very respectable list of scholarships, varying from £25 to £50 a year, and tenable for three years.

Every Hall has, of course, its own peculiar methods and internal economy. But the points of difference are superficial, the daily routine being pretty much the same all through. At eight o'clock the day begins with prayers, then all assemble in the big dining-room for breakfast. By nine o'clock the student's bed-sitting-room is ready for her use, awaiting only those finishing touches which she fondly believes no hand but her own can supply.

Digitized by Google

THE FAIR STUDENTS OF SOMERVILLE.

Whatever domicile the future may hold for the girl-graduate, it is safe to assume that none will fill her with such pride as this tiny College-sanctum, on whose precise number of feet it is unnecessary to insist. By cunning devices the bedroom aspect is entirely done away with. The bed itself, by means of rugs and cushions, becomes a most inviting couch, much in requisition at tea or cocoa parties. The wardrobe is draped in some deft feminine way, and the rest of the bedroom furniture mysteriously eliminated. Book-cases line the walls, and there is the inevitable bureau, which in Oxford can be picked up for an old song, and which for solid comfort is the most excellent thing in the world. There is also the china tea-service, which has to serve for every conceivable form of hospitality. And if the plants and flowers, and the shield with the College coat-of-arms, and the scarlet hockey cap, and the tennis racquet jostle each other at somewhat close quarters, the arrangement has at least the merit of bringing her possessions within reach of the owner's hand. And if the big frilled cushions are more often than not of simple cretonne, the fact takes away no whit from the cosy effect.

From nine to one the solid work of the day is put in. There are lectures to be attended in the various Colleges, and much private reading to be got through. And, if the College library falls short of the many claims upon it, there is always the Bodleian, which, as the American would say, contains all the books there are.

Lunch is a moveable feast, and since the Oxford woman is almost invariably great at athletics the hours till tea-time are all too short for the pleasures to be crowded into them. For the tennis-player there is always the wild hope that by dint of hard practice she may be chosen as champion to play in the terminal matches with the Halls, or, higher honour still, to play the yearly match with the Light

Digitized by Google

Blues from Girton and Newnham. The hockey-field is always crowded, though the river as recreation ground stands easily first. No student is admitted to the boating club until she has passed a reasonable swimming test, while good rowing form is insisted upon by public opinion.

Tea is supposed to be taken in the drawing-room, but rarely indeed is it patronised in that particular place. There are gay little parties always going on in a choice of rooms, where, if the guest is wise, she will take her own cup. Or sometimes, accompanied by a chaperone, she will sally forth, at the invitation of some undergraduate friend, to a tea, for which he will have laid in a sufficient supply of French confectionery to last a sober-minded family for the rest of their natural lives.

After tea the hour and a half till the dressing-bell rings is rigidly devoted to work, more often than not with a tutor, the only admitted exception being the fortnightly meeting of the United Halls Debating Society, quite the most stately and imposing of all College Clubs. Here high ethical problems are discussed, mixed occasionally, for the sake of the weaker "brethren," with such frivolities as "How far are artificial aids to beauty permissible?"

At seven o'clock the crowd of evening-frocked and healthily-hungry damsels assemble for dinner in Hall. Everyone sits where her fancy dictates, unless a special invitation is given by the Lady Principal to the high table. After dinner there are a few minutes' pleasant chatter in the drawing-room among the tea-cups, a little music, and a hasty glance at any of the lighter periodicals which may have strayed into the Magazine Club.

In the evening comes the reign of the College Society. There are French societies and a German band, while literary names from Browning to Meredith run the whole gamut. There is a sober Scientific and Philosophical Society and a Sharp Practice Debate, where luckless members are called upon to talk to order for the space of five minutes on any subject which the ingenuity of their friends may dictate. The societies, of course, differ in degree, but on the whole they are of a light and festive nature, the French Society holding a course of French chocolates as a necessary part of its curriculum.

MISS AGNES MAITLAND.
Principal of Somerville Hall.
Photograph by Fradelle & Young.

A clamour of merry voices drowns the sound of the clock as it strikes ten. Cocoa parties are in progress all over the place, and hostesses and guests alike lend a hand in their preparation. Sometimes there is a grand entertainment in the library, specially lent for the occasion, sometimes it is in the solitude à deux — which at College always resolves itself into à trois or à quatre— that plans are discussed for the after career to which the kindly College days are but the prelude.

And whatever the dreaded schools may bring forth, no girl-graduate who has taken the life rightly but will be better equipped for that career. And this fine equipment is all that Oxford need claim in the growing scheme for women's education. Fame has already come to some of her daughters—Miss Scot, Miss Thomson, Miss Graham, and Miss Sorabji have written books which have made more than the critics talk—while Oxford women are to-day filling high posts as inspectors, head-mistresses and secretaries. But the fame we repeat is a small matter compared to the training which is to fit the girl-graduate to play her part in any sphere—even the humble one of being helpmeet to a mere man!

KENT CARR.

Digitized by Google

A MAN OF MOODS.

By K. MURRAY ELIOT.

"To one thing constant never."

I.

"I AM going off by myself—to think," said Jim Carlton.

"O, man of many moods!" his wife answered, "You told me yesterday that wild horses should not drag a thought from you for months, now that your book is finished."

"I have an idea," said Jim, and Mildred sighed. She knew that it was useless to reason with him if he once "had an idea." She worshipped him as her husband, and believed in him as a great genius, but she sometimes wished that his will was less like the wind's will.

"When are you going?" she asked. They were sitting together after dinner, in the drawing-room of their little flat in London, Jim rejoicing in the fact that his last book had been accepted by his publishers.

Mildred did not like the book. She had begged Jim not to publish it, but Messrs. Macandrew's offer was a large one, accompanied by such a complimentary letter, that Mildred felt the ground of her objections cut away from under her feet.

"I shall go early to-morrow," he said. "You must send off the manuscript, Mildred. I have finished the alterations that Macandrew asked for. It is quite ready. I burnt my old notes this morning, and insured the typed copy for £300, just for luck!"

"I wish——" began Mildred; then she stopped and knelt down by the fire, pretending that it ought to be poked.

Jim knew quite well what she meant, and why she wanted to hide her face from him. "I can't imagine why you dislike 'A Passage Perilous' so much," he said. "You are poking the fire as if you wished that it was burning there."

"Oh, Jim! You do understand really. You know that I think it is unworthy of you."

"It is funny," he said. "You are not prejudiced as a rule—for a woman."

"It won't help you a bit," said Mildred. "It won't add to your reputation as a writer."

"I am not so sure about that," he said. "The highest test of a novel is its reality. Macandrew says it is the most realistic thing that I have written."

"To be real is to be like human nature, I suppose," said Mildred, "but human nature means everything, Jim, not only all the evil in the world, but all the good."

"And you think the poor 'Passage' all evil, do you?" said Jim. He did not seem to mind. He smiled as he took his cigarette from his lips.

"You said once that you would like never to write a book that I should not like to read," said Mildred softly.

"That must have been when we were engaged," said Jim laughing, "or was it before? If I remember right, you said that you would always like to read what I wrote, whatever it was."

Mildred laughed too. Even the disputed points of the book could not really come between them.

"But—" she began, hesitatingly. They had already repeated this type of conversation several times since the book had got well on its way. What Mildred found difficult to say was that she did not honestly think it up to the level of Jim's other writings, as literature. It was not only that she disliked the topic of the book, and the plot, and the characters.

Jim had said that she did not leave much to admire in it, but since Macandrew's offer he had assured her that she was mistaken. The book was his best, and would make his fortune.

Digitized by Google

He looked at her as she knelt by the fire. Her face was sad as the flames lit it up. He thought that there were tears in her eyes. Mildred was not given to tears; the suspicion of them surprised him.

"I rather take your dislike of my book to heart," he said, "it is quite my favourite child at present."

"You can't see it properly yet," said his wife, "it is too near you—it is out of focus."

"That is very well expressed," said Jim. "I wonder if people's children are always a bit out of focus to their parents? But you don't let someone else destroy them because they can see the faults which you can't."

"It is not quite the same thing," said Mildred.

"There's the money question too," he remarked. "The 'Passage' has taken more than a year to write—I shan't get another book done for quite as long again. The ten pounds I had for my magazine story will pay my way at Llanrhystyd. But, after that, the 'Passage' was to boil the pot—and take us to Italy, Mildred darling, for another honeymoon!"

"I could manage, I think—," she said slowly. All her friends had told her before she married, nearly three years ago, that she never would manage on the few hundreds a year that formed Jim's settled income. "Of course, not Italy—but we might wait for that."

"I don't know if I can," said Jim. "The humdrum grind is not good for me. I want a spree sometimes."

Yet he was going off next day to the coldest and most dreary place on the coast, to "think," as he said, so as to start another "grind."

Mildred looked at him anxiously. "Are you getting bored already?" she asked. "You promised me that 'pot-boiling' should never interfere with the quality of your work."

"It has not really," said Jim. "It is your mistake, dear. The book is powerful. A man can't always write for the nursery."

Mildred moved away, and said no more. It was a sore point. She did not think that he would have written that book if there had been a nursery in their house. A man's own children bring back to him his lost ideals.

II.

Jim went off the next morning, so full of his new plan for another book that he did not even mention "A Passage Perilous" to Mildred. But he was always like that.

Mildred had been very angry with their great friend, Jack Conyers, for saying that "it was a wonder that Jim had stuck to one woman long enough to make her his wife, but it was a miracle that he had ever finished a book."

He had written two since their marriage, and Mildred had discovered that the wind of his will could blow very steadily in one direction for a long time, but that the veering gusts between whiles shifted in every direction.

She told herself that he would never change about that disappointing manuscript; she ought to pack it up and send it off. "It can't possibly do anybody any good," she said to herself.

She suddenly remembered that she had promised to go and see her aunt, an old lady who seldom came to London. Mildred snatched at the excuse for delay. Mrs. Bellairs would be angry if she did not see the favourite niece who had disappointed her by marrying "a mere scribbler" as she called Jim. Mildred stopped in the street on her way to buy a handful of fluffy yellow mimosa to take to her aunt.

It made her think of Italy, of a blue, blue sky, and a wealth of flowers. Flowers scattered lavishly—treasure to be had for the trouble of stooping to pick it up. Not a jealously guarded, grudgingly given handful, but a whole wind-waved world of gold and violet and rose, daffodils and tulips and anemones.

She thought of Jim in a cold, ugly railway carriage, travelling through fields like iron, under a sky like dull tinfoil.

"Poor Jim!" she said to herself, rebelling against the humdrum grind.

Mildred remembered the glorious purple patch that their wedding trip had made in their lives. How Jim's seeing eye and picturesque speech had lifted the curtain for her from vivid scenes in the drama of life.

She remembered his sheer joy in living through the early summer days—days carpeted and crowned with flowers.

Italy in May and June is all flowers, a forgotten corner of the garden of Eden.

Digitized by Google

It was a dream of roses and love, love and roses, in Mildred's memory. And Jim said that he wanted another honeymoon.

Mildred looked at the dull brown mud under her feet, at the dull grey sky overhead, the dull brown-grey houses on each side of her. The people she passed looked shabby. There was an air of "humdrum grind" about them all.

She found old Mrs. Bellairs in her hotel sitting-room, already surrounded with flowers, and birds in cages, mostly canaries, who were apt to usurp the conversation.

"I bring them with me," said the old lady, "because I am a little deaf, my dear. I hear best when there is a good deal of noise. The canaries are less trouble than a piano-organ or a brass band."

Mildred agreed that they seemed to be the least embarrassing evil of the three. She quite understood that anyone might hear if you had to shout above the canaries' shrill notes.

"You look very well, child," said her aunt. "I suppose that Jim has not taken to beating you yet? No? Well, he worshipped the ground you stood on when you were married, and he was the most unaccountable creature I ever knew. He always did the exact opposite to anything that was expected of him. As he seemed to be utterly devoted to you I thought that he would probably treat you badly."

Mildred smiled. "He has not changed a bit," she said.

"So he said when he went off for a year, wasn't it? Just when I thought that he meant to propose to you."

"That was his goodness," said Mildred, colouring. It had been perplexing goodness at the time. "He thought that he was too poor, and that I hadn't seen enough people to know my own mind."

"Then he came back, and stood under an apple tree outside your window all night," said the old lady, laughing at the remembrance, "because I was angry with him, and wouldn't let you see him."

"You didn't tell me that he had come," said Mildred, with the smile of a victor at the remembrance of past battles.

"No, I wanted you to marry Major Anstruther, nice man, your own set, with a charming place. He is Sir Harold now, and his wife goes to Court in splendid diamonds."

"I am sure he never stood under an apple tree all night," said Mildred.

"No one but a poet, or an author, would. It is wonderful how women like to have silly things done for them."

"And he spends his life in horrible financial schemes—to make money enough to carry out his ambitions. Oh, and he yachts and races and shoots big game. Where does his wife come in? She is his nine hundred and ninety-ninth interest? He just remembers her when he has nothing else to do."

Mrs. Bellairs laughed. "Wouldn't you rather share great ambitions, and be somebody stirring in the world, than live screwed down in your corner, trying to make sixpence do the work of a shilling? Your husband's ambitions generally end in clouds—mostly of tobacco smoke, I daresay!"

"Nothing of the kind," said Mildred hotly. "His first book has made him famous already. And he has had a splendid offer from Macandrew for the book he has just finished."

The words were out of her lips before she meant to say them. She still had a hope spinning its little web in a corner of her brain that the book might not be published.

"Dear me, you don't say so," said Mrs. Bellairs. "You will be quite rich. How many books can he write in a year?"

"What does it matter?" said Mildred, "there are other things besides riches."

It wounded her to hear even Jim talk as if the worth of his book was measured by the price he could get for it.

"Does he insure his manuscripts?" said her aunt. "I remember getting quite a large sum once for some fusty old letters and diaries that belonged to my husband's father. He insured them years ago. They were burnt by accident; my maid dropped a match while she was looking for something else in the cupboard. Half the things on the shelves were burnt."

"Jim has insured this book," Mildred said.

"I am glad to hear it," said Mrs. Bellairs.

Mildred offered her bunch of mimosa. She suddenly wanted to get rid of it and her memories of Italy together.

"I wish Jim wouldn't publish this book," she said, as she got up to go. "It is not as good as his last was."

Digitized by Google

"Oh nonsense!" said her aunt. "You were always an idealist, Mildred. Don't imagine that his work is less good because you are getting accustomed to it. People always get accustomed to their husbands. You would begin to think an angel with wings commonplace if it lived in the house with you."

Mildred did not answer, but the canaries did their best for her. She knew that the wings could never be commonplace unless they were dragged in the mud.

She walked home sadly through the grubby streets. Was their drab muddiness getting even into Jim's writing? Would a new honeymoon put a new colour and beauty into him, even if it had to be paid for by the price of this hateful rubbish. Was it fair to throw mud into other people's lives in order to brighten their own?

And Jim had once agreed with Stevenson that every dull and depressing word written was a sin.

"Life is ugly enough," she said to herself, "without having its ugliness pointed out to you in detail."

Some busy demon, a child of the unlovely streets perhaps, began to spin the web of a new thought in her mind. "My maid dropped a match in the cupboard—by mistake — I made quite a large sum——"

Jim's manuscript was insured for three hundred pounds. Enough to buy a new dream of love and roses—a spring in Italy!

It was not as if Jim would mind very much. He had called it his favourite child, but with him it was always a case of one nail knocking out another. His head was so full of his new idea that he had not even reminded her before he left about sending off "A Passage Perilous."

"Somehow or other," said Mildred, as she opened the door of her flat, "this 'Passage Perilous' must make a port pleasant for us."

III.

The next morning brought saner counsel to Mildred. To cheat an insurance company would be "fraud," too high a price to pay for any of the pleasures of life.

She had a characteristic note from Jim. "I am thinking," he wrote, "chiefly that the morning stars could not have shouted for joy when this place was created."

Poor Jim! Mildred thought of Italy again.

She had work to do in the morning; half a hundred excuses for not packing up that dreadful parcel.

Jim's study door was locked. No one was allowed to go in there when he was away except Mildred herself.

She looked at the key in her writing-table drawer, but could not make up her mind to use it. She wished that Mrs. Bellairs' maid had never dropped a match in a cupboard.

After lunch she sat down to invent more excuses for being too busy to fetch that key and some brown paper, when a telegram was brought to her.

Jim had had a frightful accident, a fall from some slippery rocks. It was evidently a doctor who sent the telegram. Mildred's head reeled. She could not understand it all at once. "Severe injury. Further advice necessary. Advise Pallion at once. The only chance. Am wiring to him."

What did it mean? Pallion? Sir Charles Pallion, the great surgeon? He would have to go down, right away to that far corner of Wales, where Jim had gone "to think."

The railway ticket was expensive. Mildred forced her mind to think of practical details. Sir Charles's fee would be probably a hundred guineas—perhaps more. He could not be wanted for nothing.

She tried hard to pull herself together. The telegram said "at once." A hundred guineas at once. And she must go herself. It had to be done. For Jim—Jim's one chance. His photograph looked at her from the table. He seemed so big and strong in it. Mildred was always proud of his height and size.

She was so utterly alone. She put the idea of Jim, hurt, suffering—she would not think of another word—out of her head.

She boldly faced the question of Sir Charles's fee. She got out her bank-book to be met with sickening disappointment. She knew that Jim's was no better.

The manuscript! There was Macandrew's letter offering £500 for it. There was the insurance policy, making certain of £300. "It is lucky that Jim signed it before he went away," she said to herself.

"Lucky?" How dared she say so?

Digitized by Google

The manuscript must go to the publishers at once, and she must take their letter to the bank and borrow on its security. It was not a very formal agreement, but perhaps their banker would advance the money if she told him the circumstances of the case. At least she hoped that he would.

The insurance policy was a more formal thing. No one could hesitate about that. It would only have to be presented. Macandrew's letter would show that it was not to Jim's financial advantage to have his book burnt. There would be no question of its being done on purpose.

"Jim's book burnt!" she said to herself. "How horrible it sounds! How he would hate it! He called it his favourite child. It has taken all his thoughts—all his work—for a whole year." Mildred took up the key. "Is it worth while to go to Aunt Selina first? I told her about the book, and she never has much to spare. There is Jack Conyers?" Mildred blushed. "He would share his last penny with us, but Jim would not like me to go and ask him."

She sat down and wrote a letter for Sir Charles Pallion, a telegram for a nurse, another to the doctor with Jim. She changed her gown, threw a few things hastily into a bag. She looked out her train in Bradshaw. "At once," said the telegram, "the only chance." What did anything else matter?

"If he never writes again," said Mildred, "that horrible 'Passage Perilous' will be his last work. It won't make a 'port pleasant.' But he wished it—he called it his favourite. It is better that it should be sold for dire necessity," she assured herself, "not for mere selfish sunshine."

"Which is the worst evil?" she asked, as she strapped up her bag, "a fraud—it would not be Jim's fraud—on the insurance company, or all the evil that may come from such a publication? I must have the money—somehow. Jim said it was realistic—not wrong. Is my mind in a tangle, he generally knows. But Eve learnt the difference between right and wrong before Adam did."

She finished her preparations, sent her telegrams, told the porter to whistle for a hansom. She would leave herself no time to debate which path to take when she was once face to face with the "Passage Perilous."

She took the key, and the brown paper, and walked steadily to the door. Jim would not hesitate as to which was the only honourable way. Could she do it? "For Jim," came the answer, "For Jim!"

She went in and shut the door after her. Afterwards she drove to the bank, and then on to the station. But she took no parcel to the publishers. Her face looked half-frightened, half-puzzled.

IV.

"Mildred! I must know how you got the money for Pallion's fee, for all my expenses—and now for this trip?"

"My dear boy, you are an invalid, and you must not be bothered with business matters. I will tell you some day."

"I am not an invalid now—and I don't like being treated as a fool—even if I am one."

"Don't, Jim, dear! You are exciting yourself about nothing. The bank advanced the money."

"The bank! Then we owe what—how much? How shall I ever pay it? Pallion said I ought not to work for a year. One does not fall on one's head for nothing. What security had you to offer?"

Mildred did not know how to tell him.

"It is all right," she said soothingly, "they will give us lots of time."

But Jim was restless and uneasy. The illness had left his head weak. He was inclined to believe that he would never be able to write again.

There was a lurking serpent among the flowers of Italy that spring. Whitsuntide among the roses of Florence held carking cares for both of them.

Mildred saw his depression and fancied coldness, but she feared still more what he might think when he knew.

He had talked of his book once or twice when he was too ill to know what he was talking about, when he seemed likely to pass through a "Passage Perilous," which would take him away from Mildred for ever.

She could hardly bear to hear him. There were beautiful thoughts behind the ugly details which had blinded her.

Since his recovery he had never mentioned the book; Mildred sometimes thought that he had forgotten it.

His friend, Jack Conyers, came over to stay with them at Whitsuntide. Mildred had to tell him about the book, to put him on his guard in talking to Jim, but it made confusion worse confounded. Jim discovered that he knew where the money came from.

Digitized by Google

They had been up to San Miniato one morning, and were looking down over the fair dream of colour that calls itself the city of Florence, when Jim began, "Mildred, why do you tell Jack about affairs which you won't tell me?"

"You have been very ill dear," she said. "Don't talk of affairs now—it is too lovely. Look at the sun trying to warm the cold grey olives——"

"I can't look at anything," said Jim. "I feel as if I had a burden on my back. I can't fix my mind on anything. How am I to write any more?" He said it fiercely. The loss of that faculty would be a grievous loss indeed.

Mildred was very anxious. His mind had not been impaired by that terrible blow, but he was excitable, and the doctor had warned her against worry for him. How could she tell him? What would he believe?

The olives and the roses, and the matchless grace of the campanile in the distance, all looked grey together. Even the sky was hardly blue. Mildred was frightened. Fear takes the colour out of life as well as out of a coward's face.

"Dear Jim," she said, "why will you distress yourself? There is nothing to pay back. I have arranged all that."

"You have arranged it! What do you know of business matters? You seem to confide in Jack. I shall ask him."

Jack was a blunderer, he would be sure to make a muddle of it.

"You can't do that," she said gravely, as if the idea displeased her; "he would think we had quarrelled."

"We have not quarrelled—yet," said Jim. He could not understand Mildred's reserve. He had believed before that she shared every thought with him. Perhaps she had not. He was ill and depressed. The idea began to poison all his happiness. Why did Jack know?

"I won't accept charity," he said to Mildred, "I would rather starve."

"Don't trouble yourself," said his wife, "the money is honestly ours."

"Honestly ours?" he cried, "Honestly ours? How can that be? There is no way in which we could have got it."

"I got it," said Mildred proudly; "isn't that enough?"

"Enough? Yes, but how, and why does Jack know? For goodness sake, Mildred, explain to me. I don't know that you may not have been vilely cheated."

"I have not been been cheated," said Mildred. His face was changing colour every moment. Perhaps his brain really would not stand the blow that the truth might be to him.

"Tell me!" he pleaded, taking her hand.

"Dearest," she said, "I will tell you some day, but the doctor's orders are strict—you are not to be worried with business."

"You mean that you won't tell me?"

He got up, "Very well, let us go home."

He did not ask her again, but the rest of that spring was a nightmare to Mildred.

Had the wavering wind of his will ceased to blow in her direction? She feared that he had had a quarrel with Jack Conyers, because Jack went away sooner than he had intended.

And Jim's moods varied more and more. One day he seemed happy, the next miserable, and he never would tell her why. But he left the question of money alone, and never even asked about the "Passage Perilous."

Mildred at last came to the conclusion that he guessed what she had done and bitterly resented it. "He has guessed wrong," she said to herself, "but he would not believe me if I told him."

Mildred discovered that life depends on more than scenery. Happiness may be wanting even in a fairyland of art and flowers.

The shadow deepened and lengthened as time went on. Mildred tried to broach the subject once when they were at home again, but he put it aside.

"A belated confidence is like a cold omelette," he said—"even a hungry man can't appreciate it."

He began to work again, sooner than Mildred thought wise, but he would not tell her what he was doing. She used to do his typewriting for him, but this time he said that the clicking of the machine annoyed him, and sent it away to be done.

Mildred was therefore ignorant and miserable. If he could write "A Passage Perilous" in their happy days, what was he writing now? But sometimes she thought that he was not so unhappy as she was.

Digitized by Google

At last, one morning, she found the new book, printed and bound, lying on her table. She snatched it up, eager, yet fearful and trembling. What was the name? To her intense horror, as if a ghost had risen before her, she saw the well-known words, "A Passage Perilous," by James Carlton.

She caught her breath. Had he written it again, to punish her for what she had not done?

"Oh, I must tell him, I must tell him!" cried poor Mildred, "whether he believes me or not." She put down the book. Jim was out, but she could not read it till everything was made clear between them. "Oh, Jim, Jim! what have you been thinking of me?"

He came in late that night, but Mildred was waiting for him in his study. There was a half-expectant, half-shy look about him. "Well," he said, "have you read my book?"

"No, no—I could not——"

"Could not! Mildred?" There was a note of intense pain in his voice.

"No—I could not—till I could tell you. "O, Jim—it has been between us all this time."

"Tell me? Very well—anything you like." He sat down wearily, utterly disappointed. The book was to make his peace with his wife, and she would not read it."

"Jim!" She knelt down by him. "I did not burn the—the first 'Passage Perilous.'"

"My dear child——"

"It was burnt," cried Mildred. "I found it burnt when I came in here—I don't know how it could have got off the table—I found it lying almost in ashes before the fire! It is true—it is indeed! I borrowed that money on the insurance——"

"My darling——"

"You do believe me? Oh, dear, dear Jim! I did not burn your book, although I hated it."

Jim's answer was altogether satisfactory, though he did not speak for a minute or two. Then he said, "I burnt the book myself—because you disliked it."

"You did!' Mildred gasped. "You did! And I was so afraid! I thought that you would never believe me—never forgive me."

"I forgot to tell you at first," said Jim, "and then I thought that I would write another to surprise you. What a brute I have been! I never guessed that you had got the money for the insurance. I thought that you had borrowed from Jack, and I was angry because neither of you would tell me."

"I ought to have told you," sighed Mildred.

"I can pay it back all right now," said Jim. "This book was written for you—dear heart. Can you forgive the other?"

"It was my fault," said the faithful Mildred, "I ought not to have forgotten that you were always 'a man of moods.'"

THE END.

Digitized by Google

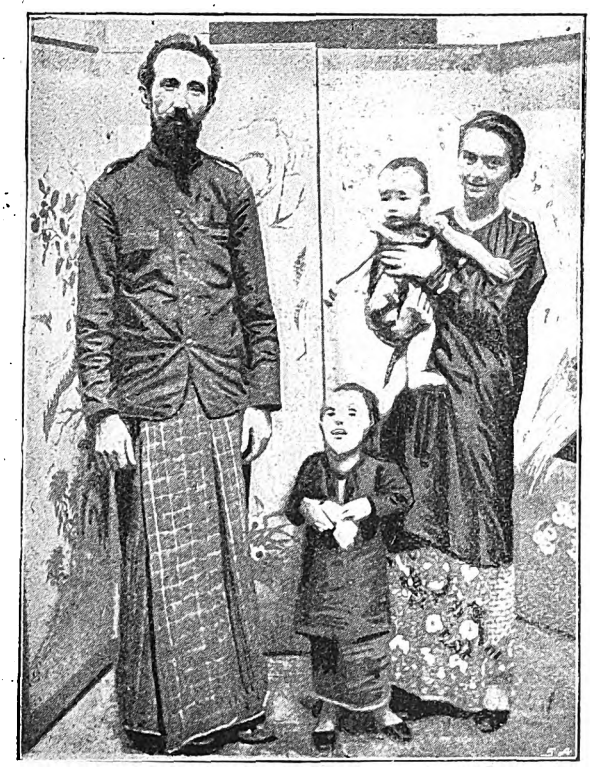
The Salvation Army Officer.

By W. BRAMWELL BOOTH.

THE Salvation Army, next to the presence of the Spirit of God, owes its very existence to the enterprise of its Officers, of whom it has at work 15,460 in 47 countries and colonies. It is a thing of energy and ambition and fire, or it is nothing. Side by side with the deepest teaching as to the helplessness of any human effort without the attending life of the Holy Ghost we are for ever urging upon all alike that, as in the material so in the spiritual world, God will not do for men what they ought to do for themselves; that He will not answer prayers which ought to be answered by those who offer them; that it is useless to expect Him to own and bless those who are idle or negligent of their duty, or careless of their opportunities; that if the word of the Lord is to run and have free course, someone must run with it; that if the work of God is to grow, someone must make it their business to grow it; that if God is to give the increase of the precious seed, someone must "plant" and someone must "water."

The doctrine of human responsibility is writ large on all aspects of our work. Our very defeats—for we have defeats—no less than our successes, serve to prove to our Officers the everlasting truth that men reap as they sow.

This principle applies to their own promotion and advancement as well as to their work, and just in proportion as they realise it a spirit of healthy ambition springs up. Every Officer receives with his first commission the opportunity to reach the highest positions amongst us. On every hand he sees men and women occupying posts of honour and usefulness beyond their highest dreams, who began at the same point. The farm labourer of yesterday, from some obscure village outpost, is to-day the beloved leader of a corps with four or five hundred soldiers, and the centre of a network of holy activities which influence a city; the one-time



OFFICERS WORKING IN JAVA.

Digitized by Google

A VISIT IN THE SLUMS.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

its members take an old, yet ever new and ever-convincing text from which to address their ungodly neighbours. "You know me," each will say; "I work with you; you know I live godly; you can therefore live godly too." "You know me. If I don't live it," I have heard a navvy say when addressing his mates in the street in which his little home was situated, "If I don't live it, you can knock me down."

SALVATION ARMY OUTRIDERS CARRYING THE GOSPEL TO OUTLYING DISTRICTS.

Here let me quote a bright account of one of our ordinary open-air meetings, by the late Robert Buchanan, which appeared in one of the London weeklies.

". . . . The sound of the military band is hushed. The Salvation Soldiers, men and women, are kneeling bareheaded and with closed eyes on the shingle, while the Captain of the band, kneeling also, delivers an extempore prayer. The Captain's weather-beaten face is tortured with emotion, his voice is sharp with nervous agitation, but every word is simple and to the point. He speaks of the Rock of Ages and the Ivory Gate, and ever and anon his companions inter-ject a 'Hallelujah!' The features of both men and women are full of a curious intro-spective light. The Lieutenant, a delicate looking young man, kneels like one in a trance, his face shining, his lips quivering. The intense conviction and earnest sin-cerity of all is un-mistakable. Here and there among the listening crowd there is a mocking laugh and contemptuous word, but the majority of those present are respectfully attentive. Rising to his feet at last, the Captain takes up an old coat and cap which lie near him on the shingle, and speaks of a 'brother' who wore them only a few days since, and who has been suddenly 'taken up to Glory.' He pays a gentle tribute to the worth of the departed, and tells his hearers that the dead comrade was saved from 'a life of sin' by faith in the redeeming power of Jesus. 'We miss him, but do not grieve for him; he is happy with the Lord.' The band and chorus bursts out again in jubilation.

"As I listen from my coign of vantage, a little maiden of the house trips in smiling with a copy of the current War Cry. She is one

OPEN AIR MEETING IN SOUTH AMERICA.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

barren wisdom compared with cheerful acquiescence as that of my three little maids from Devon!"

But this open-air work is only a small part of the corps' programme. The following schedule, which is an attempt to put in the form of a table the daily fighting engagements of a Captain in charge of a corps containing a hundred Soldiers, has been supplied to me by an old Field Officer who has had experience of all kinds of corps, and who calls it "From an Officer's Diary." Four representative days have been chosen, but the remainder of the week is just as full of work of the hardest and most multifarious kind for these self-sacrificing servants of their Lord. It speaks for itself :—

LEAVES FROM AN OFFICER'S DIARY.

MONDAY.

Arose at 7 a.m.—a good night's rest after yesterday—hard but happy fight. Began the week in faith for a time of great blessing.

9 a.m.—Visited Sunday's converts. Saw them during the breakfast hour. We had cheer and prayer. Then went visiting Soldiers and Recruits who were prevented from attending meetings. Found three sick.

1 p.m.—Hour for dinner. Found wife had been dealing with a backslider—a poor woman who appears to be very easily driven back.

Afternoon—resting.

7 p.m. — Open-air — Boro' Lane — great impression made by one of last night's converts, who testified.

8 p.m. — Indoor meeting. The converted Irishman and two saved footballers testified—spoke myself on prodigals—had two at the Mercy-seat, one from a lodging house—found he was a poor backslider.

9.45 p.m.—On way home from meeting visited two backsliders—they were very grateful for my visit.

TUESDAY.

After breakfast and family prayer answered correspondence from D.O.—went to see Mr. Thompson concerning work for last night's lodging-house man—got him fixed up.

10.30 a.m.—Went to see a gentleman with reference to the taking of a small room down among the navvies who are opening up the new line—took building.

Afternoon—visited from door to door—saw twenty-five families and prayed with them.

Evening—Soldiers' meeting—spoke to them on responsibility for the drunken classes.

9.30 p.m.—Held Census meeting to consider condition of Roll Book—found it was necessary to look up several backsliders and to follow down one or two offended. Local officers appear to feel the burden of the corps.

THURSDAY.

Was called up about three o'clock in the morning to visit a dying man—often been to our Barracks—was with him until he died at 7. After breakfast went visiting.

Afternoon.—Held cottage meeting amongst some old cottagers—had sixteen present—one old woman converted.

Evening.—Salvation meeting—got a runaway girl—just starting a life of ill-fame—took her back to her home, sixteen miles off, by last train to-night. Tired, but happy.

SUNDAY.

7 a.m.—Knee drill.
8.15 a.m.—Breakfast.
10 a.m.—Open-air meeting.
11 a.m. Holiness meeting.
12.45 p.m. —Dinner.
2 p.m.—Four company open-airs—ten Soldiers in each. Wife conducted open-air with converts.
3 to 3.30 p.m.—Attended junior meeting—examined register.
3 p.m.—Wife did first part of adult meeting.
3.30 p.m.—I conducted latter part of adult meeting—had 45 testimonies.
4.15 p.m.—Met three corps cadets and gave them counsel.
5 p.m.—Tea.
5.30 p.m.—Met bandsmen and had special prayer with them.
5.45 p.m.—Open-air.
6.30 p.m.—Salvation meeting.
8 p.m.—Prayer meeting. Held on until 9.45—got five persons to seek salvation. Accompanied two converts home, and reached quarters at 10.30. Rather weary, but cheered.

Yes, we are at it every day. "Day by day we magnify Thee." The Son of Man cannot be lifted up too often.

Hundreds of our Officers go every year from the lands of their birth to live and labour and die among strangers. It is often a great sacrifice. We have made less of the matter in recent years because, for one thing, it has become so usual a thing with us, but it is still a very beautiful sign of the good hand of our God upon us that so many of our dear people are willing to go forth to any part of the earth without scrip or purse or promise of any kind, in search of precious souls, and singing the while :

> To me remains nor place nor time :
> My country is in every clime.
> I can be strong and free from care
> On any shore, since God is there.

From nation to nation they go, beloved everywhere. Racial enmities and national prejudices die down in the breasts of Salvationists, and in them we see instead evangels of the true brotherhood of man. Is not this a promise of the one fold, under the one Shepherd? Is it not a power for righteousness and peace? Is it not the dawn of a coming day of love? Is it not worth all the suffering and heart-break of the separations involved?

Digitized by Google

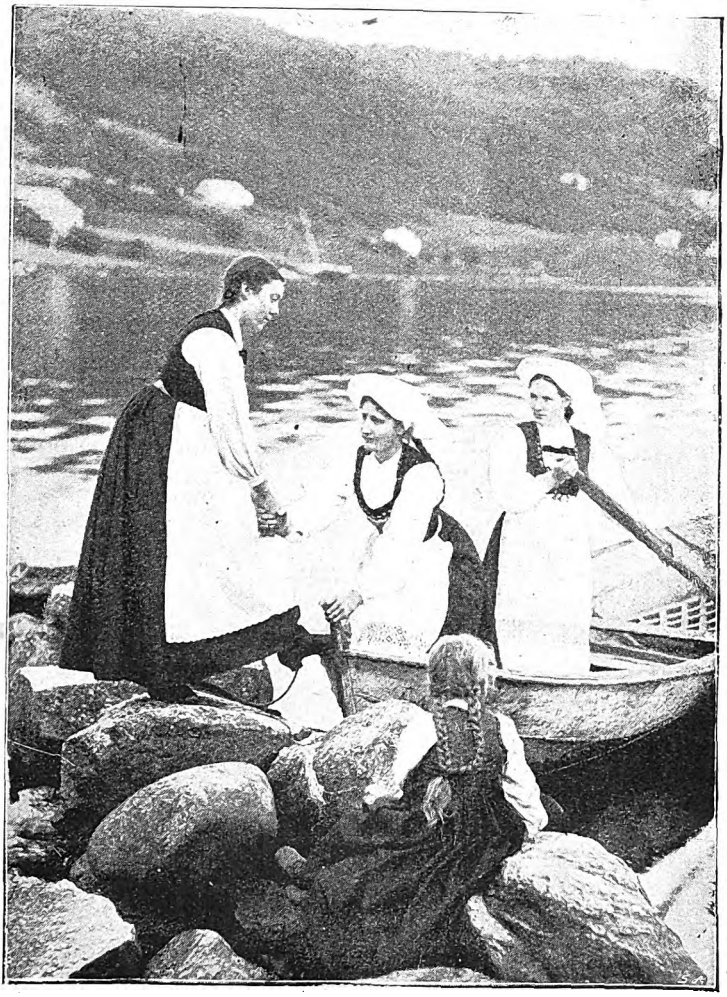
True to the great principle of sympathy which is at the root of all our work, The Army goes amongst what are curiously enough called the native races as amongst brothers. Our Officers live with them, dress in a somewhat similar manner, eat the same food and in every way possible avoid alike the assumption of superiority and the attempt to impose upon them customs which are in no way necessary to their salvation, and which are calculated to raise great prejudice against the truth. This involves some considerable sacrifices of personal comfort and convenience, especially to Europeans, but it has been abundantly justified by the results.

As to the devotion and the thoroughness of many of our comrades working in heathen fields it is scarcely necessary to speak. Their praise has gone out unto all the earth. Even those who most condemn their rule of life are compelled to acknowledge their unflinching self-sacrifice for Christ's sake.

It may be said that all our officers in India have "hazarded their lives for Jesus Christ," and it is equally true that some have laid them down for His sake and the Gospel's.

Here is an illustration of what I mean :—

The cholera had come to an Indian village in which there was no representative of Jesus Christ. Medicine they had none; advice, only that which the incantations of the priest or the wild shrieks of the Devil Dancers could afford, and sorrow and dismay soon became a panic. In a few days the dismay became despair.



GOING TO A MEETING—NORWAY.

The dead lay unburied, the sick and dying uncared for.

At last the head men of the village held a council together. To whom could they turn for help?

After a number of suggestions had been made, one of the men exclaimed, "My brothers, let us go to the Mukti-fauj, of whom we have heard. It is said that they are not afraid of cholera; they will come and help us." So all that remained to be decided was who should form the deputation.

Digitized by Google

The next day a group of villagers, weary, despairing and spiritless, presented themselves before the white leader of the Salvationists for that district. Their request was soon made, and the Major's heart was touched. "Wait," he said, "one day, and I will see what I can do for you."

Amongst those who stood by while the villagers made their appeal were two Officers, Tamils by birth, who could have remained at their well-paid posts in office work, but the love of souls constrained them, and they had begged for a life for and with the people.

"May we not go back to the village with these men, Major?" pleaded the Captain earnestly, as soon as the deputation had retired. "Oh, give us this glorious chance!"

"But do you know anything of cholera?" asked the Major doubtfully. "What about the risk to yourselves; you have considered it?"

"Yes, yes, Major," interposed the Captain's wife; "my husband knows something of medicine. God will go with us."

And a few hours later, with the yellow robes of the Army Officers fluttering in their train, the villagers were making their way home across the rice fields.

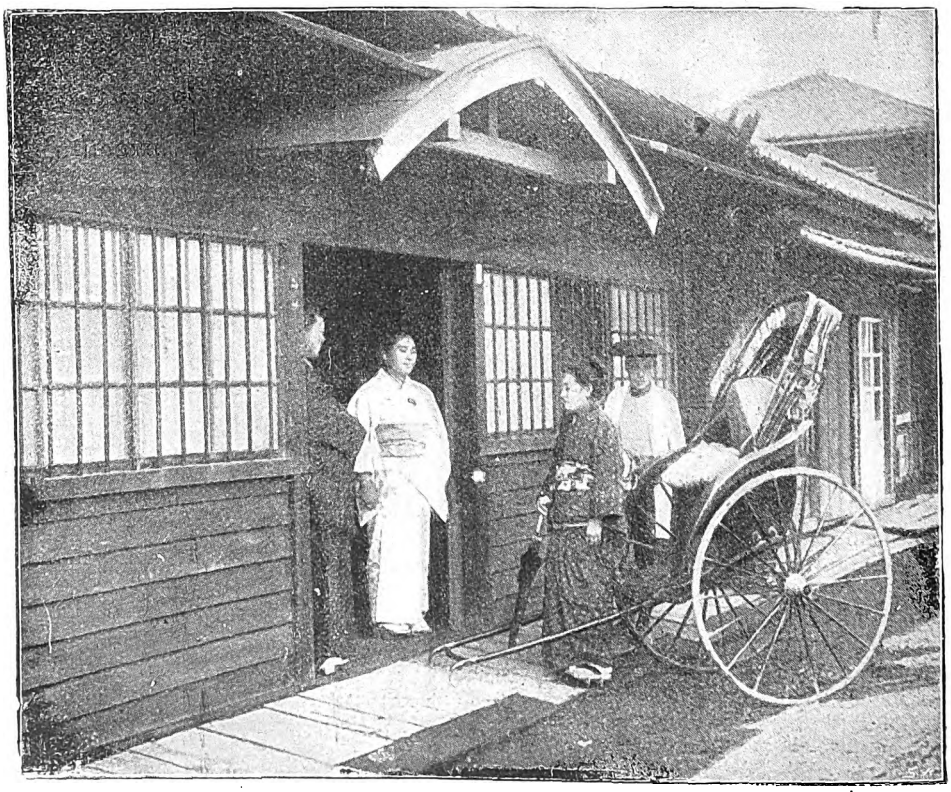
The Captain showed himself strong and wise and calm, and his wife carried hope and comfort to the sick, and gave them the only remedies which can avail against the awful scourge.

The little meetings held daily under the banyan trees hallowed the village, till even the hardest hearts were touched.

After a little time a messenger arrived one day at the Headquarters.

"Come quickly," he said, "the Muktifauj is ill; the sickness has taken him."

The Major and one or two with him set out for the village. But it was all over—even now the grave was being dug, quite near to those the Captain himself had helped to make but the day before.



A RESCUE HOUSE IN JAPAN.

Digitized by Google

"It was quick, Major, and peaceful," said the widow of an hour, with a strange light in her eyes. "He did not suffer much. We came here for life or death. He belonged to God before he did to me." And then came the burial.

"You must come back with us now," said the Major gently, when they stood once more in the little empty hut. "I cannot allow you to remain; the risk is too great. Besides, the worst is over now, and the cholera has spent itself."

But the widow shook her head, and clasped her dark hands tighter together.

"If I leave them now," she said, "all my husband's work is undone. They will say, 'She is frightened. Her own life is more to her than our souls. Her God is not greater than our gods.' Let me stay! Let me finish the work my husband died to do!" and her tears of entreaty fell thick and fast.

But the Major still hesitated.

"One week," she pleaded; "only one week! Then if there are no more deaths, I leave and come to Headquarters." And the week was granted her.

But twice only had the sun risen and set when a little group of weeping villagers carried her slowly in a litter over the rice fields back to the Divisional Headquarters, where, in spite of skill and love, she passed away to the Lord.

"What, then, have these two Tamil comrades accomplished?" I asked the Major, who saw it all.

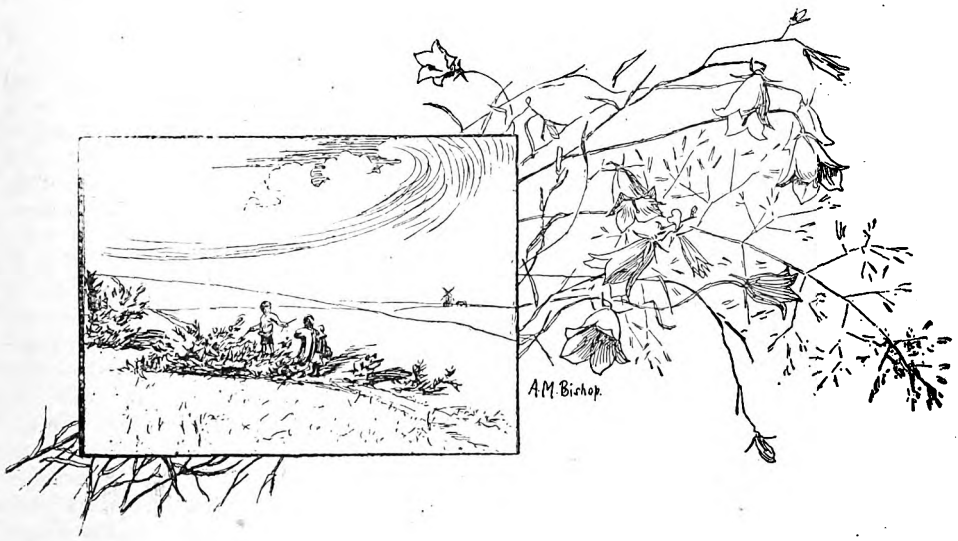
"Accomplished!" he said, "accomplished what will never be forgotten there, nor in any part of the district around. In that village I myself, not long after, helped the inhabitants to break and smash up their idols. Quite half the people in the place are now Salvationists, trying to serve God. They have an Officers' quarters and barracks there, and the village itself forms part of a flourishing circle of corps, all the outcome of the life and death of those two dear comrades."

This is sacred ground. I bow my head in silence in the presence of the Spirit of Calvary. I listen, and voices from out the past and from out the distant future also, seem to reach me. "If it die," says one, "if it die it bringeth forth much fruit—much fruit!" "The world," cries another, "must believe witnesses who are ready to seal their testimony with their lives."

Above them all I catch a heavenly echo, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them."

And I see as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire, and them that had gotten the victory, having the harps of God.

W. BRAMWELL BOOTH.



Digitized by Google

LITERARY JOTTINGS.

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN.

ONE is constantly getting surprises in connection with the first-edition market. Here, for example, is the editio princeps of the "Vicar of Wakefield" being knocked down in a London sale-room for £126. That is a record price. Fifteen years ago you might have bought the book for twelve guineas; thirty-five years ago the price would certainly not have exceeded a five-pound note. In 1895 a copy sold for £56; in 1892 one was knocked down for £94. When you remember that Goldsmith received just £60 for the entire copyright of this masterpiece of English literature you will realise how much better we understand the value of such things now.

In recalling Goldsmith's prices, it is curious to note how he was underpaid for good works and overpaid for poor ones. For "The Traveller" he got £20; for "The Deserted Village" £100; for "The Good-Natured Man" £500; and for his "Natural History"—a work so absurd that it speaks of cows shedding their horns—£1,400. If the latter sum had been paid for "The Deserted Village" it would have been more like the thing. However, it is satisfactory to find that, on the whole, literary merit has something to do with the present value of Goldsmith's books.

What is a library? How many books does a man require to have before he can speak of his library? Mark Pattison had 16,000 volumes on his shelves, and I believe he has remarked somewhere that "no one can be said to have a library at all unless he has at least ten thousand volumes." Mr. Augustine Birrell holds the same view. He says it would be quite absurd to be proud of having 2,000 books. You might as well be proud of having two overcoats. "After your first 2,000 difficulty begins; but until you have 10,000 volumes the less you say about your library the better. Then you may begin to speak." If that be true, some of us have, I fear, a long time before us in which to remain dumb.

And yet we are constantly adding to the number of volumes on our shelves. Speaking for myself, at any rate, I buy a great many more books than my income justifies. I know I am doing wrong, but I cannot resist the temptation. And that raises another point. Mark Pattison is quoted as saying that "he had been informed, and verily believed, that there were men of his own University in Oxford who, being in uncontrolled possession of annual incomes of not less than £500, thought they were doing the thing handsomely if they expended £50 a year upon their libraries." Whatever may be said about the University man, I certainly think that the average book-lover who devotes a tenth of his income to his library is "doing the thing handsomely." If he has a wife and family and a position to keep up it is as much as he can afford. The bookseller cannot have all one's custom; the butcher and the baker have their claims too.

Do you remember the story of the Mormon with the two wives? One wife disliked her husband's dark hairs, the other disliked his grey, and so they pulled away at the poor man's locks until he hadn't a single hair left. William Shakespeare seems to be in the same case as the hapless Mormon. What the Baconians don't rob him of somebody else does. Professor Boas has been asserting that Thomas Kyd, one of the earlier Elizabethan dramatists, was practically the author of "Hamlet." No wonder a reviewer feels "bound to enter an emphatic protest."

That Kyd wrote a "Hamlet" which can be dimly descried underlying the great Shakespearean tragedy is known to every student of Elizabethan letters.

Digitized by Google

But it is really too much to say that the vocabulary and the rhythm of the "Hamlet" with which we are acquainted "are not those of the master-dramatist at any stage of his career, while in Kyd's works they may be frequently paralleled." Shakespeare could have put Thomas Kyd in his finger ring. He was quite a second-rate dramatist, and if Shakespeare took anything from him it can only have been a few commonplace lines, which are now preserved like flies in the golden amber of Shakespeare's verse. This business of trying to dethrone Shakespeare is becoming highly ridiculous. There is madness in it, and if the Baconians fail to take warning in time they may live to be as crazy as the lady mentioned by Nathaniel Hawthorne, who declared that Bacon had hidden his secret in Shakespeare's grave and protected it by the well-known curse!

Fortunately, the present-day Baconians are not so daring as this monomaniac in petticoats, who actually wanted to open Shakespeare's tomb in order to get at the all-important documents. She took a humble lodging in Stratford-on-Avon, and began to haunt the church like a ghost. First she tried to bribe the clerk, and when he failed she sought the aid of the vicar. The vicar was so staggered that he was unable to say no. He temporised by asking permission to consult a lawyer, and instead of having the poor lady sent to a lunatic asylum at once, he led her on bit by bit until at last she thought she had really got permission to make an assault on the poet's resting place. Of course the grave was never touched. The woman went hopelessly insane just after sending into the world a ponderous book about her "theory." Let the Baconians beware lest a like fate overtake them!

What is Scott's best novel? Dr. Conan Doyle, in a speech delivered at Edinburgh, selected from the magician's works "Count Robert of Paris" for special and solitary eulogy. That is not a very usual choice. Mr. Barrie votes for "Ivanhoe" as the finest of all the Waverleys. It is purely a matter of personal taste. My own favourite is "The Antiquary." Some people prefer "Old Mortality." Mr. Russell Lowell's fancy proclaimed itself on what proved to be his death-bed. Holmes called to ask how he felt. "I hardly know," he said: "I am deep in 'Rob Roy.'" It was not the first time that Scott had been used as an anodyne, and it will probably not be the last.

In the speech to which I have just referred, the creator of Sherlock Holmes uttered a very necessary warning against haste and over-production in literature. He recommended to every man now and then a literary retreat—"a time when he may get away from the rush of life, and steady his mind and sober his judgment by a course of the classics." The advice was never more needed than it is to-day. It is true that Scott wrote much and wrote rapidly, but Scott was a giant compared with whom our novelists are but pigmies. The deplorable thing is that writers with a little talent now have all their originality dissipated by the forcing process of publishers and log-rollers, who tempt a man to "make the little success he has attained the excuse for an excessive output." Novels, as it has been truly said, are turned out as a baker turns out hot pies, with the result that they are dead and forgotten within three months of publication. If a man produces a novel as often as Mr. Meredith or Mr. Hardy he does very well, and, at all events, cannot be called a machine-man.

Looking through a little book on pronunciation for singers I am pleased to see the author protesting against the neglect into which the letter "r" has fallen among English people. Except at the beginning of a syllable this important consonant seems to have dropped quite out of use. Ninety per cent. of English speakers and singers (I do not include Scotch and Irish) never attempt to sound it in the thousands of words like "her," "farm," "winter," "world," "bird," and so on. In a recent issue of the Musical Times I find this little joke: "What English composer is like a reply? Arne, sir." Do you think that the composer of "Rule Britannia" pronounced his name "Ahn"? Not a bit of it. And why should educated people accept the utterance of the idle and the ignorant as their standard of propriety? The letter "r" remains in all the dictionaries, great and small, as the theoretical and authorised pronunciation. Why is it to be ignored?

J. CUTHBERT HADDON.

Digitized by Google

WHY LIFE IS WORTH LIVING.

By Rev. J. HIRST HOLLOWELL.

ONE answer to this question is that our life is a divine creation, and it must therefore, be worth the creature's acceptance. God would not create life if it were necessarily a curse to its living possessor. Part of the sacredness of His own eternal life must pass over to the life of His noblest creature. We are not justified in disparaging, abusing, or destroying what He has given. His gift is worth taking.

And it is so for another reason, namely, that life is the greatest thing we know. One of the best names for God Himself is "Life." He is the "living One." Love is the highest of God's names, but love implies life, and is the crown of life's glory. The universal horror of death is the proof of the dignity of life. The fear of death does homage to the worth of life. If it were not a noble thing to live, men would be less unwilling to die. If, again, man were not great, his moral ruin would not be so appalling a fact. The height of his faculties measures the depth of his fall. Nothing is so great a thing as life. The mountain, the sea, the pyramid, the sun, the starry universe, sink into inferiority compared with the life of one soul. Life so mysteriously great must be worth living.

Further, our sense of the worth and greatness of life is in no way injured by the short time we have to live. Some of the most happy, worthy, and noble lives were lived in very narrow limits of time. But no one thought them less worth living because they were cut down like a flower. Everyone would have admitted that such lives were a success even if they had been lived only for a year. It is not the extent, but the content and intent, of life which determines whether it is worth living. We come up to the Gate of Death and start back at the frowning portal. Within all is dark. Silence reigns without. No voice calls, no hand grasps, no eye sparkles, no foot approaches, no sign is given. But life is worth living for all that. To them that have passed through the gate, and "after life's fitful fever sleep well," no apology is due from the Creator for bringing them under the burden of existence. Nor would they ask for one. Read the names of those that have entered: Moses, Isaiah, David, John, Paul, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Cæsar, Napoleon, Homer, Virgil, Dante, Shakespeare. Above all read the Name that was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin on the Cross—"Jesus." When we know who have died we need not fear to die, and we cannot be ashamed to live. Our desire must be to share in their life, and to follow them at last in death.

Of course, we know that life must be lived to the full, if it is to be worth living. We must enter into life with zest and purpose. If we hold ourselves back from the free and consecrated employment of life's opportunities, "flat and unprofitable" will seem to us "all the uses of this world." The glow of exercise is wanted. The joy of effort must be known. Morbid self consciousness must be lost in the depths of unselfish interest. Look at the eagerness of men to make money, and to try the risky chances of gambling. If men can put what soul they have into the speed of a horse or the ribbon of a jockey, how ought we to put life and zeal into the better forms of action? Perhaps an inferior mode of life, if pursued with devotion, brings more pleasure than the half-hearted and grudged service of a holy cause. But where the best things are done in the best spirit, no one will ever need to ask whether life is worth living.

Life is worth living, moveover, because the Greatest has lived it. It was good for Him to live. He never regretted His Birth. He "despised the shame." He had the joy "set before Him" of passing through seeming defeat to eternal victory. If it was expedient for Him to go away, it was also expedient for Him to be here.

Digitized by Google

Nor did He take one part of life as hallowed and ban the rest. Temple and workshop, desert and marriage-feast, well of Sychar, home at Bethany, the sick, the lepers, the publicans and sinners, the scenes and cavil of controversy, the love of the faithful, the kiss of the betrayer, the mockery of Herod, the farce of trial, the sharpness of death—He took all as forming an experience through which He must and chose to pass. And life is worth living if it carries us along the course He went. His way to the Father and to eternal glory cannot be bad for us. We will not only say, with Thomas, "Let us also go, that we may die with Him," but "Let us also stay, that we may live with Him." What He has cleansed, let no man call common. Our life, in its measure, need be no more a failure than His.

Once more, life is worth living because we do not live it alone. There are so many to live it with us. We are in a great company. The inspiration of numbers is ours. Neither our joys nor our sorrows are solitary. The same cross we carry rests on other shoulders, some weaker than ours. Our brothers are not mere spectators: they are comrades. They strike the same blows on the anvil of life. They shape circumstances, and are shaped by them—for man has both active and passive relations to them—as we do, and are. They visit the same altars—the same graves. They find comfort in sorrows the sorest, and compensation in losses the greatest, that man can know. We are moving forward, but we are moving together. It is a procession, not a private walk, this life-journey of ours. The labour is social labour that we perform. The rest of night comes to the tired multitude of the whole city. The joys of one tend to become the joys of others, and the wrongs and griefs of some affect others with strange emotions of sympathy. In short, we find stimulus, solace, interest, and delight in the fact that men bear each other company and cheer each other's way. We hear the hum of voices on every hand. It is beautiful to know that "no man liveth to himself."

Further, life is worth living because one life carries other lives with it. If when we begin each day we could remember how much of the happiness or sorrow of others depends on us, our plans would be more carefully formed, and our words more thoughtfully chosen. Our lives are freighted with other lives. We bear the fortunes of others with us over the wide ocean of life. Such a life as carries others' lives with it must be worth living. It is too solemn and potent to be despised. To despise the mother is to despise the child. To undervalue and scorn life is to show contempt for its issues. Our lives are the acorns sown for future forests. The times that are coming will be coloured by the thought, purpose, and deed of to-day. It is worth living to be the sources of a nobler future.

And, lastly, our work will remain when we are gone. The work of life is worth doing, for it cannot be undone. I was vividly impressed with the terrible accident that befell those Cornish workmen who fell from the viaduct of Menheniot some years ago, while engaged in widening the line from Bristol to Penzance, and were dashed to pieces in the lovely valley below. The very task on which they were engaged when support failed them and they fell was contributing to that great result. They were opening communications for their fellows when their own lives closed. They did their work, and it will last. The trains and the people fly over the viaduct, and few think it was men that are dead who made it all possible. Those broken bodies were the real viaduct. They bridged the abyss, and nothing can take from them the glory of the accomplished work.

Let it be so with us. We shall soon sleep. Our places will be filled by others. But while the day's work is doing let it be ennobled and brightened by the reflection that it is more than a day's work. It is the work of our short day, it is true, but generations will experience its effects. Let us so work that trains of progress shall pass over the valleys we have bridged, the rough ground we have smoothed. It is worth living to do work that can never die. And as we are God's workmanship, we are assured that not only will our work live below, but we ourselves shall live on with the Father above.

J. HIRST HOLLOWELL.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

PRIZE COMPETITION.

"WHEN I GROW UP!"

There is something very interesting in hearing children tell of what they mean to do or be when they grow up, for though older experience may see how this or that is not very likely to come to pass, yet the spirit of the wishes has its meaning. Though the child cries for the moon he is not going to get it, but that the child does cry for it is a witness to the fact that his eye was made for light, and light has been set somewhere to satisfy his eye.

Robert Louis Stevenson's highest ambition at one time was to be a lamp-lighter!—

Now Tom would be a driver, and Maria go to sea,
And my papa's a banker, and as rich as he can be;
But I, when I am stronger, and can choose what I'm to do,
O, Leerie, I'll go round at night, and light the lamps with you!

Stevenson didn't turn out a lamp-lighter after all, yet he did fling a deal of brightness on the world. When I was "little and good" myself, the highest wish I had "when I grew up" was to be the keeper of a toll-bar! This was with a view to having plenty of time for reading, for, of course, I meant to choose a bar on some quiet country lane where the traffic was very slender. Well, I didn't turn toll-bar keeper, but the wish for a chance to read much has stuck to me, and been in some measure fulfilled too. If we read the following letters in that light they will be found to give very pleasing indications of character. They are placed in the order of the writers' ages:—

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I think I will be a mother and have a very nice little girl and a little boy, and I will train them well. But I will not let them go to school, but they will have a governess, and I will tell her to teach them arithmetic, spelling, reading, singing, music, poetry, painting, drawing, etc.; above all to be good. Now I think I have told you all.—Yours very sincerely,

MARJORIE E. BARBER.
(Age 8½ years.)

8, Cleveland Parade, Darlington.

DEAR SIR,—When I grow up I hope to be a teacher. I should like to be a daily governess to two or three little girls, about six years of age. Why I would rather be a daily governess is because I could live at home, and have the evenings free for my own engagements. I practise keeping school with my blackboard at home. Sometimes I play by myself, and pretend I have pupils, and sometimes I play with our servant.—Your truly,

GRACIE M. EDWARDS.
(Age 10 years).

5, Alexandra Park Road,
Muswell Hill.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—When I'm a man I would like very much to be an officer in the Navy. First of all I would need to go in for an examination which, if I passed, I would then become a midshipman. When I received the news that I had passed I would likely get the name of the ship I was appointed to. Now life would begin to get unbearable. From morning to night it will be work, work, work, superintending washing of the deck, and seeing that the sailors do not get drink when the boat's on shore. After a few years' serving as a midshipman I will try an examination to make me a lieutenant. (This examination is on navigation.) Then after a few years' service I will be examined, and perhaps be made captain. I will then go a cruise till I receive orders to join a fleet where I will distinguish myself and become an admiral. I will remain in that position for twenty years when I will retire and live on my pension. The ambition of my life I have told you in a few words. I am afraid it is rather like castle-building in the air, for I will perhaps never succeed.—Yours truly,

Digitized by Google

JAMES S. AITKEN.
Teviotside House, (Age 10 years.)
Hawick.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I want to work hard at my lessons, so as to get a scholarship, and after that to go to college. I should like to go to Newnham or Girton at Cambridge. I should like to be able to teach, especially little ones, because I am very fond of them. I think I have told you all I should like to do when I am grown up.—I remain, yours affectionately,

MARGARET F. KELLETT.
(Age 10¼ years.)
Brazenose School, Stamford, Lincolnshire.

MY DEAR MR. HOWATT,—When I grow up I should like to be brave, and I think I should like adventure, although I am a girl. I should like to travel very much and go round the world, and if I were a boy I should be a soldier if there was a war. I look forward to having a nice home of my own in the country. I should like to be a good housekeeper, and I should like to be able to be a good drawer and painter. I should like to be able to cook well, as I am that way inclined. I am fond of horses, and I should like to ride and drive; I should like to have money and help the poor, and give money to hospitals for the poor. I should like dancing very much, I think, if I got more of it. I should like to be tall, which I think I shall be. I shall always try and help mother and father as much as possible.—Believe me, your little friend,

GEORGINA MARY JOAN JACKSON.
(Age 12 years).
The Green,
Kirbymoorside, Yorks.

MY DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I think when I am a man I shall be a chemist, and not a doctor, like my father, because it is awful having to go on to the moor in the middle of the night. I think if I change my mind at all I shall be an engineer, as I like engines very much. I should like to be very clever, and help my father and mother in every way possible. I would like to go to South America very much for a few years, or have a few adventures in Central Africa. I think I shall hunt a great deal when I am grown up, because I like horses very much. The thing I shall most look forward to is to have plenty of money. The chief deed would be to help the poor as much as it is my power to do.—I am, your sincere friend,

ARTHUR EUSTACE BLYTHE JACKSON.
(Age 13 years.)
The Green,
Kirbymoorside, Yorks.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—When I am a man I should very much like to be an electrical engineer. By that I mean to have something to do with the electric engines at an electric lighting station. I should also like to be a Sunday-school teacher, and have something to do with the Band of Hope. I should certainly do my duty both to God and man. I should like to marry well and live in a house of my own, also not have many children. I think if I had money to spare I should try to make others, not so well situated, happy.—I am, yours truly,

ARTHUR WILLIAM DAVIES.
(Age 13 years.)
21, Camm Street, Crewe.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—When I grow up I should like to be a musician. I am very fond of music, and I hope to be able to repay my parents for their kindness in paying for my examinations. I also wish to help the poor and needy.—I remain, your affectionate reader,

ELSIE JONES.
(Age 14 years.)
Darmstadt, Newport-road,
West Cowes, Isle of Wight.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—There are two things I should like to be. Either a teacher or a hospital nurse to little children. I think so much depends on the training of little children, and although nurses do not train them, they have so many chances of helping them, as trying to set a good example, and dropping texts and verses which may become the means of leading them to the Saviour.—I am, yours sincerely,

ALICE MANNING.
"The Mills," (Age 15 years).
Great Barton,
Bury St. Edmunds.

DEAR SIR,—When I have grown up I should like to be a shorthand and typewriter, which I would have to begin to learn very soon. I should like to be good and noble, and do to others as I would they should do unto me, also to help those who might not have been so fortunate as myself. I would like to be in a large town or city, to begin my career, and stay there for a few years. After that I would like to go to India or Africa to work amongst the people who have not heard of the way to Heaven. I should like my life to be of some use in the world; that is my great aim.—I remain, yours truly,

ANNIE ROBERTS.
117, Forth Street, (Age 15 years).
Pollokshields, Glasgow.

The best letter in this batch has been judged to be that of Arthur E. B. Jackson, to whom, accordingly, a handsome volume has been sent.

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

Boys are proverbially very puzzling to make out, from whatever point of view you regard them. Gazed upon with the eye of the artist they may be picturesque, but mother can rarely get a view of them in an entirely satisfactory condition—what with crumpled collars, baggy pouches, shoes laced with scraps of twine, and all negligence generally. Studied from the philosophic point of view they are most troublesomely baffling—such a mixture of "cheek" and shyness, cruelty and magnanimity, bullying and championing, rapacity and generosity. There is here the raw material for anything—good or bad, lofty or low, according to the heart or hand that may now try to mould them. In one thing they are all much alike at this stage—give them something weak to protect and take care of, and the most careless rises to his responsibility and develops a sturdy steadfastness in tender-heartedness.

Digitized by Google

It is not at all surprising then to come across the following extract from a letter: "My children, especially the boys, think so much of their Crutch-and-Kindness letters that I have often to read the whole of them through, and the presents are shown again and again."

The exact bearing of this may need a word of explanation. There are 6,000 poor crippled children in London alone, and, apart altogether from their continual suffering, their lot is most pitiful and lonesome. The parents at the best have a hard struggle to find bread and shelter, and the little weaklings have to be left much alone. The Crutch-and-Kindness League was started with the hope of doing something to mitigate the sad lot of these maimed children, and the way it has devised for this brings the good work within the reach of all, far off or near. For, all it asks is that each member of the League should write a letter once a month to the crippled protégé put into his or her care for this purpose, or if at times the member finds himself too busy to write, then an illustrated magazine, a picture-book, a toy, bit of ribbon, or such-like may be sent instead—till next time. The joy such kindnesses bring to the little "prisoners of God" who have often, through spinal complaint, to be on their backs from month to month, is simply inconceivable to any but those who have seen it.

This explains the extract quoted above. The boys are in correspondence with some cripple or cripples, and the delight they find in the replies from their young charges has a steady, engentling influence upon them.

And what is thus true of boys is equally true of girls, and of men and women, so that, in this view of it, it is sometimes hard to guess which gets the most good—the one to whom the kindness is done, or the one by whom it is rendered. In both cases there is the quality of the mercy which "blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

Here then is an opportunity for cultivating the best that is in the heart of young or old, and it is an opportunity which comes within the reach of all, abroad or at home, the invalid and the strong, those in loneliest hamlets or distant backwoods, as well as the busy toilers in the thronged cities—all, in fact, who have it in their hearts to do some good for pity's sake, but who are often cut off from the commoner agencies for kindness.

In this way the League has spread to every part of the world. Already there are 5,000 members distributed over the globe, but 1,000 more, at least, are needed before every crippled child in London can say he or she has a friend somewhere out in the vast world of health. Will you, good reader, become one of the thousand still required?

All further particulars of the Crutch-and-Kindness League may be had for a stamp from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John Street, Theobalds Road, W.C.

NEW MEMBERS FOR THE MONTH.

Mrs. Edgar Hodgson, Natal; Miss Flossie Cann, Steyning; Miss Ethel F. Brown, Birtley; Mrs. Lucas, Birkswith; Miss Lillie Kent, Frodsham; Miss Muriel Angas, Highgate; Miss Shaw, Harrogate; Miss Murray, Birmingham; Miss H. Quertier, Guernsey; Miss Hilda Skelsey, Nottingham; Mrs. Crewe, Ealing; Miss Ada Howard, Ipswich; Miss Hester Townsend, London; Miss Jane Ellames, Frodsham Miss Dorothy Archer, Chatham; Miss Elsie Bowman, Nevenshulme; Miss B. Dudley, New Zealand; Miss Muriel Heaton-Ellis, Buntingford; Miss B. A. Paul, Tavistock; Miss Constance E. Boyd, Altringham; Miss Marian Cave, Miss Ella Cave, Natal; Miss Eleanor Anstey, Miss Alice Anstey, Blackheath; Miss Janie Penford, Westminster; Miss F. Jeffereys, Isleworth; [Miss Janie Rush, Sidcup; Junior Christian Endeavour, per Miss Hyslop, Romford; Mr. Long, Bath.

Digitized by Google

FRIENDLESS AND FALLEN.

London Female Preventive & Reformatory Institution.

Office: 200, EUSTON ROAD, N.W.

DEPENDENT ENTIRELY UPON VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS.

FIVE HOMES AND AN OPEN ALL NIGHT REFUGE

For 180 Friendless and Outcast Young Women and Girls are maintained by this Institution.

The Work is Evangelical, while the pitiable condition of those whom it seeks to save constitutes a powerful appeal for the sympathy and aid of Christian men and women.

CONTRIBUTIONS are URGENTLY NEEDED for DAILY SUPPORT.

Bankers: Lloyd's Bank, Limited, 16, St. James's Street, S.W.

WILLIAM J. TAYLOR, Sec., 200, EUSTON ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

"BEGIN WITH THE CHILDREN,"

LORD SHAFTESBURY used to say—and he was right!

For nearly sixty years this has been the work of the

Ragged School Union, of which he was the practical Founder.

This Society is affiliated with 152 Local Mission Centres in the congested districts of London.

It thus reaches at least 100,000 Souls weekly through its manifold agencies, sustained by over

6,000 VOLUNTARY WORKERS.

It has a sensible scheme for helping the Bootless, Clothing the Ragged, and Feeding the Hungry.

It has a register of over Six Thousand

CRIPPLE CHILDREN in their own homes—poor afflicted little ones who need "most everything," the spiritual interest being paramount.

It sends away over

6,000 PALE-FACED CHILDREN

and adults to its Holiday Homes in the country each year. It gives over 50,000 of the poor children a Day's Fresh Air.

The Society is a distinctly Christian organisation, an ally of the Church, and an embodiment of the spirit of

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

FUNDS ARE URGENTLY NEEDED. ALL GIFTS SHOULD BE SENT TO

Mr. JOHN KIRK, Secretary,

Ragged School Union,

32, JOHN STREET, THEOBALD'S ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

The Bishop of Durham writes: "The Evangelical Alliance is a grand means for the promotion of the spiritual sympathy and co-operation of Christians of many lands and Churches, scattered locally as to organisation, yet one in the Lord. It is also a powerful agency for the practical aid of the weak and oppressed, which God has largely used."

Rev. B. F. Meyer writes: "In my opinion the Evangelical Alliance was never more needed than in the present day, as the common meeting ground of those who are one in their loyalty and love to the one Divine Head."

Rev. G. C. Morgan recently wrote: "I look upon the Evangelical Alliance as a splendid organisation for the accomplishment of just the work our age needs."

Principal J. Oswald Dykes says: "The Alliance seems to me to render a service to Evangelical Religion which hardly any other Association can accomplish. I hope therefore it will continue to rally fresh supporters and receive a large measure of encouragement in its good work."

In sending financial help, or the names and addresses of new members, please direct to

The SEC., 7, ADAM ST., STRAND, W.C.

Medland Hall, "A Home for Lost and Starving Men."

The only Free Shelter in London open all the year round.

2,400 FREE BEDS PROVIDED EVERY WEEK.

Last Year's admissions for the night	148,820	Number of different men helped in 1900	12,896
Additional supplied with food	14,494	At Sunday Evening Services	29,324

Average cost—less than 1½d. per man per night. Over 400 men have been settled in Canada.

A Gift of Two Guineas endows a Bed for Twelve Months.

Contributions welcomed by Rev. A. Mearns or Mr. E. Wilson Gates (Superintendent of the work) at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

When buying a bicycle, look at the tyres. If they are not the machine is not cheap at any price.

DUNLOP TYRES

BE SURE YOU SEE THE TRADE MARK ON THE INNER TUBE AS WELL AS THE OUTER COVER.

THE DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE COMPANY, Ltd.,
Para Mills, Aston Cross, Birmingham; & branches.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

"NEGO" FIRELIGHTERS

Are a scientifically prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. ONE OF THESE FIRELIGHTERS IS QUITE SUFFICIENT TO BOIL A KETTLE IN A FEW MINUTES.

Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d.; or twenty packets will be sent post free on receipt of 5s. P.O.

A Sample "NEGO" Firelighter will be sent post free on application.

Sole Wholesale Agents for the United Kingdom GENDALL & CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, W.C.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.
LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

Vol. 6. APRIL, 1902. No. 7.

Price Sixpence.

Published at 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

HALF PRICE AND DOUBLE STRENGTH OF ORDINARY HOUSEHOLD AMMONIA.
Retains its Strength to the Last Drop.

REPD. PINT 6d.

REPD. QUART 10½d.

A Necessity as well as a Luxury.
Used in the Bath, this popular Ammonia gives a delightful, refreshing feeling to the person. Its cleansing properties are manifested when used for washing china, glass, silver, clothes, &c. Its low price brings it within the reach of all.

Use it when Spring Cleaning.
Agents Everywhere.
If you experience any difficulty in obtaining it send us a post card and we will give you name and address of nearest dealer.

"You look unusually fresh this morning, dear!"
"I really feel so—I use CLARKE'S AMMONIA in my bath."

Large Sample Bottle Free on receipt of THREE penny stamps for postage. Address— CLARKE'S, 360, OLD KENT ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

Cheap Outfits of House Linen.

"The Noted Moore's Belfast Linen."—Yorkshire Post.

PARCEL A.—COMPLETE, £2 0s. 0d.

1 Damask Cloth, 2 yds. sq.	4 Chamber Towels.
2 Unbleached Cloths.	2 Roller Towels.
2 prs. Twilled Sheets.	2 Bath Towels.
4 Pillow Slips.	6 Tea.
1 White Quilt.	6 Dish.
2 Toilet Covers.	6 Dusters.
	2 Oven Cloths.

PARCEL B.—COMPLETE, £5 0s. 0d.

2 Damask Cloths, 2 yds. sq.	12 Linen Chamber Towels.
6 Serviettes.	3 Bath Towels.
4 prs. Cotton Sheets.	2 Roller Towels.
6 Pillow Slips.	2 Kitchen Cloths.
2 White Quilts.	6 Dish.
1 Coloured Quilt.	6 Tea and Glass.
2 Toilet Covers.	6 Dusters.

4 Oven and Pudding Cloths.

The Items quoted are Full Size, and may be relied upon to give Satisfaction in Wear.

Hemmed and Marked Ready for Use.
Free Delivery to any Railway Station.

Patterns and Price Lists of Household Linen post free.

Address:
MOORE'S BELFAST LINEN WAREHOUSE,
Albion Street, LEEDS.
AND AT BRADFORD.

27 YEARS' SUCCESS.
THE
UNIVERSAL REMEDY FOR
Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Influenza, Whooping-Cough, Hoarseness, &c.

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

IMPORTANT NOTICE:
SUBSTITUTION. — There are so many imitations of this successful, and therefore popular, remedy that it is of the utmost importance you should use the word "OWBRIDGE" when buying Lung Tonic, and TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

Sold everywhere in bottles at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., & 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

Digitized by Google

HOVIS
TRADE MARK
BREAD

Every genuine Loaf is stamped "HOVIS."

Is an improvement upon any other bread. Its popularity is due to this, that it is more nutritious and more digestible than any other.

Most Family Bakers make it.
Any further information will be sent on request.
HOVIS, LTD., Macclesfield.

SOLD IN 16 OZ. TINS AT 1s.

"FRAME-FOOD"

Best for Infants.

FREE TEST.
Sample of "FRAME-FOOD" or "FRAME-FOOD" JELLY sent free on receipt of 3d. for postage; both sent for 4d. postage.
(Mention this Magazine.)

Full Particulars with Analysis and Testimonials sent free on application.
FRAME-FOOD CO., LTD., BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.

LIFE-SIZE DOLL FREE.

"Baby's Clothes will now Fit Dollie."

Girls can get this beautiful Life-Size Doll absolutely Free for selling only ten packages of SHY-NALL, the Electric Polishing Fabric, at 6d. a package. Something new for cleaning and polishing Jewellery, Silverware, Glassware, &c. Sells at Sight. Write to-day; and we will send you the Fabric post free. When sold send us the money (5/-) and we will send you post free this Life-Size Doll, which is 2½ feet high, and can wear baby's clothes. When stuffed, this Doll is an exact reproduction in fast colours of a hand-painted French creation, done on extra heavy sateen that will not tear. The workmanship is perfect, the colour effects the very finest. The Doll is intended to be stuffed. It is this century's model of the old-fashioned rag doll that grandma used to make, and would make grandma open her eyes in wonder. Dolly is printed with golden hair, rosy cheeks, brown eyes, kid-coloured body, red stockings, black shoes, and will stand alone. If mamma can donate one of baby's outgrown dresses that her little daughter can put on and off, button and unbutton to her heart's desire, the Life-Size Doll will live in that child's memory long after childhood days have passed. If you do not care to sell our goods we will send the Doll post free upon receipt of 2/-.

Address:—Shy-Nall Chemical Co. (Doll Dept. 79), 75, Queen Victoria St., London, E.C.

HUNDREDS OF LADIES
are testifying to the value of
DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS.
They eradicate the imperfections, and make the Skin pure, fresh and velvety. Sold by Chemists in boxes at 2/9 and 4/6.
Sample Box, post free, 2/6.
Postal Dept., S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., S.E.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.
EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Digitized by Google

Produces the most lovely complexion. Deliciously and expensively perfumed. 1s. per tablet—3 in box for 2s. 6d.
At all Chemists or Stores, or post free from S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman Street, London Bridge.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE THREE GREAT SCOURGES,

ALCOHOL, MORPHINE, COCAINE.

The Hutton-Dixon Vegetable Antidote,

A HIGH-CLASS, UP-TO-DATE, PHYSICAL HOME CURE FOR

ALCOHOL and DRUG ADDICTIONS.

Also of great value in cases of Insomnia, Neurasthenia and Nerve Exhaustion. Can be carried in the Pocket and taken Privately—thus obviating the Publicity, Expense, and loss of time of an Institute treatment.

WARRANTED FREE FROM NARCOTICS.

Patronised by the Nobility and All Classes.

AN IDEAL HOME CURE.

This humane discovery has been publicly endorsed before the Congress of Bishops, and at Father Matthew's Anniversaries, also by Clergymen from their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in nearly every quarter of the Globe. Over Six Thousand Cases have been treated successfully.

In this treatment there are no hypodermic injections, it being a purely vegetable medicine taken by the mouth, can be carried in the pocket, and taken in perfect privacy at home or anywhere. In from one to three days, and often in as many hours, after commencing this treatment the desire or crave will have so completely disappeared that the victim would not give a penny for all the liquor or drugs in the country for his own use. Among the immediate effects of this treatment are calm, restful sleep, steady nerves, clear brain, increased appetite for food and pronounced benefit in every way physically and mentally, with a positive guarantee that there shall be only good after effects and a permanent removal of all appetite for intoxicating liquors or drugs of any kind, all of which is indorsed by scores of physicians, clergymen of every denomination, and men and women in all phases of life in many parts of the world. This is an absolutely harmless home treatment, and an up to date physical cure backed by and vouched for by testimonials unapproached by any other treatment for these habits.

Full particulars and indisputable testimony sent free in a plain sealed envelope. All correspondence strictly confidential.

N.B.—The Testimonials published in my circulars are unique, inasmuch as I print (by kind permission) the full names and addresses of the subscribers thereto, so that the genuineness of the certificates can easily be verified. Glowing letters of recommendation may readily be written and left unsigned, or signed with initials only, but what the public need now-a-days are the hard facts which cannot be denied or controverted, and these I furnish.

Address:—ALEX. H. DIXON, 5, Cannon Place, BRIGHTON, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

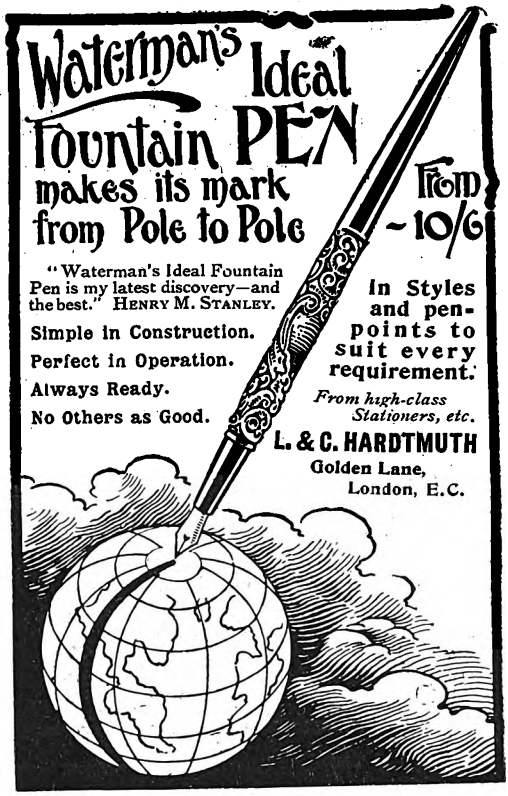
ZOX Cures Neuralgia!

Free Test Offered to our Readers.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. The annexed cut presents the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks. All sufferers from Neuralgia, Headache, Toothache, &c., will be glad to know of a simple and Speedy Remedy. The proprietors offer to send two Free Sample Zox Powders to any Reader of the "Temple Magazine," who will send a stamped envelope to

ZOX CO., 11, Hatton Garden, LONDON.

Of Chemists, &c., at 1/- and 2/6 per box.



NEWNES' POPULAR SIXPENNY SERIES.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE KOROSKO. A. CONAN DOYLE.
THE AFRICAN MILLIONAIRE. GRANT ALLEN.
THE MANCHESTER MAN. MRS. BANKS.
THE WHITE COMPANY. A. CONAN DOYLE.
ADVENTURES OF SHERLOCK HOLMES. A. CONAN DOYLE.
MEMOIRS OF SHERLOCK HOLMES. A. CONAN DOYLE.
THE SIGN OF FOUR. A. CONAN DOYLE.
THE EXPLOITS OF BRIGADIER GERARD. A. CONAN DOYLE.
RODNEY STONE. A. CONAN DOYLE.
JOHN HERRING. Rev. S. BARING GOULD.
MOLLY BAWN. By the Author of "Phyllis."
DONAL GRANT. GEORGE MACDONALD.
MALCOLM. GEORGE MACDONALD.
THE MARQUIS OF LOSSIE. GEORGE MACDONALD.
VICE VERSA. F. ANSTEY.
A WILD PROXY. MRS. CLIFFORD.
THE ROMANCE OF A MIDSHIPMAN. W. CLARK RUSSELL.
RODMAN THE BOATSTEERER. LOUIS BECKE.
THE HERB-MOON. JOHN OLIVER HOBBES.
FIGHTS FOR THE FLAG. W. H. FITCHETT, LL.D.
DEEDS THAT WON THE EMPIRE. W. H. FITCHETT, LL.D.
STORIES FROM THE DIARY OF A DOCTOR. L. T. MEADE.
THE REPROACH OF ANNESLEY. MAXWELL GRAY.
WHAT'S BRED IN THE BONE. GRANT ALLEN.
ROBERT ELSMERE. MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.
MARCELLA. MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.
THE HISTORY OF DAVID GRIEVE. MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.
SHIPS THAT PASS IN THE NIGHT. BEATRICE HARRADEN.
JESS: A Story of the Last Boer War. H. RIDER HAGGARD.
SHE: A History of Adventure. H. RIDER HAGGARD.
THE SILENCE OF DEAN MAITLAND. MAXWELL GRAY.
THE IMPREGNABLE ROCK OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. Late W. E. GLADSTONE.

POST FREE, 8d. EACH.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 7—12, Southampton St., Strand, London, W.C.; or from all Booksellers and Newsagents.

Digitized by Google

SANDOW'S PERFECT SYSTEM OF PHYSICAL CULTURE

Successfully taught by post for 2/6.

Owing to the large number of communications received from all parts of the world asking advice on my system of Muscular Development from those unable to attend my Schools of Physical Culture, it became apparent to me that something would have to be done to cope with the ever-increasing demand for more knowledge of my methods; and to meet the intense interest which has of late been centred upon this subject by men, women, and children, and after giving the matter due care and consideration, I have decided to introduce my Physical Culture system by Post. No pains have been spared to make this system perfect, and one of its greatest features will be the attention given to every application. The general health and strength is most carefully considered from the filled-up form beneath before the course most suited for the student's individual requirement is despatched. I have been so far successful that I can produce proof in flesh and blood which will fully bear out my assertions that it is the most perfect system yet introduced for Developing the Body and Improving the General Health.

It is undoubtedly the next best thing to a personal course of training at my well-known Physical Schools.

Fill up this Form and send it with Postal Order to the address at foot of page.

ADDITIONAL MEASUREMENT FORMS SUPPLIED FREE ON APPLICATION.

MEASUREMENT FORM. (The Temple Magazine.)

1 Month's Course, 2/6; 3 Months', 7/-; 6 Months', 12/6; 12 Months', 21/-.

Money enclosed ..... Course desired.....

DATE..... 190

NAME.....

ADDRESS .....

PARTICULARS.

Heart, condition of..... Age.....

Lungs, condition of..... Sex.....

Digestion, condition of..... Occupation.....

Nature of illness, if any..... Athletics, if any, and when.....

How long ago?..... Have you a "Sandow Developer"?.....

Physical peculiarity, if any..... Have you "Grip" Dumb-bell?.....

Reference No......of last Course, if any. Do you read "Sandow's Magazine"?.....

NECK.	CHEST CONTRACTED.	CHEST EXPANDED.	UPPER RIGHT ARM.	UPPER LEFT ARM.	FOREARM RIGHT.	FOREARM LEFT.	WAIST.

THIGH RIGHT.	THIGH LEFT.	CALF RIGHT.	CALF LEFT.	HEIGHT.	WEIGHT.

Sandow' Large Dumb-Bell Chart given free with each first course, usual price, 1s. 6d.

ADDRESS :—

SANDOW'S POSTAL INSTRUCTION DEPT., 17-18, Basinghall St., London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

NO CURE, NO PAY!

CHRONIC

CHEST DISEASES.

GOOD NEWS TO SUFFERERS.

HELP FOR THE HOPELESS — CHEST DISEASES CURED

ASTHMA . . .
BRONCHITIS .
CONSUMPTION

POSITIVELY CURED PERMANENTLY.

All sufferers will rejoice at the good news that at last there is a safe, certain, and permanent cure for those three dread diseases, Consumption, Asthma, and Chronic Bronchitis, with such distressing Symptoms as Cough, Phlegm and Blood Spitting, Wheezing and Tightness at Chest, Difficulty in Breathing, Suffocating Sensations, Pains in Chest and between Shoulders, Loss of Flesh and Strength, &c., &c. The most severe cases have been quite cured, which can be proved beyond dispute.

READ THESE LETTERS.

Grosvenor Street, Pendlebury, October 4th, 1901.

DEAR SIR,—I advise all sufferers from Consumption to place themselves under your treatment without delay, for I am sure that your treatment can cure any case as bad as mine was, and mine could not have been worse. Hoping that you may long live to cure other sufferers, and with all my heart again thanking you for curing me, Believe me, dear sir, yours truly gratefully,

(Miss) F. L——.

Derwent Street, Belper, Sept. 22nd.

DEAR SIR,—I am glad to tell you that I am quite a new man altogether; I don't know myself. I have lost my cough, and my breathing is quite different altogether, and I am gaining flesh, for I have gained 7 lbs. in weight. I can walk up hills or anywhere now, and not take the slightest notice of it. It is only your remedies that have done it. I shall have another month's medicines in the course of a week or so.—Yours truly,

F. W. S——.

Long Lane, Aughton, Jan. 27th, 1902.

PROFESSOR HERN,—DEAR SIR,—I am very pleased and thankful to be able to say that since I was under your treatment last year I have never had an attack of bronchitis. My chest seems to be getting quite strong. I shall ever be very grateful to you, and I pray that by God's help you may go on with your great work, looking ever unto Him to help you.—I remain, your ever-grateful friend,

A. M——.

The full names and address of these patients and hundreds more supplied to sufferers doubting the cure.

Professor Hern is the originator of the most Successful System of Treatment ever discovered for Chest Diseases. It comprises separate Cures for each kind of Chest Complaint, and each Cure is specially adapted to meet the particular requirements of each individual case. The treatment strikes right at the root of the disease, and entirely eradicates it in a remarkably short time. No minerals, poisons, or dangerous remedies are used, and there is no experimenting. Patent Medicines afford only a little ease, but never cure these diseases—a special treatment is required.

Arrangements can be made for Treatment to be paid for after the cure has been effected.

Sufferers wishing to be quickly restored to perfect health and strength should write to Professor Hern, naming complaint, mentioning the TEMPLE MAGAZINE, and enclosing six penny stamps, when full information will be sent by return of post. Those sufferers able to call at either of the three permanent Consulting Rooms should do so. Consultations free.

PROFESSOR HERN,

Specialist in Chest Diseases,

89, Corporation St., Birmingham; 268, Oxford St., Manchester; 85, Lord St., Liverpool.

HYPNOTISM

The art of hypnotising may be learnt at home. You should take up this fascinating pastime for you will be delighted with the power and knowledge it gives you. Our new and original system of lessons by post makes it all clear and easy for beginners.

FREE Book for . . . . . Beginners.

A most remarkable Illustrated Book for Beginners can be had by post for the asking. This book gives full instructions on how to set about learning Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism, Nerve Control, etc. It tells you things you have long wanted to know.

A hypnotist controls the minds of his subjects. He makes them see, feel, believe and act as he directs. Within certain well defined bounds he is absolutely their master for the time being. He can often cure pain and disease with a word or wave of the hand. He can influence and impress others in daily life through his special knowledge.

HUNDREDS OF TESTIMONIALS in this strain:—"Words cannot express my thanks for this wonderful knowledge." "The book is worth ten times its weight in gold." "I would not take £1,000 for my new knowledge." "It was a fortunate day for me when I first saw your advertisement," etc., etc.

Hypnotism is an art studied and used by many of the world's greatest doctors, lawyers, clergymen and scientists. Owing to a strange ignorance it will be many years before it is generally understood. So much the better for the few who take it up now and surprise their friends with some startling example of their new power. Send for the Free Book, entitled "The Power Within," to-day. Enclose name and address plainly written, with 1d. stamp for return postage.—Address:

PSYCHIC RESEARCH COMPANY
Dept. (408) Temple Chambers, Temple Ave., E.C.

Digitized by Google

A FREE GIFT

TO EVERY READER OF THIS ISSUE.

A SERIES of MINIATURE ILLUSTRATIONS of our

GENUINE

Steel-Plate Engravings

and CHARMING ENGLISH GRAVURES, will be Presented Free of Charge

To EVERY READER of THIS ISSUE

applying at the Offices of The City of London Fine Art Society, 5, Victoria Avenue, Bishopsgate Street, London, E.C., or same will be forwarded to any Reader (at home or abroad) on receipt of the following Coupon duly filled up.

A FULL-SIZE Specimen Plate of our 3s. 6d. HIGH-CLASS PICTURES, 30 by 22 inches (superior to many Guinea Prints), will gladly be sent ON APPROVAL to any Reader.

SPECIAL COUPON AVAILABLE FOR EVERY READER.

The Reader must cut out this Coupon, fill in Name and Address in full, and forward same with Three Stamps for postage.

*Name in full*_____

*Address in full*_____

Send at once the above Coupon, with your Name and Address duly filled in, enclosing Three Penny Stamps for the postage of the parcel.

CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY,
5, Victoria Avenue, Bishopsgate Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

DISTRIBUTION OF GENUINE STEEL-PLATE, ENGRAVINGS & ENGLISH GRAVURES

TO THE READERS OF THIS ISSUE.

FOR INSTRUCTIONS SEE BELOW

Coupon No. 1 'In the Cornfields.' John Constable, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 2 'Crossing the Brook.' J. M. W. Turner, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 3 'A Scotch Headland.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 4 'A Rock-Bound Coast.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 5 'THE CHALLENGE' Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 6 'THE SANCTUARY' Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 7 'The Market Boat. W Clarkson Stanfield, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 8 'The Ferry Boat.' W. Clarkson Stanfield, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 9 'BOLTON ABBEY.' Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 10 'In the Highlands.' Sir Edwin Landseer R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 11 'THE LAND'S END, CORNWALL.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 12 'THE NEEDLES, ISLE OF WIGHT.' Alexander Mortimer On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 13 'ESCAPED.' Richard Ansdell, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 14 'A Day on the Moors.' James Hardy On Plate Paper 30 by 22in	Coupon No. 15 'The Glebe Farm.' John Constable, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No 16 'ELATFORD MILL.' John Constable, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 17 'Lincoln Cathedral.' J. R. Hutchinson. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No 18 'Lichfield Cathedral.' J R. Hutchinson On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 19 'A Surging Torrent' Jacob Ruisdael. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No 20 'A Mountain Stream.' Jacob Ruisdael On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 21 'RETURNING FROM MARKET.' Sir A. Callcott, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 22 'IN THE DAYS OF LONG AGO.' H Stacy Marks, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 23 'THE CLIFFS OF OLD ENGLAND.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 24 'THE HOME OF THE SEAGULL.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 25 'Waiting the Word.' James Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 26 'ON THE HILLS.' James Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 27 'HAPPY DAYS.' Fred. Morgan. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 28 'CROSSING THE STREAM.' Fred Morgan. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 29 'Early Morning.' B. W. Leader, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 30 'Departing Day.' B. W. Leader, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in	Coupon No. 31 FISHING SMACKS LEAVING HOME.' T. B. Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in	Coupon No. 32 'RETURN OF THE FISHING BOATS.' T. B. Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 33 'In the Nick of Time' R Caton Woodville. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 34 'ENRAPTURED!' Life. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 35 'A Good Day's Sport.' James Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 36 'OUT OF REACH.' Richard Ansdell, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in

INSTRUCTIONS.

Our Readers must detach the Coupons for the particular Subjects required, and forward them to THE CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY, 5, VICTORIA AVENUE, BISHOPSGATE STREET, LONDON, E.C., together with a Postal Order for 3s. 6d. for One Subject, 5s. 6d. for Two, 7s. 6d. for Three, 12s. 6d. for Six Subjects, or One Guinea for Twelve. £3 for the complete 36 Subjects.

Readers preferring INDIA PRINTS (giving a softer tone and superior effect) can secure the Pictures on India Paper, and MOUNTED ON PLATE PAPER (32 by 24 inches), at double the above prices.

These payments will cover all charges, including Plates, Copyright, packing, case, carriage and all other expenses.

EVERY READER SECURING THESE PICTURES WILL BE GIVEN A SIGNED GUARANTEE THAT THESE GENUINE STEEL-PLATE ENGRAVINGS and GRAVURES ARE ALL PRODUCED DIRECT FROM THE ACTUAL PLATES.

We have also made arrangements to supply these Pictures BEAUTIFULLY COLORED by HAND in WATER-COLORS, at the nominal cost of 5s. each EXTRA, and lovers of the artistic will find this an opportunity that they should not fail to take advantage of. Each Water-Color Painting will be signed by the Artist to enhance the Value of the Picture.

If the instructions given above are faithfully carried out, and the Coupons are sent (with name an address carefully written), THE CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY, 5, VICTORIA AVENUE, BISHOPSGATE STREET, LONDON, E.C., undertake to forward the Pictures, carriage paid, TO ANY PART OF THE WORLD (Foreign and Colonial Parcel at 2s. extra), securely packed in a stout case, so that they will arrive in good condition. Money returned in full if the Pictures are not approved.

N.B.—A certain portion of the Issue will be reserved for Foreign and Colonial Readers.

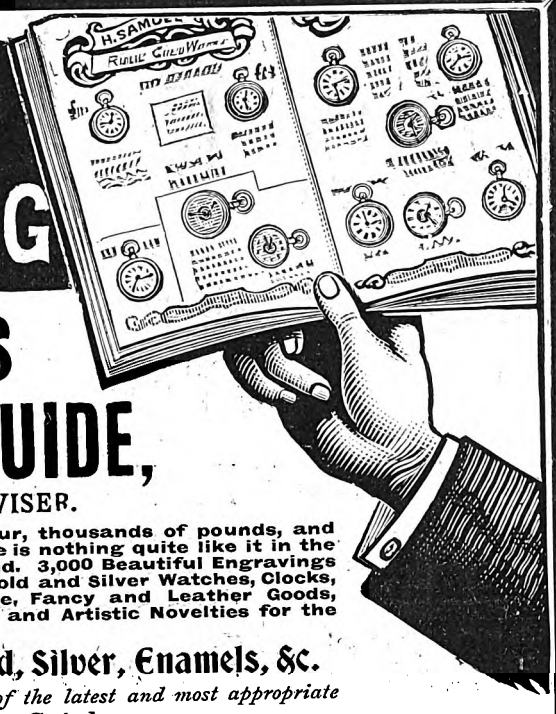
[COPYRIGHT].

[PLEASE TURN OVER

Digitized by Google

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR.

GOOD READING



H. SAMUEL'S GREAT FREE GUIDE,

THE SHREWD BUYER'S ADVISER.

The book that has taken years of labour, thousands of pounds, and untold mental efforts to produce. There is nothing quite like it in the whole world. 224 Pages, elegantly bound. 3,000 Beautiful Engravings of Astounding Bargains in Diamonds, Gold and Silver Watches, Clocks, Rings, Chains, Cutlery, Plate, Silverware, Fancy and Leather Goods, and a vast assortment of Fashionable and Artistic Novelties for the person and the home.

Coronation Souvenirs in Gold, Silver, Enamels, &c.

BROOCHES, PINS, MEDALLIONS, &c., all of the latest and most appropriate designs. Write now for Catalogue.

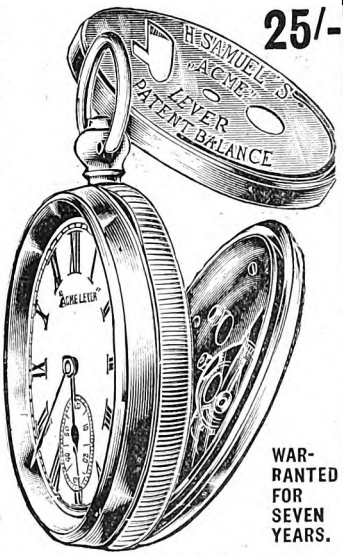
FREE TO ALL FOR A POSTCARD.

DO NOT BE MISLED BY THE SPECIOUS ADVERTISEMENTS OF PERNICIOUS INSTALMENT SCHEMES, WHICH SERVE ONLY AS A MEANS OF DISPOSING OF WORTHLESS GOODS AT FABULOUS PRICES, FILLING THE POCKETS OF UNSCRUPULOUS TRADERS.

DEAL DIRECT AND SAVE HALF.

HIGHEST-CLASS GOODS AT FACTORY PRICES.



H. SAMUEL'S

WORLD-RENOWNED

"ACME" LEVER,

THE WATCH FOR ALL TIME.

SPECIFICATION.

SOLID SILVER CASES.

Fine 3-Plate Movement, Jewelled, Dust and Damp-Proof Cap, and fitted with H. SAMUEL'S Latest Improvements, Patent. Sent with Key, Instructions, Warranted, and FREE PRESENTATION ALBERT, for P.O.O. 25/-

25/-

WARRANTED FOR SEVEN YEARS.

One Month's FREE TRIAL Allowed. Money Refunded in Full if Dissatisfied.

INFINITELY SUPERIOR TO WATCHES SOLD AT DOUBLE THE PRICE ON INSTALMENT SYSTEMS.

H. SAMUEL, DEPT. 61, MARKET ST., MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

THINGS OF THE PAST !!

A WONDERFUL INVENTION . .

for the

LAME.

As Supplied to the War Office for the Wounded from South Africa.

THE O'CONNOR EXTENSION Co.'s PATENT APPLIANCES

Enable those with Shortened Limbs and Weak Ankles to dispense with Unsightly Instruments, to Wear Ordinary Shoes, and to look like other people.

FLAT FOOT. The New Patent . . . . Arch Support

CAN BE ADAPTED TO HELP ANY CASE OF FLAT FOOT.

A New Book on the Mechanical Treatment of Flat Foot will be sent FREE.

TENDER FEET. The New . . . . Patent Socks

CAN BE MOULDED TO FIT THE SOLE OF ANY FOOT.

Describe the case, send a pair of old boots or shoes and 5/- A pair of Socks will be sent POST FREE. (United Kingdom).

GOLD MEDAL, LONDON; HIGHEST AWARDS, CHICAGO AND PARIS.

ADDRESS:

The O'Connor Extension Co.,

SURGICAL APPLIANCE MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT,

2, BLOOMSBURY STREET,

LONDON, W.C.

PAMPHLETS FREE on mentioning The Temple Magazine. Please give particulars of the case.

THINGS OF THE PAST !!

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Edited by CHARLES HERBERT.

CONTENTS FOR MARCH, 1902.

			PAGE
I.	Portrait of Bunyan		Frontispiece
II.	The People's Friend; or, the Adventures of Carlton-Hawes. Illustrated.	Charles Herbert	565
III.	A Remarkable Offer		572
IV.	"Cumbered with Much Service" Illustrated with Original Drawings.	Seebie Aitch	573
V.	The White Lady of the Zenana. Serial Story. Chapters I. and II. Illustrated by Fitzgerald.	Miss H. Bourchier, M.D.	579
VI.	An Arm of Flesh Illustrated.	Beth Bannester, B.A.	595
VII.	A Peculiar People Illustrated.		601
VIII.	A Modern Esdras. An Original Dialogue.	Wolfe Street	605
IX.	A Step in the Dark. Long Complete Story.	Helen Hardin	611
X.	Unappreciated. Story. Illustrated.		621
XI.	Falls of Niagara	Page Illustration	626
XII.	Via Southampton. Story. Illustrated.	Gertrude Violet McFadden	627
XIII.	Two-Room Economy. Illustrated.	Realist	631
XIV.	At a Conventicle. Story. Illustrated.		633
XV.	The Mechanics of Religious Work. (I.) Illustrated.		637
XVI.	Queer Ways. (I.)	Queer Sider	642
XVII.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.		643
XVIII.	A Country Anniversary		647
XIX.	When the Mind Abdicates	The Onlooker	649
XX.	For Africa by Africans. Illustrated.		651

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. The Editor will be obliged if, before sending any manuscript, a letter is sent him describing the purport of the article or enclosing a précis of the story. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to THE MANAGER, 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. MATHER AND CROWTHER, BRIDEWELL PLACE, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

TO THE DEAF

If you suffer from Deafness or head noises, and desire a complete and permanent cure, write at once to Professor G. Keith-Harvey, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C., for pamphlet fully describing an entirely new self-applied method, which he will send you gratis and post free on mentioning the TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Mr. S. Gregory, 23, Alfred Place, London, says: "Although I am over 80 years old, I can now, thank God, by the help of your system, hear as well as I could when I was 18."

No More Chapped or Rough Skin!

"BEETHAM'S Reg^d Larola"

will very soon remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, CHAPS, IRRITATION, &c., and render THE SKIN delicately SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE. Try a 6d. bottle. Its effect will delight you! Bottles, 6d., 1/-, 2/6, of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham

Digitized by Google

To prove the exceptional merits of a good article it must be tried; we offer every one the opportunity of judging "Harlene" for themselves before wasting money on worthless and injurious preparations.

WRITE FOR A FREE SAMPLE BOTTLE.

UNDER THE ROYAL PATRONAGE OF H.M. THE QUEEN OF GREECE.
H.I.H. THE GRAND DUCHESS GEORGE OF RUSSIA.
H.R.H. THE DUCHESS OF SPARTA.
H.R.H. PRINCESS HOHENLOHE.
H.I.H. The Grand Duchess of MECKLENBURG SCHWERIN.
H.R.H. THE DUKE OF SPARTA.
H.R.H. PRINCE GEORGE OF GREECE.
H.H. PRINCESS WINDISCHGRAETZ.
PRINCESS ANNA HOHENLOHE.

A TRIAL COSTS YOU NOTHING.

EDWARDS' "HARLENE"

THE GREAT HAIR PRODUCER AND RESTORER.

The Finest Dressing, Specially Prepared and Delicately Perfumed. A Luxury and a Necessity to every modern toilet.

"HARLENE" Produces Luxuriant Hair. Prevents it Falling Off and Turning Grey. Unequalled for Promoting the Growth of the Beard and Moustache. The World-Renowned Remedy for Baldness. For Preserving, Strengthening, and Rendering the Hair Beautifully Soft, for Removing Scurf, Dandruff, etc., also for Restoring Grey Hair to its Original Colour

Crown Prince's Palace, Athens, Greece.

H.R.H. PRINCESS MARIE OF GREECE

writes: "Messrs. Edwards' Preparation 'HARLENE' for the Hair has given entire satisfaction. H.R.H. wishes six more bottles of 'Harlene' sent as soon as possible."

H.I.H. THE GRAND DUCHESS GEORGE OF RUSSIA

writes: "Please send me at once six bottles of 'HARLENE,' the same as formerly sent to H.I.H. when st Princess Marie of Greece."

Photographed specially for the "Harlene" Co. by Downey, Ebury Street, London, W.

MISS MAUD JEFFRIES writes: "I have much pleasure in stating that I find your 'Harlene' an excellent dressing for the hair."

A FREE SAMPLE BOTTLE

Will be sent to any person filling up this form, and enclosing 3d. for carriage; if presented personally at our offices no charge will be made.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

1/-, 2/6, and (3 times 2/6 size) 4/6 per Bottle, from Chemists and Stores all over the World, or sent direct on receipt of Postal Order.

EDWARDS' "HARLENE" CO., 95 & 96, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

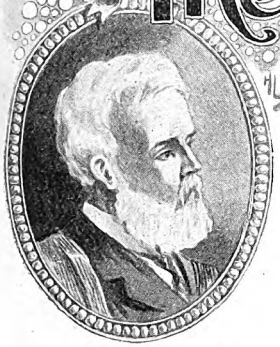
Digitized by Google

JOHN BUNYAN.

(See page 578.)

Digitized by Google

The People's Friend



OR,

The Adventures of Carlton-Hawes.

By CHARLES HERBERT.

I.

"WHAT a perfectly lovely night we have had, mamma," sighs Violet Latham, as she throws herself back on an ottoman, clasping her hands behind her head, and presenting a pretty picture of serenest satisfaction. The remark, however, is received in silence, silence so stony that Violet slowly turns her head towards the spot where her mother stands, regarding her pretty daughter with a perplexed little frown.

"Oh! didn't you hear, mamma?" says the girl mischievously, purposely misunderstanding the cause of the frown. "I said——"

"Yes, Vi, I heard what you said. And I am sorry my girl thinks a night 'perfectly lovely!' in which she has repeatedly disobeyed me."

"My dear mother," returns the girl, wearily, "when will chaperons and our dear parents begin to understand that the fifth commandment (or is it the sixth?) has no application to love matters. I'm quite prepared to honour you and obey you in any other thing"—and, rising, she crosses the room and gives her mother a most affectionate hug—"but," she continues, "there ought to be another commandment, 'Parents, trust your children!'"

"In the right!" says Mrs. Latham solemnly.

"Yes," answers Vi serenely. "They would always be that. Now doesn't it stand to reason, mamma, that just as I know what sized glove fits me, and it is no use saying it doesn't, so I know the man that fits me? And I don't mind telling you once more that his name is——"

"Don't!" interrupts Mrs. Latham. "If you encourage that man to dangle much longer you'll have to accept him, and then you'll find out the real kind of man he is."

"Yes," says her daughter calmly—"a very real kind of man. That is what I like about him. Mamma dear, please do not let us have these skirmishes about Hamilton. If he asks me to marry him I shall say yes. He hasn't done it yet, but he will, in fact I intend he shall. Good-night, darling! I'm sorry you object to my having danced so much with Hamilton; these scenes do spoil things. It's like getting the peppermint first and the medicine afterwards. Well, dear, if you won't kiss me I can't help it, can I? Owe it me!"

And she is walking off to her room when her mother rushes after her and kisses her warmly before she allows her to depart.

"Talking is evidently no use," the mother considers. "I must act, or else that wretch will win her after all. The colonel can think of nothing, neither can I. Oh, that I had someone to lean on!"

Suddenly an idea flashes into her mind, and she cries, "Why, there is Carlton-Hawes! The very thing. He might suggest some move. I'll ask the colonel to-morrow."

"Um!" says Colonel Graham. "I don't see how Carlton-Hawes, or any other, for the matter of that, could see a way out. Vi has said she will marry Hamilton Rawdon, and, as a rule, she means what she says. Still there could be no harm in seeking this 'People's Friend,' as he calls himself. It is a strange idea, by the by, that of his, Mrs. Latham; but, from what I can gather, his Advice Bureau is a genuine thing. He gave a great chum of mine a most practical suggestion the other day, and if I were ever in difficulties I would go to him straight away."

Digitized by Google

Next morning Mrs. Latham's cab drops her down in Oxford Street outside a house with a basement shop on which her attention is at once riveted. Nothing appears in the window except a few choice ferns with heavy crimson plush curtains as a background, and on a large brass plate at the door she sees written:

CARLTON-HAWES,

Mental and Moral Pathologist.

ADVICE BUREAU.

while in white enamelled letters on the window he proclaims himself thus:—

THE PEOPLE'S FRIEND.

So she realises that she is at the office of the man whose claims to public trust have been busily discussed in the papers and elsewhere, and whose counsel she has come to gain.

The bell tinkles, and immediately after a smart page enters Carlton-Hawes' room bearing a card.

"Show the lady up, Roberts, and keep a smart look out from the upper window while she is here in case anyone is loitering about." This was a common precaution taken in every case, and often resulting in the applicant for advice leaving by a back door.

"Mrs. Latham?" queries Carlton-Hawes as that lady makes her appearance.

In somewhat agitated fashion she sits down, for the style of the whole establishment and the dignified appearance of the man she has come to see, as he stands before her, broad-shouldered, erect, with silver-grey beard and hair, and robed in a black gown, considerably impress her. Meanwhile, to give her time to recover herself, he says, "Excuse me a minute," and turns over a few letters as though busy, all the while mentally diagnosing her.

During the pause Mrs. Latham uses her eyes to good advantage, glancing round the room that is one-third office, one-third surgery, and the rest library. On one side of the room, books mount from floor to ceiling, cases of instruments lie about, one or two microscopes stand on little tables; and on the other side there is a profusion of pigeon-holes crammed with correspondence. Mrs. Latham is thinking to herself: "He will imagine me to be very silly to come to him over a matter like this, when he has all this business to see to," when suddenly the great man speaks.

He has formed his own estimate of this woman, and he thinks she is "weak, decidedly weak! Somewhat indolent, marks of good living, evidently well-to-do. Not come to see me about herself, or would be readier with a glib explanation"; then, glancing up, he says in clear, decided tones:

"You are a widow, Mrs. Latham, I think, by your appearance?"

"Yes," she answers, "and it was a very heavy burden to me to be left the care of an only daughter, without a husband's counsel."

"Ah!" he says, rapidly concluding the object of her visit. "It is about her you wish to see me."

"How did you know?" she replied wonderingly.

"Simply by her being uppermost in your mind. What is wrong?"

"She is in great danger!" she exclaims, "the worst that can befall a girl. She is falling in love with an unprincipled man, and her life will be wrecked. But there! she will listen to no reason. What am I to do?"

"Tell me all about it," he answers gently, with a slight emphasis on the "all."

And, quietly listening, he gathers out of the long tale the following facts.

Six months ago her only daughter had come out, and soon after was beset by the attentions of one of the handsomest men in London, who by common repute was thoroughly wicked.

"I made enquiries as to his private life," she continues, "and the result, bad as it was, I laid before Violet. But she is infatuated! What is there about bad men that has such influence over girls?" she pleads.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"Animal magnetism!" he replies. "It is a species of hypnotism. If you could remove her from his presence now?" he suggests.

"She will not go," feebly urged the mother. "Violet is a girl of spirit and very headstrong. Oh, if only she had a guardian!" sighing.

"Has she great expectations?" he asks.

"Only what I choose to give her," proudly. "Her father left all in my hands—he trusted me so—and, of course, she is my only daughter, so naturally she would have everything."

"And this man, does he know—does he realise how dependent she is on you?"

"I fancy not. I think, even if he did, he would build on a mother's love."

"I see! Yet," meditatively, "you are young yourself still, and might ——"

"Marry again?" she completes, flushing. "No; I was married very young, I was only seventeen, but all the love I had to give was my husband's and is centred in Violet now."

"But may I ask if you have ever had your hand sought in marriage?" Carlton-Hawes persists.

Flushing again, she assents: "Yes, there was a Colonel Graham, an old friend of my husband's, but he is very elderly and has a son who, in fact, is a little older than Vi. At one time, I thought ——"

"That there might be something between them, I suppose?" smiling.

"Exactly! So you see how ridiculous this made the father's offer appear to me," scornfully.

But by this time Carlton-Hawes is in deep thought, and scarcely appears to notice her remark. At last he says, "My feeling is that whatever Hamilton Rawdon's past may have been, it is no distinct reason for believing that he only cares for your daughter's money and not for her. Even bad men are susceptible of the influence of a great love. And supposing that is so, I should not suggest separating them."

"But how am I to find out what he does really feel?" queries Mrs. Latham, impatiently.

"I am coming to that," he says. "If there is any good in the man we will give it a chance to work." And in a few sentences he confides to her his plan of action. She listens intently, and with a new spring to her steps, and waving him a laughing adieu, she leaves him to the solution of other human puzzles.

"Distinctly a twentieth century idea," some say in reference to his business. "A bold attempt to provide a long felt want" is another remark. "A further step in the history of quackery," is a third criticism; and, as the unkindest cut of all, The Morning Letter denounces his work as "an attempt to draw secrets from those who have skeletons in their cupboards, possibly to serve for purposes best known to the proprietor of the Advice Bureau." But, in spite of it all, Carlton-Hawes' business flourishes, and his name is becoming known as one who, with a vast experience of the ways of men, goes about doing good; and as he unites in himself a man of business, a man of law, and a man of medicine, the opportunities for it simply bristle. Carlton-Hawes, left an orphan early in life, has been keeping himself ever since he was twelve years of age, and there are few things at which he has not tried his hand. A kindly solicitor, when the lad was nineteen, took him into his office, and finding him bent on work, gave him his articles. After qualifying as a solicitor he only spent two years' hard work at criminal practice before he left it to study medicine, using his little savings to support him. By thirty he was doctoring in a country village, and there came face to face with problems of sin and suffering. Restlessly he began to ponder the causes at work, and seeing they "more needed the Divine than the human physician," he began to preach to them in a very passion of pity. But the more he pondered the more he felt convinced that what was needed to efficiently help men was practically an enquiry bureau where common-sense advice could be given which would apply the brake to downward progress by restoring hope and self-respect, and also assist those who were in perplexity—a place, in short, where troubled men and women in moral, business, and home difficulties could go to a third party as anxious to help as they were to be helped. Oh, how this man longed to help them! How he burned to thwart self-seeking tyranny or fraud! How he loved to take some first offender by the hand and restore some lost one to her home. So he determined to try it, and had opened his bureau with most gratifying success.

Digitized by Google

A huge reference library and a staff of clerks make it a very easy matter to answer the inquiries that pour in on him by every post; but that is only a part of his work. He is well known as the writer in The Contemporary of some really remarkable articles, dealing with the working out of the human mind in crime, and he is also the author of three well known books, "The Prevention of Pauperism," "The Prevention of Crime," "The Prevention of Disease." These show the bent of his mind, and he is never so happy as when called on to advise in some matter that may save a life from ruin, and a soul from death. Certainly in such matters no one is better fitted to give advice than he. For he knows men at their lowest and appeals to them at their highest, and so sways men.

. . . .

Violet Latham sits back in a deep "easy" chair in her own room, which has apparently been expressly designed for comfort, but to her excited mind to-night it proves anything but restful.

Her womanly pride is stung; for this very night Hamilton Rawdon has startled her by a most sudden and unaccountable coolness of demeanour. "Have I offended him in any way?" she wonders. "Or," and her eyes blazed at the thought, "is there some other girl? He would never dare," she exclaims to herself, "after all that has passed between us, to cool off like this."

But suddenly she remembers how little of anything definite has passed between them. Soft words and loving looks, in the use of which he was a past master, had been plentiful; but, though they had stolen away her heart, they had not committed him, and as she sits back, measuring up the situation, she realises this to the full.

"It is all mamma's fault," she mutters. "If she had not been so dead set against him he could have been here more, and things would have been different a little. But I am not going to play the part of the love-lorn maiden to his faithless lover if I can help it," haughtily. "The next time we meet, he shall find a difference also!"

That "next time" was but a day later, and Hamilton Rawdon noted the careless laughing acknowledgment she made to his bow, so different to the earnest look of welcome he usually received.

"Poor little girl!" he murmured to himself, "it is too bad, but I can't help it. If I were rich now and free I'd be at your side, my pretty darling, in a moment. But, as it is, it is fortunate I heard that piece of news in time."

Vi Latham found her cool treatment of him produced no such effect of pique as she desired, and, smarting under his neglect, she turned more readily to the wistful attentions paid her by Reginald Graham.

"I say, Vi," he whispered presently—they were old friends—"is there really any truth in that absurd paragraph about dad and your mater?"

Vi opened her eyes widely.

"What paragraph?" she said, innocently.

For answer he shewed her a cutting from a society paper announcing that a marriage had been arranged between Colonel Graham and Mrs. Latham.

Then Violet understood. She knew enough of the world to appreciate the difference it might make in her position, and with unutterable scorn she saw the real cause of Hamilton Rawdon's behaviour. She could have forgiven anything but this; but a mercenary, cold, calculating man she absolutely despised.

"Is it true, mamma?" she queried on her return.

The somewhat enigmatical sentence was well understood by Mrs. Latham, who at once smilingly assented.

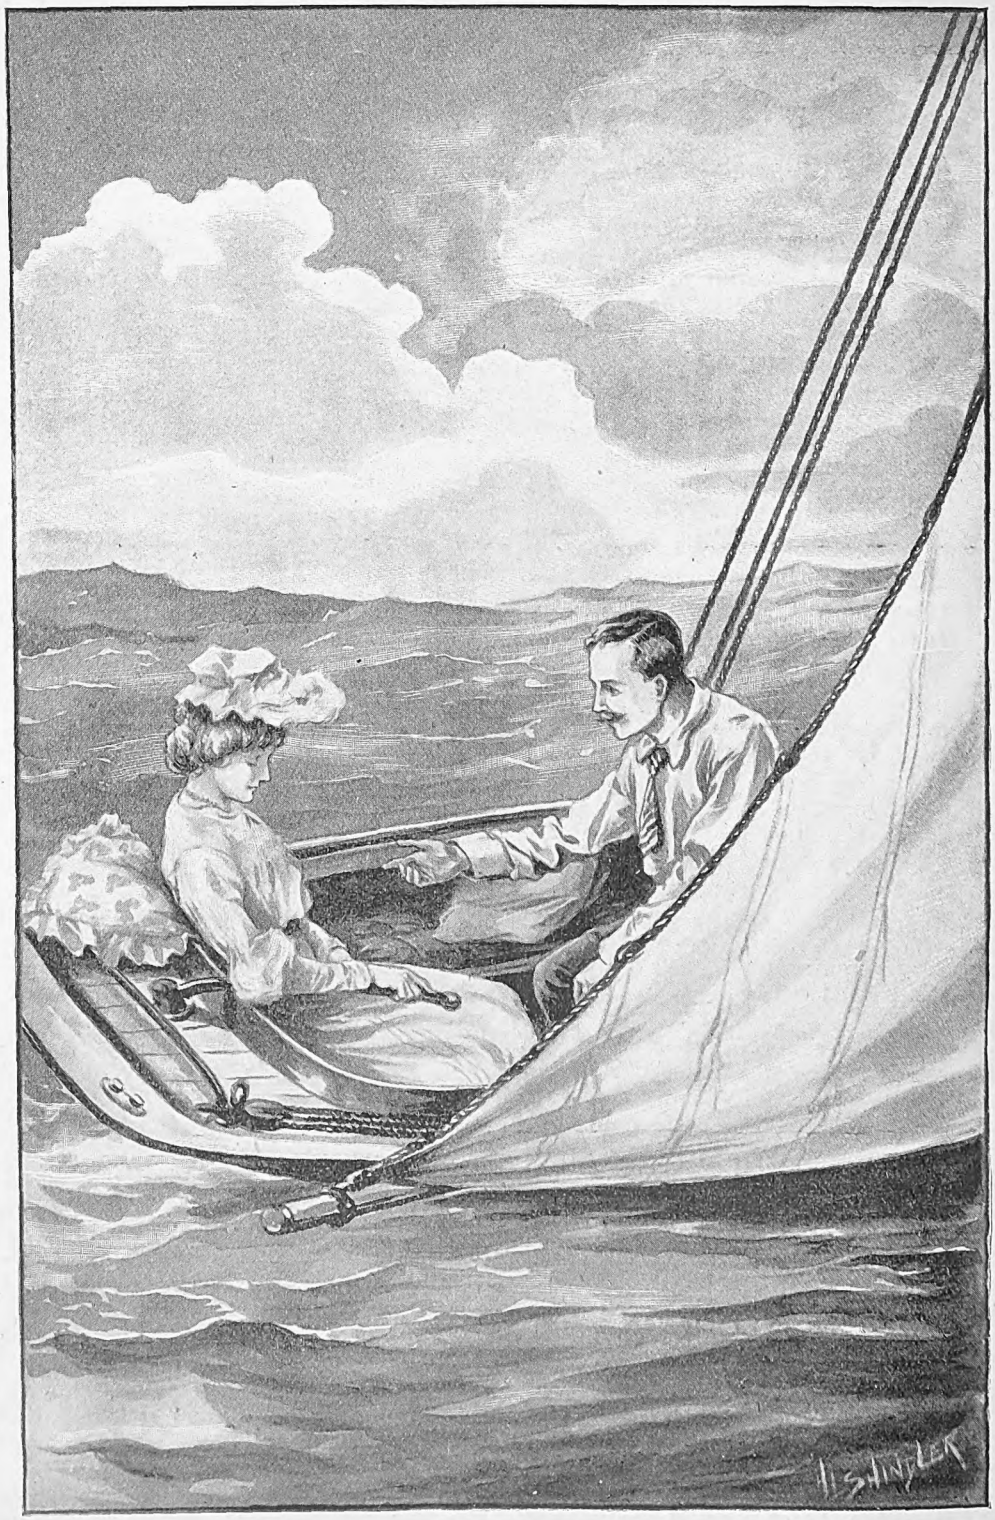
With a girl's ready sympathy for anything approaching the romantic, Vi kissed her mother, saying, "The colonel is a good man, mamma!" Then presently she laid her aching head against her mother's shoulder, and drawn by an irresistible impulse, let the tale come, and it came tearfully enough. Had she looked up, she would have seen her mother's eyes dancing with merriment, but she had hidden her face, as she sobbed out the story of the dethronement of the first idol she had set up on her heart's altar.

Inwardly, however, her mother rejoiced. "She will get over it," she murmured to herself—"she will get over it!"

Six months later.

The elder couple were still unwed, although they saw one another daily, and the colonel proved a most devoted

Digitized by Google



"THEN COME WITH ME AND BE MY QUEEN!"

Digitized by Google

cavalier; while Vi, feeling somewhat in the way, was glad enough to allow Reginald to escort her about everywhere, and this very afternoon they were coasting the shore off Hastings in Reginald's tiny yacht. It was a glorious May afternoon, the blue waves danced in the early summer sunshine, and a feeling of perfect content filled Vi Latham's mind, as she lay back lazily steering the boat and sleepily watching her companion as he managed the sails. Not a sound could be heard but the ripple of the water, as they gently scudded before the warm breeze, for Reginald Graham said nothing, appearing quite satisfied to fix his glance on the dainty little lady in the stern.

At length Vi breaks silence.

"Have you any idea, Reginald, when this, this—er—this new arrangement is to begin? I ask mamma occasionally, but she only smiles."

"I don't know," he responds. "I presume the elderly pulse beats more slowly than ours. I should have had it over long ago. I wonder—er—whether we shall all live together? Brother and sister fashion, eh, Vi?"

"You'll be with your regiment, I imagine," she answers, colouring.

"And where will you be?" he queried, softly. "I—I wish you'd come with me, Violet!"

There is no answer, only a flush of colour flooding her face.

"Vi, I haven't bothered you about these things lately," he continues, apologetically. "Ever since that Hamilton Rawdon monopolised you I have kept in the background.

"Oh, he!" she responded, bitterly. "You are a king to him!"

"Then come with me and be my queen!" he answers, laughingly, and, reaching out his hand, he continues, with a passionate pleading in his face: "Say yes, little woman, say yes! Let us sail together always, will you?"

A moment she hesitated; then, with merriment in every line of her face, she said, "But what a queer arrangement! My mother takes the father, and I the son."

"Then you will, Vi?" eagerly, as if astonished.

"I will see what mamma says," demurely.

"And I say, Vi," he blurted out, "forgive me, but Hamilton Rawdon? Was there, is there"—and he broke off, but Vi understood.

"No," she said, deliberately. "He was a bad man. I have forgotten him."

It was in September, when, orders coming for Reginald Graham's regiment to proceed to India, Vi united her fate to his by a clearly uttered "I will" at the altar, an utterance that this time found favour in the sight of her mother.

She is married from the pretty London house, and after the reception is over, the last leech in the shape of a guest departs. Mrs. Latham sinks on to an ottoman in the drawing-room and regards Colonel Graham with a look of serene satisfaction.

"Haven't we played that well?" she says merrily. "Our subterfuge has succeeded beyond our hopes—thanks to Carlton-Hawes. I should never have dreamed of such an arrangement. How beautifully it cooled off that scamp, Hamilton Rawdon, and things turning out like this made it just splendid. So now!" nodding gaily at him, "you can put in that paragraph about breaking our engagement off, you know, as soon as you like. It has been very hard on you to use your name like that and make you dance attendance on me. I must say you played your part to the very life," quizzically—"Thank you so much!"

But the colonel looks glum, and appears wrapped in thought.

"Has it been hard on me?" he returns. "I am afraid it will be harder soon"—dejectedly. "I have just lived for the boy, and now he has gone I shall be very lonely." And he clears his throat as though he is a trifle husky.

"And I have just lived for Vi," Mrs. Latham responds, "so I can sympathise with your feelings." And she begins to use the dainty scrap of lace that is called by courtesy a handkerchief, in rather wild fashion.

The colonel takes a step towards her, and says eagerly, "Maud! Er—I say, need it be a subterfuge? Need I put in that paragraph? Of course it must be as you please, and I would not take any unfair advantage of the position, you know, but why can't we make it real?"

"What would Carlton-Hawes think?" she retorts.

"Never mind him!" he says testily, "The question is, what do you think?

Digitized by Google

"I think," she says slowly and deliberately, "that—anything—would—be—better—than utter—loneliness."

"Even me?" he returns humbly and ungrammatically. "Yes, especially you!" she corrects archly. And the colonel suddenly looks like a young man.

A week later Carlton-Hawes opens a letter in his office, the contents of which appear to mightily amuse him.

"I knew the step would cool that Rawdon fellow off," he mutters, "and save the child from spoiling her life, but this——! Well, that colonel ought to thank me!" And when out of another letter tumbles the colonel's cheque for £100 enclosed in a brief note inscribed: "An acknowledgment of common-sense," Carlton-Hawes knew he did.

(To be continued.)

A REMARKABLE OFFER!

GUSTAVE DORE, the great French painter, who is so well known by his illustrations of 'DANTE'S INFERNO' made a series of sketches of London life some thirty years ago. This standard work of art, handsomely bound, and printed on fine plate paper, forms an ornament to any drawing-room or library, and is published at 3 guineas. In size it is 12½ inches by 15½ inches and it weighs 12 pounds.

The proprietor of 'The Temple Magazine' offers this magnificent volume, handsomely bound, free, as a present to anyone who will get five of their friends to subscribe for ONE YEAR to 'The Temple Magazine.' The yearly subscription, post free, is 8s. 6d.

The names and addresses of the five subscribers, clearly written, together with 42s. 6d., being the five subscriptions, to be sent to the Manager, 'Temple Magazine,' 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, E.C., and this handsome volume will be forwarded to you free.

We will also make you a present of this magnificent work of art if you get twenty of your friends to subscribe for THREE MONTHS to 'The Temple Magazine,' at 2s. 3d. each, for the three months' subscription, post free.

How to obtain "DORE'S LONDON" (Published at £3 3s.) for nothing.

Digitized by Google

CUMBERED WITH - - - - MUCH SERVICE.

By SEEBIE AITCH.

"CUMBERED about much service"—was there ever such an apt description of the life led by the hundreds of thousands of women, who are perfect gymnasts in the art of pulling together two ends, which somehow will never quite meet? Not long ago the pages of a popular magazine contained the detailed description of the slavery of a Society lady, and painful reading it was, but for sheer endurance (all the more heroic because it is so unconscious) commend me to the women who carry the burdens of the poorer middle-class households. I called upon such a woman, known to seven children as "mother" and to her husband as "old lady," and asked her to take me into her confidence as to what daily life had meant to her for a great many years past, and when I came away, having (much to her amusement) jotted down some figures for further calculation, she was in my sight as a daughter of Anak, and, hard-worker as I had always thought myself, I was in my own sight but as a grasshopper.

She had been married at twenty-five, "a good age," as she said, and she was now fifty. So for twenty-five years she had made and mended, washed and cooked, for her steadily growing family. A sentence soon written down, but one which on examination proves to be a sentence of "hard labour for life."

At no time had her husband's earnings exceeded thirty-five shillings a week, and what this money could not do, it was her duty as Chancellor of the family Exchequer to make it do, by the simple expedient of working harder herself. The rivalry in the upper classes is carried on by lavish expenditure of money, the rivalry in the homes of the poor can only be carried on by lavish expenditure of strength. The clean linen means more washing and ironing, the neat clothing more needlework, the well supplied table more cooking, the shining furniture more rubbing, the tidy rooms more cleaning, the little Post-office Savings Bank account more scraping; and if it is all done, the demands must be met by cheques drawn upon the Bank of Strength.

"When I first married," she said, "I used to play the piano a little, for my mother had had me taught, because she always thought no one would look at us if we had no accomplishments. But very quickly I'd no time for it, and the housekeeping I'd looked forward to with pleasure when a girl, became a very trying thing. You take the washing I've had to do with my own hands, for instance."

I made a note of it, and worked out as a result that simply spending a day a week at the washtub during some years, and two days during ten at least of her life, this woman had spent 1,300 days of her life at nothing else.

PRACTICALLY FOUR YEARS IN WASHING.

And working this out at the usual charge of a woman for a day's work (two shillings), she had saved her husband £130. And if we just imagine a pile of 1,820 large basketfuls of dirty linen, we should see before our eyes the task through which thousands of women have each worked their steady way in twenty-five years. Six weeks' wash would make a pile her own height of five-feet five; so in twenty-five years there would be a huge basket, 200 times her size, filled with the clean product of her endeavour.

Digitized by Google

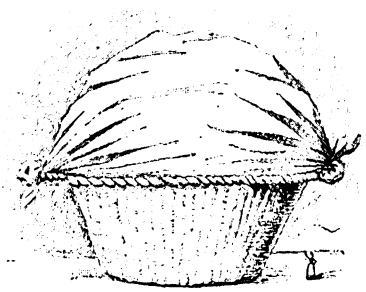
But washing only counts in as one of the many trifles that, taken together, make no trifle. Six hours a week at least must be spent in ironing, and the average iron weighs six pounds. Lift, lift, lift—press, press, press—thump, thump, thump—this is the process by which the children's pinafores and the husband's collars and shirts are made to look so nice. The ironing of four dozen things per week means that the iron is lifted 300 times at least, and, remembering the weight of the iron, we find she has lifted 208 tons 18 cwt.

But while we are on the subject of clothes, it must be remembered by the masculine mind (and it is to impress that dense object that this is written) that a careful eye needs to be kept over holes and frays. Fortunately the darning that is necessary is one of the things that disprove the saying, "You can't do two things at once," for hands can be busy while the mother, neatly dressed, sits chatting to her husband at night. It would startle some men if they were told the large amount of money that is saved in those evening hours, while they sit in the arm-chair smoking.

"How long," I said to my informant, "does your weekly darning take?"

"Oh, say five hours a week! But we make nothing of that. One can't sit still while one talks."



IN 25 YEARS SHE WASHES THROUGH A PILE 280 TIMES HER SIZE.

"Make nothing of it!" Why, it works out at over 700 days of nine hours each, or practically and represents a saving of nearly £50.

TWO YEARS SPENT IN DARNING,

"But where," I enquired, "did you get the time for all the needlework as well? For I presume you were never able to manage to put out your dresses to be made for the girls. How many did you say you had?"

SHE HAS LIFTED THIS WEIGHT IN THE WEEKLY IRONING.

"Three girls and four boys," she said, "and I made every stitch those girls wore, and took care it should be in the fashion too!"—proudly.

"But how? Surely with all your other work——?"

"Oh, I managed it; though I don't mind confessing I have had to sit up many a night to do it, and it was all the worse, for I hate needlework of that kind. But I turned out as many as half a dozen dresses in a year, besides mending and altering. In the earlier years I hadn't so many, and that is half the secret of the management. The burden isn't flung at you, so to speak, all at once; it comes little by little and one gets into it by degrees. But I have no doubt in the twenty-five years (including my own) I've made more than a hundred dresses.

Digitized by Google

'Cost' did you say, if I hadn't? Oh, five shillings to eight shillings each, beside which, dressmakers are so very extravagant with linings and things."

"Well," I said, "if you average them at six shillings each, you have saved your husband thirty pounds."

"It isn't the money," she replied, "but they all looked so nice; and of course," she added as an afterthought, "if you reckon all the mending and making down of the clothes you might safely add another £20. But look here, you have asked me nothing about the housework. I mean," she continued, "the lighting of fires, the cleaning of grates, the scrubbing of floors, the perpetual washing up of dishes and plates, and the cooking. You've scarcely anything down as yet." And she laughed merrily.

What a side light it was upon

"The daily round and common task."

And thinking thus, I continued to make my notes with astounding results.

In 25 years their six-roomed house had had every room in it "turned out" (which is woman for cleaned thoroughly), at the rate of one room a week, excepting in times of illness. So knocking off five years to cover these interludes of muddle, she had cleaned, i.e., scrubbed and swept and dusted, a building of 1,000 rooms. She had taken at least half-a-day to do each, so five hundred days had been spent in "charing" at a saving to her husband, at the usual rate, of another £50.

Now, take the other "charing" work. First, there is the scrubbing. The rooms we have already noticed; but there was the spotless kitchen floor and the floor of the little pantry, a little over 21 ft., to be scrubbed weekly in order to keep it clean and sweet. A task scarcely noticed at the time, but taken together it meant that she had scrubbed her way (not counting the other rooms) through 3¾ miles, and simply worn out 50 scrubbing brushes. The blackleading of grates, "the most provoking of all work," she said, had rubbed down to the very wood another 50 "shining" brushes, and half as many "black-leading," so it only needs to glance at the pile of brushes in the illustration to get an idea of the vigour expended in wearing down and wearing out these bristly instruments.

We come now to the "scullery" work, that most disappointing of all work, in which plates and dishes, knives and forks are cleaned, simply that they may be dirtied again. Greasy, sloppy as the work is, it must be done, after breakfast, dinner, tea, and supper, and if a man thinks lightly of it, let him try it—it will try him.

SHE HAS CLEANED, SCRUBBED AND SWEPT, AND DUSTED THIS BUILDING OF ONE THOUSAND ROOMS.

The mere reckoning of the work has involved an intricate calculation, tracing through the years the steady growth from the time when husband and wife sat alone together, until ten plates, and ten cups and saucers were laid instead of two, and also allowing for the fact that from about the fifteenth year she would have considerable help from the girls; but it can safely be said that she has washed up 70,000 plates, 44,000 cups and saucers, 23,000 dishes, and with extras such as jugs, table plates, etc., the total would be 200,000 pieces, while if the bedroom crockery be reckoned in, she has actually cleaned a QUARTER OF A MILLION PIECES OF CHINA.

This has by no means exhausted the "Routine" work of such a housewife. Every morning there are beds to "turn down" and "air" and then to make again. And during fifteen years (for after that the girls could help her), she actually made 16,000 beds, and allowing only five minutes for each bed, she had actually been shaking, banging, smoothing, and coaxing beds into shape for 1,333 hours. This at a working day of eight hours means 166 days at bed-making, or only 16 days short of six months.

Digitized by Google

SHE HAS SIMPLY WORN DOWN ALL THESE BRUSHES TO THE VERY WOOD.

Then there were the meals to lay, those ever recurring meals, four every day, making 22,000 in 15 years.

And, as a mere detail, beside all this she has been a great incendiary, lighting no less than 7,000 fires in fifteen years. The cheerful glow that delighted her husband at night, the merry blaze that boiled the morning kettle, all meant work to her, as, indeed, every detail of home life always did and must have done. Nothing but rigid system could get through it all and leave time beside for that great achievement of home comfort—the cooking.

"I always," she said, "went on the principle that one good joint on Saturday and cold meat every other day was the most economical method of living, and a great time-saver also. I reckon that it took me from nine Saturday morning until one o'clock to prepare the great dinner of the week and the cakes and pies. Vegetables and other sundries would require about an hour a day, except washing-days, when we have made-shift; so if you put down nine hours' cooking weekly you'll be about right. No, I never trusted my girls at that; they helped a little, but that has been my work always." So clearly, for 20 years at least, this woman had spent 52 days, of nine hours each, every year—practically three whole years — in boiling, roasting, stewing, baking, and pastry-making.

"Ah, but," she replied in answer to my expressed astonishment, "it was nothing, so long as things went smoothly; but sometimes there were the days at the hospital, when the little chap was so bad, sometimes "father" has been bad, and men are not easy to nurse. Then things would get all behind, and, although one was run down oneself, it meant double

SHE HAS SPENT SIX MONTHS OF EIGHT-HOUR DAYS IN BED-MAKING.

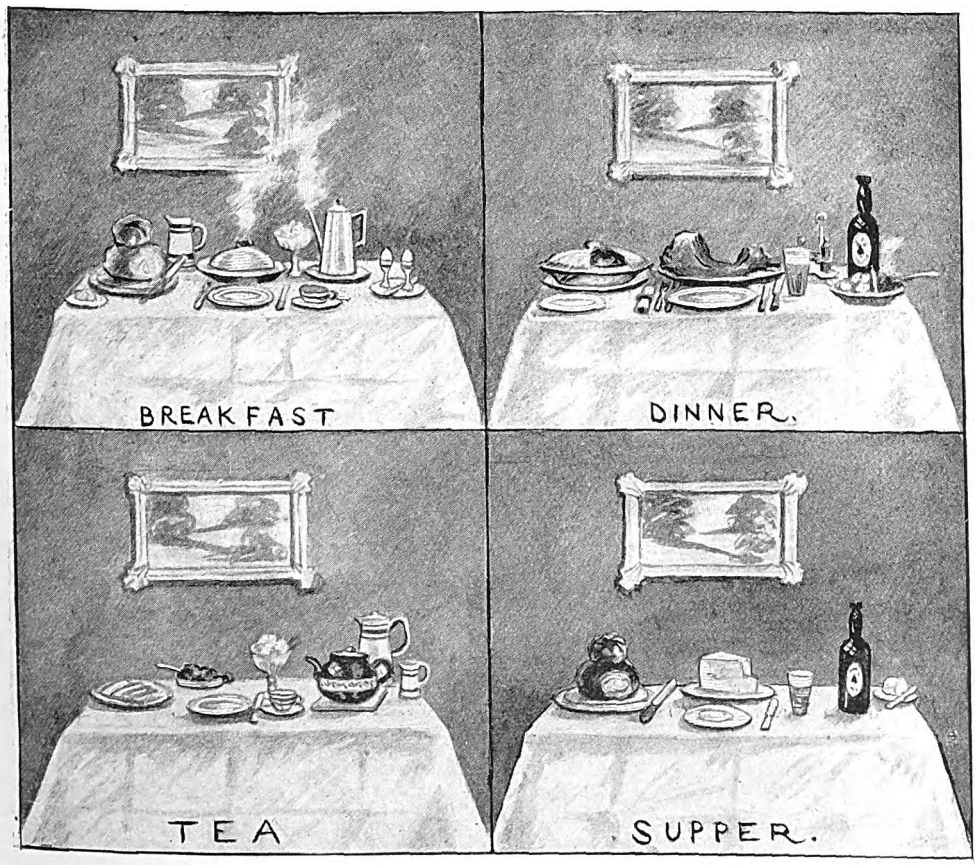
Digitized by Google

work to pull it up afterwards; and of course I was ill myself occasionally, and believe me, the illness is as nothing to the terrible anxiety, because you know everything is at sixes and sevens downstairs. However, I've got through it, or rather, I've been got through, and I don't look much the worse, do I?"

No, that she certainly didn't, and I said so, but as I was coming away I asked her if she found herself growing hard amidst it all.

"No," she replied, "just the other way. The children act on you like sugar and sweeten you. If it were not for them perhaps one would get hard, but

THREE YEARS OF NINE-HOUR WORKING DAYS HAVE BEEN SPENT IN COOKING.



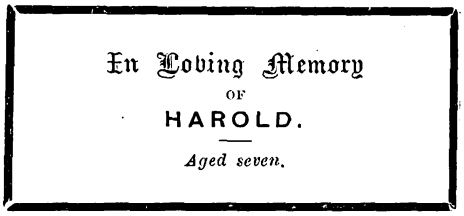
SHE HAS LAID 22,000 OF THESF MEALS.

Digitized by Google

a romp when they're young takes you out of your self, and when they're older you get full of their plans, their young men and young women, and presently the grandchildren come and the tenderness comes."

"What was the hardest thing of all you have had to do?" I queried gently as I came away.

"That," she answered with a slight quiver of her lip, and pointing to a memorial card inscribed :—

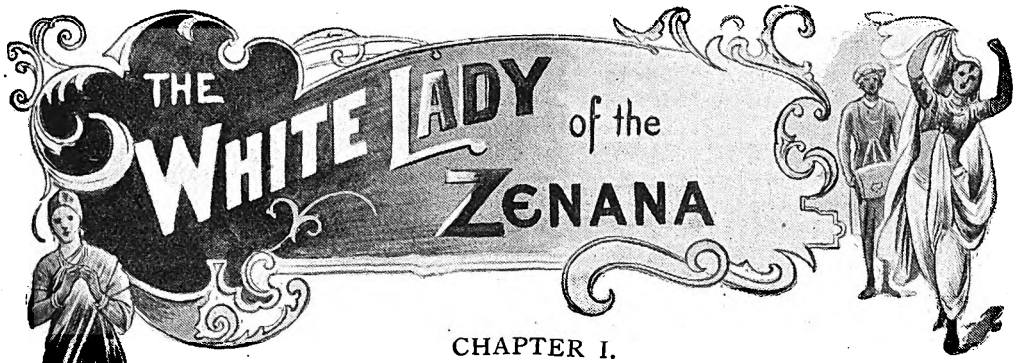


and having just buried a four-year-old girlie myself, the freemasonry of sorrow united us, and I understood and was silent.

OUR FRONTISPIECE.

MARY, COUNTESS OF CAVAN, has recently presented to the National Portrait Gallery Thomas Sadler's painting of John Bunyan—the only one extant that was executed in the immortal dreamer's lifetime—and we have reproduced it as our frontispiece to enable the public generally to see it. This Sadler portrait, as well as the pencil sketch by Robert White, in the Print Room of the British Museum, shows a blunt, dogged English face, and, looking at it, the wonder increases that from such a source sprang that marvellous dream, that fascinated even the literary taste of a Macaulay. One of the healthiest signs of our times is the revival of interest in Bunyan literature, a revival probably stimulated by the lectures of Dr. Alex. White on Bunyan characters, which we should recommend all our readers to study. Macaulay's Essay and Dr. White's lectures enable the reader to "hold the key."

Digitized by Google



CHAPTER I.

THE steamer India was three days out from London on her way to Bombay, and the passengers had begun to get over their sea-sickness, and to fraternise together on the deck; the ladies who shared each other's cabins drew their deck chairs close together and whispered confidences over such scraps of gossip as were already obtainable in the great floating hotel. Some of the younger men got out the bull-board and the buckets and rope circlets for board-ship quoits; there was much laughter and scampering about the decks, and many a gay flirtation begun over those time-honoured games.

"Do you see that tall, fair girl, playing with my daughter and Captain Fletcher?" Mrs. Gore whispered to the lady who was sitting beside her against the skylight, well out of the way of the players.

"Yes, she is quite the prettiest girl on board," answered the other, who had no daughters.

"She is going out to join her husband," Mrs. Gore went on, passing over her companion's uncalled-for remark.

"She looks very young to be married," said Mrs. Benson.

Mrs. Gore lowered her voice: "She is married to a native," she said.

"To a native! Impossible! That pretty young girl!"

"She told my daughter, herself, yesterday evening, when they were walking up and down the deck together. Janet was very much shocked, as you may suppose."

"Poor thing! She knows nothing whatever of India, I suppose. Of course no one will visit her."

"She won't get much chance of finding that out," said Mrs. Gore, "for she won't be allowed to do any visiting. Her husband is a Mahometan."

Mrs. Benson's ruddy face turned pale. "Oh!" she exclaimed, "what can her relations at home have been thinking of to allow such a horrible thing," and she looked with awed interest at the graceful, gay young creature, standing with a quoit poised in her hand, and a happy smile on her sweet mouth.

"She met him at home it seems. He is a barrister, and was studying in London, and he lived at her father's house. I fancy the father was one of those crammers who prepare native students for their examinations. I should have thought she would have seen enough of him to disgust any right-minded girl with native ways," said Mrs. Gore, bridling.

"I call it a wicked shame to let any innocent young girl marry a Mahometan," said Mrs. Benson, indignantly. "Why he may have two or three other wives by the time she gets out there. What is the man's name?"

"Mahomed Shere Ali," answered Mrs. Gore. "She calls herself Mrs. Ali—Hazel Ali. It's a pity her husband cannot see her laughing and flirting with Captain Fletcher. She won't have much chance of flirting when once she gets to Madras, I fancy."

"Horrible!" said Mrs. Benson; "but surely he won't be allowed to shut her up in the harem: she is a British subject. I don't believe it would be legal."

"We shall see, my dear," said Mrs. Gore, who was also going to Madras.

"I wish she were coming to Bombay," said Mrs. Benson, "I should look her up when we got there, native or no native, and see she was properly treated and not locked up with a lot of other wives in some horrible harem."

Digitized by Google

"Well, you have no daughters, so I suppose you are not obliged to be so careful as I have to be with my dear girls."

"Daughters indeed!" said Mrs. Benson, with a toss of her head; and she got up and went over to the other side of the deck to her husband, who was more to her than Mrs. Gore's husband and sons and daughters all put together had ever been to that proud matron.

Pretty Hazel came presently and sat down in Mrs. Benson's vacant chair.

"Isn't it a lovely day?" she said. "I am sure we are going to have a delighful voyage. Miss Gore has just been telling me what a gay place Madras is. I have always heard life in India is so delightful. Do you like Madras, Mrs. Gore?"

"Yes, I like it," said Mrs. Gore, looking at her with some curiosity. Madras gaiety would probably not mean quite the same thing to the collector's wife and to the wife of a native barrister.

Hazel gave a sigh of beautiful content, and leant back fanning herself. Her thoughts wandered away to the dream castles she had built of her life in the shining East with her clever dark husband, who was sure to rise high in his profession. It was all like a fairy tale, this sudden translation from a dull, dark house in Bayswater, and a narrow bourgeois life, first to this gay free life under clear skies, upon a wide sea, among a pleasant company where her beauty and her youth for the first time gained their meed of homage, and by and by to her Indian paradise where she would dance and ride and dress and enjoy herself as those fair ladies did she had seen sometimes in their carriages in the Park at home. And thinking of all these things her heart went out in a passionate gratitude to the man who had brought this glorious change into her life.

"You are not tired yet, Mrs. Alley, are you?" Captain Fletcher asked, bending over her. He had not heard of the native husband yet.

"Oh no! What are you going to do now?"

"Come with me and you shall see," he anwered, laughing, and she went with him, nothing loth, to play with him and the other irresponsible children who had stepped back into earlier years for this short holiday.

As the days went on, people were kinder to her than ever, Hazel thought gratefully.

"YOU ARE NOT TIRED YET, ARE YOU?"

Digitized by Google

The pitying glances, the strange silences that fell sometimes when she talked of what she would do in the future, passed by her serene content unobserved. Once when she talked to Janet Gore about her pretty ball dresses that were in the boxes down in the hold Janet burst out crying and left her abruptly. But she only thought that Janet had some secret of her own that troubled her, and was sorry for the girl whose future seemed less cloudless than her own, but for herself she was quite undisturbed.

When they reached Bombay Mahomed Shere Ali was there to meet his wife. From the deck of the steamer she saw him leaning against the rail of the tender that had come to take off the passengers.

"How much darker he looks," she said to herself.

He looked sullen too and heavy, and his dark eyes had lost much of the beauty and deep mystery that had charmed her now that she saw them repeated in every brown face under every turban and skull cap of the natives who crowded about the tender.

The Mahometans of the South have neither the beauty nor the dignity of their brethren of the Northern provinces; neither their tall straight forms nor their high eagle features. But Mahomed Shere Ali, a son of the ex-Nabob of Tulipatam, was a tall handsome man, rather too bulky for his years, perhaps, with a round, smooth, beardless face, and great slumbrous black eyes. He wore a long purple satin coat, red silk trousers, tight and wrinkled at the ankle, and a white muslin turban with a gold band. A cold wave of depression and foreboding swept over Hazel's joyous mood as she looked at him, and she remembered with a sudden pang that he had begged her not to come out to India, and that only after much pleading and insistence on her part had he agreed to her joining him in his own country. He came on board presently with a rabble of dirty, unkempt retainers behind him, and she took him down to her cabin, but she did not offer to introduce him to any of her fellow passengers as she had intended.

"You are glad I have come?" she whispered, clinging to him.

"Since it was your wish, I am glad," he said, "but I do not know how you will like the life here; it is so different from what you have been used to. I am living in my father's house, as I told you, and, of course, we live in the Mahometan way."

"Oh, but you will change that now I have come?" she said hastily. "We must have a house of our own."

"We will talk about that later on," he said, evasively.

When they went up again the deck was empty and the tender gone. A little steam launch was waiting for them, and Hazel's luggage was on board it, guarded by some of her husband's lank, half-clothed attendants.

"Oh, dear, they are all gone!" said Hazel in dismay, "and I haven't said good-bye to any of them, and they have been so kind to me all the voyage. I do hope we shall see some of them at the station."

From the landing pier—they call it the Apollo Bund in Bombay—they drove straight to the railway station, and Mahomed Ali left his wife in the ladies' waiting-room. Alone in the great bare room, her foreboding and uneasiness grew darker and darker upon her. Directly the train was ready in the station, where it stood for an hour or two before the time of departure, her husband hurried her into a reserved carriage, where she found a great part of her baggage distributed about the floor and under the long seats that ran along beneath the rows of windows on each side of the carriage. Mahomed Ali drew up all the little Venetian shutters so that no one on the platform could see into the carriage, and if any of Hazel's fellow passengers were there she had no opportunity of seeing or communicating with them.

They travelled alone together through the long hours of the two days and three nights' journey from Bombay to Madras. From time to time there were long stoppages at various stations for breakfast and luncheon and dinner, and Hazel heard bright voices and laughter on the platform as the English passengers hurried past to and from the dining-rooms, or met their friends and greeted them; but she herself never left the carriage. She said once timidly, "I should like to get out for a little while and walk on the platform. I am so tired of this carriage."

But he answered: "I would rather you stayed here with me, dear. They will bring us what we want to the carriage, and the journey will soon be over." And Hazel, with that new-born dread upon her, had not the heart to persist.

Digitized by Google

Their servants came to the door and handed in plates and dishes of food from the dining-room, and took them back when they had finished. The hours of that journey seemed never-ending to Hazel, although Mahomet Ali did his best to amuse her, and was full of kindness and attention. They talked of the friends they had both known in London, they recalled episodes of their life there together, and Hazel had many questions to ask about his life in Madras since he had left her, but he seemed to have very little to tell. So, with heart sinking ever lower within her, she travelled with her husband to his home.

At Madras a covered carriage was waiting for them, and Hazel was hurried into it, without having a moment to look about her and see if any of her late fellow passengers were on the platform.

"I tried to learn a little Hindustani on board the steamer," she said to her husband as they drove away together, "so that I could talk to your mother and your sister, but I am afraid I am not a great hand at it."

"I am glad you did that," he said. "You will get on much better with them if you can talk a little, and I daresay you will soon learn."

"Do any of your brothers speak English?" she asked.

"No. But never mind them, they do not matter," he said, and he laughed a little strangely.

They drove away from the town and the shops down a broad tree-shaded road into a large, neglected looking compound, and drew up under a pillared portico with steps leading up to a wide dirty verandah where a few dingy pillows were scattered over the matting, with here and there an earthenware water pot; two or three hens were pecking about, but no human being was to be seen.

As Hazel got out of the carriage there seemed to be no living creature in sight except the hens. She hesitated for a moment at the top of the steps with that undefined fear and dread strong upon her. She had a momentary, wild impulse to rush down the steps and out into the road, and to fly for safety and shelter to one of the English homes they had told her of on board the steamer.

"Come in, dear," her husband said. "The servants ought not to leave the verandah in this untidy state; they are much too careless."

The commonplace words roused her, her momentary dread seemed ridiculous, and with a light laugh she followed him across the verandah, through a high, double-Venetian door that stood open, into a large bare room, very dim and dark, with a white cotton sheet spread upon the floor; more cushions and pillows, like those outside; three cane-seated arm-chairs, and a vast chandelier hanging from the ceiling. They crossed this room and came out into a dark, stone-paved passage, that led to a narrow, uncarpeted stone staircase. Upstairs, they went on through other passages to a large, wide dim chamber, with shuttered windows, opening on to a sunny terrace. Some attempt at furnishing had been made in this room; there were two low, broad, wooden beds—charpoys they call them—several wardrobes, a table with a looking-glass upon it, two or three cane-bottomed chairs and a wash-stand.

Mahomed Ali looked round the room with some pride: "This is your room," he said, "I furnished it for you when I heard you were coming."

"It looks very nice and cool," she said, pleasantly, thinking how prettily she would furnish it by-and-bye; she had heard there were very nice shops in Madras, she would go out to-morrow and get some things, and the room could really be made very pretty indeed—it was so large and lofty.

"I want to take you to see my mother, presently, Hazel," her husband said, rather awkwardly. "But I want you to do me a favour first."

"Well, dear, what is it?"

"I want my mother to like you and to realise thoroughly that you are my wife and one of the family. But if she sees you in that European dress she will always look upon you as a stranger, she will never understand that you are really and truly my wife; first impressions go for so much. If only you would wear the Mahometan dress when she sees you for the first time it would make things so much easier; it would be pleasanter for you, too, while we have to live in my father's house.

Digitized by Google

Hazel laughed. It really would be a joke to dress up in native clothes to see the old lady. "But, my dear boy," she said, "I have no Mahometan dress, and if I had I shouldn't know how to put it on."

"I have a dress here on purpose for you," he answered, "and one of the women will show you how to wear it and do your hair for you if you will let her."

HE CAME ON BOARD WITH HIS RETAINERS.

"What fun! Certainly I will let her."

Mahomed Ali went out and presently a couple of serving women came to dress her. Hazel put herself into their hands, and with much laughter and some attempts to air her few words of Hindustani, she let them transform her into a Mahometan lady.

They took down her hair and oiled and smoothed and parted it in two sleek Madonna bands, framing her face; they hung a jeweled pendant on her forehead and loops of pearls in her hair; but there was much chattering and headshaking between them when they found that her ears were not pierced and that the many earrings they had brought must be laid aside. They put on her a voluminous, many-patterned silk skirt, and a little gauze, short-sleeved jacket, and over head and shoulders and skirt a delicate flowing pink crèpe veil.

"I shall never be able to keep this thing on, I am sure," she said, laughing, and the women laughed too, and showed her how to wind it round her and tuck an end into her skirt, and how to cover her face with its folds. They fastened bracelets on her arms, some above her elbows, and some upon her wrists, that looked all too large and wide beside their own slender rounded members; there were necklaces, too, and anklets to complete her pretty fancy dress.

Digitized by Google

When they had finished they fetched her husband, who stood and looked at her critically.

"They tell me your ears are not pierced, dearest," he said; "we must have the barber woman in to-morrow to pierce them, so that you can wear your earrings. Will you come now to my mother?"

"Oh, but I don't want my ears pierced; its spoils the shape so, and no one wears earrings now," Hazel objected. "Please don't send for the woman, Ali."

"Just as you like, dear," he answered, and then he took her by the hand to lead her to his mother.

In a dim and lofty room, entirely void of furniture, a figure sat crouched upon a charpoy, with a veil over her face. Eight or ten slatternly women, in greasy, dirty skirts, and with uncombed hair under their cotton veils, squatted about on the floor round the charpoy, talking and whispering among themselves. As the husband and wife came up to the charpoy the lady-mother put aside her veil and looked up, and Hazel saw a beautiful woman, with the oval face and straight thin features, and great langourous eyes of the high-bred Mahometan. She looked at Hazel with a dreamy interest, and raised one delicate hand languidly to her forehead in a gesture of salutation, which Hazel awkwardly returned. She said a few words in an indifferent tone to her son.

"She is asking you to sit down," he said. "Do you think you could sit on the floor, Hazel?"

"I will try if you like," said Hazel, glancing round, and noting the dearth of chairs. Her husband sat beside her, cross-legged on the floor. The Begum did not take much notice of them except to make a more or less irrelevant remark from time to time, which Mahomed Ali carefully translated to his wife, who could think of nothing whatever to say in reply. The women, who would have chattered fast enough and overwhelmed Hazel with questions, had been silenced by a short word or two from Mahomed Ali, of whom they were obviously greatly in awe.

They had sat there for some time, when the Begum murmured a few words to one of her women, who brought out a shabby little wooden box, common and dirty, from under the charpoy. In the box was a black, soft, sticky-looking mass. The woman pulled off a small piece and rolled it deftly between her brown fingers into a pill, which she put into the Begum's mouth.

"What on earth was that?" whispered Hazel.

"Opium," her husband answered shortly. The Begum lay back upon the cushions of her charpoy, she had quite relinquished the attempt at conversation with her son; now and then she muttered a word or two to the women, and they altered the position of a foot or a hand of the inert form on the charpoy, and once one of them poured some water out of a silver vessel, like a coffee-pot, into the Begum's open mouth, doing it with a wonderful dexterity without spilling a drop, and without touching the drinker's mouth with the spout of the vessel.

"Can't we go, now?" murmured Hazel. "I am dreadfully tired of sitting like this; my legs are quite cramped."

"We cannot go till she gives us leave," said Mahomed Ali; "it would not be polite or respectful. But you can get up and walk about the room if you like."

Hazel's movement of rising disturbed the Begum, who sat up and looked about her with vacant eyes; at a whispered hint from one of her women she gave her son and his wife permission to withdraw.

They went out, by a different door to the one by which they had entered, into a little ante-room. On the floor, upon a Persian rug, a young girl was lying; a most beautiful creature, like an exquisite hothouse flower, with dreamy, velvety eyes, and rich dark colouring, and slender, rounded limbs of a perfect grace and symmetry. She lay full length upon the rug, with her arms crossed under her head; there were three or four young women sitting near her on the floor, who fanned her with the long, slow sweep of their great fans of peacock feathers. She did not move when they entered, she only turned her head a little and looked at them with her unfathomable eyes. She asked a few questions about Hazel, which Mahomed Ali answered, laughing, and then they left her and went on to their own apartment.

Digitized by Google

Hazel felt a sudden distaste for the rich bright garments of her masquerade, and looked round the room at once for her own simpler habiliments. They were nowhere to be seen. In the wardrobes there were rich hued skirts and fairy veils, but nothing the least like the quiet, ladylike grey frock she had taken off an hour before. None of her luggage, containing the rest of her wardrobe, had been brought upstairs, nothing but her dressing bag and a small box that held her books and photographs, and a few of her wedding presents.

"O Ali!" she said, turning to him in some dismay, "those stupid women have taken away all my clothes, and none of my boxes have been brought up. Do tell them to bring them back."

Mahomed Ali went out presumably to give her orders, but the two women returned without any of her own raiment, and she was obliged perforce to go on wearing the now hated Mahometan dress. Her husband did not return, and she was afraid to seek him in that strange house and in that strange guise. The women could not or would not understand her, they shook their heads and laughed at her Hindustani and at the angry English that succeeded it, and then they set to work unpacking and admiring the pretty things in the one case that had been brought up to her.

The morning was ended before Mahomed Ali came back to her, followed by more women bringing the mid-day meal. She flew to him at once, and between laughing and crying explained the disagreeable plight she was in.

"Let us have luncheon now, dear," he said. "I will see about all that afterwards."

"Are we going to have our meals up here, by ourselves?" she asked in amazement.

"Are we not happier here by ourselves?" he said tenderly. "What do we want with anyone else when we have each other?"

"But won't they all think it very strange?" she asked. "Your father and mother and your brothers. It will seem so rude, as if we took your father's house for an hotel."

"No one will mind," he answered. "My mother and sister always take their meals in their own apartments. You see we have no regular fixed hours for stated meals here. You will see that here whenever anyone is hungry that person calls for his dinner or his breakfast, or whatever it may be, and eats it then by himself without waiting to know whether someone else is also ready for a meal. We take ours together because we like to be together."

There was no more to be said. So Hazel sat down, and they had a pleasant little lunch together, eating their pillau and curry and rice and sweetmeats amicably enough together. Mahomed Ali smoked his hookah when they had finished. Then he left her with some vague excuse, and she was alone with her women till the evening. When the sun went down they invited her out on to the terrace, which looked from the back of the house over a wide view of wooded compounds and tall, white pillared dwellings, of flat red roads, tree shaded, of vivid green paddy fields, of plaintain gardens, and cocoanut topes and mango groves. It was cool and pleasant enough on the terrace, but Hazel would have liked to go down and walk among the mango trees in the garden if it had not been for her absurd attire.

With the dinner came Mahomed Ali. She met him now without any smiles of greeting.

"I am sick to death of this odious room," she said angrily, "and I will not wear this vile dress any longer. You are treating me unkindly, Mahomed Ali. I insist on having my own clothes brought back to me at once. I will not sit down to dinner without them."

Mahomed soothed her: "You shall have them, dear, of course," he said, "but you really look very charming as you are."

"I hate to be shut up all day in the house," she complained, "and I cannot go out like this."

"But no one goes out in the heat of the day in Madras; surely you know that, dear," he answered gently.

"But just now from the terrace I saw carriages going along that road far away over there; I daresay there were ladies in them, and they were going down to the beach to hear the band play, and meet each other and walk about; they told me all about it on board the steamer."

"I will take you for a drive after dinner, Hazel dear," he answered, "and to-morrow, too, if you wish it."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, will you really, Ali?" she said brightly, and, much mollified, she sat down to dinner, which was set out on a table on the terrace.

"I have been perfectly miserable all day," she complained; "you ought not to have left me so long, Ali. I have been here all alone, with nothing to do, and no one to speak to, and those odious women pretend not to understand me when I try to speak Hindustani to them."

"They are very stupid," he agreed.

"I must have a Munshi," she went on. "Captain Fletcher told me that was the best way to learn the language. Will you get me one?"

"Certainly, I will see about it. But there are not many Munshis in the place, and they are always busy. Perhaps I could teach you myself."

For the first time Hazel looked at her husband with a vague suspicion. "Don't you want me to learn?" she asked sharply.

"Of course you can learn Hindustani if you wish it, Hazel. You are really not reasonable. Why should I wish to prevent you when I see as well as you do how much more convenient it would be for you to understand the language of the people about you? I was only considering whether my father would like to have a Munshi coming upstairs to the private apartments; in fact I am quite sure he would never consent to it for a moment."

"Then your father must be a very ridiculous, unreasonable person. Why haven't I seen him, by the bye, or your brothers?"

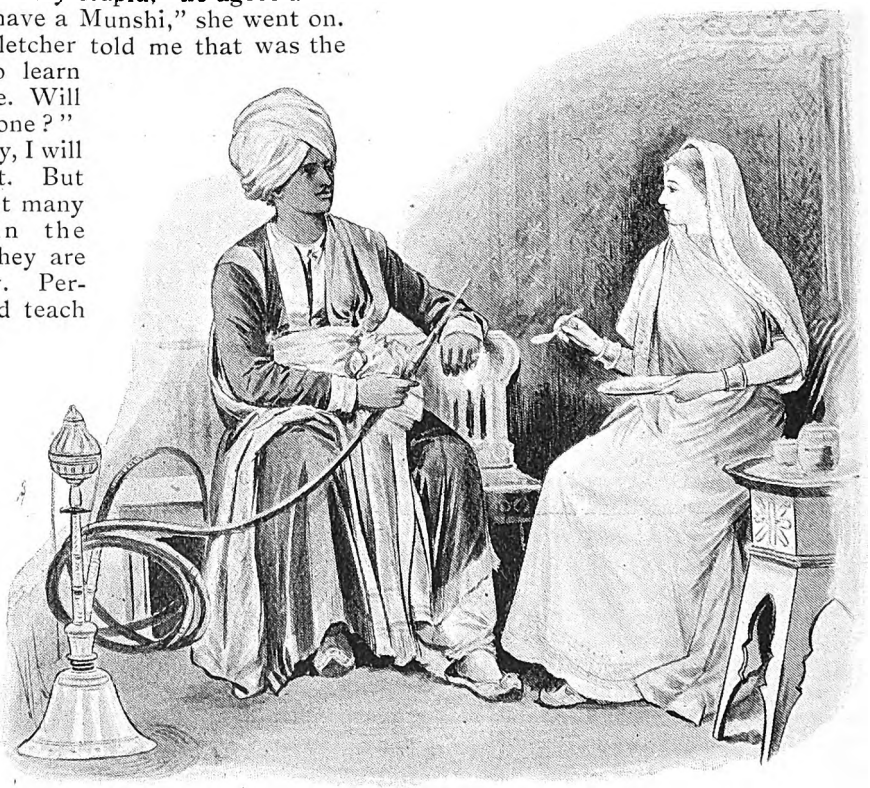
"He is away from home just now, and I don't think you would care for my brothers. They none of them speak English—you remember I told you that."

"And do the whole three of them live in this house, Ali?"

"Yes, certainly. Where else should they live?"

"Are they married?" asked Hazel.

"One is married," Mahomed Ali answered, "and one had a wife, but she died—the youngest is only a boy. If you have finished dinner, shall we go for our drive now?" he asked.



MAHOMED ALI SMOKED HIS HOOKAH WHEN THEY HAD FINISHED.

"What! In these clothes?" cried Hazel, "you must be mad. Make them bring my things at once. I shall not be ten minutes dressing."

"It is so dark, no one would see what you have on," he said.

"I must have my own clothes, Ali."

"Do come as you are, dearest," he urged. "It is so late now to send for your things, and the women want to go and get their own food."

Digitized by Google

"I will not go out dressed like a native woman," Hazel cried passionately. They had both risen, and stood facing each other.

"Do you really mean that?" asked Mahomed Ali.

"Certainly I mean it."

He moved towards the door, but Hazel flew round the table and seized his arm, "You shall not leave me like this," she cried. "I will not let you go. Tell them to fetch my things at once from wherever they have hidden them so that I can go out with you."

He tried to loosen his arm, but she clung to him. Then he gave an order to the women who were standing looking on with grinning faces. They went out and presently returned laden with Hazel's clothes—one carried a skirt and petticoats, and the other a pretty hat and veil and gloves.

Hazel began to dress herself hurriedly, only to find that so many necessary articles of her attire were missing that she was very little better off than she had been before; amongst other things, the women had forgotten her shoes and stockings. She was plunged again into the old maddening confusion of useless remonstrances, and directions on her part answered by head-shakings, and laughter, and general bewilderment on the part of her attendants. At last she caught up the veil she had just laid aside, wrapped it round her, and ran out of the room in her bare feet, and down the stairs. She hurried along the narrow, flagged passage, and opened the door of the outer room, which she remembered. It was full of people; round the sides, lounging on cushions, and leaning against the walls, were men smoking hookahs—young men, middle-aged men, and venerable patriarchs with long beards. At the further end, just within the verandah, three dancing girls suddenly ceased their swaying movements as she appeared in the doorway. The men all turned to look at her, with intolerable laughter and admiration on their dark faces; seeing which, Hazel turned and fled, in impotent anger and shame, back up the stairs, through the winding passages to her own room, which was empty. Her three women soon followed her, evidently filled with consternation at her behaviour; but Mahomed Ali did not return. When she woke in the morning the women were still there, and they had already removed her European dress, or rather such part of it as had returned into her possession the evening before. There was nothing for it but to clothe herself again in the hated Mahometan draperies they brought her.

At noon they handed her a letter from her husband.

"My dear Hazel," she read, "I am obliged to go away for a few days on an important case. I hope when I return I shall find you more kindly disposed towards me, and that you will believe that I am only devoted to your happiness.

"M."

Hazel folded up the note silently and slipped it into her bodice; she was beginning to understand the situation. She fell into a great panic, in which it seemed to her she could find no safety but in instant flight. She made no further attempt to communicate with her attendants, but sat all that day pondering over her position; and the very desperation of her case called up all the energies of her mind, all the quickness of her wit. She was a prisoner in a Mahometan zenana, without money, ignorant of the language of the people who surrounded her; compelled to masquerade in their dress, as one of themselves, having no means of communication with the people of her own race, who might be living close around her. She understood that it was useless, in that house, to write, imploring aid from anyone outside, even if she had had any idea whom to address.

She sat on the terrace in the evening and watched the few carriages that drove along the winding red road in the distance; there were English ladies in the carriages, she could see their gay parasols and fluttering, light draperies. The front of the house was not visible from the terrace, and there were wings on each side which shut it in from every view except at the back; but Hazel remembered that the front of the house was very near the road, a wide road too, with handsome houses and compounds scattered along its length; and there, too, no doubt, English ladies drove past in their carriages as they did on that other road in the distance. "I must see if they drive past there in the morning as well as in the evening," she said to herself, "it would not be possible to get out of the house at this hour." The women never left her all day, but they seemed to wait on her with respectful kindness, and even made some effort to entertain her; they brought up a couple of dancing girls to sing and dance before her, and her beautiful young sister-in-law came in from her own apartment to see the performance; and afterwards made her women bring out the jewels and gala dresses of the family to show them to Hazel. She took some trouble, too, to understand the few Hindustani phrases that Hazel attempted; and for some little time the English girl forgot her own anxieties, and was quite amused trying to carry on a conversation with her, in which, according to the custom of the zenana, the attendants bore their part.

Digitized by Google

The women who had been appointed as Hazel's special attendants—there were three of them—slept in Hazel's room that night, lying about on the floor, in the clothes they had worn all day, as their manner is; but she did not mind that, she was even glad of their company in that strange house.

Very early in the morning, while the women were still sleeping, with heads muffled in their blankets, Hazel went out on to the terrace to watch the distant road; and before six o'clock she saw, as she had hoped to see, figures moving along the road, men and ladies on horseback, other ladies in carriages and now and then a few walking. They were few and far between, no doubt, but that was, perhaps, all the better for Hazel's purpose. "I shall get out into the road in front, to-morrow morning," she said to herself, "before anyone else is stirring in the house, and I shall wait out there till some English person comes past, who will help me to get away from this place. I believe I shall die if I have to spend the rest of my life here." An escape seemed easy and simple enough to Hazel, planning it all out that morning, alone there on the terrace. She would only have to run downstairs in the early morning, go through that other room, she remembered, into the compound, and so out into the road, where she could hide under a hedge till some one came who would help her. It was lucky that Mahomed Ali was away just now, it made things so much easier, and the women slept so soundly there was no fear of disturbing them by her flight.

They brought her her breakfast presently—boiled rice and different sorts of curry in little saucers, curried meat, curried potatoes, curried mangoes, so hot with chilis that the tears ran down her cheeks when she tasted them.

The day passed exactly as the day before had done. Kair Unissa Begum, her sister-in-law, spent the greater part of it in Hazel's room lying on her carpet, which she had had brought in from her own apartment, and surrounded by her women. By dint of much explanation and frequent recourse to the Hindustani dictionary she had brought out with her, Hazel managed to understand that Kair Unissa was to be married in three months time to a rich young Mahometan, a son of one of her father's friends, and that there would be a great "tomash" on the occasion. She was to have new jewels and dresses, and they would all be able to see the fireworks from Hazel's terrace. There would be a high lattice-work screen fixed up on the balustrade so that the ladies could look out at their ease without any risk of being seen by the profane eyes of men. There was much more about the wedding which was quite unintelligible to Hazel. They all—mistress and maids—talked at once, plucking at Hazel's skirts from time to time as she sat in her chair amongst them to attract her attention, and addressing her as "Hazari Begum," which was as near as they could get to her name.

When the subject of the wedding palled upon them, and Hazel's difficulties with the language ceased to be amusing, one of the women read aloud to them in a high, monotonous voice; Kair Unissa herself could neither read nor write. This amusement was varied by story telling, and the singing of inharmonious nasal, native songs, to the accompaniment of a sort of zither; and some of the younger women danced a little, in uncouth imitation of the Nautch girls. Kair Unissa Begum ate opium out of a dirty little old work-box like her mother's, and some of the women smoked hookahs filled with a preparation of molasses and opium, with a little tobacco added. They had two hookahs amongst them, which were passed from one to another, each taking a few whiffs and passing it on, filling the room with a sweet sickly odour, in which there was very little trace of tobacco.

Some time in the afternoon Kair Unissa called for food, and the women brought in a number of little dishes and saucers, which they ranged in a half-circle in front of her, one of them reading aloud to her while she ate. She did not invite Hazel to join her in this repast, but ate alone, feeding herself with her fingers. When she had finished, they brought a basin and poured water over her hands from a silver coffee pot, one of them drying her hands afterwards in a corner of her own veil.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

From time to time the women slipped out, one or two at a time, to eat their own "karna," and when the drowsy heat of the afternoon was at its height they slept, lying down just where each of them happened to be seated, as dogs lie sleeping in the sun.

For very boredom Hazel chewed some of the betel and nut that was handed about; it was very aromatic and pleasant, and left a cool freshness in the mouth. The opium she declined. "Though I daresay I should come to that in time if I had to live here long," she thought.

CHAPTER II.

Hazel lay awake nearly the whole night, thinking of what she would say to the first English lady she should see driving down that road she remembered in front of the house. She determined that, as soon as she saw a carriage coming, she would get up very quietly from under the hedge where she would have been hiding, and she would walk slowly to meet it, and call to the coachman to stop; she would not be in any hurry or fuss, for fear people should think she was mad, and not listen to her; she would go quite close up to the carriage and speak to the lady inside, and ask her to take her into the carriage and let her go home with her. Or, perhaps, she might see a lady and gentleman walking, that would be best of all; she would tell them she was shut up in a Mahometan zenana and beg them to help her, so that she could go home to England. If no one came down that road at all, after she had waited a reasonable time, she would go up to one of the houses and ask the servants to let her speak to the mistress. She had always heard that English people were so kind to each other in India.

At four o'clock she got up and dressed herself, wrapping herself in the longest and thickest veil she could find. It was still dark outside, the Venetian windows were all closed, but a lamp burnt dimly on one of the side tables; there were only two women in her room that night, and they were sleeping soundly with their blankets over their heads. Her heart beat so loudly she was afraid it would wake them. Getting away did not seem so easy in the dark of the early morning as it had done last night. She stopped now and then in her preparations, trembling with fear, and half inclined to give up the attempt to escape; but the thought of the empty days of the zenana, and the hopelessness of any help from outside, nerved her to go on. When she was ready she opened the door very gently and stepped over the threshold, closing the door softly behind her; the passage outside was in total darkness. She took one swift step forward and struck violently against a charpoy that was drawn across the passage. At that unexpected shock all her long, pent-up excitement burst out in a terrified shriek, a shriek long enough and loud enough to waken every sleeper in the house. At the same moment a man sprang up from the charpoy and seized her arm, with a smothered exclamation:

"Qui hi?" (who is it?) he asked.

"O Ali! Is it you?" she whispered, shuddering.

He drew her back into the room and shut and locked the door, for there were sounds of movement in the house. Within the two women slumbered still with the dead sleep of the tired native.

"What is the matter?" he asked gently, feeling the trembling of her body against the arm he had put round her.

She had her wits about her now, sharpened by her desperate position. "O Ali! you startled me so," she said. "I had no idea there was anyone there. I wanted to walk a little in the garden before people were about to see me. I could not sleep, and this room is so hot. I thought it would be cool and pleasant in the garden. What on earth were you sleeping outside in the passage for?"

"I am sorry you were frightened, dear," he answered. "I came home very late to-night from my journey and I did not want to disturb you, so I told them to put a cot outside there for me. They need not have put it so close up against the door, but they are stupid. Come out into the garden now if you like. It will be cool and pleasant there, as you say. I will open the door for you—the doors are all locked at night you know."

Digitized by Google

She knew he did not believe her, but she said pleasantly, "I am so sorry I disturbed you, you must be very tired after your journey. But let me go down into the garden if you are sure you would not rather go to sleep again."

Laughingly he helped her over the obstructing cot, and together they passed down the stairs, lighted now by the advancing dawn. They went down the lower passage, past the door of the outer room, where Hazel, glancing in, saw a lamp burning, and sleeping forms scattered about the floor. The outer doors were shut, probably locked, and she would have had to step over those prostrate bodies to reach them before she could get out into the compound. Her husband led her down another short passage, at right angles to the first, that led to the garden door. With some ostentation he drew a key from the pocket of his long coat, and unlocked this door for her, and they went out into the compound at the back of the house, which was quite shut off from the front. The house had formerly been occupied by an English family, and the garden had been well laid out and tended, but it was neglected and overgrown now; the paths thick with weeds, the grass long and rank, with tangled undergrowth encroaching everywhere. The compound, of some acres in extent, was closed in by a high wall, as Hazel had seen from the terrace, and now, looking back at the house, she saw that from each side of the building a wall had been carried on that joined the outer surrounding barrier, completely enclosing this part of the grounds, so that there was no egress except through the house.

The air was cool and fragrant with the morning perfume of many flowers, and, shaken and disheartened though she was, it was very pleasant to poor Hazel.

"I wish I could come out here every morning," she said, timidly; "it is so fresh and nice, and I have never been used to be shut up all day long in one room."

"Come here every morning, certainly, if you like," he said; "it is not very safe in the evening, on account of the snakes, but there is nothing to hurt you at this hour. I remember, too, there is a little staircase from the terrace outside your room, it is in one corner; but perhaps you haven't noticed it."

"I saw a little door at the corner by one of the side walls, but it was shut," she answered, "and I thought it opened into one of the other rooms."

"I will get you the key if it is locked," he said, kindly. "Look at the house from here; you will see that the other rooms on each side do not come out quite so far at the back as the terrace, though the wall has been built out to screen it, and you can see a flight of steps leading down behind that bit of blind wall."

She stood and looked back at the house. Her heart was full of suspicion of her husband, and she felt he only wanted her to note how impossible it would be to get out of this garden into the road in front of the house.

"The ladies of the zenana are always very particular about their seclusion being strictly observed," he remarked; "they would not like to be intruded upon by any chance stranger who might be strolling along the road, when they choose to take the air in their own garden. So my father had those walls carried on from the house when we came to live here; it used to be all open from here to the front before that."

"And you mean to say the women themselves like to be walled in, like prisoners?" Hazel asked, with great indignation. Then, remembering the Begum and Kair Unissa, she thought it was not impossible they might prefer seclusion; so she changed the subject. "Your sister told me yesterday that she was going to be married. She is very beautiful—I hope the man she is going to marry loves her truly. I suppose he is away now as he has not been to see her since I have been here."

He laughed a little, indulgently.

"Our girls are not like the girls in England," he said; "the man my sister is going to marry has never seen her. His father and mine arranged the marriage; he will be very glad when he sees how beautiful she is."

"Oh, yes, of course; I forgot," said Hazel, who had read something of Eastern customs in the old days at home, but who had, as yet, failed to assimilate them with the domestic habits of her own husband's family. "I don't think she ought to eat so much opium, you know," she added, "I am sure it must be very bad for her, and it makes her so indolent."

Digitized by Google

"There is nothing for her to do, if she had the energy of fifty women," said Mahomed Ali, indifferently.

"Nothing for her to do," repeated Hazel, under her breath; "how hideously true that is. And when she is married, Ali, I suppose it will be the same then?"

"She will live in her father-in-law's house as you do, Hazel. She will make herself pleasant to her husband when he comes into the zenana, and she will play with her children so long as they are young enough to stay with her. And she will receive the ladies who come to visit her, and visit them in return. My dear Hazel, what would have them do, my mother and Kair Unissa? They have plenty of servants; there is no need for them to make their own clothes, or wash, or cook the food. The wives of the poorer Mahometans do all that, but not ladies of their rank."

"But she could read, and study, and improve her mind," said Hazel rather feebly, "as she is not allowed to go out of the zenana or see anything of the world."

"She cannot read," he answered. "Why should she take the trouble to learn when my father had one of the women expressly taught so that she might read aloud to her, and what would have been the use of her learning to write? If she wants to say anything to any of her friends she sends one of her servants with a message, or she goes to see them herself. She has a woman who can write for her, too, for that matter."

Then, to her own surprise, Hazel burst out crying. It was all so terrible, so hopeless! She had no words to clothe the feelings of pity, of anger, and of ruth that were surging up in her heart for poor beautiful Kair Unissa, and for all the thousands of women like her, whose lives must pass either in the dream apathy of opium, or in the conscious emptiness of a life that held nothing to make life worth the living.

Mahomed Ali led her to the nearest bench, in the shadow of one of the mango trees, and sat down by her, with his arm round her, saying nothing. Hysterical outbursts of tears are not unknown in the zenana, and he was neither frightened nor distressed to see his young wife weeping, though he loved her well enough in his own way.

As soon as she had recovered herself, which she did very quickly, he suggested that it was time to return to the house, to which she had neither courage nor spirit to object, feeling that her first attempt to regain her freedom had been a disastrous failure, which could only render any such attempts in the future more difficult and perhaps dangerous.

"Is your business finished, or are you going away again?" she asked, as they strolled slowly across the neglected lawn towards the house.

"I am sorry to say the work is not finished," he said, regretfully. "I only got away for a few hours just to see you for a moment. I shall have to go away again very soon; some time this morning, in fact."

"You will get me the key of the little door before you go?" she asked.

"Yes, certainly. We will go up the steps now, if you like, and see if the door is really locked."

The narrow little wooden door at the top of the steps was not locked, as, indeed, why should it be, seeing it only admitted to the secluded shades of the walled garden?

"I suppose there is no objection to my walking there whenever I like?" she asked.

"Certainly not, dear. The garden belongs to you, do whatever you like with it. Only I should not advise you to go there after dark, as there may be snakes among that thick undergrowth."

But Hazel was not afraid of snakes.

"In that case I had better have back my own shoes and stockings," she said. "My feet are quite sore already with just that little walk across the grass."

She heard him saying something about shoes to the servants when they got back to the terrace; and after he had breakfasted with her, and bid her a very tender adieu, the woman brought her a pretty pair of native slippers, embroidered in blue and gold, flat-soled and heelless, in which she could only shuffle about very slowly, but she smiled and nodded at the woman, and made a pretence of being quite pleased with them.

In the cool of the evening, sick of the tedious reading and singing and dancing, and the eternal chatter in a language she could not follow, she stepped carefully down the narrow little stairs and shuffled off into the compound. Looking up at the terrace she saw that Kair Unissa Begum had roused herself sufficiently to leave her rug, and was leaning over the balustrade watching her; one of her own women hovered uncertainly for a moment at the head of the stairs, then her native indolence conquered her, and she went back to the terrace.

Digitized by Google

The hush and solitude of the compound were inexpressibly soothing to Hazel's tired nerves, and she was able to think quietly, as she had not done all day. It was evident to her now that Mahomed Ali had never been away at all, and was probably at that very moment smoking among his odious companions in that hateful lower room. She made the tour of the garden; everywhere the wall was sound and high, too high for her to get over it by any effort of agility. There were mango trees here and there, growing very close to the wall, with branches that reached easily to the top, but, London-bred child that she was, she had never learnt the art of tree-climbing, and could even an adept in the art have climbed in the ridiculous full, flowing skirt and floating veil that made up the hated Mahometan costume? For one wild moment she thought of trying to learn to climb, practising in the early morning before anyone was about to see her from the house; but the thought of the torn and bedraggled condition in which she would present herself to the wondering eyes of her attendants on her return to the zenana stopped her, and she relinquished the idea with a sigh. But it returned to her again that evening as she stood before the open door of one of her wardrobes; her servants were too lazy and too careless to trouble themselves about the clothes it contained, they never opened the wardrobes, and they were not likely to miss anything out of them. "I will take a change of clothes," she said to herself, "and keep them down at the bottom of the garden, and put them on to climb in. I shall practise climbing one of those mango trees every morning; they don't look as if they were very difficult trees to climb, only it seems a pity that women should always have to wear such inconvenient clothes."

As she made her plan she had a delightful feeling that she was developing a really Oriental subtlety, and that soon she would be more than a match for all the cunning of that household put together.

It was easy enough for her in the early morning to slip down into the compound; she did not care in the least whether anyone saw her or not, since she had her husband's permission to use the compound. Under her usual dress she concealed a second skirt and short jacket—a veil was superfluous for gymnastic purposes. Guided by her new Oriental astuteness, she resolved to let some time elapse before her next attempt at escape, so as to disarm suspicion; and even if she found the climbing quite easy, not to scale the wall, at any rate, for several days, until her gaolers had got quite used to her spending a great part of the day in the compound. "I must, above all things, guard against being in too great a hurry," she told herself, as she shuffled across the garden in her flapping native slippers. "It would never do for me to fail again, and be caught trying to escape; they might lock me up in some place where I couldn't get out at all."

There was a certain amount of pleasant excitement about the adventure, but underlying it all was a very real fear. Hazel understood very well by this time that any amount of tyranny, and even crime, was possible in the zenana, where there was absolute immunity from any outside observation or any interference of the law. The women about her were not servants liable to be dismissed and to carry tales into a new family. They were slaves who were born into and died in the same master's service. No one outside the zenana knew that Mahomed Ali had an English wife, and if she were to disappear some day no enquiries would be made. Ali could write home to her father at any time and say she was dead. He would probably find it convenient in any case to do so if he meant to prevent her communicating with her family.

Pursuing her plan, she chose a mango tree conveniently near the wall at the bottom of the compound, and having removed her outer dress, she scrambled without much difficulty into one of the lower branches of the tree, and dragged herself up to a seat on a second higher branch. There she sat for a long time that morning, swinging her feet and getting accustomed to her unwonted elevation. "I will take just one branch every morning," she said, measuring with her eye the distance to the top of the wall. "The third branch from this will be high enough for me to reach the top of the wall."

Digitized by Google

The sluggish life in the zenana went on, with its reading and singing and smoking, its betel chewing and its opium eating. Kair Unissa lay for hours on her Persian rug in Hazel's room, without speaking or moving; the women came and went, and their chatter began by degrees to be a little less unintelligible to Hazel. Everything about the place was indescribably dirty and dusty; it seemed to be no one's business to sweep, or dust, or wash; the white cotton sheet spread on the floor turned from white to grey, and from grey to a grimier duskiness with the passage of many bare brown feet, but no one seemed to notice it.

Mahomed Ali was still absent, and every morning and evening Hazel climbed up into her tree and sat among the branches, till she could get up and down almost as easily as she could walk up the narrow stone steps to the terrace; but it was more than a week before she seated herself in triumph on the top of the wall and looked over on the other side. She saw a wide ditch, known as a "nullah," running along the foot of the wall, with a rough growth of prickly cactus and thorny creepers along the edge and running down the sides. There was a good deal of slimy, stagnant water in it, in which three or four fine buffaloes were wallowing. Hazel looked down upon them in profound dismay. Dirty water was bad, brambles and cactus were worse, but worst of all were the buffaloes. She had never seen these monsters before, and already they seemed to be looking at her malignantly with their little dull eyes. She had not meant to get down on that side to-day of course, she told herself, and most likely the creatures were not always there. When she did get over, she would have to bandage her feet with strips of rags or something, and hang by her hands from the top of the wall, and so drop down among the prickly things. Here her meditations were suddenly interrupted.

"Shall I bring a ladder for you to get down?" asked her husband's voice politely, from the compound under her feet. "I am afraid you will not be able to get down by yourself."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

AN ARM OF FLESH.

By BETH BANNESTER, B.A.

"IT seems to me perfectly clear that he meant the right thing, whatever he said. I don't see that we have any right to put such constructions on the minister's words when all his teaching, Sunday after Sunday, directly contradicts it. I think when we never make mistakes ourselves it will be time to throw the first stone at Mr. Magnus."

Little Miss Dennis's high voice rose higher, her fidgety hands worked with nervous excitement, and her spectacles were dimmed with indignant tears.

Mrs. McCackle had no reply ready. She surveyed Miss Dennis for a second or two with a stout and comfortable complacency which the latter found peculiarly irritating, and then said, addressing nobody in particular—

"Well! I'm glad to say I don't worship the minister."

Most of the ladies at the sewing-meeting felt that Mrs. McCackle had had the last word.

"No, indeed!" said little Miss Dennis to herself on the way home. "She doesn't worship anybody or anything but herself."

And then she took herself to task severely for her uncharitableness, and for the unchristian temper into which her righteous indignation had degenerated.

The sting of Mrs. McCackle's remark lay in its truth. Miss Dennis did really in a certain sense worship the minister. Of course, she did not acknowledge it to herself, and there were really great excuses for her. She had come to the quiet country town of Redstones, bruised and battered by the storms of existence, with the enthusiasms of youth behind her, and the sorest part of life's battle still in front of her. She had given her best energies and hard earnings in loving self-sacrifice for the sake of those nearest and dearest to her, only to see them fade away before her eyes, leaving her desolate. Her remaining income was barely sufficient for her own support, and in order to educate her sister's orphaned children, she must begin life anew. She had not the social gifts nor the charm of manner that brings friends to a woman's side. It was small wonder that the lonely woman lost her grip of the conventional creed in which she had been educated, and, forsaken apparently by God and man, drifted perilously near the rocks of despair. Then one never-to-be-forgotten morning she entered John Magnus's church, and he spoke words which touched her soul's deepest needs, and made her feel that the eternal realities were very near her, and the Everlasting Arms around her.

She sought him out privately and found that the sympathy which vibrated through his public utterances was no mere pulpit trick. John Magnus listened with grave interest and attention to her spiritual difficulties, and gave her the best guidance in his power. Furthermore, he took the trouble to win her confidence and penetrate beneath the reserved surface which had caused many, who might have helped her, to "pass by on the other side." Finding that she had a real gift for teaching little children, he sent her his two little boys, and his warm recommendation helped her to establish a small preparatory school, and partially to realise her unselfish ambition.

There was a halo round John Magnus's head when Miss Dennis's grateful eyes rested upon him. To her he was prophet, apostle, saint, a walking compendium of all the virtues, a philosopher of profoundest depth. His very failings were virtues in her eyes. His hot temper was manly indignation, his want of tact was his absolute sincerity. She took his part when he was obviously in the right with a fervour which was sometimes unnecessary; and when he was obviously in the wrong her fervour reached a degree of warmth which not unnaturally irritated other people. She held all his opinions as articles of faith, and modified her own to suit any apparent changes in his.

Digitized by Google

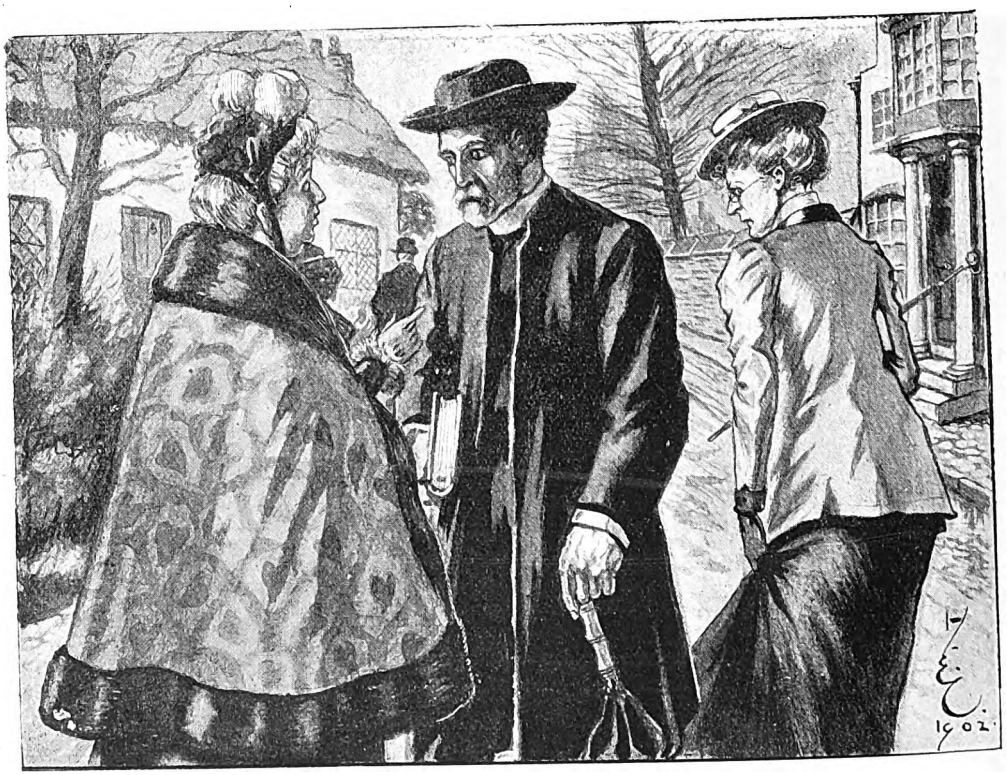
her eyes. One morning, on her way to church, she passed Mr. Magnus and Mrs. McCackle. The minister was later than usual and had been overtaken, much to his chagrin, by the voluble lady, who was pouring forth an excited flood of words. Neither of the two saw Miss Dennis, and, as she passed them, she overheard her own name. Instantly a host of uneasy suspicions assailed her. What could Mrs. McCackle be saying to the minister about her? Nothing that was any good, she



AS MISS DENNIS PASSED THEM SHE OVERHEARD HER OWN NAME.

She would have been shocked had she realised how dependent her religious life was upon his. She saw her God in a sense through John's eyes, and sought Him through John's prayers. Her keen sympathy detected his mood in every inflection of his voice, and there was not a moment in which she was not conscious of his presence. If he spoke to her at the close of the service, she went home in an elation which she not infrequently mistook for spiritual uplifting.

It was some time before she discovered the spiritual shallows into which she had drifted. A trifling circumstance opened was quite sure. And would Mr. Magnus believe it? Oh, if she only knew what it was all about!

The tumult in Miss Dennis's mind lasted long after she entered her pew. She did not know what the opening hymn was, and found with a start at the end of the first prayer that she had not joined in a single petition. When the chant began, she forced herself with a great effort to attend to the words, and suddenly their message reached her: "I shall not be moved," sang the blended voices with sweet iteration, "I shall not be greatly moved."

Digitized by Google

The old words came home to Miss Dennis with a force which made them wholly new. "'Not be greatly moved!' How dare David, or any other man in this world of trouble and unrest and backbiting tongues, say that he should not be greatly moved?" And then her eyes wandered back to the beginning of the Psalm, and she read there the key to the words of triumph.

"Truly my soul waiteth upon God. . . He only is my Rock!"

In a flash she saw how she had insensibly transferred her trust from the Rock of Ages to an arm of flesh, and that a fellow mortal's approval was dearer than the smile of God. The discovery brought her no consolation, for she could not face the pain, which she knew a radical change in her spiritual and mental attitude would involve. She was wrong, she knew, but she did not want to change. Her weary life had been one series of upheavals and uprootings, a snapping of tie after tie. How could she bear another earthquake? She went home profoundly wretched, for it seemed to her that, in spite of the spiritual experience which an hour or two ago she had believed to be so real and deep, John Magnus's friendship meant more to her than her Creator's. And the worst part of it was that she could not wish it to be otherwise.

On the following Tuesday, she found out, through Mrs. McCackle's own gossip, the subject of that lady's conversation with the minister. The finances of the Young People's Guild, of which Miss Dennis was honorary treasurer, were in an unsatisfactory condition, and Mrs. McCackle was sure that Miss Dennis's unbusiness-like ways were at the root of it all. There was, as usual, just enough truth in these indictments to pierce a joint in the victim's harness. The poor little treasurer had been over-worked and over-worried of late, and had on several occasions neglected to send receipts for subscriptions and contributions till some days after they had reached her.

On Sunday, Mr. Magnus had asked the treasurers of the different societies connected with the church to meet him in the church-parlour on the following Thursday, and give in their accounts for the year. Miss Dennis promptly concluded that this request was owing to Mrs. McCackle's representations, with which as a matter of fact it had nothing to do. On Thursday evening she marched into the church-parlour, with the accounts neatly balanced on a sheet of foolscap, a small bag of money, and a note, in which she offered to resign if the manner in which she had discharged her duties did not satisfy the society's members. She laid these on the minister's desk and then made a bolt for the door, feeling perilously near tears, and being conscious that Mrs. McCackle's eye was upon her. Down in her heart she knew that Mr. Magnus would side with her and refuse to accept her resignation. Still she endured much inward agitation for the rest of the evening.

Meanwhile the items of her accounts were being read by the secretary to a committee-meeting of the Guild. All seemed satisfactory, but just as John Magnus had cleared his throat and begun, "All in favour of these accounts being passed, signify——," one of the vice-presidents rose and begged to say a few words. He had heard many complaints as to the dilatory way in which the society's business was conducted, but he would have said nothing had he not been personally affected. He had sent Miss Dennis postal orders to the amount of two pounds ten, as a subscription to the Guild, exactly twelve days ago. He had received no acknowledgment, and his subscription was not included in the list just read out.

There was a moment's dead silence. John Magnus began to think Miss Dennis must really be incapable of managing money matters, and that her resignation had better be accepted. Then a very youthful member of the committee, delighted to have a chance of hearing his own voice, got up, and expatiated pompously on the need of punctilious accuracy in the discharge of public duties, asking what guarantee had the committee that other sums, having reached the pocket of a private individual, had not stayed there?

The minister shut the youngster up at this point with a contempt which made him writhe, and took up his own parable. There could be no question, he said, as to the bona fides of Miss Dennis, but she had so many private duties that in his opinion she ought not to be called upon to undertake public ones. She had herself already recognised this, and he thought they should accept her resignation and appoint some person with more leisure.

Digitized by Google

A more or less garbled account of the proceedings was taken round to Miss Dennis, with the result that she called upon the minister late at night in a very excited frame of mind, when he was wearied out with four consecutive meetings. She was absolutely certain that she had never received that money, but she inconsistently insisted on paying it into the funds. It had been lost in the post she supposed. Why had not the man who sent it made enquiries at once? Why had not ———?

And then John Magnus had to remind her that in several cases the receipts had been delayed. The fact that he was politely anxious to get rid of her dawned upon her comprehension, and she went home firmly convinced that he thought she had really received that letter, and almost certain that he suspected her of an intention to embezzle two pounds ten shillings. She cried herself to sleep that night, and many nights after, for her enquiries of the postal authorities brought no trace of the missing letter. No one suspected the anguish into which the affair had plunged the lonely, reserved little woman, and as the missing sum had been made good, the matter dropped entirely from most people's minds.

There was small chance of anything dropping from Miss Dennis's mind when it was once established there. The whole trend of her monotonous life was towards keeping her in her groove. She would have thought it monstrous selfishness to spend money on a holiday, or even on a day's excursion. And almost everything that happened to her for some months after the incident of the letter, tended to increase the painful colouring of her thoughts, and accentuate her tendency to nervous apprehension and melancholy brooding. Her pupils dropped off, the nephew and niece for whom she had done so much proved wilful and ungrateful, and her own strength was slowly giving way under the long strain of work and anxiety.

No one guessed the struggle and the anguish that lay beneath the little woman's quiet exterior. She made no difference in her outward life, but the root of bitterness within her turned everything to gall. Everything that had helped and cheered her in the past was now fraught with pain. In every religious service there were dagger-pricks to probe her aching sore. John Magnus rarely preached without cutting his sensitive hearer to the quick, and even his prayers not infrequently seemed full of injustice to herself.

Many times she was tempted to write a letter resigning her church-membership, but a sense of responsibility to others held her back. She had a Sunday-school class, how could she set her scholars such an example? Pride whispered often —"Give up the class." But here was an unmistakable issue of right and wrong. Such an act, she saw clearly, would have been a sacrifice at the altar of pride and selfishness. She had no right to refrain from doing good because others thought she had done evil. So she kept her class, and perhaps this religious duty, though it helped to wear out her physical powers, kept her mentally from despair and insanity. For though her pain seemed often to conquer her, she fought it, and fought it bravely too.

Thus the slow years dragged on, and each seemed to tighten the chains which her circumstances and her own temperament had wound around her. Her thoughts had run in a circle so long that they seemed incapable of taking a fresh direction. The one person who could have diverted them into healthier channels rarely spoke to her, except to give a passing "good-day." For she studiously avoided the minister, and he, having no clue to the workings of a temperament so different from his own, put this down to some disaffection towards himself, and made no effort to break through her reserve.

One afternoon, more than five years after the occurrence which had poisoned the wells of her happiness, the postman rang after his customary knock and asked to see Miss Dennis.

"A rum go, ma'am, this!" he remarked. "Here's a letter for yer, what must have been posted more nor five years since. You see," he went on, as Miss Dennis took the letter in her white and trembling hands, "when our new front was made, the letter-box at the side was closed and we had a new one in the front. This here letter must have been posted just afore the box was cleared for the last time, and them as cleared it never saw as how a letter had slipped into the woodwork, which was rotten, and stuck. There's some more alterations going on, and that's how it's been found. I reckon it 'll be in the papers."

Digitized by Google

It seemed ages to Miss Dennis before she could get rid of the man, and shut herself up in her room with the precious letter. By some mysterious intuition she had known what it was the very moment she heard the postman's ring. An overpowering rush of gratitude filled her soul. By and by she managed to make herself a cup of tea to steady her trembling nerves, and then set off to John Magnus's house. On the way her imagination, long unused to joyous flights, tried to picture how he would receive her intelligence. Words of self-reproach would rise to his lips, she knew. He would divine in an instant all that she had suffered unjustly. Perhaps he would feel the matter was too deep for words, and would press her hand in speechless sympathy. Or, better still, he would turn to her with some holy text of trust, and triumph, echoed from some ancient saint who had found that God does, indeed, plead the cause of the innocent, and though the vision of His justice tarry, it comes at last.

Her ring at the bell sounded just as John had reached home after a prolonged committee meeting. He had arranged to start the next morning for a much needed holiday, and was looking up a few books and manuscripts to take with him. He was a good and thoroughly sincere man, but he was very human, and just then he was feeling worn out and irritated.

"Whoever can that be?" he asked his wife. "The congregation are not all going to call this afternoon, I hope. Really, my people might be a little more considerate. And I have another committee meeting this evening! I am not made of cast-iron."

"I'll run down and see," said Mrs. Magnus. She came back in a few seconds.

"It's Miss Dennis, John," she announced. "I asked if I should do, and said you were busy, but she wants to see you."

John strode downstairs in an annoyed mood. "I fear I can only give you five minutes, Miss Dennis," he said pleasantly enough, yet with a certain coolness in his intonation.

"HERE'S A LETTER THAT MUST HAVE BEEN POSTED FIVE YEARS SINCE," HE REMARKED.

Somehow Miss Dennis's joyous confidence faded away before the tone.

"Mr. Magnus," she began plunging into the subject without preamble in her nervousness, "Mr. Magnus, the letter that was posted to me five years ago has reached me at last. It had stuck in the post-box."

John looked hopelessly puzzled. He was in no mood for guessing riddles.

"Mr. Tennant's letter, I mean," said Miss Dennis. "The subscription of two pounds ten which he sent to the Guild, and of which I gave no account because it never reached me."

Digitized by Google

"I am afraid I scarcely follow——" began John.

And then Miss Dennis looked into his face, and read there that he had entirely forgotten the whole matter. Herself and her poor little heart-burnings, which had loomed so large before her own eyes, were of so little moment in his that he had not even remembered. She would have burst into a passion of tears if another visitor had not been ushered in at that moment. That saved her self-possession.

"It's all right, Mr. Magnus," she faltered. "I made a mistake. I thought you would remember, that's all."

She was out of the room before he could frame a reply, and when the front door closed upon her, she fled like a wounded animal.

"What did you say to Miss Dennis, John?" asked his wife later on. "She went by the dining-room window with a face like a ghost."

"I couldn't make her out," said John uneasily. "She expected me to know all about some letter in connection with the Guild. I seem to have a vague memory of there having been some complaint about the way things were managed when she was secretary—or treasurer, I forget which. But what it was all about, I haven't a notion."

He took a turn to the window, and stood looking out.

"Well," he added, a moment later. "I'll call and see her on my way home from the meeting. It will make me late, but I shall have her off my conscience."

But on the way home from the meeting, Mr. Magnus was summoned to see a dying man, and Miss Dennis did not enter his thoughts again till he was in the train, and half-way to his destination. He felt vexed to have forgotten her. Should he write to her? No, he would call and have a chat next month after his return.

* * * * *

"You'll be sorry to hear that poor Miss Dennis was taken last night," said the senior deacon, the day after John's return.

John started guiltily.

"Dear me, I am very grieved! Do you know anything about it?"

"Not much. She had been ill for a month, but I only heard of it the day before yesterday. I went to see her, but she could hardly talk at all. She had written something on a scrap of paper, and begged me to give it to you. It was a text she wanted you to preach from, she said. The woman who was with her told me she had had some letter a month ago which had upset her, and she had never held her head up since."

On the paper handed to John was written:—"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace WHOSE MIND IS STAYED ON THEE."

The last clause was deeply underscored. And underneath was another sentence of which John could only make out three words:—"Never until now."

He pondered painfully awhile, then suddenly remembering that Miss Dennis had named the sender of the mysterious letter to which she had alluded, he sought him out, and obtained sufficient light on the subject to make its rough outlines clear to him. He began to see that the drama enacted in this obscure life was typical of the struggle in which each human soul must be victor before it can realise the end of its being. The whole pathos of the lonely woman's agony he could not fathom, but he understood enough to bring a new note into his preaching on the following Sunday. There was an undertone of living sympathy which had been somewhat lacking in his recent utterances, a probing of new depths of human experience, a more forceful presentation of the Divine helpfulness and strength. He received quite a budget of letters during the ensuing week, thanking him for blessing received through that sermon. Perhaps if Miss Dennis could have read them, she would have felt that her silent years of pain were, after all, worth while.

And yet is it necessary to seek even so far for the inner meaning of her struggle? Who shall appraise the value of a single jewel in the Eternal Crown? Who shall limit the pains that the Heavenly Potter will take lest even one of His vessels be flawed or imperfect? Who shall set bounds to the dealings of the Eternal Patience with each individual soul, lest being made for infinite destinies, it should content itself with the finite?

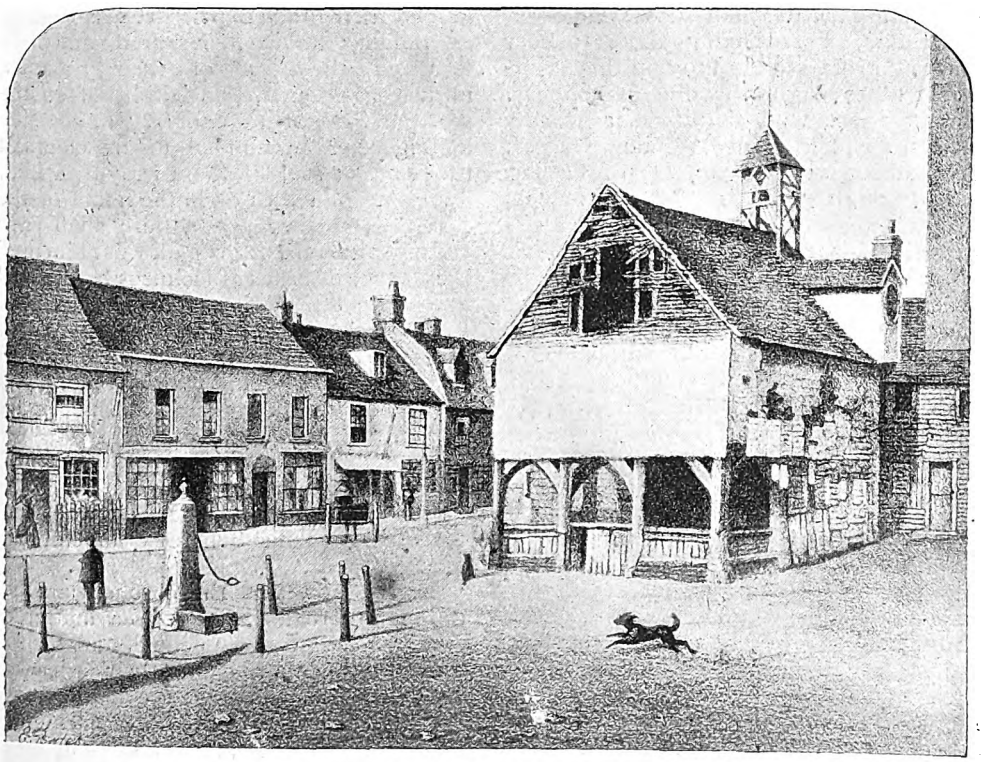
For we have not yet outgrown the simple wisdom of Augustine:—

"Thou hast made us for Thyself, and the heart never resteth till it finds its rest in Thee."

Digitized by Google

A PECULIAR PEOPLE.*

AMONGST the 274 sects described in a page of Whitaker's Almanack, there is one rejoicing in the name of Peculiar People. To the general public, they are mostly known, if known at all, as defendants in trials for manslaughter, for again and again, accused of neglecting to provide proper medical attendance for their children, they have had to take their trial on that charge. It is not, however, generally known that under this name there assemble Sunday by Sunday many hundreds of people, and that since 1837 their peculiar belief has been a force in the hearts and lives of great numbers in Essex.



ROCHFORD OLD MARKET PLACE, IN WHICH BANYARD USED TO PREACH.

It has been said that the real test of any movement being divinely ordained is the way it stands the three stages of development accompanying every great movement. Firstly, that its beginning is blessed; secondly, that it surmounts a persecution; thirdly, that it survives internal dissensions. If this be true, then the Peculiars answer to the description.

From the commencement the blessing of God seems to have attended their preachings; rough lives have been softened and bad ones purified. Of persecution they have had more than enough, but they have survived the ordeal, and as for internal strife, it has been and is sharp and bitter, but they still stand.

A few words as to their history. First, as to their origin. As with many other religious movements, their original connection with the Established Church can be distinctly traced. In 1834 there laboured in the Isle of Man a minister of that Church, by name Atkin, who, detesting the formalities and restraints he found in the services of the Establishment, imitated the example of Wesley and of many others and

* Copyright. All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

seceded. He travelled the length and breadth of the country, occupying the pulpits of Dissenters in many villages and towns, and laying emphasis in his sermons on two cardinal points of doctrine. First, that a man could know that his sins were perfectly forgiven; and secondly, that once forgiven, there was all-sufficient grace to keep him perfectly holy. These doctrines of perfect assurance and perfect holiness not finding much acceptance, Mr. Atkin withdrew from every other sect and went forth with his message to men at large. In the open street or field, wherever, in short, he could find an audience, he preached these doctrines. Some time later he hired a place in White's Row, Holborn, in London, where many came to hear him, and professed both to find this assurance and to begin this life of holiness. Among those who came was a worthy hat-block maker, named William Bridges. He had been a Wesleyan local preacher, and although "locals" as a rule most rarely discover the virtues in anyone else's preaching, he found something in Atkin's which his own had lacked. This experience of his he related to James Banyard, a Wesleyan local preacher in Essex, who happened to be staying with him. Persuaded to go and hear Atkin, Banyard also came under his influence, and was convinced how utterly wanting he had been, both in belief and the expression of it. Pathetically, he said to Bridges:

"How can I go home and tell my congregation I have had no religion?"

But he did. He returned to Rochford and preached these doctrines of Assurance and Holiness to people who thought both ideas exaggerations, and esteemed Banyard's excitement about them as sheer craziness. The result was that Banyard found no home in Wesleyanism—at any rate, as it existed in Rochford. Nothing daunted, he started services at his own little dwelling in West Street in that town, and outside he preached in Rochford Market Place.

Banyard then extended his efforts to Stambridge, Great Wakering, and Prittlewell, then little more than a village, but which now includes the populous borough of Southend-on-Sea. The settled worshippers who gathered with Banyard were but few at first, but from the beginning his words seemed to have a wonderful power. Snatching all the time he could from his daily labour, he studied to do the work of an evangelist, and steadily gained adherents amongst the agricultural labourers.

Persecution did its best to frighten them. Solid arguments in the shape of dead cats, pails of filth, rotten eggs, were plied against them—but in vain. The uproar was but a free advertisement, and as their reputation spread, people came from miles around to hear the gospel according to Banyard. In about two years they formed in Rochford their first church. This church first met in Union Lane, Rochford, but at last they obtained the old barracks at Rochford, and, demolishing the partitions of three rooms, gained their first chapel. It was capable of holding about a hundred, and here occurred the first of their so-called miracles. Founding their belief on the word of St. James's epistle, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up," they brought cases of sickness before God in open meeting with astounding results. From this arose a settled belief amongst them in the doctrine of "laying on of hands upon the sick," which became with them a third point of doctrine necessary for all Peculiars to accept.

For many years this doctrine met with a rigorous opposition at the hands of the civil power, and many a Peculiar has had to witness to his belief by an enforced imprisonment.

Lately, however, the coroners are beginning to realise that it is a matter of conscience with these people, and, for the most part, while they and their juries feel as strongly as ever over the matter, they do not proceed to extremities. There is no doubt, moreover, from numerous testimonies, that very striking instances of cures have occurred among them, many obstinate and desperate cases have been relieved. Whether the real explanation is the extraordinary power of mind over matter, and that the enthusiasm of faith has exerted this power of mind in their cases must be left. The facts are as they are stated and cannot be gainsaid, however they may be explained.

Side by side with the occurrence of these phenomenal therapeutics the people began to increase, and it was evident that they were but at the beginning of a movement, the end of which they could not see. They proceeded to give their church a constitution. Feeling that Banyard was a man raised up to be their founder and leader, they ordained him first Bishop of their church. The account of the ceremony is very interesting.

Digitized by Google

"In 1852," runs the story, "they concluded to make four bishops, and chose the following: James Banyard, Samuel Harrod, David Handley, and John Thorogood. Thereupon the last three laid their hands upon James Banyard, and in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, designated him their bishop. He then in turn ordained the other three."

Under their guidance a brisk work was carried on, and causes established in many directions. In three years, however, from the time of Banyard's elevation to the episcopate, came the great split, in which the head and front of the offending was the shoemaker-bishop himself. Having a child taken ill he sought the aid of the doctor, and from that time forth began to advise using means, as well as relying on the power of believing prayer. Most of his people concluded to depose him from his bishopric, but his chapel was his own; so they took away his authority and left him the place. A few stood by him, and he remained preaching to them for a few years, till his arguments about disease were silenced by disease itself hushing his voice in death. Whatever may have been his mistakes, there is no doubt that when he died "a light was put out." The district in which he lived and laboured was one which greatly needed just such a stirring-up as he was used to give. The strange thing is that such a man should have been the instrument. One who knew him well and appreciated him greatly thus speaks of him: "He was the ugliest man I ever saw. As a young man he had been guilty of all manner of tomfoolery, pulling out his lips like a horse's mouth, till he had deformed himself." With a voice like thunder, with as firm a belief in his heaven-sent mission as any budding ritualistic curate, and couching his message in the homely phrases which were all he understood—his words, delivered with intense earnestness, carried conviction into the hearts of many. Had they not heard it, in all probability some of them would have received conviction of another stamp. Not a few of the old inhabitants can still be found who believe that Rochford had the day of visitation when James Banyard lived, and that it closed when he died.

The spirit of the movement is, however, stronger than ever, and sturdy causes have been, and are, maintained at Woolwich and Upchurch in Kent; but it is chiefly in Essex that it has made itself felt, chapels existing at Southend, Daws Heath, Grays, Canning Town, Great Wakering, Steeple Tillingham, Witham, Baddow, Stanford, Woodham Ferris, Herongate, Stanway, Ramsden Heath, and Rochford, while in London there have been several causes, which are now united in one at Bath-street, Kennington. It is not long since that those in full membership with them were reckoned at about 1,500, but this, of course, leaves out many who frequently attend and come under the strong influence of their preachings.

It is certainly a distinct type of character which is fostered amongst them. Meeting any of them as they wend their way to their chapels, one could tell them at a glance. The women are severely neat in their dress, modest and unassuming in appearance; the men, always respectable, steady, sober specimens of the labouring class. But it is their curiously thoughtful and somewhat sanctimonious expression of face which stamps them most.

Of the character they bear it is impossible to speak too highly. Several farmers have assured the writer that, for faithfulness in work and reliability, their men who were Peculiars stood head and shoulders above the rest

So very striking, too, is the effect of their home life and training upon their children that one of Her late Majesty's inspectors stated their intelligence to be so much greater than the average that examining them was like going from the children of an agricultural district to those of a London board-school. Whether the increased advantages of education which their children now receive will tend to modify the literalism of their belief in Scripture, bringing the leaven of rationalism into their midst, remains to be seen. But, meanwhile, it is an indisputable fact that the little stream which took its rise in Banyard's cottage in Rochford is widening in many places, and may even yet become a mighty river.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A MODERN ESDRAS.*

By WOLFE STREET.

These papers are confessedly an imitation of the 2nd Book of Esdras in the Apocrypha.

CHAPTER I.

IN the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and ninety-seven I was in London and lay troubled on my bed. That day in crowded city streets the thronging thousands of my brother men had stirred within me thoughts too deep for words. And vexed at heart was I at sight of younger men, brow-lined with care, and grey beyond their years, and older men whose time to rest had surely come, still dragging on. That night I wandered on for hours through the great City's thoroughfares, and everywhere while Sin revealed its power, Humanity made light of God. While tapering spires pointed aloft, yet in the street beneath, lost men and women bargained over sin.

"Where—where is God?" I cried. "He stays not Toil—prevents not Sin: where, where is God?" And from my heart there came a whisper: "How can there be a God? There is no God! no God! NO GOD!"

. . . .

With weary steps and sinking heart I sought my home for rest, and sought in vain. At last I rose in maddest frenzy and shrieked into the darkness: "God! God! If God there be? speak to me!—think to me!—tell me some reason why men needs must labour, why Sin is not crushed!"

And more in mercy to my fellows than myself, God sent me an Interpreter, whose name was Uriel. "Fear not to speak!" he cried, "and I will answer. And that thou learnest tell thy fellow-men."

"O my lord!" I hastened to say, "why must men earn the means to live by travail sore and sweat of brow?"

"Thou thinkest this is a curse," he answered. "Thou thinkest wrongly! Labour, which wins men food, yields also health and strength. God joined together Work and Happiness, and none can sunder them. Yet who would work of their own will unspurred by need? Need which exists on their account, for idle life is full of danger, and leaves men weak in Body, Mind, and Will. Behold!"

He waved his hand; and there I saw—in an abode of wealth, supported upon cushions—the form of one who should have been a man. His brow was lofty, and his shoulders broad; but in his eyes there burned devouring fires, and discontent was stamped upon his face. In querulous tones he spake the nurse, who soothed the man as though he were an infant.

"Seest thou, Esdras," Uriel said, "the fruits of idle life? This man is not afflicted in his body, but his mind. He is but sick in fancy. Upon excitement has he lived for years, and turning Night to Day, has surfeited with Women, Wine and Play; until at last his nature, overtaxed, deludes him into fancied illness. Nothing can ever cure him but God's remedy of Work.

"Esdras, the power is granted thee to pierce that outer shell, to seek the mighty Will which should be there!"

I gazed, and lo! within the man, beneath Life's hidden roots there crouched a tiny thing almost too small to see.

"Beholdest thou that dwarf?" asked Uriel. "Within that man, it ever lacked the use by which alone its stature could

* Copyright in United States. T. Y. Crowell & Co., Boston.

Digitized by Google

increase. Effort is Nature's law. It has no other way to strengthen powers of Mind and Will. And if Men take no effort, then they gain not growth. Work is the Servant of Mankind."

Then answered I and said, "My lord, this was but one of my troubled thoughts, and a small one, but my mind is heavy more by reason of men's Sin than men's Labour. Tell me, could not He who knew that which would come to pass, and who was powerful to prevent it, so have fashioned human hearts that Sin they could not? I do not mean it ill unto my lord, but if God so made men that Sin they could, can He, in justice, blame them when they do?"

"Thy question has gone far," he said, but farther must thou go! Before thou askest why men were empowered to Sin thou shouldst have questioned whether in itself the power to Sin need be a curse. I tell thee it is not! Knowest thou that to resist temptation leaves men the stronger for the battle? Wouldst thou have had men so created that they need not fight?"

I answered humbly: "I would have had them but inclined to choose the higher things and good."

"Thou foolish one!" he said. "How can there be these higher things without things lower, or Good without a Better and a Best? Sin is to choose the Lower when there is a Higher, to choose the Good in presence of a Better, or Better when there is a Best."

"But," I answered, "why was I not so made that I should always choose the higher, and evermore climb up? God has made other things which cannot disobey; governed by law, by law they move! No man heard yet of stars which would not shine. Why was I not like them?"

"It is thy glory that thou are not like! Would'st thou be like to a machine, producing without partnership in what it has produced? To grieve not over Sin like thee, and never to rejoice at Victory? Wouldst thou miss the last to escape the first, and sooner than have Struggle possible, feel nothing and nothing know?"

"Thou makest, then, SIN necessary in God's great Scheme?" I boldly asked; for I should have been right glad to shift the evil on shoulders other than my own.

"Nay, O man, the power to Sin is necessary, but that is different; that power might well have started men upon an upward course; if they have let it but begin their falling, the burden of result is theirs. Seest thou, O Esdras, that hand of thine? Make with it a span!"

And I measured with it a hand's breadth.

Then said he unto me, "Behold! for while that tiny span of goodness were left for thee to pass, to reach the perfect holiness of God, and over it thou didst refuse to cross, thou wouldest Sin. Therefore, how couldst thou be without the possibility of falls, unless God made thee like to a machine? O man! I tell thee, rather would I have the power to sin, than only to be capable of helpless acts. For thine own sake thou hast the power to utter yea as well as nay, and nay as well as yea. That is thy character's foundation, and places thee as partner unto Him who ever makes for Right. I know not in the Universe a greater gift than power to overcome—an idle gift without the opportunity of use. The power to fall is but the underside of power to climb—it has been so from all Eternity, and will be so through all Eternity. That power is given men for their sakes alone; it is their chiefest glory. Birds in the air by law must fly; fish in the sea by law must swin; sun, moon, and stars by law must shine; but men can climb by Will. Behold!"

And in an instant the walls around my room were sundered, and in the mists I saw another scene. Alone, a man was sitting reading, but ever and anon he closed the book and seemed to think. Now he half left his chair, now he sat down again, with lips that moved as though in prayer. Again he took the book, again he laid it down, and this time rising, crossed the room, and drew from a recess a vessel holding wine. Brightly glittered the glass in the glancing light as he poured the ruby liquor. Raising it to his lips, some inward thought arrested him; with trembling hands he set it down. Red as the wine the blood crimsoned his face, swelling the veins therein, as though 'twould burst them, showing me his inward agony of soul. Yet, though his longing for the wine rioted in him, he returned it to the vessel and departed; and as he went he cried, "Thank God, I've won! I've won!" while radiance such as shone on Moses' face of old gleamed upon his.

Digitized by Google

"That is how men climb," said Uriel unto me. "Wouldst thou alter it? 'Blessed is he that overcometh!'"

And I was comforted.

CHAPTER II.

It was the glorious summer-time, which brightens Man's existence in London's grimy city as in the verdant fields.

Serving as breathing-spaces for the City's life, a few green plots remain, where Nature has full scope, and there she woos the multitude from crowded tenement and slum and alley to see her subtle skill in tree and flower and grass.

. . . . .

In the cool hours of evening I walked alone beneath the leafy avenues of London's west-end park. Suddenly, I saw, gathered around a vacant space of ground near to the Marble Arch, some little groups of men. Drawing near, I listened, and found them speaking, with exceeding bitterness, against the Great Creator and His Word. One man arraigned the justice of my God in calling out a chosen people in Abraham of old. "Who are the Jews," said he, "more than another nation? And who was Father Abraham that God should pass all in the world and speak to him alone. I hate favouritism amongst men—still more in God." And the crowd cheered and laughed.

I WALKED AWAY SEEING CLEARLY THAT MANY DOUBTED THAT THE ALMIGHTY HAD SPOKEN UNTO MEN!

Digitized by Google

Another made the object of his sneers the character and ways of ancient men to whom God spoke.

"Was not Noah a drunkard, Abram a liar, Jacob a deceiver and a thief, and David an adulterer and murderer? Yet, with these men God bore, and held most intimate communion. If I believed in God I'd seek a much more moral God than this." And again the crowd cheered.

And yet another rose to tell the story of his doubt. About this man was nothing coarse. Calmly he said he found it hard to think that human beings like himself were enabled to foresee events of history; nor was he able to believe that God could crowd Himself in human form like that of Jesus Christ.

Then a fourth man leaped in excitement on the stand, and loudly asked: "If Jesus of Nazareth is the Saviour of Mankind, why did he come so late?"

And again the crowd cheered, and loudly laughed.

. . . . .

Sadly I walked away. Clearly I saw that many doubted that the Almighty had spoken unto men, nor knew I how to make the matter plain. Communing with my soul in watches of the night, my spirit then waxed heavy. So I cried aloud to the Great Spirit to make these matters clear to me.

And Uriel came again, and said: "The things which seem opposed to one another have but arisen on account of men, the level where they stand, the limits of their minds. The book thou thinkest the revelation of God, is but His revelation unto men. Seek to explain thy nature to thy little child! Can he understand thy mind or heed thy general speech? It is a long way down from thee to him, it is farther from God to thee. But once, in the childhood of the world it was farther down to men than it is now to thee. In place of God at first, now put thyself. Seek to reveal thyself to men. The very nature of Mankind will limit thee. What canst thou say that they will comprehend? Speak to thy child in foreign tongue, how will he understand? Tell him of things beyond his mind, how will he understand? Thou must descend to him to meet, and like a child converse. Yet, when a man, if one should say to him, 'Thus said thy father to thee once,' he might reply, astonished, 'How could so wise a father yet have spoken simple things like these?' The men who murmur now at things once spoken in the long ago, do as that man would do. They but forget there was a time when men as children thought, as children spake, as children lived, and books of what God said and did to them, and bore with from them, are but children's books.

"He taught them by toy signs of truth. Ever the rainbow had been there. God used it as sign of mercy, for 'twas colour on a cloud. And dying plants and animals were used as signs of that decay which SIN should bring. The ravages of fire caused by the lightning's play were known before to every desert wanderer. But to unite the thought of them with wrath 'gainst sin was witnessed first at Sodom, and promise of deliverance to the city, for sake of righteous men within, made but the lesson clearer still. Dost thou understand, O Son of Man?"

"Yea, my lord," I answered humbly.

And Uriel continued, saying: "The Lord has used the childish instincts of Mankind to shape the story of their fuller growth. The wandering spirit in Abram of old was used to lead him from his country; and then the first great revelation was bestowed that there are not gods many—there is One alone.

"In times of silent pondering, in solitude which could be felt, in visions of the night, the Greater Spirit showed the human the little it could grasp.

"In the grey dawn of truth the family ambition was used to stimulate the faith of Abraham; and to instruct him in the majesty of God, God called Himself 'Most High.' Learn by his heart's belief that God (whose Name is Love) wished Isaac for a victim, when He but asked his dedication—how little he knew God."

"But, my lord!" I cried, "why came this revelation to Abram alone? Was not the whole earth the Lord's and they who dwelt therein?"

"How canst thou use a lever, without first finding some one spot on which to make it bear?" he answered. "Yet to thee that spot is not more precious than the rest. 'Tis for the rest thou does but use that portion first. So of necessity, one had to be the first, and whether Abram or another, only was he chosen, to bless in him the nations of the earth. For his own sake God has called no man, but for the sake of ALL. No respecter of persons is thy God! Abram was called for his family, his family for the tribes, the tribes for the nation, and the nation for the world.

Digitized by Google

As God found men, so He spoke to them, likening the truth to what they knew. He said to them "I am not this, I am like that! As men were able to receive, so He increased his revelation. I tell thee, the knowledge God has given of His will has grown, like to the power of men to whom 'twas given."

"And yet, my lord, it seemeth strange to me that instruments in which so many flaws are seen were chosen by a Holy God."

"If God had waited for more perfect messengers," the Angel said, "then would those truths which now have been revealed remain unspoken to this day. To Man through men must revelation come, and never yet was one found perfect. Nor is it right that those who hear the message should fix their gaze upon the imperfections only of the messengers. Come with me now, and I will show thee!"

And in my dream he carried me to where a river, swollen by the rains, had overrun its banks, and made the neighbouring fields a dismal swamp.

"Now map for me that river's course!" he cried.

"My lord, I am not able while 'tis thus. I need to see its usual steady flow ere I can judge its course."

"Why, then, should any judge the course of human life at moments when the floods are out? Watch but the general tenour of their way, and lo! the current of their life is seen to set towards Right."

Again he bore me to a rugged scene where mountainous ambitions strove with each other for pre-eminence on Earth. Peak rose on peak in rivalry of stature. I stood far, far above the level of the sea, and yet the little mount beneath my feet was dwarfed by grandeur of comparison.

Once more he carried me in spirit unto a plain, where, in the midst, a solitary hill arose, and set me down upon it. It was no higher than the one I left, but there beneath me the level country stretched, and over it I seemed exalted, for nothing towered above me.

Then spake the Angel unto me: "As in the plain that little hill seems great, so many a paltry life seems great in its surroundings. And as in mountain grandeur the hill seemed insignificant, so seem those lives when measured by far greater life and aim.

"The world's grey fathers were set within a plain. Judge them by measure of the time in which they lived; imperfect though they are, they seem the loftiest of the Sons of Men!"

. . . . .

Thus, one by one, my doubts were vanishing, but the more light I gained the more I craved. So, growing bolder, I entreated: "Let me but ask my lord one thing! How were the holy prophets given their sight of things to come?"

"That thou canst not know," he answered. "I cannot liken it to anything on earth. But even as on earth the will of one can overpower another by laying on of hands, to make him see the things he would not see without, so could it be with God. There is no man enabled to use power which God who gave it cannot use Himself. And if one man has power to put his spirit on another, so has thy God the power. These men were overcome by the Will of God, until they saw and spake of things beyond their own. I cannot tell thee more, thou couldst not understand."

Then said I humbly: "Is the mystery of God dwelling in Jesus beyond the servant of my lord also? Forgive me if I err, but never could I understand how Being Infinite could enter Human form and therein dwell."

A moment Uriel regarded me, and then he answered: "Take up thy pen and write a letter to thy dearest friend. Say what thou pleasest, but let it be thy mind as fully as thou canst."

With wonder I obeyed, and when the script was finished, Uriel said: "Now seal it in an envelope!" which being done, he then continued. "Seest thou not this parable? Within that envelope, upon that sheet of paper, thy mind is manifest unto another. Yet thou remainest as thyself. Is it then more mysterious that God should clothe his thought in human form and action, and yet remain Himself? Christ is the Thought of God, Jesus the human handwriting in which that Thought has come to thee.

"And as the savage would wonder at thy writing so wonderest thou at God's."

. . . . .

Digitized by Google

Long time I marvelled at the folly which had often done the very thing I thought so difficult for God, and yet perceived it not. Then I entreated: "If it be not too bold a question on my part, suffer thy servant, in all humility, to ask thee why the Saviour of Mankind came not here before. The power of SIN was present, why not the power to save?"

"Give me thy whole attention, and I will seek to show thee!" answered Uriel. "Thou speakest but as if to save men from their sins was sum and substance of the mission of the Christ. Yet, said He not Himself He came to give men Life and more abundantly? Until He came they were not ready to receive that gift. The World was being schooled until it came of age to enter into its inheritance. The sense of Art, the sense of Justice, the sense of Right and Wrong had each to be developed to their full. God called the Greek to do the first, and Rome to do the second, the Jew to do the last. And when through many an age the world had learnt its lessons and reached 'the fulness of its times,'—the fulness of its life, then came the Christ to give it further life. First was the TEMPLE built by slow degrees, the Body perfected—the powers of Thought and Feeling quickened; then came the Holy Ghost to dwell therein. 'The natural was first and then the spiritual.'"

. . . .

It was enough! The veil was lifted from the page of history. I saw the years before the Christ as years of preparation before men entered into more abundant life. I saw the years since He came as years in which the Architect Divine places the crowning touches on His work and hails the Sons of men as Sons of God.

And as I rose in ecstacy, I cried: "Behold what love is this, God has on us bestowed, to call us Sons of God!"

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

A STEP IN THE DARK.

By HELEN HARDIN.

I, Phyllis Mortimer, make a solemn resolve that I will discover the criminal. Lady Helby's jewels have been stolen, and two hundred pounds in gold, and as I had the key of the safe in my possession, it is attributed to my carelessness. No one suspects me, but a good many blame me, and I am afraid that while I am under this cloud, Claude Forest, if he gets to hear of the matter, will think no more about me. So the cloud must be lifted, or settled over the right head, and, God helping me, I will do it. The detectives have failed in their search, the nine days' wonder has passed, but I will not forget. My own suspicion inclines to one of Lady Helby's husband's nephews, two of whom were staying with us at the time. I heartily dislike them, both George and Charles, but chiefly George, and he it is somehow to whom my thoughts go out as the thief. They both hate me as an interloper in Lady Helby's favour, for she was my late father's first cousin, and ferreted us out in our poverty at Clapton, and, bringing me to Helby Hall, made me her companion. I wish I had never come; there is so much to do and so much to bear. But I must stop now till this matter is cleared up, and I want to stop also, for Claude Forest has his home next the Helby estate. We are going to London in a short time; Lady Helby sickens of these country surroundings, and I shall be glad enough, for it seems an age since I have seen mother and the girls, and if only I can get leave from Lady Helby, I have promised to go and stay with Maud Gatenby, who was one of the guests here at Helby Hall. We were more like sisters together than mere friends. How I wish the London journey were to-morrow.

CHAPTER I.

"You can go right away to-night," Lady Helby said, as we neared the terminus, "that is, if you care to," and she handed me a ten-pound note.

Would I not? I wished Lady Helby and Mason good-bye, gathered my luggage together, and called a cab. Just as I was giving the man final directions someone touched me on the arm. I looked round in surprise to find Maud Gatenby smiling down at me. I liked Maud. She was a frequent visitor at Helby Hall, and had never tried to snub me, which was more than I could say of some of the guests.

"Whatever are you doing here, Phyllis?" she said.

"I might repeat the query, but I will not. I have just parted from Lady Helby; she has gone to the Mêtropole. I am going to Broad Street, and from there to Clapton, to my mother."

Digitized by Google

"Lucky girl! I suppose, though, Lady Helby finds the Mêtropole too expensive to allow you to stay there. Ah! I see I am right. Never mind, I daresay you are not sorry. Will you be in town any length of time?"

"A month, or possibly more, just as Lady Helby's fancy suggests."

"Then you must spend part of the time with me. I have just returned from a country visit, and through some mistake there is no carriage to meet me. Now, promise me that you will come; uncle would be pleased, I know."

I promised, and scribbling her address on a card, was soon on the way to Broad Street.

Three weeks after I came home I found a letter waiting for me, which I took up in fear and trembling. No doubt it was from Lady Helby. I opened it reluctantly, while the girls were undoing their parcels amidst much clamour and delight.

I LOOKED ROUND IN SURPRISE TO SEE MAUD GATENBY.

To my surprise, it was from Maud Gatenby. I had almost forgotten her and her promise to write. She wanted me to stay with her at Ombersley Square.

"How kind of her!" I said, passing it to mother.

"I think I used to know Colonel Gatenby. This would be his brother's daughter, who was left an orphan," she said as she read it down.

"Yes, Maud is an orphan, and it is supposed she will come in for the colonel's money. He is very rich, I believe."

"He must be. He was the fortunate one of the family. Does he know you, Phyllis?"

I thought mother looked at me rather keenly as she spoke, and seemed relieved when I told her I had never met the colonel.

"If you wish it, I can decline the invitation," I said.

"Oh, no! Go, by all means! I daresay the colonel will not remember the name Mortimer. It is many years since we met."

. . .

When I arrived, Maud and I had not been chatting long before she suddenly said, "Phyllis, I am going to confide in you. I feel I must tell some one."

"You can trust me, Maud," I said proudly.

"Well,"—hesitating—"I am engaged to be married. It is a secret at present. Uncle does not know; he must not—not yet at any rate."

"Are you acting wisely?" I asked feeling much perplexed.

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps not," she returned smilingly, "but we will talk about that later on, dear," and she turned the subject.

It may be imagined that in my stay with Maud I had forgotten my resolve, but it was not so. Every day I thought of the task I had set myself.

We dined alone one evening — the colonel, Maud, Ralph, and myself—and then Ralph Gatenby offered to escort us to a concert. The hall was crowded with well-dressed men and women, but I had no eyes for the gay dresses of the ladies; for once, I gave myself up to the enjoyment of really good music.

"How you enjoy everything, Phyllis!" Maud said enviously; "and you do not seem to notice that you are attracting considerable attention yourself."

No, I did not know, neither did I care; I had come to listen, and not to be looked at. But presently I could not help feeling uncomfortably conscious of being watched by someone. Every few minutes, much against my will, my eyes would wander to the opposite part of the house. At last I discovered the reason. In the dress circle sat Claude Forest, bowing and smiling. I felt the tell-tale colour rush to my face, and for a moment I forgot myself.

"Do you see who is there?" I said excitedly.

Maud turned to me with an amused smile.

"I saw him half an hour ago. I have bowed repeatedly, but, poor fellow, it was not my smiles he wanted. You have been very obdurate, Phyllis—you would not look at him."

"I did not know," I stammered shamefacedly.

Inwardly I was wondering what had brought Claude to town. I was very glad to see him so near. In spite of the coolness that had arisen between us during the last few months, I could not help a throb of joy at the thought that possibly he had come because he hoped to see me. The next moment I put the thought resolutely from me. I was only Phyllis Mortimer—a nobody, I told myself. Claude Forest was not for me.

He was waiting for us, however, when we came down the steps, but it was Maud who had most to say to him. I felt diffident and tongue-tied for once in my life.

I went straight to my room when we reached Ombersley Square. I wanted to be alone to think, and to put things on a plain footing with myself. I was not going to be foolish, I resolved. If Claude Forest could be nothing to me, the sooner I put him out of my thoughts the better it would be for my peace of mind.

I had arrived at this stage in my meditations, when there came a gentle tap at the door, and Maud entered. She had only removed her outer wrap, and as the soft light fell upon her exquisite features and white neck and arms I thought I had never seen a more beautiful girl.

"Phyllis," she said, with an air of mystery, "I am going out to-morrow, and if I should not return in time for luncheon I want you to take my place and make some excuse for me to Ralph and Uncle Conrad. I must have my dress fitted, and that will take time. You can use that as an excuse—anything you like; only I must go, and I shall certainly be away several hours."

"I will gladly take your place, dear," I said, looking down at her pensive face.

"But you object to anything in the shape of subterfuge. Of course I might have known it. Still, Phyllis, I must go. I have promised to meet—someone. We have not met for some time, and I must see him to-morrow."

"Are you sure you are doing what is right Maud?" I ventured. "Your lover surely should be proud to have won you. Why this secrecy? Is it necessary?"

Maud flushed a deeper red.

As she turned her face towards me the fitful firelight flashed upon the jewels on her breast, and there, amidst the blaze of diamonds, I caught sight of something that almost made my heart stand still.

"Maud, Maud!" I gasped, "wherever did you get it?"

"What do you mean, Phyllis? You look quite frightened."

"Where did you get that?" She put up her hand as if to ward me off, but I was too quick for her. "Do let me see it," I pleaded, trying to hide my excitement.

Reluctantly she allowed me to unfasten the diamond collar from her neck. It was not that I so much desired to see, but the pendant which hung from it. I held it in my hands and turned it over. It was as I thought. On the back the one letter "H" was engraved, and I knew then that it was one of the stolen jewels.

I had found a clue at last!

Digitized by Google

"Where did you get it?" I repeated.

"A friend gave it me. There is nothing unusual about it, is there? You seem quite disturbed."

"I am not disturbed. It is an uncommon pattern, and I saw one like it some time ago."

I spoke with seeming carelessness, and returned the jewel to Maud's outstretched hand. There was something behind it all, else why should she appear confused at my notice of the pendant?

I did not sleep much that night—I was too excited over my discovery. How fortunate it was that I had come to Ombersley Square!

As soon as breakfast was over the following morning, Maud left the house, ostensibly to visit her dressmaker, and I was left to take her place for the time being. "A telegram for you, miss." I took the yellow missive from the girl's hand. It was from Lady Helby, requesting me to come to her at once.

"How provoking! It is all right, Sarah; no reply to be sent. I have to go out, and may not return for an hour or two." How vexed Maud would be at this unexpected turn of affairs!

I set out in a very bad temper, wondering vaguely what Lady Helby could possibly want with me. She received me quite graciously.

"What a colour you have, child! London evidently agrees with you. Perhaps you will not be sorry to remain in it for a time," she said, gushingly.

"Not at all. I think I should prefer remaining for a time at least."

"Then you will be pleased to hear that I have let Helby Hall for six months."

I was pleased—there could be no doubt on the point. To be torn away from London just now would have been too cruel.

"Before you go, you might answer those letters for me," she said, pointing to a heap of papers.

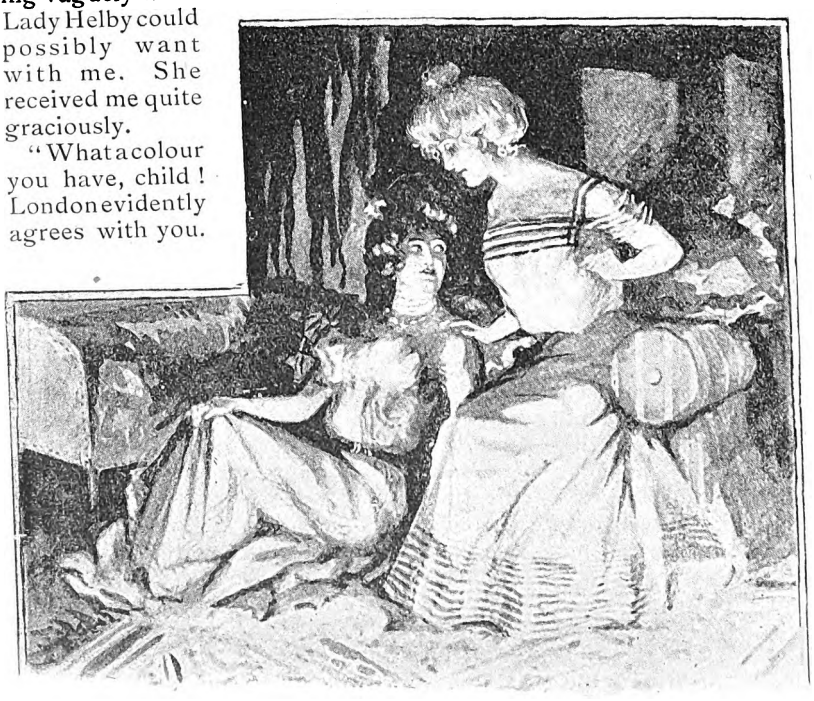
I drew off my gloves, and sat down obediently. In half an hour my task was finished. I made my adieu joyfully. I could be back at Ombersley Square in time for luncheon, after all.

I walked across Trafalgar Square, and, as I stood watching for the omnibus, suddenly my eyes caught sight of a form that seemed familiar. There could be no mistaking the graceful gait and upright carriage—it was Maud Gatenby, looking her best in her well-cut coat and skirt of rich brown cloth.

I watched till the nodding plumes in her hat had disappeared behind the swinging doors, and then I followed her. I had been frustrated in my attempt to inspect the jewel-case, but here was an opportunity too good to be lost. The Gallery was no doubt the meeting-place appointed, and I might be able to find out the secret she guarded so jealously—the name of her unknown lover.

I turned aside into the little Turner room. My object was to see without being seen. Maud had gone in alone—would she come out alone, or would her lover be with her?

The paintings had no interest for me. I was too full of suppressed



THE FITFUL FIRELIGHT FLASHED ON THE JEWELS ON HER BREAST.

Digitized by Google

excitement to feel the effect of the soothing quiet, which was such a contrast to the noise and bustle without. I walked up and down impatiently, keeping as near as possible to the windows which looked out upon the Square.

My vigil was rewarded at last. All my uneasy suspicions had not been without foundation. I could have laughed aloud with triumph at my success, for the second link in the chain of evidence had been found. I had no need to ask again who was Maud Gatenby's secret lover. It was George Helby.

CHAPTER II.

UNDER A CLOUD.

During the afternoon, before Maud returned, to my amazement Claude Forest called, and, finding Maud out, asked to see me.

I went downstairs, feeling unusually gay and light-hearted. Claude was in the drawing-room, and came forward with outstretched hand to meet me.

"I daresay you wondered to see me in town, Phyllis," he said. "The fact was, Forest House seemed so dull with you so many miles away that I felt I must look you up; and then, as luck would have it, I met Ralph, and found out from him where you were staying."

I felt a flutter of gratified vanity. It was I, then, whom he had come to see—poor, penniless Phyllis. Still, I did not answer him. I could find nothing to say. It was all so sweet and delightful. And how good of Maud to let us have this little time all to ourselves!

"Are you not pleased to see me, Phyllis?"

His words were like music in my ears. I let my hand rest in his, and did not resist when he drew my head to his shoulder. It was so sweet to be loved, to feel that I had a protector.

"Have you nothing to say to me, dear?" he asked. "Are you not glad I came, Phyllis? I came on purpose to ask you to go back to Northshire as my wife. You cannot deny you love me, dear!"

No, I could not deny—I did not want to. I let my head rest on Claude's shoulder, his arms were about me, and the next few moments passed in a state of bliss which it is sweet to remember, but of which I cannot speak. Then the colonel came in, and we descended to the commonplace.

I did not tell Maud what had happened. Claude had promised to call for me on the morrow at three, and together we were to go to Clapton and see mother. Until she had been told, I felt I did not wish anyone to know of our new-found happiness, and Claude agreed.

For several days nothing happened. I heard no more of Lady Helby, and Maud did not once leave the house without taking me with her. I could see she was restless and unhappy, and I was farther than ever from gaining her confidence. A barrier seemed to come between us every time we were left with each other. I had my secret to guard, and she had hers to keep also. I wondered, too, if she had been warned against me. Most likely George Helby had not been backward in trying to imbue her with the same dislike he felt for me. Well, I must be more on the alert than ever.

It was dreary work waiting, but at last my opportunity came. Maud happened to be putting her jewel-case tidy one afternoon when I entered her room, and, under the pretext of admiring her jewels, I managed to gain a pretty accurate knowledge of the contents of the case. The pendant was there still, packed away in a little corner by itself, but, to my great disappointment, I could discover no more of Lady Helby's missing property.

A longer time than usual elapsed between Maud's interviews with her secret lover; but I was only waiting for the next occasion, and I did not wait so very long, after all.

"I want to go out to-day about three o'clock," she said one morning, with an air of mystery.

I grasped the situation at once.

"Very well, dear. We will come upstairs after luncheon for a comfortable chat. No one will miss us if we do not appear for a few hours, and the colonel is dining out this evening, I believe."

I tried to speak calmly, but my heart was thumping with suppressed excitement.

"Phyllis, you are a darling. I wonder how anyone could think ill of you."

"Does anyone?" I asked innocently.

She flushed guiltily.

"If your unknown lover is to come between us, Maud, I shall never forgive him," I said pointedly.

"He never shall. Do not dream of such a thing — it is impossible. O Phyllis, sometimes I think—I am afraid I am doing wrong——" She hesitated a moment. Then the softened mood passed. "I am emotional to-day. Never mind. It must be the dull weather, I suppose. I daresay that strange feeling of something unpleasant about to happen comes to everyone at times."

Digitized by Google

She broke off with a short laugh.

"I daresay it does. Certainly the weather is unusually depressing. My head is inclined to ache; so, if you will excuse me, I will go to my room for a little while."

My head did ache, it was true, but I wanted to be alone. I must write to Claude, at any rate. A week had passed since I had seen him last, and—was it a foreboding?—I could not carry out my plan without giving him an inkling of what I meant to do.

Three o'clock came at last, and Maud was dressing to go out. I could hear the quick movements of her high-heeled shoes as she passed up and down the room. Now was my opportunity—now or never—and I wanted to be first in the field.

I crept softly along the corridor to the servants' quarters. I guessed that the maid, Sarah, might be in her room just then, and I guessed rightly. I knocked at the door softly and entered, closing it behind me. The girl looked surprised.

"Sarah," I said, "I told you the other day that I might need your help, and the time has come."

"And you shall have it, miss. I'm ready to do anything you want me to—that is, anything an honest girl can do."

"I would not ask you to do anything wrong. It is like this. I have reason to believe that your mistress is running into danger. She is just going out, and I want to follow her. Now, can you lend me some of your clothes? We are about the same height and figure, and I want to disguise myself, so that no one would know me if I happen to meet any of my friends."

The girl looked thoughtful.

"No doubt you think it a strange thing for me to do, Sarah, but I am very anxious to find out something, and this seems to be the only way."

"O miss, don't think I am wanting to make out that you're doing wrong. If my mistress is likely to get harm, it's only right you should do your best to keep her out of it. I was only wondering what I could lend you to wear. There's my old serge dress, only it's so shabby for the likes of you."

"The shabbier the better."

"Very well, miss; here it is."

In a few minutes I was attired in a shabby serge dress, a black jacket of the shoddy type, with huge football sleeves which drooped disconsolately on my shoulders, and a large black bonnet, similar to those worn by the devotees of the Salvation Army.

"I want a wig, don't I?" I said, laughing.

"I believe I know where to find one. There's some as was used in a play they had here one Christmas."

Sarah returned in a few minutes with the wig, and when I had donned it and tied the bonnet well forward over my face, I believe my own dear mother would not have recognised me.

CHAPTER III.

CAUGHT IN A TRAP.

I did not wait long in the gardens of the square. In a few minutes Maud came down the steps of No. 11, and walked rapidly towards the other exit from the square. She was very plainly dressed, and it would be rather difficult to distinguish her in a crowd.

I was on my feet in an instant, and began to follow at a safe distance. Not once did she look back. When we reached the more crowded thoroughfare, she signalled a cab. I did likewise.

"Follow that cab, No. 4,087. Do not lose sight of it, and when the lady gets out, let me know. I will pay you well."

The cabman smothered a smile. Possibly he was not unused to similar requests.

I took little notice of the direction in which we were travelling, though I thought it possible that some less conspicuous place might be the rendezvous of the lovers on this occasion, and I was not mistaken. We drew up near Charing Cross, with its congested traffic, and then turned into a side street leading to the Embankment.

Suddenly the cab stopped, and the man appeared at the window. "The lady hev gone into them gardins," he said, with a smirk.

I jumped out hastily, gave him a sovereign, and made my way to the gardens. Maud was there sure enough, but it was not George Helby she had come to meet, after all. I could have cried with disappointment and vexation. She was walking up and down talking earnestly to Charles Helby.

Digitized by Google

For half an hour I kept my vigil. I had expected it to be a longer one, but no doubt the non-appearance of her lover would cause Maud to hasten home earlier. Charles handed her into the cab which had waited for her, and I stood for a moment undecided as to what course to pursue.

While my thoughts crowded each other in confusion, I followed Charles through several streets, and at last he opened a door with a latch-key, and let himself in. He was not conscious of being followed, and as I crouched at the foot of the steps, hidden in the gloom, I heard the door swing back.

It was madness to wait longer, I told myself, but the temptation to climb the steps was strong upon me, and I yielded. I put out my hands against the door, and, to my surprise, Charles had forgotten to close it. The sound of voices overhead guided me as I went slowly and noiselessly up the thickly-carpeted stairs. A gas-jet lit the landing, and through a half open door on the right I heard Charles Helby speaking, and a woman's voice replied. I looked around for a hiding-place. A heavy curtain was drawn halfway across the landing. I decided to wait there until Charles had taken his departure.

The woman's voice was raised as if in remonstrance, and Charles, in low, deep tones, was apparently trying to mollify her. I crept closer to the wall and listened. At first the conversation was more or less of an enigma to me; then I began to be enlightened, and as I listened my heart grew faint within me. Oh! blind fool that I was! I had been on the wrong scent, after all.

How my heart beat and throbbed! My nerve seemed to forsake me all at once, and I felt certain that my trembling legs would never convey me safely down the stairs. I started forward to make the attempt, but at that moment the door was flung open, and Charles came out. I had just time to creep back to my hiding-place. The woman followed him. I could hear the swish of her dress, and a faint odour of violets was wafted along in the current of air she made.

THEN THE CURTAIN WAS FLUNG ASIDE.

"I will light you down the stairs, though you don't deserve it a bit. If you fell and broke your neck, I should say it was a judgment on you for staying away so long. However, I'll forgive you this once, but mind you turn up to-morrow, and I shall expect to hear that you've taken the house. I'm fairly tired of this place, and I don't see why I shouldn't have all I want now."

Charles muttered something which might have been a curse. I heard the street door slam behind him, and my heart grew heavy with fear and dread. Escape was impossible now, and how could I explain my presence in this strange house?

The woman came up the stairs humming snatches of a gay tune. Again that faint, sickly perfume of violets was wafted towards me. She came nearer, and a white hand glistening with jewels laid hold of the curtain. I held my breath. Then the curtain was flung aside, and I was discovered. In that moment of terror I could see that the woman was young and handsome, but her face was hard and cruel. I felt that whatever plea I might put forward to explain my presence would not be believed. She would most likely send for a policeman, and I should be given in charge. She gave a little scream of fright, and held the lamp high above her head.

Digitized by Google

"Who are you, and what are you doing here?" she asked haughtily. "Have you been listening at that door?"

"Why should I listen? What are your concerns to me? I am an utter stranger to you and entered the house by mistake. If you will kindly allow me to pass I will relieve you of my unwelcome presence."

"Not so fast," she said, barring the way. "If you have been listening to private conversation, as I believe you have, it may not be safe to let you be at large. At any rate, you have come here of your own accord, and before I let you go I must seek other advice. It would serve you right if I called a policeman and gave you in charge—a night in the cells might bring you to your senses."

"And it might also bring you to yours," I retorted. "Call a policeman, by all means—it would suit my purpose admirably."

I had made another false step in assuming a bravado I did not feel. Her eyes blazed with passion.

"Then it is as I thought—you did hear. I would not let you go now at any price."

She set the lamp down hastily upon a small table, and, before I could guess her purpose or cry out, she had seized me with both hands and thrust me into a room at the end of the landing.

"You came here of your own pleasure; you remain at mine," she said, with a sneer. Then the door was slammed and locked, and I was left alone in the darkness—a prisoner.

CHAPTER IV.

How the next few days dragged on I shall ever remember. Charles Helby soon returned, and, suspecting who I was, made this woman take my disguise away, and I stood revealed before his malicious gaze. Then he taunted me with my capture, and feeling sure that I was in a trap, openly and gloatingly confessed he had taken the jewels, both because he needed money and also to throw, if possible, the suspicion on me. An impression of my key that he had taken furnished him with the necessary means to do it. All this I heard, and also that this woman was really his wife, and then he left me to her care.

One morning she did not appear as usual with my meagre breakfast. I waited and waited, but the hours passed on, and she did not come; neither did I hear the sound of her quick step outside, or the strains of the songs she was so fond of singing.

It struck me then that the house had been unusually noisy overnight; hurrying footsteps, the dragging of boxes, and even the rumble of a vehicle—all these sounds had reached me, though in my half-dazed state I had thought nothing of them. They were at best only far-away noises, which could not really break the everlasting silence that reigned within the four walls of my prison. Could it be that I was left really alone in that awful place—to starve?

But I would not die like this. It was too horrible—it should not be. I rushed to the door and beat upon it in my mad frenzy, but there was no response save the echo of my feeble blows and cries.

The lock was upon the inner side of the door; I pulled at it viciously, and, to my delight, it moved slightly, though the thick screws still held it safely. I remembered seeing an old pair of scissors in the room, and I groped about until I found them. I had learned the use of a screwdriver in those far-off days and happy times at Clapton.

Dear mother and the girls—no doubt they mourned me as lost to them for ever. But I had made up my mind I was not going to die—not yet, at least. I worked slowly and patiently till, one by one, the screws were loosened, and with a wrench the lock came off in my hands.

The next moment I was out of the house in the street with the pure air of heaven blowing on my fevered cheeks. I was free! Excitement and want of food had made me light-headed. I scarcely remembered who I was or where I wanted to go. I wandered along aimlessly with one desire uppermost—to get away from the haunted house in that hateful street.

On and on I tramped until I came to the busy streets of the great city. Some looked at me pityingly as they passed along. I was famished, but I did not stop to buy food, though I had money in my purse. Where was it I wanted to go? My numbed brain refused to tell me. My thin shoes were sodden with slush, my dress torn and draggled. When—oh! when—would my journey end?

Digitized by Google

"Now then, miss, move on, please. You've been staring at that there placard long enough, I guess."

Unconsciously I had been gazing at a big bill hanging outside a homely-looking building, which must have been a police station.

"£500 reward. Whereas, on the 18th day of January last, a young lady mysteriously disappeared from Ombersley Square ——"

I looked up vacantly at the policeman. "Ombersley Square — Ombersley," I repeated. "Yes, that is it. Take me there, please—oh! do." Then something seemed to snap in my brain, and I remember no more.

. . . .

It was a long, long dream. I seemed to be wandering in beautiful fields, and Claude was by my side. I was perfectly happy; neither sorrow nor pain came near to mar the bliss; no fears or alarms visited those scenes of peace and rest. Then I awoke, and part of the dream was true, after all. Claude was there, and mother and Maud. What were they all doing? I wondered. I could see that there was a blue canopy over my head, and blue draperies on either side, and then I knew that I must be in my dear little room at home.

"I want to get up," I said, and my voice sounded very weak and thin. I put my hands to my head, only to find that my thick waving locks were gone.

Mother bent over me and kissed me. "Thank God you are spared to us, my darling," she said softly; and then I knew I had been ill, though for many a long day I did not remember all that had gone before. Slowly and painfully I struggled back to life and reason, and then I learned bit by bit how I had been recovered.

UNCONSCIOUSLY I HAD BEEN GAZING AT A BILL OUTSIDE THE POLICE-STATION.

When I fell into the arms of the policeman, he thought I had fainted, and carried me into the police station. Something in my appearance, and my strange request to be taken to Ombersley Square, aroused his curiosity, and he telegraphed to Colonel Gatenby. My identity was soon discovered, and I was taken to Clapton, though mother and the rest thought they had found me only to lose me again; but a sound constitution proved victorious in the struggle, and good nursing completed the cure.

Digitized by Google

The rest of my story is soon told. Charles Helby and his wife—alias Vera Rivers, Nell Travis, actress, or "Deb"—escaped safely out of the country with the money they had made by selling the jewels. Lady Helby's treasures, mutilated and divided almost beyond recognition, were restored to her in part, though the whereabouts of some of them will never be discovered. Perhaps in their new form they may be decorating the figure of some society lady at this very moment.

Maud Gatenby, it appeared by what she told me, was thankful enough at her escape, and as for her meeting with George Helby at the National Gallery it was only chance. She had really gone to see Charles.

When Lady Helby came, she almost overpowered me with her exclamations and caresses; and when I made it known to her that I could never return to Helby Hall as her companion, her complaints were exceedingly loud.

"I AM AFRAID I DO NOT CARE WHAT YOU THINK."

"I think after all I have done for you, Phyllis, it is very ungrateful of you. I——"

"Excuse me, Lady Helby," I broke in impatiently, "I am afraid I do not care what you think. Claude loves me! Claude wants me! And he has the prior claim."

As soon as I was strong enough, Claude and I were married. It was a very quiet affair, and after it was over we went down to Forest House, where Claude's mother and sister received us with open arms.

But before that event took place something very surprising happened. Mother came to me one day, smiling and blushing like a young girl in her teens.

"Phyllis," she said, "would you and the girls be greatly vexed if I were to marry again?"

I could hardly believe my ears.

"Not that I forget your dear father," she went on, deprecatingly; and then she told me about Colonel Gatenby, and how, when she was a young girl, he had wanted to marry her, and her refusal had been a dreadful blow to him.

"And so, after all these years, you are going to reward him at last?" I said. "Well, mother dear, if it will make you happy, I am sure all your children will be happy too."

Digitized by Google

UNAPPRECIATED.

A CLERICAL LOVE STORY.

CHAPTER I.

"NOW then, Stambridge! All together! All together, I say! Pass the ball, will you?" shouted Percy Thornton, the curate of the parish, as he coached his somewhat raw material in this, their first football match. He was playing in it himself, but he found himself handicapped by the burning desire of his men to individually distinguish themselves in running the ball down, instead of passing it from side to side, and so moving forward together.

At last it rose from the side and came towards him, and was carried by his well-directed kick on to the right forwards.

"Shoot, Benson! Shoot! B—rav—o!" And the whole field cheered as Benson shot the ball from the side just between the goalkeeper and the post, and so scored the first goal for Stambridge.

From the little iron building on the ground, which the restless energy of the new curate had been able to put up, came the sound of clapping of hands and cries of "Well done, Stambridge!" and two young ladies in the crowd of spectators joined the rest in applauding vigorously.

"What a splendid physique Mr. Thornton has!" observed Amy Forrest to her friend, Kathleen Vaughan. "He has the Stambridge boys well in hand in no time, hasn't he?"

"Yes; football seems about his own particular line," answered the other, with a slight curve of her lip, which her friend instantly noticed.

"That is too bad, Kathie," she said. "I like a clergyman to be as manly as Mr. Thornton. The gentle, smiling kind of man would do no good down here with these boys and roughs."

"Perhaps," said Kathie, "but I don't suppose he will be at Stambridge all his life, and ability for football will not help him forward in the Church."

"But doesn't he look splendid!" enthusiastically. "I couldn't help thinking so last Sunday morning while he was reading the lessons. He's very different from that tiny mite of a Mr. Blagden we had last, you know."

"I didn't see the creature, Amy. I was up at Cambridge then, and he had just gone when I came. As for Mr. Thornton, I admit, of course, that he has a very striking appearance, but I prefer a magnificent brain."

"But you don't know, dear, that he hasn't a fine brain," insisted Amy Forrest.

"Then what has he done with it?" snapped Kathleen. "Fancy a man leaving college without even a pass degree!"

"Perhaps he's not good at passing examinations," pursued his defender. "I've heard of such cases, and one thing I'm sure of—no degree would help him to preach better than he does."

Here another cheer proclaimed that Stambridge had gained a second goal, and as half-time had arrived and the rival teams changed over to different ends of the field, the wind, which had been against Stambridge at the first, was now in their favour, and the result was that the match closed with Stambridge as winner by five goals to none.

"Bravo, Stambridge!" cried Mr. Thornton, after the other team had left, amid the consoling cheers of the winners. "Bravo, Stambridge! You must do the same next time. Only you fellows must learn to pass better. I'll preach about it next Sunday," jokingly.

Kathleen Vaughan's lips curled again, as the boys laughed, and she inquired, a trifle scornfully, as to what the text would be for such a deep subject.

Digitized by Google

"Hadn't you better come and hear?" he queried, with a slightly heightened colour, for the scornful manner and patronising way of his rector's daughter always jarred upon him.

"I suppose I shall be at church," she said, walking on with him and her friend. "You see one cannot very well be away when you belong to the rectory, otherwise——"

"Well," he said, "otherwise——?"

"I don't think," she continued, "I should care to hear a sermon about football." And, wishing him good-bye, she crossed with Amy Forrest to the rectory gate. "Football!" she said. "What are things coming to? I only wish papa were home, I'd mention it to him."

Meanwhile, Percy Thornton made his way to his lodgings, smiling to himself.

"I wonder she hadn't the wit to see what I meant," he murmured; "she is usually so clever." And he sighed, for somehow he was quite aware of the scorn with which Kathleen regarded him, and its reason, for when she had returned home at first she had seemed disposed to be friendly enough, until one day in conversation she learned that he had no degree.

"He will always be just a curate," she observed to her mother, "when, if he had only liked to work, he might have made his mark in the world."

"He is a good man," her mother replied, "and he will leave his mark upon this village."

But from that day Kathleen had always treated him in a manner that made it only too evident how little she thought of him.

The pre-communion service was over, and Mr. Thornton ascended the pulpit, feeling somewhat amused at the number of people who had been brought together by hearing that he was about to preach on football.

Taking his text from Isaiah: "I am, and there is none beside me," he proceeded to show that the selfish spirit mentioned in the text would accomplish much less than the spirit of co-operation; and then he made what, to the greater part of the congregation, was a telling illustration, by showing how it worked out in football, where, unless men "passed the ball to one another," it was hard to make united progress.

Then he pleaded earnestly and simply with them to give up living just for themselves, and to do their best for their fellows wherever they were placed on Life's great field. Some were "forwards," some were in the "middle line," some were at the back, but it was only as all worked together that the world at large would score goal after goal against evil.

WHY SHOULD SHE BE SO PERPETUALLY ARGUING ABOUT MR. THORNTON? SHE ASKED HERSELF.

"It was very clever, certainly," grudgingly admitted Kathleen to her friend. "But more smart than deep."

"At any rate," said the other, "they all listened attentively, and that is more than can be said of them about most of the sermons."

But Kathleen said never a word more. She wanted the culture and learning which were shown in the University sermons at St. Mary's, Cambridge, and did not see that to reach the minds of the people around her, a preacher must speak like his Master of old, so that "the common people heard him gladly."

She went home in an irritable frame of mind. Why should she be so perpetually arguing about Mr. Thornton? she asked herself. What was he to her? Why should it worry her so that he did not come up to her standard?

Digitized by Google

"If he would only write a book or do something of that kind!" she muttered. "What a pity it is that a man can't be a scholar as well as an athlete."

CHAPTER II.

Four months later!

It was a frosty afternoon in the beginning of January, and the winter was unusually severe. Kathleen Vaughan, who was an enthusiastic skater, availed herself eagerly of an invitation to a skating party given by the Squire to the young people of the place. She was very quickly the centre of a group of admirers, and very charming she looked as, wrapped in furs, she approached the bank of the lake and prepared to put on her skates.

Percy Thornton was already on the lake, and being a thoroughly accomplished skater was enjoying himself immensely when, catching sight of Miss Vaughan, he bore down upon her and proferred his hand to help her skim the smooth surface.

"Thanks," she said, "I really think I shall enjoy it—at any rate, for a little time—quite alone," and leaving him, she began gracefully to move off.

He stood watching her from a distance with a determined look upon his face, and in spite of the snub he had just received he thought: "I will win you yet, and you shall appreciate me as much as you despise me now."

Another moment he was flying over the ice towards her, crying: "Miss Vaughan! Miss Vaughan! keep off that side of the ice. The Squire says it is dangerous."

She turned and faced him with a haughty look, saying: "Thank you, Mr. Thornton, I am quite capable of looking after myself. A spice of danger has an attraction for me."

"So it has for me!" he returned boldly, thinking of the danger he was in of losing his heart to her hopelessly. The expression that flashed into his eyes spoke more plainly than his words, and she coloured as she turned away disdainfully, but at that moment there came a crack, and in another second the haughty girl had disappeared through the broken ice. Everybody held their breath in suspense as Percy Thornton dived out of sight after the drowning girl. Well for her was it that the clergyman was an athlete, for no merely splendid brain could have saved her now, as, reaching her, he seized and kept her afloat, clinging by main strength to the rope they had flung him, but which, as it tightened drew him against the broken ice, lacerating his arms terribly.

He gave a groan of pain, but as he leaned back in despair with one hand upon the ice he found it would bear him. Clutching Kathleen's dress by the neck he wriggled himself on to his back upon the ice, and lay there awaiting help. Slowly and cautiously they reached him at last by pushing ladders along, and then, though the effort cost his arm such pain that he was afraid it was broken, Kathleen was drawn safely out of the water.

"No, no!" he said, as one of the men offered to assist him. "I'll carry her now."

Mrs. Vaughan was there, white with anxiety, which deepened as she saw Kathleen's unconsciousness.

"Oh, she is not dead, surely!" she cried.

"Hope not. Hope for the best!" rang out the cheery voice of the doctor, who happened to be on the spot. "Bring her into the house; and as for you, Thornton, you'd better be quick home and change." Obstinately, however, he stayed longing for news, wishing that he were a doctor, envying everyone in that room from which he was shut out, because they would know the truth sooner than himself. At last out came the doctor, who whistled when he saw Thornton there, and going up to him, said, as he seized him roughly, "She's all right, but if you don't go home at once I'll—Why!" exclaimed the doctor, as Thornton went white with the pain of his arm, "what's the matter? Arm? Let's see it. Ah! broken. Be quick home, and I'll be down in a trice and set it."

"Right, doctor, I'll go now. Don't you worry about me, Mrs. Vaughan," he added to Kathleen's mother, who had just made her appearance. "I'm so glad Miss Vaughan is likely to do well. As for me, I'm strong as a young lion. Why, I hardly remember ever having a bad cold. So don't look anxious unnecessarily." And he departed.

Briskly as he could walk he reached his lodgings, but in spite of the pace he kept up, and in spite of the pain of his broken arm, his thoughts still busied themselves with Kathleen. He felt thoroughly sorry it had fallen to his lot to rescue her, for it was putting her under an obligation, and he had determined to win her love independently of such matters.

Digitized by Google

"It's no good!" he almost groaned. "I must get away from here. I get on her nerves somehow, no matter what I do. Perhaps, if that little venture of mine turns out all right and people think a lot of it, I may come back again, and then, who knows?"

He was referring to a book he was just publishing, containing some stringent observations upon Society as he had seen it, and he was longing to see how it would go.

But all his intentions of leaving the neighbourhood were frustrated, for, after his arm was set, he found himself imprisoned against his will.

The doctor was attending Kathleen Vaughan, and giving directions to her mother in leaving.

"You must keep her perfectly quiet," he said. "She will soon be none the worse for her impromptu bath; but, do you know, I am afraid for Thornton. He is showing decided signs of rheumatic fever, and I expected as much, standing about as he did after that wetting." Then, suddenly and abruptly, he faced Mrs. Vaughan with: "Is there anything between your daughter and Mr. Thornton?"

"Not that I am aware of," that lady replied cautiously; "but I should say, most decidedly not!" remembering several of her daughter's late speeches.

"Well, it seems strange if not, for last night, in a kind of delirium, he did nothing but talk about 'Kathie,' and if he is going to be seriously ill, and has anything on his mind already, I'm afraid it won't help him. But there, good-bye, Mrs. Vaughan; we must leave these youngsters to make their own arrangements, I suppose. Er—I don't think I should mention the matter to Miss Vaughan."

"No need to tell me that," thought Mrs. Vaughan. "Percy Thornton's very name always seems to have a disquieting effect upon her."

But without mentioning him Kathleen's thoughts turned a great deal in his direction. The mere fact of the persistent avoidance of his name made her think that something must be wrong. She noticed, too, that amongst all the callers who left their cards his was never amongst them, and yet a strange reserve held her back from inquiring, until at last she was allowed downstairs, and then from a local paper she learnt the danger in which Mr. Thornton still stood. Just then Amy Forrest came in, allowed to see and chat to her for the first time, but she had scarcely taken her seat before Kathleen pointed to the paragraph, and abruptly asked, "Is it true?" Sorrowfully Amy shook her head, saying:

"I'm afraid so, dear. They declare in the village there's no hope; but Dr. Maguire told me that he may pull through, owing to his splendid constitution."

There was silence for a short time, then Kathleen Vaughan exclaimed, while two red spots burned brightly upon her cheeks:

"Amy, I've been a fool! That man was every inch a man, and he's laid down his life for a proud, stupid girl. Why he had already warned me, before I fell in, but I was so set on showing him I didn't want his warnings, and then the crash came. Amy, I shall never, never forget it"—the tears were flowing fast now—"and if he dies, I shall be utterly miserable."

Next morning, early after breakfast, Dr. Maguire was round, full of anxiety about the curate. He found him lying with that pathetic expression on his face so often seen on a strong man when illness has shorn him of strength and reduced him to a ridiculous helplessness. He smiled feebly at the doctor, who took his temperature, and then, speaking just as feebly, said, "Well, I'm just about the same, I suppose?"

"Yes," said the doctor, looking nonplussed, "you are. You want a fillip of some kind. What are we to do for you?"

Just then came the knock of the village postman, and in an instant the curate's face flushed, and he listened intently for the girl to bring the letters in.

"At last," he said, as a pile of papers and letters appeared, "my book's out, doctor. Not a word to a soul, mind. But sit down and read me the reviews and the letter."

They were read, reviews full of praise, and a publisher's letter speaking most hopefully of the book's reception.

"I—I think I am better now, doctor," said the patient with a stronger voice. "How soon can I get out of this?"

Digitized by Google

"Ha! ha!" laughed Dr. Maguire. "I said you wanted a fillip, and now you've had it you'll pull round and live to write much better stuff, I hope. Got anything here to drink to your success in? No?"—as the patient shook his head—

"Oh, you teetotalers! Well, it shan't go untoasted!"

So pouring out a dose of his own medicine, Dr. Maguire drank success to the book and the author, who lay back and laughed till the tears rolled down his face. From that day the curate mended.

. . . .

Mr. Thornton and Kathleen had met a great many times since his recovery, but like circles which when drawn towards one another—

> "Only touch when met, > Never mingle, strangers yet," so it was with them.

Kathleen felt unaccountably nervous in his presence, and beyond a very faltering and shy "Let me thank you, Mr. Thornton, for ——" which he had instantly and decidedly stopped, she had never referred in any way to her rescue; while he, afraid of treating their relations as any different now, maintained the old cold reserve with which he had met her cynical patronage before.

It was hard, however, to keep up such an attitude when the patronising way had disappeared, and in its place there was a gentleness which filled him with pleased surprise.

"I must get away, it is my only chance," he groaned involuntarily, as he walked home after taking tea at the rectory. "I shall only make a donkey of myself and speak out."

But somehow he did not go, for a strange lack of decision, which had never showed itself in him before, made its appearance. He even wrote out his resignation, then threw it in the fire, and spent the same evening at the rectory, only to return muttering to himself concerning moths who would flutter around the candle-flame.

Yet the more he felt drawn towards Kathleen, the more he hardened his heart against trading on the position in which the accident had placed him.

"It wouldn't be right," he said, "no true love could spring from such a thing as that. I don't simply want to win her. I want to win her. If I could be sure of some common ground of sympathy between us, I'd try and build on that, but——"

"Mr. Thornton," queried Kathleen, one evening, "have you ever read this?" pointing his attention to a book she had been reading. "Everyone has been talking about it."

He looked at it in amaze, it was his own book; but it was written under a nom de plume.

"What do you think of it?" he said curiously, expecting a battle of wits to follow, such as they sometimes had.

"I feel as if I could have written it myself," she answered. "I should like you to read it. Not that I think you will agree with many things it says, but it is the manliest utterance against the evils in the Church I have ever seen."

"Do you know, I happen to be acquainted with the author?" he said. "Gerald Manning was a chum of mine at college; he rowed in the same boat, and sat near me at table—er—I have his photograph with me now."

"How I should like to see it," she answered. "May I?"

There was a moment's silence, then he said, looking round the room:

"Would you mind coming here?" making as though to stand beneath the light, and obediently she joined him.

"There it is!" he exclaimed, pointing to the overmantel, which reflected them both.

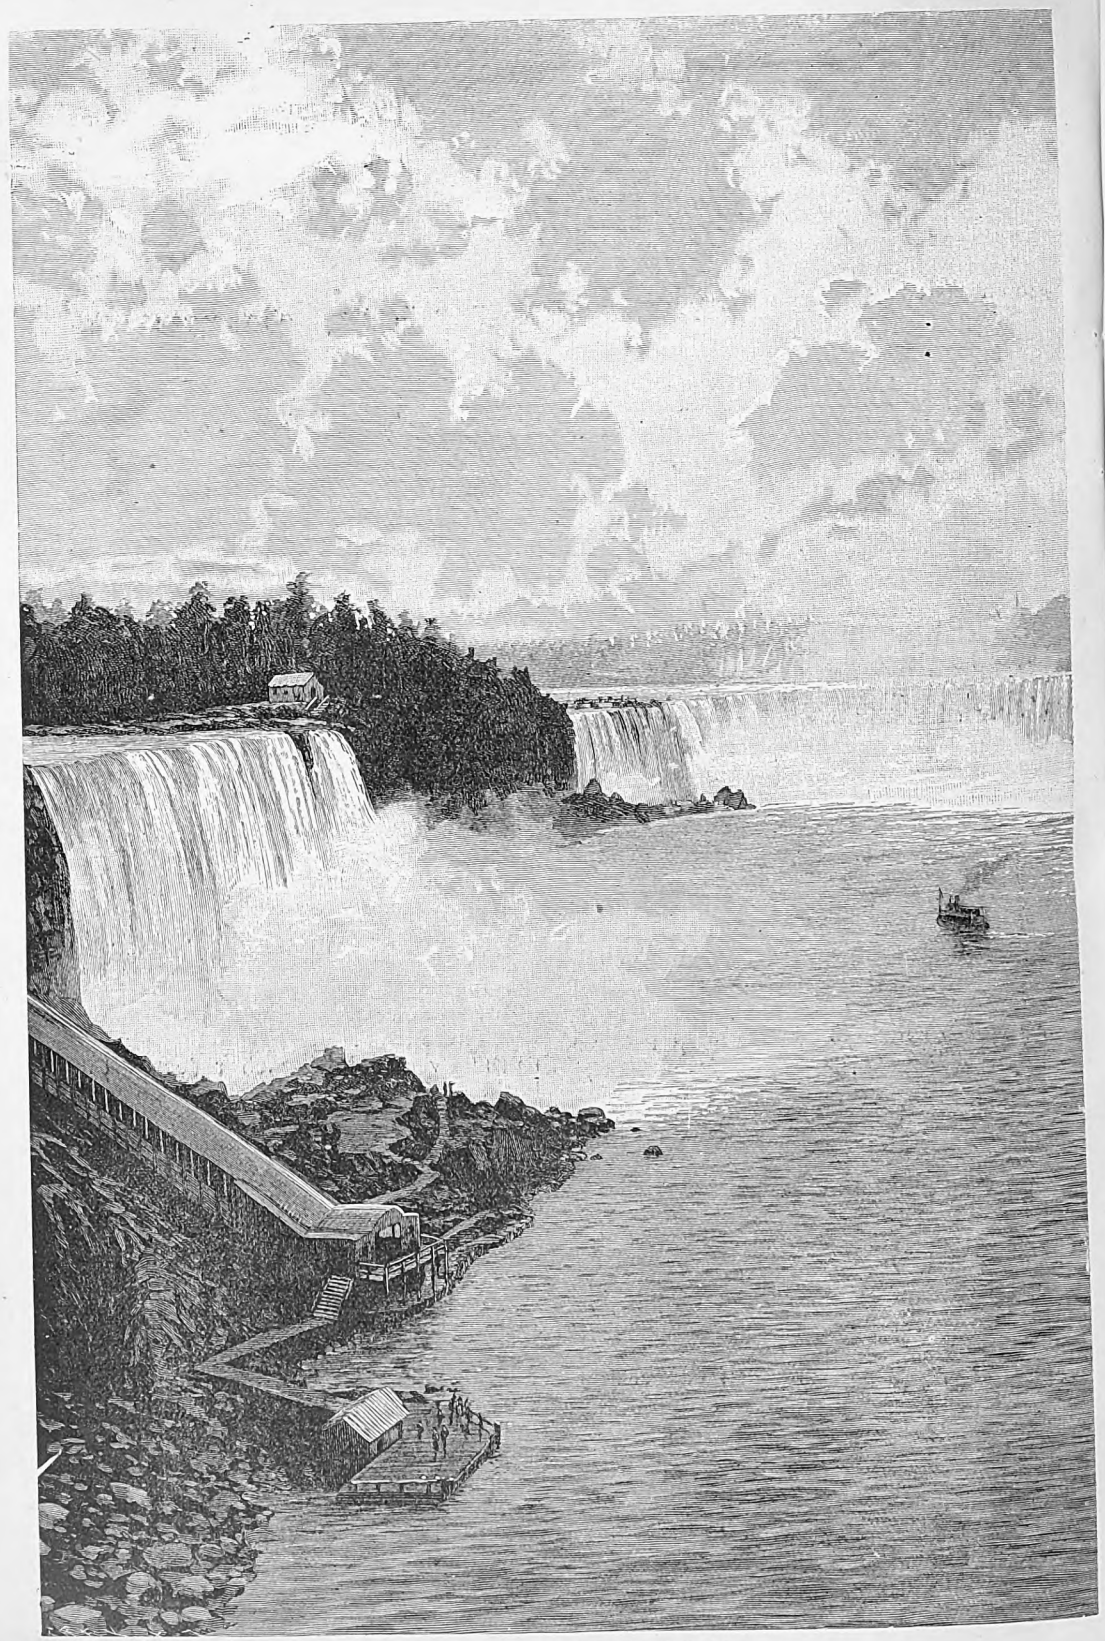
She started, and looked for a moment in the direction he pointed, then his meaning dawned upon her.

"You!" she said, with a little catch in her voice, "you! and I thought that—that—that——" and she began stammering.

"You thought it wasn't in me?" he queried mischievously; but feeling for her, he continued: "Are you sorry to find out your mistake?"

"Sorry?" she exclaimed; "no, she murmured insistently, "not sorry. I'm glad. Why, I'm proud of you!" giving him one shy upward glance as he towered over her. But the glance told a tale of love which drew another from his own lips, and he has been telling it ever since.

Digitized by Google



THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.

Digitized by Google

VIÂ SOUTHAMPTON.

By GERTRUDE VIOLET McFADDEN.

MILDRED LOCKE was a trifle annoyed, when, just as the train was about to start, the door of the second-class carriage she occupied was opened hurriedly, and a young fellow suddenly sank down opposite to her as the train began to move. When he had recovered his balance he begged pardon for his unceremonious entrance. Mildred coldly responded, and drew closer into her own corner. She was travelling from Waterloo to Southampton, and had hoped to make the journey with no company save her own. The young stranger, after this rebuff, drew out a paper and retired behind it. Mildred observed this enviously; she had not seen the morning paper, and was longing to know the latest news of the war.

THE DOOR WAS OPENED HURRIEDLY.

As the minutes passed, her envy changed to irritation. The happy possessor of the newspaper occasionally let fall some half-formed expressions of admiration or dismay. Mildred bit her lip, and tried to read her novel, fighting down her growing inclination to snatch the paper from her companion's hands.

At length he lowered it, and still holding it, gazed meditatively out of the window. Mildred ran her eyes over him. In build he was tall and slight; his features were clear-cut and regular, his attire scrupulously neat and well-fitting. Altogether, he was as presentable a young fellow as Mildred had ever seen. Some of her animosity died away, as this reflection occurred to her.

With a sudden impulse, she leant forward, and spoke.

"Would you please tell me if there is any fresh news?" she asked. "About the war, I mean, of course."

The young man smiled—and it was a very pleasant smile.

"You are interested in the war," he remarked, as he handed over the paper. "There is nothing much but what one knows already."

Mildred made no answer; she was deep in the morning's news. When she had eagerly devoured every line, she drew a long breath, and returned the paper.

"How splendid they are!" she exclaimed. "Don't you think so?"

"Everyone thinks so," said he. "Might I ask if you have any special interest in our troops—any friends or relatives at the front?"

"No," said Mildred, who had thawed into graciousness by now. "I wish I had, though. How proud I should be of him! I love soldiers."

Digitized by Google

"You do? Well, they're lucky fellows! They get the best of everything. All the girls worship them. No one else has a chance."

Mildred looked studiously out of the window. Presently she remarked, "I hope to see some at Southampton; when they embark, you know."

"You will like that."

"I should rather think I would!" cried the girl, turning round. "If I were a man, nothing should keep me at home, while there was fighting going on out there! I should be off at once."

To her annoyance, a slight expression of contempt appeared on her companion's face, causing her to flush hotly.

"I've often heard girls say that," he answered. "But I don't believe they mean it."

"I can only speak for myself, of course," said Mildred, with some asperity. "I know that I mean what I say."

A chilling silence lasted for some moments, then the young fellow spoke again.

"I didn't mean to be rude," he said. "Pray forgive me. I'm sure you would go if you could."

"Thank you," said Mildred. Then she added, speculatively, "I wonder why you don't go."

The young man flushed, and hesitated for a moment.

"I am going," he said, simply.

"You are?" cried the girl, excitedly. "Really going? Oh! how splendid of you! You're not a soldier, though, are you?"

"Not yet. I hope to be soon."

"You are going to enlist?"

He nodded. Mildred sat looking at him, admiringly. There was a fresh interest attaching to everything he said. His opinion suddenly became of the greatest value.

"You don't think the Boers will beat us, do you?" she inquired, anxiously.

"Of course not!" he said, emphatically.

"I'm sure," said Mildred, gently, "you'll do your part bravely. Perhaps you'll do some great deed and get the Victoria Cross!"

"I might," assented her companion, with a modest dubiousness.

"I'm so glad you came in here," Mildred went on, all her hero-worship rising up in her. "I shall never forget this journey—never! It's the first time I ever met a soldier, or a man who was going to be one. Will you please tell me your name, and I'll look in the papers for it every day."

"You are very good," said he. "My name is Charles Oakley."

"And mine is Mildred Locke."

"I wanted to ask you," Oakley told her; "but I thought you mightn't like it."

"I don't mind," said the girl. "Perhaps, when you come back, I may see you again. I'm sure to be out to see the regiments march through the streets, and I suppose they'll do that."

"Very likely. And will you really look out for me?" he asked, and his voice was soft, while his eyes were fixed on Mildred's face. She dropped her gaze. The experience was as pleasant as it was novel, for she was but a mere girl.

"Why, of course," she answered, confusedly.

"And when I see you—"

"Yes?" Oakley bent forward towards her.

"I shall think to myself," continued Mildred, softly, and with downcast eyes,

OAKLEY TOOK HER HAND AND SHE MADE NO DEMUR.

Digitized by Google

"There's my hero! There's the brave man who risked his life for his country's honour, and yet who condescended to talk to me!"

Oakley took her hand, and she made no demur.

"I shall always remember those words," said Oakley, with feeling. "Even in the wild desolate veldt, among our treacherous foes, surrounded by a hundred dangers, I shall find time to remember this railway journey—and you!"

Mildred drew her hand away, and raised her head.

"You mustn't talk so any more," she said. "Why, we are almost strangers. You'll soon forget me."

"I don't think it's likely," said Oakley, decisively. "But I daresay you'll not remember me."

"Indeed I shall," declared Mildred, eagerly. "With you it will be different. A soldier has so much to think about."

"That's true," assented Oakley. "A glorious life, a soldier's! I've wanted to join the army ever since I was a little chap."

"And now you're really going to do so!" murmured Mildred, enthusiastically. "How happy you must feel!"

"I am," he responded. "You are going to Southampton, I think. So am I."

"I'm glad of that," said the girl, and then turned to the window in some confusion.

Presently she felt a hand on her arm. Oakley was bending forward, a grave expression on his face. Mildred looked inquiringly at him.

"Would you care to have a letter from the front?" he asked; "a letter from me?"

Mildred's heart beat fast, and she opened her eyes in wonder at her experiences. She would never have believed that such things as these could possibly happen to her. A letter from the front! What girl would have declined to accept such a favour?

"I should very much like it," answered Mildred. And she thought with what pride she should show that letter "from a soldier in the Transvaal" to all her girl acquaintances.

"Then I'll write," said Oakley, with decision. "That's settled."

"MY BUSINESS IS WITH THE OTHER YOUNG LADY."

The rest of the journey passed pleasantly enough, Oakley saying gallant things to Mildred, or discussing the probabilities of the war; she listening with the wrapt attention of a devotee towards an oracle. Their carriage not being invaded by newcomers, they were able to indulge their sentiments as they liked. At length the train steamed into the West station at Southampton, and drew up. Mildred rose, and began collecting her various trifles of luggage.

"There's no one to meet me," she said, in reply to a question from Oakley. "I haven't far to go."

"Surely I may accompany you," he expostulated.

"I don't think you'd better," the girl returned, with a hesitancy that gave consent.

He opened the door, and both alighted. The platform was crowded with new arrivals. Pushing their way among these, Oakley led Mildred towards the bridge over the line. The crowd was somewhat thicker here, and they were compelled to pause.

"What a fine policeman!" said Mildred, standing a-tiptoe, and leaning forward. "Do you know, I do admire big men so much. He seems to be waiting for someone, doesn't he?"

Oakley made no reply, and together they slowly advanced towards the object of Mildred's present admiration. When they were quite close, the policeman was standing right in their path. Oakley had suddenly become interested in the few small boats in the neighbouring water.

"Morning, miss," said the policeman,

Digitized by Google

with the faintest suspicion of a smile. "You haven't kept us waiting long."

"What do you mean?" asked Mildred, with dignity, and her companion's eyes came back from the opposite shore.

"Not you, miss," said the policeman to Mildred. "My business is with the other young lady."

"Other young lady!" repeated Mildred, frowning. "Please to let us pass!"

But he barred the way still. A crowd was collecting round the three, and Mildred grew angry. However, the policeman turned from her to Oakley.

"Miss Cordelia Oakley, if I make no mistake?" he said. "They wired us all about you. Better give in at once, miss. It'll save trouble. You'll only be detained and kept safe till your father comes down to fetch you home again. I'm afraid you won't get to the front yet awhile!"

"Do you mean to say," Mildred broke in, "that this is a girl? You've made a mistake!"

"Ask her," returned the policeman. "She knows the game's up, don't you, miss?"

"Don't talk any more!" said Mildred's companion, shortly. "I'll come with you, though I'm thoroughly disgusted! I call it a horrid shame to be stopped like this. I wish I hadn't been so silly as to tell my sister all about it—the very station I should stop at, too! I might have known she'd let it out directly I was gone."

Mildred Locke gripped Miss Oakley's arm fiercely.

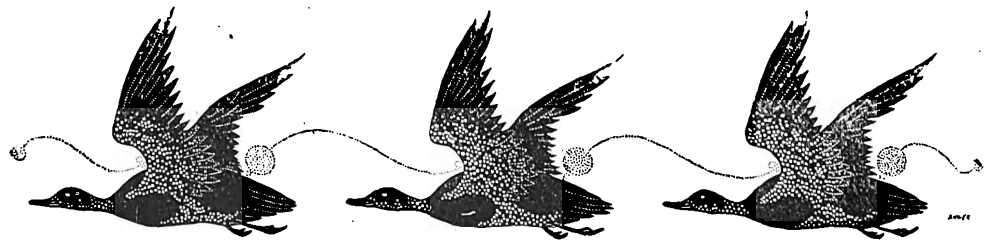
"How dared you?" she exclaimed. "You— you contemptible creature I wouldn't have believed a girl could be so horrid! Why did you deceive me so, and say all those things to me in the train?"

"Because I thought you were a little simpleton!" returned Miss Oakley, composedly. "I enjoyed it—didn't you? Besides, I wanted to see if I were properly disguised."

"*Im*properly!" cried Mildred, hotly. "Well, for my part I can't understand how girls can take such an interest in the war, and in soldiers! I think you've treated me abominably."

"Don't be angry," said Miss Oakley, coolly. "It wasn't my fault that you were so silly in the train. Yes, policeman, I'm quite ready, and I think we'd better go at once. How these people stare!"

She went away, with head erect, albeit with a high colour, escorted by the policeman. Mildred watched them go. Then, assuming a look of unconcern, she slowly followed in the same direction. She was trying to forget the various incidents of the journey down, and thought hard things about girls who admired soldiers. And, when as she made her way out of the station, she chanced to encounter a red-coated individual, she kept her eyes fixed on the ground until he had passed by.



Digitized by Google

TWO-ROOM ECONOMY.

A Realistic Sketch.

"HOW do the poor live?" Ah, that is a mystery, known only to the women of brave heart, whose study of "household economy" resolves itself into the study of a "two-room economy."

It is a struggle which taxes the powers of the mother severely.

If the family have the luxury of two rooms, and there are several members of both sexes to be stowed away with a due regard to decency, it becomes an economy of space.

One room is usually turned into the girl's dormitory, and at night the "living room" answers the same purpose for the male members of the family.

Imagine every chair placed with the seats against the wall; three or four thus arranged make the necessary bedsteads, while the top of a table can hold another bed, and the floor between can contain a third.

As for clothing—the coats of the daytime, the jackets of the girls, table cloths, and a miscellaneous patchwork of rags have to help serve in winter, though such small, crowded rooms are naturally rather warm of themselves.

In the morning the mother dashes in and gets the boys up before the others, and as soon as they have a few of their things on, the sisters come in. The beds are then whisked away into the back room to be stacked on top of the others, while the chairs return to their natural use. The girls busy themselves about breakfast, one of them perhaps hushing a fretful baby.

Meanwhile the boys are taking turns at the only washstand in the other room, hurrying to clear out for their sisters.

One brush and comb often serves the family, and there is no time for great care with unruly locks. There is a brisk competition for first place before the looking-glass, although if a girl be taller than her sisters, she can usually look over the head of one, who is using the brush while she herself performs with the comb.

After breakfast there is a general clearance. The children are off to school, and the rest to work, while the mother proceeds first to do a little tidying of both rooms, to wash up, to make up the fire; and (if there is one) to take baby and sally off in search of the day's dinner. With eager eyes she looks out for the bones, which, with a jagged reminder on them of the meat which once clothed them, may serve for stewing. By the time she returns, her old basket contains small contributions from the baker's, the butter-man's, and the grocer's, for in the very spirit of the words it is necessary for the poor to live "day by day."

Digitized by Google

Soon after one o'clock, the father and the elder ones are home for dinner with wolfish appetites.

The mother—with a very red face, the result of the morning's rush and baby's peevishness—dishes up and serves out, with a delicate calculation of due proportions, some Irish stew.

Perhaps, the day after, there will be "sassidges" for dinner, another day some appetising tripe and onions, and yet another "'am and eggs," the flavour of the bacon disguising the staleness of the eggs. A few bits of steak, well peppered, crowned with a huge, thick crust, and crammed with potatoes, soaked in plentifully watered gravy, provide yet another savoury repast. But in each case the sine quâ non of cooking is that the dish must be "something quick." For when cooking has to be watched, the home generally suffers.

Still no one thinks of grumbling. It is what they have been used to, and, so long as there is enough for all and a pint or two of beer, all's well!

This beer is generally fetched by the fag of the family, usually a girl of about twelve, not old enough for work, except at home. One such girl had just emerged into the dignity of an apprentice, and on coming home the first day, the usual cry greeted her: "Now you, 'Arriett, just go and fetch that beer!"

The girl's face was a study. "Me fetch the beer. Go 'long! Don't I help to keep you? Think I've waited on you long enough. Git it yerself. Not me!"

But for the "fag," as for everyone else, every trial has its compensations, and when the father remarks concerning the beer—"Short measure to-day!" it generally means the "fag" has been using her opportunity to have a pull or two on the way. Woe betide her if her father smells her breath!

Saturday, which is an early day both with the father and the youngsters, usually brings with it the expectation of a hot dinner with "Yorkshire" pudding. Fortunately there is a baker's close at hand, and in a tin dish the meat, with "puddin' and taters" under it, is taken to be baked, while with broom and water the mother cleans up in a general kind of way, to be ready for her family by two o'clock.

But in spite of the fact that the dinner is put out of the way, Saturday is a terrible crush all day long. When dinner is over the girls put on their Sunday best, and, leaving their mother to do the washing-up, go forth in feathers and finery to meet the bridegroom that-is-to-be. But at home there are to-morrow's clean shirts and stockings to get ready—shirts which want a new back, a new front, new wrists and new everything—stockings which have been darned till it is a puzzle to know which was the darning and which the stocking. The place, too, must look a bit smart, for Polly's young man may drop in; so bits of clean curtains, made of halves and quarters of old ones mended together, go up at the windows, and a penn'orth of whatever flowers may be about are stuck in an old mug in the centre of the table.

So the round goes on, the mother never knowing any rest, except when family events lay her aside, and even then she enters heartily into the spirit of competition amongst poor women to be able to boast of the few days in which she got down.

She had need to hurry, for the family have a lively time of shift, when the mother's busy hands and brain are in "the other room."

It is a scramble to get what they can, and how they can; but not one of them has to make such shift as the poor sick woman herself.

"Good-bye, Poll!" says the husband, as he departs to work again. "Be all right I suppose till we get back?"

"Yes, Bill!" faintly. "Don't you worry about me!"

But when the man has gone, and the girls have sung out a cheery "good-bye, mother!" and the sound of the boys' retreating whistling tells they are disappearing, she indulges in the luxury of a good cry. Oh, what she would give for a cup o' tea and a bit o' toast!

A feeling neighbour perhaps runs in to make up the bed for her, and with one rapid glance sees at once what is wrong. She herself has trod that way before. So out of a common experience comes a common sympathy, and if the curse of the poor is their poverty, that poverty it often the spring of a comradeship amongst men and men, and women and women, for the most part utterly unknown in the "upper" classes. REALIST.

Digitized by Google

At a Conventicle.

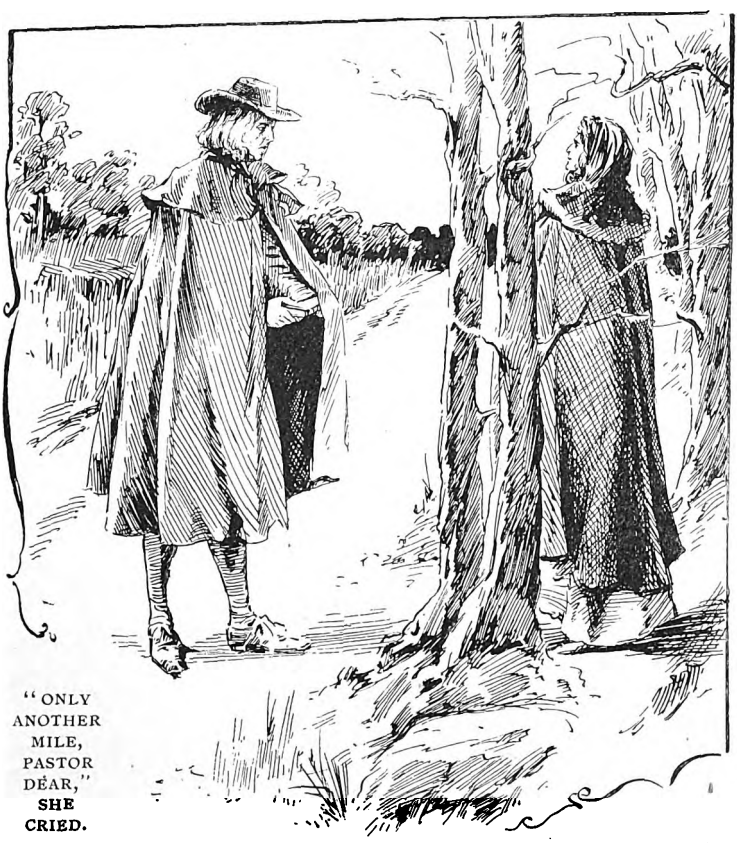
TWO wayfarers—old man and young woman—slowly trudged across the hills that lead to Northferry.

"Maid, let us rest awhile," said the old man, leaning heavily on his stout stick. "Truly, my limbs are not as agile as they once were, and the path is rugged indeed. Here, beneath this boulder, we shall, peradventure, be safe from malignant observation."

He seated himself on a large stone, while the girl threw herself on the grass at his feet.

"Only another mile, pastor dear," she cried, looking up encouragingly into his face; "then will David meet us with the horses, and the way is easy. Surely, I am selfish to drag thee from thy peaceful retirement unto the perils of this cruel place."

"Nay, nay, my child, think not so," returned the pastor, stroking her chestnut locks with fatherly affection. "He is but an unworthy shepherd who sharest not the dangers of his flock. Verily, were ten thousand demons in the path, as good Martin Luther once said, yet would I make an effort to join thy hands in holy matrimony; for these eyes long to behold my people once again; yea, this feeble tongue burns to proclaim the words of life anew. Let us trust in God."



"ONLY ANOTHER MILE, PASTOR DEAR," SHE CRIED.

"Will His people ever have liberty in this fair country?" asked the girl, wistfully, just a wee tinge of bitterness marring her low, sweet voice. "Will they one day be free to preach and to pray without fear of the fierce soldiers tearing them from home and friends?"

Digitized by Google

"Prithee, sigh not, my brave Bessie," he said. "Affliction is good, for it knits the heart closer to its God; yet assuredly persecution shall not endure for ever. When the day of peace cometh, and men worship in freedom, perchance they will forget the tribulations their forefathers endured, and place but little value upon the liberty they enjoy. Now tell me, I pray thee, something of this David Manley."

A vivid blush slowly overspread the face of the maiden.

"I love him," she said, simply, casting her blue eyes on the ground.

"'Tis right and fitting that thou shouldest; nor needst thou be ashamed at the mention of his name."

"In sooth I am not ashamed to confess I love him," cried Bessie, glancing up, half indignantly; "for my David is full worthy of any woman's affection. Brave, noble, generous, strong—nay," she added, laughing slightly, "I cannot describe him to thee aright, pastor, because I love him so well. But when thou seest him methinks I mistake greatly if thou lovest him not also."

"God grant thee a full measure of happiness, my child," said Pastor Fixby, rising to his feet as he spoke. "Let us resume our journey, for the rest hath done me good, and I see thy heart is anxious, troubling over the safety of the young man."

She gave him her hand, and they plodded onward, carefully avoiding the direct road, still keeping within the shelter of the heath-covered hillocks. As Bessie tenderly guided the old man's footsteps, her eyes eagerly scanned the rough country around while her ears listened for the tramp of a horse. But, after all, it might not be safe for David to come on horseback; the cruel soldiers of the king still lingered about the neighbourhood searching for her beloved pastor, and loudly swearing speedy destruction upon any who succoured him or attended another open-air conventicle. Possible, also, the horseman, when he appeared, might prove an enemy. This last thought caused her to suddenly stop as she heard the distant clang of hoofs on the main road.

"Quick!" she exclaimed, directing her companion towards a thick clump of trees some twenty feet from the pathway. "We must hide here until he passes us. Maybe 'tis not David, but some man of blood."

Friend or foe, the horseman rapidly approached, and Bessie, cautiously peering from between the bushes, almost uttered a cry of horror as she caught sight of him. The old man read her face.

"Fear thee not," he whispered: "there is One above ——"

"Nay, pastor," muttered the girl, clenching her hands tightly together, "I fear his tongue more than his weapons. One trooper shall never take thee while Bessie Hazeldean can wield a cudgel. But did he see us, forsooth, he would spread the tale and so prove our undoing."

The soldier, a tall, muscular fellow, was nearly opposite the trees when he abruptly checked the pace of his steed, brought it to a standstill and lightly vaulted from the saddle. Something on the ground, apparently dropped by one of the fugitives, attracted his attention. He picked up the article, examined it scornfully, then, uttering a blasphemous oath, dashed it upon the earth, remounted his impatient charger, and cantered swiftly down the road.

"My psalter!" exclaimed Mr. Fixby, almost recklessly hurrying to recover his treasure. "Marry, the rogue knew not its priceless worth."

Bessie was following him into the roadway when the sound of a soft peculiar whistle arrested her movements. A moment later David Manley clasped her within his powerful arms.

"Troth, dearest heart, yon huge dragoon seems on mischief bent," he said, stealing a kiss. "There's half a squadron encamped outside the village, and to bring horses would have been to court disaster."

"But what can we do? The good pastor is already tired out."

"Prithee, sweetheart, be not downcast," cried the young man, gaily. "My back is at his service, and truly, methinks it hath oftentimes borne more than twice his weight. Never thee doubt, my Bessie, we'll reach our haven long afore the morn."

The minister now came toward them. Little as he valued the mere exterior of his fellow-creatures, the fine proportions and frank healthy countenance of Bessie's lover almost immediately won his heart. David doffed his hat, bending on one knee.

"My humble service unto thee, reverend sir. My name is David Manley."

Digitized by Google

"The peace of God be upon thee. Verily ye art made for each other," he added, gazing at the happy couple with something akin to pride; "yet surely youth passes anon and all flesh is frail."

It was night before they reached Northferry, although David, despite some initial protests, carried the old man nearly all the way, moving with a free, bold stride, and pausing to rest but a few minutes during the journey. The moon shone brightly overhead as, skirting the village, they entered a small field almost entirely edged by a wood on one side and a bleak, barren hill on the other. At first sight it seemed as though there were no other human beings about the solitary place, but, after David's low whistle had thrice been repeated, at least one hundred people —men, women, even children—stole from their concealment within the wood and welcomed the new arrivals.

"We've been a-praying for thy safety, pastor," said Isaac Stowe, the big village blacksmith; "verily the Lord hath heard us."

All present knelt on the grass while the minister, lifting his hands towards heaven, poured forth his heart in earnest supplications for his much-tried flock. His prayer was short; his closing solemn words seeming in strange harmony with the dusky gloom of the surrounding scene, with the moon half hidden behind heavy clouds, with the towering trees casting their fitful shadows over the kneeling congregation. A deep religious zeal animated these humble worshippers, who, refusing conformity to doctrines their faith condemned, braved an intolerant edict, and cheerfully risked confiscation, imprisonment, banishment, even death itself, rather than sacrifice their consciences by abandoning such forbidden conventicles. The common danger drew each closer to his fellow, broke down nigh all formality, and blended them into one united family.

"And now, my beloved people," said Mr. Fixby, "as is known unto everyone here, at their own desire and with the full consent of their lawful guardians, I am about to join together in the bond of holy matrimony two of your number. Nevertheless, if anyone hath ought to say against this union — though, truly I apprehend it not — let him speak out boldly, for surely we will hearken unto what he may advance."

A hush fell over the assembly; no one proffered an objection. Accordingly, after waiting a few minutes, the pastor motioned David and Bessie to stand before him, joined their hands and questioned them as to whether, throughout life, each would remain faithful unto the other. Receiving unhesitating answers in the affirmative, he declared them man and wife, completing the simple ceremony with another prayer. Scarcely, however, had he concluded when the ominous tramp of military feet chilled the hearts of his congregation. A moment afterwards twenty armed soldiers burst upon the scene.

"I LOVED HIM TOO MUCH," SHE SAID.

"Fairly caught the old fox in his den!" shouted their leader, roughly seizing Mr. Fixby by the collar of his coat. "Depend on it, thou drivelling wretch, this shall be thy last conventicle."

"Marry, where's thy warrant?" interposed David Manley, pushing the fellow back and at the same time adroitly releasing the minister. "Get him away—the wood—quick!" addressing those nearest him. And, before the astonished officer recovered his balance, Pastor Fixby was being hurried across the field by a dozen willing helpers. But the other troopers now came up. There was a fierce oath —someone fired his musket—and David Manley lay prone on the grass, his life's blood rushing from a terrible wound in his side. Then the ruffians dashed after the chief fugitive, to lose their prey for the time, to find his chill dead body when hunger and exposure had carried him beyond their malice.

Digitized by Google

Poor Bessie, cut to the heart by a nameless dread, threw herself beside the motionless, outstretched form of her young husband. Pressing her handkerchief against the gaping, ghastly wound, kissing his still warm cheek, murmuring his name in piteous entreaty, she yet instinctively felt that her tremulous pleadings could draw no response from the lips now eternally sealed by death. The blood left her face, though in her eyes were no tears. Turning to the big blacksmith, who, sobbing like a little child, held David's right hand, vainly seeking for the pulse that would beat no more:

"Isaac," she said, simply, "they have killed my David."

"God help thee, poor lass!" blubbered the man.

"And I had dreamed of year after year full of happiness with him," she went on, in a slow, constrained voice, totally unlike her own. "So good, so kind, so gentle. Oh, how could they kill my brave darling!"

"God's earth bore no truer Christian, nor kinder-hearted man," said Isaac, sympathetically.

As he spoke the fire of religious enthusiasm glittered in Bessie's tearless eyes.

"'Twas my fault," she declared, speaking quickly and with an unnatural calm, "for I loved him too much; nay, methinks I almost worshipped the ground on which he trod. But God loved my David far better than I, so He hath ta'en him from me." The young wife rose suddenly to her feet. "Oh, my dear brothers and sisters," she cried, addressing the weeping, faithful few who still remained, "believe not that because men persecute and slay, God hath utterly forsaken us. Surely the glories of everlasting bliss shall wipe away all memory of the pain we suffer on earth. Though our dear ones be torn from us, our pastors driven into exile, our hopes in this world trodden under foot, God will still support us, even when the night is darkest. Yonder"—she pointed upwards—"I see my martyred David seated amid the angels gathered around the great throne of God, his face radiant with a joy inexpressible! Why, then, should we mourn? Man cannot part us for ever."

But Bessie's fervent words were followed by the deep sigh that springs from a broken heart. The enthusiastic glow faded from her countenance, leaving it again a deathly white; one hand shiveringly clasped the other, and, as she tottered backward, the strong arm of Isaac Stowe alone prevented her from falling. He gazed into her face tenderly and anxiously, then reverently closed the staring, sightless eyes, and gently placed her passive figure on the grass beside the murdered man. "'Tis better thus," said Isaac Stowe, huskily; "Christ hath gathered His stricken lamb unto His immortal fold."

Digitized by Google

The Mechanics of = = = = Religious Work.

I.

IT will be the aim of this series of articles to bring the reader into touch with the many great businesses which have been chiefly built up owing to needs created by religious work.

There is a side to the varying philanthropies and religious efforts of the day which is often completely ignored—the mechanical side; and even those whose duties force them to notice its existence are scarcely aware of the great extent of the employment of labour in such work. Yet, if one comes to consider the matter, it must be perfectly clear that the thousands of societies and charities, to say nothing of the Churches, must be the means of a living to a vast industrial army. For instance, the "Report," which is the subject of such anxiety to secretaries, must for every society be printed and circulated in thousands. Moreover, some of the great societies, like the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Religious Tract Society, and other similar institutions, spend the chief part of their income in printing and binding, thus conferring a great benefit on the community by the employment of labour. Religious efforts are often spoken of as though they were simply parasites existing on the charitable gifts of the public, but, as a matter of fact, they hold such a position as employers, that if they were to cease, there would be hundreds of thousands of men and women standing idle because "no man had hired them."

MR. WALTER HAZELL, M.P.

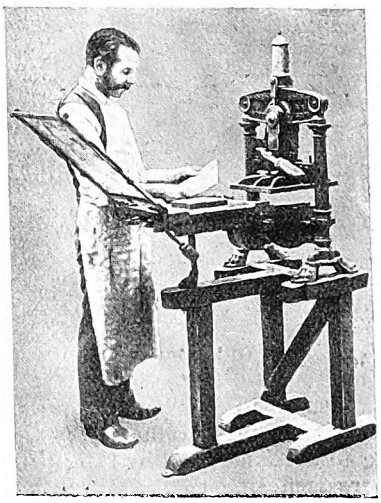
A firm which, by its growth and its enormous business, is an object lesson of this very fact, is that of Hazell, Watson and Viney, which finds scope for the employment of nearly two thousand men and women, in the printing of religious reports, books and newspapers. For over fifty-five years they have laid themselves out to do this work, and as the work has increased so their establishment has grown. In 1845 their annual pay bill was £520, while in 1902 it is £80,000. The original space occupied by their works was only 4,000 square feet and now it is over 4 acres.

The chairman of the company is Mr.

Digitized by Google

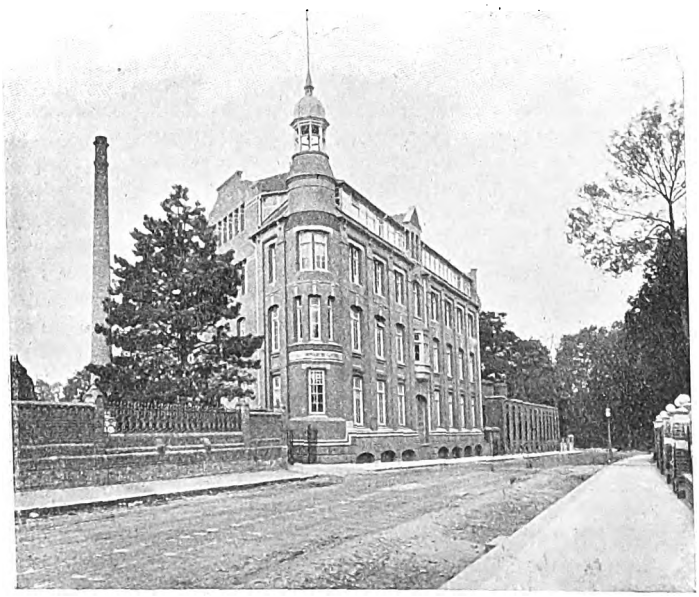
Walter Hazell, the M.P. for Leicester. Unlike many heads of important firms, who have received their early drilling in public schools, he was educated at private establishments, and came into the business at the age of twenty. He is a man of wonderful energy and enterprise, and it is owing to his fostering care that his establishment has so greatly grown.

The concern which for many years has been called Hazell, Watson and Viney, Ltd., was founded by the late Mr. W. Paul, at 5, Kirby Street, Hatton Garden, which was in those days an old-fashioned dwelling-house containing some old-fashioned presses. Mr. Paul, in the year 1845, sold his business to the late Mr. George Watson, who died sometime ago at the ripe age of eighty-two. In 1867 the Aylesbury Works had been commenced as an experiment in an old silk mill at California, near the Great Western station. The original staff there consisted of three persons. The mechanical methods of those days seem very backward and slow compared with those of the present time. The struggle for improved organisation and efficiency was most severe, but after long effort the business was placed upon a satisfactory basis. In 1869 Mr. J. Elliott Viney entered the concern, as an articled pupil to Mr. Hazell and Mr. Watson, and in the year 1875 the firm became Hazell, Watson and Viney.



ONE OF THEIR FIRST PRESSES.

The original premises in Kirby Street were enlarged by the addition of adjoining land, which was taken from time to time, until the original No. 5, Kirby Street, is almost lost in the large buildings which now surround it. The old building in California became overcrowded by the year 1878, when the first block of buildings in the Tring Road, Aylesbury, was erected, and opened with an appropriate gathering. Another block was added in 1886, and a third block in 1895. The Long Acre business was joined to the concern in 1884, at which time the whole became a private company under the partners who had built up the business, and who still retain the control of it.



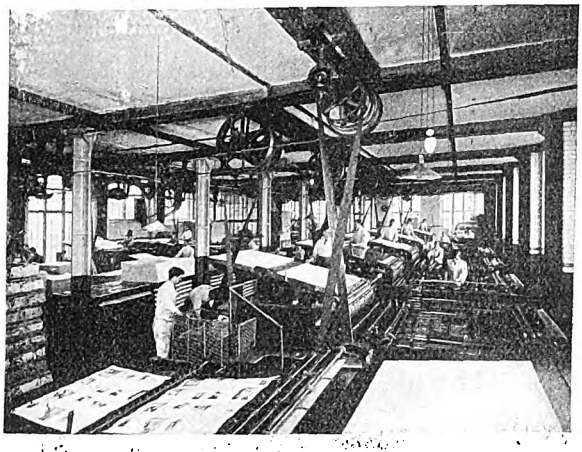
THE WORKS AT AYLESBURY

It is from those works in the quiet town of Aylesbury that an immense amount of the printed information on which societies depend to increase their income proceeds. The Religious Press also makes a great deal of work for the many hands employed by the firm. The British Workman, Band of Hope Review, The British Weekly, The Church Monthly, The Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, The Wesleyan Methodist Record, The British

Digitized by Google

Monthly, The Children's Friend, The Family Friend, The Methodist Welcome, Missionary Leaves, Work and Workers, Early Days, North Africa, The Band of Mercy, Herald Tracts, The City Temple Pulpit, and a host of other religious papers are among those which are produced by the labours of men employed by this firm at Kirby Street, Hatton Garden, while they also do a great deal of work for the Religious Tract Society and other organisations interested in the output of religious literature. A glance at the two illustrations of one of the printing rooms and one of the binderies of the company will bring home forcibly to the reader how many "hands" must find employment in this work that is so intimately associated with religion.

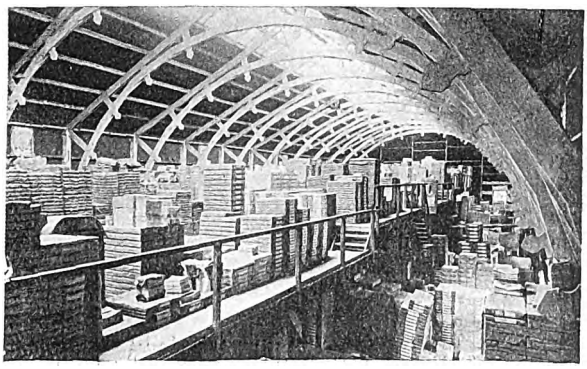
A BINDERY.



A PRINTING ROOM.

One of the most pleasing facts in connection with the firm is its healthy relations with its "hands." It would be little short of a scandal if a company that made religious work such a special feature should carry it on in such a way as to leave room for carping and sneers. Of all sweating, the sweating of workers for religious objects would be the most abominable, and no employés ought to be so happily situated and carefully studied as those whose labours are connected in any way with religious and philanthropic work. No one sees this more clearly than Mr. Walter Hazell and his co-director, Mr. Viney. In an address issued by the former to his workpeople, he says:—

"We who come together originally for the homely purpose of earning our living, are trying to interest each other in matters aside and beyond the mere routine of daily work. Man does not live by bread alone, and a man's interest in his business should not be limited solely by the money he takes away from it. Among the hundreds of employés of the firm there are people of varied tastes, ideas and aspirations, and it seems a good thing to cultivate public spirit among them. Those who have the natural aptitude for organisation are encouraged to be leaders in sports, or in the educational, recreative and other efforts which are worked for the good of all. We think the time has come when everyone regularly employed by the firm should feel that he or she has



A STORE ROOM.

Digitized by Google

some interest in it and in the people connected with it, over and above the routine of daily work, necessary and honourable though that be.

"Whether regarded from the point of view of the money value of the savings which the different thrift schemes indicate, or the social and physical value of the various forms of recreation, we believe good work is being done, and that more can be done as time goes on.

"We do not make a fetish of the virtue of thrift. It is only one of many good habits, and, like other virtues, may be carried to excess and become a vice. But, in general, few will question the social advantage to a man of carefully husbanding his resources till he becomes a shareholder in the concern he works in, and this is the pleasing condition of hundreds of our staff. How many distinct individuals invest their savings in the concern can hardly be stated, because the same names reappear under different schemes, but the total number of persons reaches hundreds, and the value of their investments when the payments are completed will approach £30,000, no small part of the capital required to work the concern."

MR. VINEY.

Everything that is possible to start and promote thrift is done by the firm. If the apprentices conduct themselves well they are presented on the expiration of their apprenticeship with a bonus of £10, part of which is paid to make them life members of the Printers' Pension Society, and it is expected that the recipient of the bonus should have saved an equal sum by the time he receives it. This is the first step, and a further effort finds opportunity in the savings banks of the firm, where there is actually deposited £8,500. Independently of this any member of the firm who is making an effort to save, and who sees that a loan of a moderate amount will help him in this direction, is eligible for a loan from the directors, to be repaid by instalments spread over such a period as may be agreed, at 4 per cent. interest. It is a condition of the loan being granted that it is to be used for some purpose of thrift, such as buying a house, buying shares in the company, or in some way helping the applicant to increase his capital. Each proposal will be carefully considered upon its merits, including the length of the applicant's services, the amount of effort to save that he has already put forth, and the security (if any) which he offers.

By a contribution of a penny a week, a provident fund is carried on, and the capital invested has now reached £3,300, while the benefits are realised in sickness and the payment of £15 at death.

Between the directors, the managers, the foremen and the trustees of the provident fund no serious case of sickness among the staff occurs without practical expressions of friendly interest. Exceptional cases of difficulty arising from long sickness come under the notice of the provident fund trustees. Where a stay at a convalescent home will be a benefit to anyone recovering from a severe illness, it is arranged for. The directors have secured a permanent bed at the Bexhill Convalescent Home, at the joint cost of the company and the London Houses Sick Fund. Arrangements also are frequently made for convalescents to stay with a private family at Bognor.

Digitized by Google

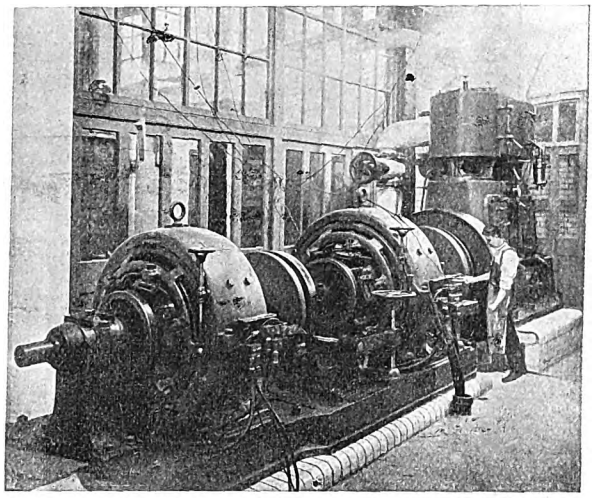
The one great feature, however, is the existence of the share-purchase scheme. With a view to extending the shareholding system, Mr. Hazell brought out a scheme in 1890, in which he offered to sell a limited number of his own shares to the employés upon the following conditions :—

That the share should be purchased at its market value—£17 ; that it should be paid for at the rate of one shilling a week for 340 weeks, making a total of £17. During this time the subscriber received all the dividends that were earned, and as the dividend was at that time 10 per cent. per annum, the result was that nearly all the premium the subscriber paid was returned to him in the form of dividends, and ultimately the share became his property at three-quarters its market value. A system of insurance was combined with this scheme. It was arranged that from the moment the subscriber had paid his first weekly instalment, should his death occur, the share became the property of his family without further payment. The idea was cordially accepted,

On the completion of the scheme, in 1879, Mr. Hazell and his co-directors were invited by the staff to a social gathering at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, London, as it was considered to be a somewhat memorable incident in the history of the firm.



A GENERATOR.

Other schemes are also in operation with the same aim. Two Institutes, one at Kirby Street and the other at Aylesbury, form social and recreative centres, and in connection with them have been established brass bands, string bands, lending libraries, book societies, cricket, football and tennis, and swimming clubs, while there are billiard, smoking and reading-rooms, and also a refreshment bar.

Altogether, this firm does its religious work in the most religious way, and it is no wonder that it should flourish, for everyone is encouraged by such a system to do his best work, and to make that best better.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

Digitized by Google

QUEER WAYS.

I.

ONE of the queerest things in the world is the blindness to the general queerness of the world. There are so many things in it to laugh at that one might go laughing through life. Judging by their solemn faces the procession of human beings which daily crosses London Bridge is not awake to the fact. But it really is very, very funny even to stop and watch that crowd. Look at that self-important dapper little man, walking with head tilted up, and an air that plainly says "I am, and there is none beside me." Five feet, four inches of self-importance. It would be dignity on six feet, but it is absurdity on anything less, especially much less. On the other hand, see that six-footer slouching along. Why ever does he wear such tight trousers over such long legs? Why will he crown such splendid height with that bowler hat? A silk hat would be "a high hat" on him; but on a stout, podgy man it is only called so. Then look at that little boy, hanging on to a big cigar! It is irresistibly comic, a cigarette would be more in keeping, and no-cigarette suit him better still; but that brawny man yonder certainly doesn't match that tiny paper whiff; a pipe would set him off to advantage.

There is a group trying to walk abreast and converse, regardless of those behind, who want to get before. Watch those quick glances the men give at every passing woman, young of course; how conscious they are of her, how utterly unconscious she is of them, or seems to be, though it is very queer that, dainty as she is, she should not know it. If I had the least claim to such freshness and nattiness, I should be walking along like that self-important little man. Where does she get her demureness? It must be a gift. So must that man's self-possession there who is just coming along! Surely he must know how ugly he is. He ought to be ashamed of it, and not draw attention to his ungainly figure by smart suit, flaming tie and glossy hat, everything about him smart except himself. No amount of watch chain and tie will ever redeem his features, and the best cut clothes won't hide those whisky curves. But sublimely unconscious, he moves along. It must be a gift. So must that man's apparent ignorance that the saw projecting out of his tool-basket nearly jagged a hole in a fine coat as he passed. Wonder if the owner could have claimed damages, and how he would get them. As it is, he doesn't even get an apology. Working-men are so civil. All he does get is an enquiry—whether he wants the whole pavement to 'is blessed self. Only he doesn't say "blessed." And that little man in front turns to laugh at them and slips backward off the curb, and nearly gets under that cart; while, just in time, the driver stops everything except an oath, and the waggon behind him has to pause and the traffic pulls up right away to London Bridge Station, and perhaps even at the Elephant they feel the result of that little man having slipped off the curb backwards. But, then, if they hadn't stopped, that stout lady couldn't have caught that 'bus she's been hailing so frantically, and perhaps if she hadn't, the next 'bus might have lost her train for her, and she would have got home late, and the house would have been put out, and so would her husband, and he would go out angry, and go where something to drink is always ready, and come back again and slap the children and say naughty words, and get up sorry next morning, and perhaps she would bear malice and they wouldn't speak for a month, and he would discover some lady who would, and then get found out and it would be very awkward to explain, so he would get blamed by everyone, whereas it would all be owing to the fact that that silly little man had not turned round to laugh and had not slipped off the pavement.

QUEER SIDER.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

Harrison, Lincoln.

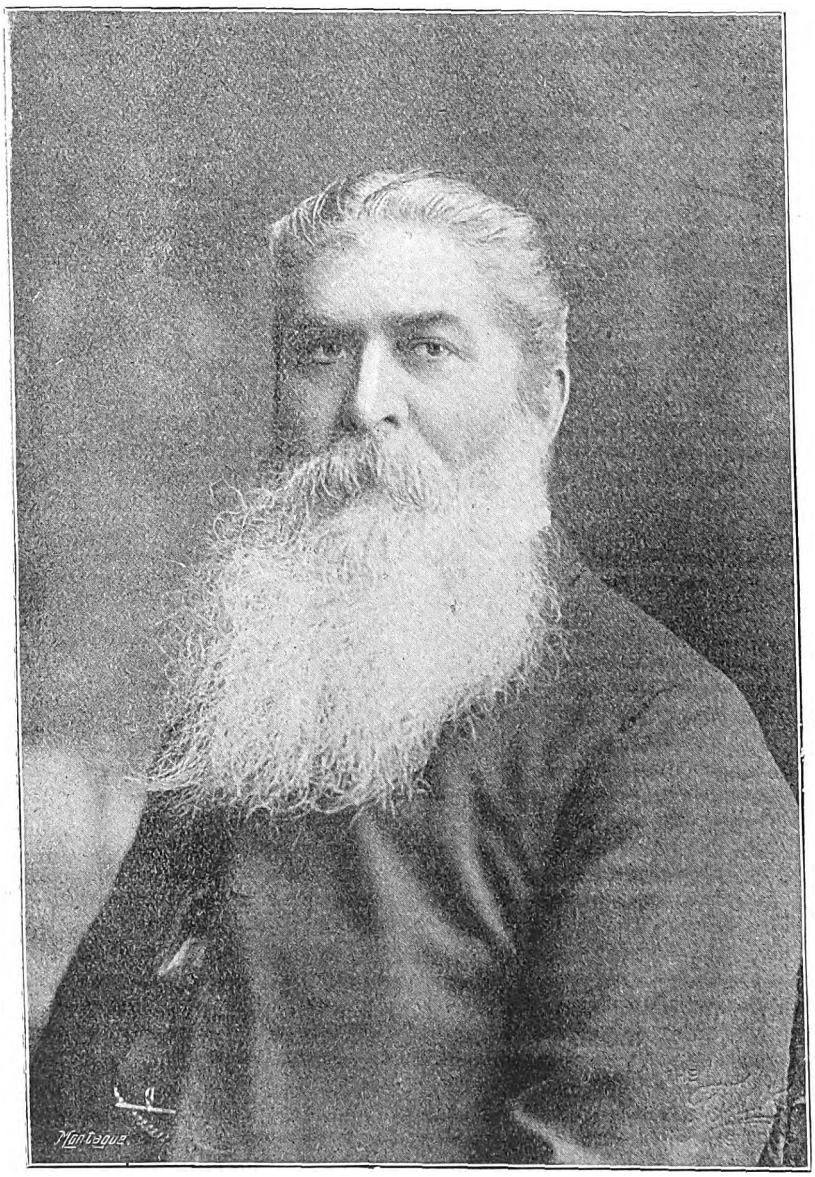
REV. H. H. CARLISLE, M.A.
Newland Congregational Church, Lincoln.

THE Rev. Henry Hermann Carlisle, M.A., the pastor of "Newland" Congregational Church, Lincoln, is a man who is just now occupying public attention in the Congregational churches, owing both to his own personal gifts and also to the unique position held by his church at Lincoln, which has been bold enough to already try, as an experiment, the policy of a "United Congregational Church," advocated by Dr. Parker. With regard to the last there are four churches, worked as one, on the circuit plan —Newland, South Bar District, Far Newland District, and Monks Road District. The assistant ministers are under the control of the deacons and of the pastor, who is responsible for the plan of preaching and for himself taking one service each quarter in each district. The election of the ministers is by the whole church assembled at Newland. The diaconate consists of twelve, each district church at present sending one representative elected by themselves. A quarterly church meeting is held at each district church, at which all their business is brought forward and discussed.

Digitized by Google

The report of this and any new departure proposed, has to be sent for approval and confirmation to the next church meeting at Newland, which all have the right of attending. These are held monthly.



REV. W. G. LAWES, D.D.

All expenses are met by two funds—(1) the Church Expenses Fund and (2) the Ministers' Fund. The whole church has therefore a common purse, and this means that what the district churches do not contribute the mother church has to make up. This involves that any extension or repairs are taken up by the whole church. It has been found in the result of working out that for the assistants it means easier work in preaching, as they have to go the round. But for the senior minister, though very interesting, it is not quite so easy, as it keeps him much tied to Lincoln, for it does not mean the same to a congregation if the regular minister is often away, however good the supply may be. As regards the rest of the week's work, it is more than doubled for every man. To begin with, there are four sets of all kinds of services and meetings to deal with every week. Each section of the church wants and holds its anniversaries, and each tends to consider its claims and interests stand first. But the four congregations are welded together by common interests and ever-growing sympathy; and it must be a healthy thing for a church to think and live for others as Newland undoubtedly does, and for district churches not to feel hampered and fretted by their poverty or the smallness of their recently-formed congregations. Apart altogether from the prominence which their successful experiment has given the church at Lincoln, the personal qualifications of Mr. Carlisle entitle him to notice. He is a scholar, having gained a First Class in the Moral Science Tripos at Cambridge. He has won golden opinions in Essex, where he placed the church at Maldon in a splendid position for work, and as a preacher he has won for himself a ready welcome into the foremost churches of the denomination. At Lincoln his wonderful powers of organisation, and the twofold fascination he exerts over young people and his brother ministers find great scope, and as he is still one of the "young men" of the denomination, there may safely be predicted for him a career, the end of which is not yet.

Digitized by Google

WILLIAM GEORGE LAWES, D.D., one of the Missionary speakers at the May Meetings, was born July 1st, 1839, at Aldermaston, Berks. He was appointed to Samoa as a missionary of the London Missionary Society, and ordained in 1860 at Trinity Chapel, Reading, of which he had been a church member. Having married a Miss Fanny Wickham, he sailed in the good old missionary ship the John Williams November 23rd, 1860, and arrived at Samoa July 23rd, 1861. Immediately upon his arrival he was appointed as the first resident missionary on Niué (Savage Island), and sailed there with Mrs. Lawes, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Pratt, remaining for a time to introduce Mr. Lawes to his field of labour, devoted himself to the preparation and revision of the Niué version of portion of the New Testament for a few months, when he left Niué to return to Savaii. Mr. Lawes, having the sole charge of the Mission, now conducted the various departments of work.

He also formed a class for the Training of Teachers, and occupied himself in the Translation of the New Testament. Six years later, on March 15th, 1868, he had the pleasure of being joined by his brother, Francis Edwin Lawes, who then co-operated with him in the Mission. In July, 1869, after much painstaking, he had completed and revised a version of the Psalms. In 1872, he revisited England, but two years later, having been appointed to the New Guinea Mission, he departed, with his wife and child, for the scene of labour that must ever be associated with his name, as with that of his long-time friend, James Chalmers.

In view of recent events in New Guinea, Dr. Lawes will be one of the most eagerly welcomed speakers at the May meetings. Dr. Lawes has found that the recent tragedy on the Aird River has called fresh attention to New Guinea. But people find it difficult to understand how mission work can have made so much progress and yet such a tragedy be possible. The apparent contradiction arises from the fact that New Guinea is so large a place that what goes on in one part of the island has no influence upon the rest of the country. The fact that the people on the Aird River had never before seen "Tamate," as Chalmers was called, or heard the Gospel comes as a revelation to many people in this country.

Asked if he thought it feasible to start a mission among those who perpetrated the recent massacre, he replied:

"It is certainly feasible; but we shall have to follow the leadings of Providence, and it may be some time before we are able to do anything directly. There is no use in rushing to the place and founding a mission before friendly relations have been established with the people.

"With the Government, the relations have always been most cordial. We have been exceptionally fortunate in having as governors two men who have been in full sympathy with us, and the establishment of the Australian Commonwealth will probably result in changes in the administration of New Guinea, bringing the possession under the more direct control of the Federal Government." Dr. Lawes believes that the change will, on the whole, be beneficial, for the tone of public opinion in Australia is on the side of justice in the treatment of native races. The resources of the country are certainly great. Large areas have now been taken up by various companies and syndicates, and considerable development may be expected before long. The question of cheap labour will be of great importance. The climate is such that native labour must be almost entirely relied on. The gold mines which have opened at the east end and on the north-east coast have been fairly successful, and a good deal is expected from some new operations now being started. The rubber industry is likely to be very remunerative. The climate is suitable also for coffee, cocoa, and other tropical products. Sugar-cane of very good quality and in many varieties is a native product. Exports have greatly increased since the British Government was established, and may be expected to increase still more rapidly as land is taken up by European enterprise.

Digitized by Google

MISS A. E. LARGE.
South Seas.

There are twenty-four students in the College at present with their wives. The course of study covers four years, and up to the present about a dozen students have passed through the College, and are now settled in various villages, though the College was only started in 1896.

One of the most serious obstacles to the spread of the Gospel is the great diversity of tongues in New Guinea. Dr. Lawes takes back with him a Revised Edition of the New Testament in the Motu language, also a selection from Psalms, Proverbs and Isaiah. The Motu language is not very widely spoken, but it is one of the predominant languages in that part of New Guinea connected with his labours.

AGNES EUNICE LARGE, another representative from the South Seas, was born February 24th, 1854, at Mildenhall, Suffolk, and afterwards a church member at Dr. Horton's Church, Hampstead. She was appointed to the school for the children of foreigners at Apia, Samoa, and sailed 1892. In November, 1894, she was appointed to Rarotonga, to co-operate with Miss Ardill. She left Apia on January 27th, and arrived at Rarotonga March 7th, 1895. Her testimony will be of great interest, for her work among the children will enable her to speak of the future that lies before New Guinea, for in the rising race lies its hope, if hope there is.

DR. J. G. PATON, of the New Hebrides, needs no fresh introduction to the public. His famous book of missionary experiences has made his name a household word to great numbers. It will be an absorbingly interesting spectacle to see for the last time at the May meetings the man who is going back shortly to his own elected and beloved labours in "widening the skirts of the Kingdom of Light, and narrowing the skirts of the Kingdom of Darkness." It is not, perhaps, likely that any of us will again set eyes upon him, but the spirit of enthusiasm for missionary work he has evoked will remain when he has left us, and, in that sense, may he be with us always.

J. G. PATON, D.D.
New Hebrides.

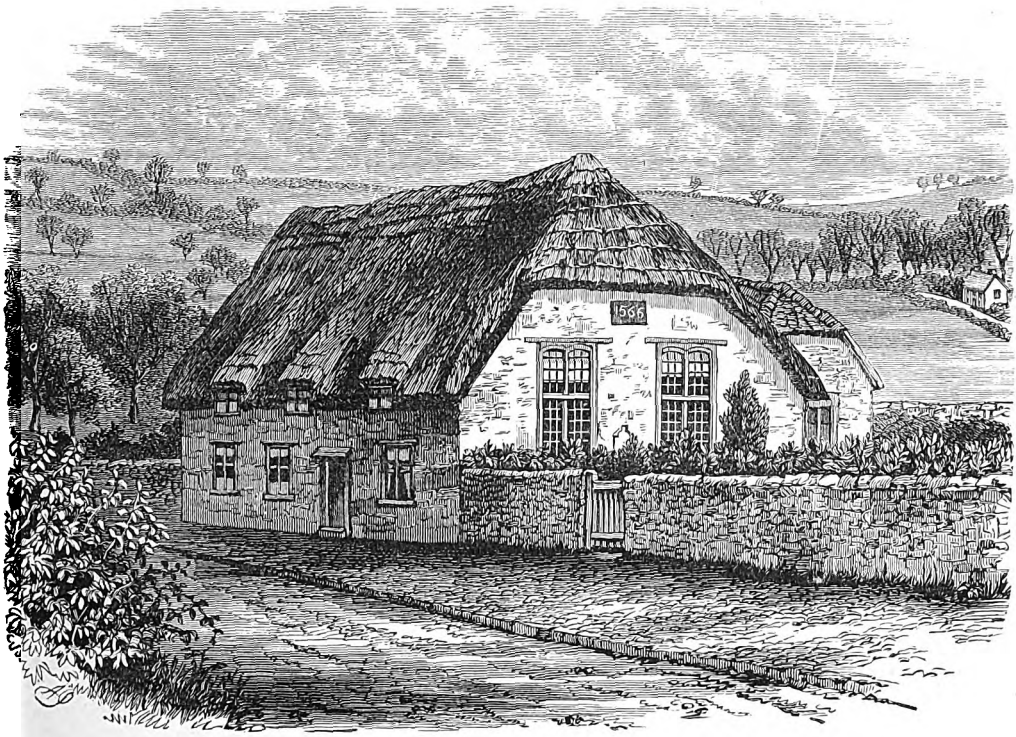
Digitized by Google

A Country Anniversary.

SUPPLIES had been growing very short in the little Manse for the past three weeks: it was getting near the end of the minister's year. Several accounts had now been standing for a few months, and would need immediate payment. But hope was strong in the minister's heart, and his wife was glad, for the ANNIVERSARY was approaching! Then outsiders would drive in as usual, and every little help would swell the small salary.



THE OLD CHAPEL.

. . . . .

The three weeks had passed. They had been busy ones. So many reminders had to be sent out to friends who had a near or remote interest in the place. Brethren had to be seen and pressed to stir up their people and put them in remembrance, lest by any means they should forget, and be missed at the small chapel which needed their help so sorely.

But alas! the day when it dawned was wet.

The clouds in the sky were matched by the clouds in the minister's heart. Showers to him would not be "showers of blessing." Rain would not be "rain of refreshing." A wet day was a wet blanket. For the heroic race of old which looked on wind and rain, and cared for none of these things, only used to be.

Anxiously the minister watched for the post. There were several letters containing apologies. He opened four, they were all alike, they all with one consent made excuse. He opened a fifth, it was a cheque for a guinea ; a sixth, it contained two ; a seventh, it asked his acceptance of five. His burdens were lighter by eight guineas.

Digitized by Google

He still anxiously regarded the weather. In the afternoon it poured incessantly, and his wife inquired if, after all, they had better cut up the cake. It would be sure to be wasted. But the minister had left the meeting in the hands of the Master. "Put it into their hearts to come!" he had prayed. So now he answered, "Cut it up by all means! It will be wanted!"

Tea time was drawing near. The usual few had come to the afternoon service. It was over, and now came the crisis. Hark! that was the sound of wheels. Regardless of dignity and of rain the minister dashed out bareheaded to receive the load of brave sympathisers, who had ventured. Two waggonettes came in one direction, and while they were yet unloading there came a third in another direction, and behind it several traps. The minister took heart.

"Has Mr. —— come?" whispered his anxious wife, mentioning a well-known helper of the district.

"No, dear, but he has sent, as usual."

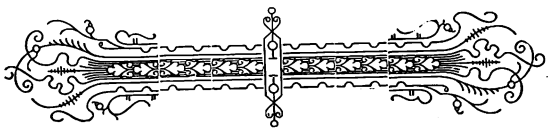
The meeting progressed. Many had stayed away. It was surprising the amount of influenza there was about. But the Lord, who opened Lydia's heart of old, had opened theirs, and when the collections were taken, they were better than usual.

"Is it as much as you expected, dear?" asked his tired wife.

"Quite!" was the emphatic response. "When Jenkins and Morris and Keyes are paid, there'll be enough for that dress of yours, and I think I can see my way to an overcoat."

This is what the anniversary meant to him. Ah, and to how many more of struggling, barely paid country ministers?



THE great aim of the Proprietors and Editor of "THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE" will be to make it in future Bright, Breezy, and Up-to-Date. Great attention will be paid to bringing our readers into touch with "live" subjects and persons of interest (not simply those whose portraits and careers are already familiar, and who may be said to have "arrived," but also with those who are "arriving"). There will also be short Illustrated Sketches of some of the Great Provincial Centres of Religious Work. Chatty Interviews will also be a feature. There will be Short Stories by the Best Writers, a long Complete Tale, one or two Thrilling Serials, a Child's Serial, Brief Articles, a Philanthropic Article, "In the Public Eye"; and the Book Reviews will set forth not only the contents of the books but the personality of the writer. "The People's Friend" series will also run from month to month, while the Religious Discussions commenced this month in "A Modern Esdras" will be continued. Other improvements will be announced shortly.

Editor.

Digitized by Google

When the Mind Abdicates.

"IT is wonderful!" I said, after being shown the complete provision made for dealing with the insane at the —— County Lunatic Asylum. I had imagined it a work of great difficulty and suggested the same to the attendant. "Not at all," he replied. "You see it is just a matter of systematic treatment. The poor creatures who come in here soon fall into the routine, the greater difficulty coming with them at the first. It is then they require greater care and watching until the unvarying regularity of their life forms their habits, and we have little trouble with them afterwards."

"Do you mind describing to me something of their life?" I said.

"Well, when they first come in they are weighed, measured, bathed, their old clothes taken away, and the uniform of the place put on them, after which they are placed in the wards according to the nature of their case. There is the suicidal ward, and the ward for epileptics. These require the most careful watching both day and night, and there are some attendants always about."

"I can understand that," I said; "but what puzzles me is how you manage with them all at meals—say the suicide cases, for example?"

"They are all placed in the dining-hall in separate companies—the suicidal, the epileptic, the invalid, and the convalescent. Nothing in the way of damage is likely to occur at table; they are too closely watched. We count the knives and forks before meals, and count them afterwards. If one is missing, there is a strict search till it is found."

"Are you troubled much with the violence of the inmates?"

"Not so much as on the female side. The women always take the palm for violence. Here, at any rate, they are not the 'gentler sex.'"

"What do you do with the rough specimens then? I suppose you must isolate even the very noisy cases."

"Yes, we have the padded rooms, but they never stay in long—those seizures are mostly paroxysms."

"The majority, I suppose, are not exceptional cases?" I queried.

"No," he answered, "and all that are not we put to work. There is the farm, the engineer's, carpenter's, tailor's, and upholsterer's shops for the males, and all manner of house work, etc., for the women. It would never do to allow their minds to be unoccupied. Regularity, company, work, discipline, good food and plenty of sleep, these are the means we rely on for cure! They rise at six o'clock, breakfast at eight, have dinner at one, tea at a quarter past five, and go to bed at half-past seven; which secures them 10½ hours rest, and gives to us day attendants a fairly long evening."

"But you have said nothing about their amusements!" I remarked.

"Oh, they are well enough off for that. In summer there is cricket on fine evenings. Then there is the band, mostly composed of the attendants. Amateur theatricals are also given frequently, and it is a curious fact that however stupid the inmates are at other times, they are generally alive to any fun then. In the winter we have a dance every Monday evening, and holidays are pretty often given, in which case we have some special band up, and make a regular fête day of it. Altogether, many of them are far better off than ever they were in their lives."

"How long do they stay?"

"Oh, well, we had one man who was here 40 years—died here in fact. Another we discharged after 22 years' stay. The other day we sent out a man who had been here 18 years, but he couldn't get any employment, so had to go to the workhouse. He soon came back, however, saying they half-starved him, and out of sheer pity he was taken in."

Digitized by Google

"You don't 'half starve' them here," I observed, for I had noticed how strong and well most of those I had casually caught sight of appeared. "No, indeed!" he said, "liberal allowance of everything is the rule here, even tobacco."

"Tobacco?" I said, surprised.

"Bless you, yes, sir! Some of them have four or five ounces a week!"

"You have quite a little town inside the walls, I see—workshops and chapel, recreation grounds and theatre," I observed. "Have you a cemetery here?"

"Yes," he answered. "We bury those that die here in the place."

"I suppose you do not have many deaths?"

"Not so many considering the great number here. Besides, when the mind goes wrong the body often thrives the better, at least we find it so. It is in the cases of melancholia that the body wastes so."

"How many have you here?"

"Roughly speaking, about 500 males and twice that number of females, and to look after these we have, as you may imagine, a very large staff."

"The doctors, I conclude, are all specialists?"

"Oh, yes; and the great interest they take in their cases would surprise you. If a man or woman has a chance they'll get it here. But I must go.—Oh, here is one of the doctors!" And he mentioned to him the name of the patient I had come to see. Readily and courteously he gave me every information in his power. "I have no doubt the friends of the patients are often anxious to see you," I said. "Yes, indeed! It is very trying sometimes to have to turn inquiry agent, when one's hands are full of the other work. But then I think if we put ourselves in their place we should be just as anxious, so I put up with it for their sake."

I thanked him and departed, pondering that remark of his as I went. "If we put ourselves in their place." That was the spirit of the Master. It was the golden rule. And as I looked at the carefully-kept grounds, bright with flowers and ornamental grasses, and glanced at the buildings replete with contrivances to lighten the sad lot of the otherwise unhappy inmates, I recognised how that spirit pervaded the whole place, and was, in fact, its raison d'être.

THE ONLOOKER.

Digitized by Google

FOR AFRICA BY AFRICANS.

THE African Training Institute for African Students, situated at Colwyn Bay, North Wales, is designed for the purpose of training self-supporting native missionaries to minister to their brethren in the Dark Continent; the founder of the Institute, the Rev. W. Hughes, was himself once a missionary on the Congo, and from his own experiences while at work there, evolved the idea of the college which he afterwards founded.

Of all climates in the world certain portions of Africa are the most inimical to the health of Europeans. The European missionary who settles in these regions has to encounter, in addition to the usual anxieties and discouragements of his work, the insidious effects of the climate, which saps his strength and makes all exertion peculiarly difficult, but climatic differences do not affect the native-born African, his standard of living is a lower one than that of the European, and he can support himself, or be supported, in comfort, for an amount upon which the most self-denying missionary would find it hard to exist.

REV. W. HUGHES, FOUNDER OF THE COLLEGE.

In all races and in all classes "like appeals to like." The native convert, in what ever country he is found, can enter into, and understand, the prejudices, superstitions, the ways of thought of his heathen brethren, with a fulness of sympathy which the most devoted of European missionaries necessarily cannot possess. They look on from without, the native convert sees from within.

It is not the design of the African College to bring over every convert to England for training; only the more intelligent and promising are selected. For these the college affords an opportunity of complete severance for a time from the degrading influences of their native African customs and superstitions, and gives its students a training which will best fit them to become, in their turn, instructors of their heathen brethren.

They receive an ordinary course of English school training, and in order to equip them for their future work, special attention is paid to Scripture and composition of sermons. Each student in turn takes part in the services held in the Institute's Lecture Hall, in winter, and Colwyn Bay Public Hall or where the meetings are held in summer, which are so much appreciated by visitors and residents. In some cases students become medical practitioners, when friends undertake the expense. In such cases they are prepared for the preliminary examinations. A very important part of their training is industrial, each student taking up a trade or handicraft, their hours of labour being fixed so that they can carry on class work simultaneously. A printing office has recently been set up on the premises, where, in future, all printing will be executed by the students. Orders for printing are hereby solicited for the benefit of the work. Other trades will eventually be started. The millions in Africa need to be taught the first principles of civilisation.

It is a charitable institution and entirely unendowed. Contributions are sent by God's people in all parts of the United Kingdom. Being so thoroughly convinced that this is the most suitable scheme for the early uplifting of their country, native christians of West Africa send their contributions unsolicited. A number of persons in some parts of this country form themselves into "Bands," contributing, in the aggregate, twenty-five pounds annually for the support of a student. The total receipts in 1890 were £88 6s. 7d., but in 1901 they amounted to £1,940 9s. 8d.

Digitized by Google

Educated native Christian workers all along the coast have over and over again expressed themselves most favourably, and call upon their fellow-countrymen to accord to it their support. The native press of the Gold Coast, Lagos, and other English colonies say it is par excellence the agency for uplifting the African in every sense of the word. African travellers have also expressed approval of its methods, whilst Carey, Marshman, Ward, and other great missionaries in speaking of India and other heathen countries have pointed out that the principle upon which this institution is carried on must be applied to the great work of extending the dominions of our Saviour throughout the whole world.

A NATIVE.

They are recommended either by native churches of Cameroons, Victoria, Lagos, Sierra Leone, Gold Coast, etc.; missionaries in Africa; or by auxiliary committees of educated native Christians, formed in convenient centres in Africa, who co-operate with the Institute. Each candidate is required to undergo a medical examination, and answer satisfactorily certain questions which are sent to him.

The influential firm of African steamship owners, Messrs. Elder, Dempster, and Co., of Liverpool, have very generously undertaken to bring over and return the students free of charge, exept in a few instances, but even these at much reduced charges.

A frequent question addressed to us is "Why not send coloured missionaries from America to their brethren in South Africa: Why bring them from Africa?"

The Language.

Let us now ventilate the subject, and we will first proceed to treat of the difficulty of foreign missionaries learning the languages of Africa. It is a life's work to master a language thoroughly, to think in it, and speak it with the fluency of a native. Coloured missionaries from America have to encounter this language difficulty, whilst the natives of Africa already have it at their command. They learned the African language when babes; their mothers spoke and sang to them in their own tongue. Knowing it thus from childhood, they speak it with an ease that foreigners can never acquire. Moreover, when our students return home they will preach the Gospel as it has been intended to be preached from the day of Pentecost—so that every man may hear it in his own tongue."

The Climate.

Coloured men born in America cannot stand the climate of Central Africa as well as the natives. I have had experience of this fact. A coloured missionary from Jamaica was with me for three months at my station on the Congo, and his fevers were almost as bad as my own. He got them often, and they were somewhat heavy. I admit that coloured men from America ought to stand the climate of Central Africa better than Europeans, and we have reason to believe they generally will; but there are many reasons why they cannot be as healthy as the natives. The constitutions of men are formed according to the climate in the country of their birth. The coloured men of America have all their lives breathed the air of America, drunk the water of America, and shared its civilisation. Our students, when they return to Africa, will be content to rough it in their old accustomed way. To us it appears as natural to return these young men to their native climate as it would be to transfer a fish from dry land to water. Our conclusion is that no men can stand the climate of Central Africa so well as the natives. They endure the scorching heat of the sun for ten hours each day without a hat or a cap on their heads, often with the woolly hair shaven from their crowns, and suffer no harm. They sleep with impunity in the open air at midday, sometimes with their uncovered faces turned to the burning sun, which would be fatal to a white man. Most of us have seen black showmen in the street tossing big turnips into the air and letting them fall upon their forehead with such force that the turnips were dashed to pieces. The explanation of the fact is the thickness of the African's skull. If I must take my choice, I would rather bare my head to the blows of the turnips than to the sun's rays in the torrid zone. The white man, before he can work or walk safely in Africa at mid-day, must wear a helmet with a crown of cork of considerable thickness, carry a sunshade, and fold a silk handkerchief or puggaree over the neck to avert the deadly sunstroke. We must learn to be reasonable and natural in carrying on the work of God in every country. In the third place, native African missionaries will have more than would foreigners from America. A stranger cannot enter into the feelings of the natives as fully as an African; the American coloured man does not know all about the Africans—their poverty, their temptations, etc. The same law applies everywhere. No man can sympathise with an Englishman as fully as an Englishman or share the feelings of an Irishman or Scot like a brother Scot or Briton. It is a wrong and a blunder to appoint any foreigners, if suitable natives can be found, as judges, preachers, and magistrates in any country. Even were they the best of men they would be in the wrong place; they don't fit their places; they are square men in round holes, or round men in square holes; they are ignorant of the language, unacquainted with the affairs of the people, their poverty, history, wrongs; they cannot sympathise with the sentiments, hopes, and aspirations of a conquered people like their own flesh and blood. A foreigner cannot plead the cause of any country in Parliament or anywhere else with as much force and point as a native. For instance, the English Church failed in its early days in Wales because it came here with an English cloak upon it attempting to teach in an unnatural way, preaching in another tongue to people who spoke Welsh, but the Roman Catholics were wiser in their generation when they went to Ireland, for they employed the natives of the land and succeeded in their purpose. What is against natural feeling and common sense will never succeed. When the first Great Missionary came from Heaven to save the world, He came in the most natural way, as much as possible like His brethren, tempted in all points like them, differing in only one point—without sin. Our idea in training Africans as missionaries is that in all points they are like their brethren, of the same blood, the same colour, the same humour, the same language, the same in everything, excepting in education and training. We see every day more and more the necessity of having preachers as much as possible like the people to whom they preach. This is the main cause of success with the Salvation Army, though connected with many infirmities. It is true in religion as in medicine—like cures like. There is an inspiration in the word "home," the very sound of it is soothing and homelike. The sweetest song in the English language is "Home, Sweet Home." When our African students have finished their training in this Institute, they will be sent to Central Africa. They think with pleasure of the time when they will go "home." They talk and sing about their "home," they dream of "home," they pray for the "homeland" and for the loved ones at "home"; they have come here to be trained for "home" mission work, and they earnestly desire to be instrumental in making their "home" happy. When English and American missionaries, both white and colored, are sent to Central Africa, they do not go "home"; they are sent away from their "home" to a "home." Their "home" is on the banks of the Congo, or some other part of foreign land. There is irresistible force in the "home" argument.

Digitized by Google

SYMPATHY WITH THEIR OWN PEOPLE

A GROUP OF STUDENTS.

Digitized by Google

A LADY STUDENT.

We wish to express our entire sympathy with the above effort, and to direct our readers' attention to the necessities of the Institute (ED.):—

1. To wipe off an existing debt, caused mostly by the South Wales Coal Strike, the War in South Africa, Indian Famine, and the heavy drains upon all denominations in connection with the 20th Century Funds
2. To complete printing and tailoring departments (which will ultimately pay for themselves) for the thorough instruction of students in these useful trades.
3. To assist for a few years industrial native missionary efforts in Gold Coast, Yorubaland, New Calabar, Liberia, etc., until they become self-supporting.
4. To develop the Girls' Institute at Colwyn Bay.
5. To provide for the scores of applicants who continually seek admission into the Boys' Institute.
6. To pay for the freehold property, including present Institute buildings and land.
7. To publish 3,000 more copies of a Dualla hymn book for the native Christians at Cameroons. 2,000 have already been sent out.

Cheques to be crossed "Metropolitan Bank of England and Wales," and P.O.O. made payable at the Colwyn Bay Post Office. All contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by W. Hughes, founder and director, Colwyn Bay, North Wales.

Digitized by Google

A Scientific . . . . Discourse.

FOR

THOUGHTFUL MINDS.

A Record of Facts,
Principles, and Discoveries.

Free (or unoxidised) Phosphorus in its relation to the Improvement and Preservation of Human Life on Earth.

"THAT our medical men of every school, our greatest chemists, physiologists, philosophers, and men of science generally; as well as the inventors of, and those who deal in and adopt the numberless methods and preparations which are advertised in all directions and in every conceivable manner for the cure of the "Ills that flesh is heir to," suffer almost as greatly, and decay and die as quickly as the least educated in society, is matter of positive fact as well as of regret; and although it may be conceded that much good has been done by every system which has yet been proposed, there is certainly still a deficiency; still humanity suffers; and it is painfully evident that something more is urgently wanted—something more simple, more decided in its action, less of the character of ordinary physic or medicine, and more of the nature of a preserving and protecting aliment. This important desideratum medical science has, so far, failed to supply."

"Let us hope that the preparation now described is the beginning of a series of improvements in the right direction and of victories over the natural world."

These were the words of the late Dr. Samuel Birley, M.D., when introducing to the world, a few years ago, the results of his investigations, which had been the outcome of a lifetime's work and study.

What the medical world of to-day is beginning to recognise, he had many years ago satisfied himself upon: namely, the supreme control which the nervous system exercises, not only over the main functions, but over the most minute and apparently insignificant processes taking place in the body.

Dr. Birley's great rule is, therefore:—"Look after the nervous system; keep it well-nourished, and in perfect working order, and disease will little affect us."

Dr. Birley devoted many years to the discovery of some remedy that would fulfil the above indications. He carefully analysed the brains of persons who had died from various diseases, as well as of those who had been killed by accident whilst in the full vigour of health. He was struck by the deficiency of Phosphorus found in the brain matter of the weak and ailing, compared to what normally existed in the strong and healthy. From this fact the suggestion naturally arose that perhaps the loss of phosphorus had much to do with the weakened nerve force, and that its artificial administration might help to give back what had been lost. Such a thought was no less that prophetic, but simple as it appeared to be in this early stage of the investigation, it was found impossible to carry it out with any satisfactory result, for the following reason:—

Ordinary phosphorus, as understood by the chemist, cannot, by any known method, be made to be PERFECTLY SOLUBLE in the blood. It may be finely powdered and given in pills, etc., or dissolved in oil, alcohol, ether or chloroform, but in all these forms it is precipitated into a fine dust immediately on mixing with the juices of the stomach.

Many of these particles do not pass into the blood at all, but of those that do, they are completely stopped when they arrive at the liver, through which organ everything passes from the stomach before entering the general circulation. Hence Phosphorus administered in this form cannot possibly reach the nervous system, and cannot therefore aid in its restoration.

Knowing these facts, and convinced of the necessity of phosphorus as a Food, rather than a medicine, for the Brain and Nervous System, Dr. Birley experimented in many ways for the purpose of discovering a means of preparing it so that it would be free from these drawbacks.

His aim was to find out a form which would not precipitate in this manner, but remain in perfect solution throughout the system.

In the end he was rewarded by the discovery of a new process of preparation (by distillation) which rendered it, when taken by the mouth, absolutely soluble in the blood, and was perfectly satisfactory in its effects in every way. It could pass through the liver in a fluid state and thus reach the nerve tissues, which alone were in need of it.

No better proof of the value of this new form of phosphorus could be required than the very severe tests to which Dr. Birley put his invention. That it really does pass into the circulation, and enter into the composition of the Brain and Nervous System cannot be better discussed than in the inventor's own words:—

"The question has often been put to us—What proof have you that your PHOSPHORUS, when taken into the stomach, actually reaches and combines with the substance of the brain?

As it is truth only, and not opinion or hypothesis that we care for, our answer must be perfectly candid, and such only as practical investigation permits us to give. Because we cannot, or rather have no opportunity to, analyse the living human brain, before a course of PHOSPHORUS has been entered upon, we

Digitized by Google

admit that the evidence is not direct and positive. We are obliged to depend upon implication and analogy. The following items, however, force the conclusion we have maintained upon us :—

1ST.—PHOSPHORUS is a constant element of the brain and nervous system of all animals.

2ND.—The amount of PHOSPHORUS is different in persons of different mental and physical powers.

3RD.—In the brain and nerve-matter of those who have during life been characterised by great powers of mind and body and who have been in the prime of health suddenly killed in battle, or accident, or by other violence, a much larger amount of PHOSPHORUS has been discovered than is ever found is the brain-matter of ordinary persons who have been killed in a similar manner.

4TH.—The brain-matter of idiots contains the least amount of PHOSPHORUS. A little more PHOSPHORUS is found in that of persons not completely imbecile, but physically and mentally weak, languid in action, deficient in pluck and energy, full of apprehension, weak in memory and in application of thought and purpose, who hesitate in their resolves, and shrink from the general bustle of commercial life. The same may be said of persons who are fretful, low-spirited, anxious, fidgety, and odd-tempered, and of the positively ill-tempered and disagreeable.

5TH.—Persons who in early life have enjoyed a fair amount of mental and physical power, but who have suffered many years from great anxiety and sorrow consequent upon family bereavement and other losses and trials, have been found after death to have lost a great portion of the PHOSPHORUS which is common in the brain of similar persons who have not suffered in the same way.

The same may be affirmed of those who, beginning life with a good constitution, have excessively indulged in alcoholic preparations. Alcohol has the property of dissolving and carrying away the PHOSPHORUS of the brain and nervous system. We have personally known and carefully watched the career of many who in the "prime of life" were brilliant, energetic, first-class men of business, full of dash and assurance, carrying all before them, and succeeding in almost every undertaking. We have observed some of these to gradually wane in their mental and physical powers; little by little to have become anxious and apprehensive; matters which once were trifles, unworthy of attention, have seemed to be of great consequence; enterprise and speculation have become less and less; a fear of losing or failing has gradually crept in, until a general tameness and insipidity have been observed. A few years longer, and the once bright, confident, venturesome business man has dwindled to an eccentric, nervous, despondent, and miserable human remnant, incapable of concentrating his powers, vacillating, absent-minded, forgetful, and almost heedless of the world or its pleasures. Deafness, failing sight, impaired susceptibility, necroencephalus (softening of the brain) and general inanition, have gradually terminated in death. In some cases we have been enabled to procure the brain and a portion of the spinal cord, and have found by analysis that the PHOSPHORUS has been greatly deficient and much less than has been found in the brain-matter of persons who had the same vigorous character during early life, but who have died suddenly by violence in the midst of their career, and when all their powers of mind and body were most intense. In several instances different parts of the brain have been found to contain different proportions of PHOSPHORUS.

Striking as are the foregoing examples, and forcible as they are in the way of evidence, they are not in themselves sufficient. We require a synthetical process before we can form a satisfactory conclusion.

We have treated with PHOSPHORUS cases of every class. We have seen the prematurely old, the worn and exhausted, the nervous and miserable of every position in life, gradually restored to a most vigorous and perfectly healthy state. From a lean and cadaverous condition they have become full in flesh, the countenance clear and ruddy, the eyes bright, sight improved, deafness overcome, the hair become abundant, the step and gait again elastic and determined, the spirits high and generous, the temper cheerful, the love of song and harmony returned, the brain again active, perception quick, memory tenacious, and the whole system and character changed from the most pitiable condition to the highest state of existence.

In several instances the stir and excitement of mercantile life have created a longing to return to business. Some have done so, and are now as keen and successful as at any former period.

If then in all cases of mental and physical debility where we have been able to analyse the brain after death, we have found a deficiency of PHOSPHORUS, and if in precisely similar cases during life we have administered PHOSPHORUS, and found such conditions pass away, what other conclusion is it possible to arrive at than that this new form of Phosphorus gradually assimilates with the brain and nervous system, and brings up the depressed and wasted constitution to the normal standard?

The preparation which has repeatedly produced such results as those above described, we have called 'Plain' Syrup of Free Phosphorus, because it is the simple solution formed by distillation, combined with sugar and without the admixture of any other substance or medicament."

Free Phosphorus in combination with other Medicaments.

The Phosphorus prepared as above described permits of our taking advantage of the well-known principle in medical science, that different articles of the materia medica have the property of acting specially on different organs of the body. These various properties are very valuable in cases of special diseased action, and we are able to take advantage of them in using the syrup of phosphorus here described. It will combine with many remedial agents, and thus the power of the phosphorus may be determined to different organs of the body as local conditions may require.

Where the heart is weak, and the whole muscular system flabby and greatly debilitated, in addition to great nervous debility and exhaustion, the best combination is that of protoxide of iron with the "Plain," and which we have named the "Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus."

In the course of many years' private practice Dr. Birley was enabled to considerably modify and perfect a number of combinations of his Phosphorus in addition to the "Ironised" above named. For debility of the muscular and general system in LADIES particularly; when "Below Par," and suffering from poorness of blood and lack of colour, a special preparation called the "Sub-Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus" has been found to be wonderfully successful.

Hence the fifteen standard kinds enumerated in the adjoined list have been formulated and have earned a unique reputation for the complaints named therein.

Digitized by Google

DETAILED LIST.

The result of over Half a Century's Experience. All have been proved in a Large Private Practice before being offered to the public.

PLAIN. SYRUP OF FREE PHOSPHORUS. A Vitalising food for all Brain and Nervous Affections from whatever cause—worry, late hours, overwork, &c.; and for Hysteria, Vitus' Dance, Headache, &c., &c. A sustaining and life-giving element. The basis of all Dr. Birley's Preparations. Of special value to Professional Men, Clergymen, Solicitors, Barristers, Literary Men, Schoolmasters, and all engaged in mental occupations 4/6

IRONISED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Muscular Debility, Heart Disease, Paralysis, Rupture, Sciatica, Lumbago, Scrofula, Obesity, Dropsy, and General Debility. Of great value also as a restorative after an attack of "influenza" .. 4/6

SUB-IRONISED. Especially prepared for Ladies and Delicate Persons suffering from the above, instead of the "Ironised." And for Bright's Disease, Mumps, Varicose Veins, and when "Below Par" 4/6

MAGNESIAN. SPECIAL REMEDY for Pulmonary and other forms of Consumption 4/6

BRONCHIAL. SPECIAL REMEDY for Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Quinsy, Congestion of the Lungs, Diphtheria, and Throat Affections generally 4/6

GASTRIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Indigestion and Liver Complaints 4/6

ANTI-RHEUMATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for every form of Rheumatism and Gout. (In some cases the Ironised or Sub-Ironised will aid the action of this preparation when taken on alternate days with it) .. 4/6

ANTI-STIPATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Constipation, Flatulence, Piles, Spasms Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, &c. 4/6

ACIDIFIED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak, Fading, and Falling Off of Hair, and for Actual Baldness (internal use only) 4/6

VIRILITIC. Prepared for men suffering from Nervous Debility and Loss of Vitality 4/6

TOMATINED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak and Partial Loss of Sight, Deafness, Defective Taste or Smell 4/6

ANTI-NEURALGIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Neuralgia, Pleurisy and Erysipelas .. 4/6

CUTANEOUS. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Skin Diseases, Eczema, Psoriasis, &c. 4/6

The 4/6 Bottles contain between 70 and 80 Doses, and are sufficient for nearly ONE MONTH'S USE.

A SPECIAL OFFER.

We have the fullest confidence that where we can introduce these medicines into a household we are assured of a firm footing, and of recourse to them on all future occasions of illness or indisposition.

This coupon entitles you to a 4/6 Trial Bottle of any one kind of Dr. Birley's Phosphorus Compounds at 2/6; but if forwarded by parcel post, 4d. per bottle extra must be enclosed to cover cost of carriage within the United Kingdom. We guarantee safe delivery. Should a Trial Bottle also be required for a friend or relative, we will extend the offer to them if ordered at the same time.

Orders may be sent with the Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these Trial Bottle Coupons, and if we are not the money will be returned,

For Residents abroad the date will be extended sufficiently to allow of ordering. Postage of 1/4 per bottle is required for abroad.

COUPON.

4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/6

Or by Parcel Post 4d. extra—viz.: 2/10

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Available until April 30th, 1902.

The above Coupon to be cut out and sent with order. These Trial Bottles can be had direct only from the

Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers:

GORDON, MURRAY, & Co., Ltd.,

10, ADAM ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

STRONGLY RECOMMENDED.

Among some hundreds of others we may mention the following Reverend Gentlemen, who have proved the value of the medicine, and from whom we hold some excellent reports:

REV. C. H. SPURGEON, London, S.E.
REV. DR. COCKREM, London Orphan Asylum, Watford.
REV. W. T. CRANFIELD, Stoke.
REV. R. FLETCHER, Hull.
REV. J. JAMES, Abercanaid.
REV. J. W. MORRIS, Gly Neath.
REV. C. EARLE, Langford.
REV. F. CLEMENTS, Hanham, Bristol.
REV. GABRIEL MOLLAN, Clonmetham.
REV. E. I. DEVENISH, Teignmouth.
REV. G. COOK, Church Gresley.
REV. G. DALE COPELAND, Pudsey.
REV. A. A. BROOKS, Wigan.
REV. A. E. REALFF, Leicester.
REV. F. JONES, Malton.
REV. W. BARTON, Hull.
REV. G. HOMEYER, Claycross.
REV. J. B. GRATTON, Leominster.
REV. W. FRY, Blandford.
REV. J. D. WOODHALL, Bolton.
REV. R. FRAME, Birkenhead.

THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN AGE" says:—"Doubtless the 'Christian Age' enters many a home where there is some weakly one whose feeble health makes existence a burden, or perhaps it is a disease considered incurable which is wasting away life. Wherever there is such a case, we sincerely wish one of Dr. Birley's Preparations of Phosphorus might have a fair trial. These preparations are the result of scientific studies and experiments extending over many years, and the success which has already attended their use has been almost marvellous. We have seen hundreds of letters (not copies, but the original documents), some from persons well known to us, all testifying to the curative effects of one or other of these preparations. And more than this, we know of cases in which they have been the means of restoring to health when to all appearance recovery was almost impossible."

EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."—"Our readers know quite well how careful we are not to recommend anything but what is thoroughly trustworthy, but so many voluntary testimonials of unmistakable genuineness are before us that it is simply impossible to question the efficacy of the Medicines to which we are calling attention; hundreds of letters from all classes of people, including titled nobility, clergymen, physicians, &c., among which we notice several well-known names, all bearing remarkable testimony to the benefits derived from them."

EDITOR OF THE "FAMILY DOCTOR."—"One Thousand Original Letters of Testimony have been submitted to us by the Proprietors of Dr. Birley's Preparations."

Digitized by Google

PRICE ONE PENNY WEEKLY. 20 or 24 pages Large Quarto.

THE

CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated Journal of Religious News. It always contains about TWENTY PICTURES and PORTRAITS;

AND SERMONS BY

Revs. Dr. TALMAGE

AND LATE C. H. SPURGEON,

and an Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson by Mrs. M. BAXTER. It has likewise a Weekly Summary of Current Events, Temperance Items, Short Stories, Accounts of Missionary Work, Numerous Anecdotes, Brief Biographies, Singular Occurrences, and a

GRAND SERIAL STORY

By Rev. SILAS HOCKING.

Together with a Summary of Events; and Anecdotes of Christian Work among the Soldiers.

"Christian Herald" Office, 6, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

Sent post free for 12 Months, 6s. 6d.; for 6 Months, 3s. 3d.; for 3 Months, 1s. 8d.
Payable in advance. Also in 5d. Monthly Parts.

It gives a Free Railway Insurance of £750 for Death; and of Disablement, £250; and Partial Disablement, £125; also a Special Insurance for £12 for Railway Employees.

"ON A WRONG FOUNDATION," by WOLFE STREET, is the title of the April Number of "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD PENNY STORIES" published Monthly. The April Number also contains a Sermon by the Boy Preacher, delivered at the West London Tabernacle, and Numerous Anecdotes. Can be had of any Newsagent, Price ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

ALLEN FOSTER & Co.,

CALL OR WRITE. The London Manufacturers. CALL OR WRITE.

Buy Direct at First Cost from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

LADIES' COSTUMES AND JACKETS IN GREAT VARIETY. Direct at first cost from the "Alfosco" factories.

10/6 10/6

Sweet and Dainty is how the Wearers of A.F.& Co.'s Stylish Frocks always look.

A SPECIAL LINE OF COSTUME SKIRTS In Black and Navy Serge, lined throughout. PRICE ONLY 4/6. Carriage, 5d.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S SHOW ROOMS, At 47, Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C., Are open daily from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Saturdays until 1 o'clock. Ladies are invited to call and inspect their goods.

DESIGN No. 601. 10/6 Skirt alone 6/6 Carriage 5d. extra.

Design No. 732, 10/6. New Chesterfield Coat for the Spring Season. 30 in. long. Made in stylish Tweed Covert Coating, or Vicuna Cloths. Colours: Fawn, Brown, Grey, Greeny Fawn, and Black. All sizes in stock. Price only 10/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra.

DESIGN No. 613. 10/6 Skirt alone 5/6 Carriage 5d. extra.

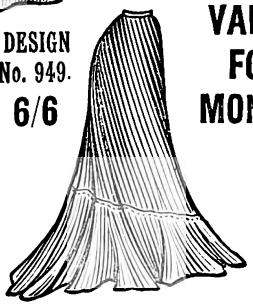
Write for our Spring Sketch Book. Patterns Post Free. Every Lady should see Allen Foster & Co.'s New and Fashionable "Coronate" Cloth.

Design No. 601. 10/6 The fashionable Eton Costume for Spring and Summer wear. Coat trimmed with three rows of cording and two rows of narrow braid and six small fancy buttons, very smart. Produced in all the new shades of the world renowned Specialité Serge or Vicuna Cloth. Price only 10/6, carriage 6d. Skirt only 6/6, carriage 5d. A marvellous Costume for the money—the best value in the Trade. This Costume may be ordered in the new Coronate cloth, price only 21/-; in all the latest Pastel shades.

DESIGN No. 949. 6/6



VALUE FOR MONEY.

DESIGN No. 934. 8/11

Design No. 613. 10/6. Stylish Costume made with the fashionable Russian Coat, produced in ALLEN FOSTER & Co.'s Specialite Serge or Vicuna Cloth in all shades. The Coat is trimmed with braid, and the skirt is cut in the new fashionable bell shape. Costume complete, 10/6; carriage paid, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage paid, 5d. extra.

Design No. 949. 6/6. Fashionable Costume Skirt. Made in Vicuna Cloth or in the world-renowned Specialite Serge, two sterling cloths, unsurpassed for durability and wear. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Fawn, Light and Dark Grey, Royal Blue Grey, Cardinal, Green, Purple, etc. This Skirt has the new graduated flounce, which is lined with good linenette. Price only 6/6; carriage, 5d. extra. All sizes in stock. Money returned if not approved.

Design No. 934. 8/11. Superior Costume Skirt, with three shaped frills, graduated at back. Each frill is trimmed with braid. There are three additional rows of braid at top of frills. Made in all shades of A. F. & Co.'s Vicuna Cloth or Specialite Serge. A Great Bargain for 8/11; sent carriage paid, 5d. extra. This Skirt can be ordered in the new "Coronate" Cloth, trimmed glace silk in place of braid. Price, 15/11; carriage, 5d.

ALLEN FOSTER & Co., The London Manufacturers,

47, GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MELLIN'S FOOD

In Infancy or sickness the food must be in a form suited to the state of the digestive functions. Children and Invalids cannot digest and absorb many substances which prove nutritious to those with vigorous digestive organs. Mellin's Food contains everything tending to rapid nutrition in infancy or sickness. It is ready for almost immediate digestion. It is speedily taken up by the blood and carried to every part of the body, contributing to its nutrition.

For Infants and Invalids.

SAMPLE BOTTLE ON APPLICATION. MENTION THIS MAGAZINE.

MELLIN'S FOOD WORKS, PECKHAM, S.E.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

Connoisseurs of COFFEE

DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST & AFTER DINNER.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary coffee.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

Vol. 6. MAY, 1902. No. 8.

Price Sixpence.

Published at 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"You look unusually fresh this morning, dear!"

"I really feel so; I use

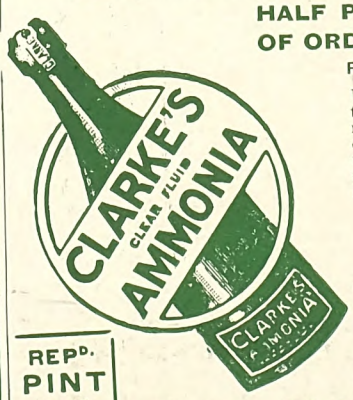
CLARKE'S AMMONIA

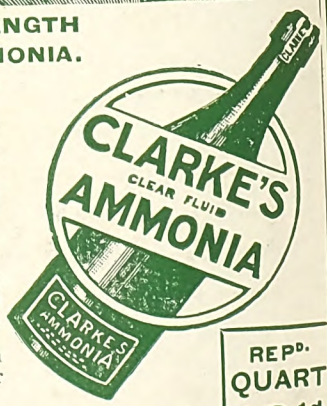
in my bath."

HALF PRICE and DOUBLE STRENGTH OF ORDINARY HOUSEHOLD AMMONIA.

Retains its Strength to the Last Drop.

Used in the Bath all the year round, this popular Ammonia gives a delightful, refreshing feeling to the person. Its cleansing properties are manifested when used for washing China, Glass, Silver, Clothes, &c. It is a necessity as well as a luxury, and its low price brings it within the reach of all.





AGENTS EVERYWHERE.

If any difficulty in obtaining, send us a postcard, and we will forward name and address of nearest dealer.

Large Sample Bottle Free on receipt of 3 penny stamps for postage.

REPD. PINT 6d.

REPD. QUART 10½d.

Address:—CLARKE'S, 360, Old Kent Road, S.E.

ADCLIFFE LIBRARY 11 OCT 1902

Digitized by Google

HOVIS

TRADE MARK.

Is always nice for tea.

Most Family Bakers make Hovis Bread daily. Should your Baker not make it we will send local agents' addresses on request. HOVIS, LTD., MACCLESFIELD.

NOTE.—No Loaf is genuine unless stamped "HOVIS."

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

FROM SIX WEEKS.

Brought up on

"FRAME-FOOD."

It possesses all the constituents necessary for the full development of Infants and growing children. The most easily digested food on the market, specially suitable for Infants, however young, who are deprived of Breast Milk.

In Tins, 16 oz. for 1s.

FREE TEST.—1-lb. sample tin of "FRAME-FOOD" or 5-oz. sample jar "FRAME-FOOD" JELLY, sent free on receipt of 3d. to pay postage; both samples sent for 4d. postage. (Mention this Magazine.)

FRAME-FOOD CO., LTD., BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.

FROM THREE MONTHS.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

HUNDREDS OF LADIES

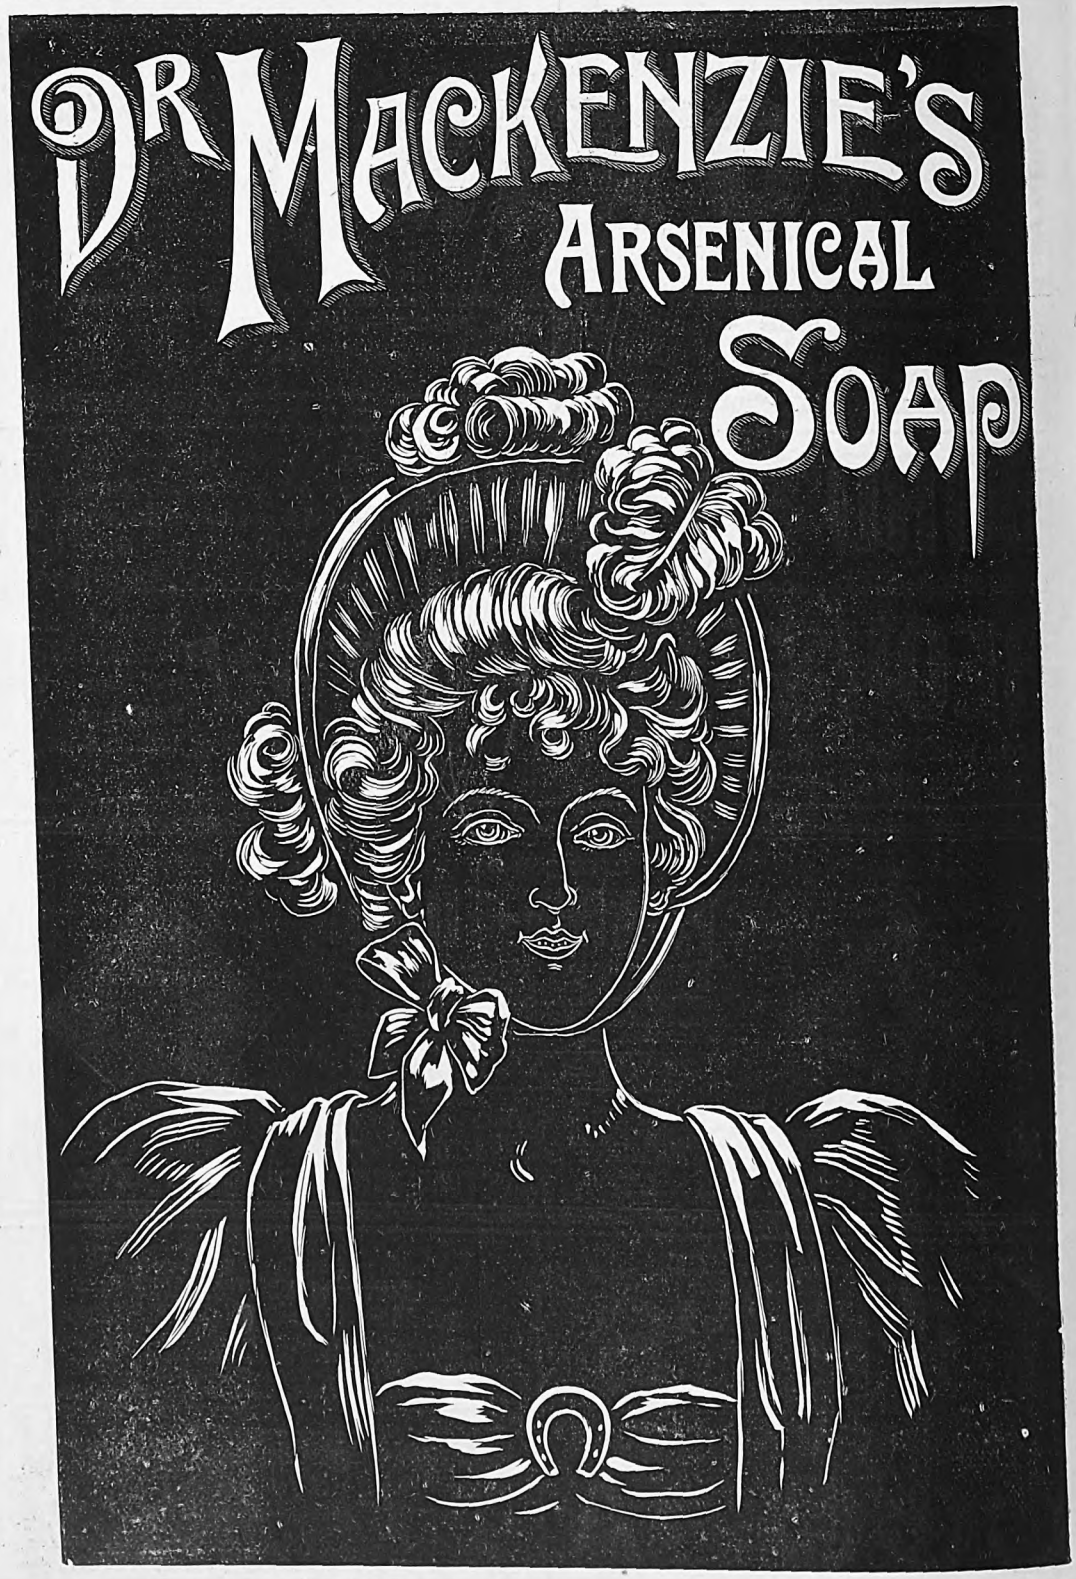
are testifying to the value of

DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS.

They eradicate the imperfections, and make the Skin pure, fresh and velvety. Sold by Chemists in boxes at 2/9 and 4/6. Sample Box, post free, 2/6.

Postal Dept., S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., S.E.

Digitized by Google



Produces the most lovely complexion. Deliciously and expensively perfumed. 1s. per tablet—3 in box for 2s. 6d.
At all Chemists or Stores, or post free from S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman Street, London Bridge.

Digitized by Google

See SPECIAL OFFER at Foot to those who have not tried KOKO.

Guaranteed to PREVENT HAIR FALLING, and CLEAR the HEAD of SCURF & DANDRIFF.

Supplied by special Royal Commands to H.I.M. THE EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.

Prevents Hair Turning Grey.

KOKO

FOR THE HAIR

Ensures Magnificent Tresses.

Her Majesty the Queen and H.R.H. Princess Marie of Greece, the Princesses Beatrice, Victoria, Maud, and Hohenlohe use "KOKO," for the Hair, and speak very highly of it. The letters may be seen at the Offices of the Koko-Maricopas Co., Ltd., 16, Bevis Marks, London.

Windsor Castle—Colonel G. J. Ivey wrote: I can conscientiously state that "KOKO" for the Hair has performed all you say. I have found it most efficacious, and shall certainly recommend it to all my friends.

KOKO IS DELIGHTFULLY COOLING, REFRESHING, AND INVIGORATING.

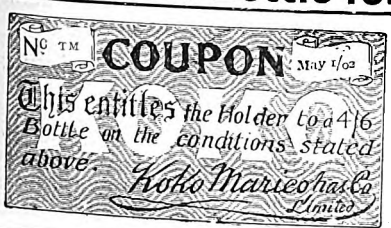
A Doctor writes: (The original may be seen at the Company's Offices). Gentlemen,—After using your "KOKO" for over six months, I must acknowledge its superiority over any other dressing for the hair which I have tried. It keeps the head perfectly cool, and it does eradicate dandriff, and gives the hair a fine glossy appearance. The medical treatment of dandriff may be summed up in six words—viz., "Keep the head saturated with oil." No doubt this is efficient; but if we adopt this method, the head becomes dirty for the simple reason that all moving particles are caught and retained by the oil; and again, bed-linen is rendered disgusting by being stained. Now, your "KOKO" possesses none of these disadvantages, and is equally, if not more effectual. It is for this reason that I prefer it to any other dressing. Since first trying it, I have used no other, and have great pleasure in recommending it to my friends and patients. I send you this little note merely to let you know how well pleased I am with your preparation.

KOKO, being a strong Nerve Tonic, is Strengthening to the Brain.

Write to the Koko-Maricopas Co., Ltd., 16, Bevis Marks, London, E.C., for Dr. Wm. M. BAIRD'S Pamphlet—"GOOD HAIR—HOW KEPT," and Book of Testimonials. Sent post free.

SPECIAL OFFER to those who have not yet tried KOKO.

A 4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/-



Any person forwarding this Coupon and P.O. for Two Shillings, and Four Stamps to pay postage, packing, &c., will receive immediately for trial, by Parcel Post, under cover, prepaid, ONE REGULAR TWELVE-OUNCE BOTTLE OF KOKO FOR THE HAIR, the price of which is FOUR SHILLINGS and SIXPENCE, provided it is ordered within TEN DAYS FROM THE DATE OF THIS OFFER. In no case will more than one bottle be sent for the use of the same person on this Coupon, as we make the offer solely for trial, knowing that it creates a demand when once used; and this large bottle gives it a fair trial. We find it better to thus practically GIVE AWAY one bottle to make a customer than to spend large amounts in advertising. ANY PERSON INTO WHOSE HANDS THIS OFFER COMES MAY AVAIL THEMSELVES OF IT. Address all Orders with Coupons to

The KOKO-MARICOPAS CO., Ltd.,
16, Bevis Marks, London.

Orders may be sent with this Coupon after the expiration of date, providing we are then issuing these trial bottle Coupons, and if we are not, the money will be returned. This Coupon will be received at 16, BEVIS MARKS, E.C., or 113, REGENT STREET, W., and TWO SHILLINGS only will be required when presented personally. KOKO is sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., at 2/6 and 4/6 per bottle.

For the sake of a greater profit, you may be asked to buy some other Hair preparation. In justice to yourself and to us, kindly insist on having KOKO.

Digitized by Google

THE THREE GREAT SCOURGES,

ALCOHOL, MORPHINE, COCAINE.

The Hutton-Dixon Vegetable Antidote,

A HIGH-CLASS, UP-TO-DATE, PHYSICAL HOME CURE FOR

ALCOMOL and DRUG ADDICTIONS.

Also of great value in cases of Insomnia, Neurasthenia and Nerve Exhaustion. Can be carried in the Pocket and taken Privately—thus obviating the Publicity, Expense, and loss of time of an Institute treatment.

WARRANTED FREE FROM NARCOTICS.

Patronised by the Nobility and All Classes.

AN IDEAL HOME CURE.

This humane discovery has been publicly endorsed before the Congress of Bishops, and at Father Matthew's Anniversaries, also by Clergymen from their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in nearly every quarter of the Globe. Over Six Thousand Cases have been treated successfully.

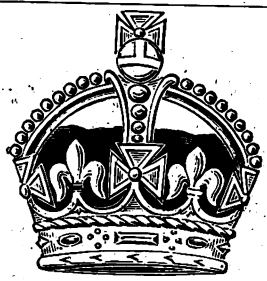
In this treatment there are no hypodermic injections, it being a purely vegetable medicine taken by the mouth, can be carried in the pocket, and taken in perfect privacy at home or anywhere. In from one to three days, and often in as many hours, after commencing this treatment the desire or crave will have so completely disappeared that the victim would not give a penny for all the liquor or drugs in the country for his own use. Among the immediate effects of this treatment are calm, restful sleep, steady nerves, clear brain, increased appetite for food and pronounced benefit in every way physically and mentally, with a positive guarantee that there shall be only good after effects and a permanent removal of all appetite for intoxicating liquors or drugs of any kind, all of which is indorsed by scores of physicians, clergymen of every denomination, and men and women in all phases of life in many parts of the world. This is an absolutely harmless home treatment, and an up to date physical cure backed by and vouched for by testimonials unapproached by any other treatment for these habits.

Full particulars and indisputable testimony sent free in a plain sealed envelope. All correspondence strictly confidential.

N.B.—The Testimonials published in my circulars are unique, inasmuch as I print (by kind permission) the full names and addresses of the subscribers thereto, so that the genuineness of the certificates can easily be verified. Glowing letters of recommendation may readily be written and left unsigned, or signed with initials only, but what the public need now-a-days are the hard facts which cannot be denied or controverted, and these I furnish.

Address:—ALEX. H. DIXON, 5, Cannon Place, BRIGHTON, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google



THE CORONATION.

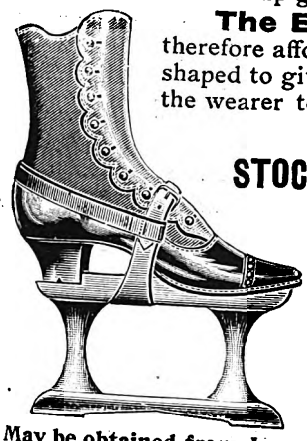
ADDISON'S PATENT ELEVATORS

BUDD Sc. WHAMPTON

APPLIED FOR—OFFICIAL No. 3814.

Come as a boon to thousands, enabling spectators to stand in the background and see one of the grandest sights in the world's history at a trifling cost.

It is an astounding but simple fact that persons 5 ft. 6 in. high using a 6 in. pair of Addison's Elevators are raised to 6 ft., and can walk and balance themselves with ease. Invaluable to spectators at football matches or any out-door sports, keeping the wearer off the damp ground; especially adapted for race meetings.



The Elevators are shaped to the concurve of the boots, and therefore afford ease and rest to the muscles of the foot; the bottom is also shaped to give a gripping action to the pavement, enabling the wearer to walk with ease.

Made in Various Heights.

STOCK HEIGHTS & PRICES PER PAIR.

4 in. 4/-	6 in. 4/6
8 in. 4/9	10 in. 5/-

H.A. & CO. also make a strong but plainer pattern.

4 in. 3/6	6 in. 3/9
8 in. 4/-	10 in. 4/3

May be obtained from Ironmongers and Boot Shops, or direct from the Manufacturers, who will forward the same per Parcel Post upon receipt of 6d. extra to cover postage.

HEEL STRAPS FOR LADIES SUPPLIED, IF REQUIRED, AT 8d. PER PAIR EXTRA.

HY. ADDISON & CO., LTD.,

WELLINGTON, SALOP,

Manufacturers of Modern School, College and Mission Room Furniture, Folding Partitions and Wood Mantels. Catalogues Free.

LONDON AGENT: B. S. BROCKBANK, The Coalbrookdale Co., Ltd.
SHOWROOMS: 141, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., where specimens may be inspected.

Digitized by Google

SANDOW'S PERFECT SYSTEM OF PHYSICAL CULTURE

Successfully taught by post for 2/6.

Owing to the large number of communications received from all parts of the world asking advice on my system of Muscular Development from those unable to attend my Schools of Physical Culture, it became apparent to me that something would have to be done to cope with the ever-increasing demand for more knowledge of my methods; and to meet the intense interest which has of late been centred upon this subject by men, women, and children, and after giving the matter due care and consideration, I have decided to introduce my Physical Culture system by Post. No pains have been spared to make this system perfect, and one of its greatest features will be the attention given to every application. The general health and strength is most carefully considered from the filled-up form beneath before the course most suited for the student's individual requirement is despatched. I have been so far successful that I can produce proof in flesh and blood which will fully bear out my assertions that it is the most perfect system yet introduced for Developing the Body and Improving the General Health.

It is undoubtedly the next best thing to a personal course of training at my well-known Physical Schools.

Fill up this Form and send it with Postal Order to the address at foot of page.

ADDITIONAL MEASUREMENT FORMS SUPPLIED FREE ON APPLICATION.

MEASUREMENT FORM. (The Temple Magazine.)

1 Month's Course, 2/6; 3 Months', 7/-; 6 Months', 12/6; 12 Months', 21/-.

Money enclosed ..... Course desired.....

DATE.....190

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

PARTICULARS.

Heart, condition of..... Age.....

Lungs, condition of..... Sex.....

Digestion, condition of..... Occupation.....

Nature of illness, if any..... Athletics, if any, and when.....

How long ago?..... Have you a "Sandow Developer"?.....

Physical peculiarity, if any..... Have you "Grip" Dumb-bell?.....

Reference No......of last Course, if any. Do you read "Sandow's Magazine"?.....

NECK.	CHEST CONTRACTED.	CHEST EXPANDED.	UPPER RIGHT ARM.	UPPER LEFT ARM.	FOREARM RIGHT.	FOREARM LEFT.	WAIST.

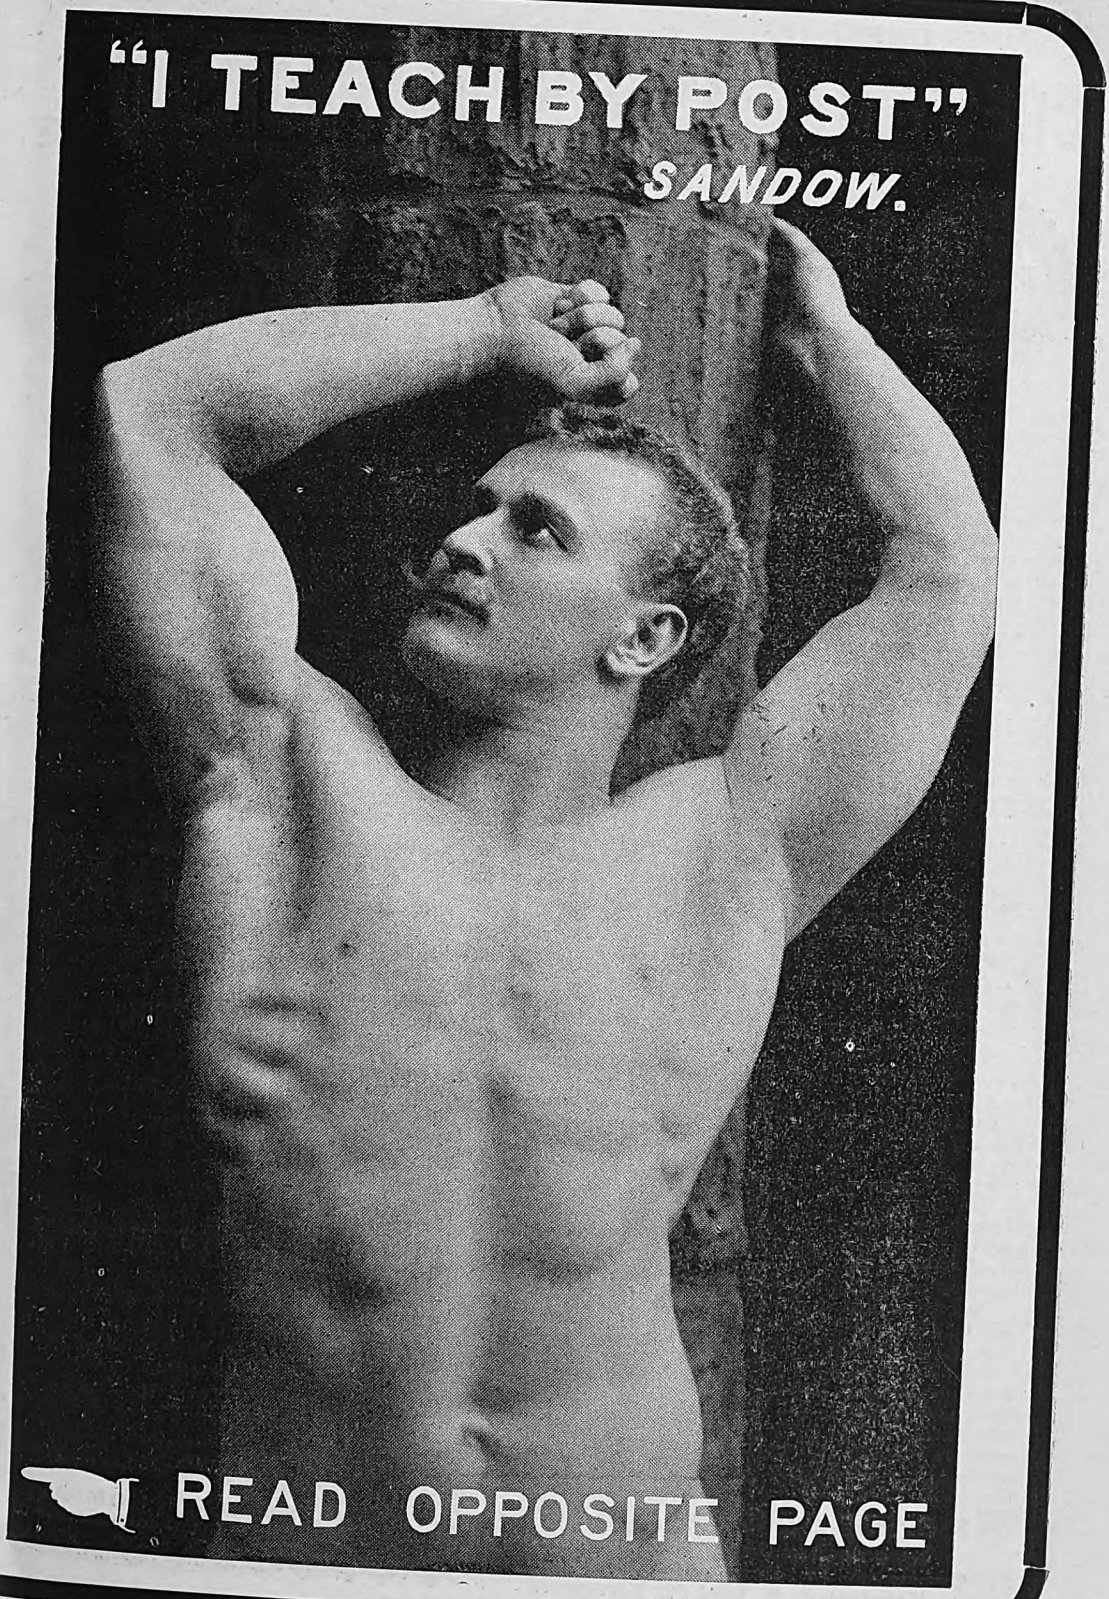
THIGH RIGHT.	THIGH LEFT.	CALF RIGHT.	CALF LEFT.	HEIGHT.	WEIGHT.

Sandow' Large Dumb-Bell Chart given free with each first course, usual price, 1s. 6d.

ADDRESS :—

SANDOW'S POSTAL INSTRUCTION DEPT., 17-18, Basinghall St., London, E.C.

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

NO CURE, NO PAY!

CHRONIC

CHEST DISEASES.

GOOD NEWS TO SUFFERERS.

HELP FOR THE CHEST DISEASES CURED HOPELESS

ASTHMA . . .

BRONCHITIS .

CONSUMPTION

POSITIVELY CURED PERMANENTLY.

All sufferers will rejoice at the good news that at last there is a safe, certain, and permanent cure for those three dread diseases, Consumption, Asthma, and Chronic Bronchitis, with such distressing Symptoms as Cough, Phlegm and Blood Spitting, Wheezing and Tightness at Chest, Difficulty in Breathing, Suffocating Sensations, Pains in Chest and between Shoulders, Loss of Flesh and Strength, &c., &c. The most severe cases have been quite cured, which can be proved beyond dispute.

READ THESE LETTERS.

Grosvenor Street, Pendlebury, October 4th, 1901.

DEAR SIR,—I advise all sufferers from Consumption to place themselves under your treatment without delay, for I am sure that your treatment can cure any case as bad as mine was, and mine could not have been worse. Hoping that you may long live to cure other sufferers, and with all my heart again thanking you for curing me, Believe me, dear sir, yours truly gratefully,

(Miss) F. L——.

Derwent Street, Belper, Sept. 22nd.

DEAR SIR,—I am glad to tell you that I am quite a new man altogether; I don't know myself. I have lost my cough, and my breathing is quite different altogether, and I am gaining flesh, for I have gained 7 lbs. in weight. I can walk up hills or anywhere now, and not take the slightest notice of it. It is only your remedies that have done it. I shall have another month's medicines in the course of a week or so.—Yours truly,

F. W. S——.

Long Lane, Aughton, Jan. 27th, 1902.

PROFESSOR HERN,—DEAR SIR,—I am very pleased and thankful to be able to say that since I was under your treatment last year I have never had an attack of bronchitis. My chest seems to be getting quite strong. I shall ever be very grateful to you, and I pray that by God's help you may go on with your great work, looking ever unto Him to help you.—I remain, your ever-grateful friend,

A. M——.

The full names and address of these patients and hundreds more supplied to sufferers doubting the cure.

Professor Hern is the originator of the most Successful System of Treatment ever discovered for Chest Diseases. It comprises separate Cures for each kind of Chest Complaint, and each Cure is specially adapted to meet the particular requirements of each individual case. The treatment strikes right at the root of the disease, and entirely eradicates it in a remarkably short time. No minerals, poisons, or dangerous remedies are used, and there is no experimenting. Patent Medicines afford only a little ease, but never cure these diseases—a special treatment is required.

Arrangements can be made for Treatment to be paid for after the cure has been effected.

Sufferers wishing to be quickly restored to perfect health and strength should write to Professor Hern, naming complaint, mentioning the TEMPLE MAGAZINE, and enclosing six penny stamps, when full information will be sent by return of post. Those sufferers able to call at either of the three permanent Consulting Rooms should do so. Consultations free.

PROFESSOR HERN,

Specialist in Chest Diseases,

89, Corporation St., Birmingham; 268, Oxford St., Manchester; 85, Lord St., Liverpool.

HYPNOTISM

The art of hypnotising may be learnt at home. You should take up this fascinating pastime for you will be delighted with the power and knowledge it gives you. Our new and original system of lessons by post makes it all clear and easy for beginners.

FREE Book for . . . . . Beginners.

A most remarkable Illustrated Book for Beginners can be had by post for the asking. This book gives full instructions on how to set about learning Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism, Nerve Control, etc. It tells you things you have long wanted to know.

A hypnotist controls the minds of his subjects. He makes them see, feel, believe and act as he directs. Within certain well defined bounds he is absolutely their master for the time being. He can often cure pain and disease with a word or wave of the hand. He can influence and impress others in daily life through his special knowledge.

HUNDREDS OF TESTIMONIALS in this strain:—"Words cannot express my thanks for this wonderful knowledge." "The book is worth ten times its weight in gold." "I would not take £1,000 for my new knowledge." "It was a fortunate day for me when I first saw your advertisement," etc., etc.

Hypnotism is an art studied and used by many of the world's greatest doctors, lawyers, clergymen and scientists. Owing to a strange ignorance it will be many years before it is generally understood. So much the better for the few who take it up now and surprise their friends with some startling example of their new power. Send for the Free Book, entitled "The Power Within," to-day. Enclose name and address plainly written, with 1d. stamp for return postage.—Address:

PSYCHIC RESEARCH COMPANY

Dept. (408) Temple Chambers, Temple Ave., E.C.

Digitized by Google

A FREE GIFT

TO EVERY READER OF THIS ISSUE.

A SERIES of MINIATURE ILLUSTRATIONS of our

GENUINE

Steel-Plate Engravings

and CHARMING ENGLISH GRAVURES, will be Presented Free of Charge

To EVERY READER of THIS ISSUE

applying at the Offices of The City of London Fine Art Society, 5, Victoria Avenue, Bishopsgate Street, London, E.C., or same will be forwarded to any Reader (at home or abroad) on receipt of the following Coupon duly filled up.

A FULL-SIZE Specimen Plate of our 3s. 6d. HIGH-CLASS PICTURES, 30 by 22 inches (superior to many Guinea Prints), will gladly be sent ON APPROVAL to any Reader.

SPECIAL COUPON AVAILABLE FOR EVERY READER.

The Reader must cut out this Coupon, fill in Name and Address in full, and forward same with Three Stamps for postage.

*Name in full*_____

*Address in full*_____

Send at once the above Coupon, with your Name and Address duly filled in, enclosing Three Penny Stamps for the postage of the parcel.

CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY,
5, Victoria Avenue, Bishopsgate Street, London, E.C.

[PLEASE TURN OVER.

Digitized by Google

DISTRIBUTION OF GENUINE STEEL-PLATE, ENGRAVINGS & ENGLISH GRAVURES

TO THE READERS OF THIS ISSUE.

FOR INSTRUCTIONS SEE BELOW

Coupon No. 1 'In the Cornfields.' John Constable, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 2 'Crossing the Brook.' J. M. W. Turner, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 3 'A Scotch Headland.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 4 'A Rock-Bound Coast.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 5 'THE CHALLENGE' Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 6 'THE SANCTUARY' Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 7 'The Market Boat.' W Clarkson Stanfield, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 8 'The Ferry Boat.' W. Clarkson Stanfield, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 9 'BOLTON ABBEY.' Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 10 'In the Highlands.' Sir Edwin Landseer R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 11 'THE LAND'S END, CORNWALL.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 12 'THE NEEDLES, ISLE OF WIGHT.' Alexander Mortimer On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 13 'ESCAPED.' Richard Ansdell, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 14 'A Day on the Moors.' James Hardy On Plate Paper 30 by 22in	Coupon No. 15 'The Glebe Farm.' John Constable, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No 16 'FLATFORD MILL.' John Constable, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No 17 'Lincoln Cathedral.' J. R. Hutchinson. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No 18 'Lichfield Cathedral.' J R. Hutchinson On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 19 'A Surging Torrent' Jacob Ruisdael. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No 20 'A Mountain Stream.' Jacob Ruisdael On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 21 'RETURNING FROM MARKET.' Sir A. Callcott, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 22 'IN THE DAYS OF LONG AGO.' H Stacy Marks, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 23 'THE CLIFFS OF OLD ENGLAND.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 24 'THE HOME OF THE SEAGULL.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 25 'Waiting the Word.' James Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 26 'ON THE HILLS.' James Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 27 'HAPPY DAYS.' Fred. Morgan. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 28 'CROSSING THE STREAM.' Fred Morgan. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 29 'Early Morning.' B. W. Leader, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 30 'Departing Day.' B. W. Leader, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in	Coupon No. 31 FISHING SMACKS LEAVING HOME.' T. B. Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in	Coupon No. 32 'RETURN OF THE FISHING BOATS.' T. B. Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 33 'In the Nick of Time' R Caton Woodville On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 34 'ENRAPTURED!' Life. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 35 'A Good Day's Sport.' James Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 36 'OUT OF REACH.' Richard Ansdell, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in

INSTRUCTIONS.

Our Readers must detach the Coupons for the particular Subjects required, and forward them to THE CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY, 5, VICTORIA AVENUE, BISHOPSGATE STREET, LONDON, E.C., together with a Postal Order for 3s. 6d. for One Subject, 5s. 6d. for Two, 7s. 6d. for Three, 12s. 6d. for Six Subjects, or One Guinea for Twelve. £3 for the complete 36 Subjects.

Readers preferring INDIA PRINTS (giving a softer tone and superior effect) can secure the Pictures on India Paper, and MOUNTED ON PLATE PAPER (32 by 24 inches), at double the above prices.

These payments will cover all charges, including Plates, Copyright, packing, case, carriage and all other expenses.

EVERY READER SECURING THESE PICTURES WILL BE GIVEN A SIGNED GUARANTEE THAT THESE GENUINE STEEL-PLATE ENGRAVINGS and GRAVURES ARE ALL PRODUCED DIRECT FROM THE ACTUAL PLATES.

We have also made arrangements to supply these Pictures BEAUTIFULLY COLORED by HAND in WATER-COLORS, at the nominal cost of 5s. each EXTRA, and lovers of the artistic will find this an opportunity that they should not fail to take advantage of. Each Water-Color Painting will be signed by the Artist to enhance the Value of the Picture.

If the instructions given above are faithfully carried out, and the Coupons are sent (with name and address carefully written), THE CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY, 5, VICTORIA AVENUE, BISHOPSGATE STREET, LONDON, E.C., undertake to forward the Pictures, carriage paid, TO ANY PART OF THE WORLD (Foreign and Colonial Parcel at 2s. extra), securely packed in a stout case, so that they will arrive in good condition. Money returned in full if the Pictures are not approved.

N.B.—A certain portion of the Issue will be reserved for Foreign and Colonial Readers.

[COPYRIGHT].

[PLEASE TURN OVER.

Digitized by Google

THERE IS NO ESCAPE

FROM THE FATAL RESULTS of dealing on pernicious instalment schemes.

THE HONEST BUYER

may not only find himself saddled with a worthless watch or other article, but pays for those who are unable to keep up the never ending series of weary payments.

H. SAMUEL'S

GREAT SENSATIONAL OFFER!

OPENS THE DOORS OF THE FACTORY TO ALL!
SAVES YOU MANY A POUND.

FOLLOW THE EXAMPLE of thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the world.

SEND A POST CARD AT ONCE FOR THE GRAND FREE BARGAIN GUIDE

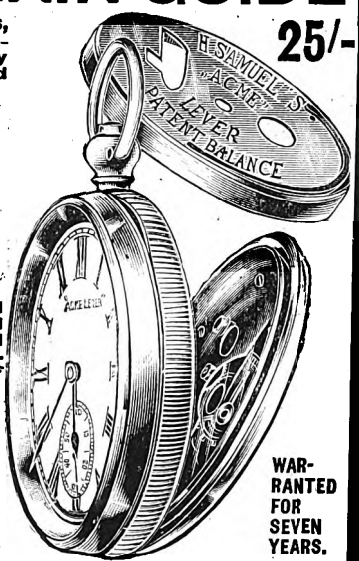
Contains 260 Pages, 3,000 Engravings. SILVER WATCHES 8/6, GOLD DIAMOND RINGS 3/6, ALARM CLOCKS 1/-, GOLD BROOCHES 5/-, ELECTRO SILVER WARE, CUTLERY, MARBLE and every kind of CLOCKS,' MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, FANCY and LEATHER GOODS.

H. SAMUEL'S

WORLD-CELEBRATED

"ACME" LEVER,



Fitted with Dust and Damp Proof Cap, jewelled and timed to a second, heavy, massive cases of pure silver, stamped and fitted with H. SAMUEL'S valuable inventions, protected by His Majesty's Royal Letters Patent. Sent post free on receipt of P.O. 25s. together with a Free Bonus Reward of a SOLID SILVER ALBERT.

A WATCH TO WEAR A LIFETIME.

THOUSANDS OF ENTHUSIASTIC LETTERS

From delighted Purchasers in every part of the world, testifying to its remarkable endurance, elegance, and accuracy.

WARRANTED FOR SEVEN YEARS.

FROM FACTORY TO WEARER DIRECT.

H. SAMUEL distributes among his customers thousands of VALUABLE FREE GIFTS.

Ten Lists to Choose From!!

WRITE TO-DAY: WRITE TO-DAY:

H. SAMUEL, DEPT. 61, MARKET ST., MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

A WONDERFUL INVENTION . .

for the

LAME.

As Supplied to the War Office for the Wounded from South Africa.

THE O'CONNOR EXTENSION CO.'S PATENT APPLIANCES

Enable those with Shortened Limbs and Weak Ankles to dispense with Unsightly Instruments, to Wear Ordinary Shoes, and to look like other people.

FLAT FOOT.

The New Patent . . . . Arch Support

CAN BE ADAPTED TO HELP ANY CASE OF FLAT FOOT.

A New Book on the Mechanical Treatment of Flat Foot will be sent FREE.

TENDER FEET.

The New . . . . Patent Socks

CAN BE MOULDED TO FIT THE SOLE OF ANY FOOT.

Describe the case, send a pair of old boots or shoes and 5/- A pair of Socks will be sent POST FREE. (United Kingdom).

GOLD MEDAL, LONDON; HIGHEST AWARDS, CHICAGO AND PARIS.

ADDRESS:

The O'Connor Extension Co.,

SURGICAL APPLIANCE MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT,

2, BLOOMSBURY STREET,

LONDON, W.C.

PAMPHLETS FREE on mentioning The Temple Magazine. Please give particulars of the case.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Edited by CHARLES HERBERT.

CONTENTS FOR MAY, 1902.

			PAGE
I.	Portrait of the late Rev. T. de Witt Talmage, D.D.		Frontispiece
II.	The People's Friend; or, the Adventures of Carlton-Hawes. Illustrated.	Charles Herbert	655
III.	May Meeting Dinners	Frank Harris	663
IV.	The Sobering of Jim Russell. Story. Illustrated.		667
V.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.		670
VI.	An Electric Tram Without Rails. Illustrated.		674
VII.	Chat Concerning Cecil Rhodes	The Editor	676
VIII.	A Miserable Mistake Illustrated.	Grace Duke	678
IX.	The King of the Desert	Full Page Illustration	684
X.	The White Lady of the Zenana. Serial Story. Chapters II. and III. Illustrated by Fitzgerald.	Miss H. Bourchier, M.D.	685
XI.	A Quarrelsome Neighbour Illustrated.		698
XII.	How the Sunshine Society Grew. With Portrait		701
XIII.	A Born Poet. A Skit		703
XIV.	Where the Sunbeam Lay. A Parable		704
XV.	Audrey's Promise. A Long Complete Story. Illustrated.		705
XVI.	My Master's Daughter	Full Page Illustration	718
XVII.	In the Belfry	Full Page Illustration	720
XVIII.	A True Briton. With Portrait.		722
XIX.	Realising Our Colonies—(I.) CANADA. Illustrated.		723
XX.	A Modern Esdras. An Original Dialogue. Illustrated.	Wolfe Street	725
XXI.	The Initial Velocity. Story. Illustrated.		730
XXII.	A Surface Current. Illustrated.	Beth Bannester, B.A.	733
XXIII.	The Prey Secured	Full Page Illustration	737
XXIV.	The Protestant Reformation Society. Illustrated.		739

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. The Editor will be obliged if, before sending any manuscript, a letter is sent him describing the purport of the article or enclosing a précis of the story. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to THE MANAGER, 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. MATHER AND CROWTHER, BRIDEWELL PLACE, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

INSIST ON HAVING

PETER'S

THE ORIGINAL

MILK-CHOCOLATE

IMITATIONS LACK THE CHARM AND DELICACY OF PETER'S.

A SWEETMEAT AND A FOOD

Sold Everywhere in 1d., 2d., 3d., 6d. and 1s. Tablets; 6d. and 1s. Croquettes.

Sole Agents: S. J. MACKENZIE & Co., LTD., London.

No More Chapped or Rough Skin!

"BEETHAM'S Reg^d Larola"

will very soon remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, CHAPS, IRRITATION, &c., and render THE SKIN delicately SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE. Try a 6d. bottle. Its effect will delight you! Bottles, 6d., 1/-, 2/6, of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

BEST IN 1894.

THE PALMER TYRE

BEST NOW.

The ONLY HIGH GRADE TYRE

NOW ON THE MARKET.

For Durability, Palmer Tyres stand alone.

FULLY GUARANTEED.

Write for Manual containing 11 Sectional Road Maps and 1 Key Map of the British Isles.

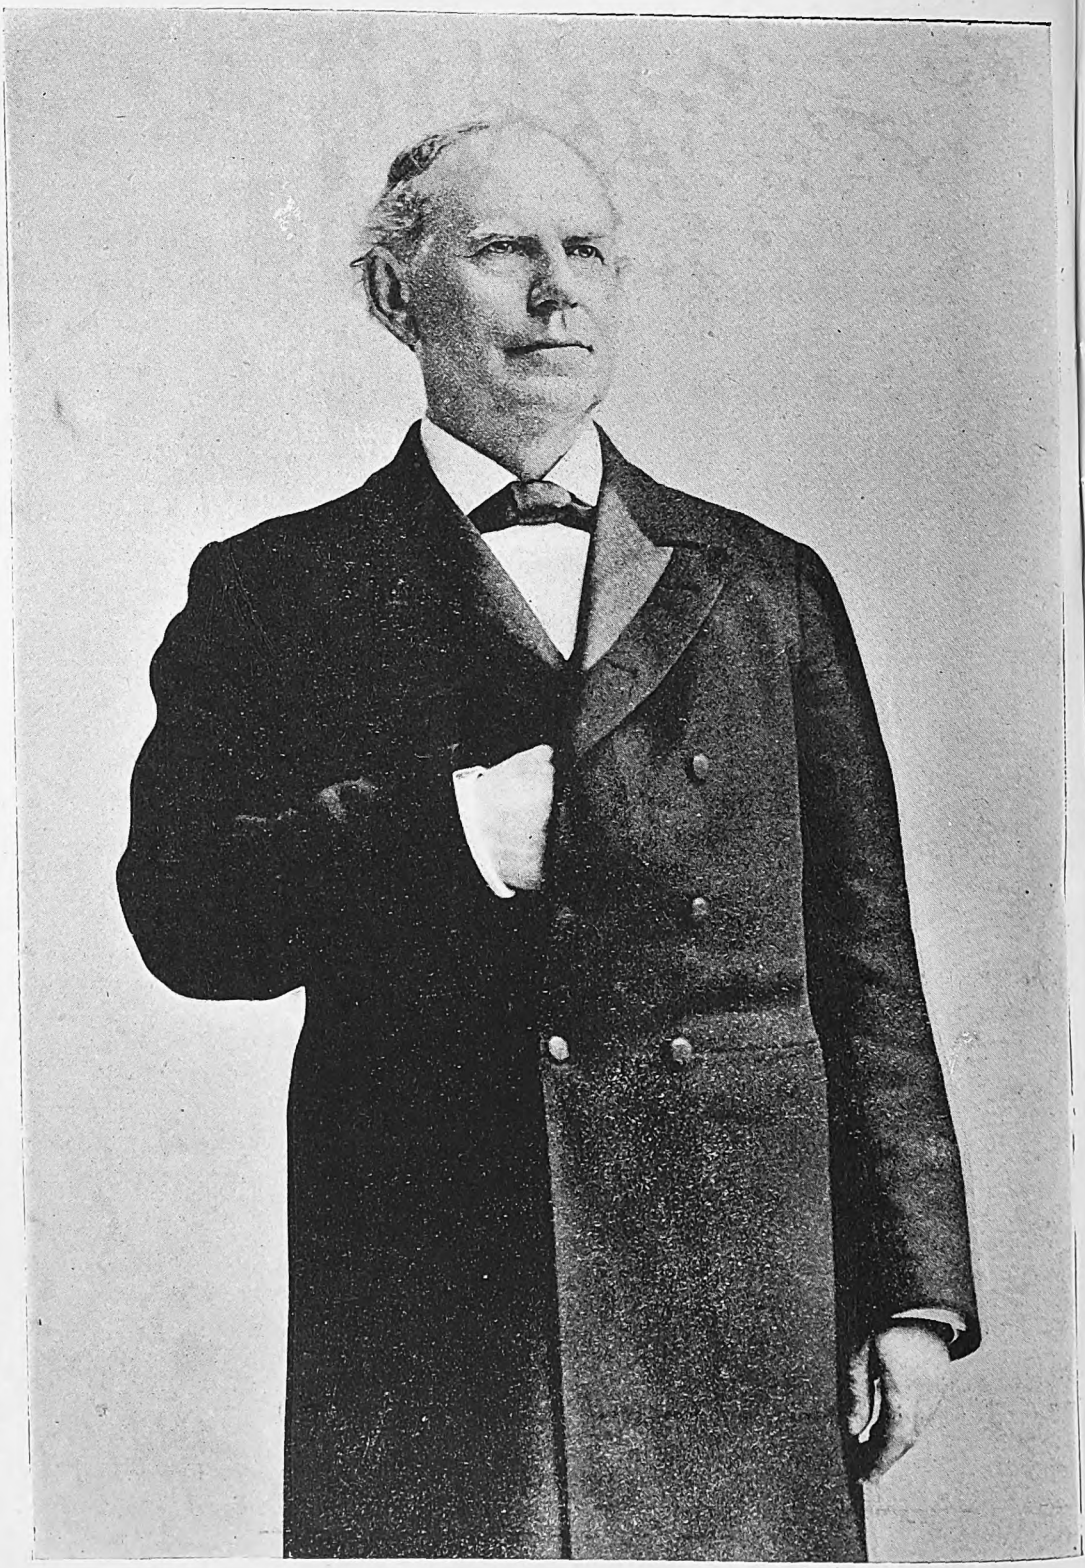
The PALMER TYRE, Ltd.,

Dept. T.M., BIRMINGHAM.

These Tyres are manufactured under license from the North British Rubber Co., Ltd., under Bartlett's Patent.

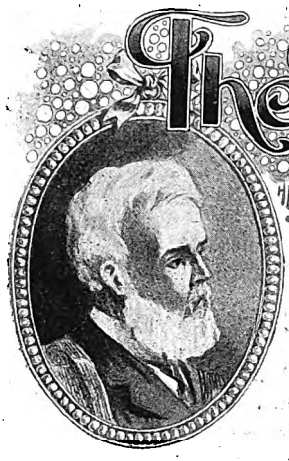
Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



THE LATE REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

Digitized by Google



The People's Friend

OR,

The Adventures of Carlton-Hawes.

By CHARLES HERBERT.

II.

IT is breakfast-time at the Exeter branch of the Bank of Willis and Somerville's, but the manager, Mr. Wyatt, for once in his methodical, punctual life is a little late, having cut himself rather severely during his morning shave. His wife, a little, timid, shrinking woman, fidgets about the dining-room lest there should be any thing wrong, while she keeps an eye on the door.

"I shall have to hurry this morning, my dear," says her husband, bustling in. "I am positively fifteen minutes late, through this wretched gash on my cheek. I believe my hand was shaking through my disturbed night's rest. How restless you have been the whole night through."

"I couldn't help it, Richard. I've had the most uncomfortable feeling that something is wrong with Bert, and I can't shake it off anyhow."

"Stuff and nonsense!" returns Mr. Wyatt, cheerily. "The boy's all right! Far better than he would be tied to your apron-strings at home. It will make a man of him!" And he proceeds to help himself to bacon.

Just then, the servant bringing in the letters, his wife says, hastily, "Open your letters, dear, there may be some news."

"No,"—turning over the letters—"Yes! Here is something from Bert!"

He tears the envelope with impatient hand, glances swiftly through the letter, and this is what he reads:—

Rusholme
Manchester
Saturday

Dear Dad,

I know you'll never trust me again, when you hear what I have to tell you. I don't mean anyway out of it or I would try. Dad. She won't be telling, and we lost a great deal but that's not the worst. I have let myself to a business and the firm's money. They don't know it yet and I thought if you would pay Landers the money I could put it back. Will you? If you don't I don't know what I am to do. I think I had better kill myself.

Your affectionate Son
Bert

He lays it down and mechanically goes on with his breakfast; but his wife, who is used to mark the changes in his somewhat impassive countenance, sees a glint of hardening in his eyes that alarms her.

"Richard!" she cries, "I know there is something wrong. Don't keep it from me. Is Bert ill?"

"Yes," he answers, "he is. Very, very ill. So ill," he adds doggedly, "that I could wish he were dead."

He pushes his plate away irritably as he says this, and, beginning to pace the room, he declaims sharp, staccato sentences, each one stabbing the heart of the mother.

"He has robbed the firm!" Here he turns and comes back. "He has proved himself a thief!" Here he turns again.

Copyright in United States. All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

"He has been companying with betting men!" Another turn. "He writes they will prosecute if they find it out." Then he stops short, breathing heavily.

"But how did it happen?" gasps the mother. "Has he been let into it?"

"No! He writes plainly enough. It's only too clear, Mary. What shall we say to people? Our boy's a thief! a thief!"

She looks at him in despair. "You will go at once, dear?" she pleads. "Bert will want you. And perhaps you can say something or do something to put matters right."

"Never!" he cries, beginning again to pace the room. "If it were one of my clerks he would have to face it. And so must Bert. I will write him to engage a solicitor to defend him if they prosecute; but I will not go. And neither shall you!"

"Richard, you have a heart of stone!" exclaims the wretched woman.

"Mary," he says astonished, "surely you—you know me better than that. But the boy must learn, and, however painful it must be, he must stand on his own feet." And he strides out of the room into the bank and dashes off the fateful letter.

. . . .

"Can I see Mr. Carlton-Hawes?" a lady nervously enquires of the smart page, for she is overwhelmed at the luxurious appearance of the place. "Certainly," she thinks, "a man whose business will support all this will make very little of my affair."

"Mr. Carlton-Hawes will see you in about half-an-hour, madam," is the reply, and she waits with anxious heart for the summons; for in all London it seems to her no one has such a load to carry as her own. Wearily she sinks down into a chair, for she has travelled many miles to see this man, whose fame has reached her through a friend, who, like so many more, has been enthused by his ready advice and marvellous knowledge of human nature. Yet she wonders why she has come: there seems such a finality about her trouble. It is not a catastrophe that can be avoided, it has arrived. Yet she is there, racked with wonder, whether this specialist in human affairs can show her the best thing to do.

There is the sound of an electric bell, and she hears the rustle of a lady's dress pass the closed door, and is just wondering whether the invisible woman has found some way out of the care that drove her to this haven of the perplexed, when the door opens, and in his gown Carlton-Hawes himself appears.

"You did not make an appointment with me," he says, gravely, "and it is getting late," glancing at the clock. "Would it not be better to say some other day?"

"No, no!" cries the lady. "Every day will count now and may be too late. I have come from Devonshire on purpose to see you, and I must return to-night. I have left without my husband's knowledge. Please do let me tell you my tale!" beseechingly.

"Certainly," he replies, "if it is as pressing as that, and meanwhile can I have your trains looked out for you? To Exeter you go I see, Mrs. Wyatt," looking at her card." And he gives the requisite directions.

"Now please," he continues, "just take your time, and tell me the story in your own way."

Then she hesitates, but finally she says, with a wan smile, "I'm afraid you'll think me very silly to consult you over a matter in which I doubt whether even you can suggest anything, but if you can't there is no one can, and my boy is ruined!" And her face begins to work pitifully, while her fingers clutch mechanically at her dress.

"Is he at home?" queries Carlton-Hawes.

"No, and I wish he had never left us! But his father always believed in young men going out into the world, and standing on their own feet, and my other boys"—proudly—"managed it, but Bert always was easily led."

"What trouble is he in, then? Is it an entanglement with some girl?"

"No, indeed! Bert isn't one of that kind. But he's been betting, and"—here her voice sinks to a whisper, and her face pales—"he has helped himself to the money of the firm."

"Has it been discovered, or has he written home confessing?" Carlton-Hawes asks.

"They're sure to find it out, Bert says, and so he wrote to my husband before they do, and he—he won't stir a finger to help him. He's very, very hard, and I can't move him. All he did this morning was to walk up and down the room, white with anger, saying no Wyatt had ever been a thief, and he would let him go to prison and suffer."

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"Is it a big sum then?" asks her listener.

"No, only a hundred pounds, which is nothing to us, but it is the awfulness of the thing that appeals to his father, and he is such a good man himself, that he cannot understand anyone being tempted to dishonesty."

"And you say he won't move a finger to help him?"

"No, he has set his lips in one of what I call his rigid moods."

"Then what is to be done?" says Carlton-Hawes.

"O sir!" cries the mother in agonised tones, "couldn't you think of something? Couldn't you pay the money and let me pay it back? I can do it in a few months, or I can borrow it if I had a day or two, and perhaps if poor Bert is saved his father will come round presently and be glad I did it. Can't you, sir, can't you?"

Carlton-Hawes keeps silence a minute or two, then he says abruptly, "What kind of man is his father? Is he a Christian—a professing Christian, I mean? And what is he? Churchman, Dissenter or what?"

"Oh, we are Nonconformists, and have been for many years. My father and my husband were both deacons of our church."

"I see," said Carlton-Hawes, his face lighting up. "I think there may be a way out; at any rate I am coming home with you to see. If we catch a cab in five minutes, we can get to Waterloo and have a few minutes to spare for a little refreshment for you—I suppose you have had nothing?"

"No, it would have choked me!"

"Well, you can have it now! Somehow or other, if it's to be done, we'll pull him through. It's hopeful that he writes before it is too late!"

Four hours later—four hours during which Carlton-Hawes has been weighing the chances of his appeal on behalf of Bert—he finds himself standing in the drawing-room of the bank in which the Wyatts live, waiting to see his client's husband.

After twenty minutes he gets impatient, and, fancying that he hears someone outside the door, he strides to it with quick tread, only to find Mrs. Wyatt standing there nervously and crying bitterly.

"He won't see you!" she says. "I thought he wouldn't! I have never seen him so angry in my life. I am afraid it's no good, after all." And she begins to cry afresh.

"Won't see me, won't he?" exclaims Carlton-Hawes. "Then I'll see him! Where is he?"

"But he'll be so angry!" she expostulates.

"Where is he?" is all the notice that he takes of the impending anger that she so evidently dreads.

"In the—the dining-room," she says, fearfully, adding, "it's the last room along the passage."

And Carlton-Hawes marches at the Red Sea of the other man's wrath, with the full intention of marching through it.

Then he flings open the door, and discovers the angry father standing before the overmantel, frowning fiercely into the glass, an occupation which he continues, taking not a fraction of notice of the new comer.

There is dead silence for a minute or two, during which Carlton Hawes measures his man, and draws his own conclusions; then he says firmly, "You want to see me, Mr. Wyatt!"

But the silence is unbroken. "I say you want to see me, Mr. Wyatt," insistently. "You want to see me, but you don't know it. I have something to say to you; be good enough to sit down and listen!"

But Mr. Wyatt does not budge. Quick as lightning Carlton Hawes pushes a chair nearer the obdurate man and lays a hand upon his shoulder. Then at last Mr. Wyatt turns, and meeting Carlton Hawes's commanding gaze, sits down obediently.

Meanwhile Mrs. Wyatt, opening the door noiselessly, drifts in and listens with strained attention as Carlton-Hawes speaks.

"Now, look here, Mr. Wyatt," he says peremptorily, "this matter that your wife has been good enough to lay before me has only one door out of it through which your son can go. That door is yourself. You are going to catch the Bristol express from here to-night and get to Manchester by to-morrow morning; pay what your son owes and ——"

"Never!" interrupts the father fiercely. "He's no son of mine from now. He must go through with it. I believe in principle, sir! If I paid all he owed to-morrow, would it make him any the less a thief? What right has he to mix among respectable men after this? They would expel him from any school if he had been at school, he would have been "sent down" from college if he had been at college, and he deserves the same treatment at business, and for anything I can hinder he shall have it doggedly!"

Digitized by Google

bottom of your position, but I see now. You are aiming for your son's good simply!"

The mother sighs and begins to cry afresh, as the father, with a voice quivering with deep feeling, says, "That is just it. If I could go to prison for him I would do it. But he has been a poor, miserable, undependable thing ever since he was at school, and it is time he learnt to stand alone. A little suffering will do

"BERT WYATT SITS WITH A STRONG LOOK ON HIS FACE."

"O, Richard, Richard!" cries his wife, "why not try and save him?"

"Why, because this will be a lesson to him. When he comes out of prison, if they send him there, I'll help him then; but if I help him now this will happen again."

Carlton-Hawes slaps his thigh delightedly. He sees harbour at last, and proceeds to pilot his ship into it.

"I see you are, before all things, a man of principle, Mr. Wyatt. I was afraid perhaps there was a little of the—excuse the phrase—vindictive feeling at the him no harm. As for the disgrace, it really falls on him, not on us. And when he comes out he can go abroad."

A cry that is wrung from the mother-heart startles them both.

"Oh, not that, Richard, not that! We should never, never see him again!" Then suddenly crossing to her husband, she says, "O husband, how can you be so hard? Why don't you remember him as he was as a little baby? Oh! the nights you walked the room with him, and thought nothing of it! And don't you remember how you wouldn't give in when the doctors all said he couldn't live, and you said he should, and stood over him for hours, moistening his lips with that feather and giving him food drop by drop? Why do you give up now? Why do you say 'let him go to prison?'"

Digitized by Google

"I am doing it for his good, wife," sobs the father, overcome at last by the picture that brought back the time when his boy's velvet cheek lay against his own. "I want him to be a man, don't you see? And it's through much tribulation we must enter the kingdom."

"But that doesn't mean prison, Richard," moans his wife. "Oh, don't let him go, dear—don't let him go!"

"There is a better way than that, perhaps," says Carlton-Hawes, quietly. "Listen! I quite agree with you that anyone who can do as your son has done needs radical treatment. Let him have it. But the prison taint is not soon eradicated, and lost self-respect is not easy to regain. To put a boy like yours under prison warders—a worthy but by no means a discriminating class—would be to trample the soul out of him. No, I trust there is a better way than that. You and I will go down and see what can be done; perhaps justice can be met without prosecution. Will you come? You have yet to learn particulars. You do not know how your son is taking this. He may really be moved to self-destruction. Will you come?" he urges again as he sees the father shrink involuntarily.

"Yes, I will come," he says, "if you can show us a way whereby Bert will have the right treatment, and yet learn a lesson for life."

"Yes, go, dear!" exclaims his wife, "and let it be hushed up if you can."

"I shall not countenance that," begins Mr. Wyatt, jerkily, but Carlton-Hawes interrupts. "And neither shall I! Come along."

In his lodgings at Manchester sits Bert Wyatt, with the stony look on his face that is the worst disfigurement a young man can have. It is only just past breakfast time, and his breakfast is lying untasted on the table; the lad's heart is too full for any eating.

"I suppose it will be all over by to-day," he is thinking. "The pater would have been here yesterday if he were coming. I thought he would kick at this, so there's nothing for it, when it comes out, but dismissal or even worse."

And he pales at the thought. Just then the postman's knock startles him, and his hand trembles as he opens and reads the merciless letter his father had written on his first receipt of the news.

"There is no hope for me," he says calmly, "they all give me up. Perhaps it will be as well if I do get out of it altogether," sullenly. "It would not take long."

But there is another knock, then the sound of his father's well-known voice, and in another moment the cowering, shrinking lad sees his father entering the room, accompanied by a stranger.

Carlton-Hawes looks at him, and his heart leaps up with desire to help this pale-faced, miserable-looking young fellow, who finds the path of transgressors so hedged about with thorns.

"Bert," says his father, with a cheery ring in his voice, that makes his son look up hopefully, "I've thought better of my letter." And he holds out his hand, which his son takes in shamefaced fashion, that reveals his own sense of unworthiness.

"Glad you've breakfast on the table, boy!" says Mr. Wyatt, turning to the table to hide his emotion. This is 'the friend of the people,' Mr. Carlton-Hawes. You've heard of him, I've no doubt—he's going to try and help you. But let us have something to eat! I'm famished, then we'll talk over this miserable business." And a touch of bitterness creeps into the words in spite of himself.

Breakfast over, the father rather abruptly exclaims, "I'm going out for a little and I shall leave you with Mr. Carlton-Hawes. Tell him the whole truth, and then do exactly as he tells you. I'll be back in an hour."

And he leaves them together, knowing by experience that if he begins to talk to his son he will soon be making matters worse by his own reproaches.

"My lad," says Carlton-Hawes, "don't be afraid of me! I've come down on purpose to help you. Just make a clean breast of things and I'll do my best." And he lays his hand on Bert's shoulder.

"There's nothing to tell," answers the lad with quiet directness. "I got betting with a bookmaker—lost! Got into debt all round. Helped myself, and betted again, hoping to come out right. Then I knew it must be found out, and I wrote to father about it. That's all!"

Digitized by Google

An hour later Mr. Carlton-Hawes might have been seen loitering up and down one of the meanest Manchester streets. Others were there also who passed impatiently backwards and forwards, as though they too were anxious for the arrival of someone for whom they waited.

Carlton-Hawes allows these people to cluster around the only well-dressed man in the street and wait while they evidently transact business with him. Then he approaches this well-to-do stranger and says, authoritatively:

"When you have finished I must speak with you."

The other half hesitatingly replies: "Why?"

"It will be better for you," says Mr. Carlton-Hawes. "And," he continues, "I should advise you to see me in private."

The bookmaker slightly winces, but he was so used to being en garde that he replies with every appearance of geniality:

"Certainly! I should be pleased to meet you, but it would be very awkward just now."

"Awkward, or not, you must!" says Carlton-Hawes. And there is that in his eyes from which the bookmaker shrinks, and he immediately adjourns with Carlton-Hawes to a room in a neighbouring hotel.

Then for half-an-hour he pleads with this man to help Bert from his dilemma by returning his ill-gotten gains, but in vain!

"'Tisn't business, mister!" says the bookmaker. "I have to stick to all I can get, else 'ow could I pay all I lose? I'm sorry for the youngster. Why don't his guv'nor dub up?"

"Well," says Carlton-Hawes, "I've given you a chance to put it straight of your own free will, but I see you won't, so now I am going to make you!" And as he spoke a curious scintillation of light is emitted from his eyes, and the bookmaker shrinks back as if he had received a blow. "Sit down in that chair," Carlton-Hawes says, imperatively. Submissively the man obeys. Carlton-Hawes places one hand upon his head—"Now," he says, "you will write me a cheque for £100, payable to yourself, and back it. Write!" he insists, and obediently and passively, entirely under the control of the other's will by this time, the cheque is written and endorsed. Then Carlton-Hawes takes it from him, saying, "You will now go direct to your home and go to bed till to-morrow morning and when you wake you will not remember what you have done with that cheque. Do you hear?"

"Yes," says the other, rising to go.

"Good-bye, then," says Carlton-Hawes, and in another moment the men separate. "I don't like using this mesmeric power of mine," mutters Carlton-Hawes to himself as he returns to Bert's, having cashed the cheque for £100 in gold, "but if ever it is justifiable it certainly is in this case."

"Now," says Carlton-Hawes to Bert, after he has brightened the boy up by giving him the money, "who taught you to bet?"

"Oh, it's general, sir! All the fellows do it more or less."

"I see! Well, if you could help put a stop to this betting would you do it?"

"Do it?" says Bert wonderingly. "Why it's the very curse of life! I should think I would! See what it's brought me to."

"Well, I'm going to give you a chance, I hope. Listen!" And he details his plan to the youth, whose face clouds as he proceeds.

"I couldn't do it, sir!" he says at length; "I couldn't face it!"

"My boy, you owe it to yourself to do it and you owe it to them. You owe it to your folks at home. You must let me tell 'Osgood's' you are willing to do it. But don't do it because you are forced!"

"I'd sooner go to prison than this," returns Bert, gloomily.

"Yes, I know you think you would! But it isn't the truth. I see you play football"—looking at a jersey hanging on a nail. "What would you think of a team who funked playing because their rivals looked big and heavy? Just what I shall think of you if you shirk this. I'm going to join your father now, and when I come back let me have your answer. And, my lad, while I'm gone pray about it."

"Pray! I!" exclaims Bert.

"Yes. What do you think prayer is for? For people who don't need it, or for those who do?" And Carlton-Hawes leaves him.

No one ever knows what takes place in that room while they are gone, but when they return there is a quiet, determined look on Bert's face, and he gravely says, "I'll do it, sir, if they let me."

Digitized by Google

"Very well, lad! We'll go and see 'Osgood's' now." And they go, on the errand from which the father shrinks.

. . . .

It is five o'clock, and the clerks at "Osgood's," to the number of thirty, are amazed at being summoned to the Board-room. There they see the partners standing together solemnly, and Bert Wyatt, pale, but composed, and two gentlemen by his side, one looking flushed and nervous.

"Gentlemen, Mr. Bert Wyatt has something to say to you," says Mr. Osgood; and in deliberate tones he continues, "He has confessed voluntarily to a series of petty frauds, a matter which we have seen fit to arrange,——"

Dead silence!

—"but the young man does not wish to remain among you under false pretences, so he wishes to say a word to you all."

There is a pin-drop hush, as Bert, now flushing indeed, begins:

"I just want to say I've been a fool! I've been betting, and got into trouble, and then helped myself. It's all through the bookies. It looked such an easy way of making money."

Here he catches his breath and pauses before he goes on, facing the expectant crowd.

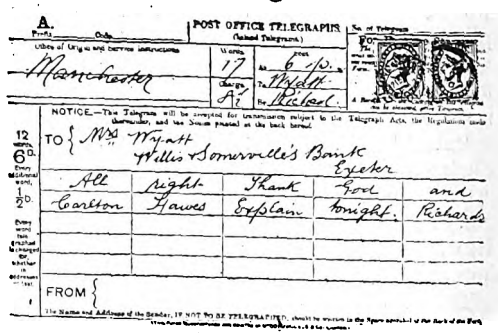
"The governors are going to let me stop, and the money has been paid. But I want to ask what you fellows think? Perhaps you won't like it"—humbly, and nearly breaking down—"I know I'm not quite fit, but you know the whole truth now, and perhaps—perhaps——" Here he breaks off short with quivering lips, while even hard old Richard Osgood blows his nose vigorously.

Quiet reigns in the Board-room for a time, then the chief cashier steps forward and says:

"Sir, this is better than any prosecution. Wyatt has tripped, but he's owned up to us like a man, and I am sure he will never bet and never borrow again. It will be a good thing if some of the gentlemen here learn the same lesson." And he looks at them all significantly. Then he proceeds, "I for one will never throw it up at Wyatt." (Hear, hear! from the others.) "That's right, you chaps! And I move that we bind ourselves never to refer to this matter again, in or out of this building. What do you say?"

No need of a seconder. Thirty hands go up, and the pent-up feeling breaks out in a hearty cheer, for the appeal devised by Carlton-Hawes has reached their hearts.

Thankful at heart, the father immediately despatches a telegram:—



A. POST OFFICE TELEGRAPHS (Inland Telegrams)
Manchester 17 6 P. Wyatt Bristol
NOTICE.—This Telegram will be accepted for transmission subject to the Telegraph Acts, the Regulations made thereunder, and the Terms printed at the back hereof.
TO Mrs Wyatt Willis & Somerville's Bank Exeter
All right. Thank God and Carlton Hawes Explain tonight. Richards
FROM

Carlton-Hawes returns direct to London and Mr. Wyatt speeds home to Exeter. But as the train leaves the station Carlton-Hawes grips him by the hand, saying, "Man, after this you'll better understand the fatherhood of God. He will not let us go! What if you had let Bert go?"

Ah, what?

Digitized by Google

May Meeting Dinners.

BY A COUNTRY PARSON.

THE May Meetings again!—Once more the customary scenes of routine work left behind, and once more to face the great City, with its whirr, its stir, its enthusiasms and stimulus. But just as it has been said that the danger of theatres lies not so much in the theatres as in their associations, so it certainly must be said that the charm of the May Meetings lies not so much in associations. The meetings themselves are magnetic enough, and the quiet country workers in the churches and chapels of the provinces, or the sleepy country towns, or the still more sleepy rural districts, look on them as an annual the meetings as in their associations. Anyone taking his stand in the vestibule of Exeter Hall, or outside the City Temple, the Memorial Hall, the Church House, or any of the halls "where the saints do congregate," will realise this, as they watch

THE MAIN ENTRANCE, HOLBORN RESTAURANT.

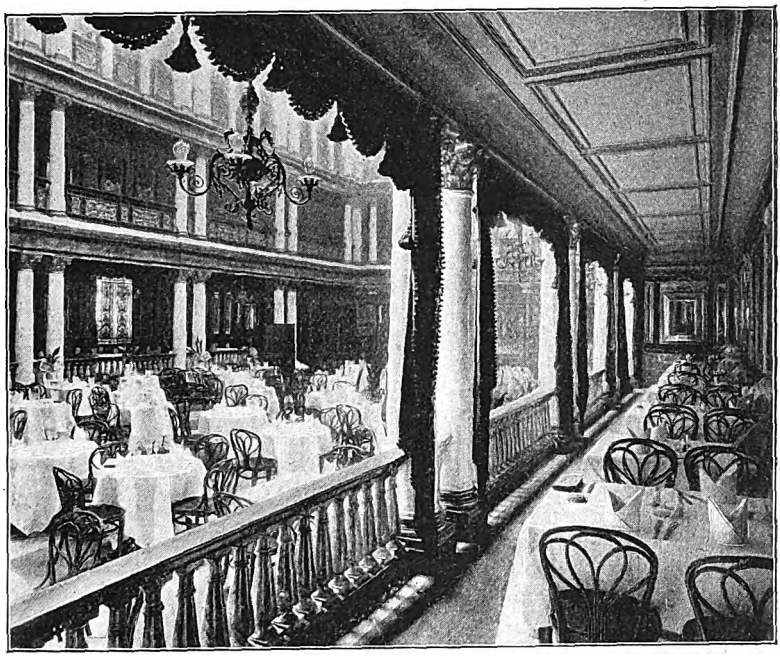
Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



THE GREAT CENTRAL HALL.

the fun remembered.—"Well, old man!" is the simple interrogation of some young curate to another (it is sure to be some young curate who says "Old man!"—the older men, with equal simplicity, say, "Well, old boy!") But in both cases there is a world of interest, in tone and look, and the sentence speaks volumes.

"Hullo! there's old Muir!"

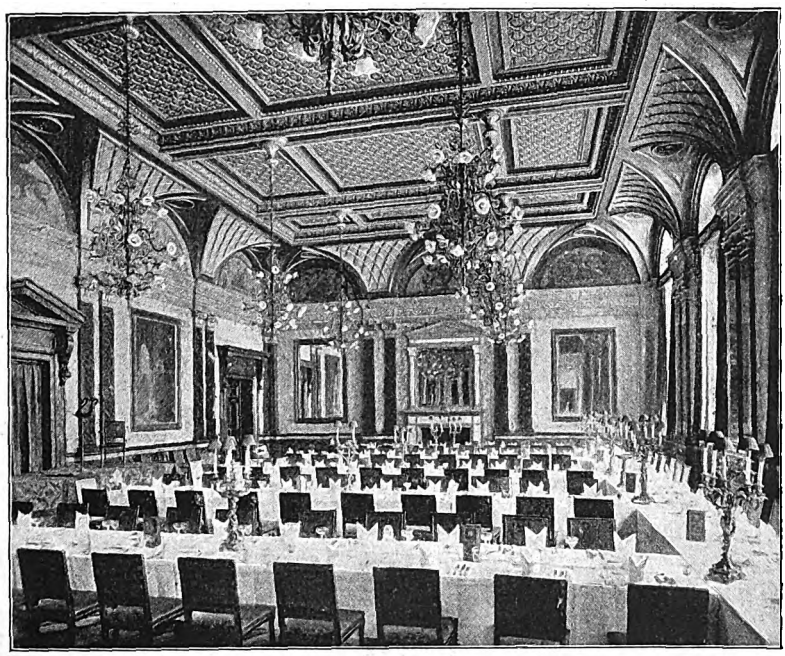
"Ah—h!" exclaims Muir, with a long-drawn-out emphasis that exhibits delight. "See you presently, old chap, at the 'Holborn.' Going, as usual, I suppose?"

He may well suppose that, for Holborn is smitten with an epidemic of "black fever" during the May meeting month, as the crowds-parsonic wend their way to the famous Holborn Restaurant for lunch.

"Is there a Church Conference on, or what?" asked a bystander, as he noted the hundreds of clergymen.

"No! It is a Round Table Conference," was the reply. But the man never smiled.

Perhaps he would have done, if he had gone into the great Central Hall dining-saloon, one of the finest rooms in Europe, and noticed every little table surrounded by the laughing, talkative clerics, who have so many stories to tell,



READY FOR THE ANNUAL COLLEGE DINNER.

Digitized by Google

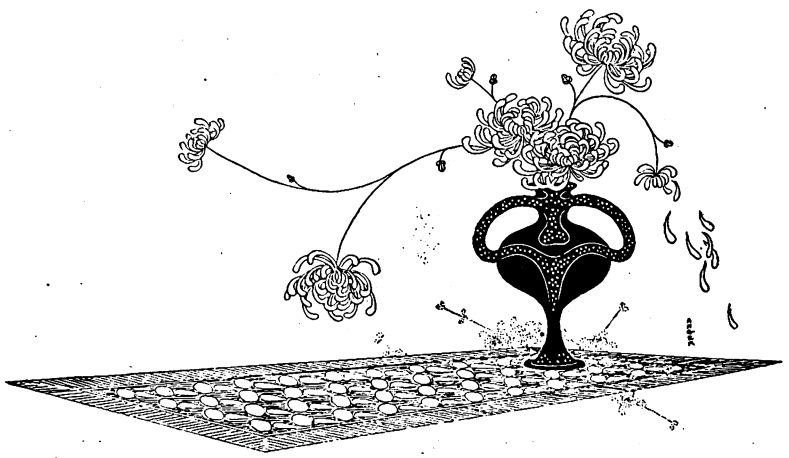
and who know so well how to tell them. No men are such good company as ministers, unless perhaps we except journalists.

Meanwhile the waiters (with that trained dexterity that is the charm of the "Holborn") noiselessly trot about, never in a hurry, but always in time, so the lunch itself is soon over, but not the chat afterwards. Away to the smoking-room they turn, and with never a dull moment the afternoon speeds by, till evening, with its recurring meetings, is soon at hand, and the twos and threes break up regretfully.

Upstairs the various colleges are holding their annual dinners. Every room is swarming with men, who meet together once a year for the sake of "Auld lang syne." Some are there whose hair has grown grey in the care of the churches, and who can look back for many years to these annual reunions, and as their gaze travels around the tables they miss some one or other who used to meet with them, someone who was there a year or two back, perhaps even last year, but whose place will know him no more — David's seat is empty and Jonathan misses him. And if a thought of wonder rises when they too will hear the call who can marvel? Oh, these gaps! these gaps! What sermons they preach, what reminders they give!

But musings-melancholy cannot last at a dinner; a roar of laughter, lower down the table, is infectious, and every eye turns in the direction of the laugh. It is only one of ——'s atrocious jokes. There he sits with face-ecclesiastic, but eyes beaming with merriment. He has been for years holding the fort in a little rural parish abounding with difficulties, but not with people. He has had to fight against confirmed ruttiness, absolute not-to-be-stirred indifference, poverty has limited his work, has introduced itself as an uninvited guest to his own home, but nothing robs him of the one thing that has helped him along through the years, the power to make fun when there was none ready made. If he could not laugh like that he would have died long ago!

A minute later, the Chairman having called upon a man to respond to a toast; he is soon on his feet engaged in that formidable task, the making of an after-dinner speech. Can he do it? If not, condole with the listeners! For of all dreary things, the dreariest is heavy speaking after a heavy dinner. If he can do it, congratulate the guests! It is the finest digestive they can have. An after-dinner speech should be racy, rapid, and rattling. It should touch its subject with a light caress, that never lingers. It should—but there, why go on? There is one thing it should not do! It should never bore. Ah me! How many agonies of endurance have these waiters passed through, for after-dinner speaking is a rare gift. Tell the tale trippingly, man! Don't be an unabridged edition! Raise a roar even against yourself, or, failing that, rally someone else! A hit, a palpable hit is what they want! Ponderosities who prose ought to be in the ranks of the unemployed. Remember, we have dined! And dined at the Holborn.



Digitized by Google

The Sobering of Jim Russell.

"GOOD-NIGHT. mannikin," exclaimed Sarah Russell, to her two year old boy when after the regular evening romp he lay back breathless, but with his whole, attitude and sparkling eyes daring her to come on again. "Good-night. Mumma going downstairs now."

"—Dada?" he interrogated, sharply.

"Yes, to see dada, when he comes home." This with a sigh.

"Daddy walky straight, eh? Funny daddy! No! Tiss adain," pleadingly, as his mother, wisely ignoring the last remark, made to leave the room. "Only once more, mannikin," but the once mounted to half a dozen ere her own motherly heart was satisfied, then she departed, leaving him alone.

Mrs. Russell was a woman of about forty-two years of age, and at least twenty-one had gone by since she married her present husband. He was a man of great power of work, and had managed by his energy and cuteness not only to start in business for himself, but to make it pay splendidly. And now he had three shops in the town, and many men at work for him. The lines might have lain in pleasant places for the Russells, but in the days of his prosperity James Russell had developed a taste for haunting one of the best inns of the town, and for years he had scarcely ever come home at night quite sober. His wife clung fondly to the recollection of what he had been in former days, and hoped, against many disappointments, that his long lane of drunkenness would find a turning out of it at last. Oh, how she had prayed, wrestling with God to grant her this boon before her only son grew up to realise and perhaps imitate his father's degradation. For the first twenty years of her married life only two children had been given her, one a boy (now her elder son), a sturdy, manly fellow, nineteen years of age, and the other a little girl, who had lingered just long enough to win their hearts by her prattle and rattle, and then been quiet at last for ever.

Two years ago, however, to their great surprise, another little stranger came to their home, and in the baby, somehow the soreness of the mother's heart, which still yearned for her lost darling, found relief. She was happier now, too, for the little fellow filled up the time she used to spend in brooding about her husband.

So the years had gone, and were going, but the prayer of her heart was still unanswered, and her elder son George had grown up to know and to feel the shame of his father's vice.

Ah, how the knowledge cut her heart, that he, the man who should have stood by her in training his own children, should make the burden heavier by his manner of life.

"Poor little mannikin," she murmured to herself, as she descended the stairs, with the little chap's words ringing in her ears with their undertone of shameful fact. "Dada walky straight, eh? Funny daddy!" No, it wasn't likely that he would come home walking straight; he very seldom did now, and her heart grew leaden within her at the thought. She sat down in the dining-room, and began to mend some of little Tim's things, and all unbidden the smiles came back, as she contemplated a wee, scrappy pair of knickerbockers she had made for her tiny son.

Copyright in United States.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"They do look absurdly small," she said merrily, "and to think he'll one day perhaps be as big as his father." "And," whispered an inward voice, "one day perhaps as bad." "God forbid!" she ejaculated fervently; "he had better die!"

The resentful flush which accompanied these words was still in evidence when the maid came in later to lay supper, for there was a surging of inward excitement at the thought that twenty-one years of married life had at last come to this, that she should wish her little chap dead sooner than he should be as his father was. Oh, how rebellious she felt at it all, how the wonder filled her whether it was any use to go on praying; how she recalled the times when she had hoped for a little, then been disappointed for long; and leaving the supper untasted she sat back listlessly, as she often did, awaiting her elder son. Ten o'clock came; half-past ten, then she heard the sound of a key in the latch, followed after some fumbling by heavy footsteps in the passage.

"It is Jim!" she thought. "Strange he should be home before George."

And she prepared herself for a take-no-notice attitude, which experience had taught her was the best to assume towards her husband at such a time. But she sprang to her feet with an exceeding bitter cry as the door opened, and she saw it was not her husband, but the pride of her life, her own boy, her elder son, staggering uncertainly to a chair, heavy with drink. A moment she gazed at him, then with a choking sob rushed out of the room, while he called after her.

"Here, I shay, mother; let's have something t'eat. Whersh dad?" Silence reigned, and looking stupidly round, he said, "He's drinking again, p'raps. Bad thing—ugh, dad that drinks." And in much self-pity he wept copiously maudlin tears, while upstairs his mother in dumb tearless agony had cast herself on the bed.

Presently she heard the street door open again, and another staggerer reeled up the passage. A sudden fear possessed her. What if Jim should see George in that state, and in drunken fury strike him?"

She sprang from the bed, and rushed down into the room, and there she saw her husband scarcely able to stand, with one hand on the table, while he tried to steadily gaze at her son, who with hands in his pockets, was half sitting on his chair, a true picture of drunken sullenness.

"What are you looking at?" George murmured, resentfully, at last, to his father; but James Russell never answered a word, only looked.

"Tell you I won't have it," pursued George. "You've no right to grumble t' me. Seen you worse yourself. You're drunk now, s'pose."

But still his father only looked, and his son at last, in shame-faced fashion, exclaimed, "Oh, get out!" and, closing his eyes, prepared to sleep.

At last his father found his tongue, and turning to his wife, who stood trembling in the doorway, he lifted a shaking hand towards George, and cried, "My God, do you see that?"

Then with a glimmering hope that he was mistaken, he said, "What's the matter with him?"

For the life of her the mother could not keep the bitter irony out of her voice as she said, "Oh, nothing; he's only drunk!"

"'Only drunk!'" he said, with his voice quivering, though he was thoroughly sober now. The sight of his son had brought him round with a shock. "'Only drunk,'" and advancing to George he said, "Here, lad, rouse up, and come to bed. I'll help you up!"

And the drowsy, drink-fuddled son let himself be alternately pushed and pulled into his own room.

In the morning he emerged from it thoroughly ashamed of himself, but before he went out his father called him into his own little office, and with a voice husky with emotion said, pushing a paper over to him—"George, sign that!"

"That" was a total abstinence pledge.

A moment George hesitated, thinking of the fellows and their jeers, then he said, firmly, "I will, if you will."

"I've signed it already," said his father, gravely. "Look," and he pointed to his own name at the bottom of the very paper. Then George signed.

"Now," said the elder man, "let the past be forgotten; but in future let's see who will keep this the longest," tapping the paper.

They are still trying their best at the competition to this day, though that paper was signed years ago, and ever since Tim's father has walked straight.

THE END.

Digitized by Google

In the Public Eye

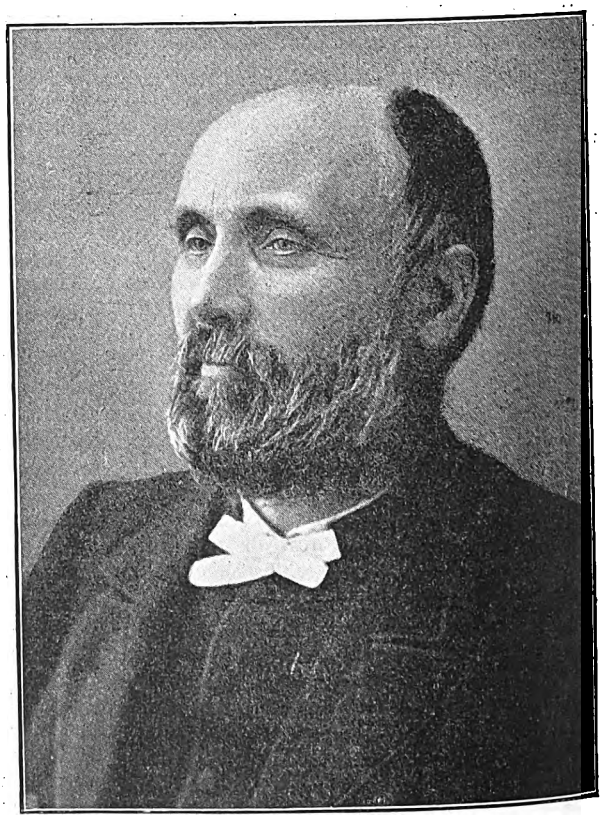
Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

THE Rev. Dr. Howie comes of a good old Covenanting stock. He is a direct descendant of John Howie, the author of the "Scots Worthies," and his forefathers fought many a valiant fight on behalf of religious liberty.

Dr. Howie is the Moderator-Elect for the year of the U. F. Church of Scotland, and he will bring to that chair the fruits of ripe experience, gained in a life-long struggle to advance Christ's Kingdom on earth.

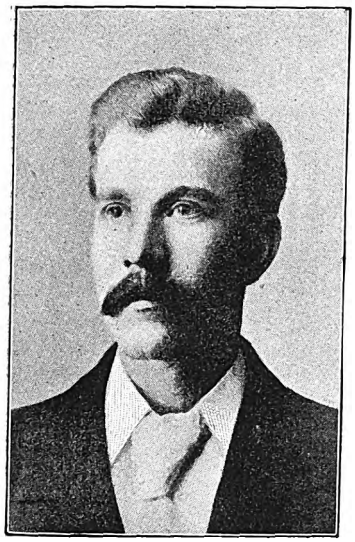
He had a brilliant career at college, where he gained many medals and prizes.

He is possessed of a strong character united to a healthy enthusiasm for Christian work, bequeathed to him from his ancestors. His name will always be associated with the Church Extension scheme, which he has consistently and eloquently advocated. Over a quarter of a million has been raised for this purpose, and 35 new churches have been added to the Presbytery of Glasgow, principally through the ceaseless energy of Dr. Howie. As a preacher he is simple and earnest in style, and strong in his denunciations of the modern tendencies to depart from the beliefs and methods of earlier years. Hard work has marked every step in his career, and there are few men in Scotland whose lives are capable of giving such a stimulus to the rising generation as that of Dr. Howie.



REV. DR. HOWIE.
Moderator-Elect United Free Church of Scotland.

Digitized by Google



Arthur Mayo.

THE Rev. Arthur Mayo was born in the year 1875 in the town of Hemel Hempstead, Herts, where he also received his education. After leaving school he was apprenticed as an engineer, in which trade he remained for eight years. From his earliest life he has been led in the path of truth and virtue by his parents. At the age of sixteen, through the persistent pleading of his Sunday-school teacher, he was led to decision for Jesus Christ, but it was not until April of his twenty-first year that he felt God's call to him for mission work in the foreign field. In the August of 1897 he gave up his occupation as mechanical engineer in the employment of the Cranstone Engineering Company and entered the Pastor's College. Mr. Mayo has been accepted by the Baptist Missionary Society to fill the next vacant post which may arise on the Congo.

ON March 26th Miss Magill, Kensington Gardens, was summoned by the King to Marlborough House to paint a portrait of his favourite Irish terrier, "Jack." The King received Miss Magill very graciously, and said he admired a picture of a dog done by her.

Miss Magill is a highly accomplished young lady, and belongs to a good family, who are loved and respected by all for their great liberality and the interest they take in every good work.

She is a native of Stewartstown, co. Tyrone, hence her numerous friends throughout Ireland and the great Metropolis will rejoice to hear of the great honour which our beloved King has conferred upon her.

Miss Magill is a sister to Mrs. Kennedy Mullanteau, Stewartstown, whose famous drawings of animals (especially horses) have reached almost every country throughout the King's great and glorious empire.

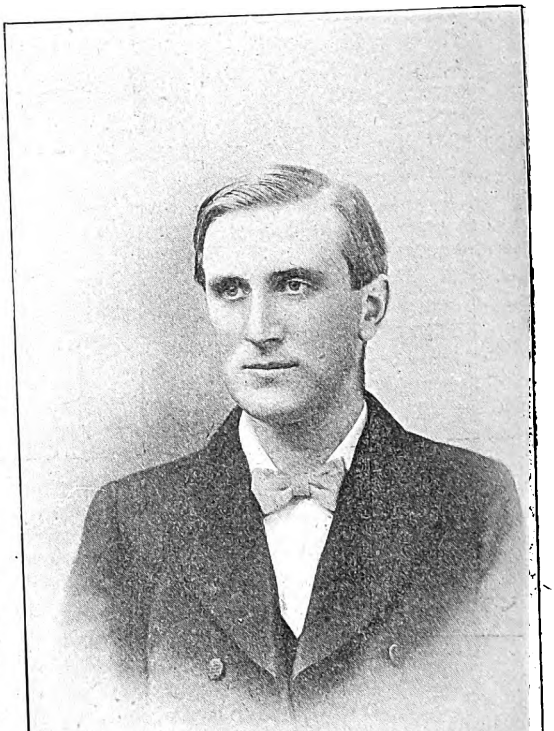
THE Rev. J. R. Barraclough, M.A., needs no introduction to the residents of South Lambeth, where at St. Thomas's Church, Westminster Bridge Road, he is such a force for good. But it is not generally known that he devotes a great deal of time and energy to that quieter, less conspicuous service of the Church and philanthropy that is done in committees. On the Jews Society and the Protestant Reformation Society and in numerous others, his valuable

MISS MAGILL.

Digitized by Google

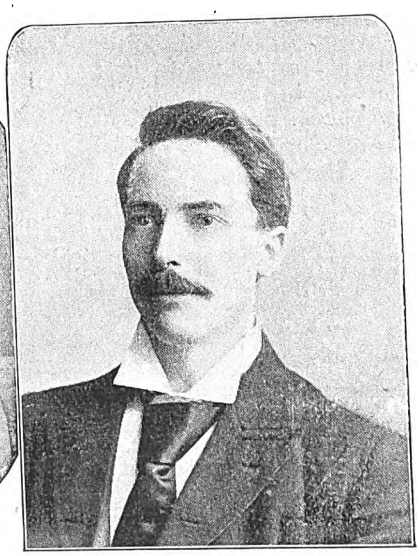
REV. J. R. BARRACLOUGH, M.A.

counsels are eagerly listened to. Altogether he is a type of the men who do not cause their voice to be heard in the streets, but who take as the motto of their life, "I serve."



REV. J. F. SHEPHERD, M.A.

THE Rev. J. R. M. Stephens and his wife are amongst the speakers who will be most eagerly listened to in connection with the Baptist Missionary meetings. He is 34 years of age, and was born at Cheltenham, but most of his life was spent at Bournemouth, where his work amongst young men brought him into local notice. In 1891 he felt moved to devote himself to the mission field and he has since been one of the Baptist Mission workers on the Congo. His wife, formerly Miss Jennie Austen, seconds his work in simply splendid fashion.



Jennie Stephens J. R. M. Stephens.

THE REV. J. F. SHEPHERD, M.A., is the pastor of Haverhill Congregational Church, Essex, and the Chairman of the Essex Congregational Union.

We hope to give an article on the unique activities of his church at Haverhill in our next issue.

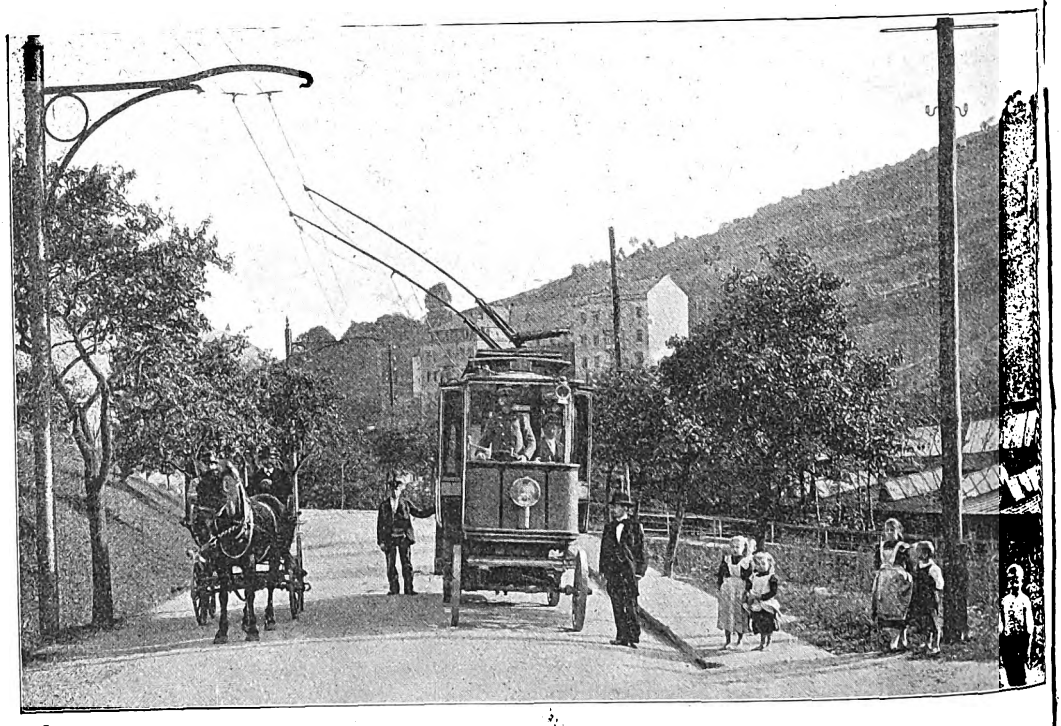
Digitized by Google

FOR a period of 20 years Mr. Bowden Green has been the energetic secretary of the National Thrift Society, and our readers may desire to be informed as to the nature of the work of that institution. "The National Thrift Society" is neither a savings bank nor a building society, but was established for the purposes of teaching the advantages, by precept and example, of habits of thrift (as opposed to parsimony) in time, in money, and in health to the working classes of the community. The literature issued by the Society covers every subject in which it is possible to exercise thoughtfulness and care. One especially important part of its operations during the last few years is that of "Thrift Campaigns." These campaigns consist of meetings in connection with various institutions and societies, and "Thrift Chats" to the work-people employed at factories, iron foundries, shipbuilding yards, flax mills, etc. The meetings and "chats" are followed up by a gratuitous distribution of thrift publications by well-known authors. Mr. Bowden Green, the principal lecturer of this hard-working institution, is a busy man. A member of the Ironmongers' Company, he has, on two occasions, been elected Warden of the Yeomanry, his father, the late Daniel Green, having been master of the Company in 1846. Last year Mr. Green was licensed by the Bishop of London to the office of Lay Reader; he is a frequent lecturer at various institutions, and is vice-president and hon. secretary of the Early-Rising Association. As an author his principal work is "Fragments of Thought," and the dedication of this somewhat unique volume was accepted by the late Poet Laureate, Lord Tennyson. This work, at the time of its publication, was very favourably reviewed in many quarters, and a new edition is, we believe, in contemplation. Another of Mr. Green's works is entitled "The Chessboard of Life," and he has written largely on the subject of Thrift. The words of a charming little song, "The Daisy's Answer," are from Mr. Green's versatile pen. At the General Election in 1885 Mr. Bowden Green, as an "earnest worker in the cause of progress and reform," received a cordial invitation from the electors of the borough of East Finsbury to act as their representative in the House of Commons, on the ground of his interest in social movements and the welfare of the working classes. He accepted the invitation, but only as an Independent candidate, "pledging himself to neither political party, but rather to those legislative reforms which would raise the working-classes to a much higher degree of comfort," but he retired from the candidature. As a citizen of London and member of one of the leading livery companies, Mr. Green is strenuously opposed to the confiscation of the trust funds of the livery companies, but he is in favour of reforms under which the City Guilds would more completely identify themselves with the trades they represent, and act as patrons of technical education in all its branches.

MR. T. BOWDEN GREEN.

Digitized by Google

AN ELECTRIC TRAM WITHOUT RAILS.



THE ELECTRIC 'BUS AT WORK IN KÖNIGSTEIN.

WHENEVER you look about in a modern large town, you always see only too many tram-rails. It is a well-known fact that such rails are at times very dangerous to all frequenting the streets, especially cyclists; and in those towns which in winter time are visited with much snow and ice, the whole of the tram traffic is very frequently stopped.

We need only remember Berlin two winters ago, when for a considerable length of time the whole of the trams could not run. Mr. Max Schienman, of Dresden, has now built an electric tram without rails, which has been running since July 10th, 1901, and well answers all demands put to it.

This interesting tram runs through Königstein, on the Elbe, in the romantic vale of the Biela. At its commencement the length was only nine miles. The road on which the trams run is built of macadam, and the passenger cars run at a rate of six miles an hour.

On the top of the car there is a sliding-sledge, to which is fitted a sort of out-rigger having a grip on the overhead wires. This combination of outrigger and sliding-sledge allows the car to travel about four yards in a lateral direction without losing its grip on the wires.

Digitized by Google

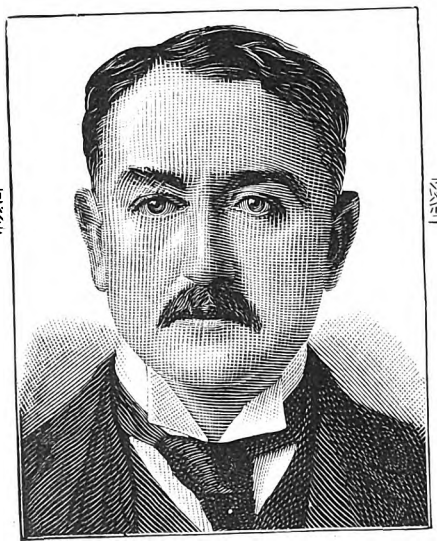
A second advantage, and not the least, is that this arrangement allows of a slow Goods and of a quick Passenger service, as, on account of the lateral free movement of the car, a quickly travelling car may overtake and pass any other in its front, running in any direction. It is only necessary for the car to be overtaken to disconnect its outrigger from the overhead wire, which is done in a second.

The whole thing is so simple that it is a wonder it has not been applied before.

ANOTHER VIEW.

Digitized by Google

Chat Concerning Cecil Rhodes.



CECIL RHODES.

ONE of the first lessons of the life of Cecil Rhodes is that Life's disappointments are often the finger-post of Providence directing our ways. When he was at Oxford, with his mind simply brimming with ambitions, he caught a cold, which speedily landed him into consumption, or what appeared to be. To save his life he was sent to South Africa, where, however, he speedily regained health. But if it had not been for that disappointment at the outset of his career he would in all probability have never gone to the Cape. I can imagine the sickening of heart with which young Cecil Rhodes heard the medical decision: how he would say to himself, "It is no use now! I must go out among strangers, perhaps never to return." But the *dis*appointment proved to be HIS-appointment, and the way that looked drear proved the way that was clear.

It is just possible that some of you find that your life at the start is not marked out according to your planning. You had thought of one thing:—God seems to point to another. You cannot be the thing you would, it is no good arguing with a closed door; and there is nothing for it but to accept the inevitable and walk the way you do not wish to go. Well, it would not surprise me greatly, if you find better things waiting for you in the place you think out of the way, than in the position you would rather fill, just now. Life is a surprise packet for most of us, but I am sure that the things Providence sends us will prove far more valuable than the things we should choose for ourselves. For instance, a young man finds himself suddenly saddled with the care of his brother's family, or in some other way limited in his own life. He would not have chosen it; he has far other aims and wider ambitions. But he takes arms against this sea of troubles, and though he does not know it, he develops by such work a character that wins him far more notice and attention than if he had merely lived out his own plans of life, free and untrammelled. Another, who longs to go to college, has to leave school early through his father's death. Life seems clouded at first, but he does not know that some day when he gets into college it will be a better man, who will do better work, that will enter there. It is an astonishment to me to remember by what strange roads the Hand of Providence leads men to their destiny: and remembering the amazing results that have come through the disappointment of cherished hopes and plans I can only say: "Let us do our best where we are, believing that nothing falls out by chance, and that the answer of our hopes and the fulfilment of our plans is often wrapped up in the strangest parcels. Remember the casket scene in the "Merchant of Venice"! Gold was the one, silver the other, and leaden the third. In one of them lay the cherished portrait, and he who found it might cherish the original as well. But the man who raised the golden lid, and the man who raised the silver found it not, —it was in the lead. So is it often in life. In leaden casket of dullest circumstance there lies wrapped the career that easier circumstances would never have contained. Only lay your life at the feet of God and if He has a mission for you to fulfil He will see to it that thou shalt find "thy lot, and stand in it at the end of days."

The second lesson is the great value of having a great aim before you. One of the most important things in life is to have large aims. Never mind if you do not reach them —you will reach more than if you had aimed at less. Do you remember that miserable wretch of a king, Joash, King of Israel, who came to Elisha on the prophet's death-bed? The prophet bade him take a bow and arrows, "for," said he, "thou shall smite the Syrians." Then, as if the sight would be pleasant to his dying eyes, he commanded him to shoot into the ground. With every twang of the bow he heard, as in a dream, another Syrian downfall. Twang!—one! Twang!—two! Twang! —three! But he listened for another in vain —the King stayed his hand. But Elisha was wroth with him, and said, "Thou shouldst have smitten five or six times, then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it." But Joash was a man of small energies and aims, so he stayed his hand. I fancy that many young men and women lose a great deal in life through not being ambitious enough at the start. I believe in being as ambitious as possible, and setting no bounds to your ambitions. Without great pulse-stirring aims one will simply not get stirred. The man who aims at nothing will hit it. But those who set before them a great purpose are not likely to waste their lives, whether they fulfil that purpose or not. Cecil Rhodes' life aim was to fulfil a dream of his—the uniting together, the federation of, the English-speaking races. This purpose he kept steadily in view, and it is clear now that if he made money it was for this one end, and since death has cut his career short and refused him permission to see the promised state he longed for, he leaves it to other men to carry out his wishes. He always was a dreamer; but it is the dreamers who work to interpret their dreams that play the greatest parts upon the stage of life. Benjamin Disraeli was a dreamer, but he meant to make his dreams interpret themselves. And he did! He lived for the one aim of his life—political advancement—an aim that, from my standpoint, is not worth much; but it was, at any rate, an aim he fulfilled. I remember, as a boy, seeing him one Sunday afternoon on Westminster Embankment, leaning on Lord Rowton's arm. I met him as I went that way, and I came back again to have another look as he returned. And as I realised that fifty years before he had been a solicitor's clerk and that now he had just made his Queen an Empress, I caught sight of the way to build the bridge of life. Start at it! keep at it with invincible determination, as he did, as Rhodes did! Do you remember the words—the pathetic words—with which Beatrice Harraden closes her book, "Ships that Pass in the Night"?

Digitized by Google

"So the Professor went back," she says, "and began to build the bridge again. As we all do. We say we will build it strong and sure this time! And meanwhile the years pass."

But what of that, I say? They would pass in any case. Better pass in building than in drifting! For whether building Life's bridge strong and sure, or drifting anywhere, anywhere on to the end, it is still true: "meanwhile the years pass!"

A third lesson from this life is the value of hard work. One of the finest touches in his will is that in which he refuses to allow even his own family to inherit his property till they have had at least ten years in business. He is afraid of the loafer, as well he might be, for money in the hands of that man means power for evil, and no power for good. If you want to know the character that is formed by plenty of leisure and plenty of money, you must study it in the worst place, for there alone you find it. As Marie Corelli pictured Godfrey Tempest and Sybil in the "Sorrows of Satan," so will it ever be. What earthly right have any men and women to loiter through life playing tennis and hunting, indulging in a round of gaieties at night and frivolities in the day? Are any men and women to get off scot free from Life's burdens? "No!" says God. "Men shall work! Work is My price for usefulness and happiness!" And if men and women will not pay it, "No!" says Evil. "You shall pay my price, and through your leisured moments, and flabby minds, and enormous means you shall find your temptation."

There is a great deal of manhood to be gained in the making of money if it is made in the right way. Getting on may hinder a man if he gets on by selfishness, by sweating, by keeping open late and early, driving himself and driving others. But so can*not* getting on injure a man if he does not get on through laziness, carelessness, and don't-careness. There are a great many good habits formed in business if a man sticks at it. Habits of thrift, prudence, forethought, care, purity, system, and sobriety. And since the world is the better for every such man, then every such man serves God.

Let me ask you, then, if it is your wish to succeed, to begin your labour by praying the prayer of Jabez of old that God would enlarge your coasts, and then by imitating the dedication I once saw in an old Bible of a merchant prince of Bradford:—

"I have dedicated my life first to God; my time, my energies, my money shall be first His. I will use my utmost endeavour to extend my business that I may have more to give and more influence to use, and will spend as little as possible upon my own gratification. I will learn all I can, make all I can, do all I can, give all I can. So help me God!"

And on that dedication was built up one of the most flourishing businesses in Bradford.

And, lastly, let us remember that, like Cecil Rhodes' life, ours may not be long. Lives like his are often broken at the fountain in fulness of work. "O that fatal thirty-seven!" said Lord Beaconsfield, referring to the many young men who die at that age—men of promise only. And if you take away twenty years of getting up steam and forming purpose from Cecil Rhodes' life of forty-seven years, you have only twenty-seven left in which to work. Not long, is it? No, but it may be shorter; of some it is true, "We just begin and then our work is done." That man was at work for forty years—that man was called home in five. Already the wings of the Angel of Death are raised to come our way, perhaps, though we know it not. Will another ten years see us here? We do not know. "We know not what an hour or a day will bring forth." But this we know: It will never bring forth fruit we have not sown, and that unless we rouse to live our lives in earnest we shall depart saying with perfect truth, the thing that Cecil Rhodes said without truth:—

"So little done, so much to do!"

Oh may God forbid! May God forbid!

THE EDITOR.

Digitized by Google

A Miserable Mistake.

"MRS. LATEY to see you, sir!" said the busy maid-of-all-work at the minister's house.

Mr. Rutherford rose with rather more alacrity than he usually showed in responding to the interruptions of his people, for Mrs. Latey was a great favourite with him. Gathered as she had been from the swarm of outsiders in the town by the minister's own efforts, there seemed to have stirred within her something responsive to the earliest appeals she had heard from him, and ever since, she had been a regular attendant at the chapel, and given real signs of a radical change in her life.

Watching her efforts, Mr. Rutherford had become much prepossessed in her favour, for he was fully aware that any such efforts received the scantiest of sympathy at the hands of her husband.

Thomas Latey was a man whose total of virtues was expressed in the fact that he brought home every Saturday night his wife's weekly allowance untouched. What he did with the rest of his earnings was best known to his intimate friend, the landlord of "The Old Ship," in whose house he spent the greater part of his leisure time; and until recently Mrs. Latey had been quite as good a man as her husband at the work of clearing the barrels of the publican; so in the change which now set in it seemed to Tom's obstinate Essex nature that she was sitting in condemnation on himself. He emphasised this feeling in the usual Essex way—he sulked—and Mary Latey, finding it hard to endure, was in the habit of coming to her minister for a little advice and comfort. But no sad face met him now.

"O sir," she exclaimed, "I felt I must run in to tell you! Tom's been and got converted!"

"Sit down and tell me all about it," said the minister, instantly glad like herself, for he saw clearly that if these two could run together the prospects before the girls and boys of the family had immensely brightened.

"It's a rather long story, sir," she said, "but you know as how Tom have been again me all along. And I'm only telling you the truth when I says I couldn't have borne it nohow if I hadn't had a bit of prayer like to myself at night. So of course I used to wait till Tom went upstairs to bed, and when he grumbled I always said as how I'd got a little job to do, and he'd go off in a huff. Leastways he did till two nights ago. Then I was a-kneeling down, and speaking out my thoughts like, low as I could, and blest if he didn't come downstairs with his shoes off, and stand a-listening to what I was a-saying. I didn't hear him, but all of a sudden he says, quite gentle-like, 'Mate, what d'ye want to send me off to pray be yerself for? You ain't afraid o' me, mate, are you?' Lor, sir, you might have heard my heart thumping against my ribs, for, don't you see, I'd bin a-praying for him and I was afraid he'd heard and got the hump. So I got up and we had a talk together, and then went to bed as lovin' as you please ——"

"Yes, yes!" interrupted the minister, hastily; "and how did things go next day?"

"I was a-coming to that," she said, with a slight inflection of reproach in her voice, as though she scarcely liked the minister hurrying her over such an important chapter of her history. "When Tom come in from work to his dinner next day, he says to me, 'Mate! it's been a miserable kind of morning, I ain't been able to think of nought but my sins. Whatever Serial Rights for United States Reserved.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

shall I do to get 'em forgiven?' I talked to him, sir, as well as I could, but, you see, I don't know much myself, and I don't suppose I was much help like to him; but early this morning when he comes home to breakfast, he bursts out, 'Mary, I've got it!' 'Got what?' says I. 'Forgiveness,' he says, and then, sir, he went on to tell me, all as if he were struck with wonder, as how he'd seen a vision in the forcing-house he was a-painting of, and It told him his sins were a-forgiven."

"Well, well!" said the minister, "time will prove all things. I am glad to hear he is so happy about it."

"Happy!" I should just about think he is. He's like as if he'd been taking just enough to make him jolly, you know."

The minister sighed. He rather distrusted these emotional conversions, putting them down in a general kind of way to hysteria. But he was of opinion that a man had better be moved by excitement than never be moved at all, and after all, an egg beaten up into a froth was still an egg. So in a kind of dubiously hopeful mood he sent the woman away, who hurried off to get her husband's tea, for he had promised to come home that night.

That promise Tom Latey kept, and it was the beginning of a series. A new life had dawned for their home, and for two years of happiness Tom and Mary Latey walked in a new companionship, appearing to the whole town as a living object lesson of the effects of a true religion.

Then came Tom Latey's testing time. For months his wife lay ill, either suffering from fearful spasmodic attacks of pain or else from their effects. It was most touching to see the devotion of this simple working man to his wife. Straightway from his work Tom came home, day after day, and sat listening to his wife's complaints about her feelings and symptoms, but by degrees the minister noticed a subtle change taking place in the man, and began to fear. He had, somehow, always felt a little distrustful of Tom, and seeing his perfect submission to his wife in everything, looked upon him as a man without any real backbone. He was not, therefore, surprised to note an increasing absence from chapel on the part of Tom, and, finally, to miss him altogether.

It was in vain he called. Tom saw him, chatted, and that was all, while from the frequent visits there of the rector's wife, the minister began to suspect that some proselytising influence was at work; and, as soon after he heard that Tom had been seen at Church, he felt sure of it. It began to be a matter of common talk in town that Tom Latey had joined the ranks of the loaves and fishes hunters.

At first Mr. Rutherford had entirely refused to believe it, and in the visits, which he still felt bound to make to the suffering woman, he sometimes led the conversation tactfully to the subject of her husband, but all he could get out of the woman was "There's a little something wrong, sir, with Tom. Some day, when I get better, I'll tell you all about it."

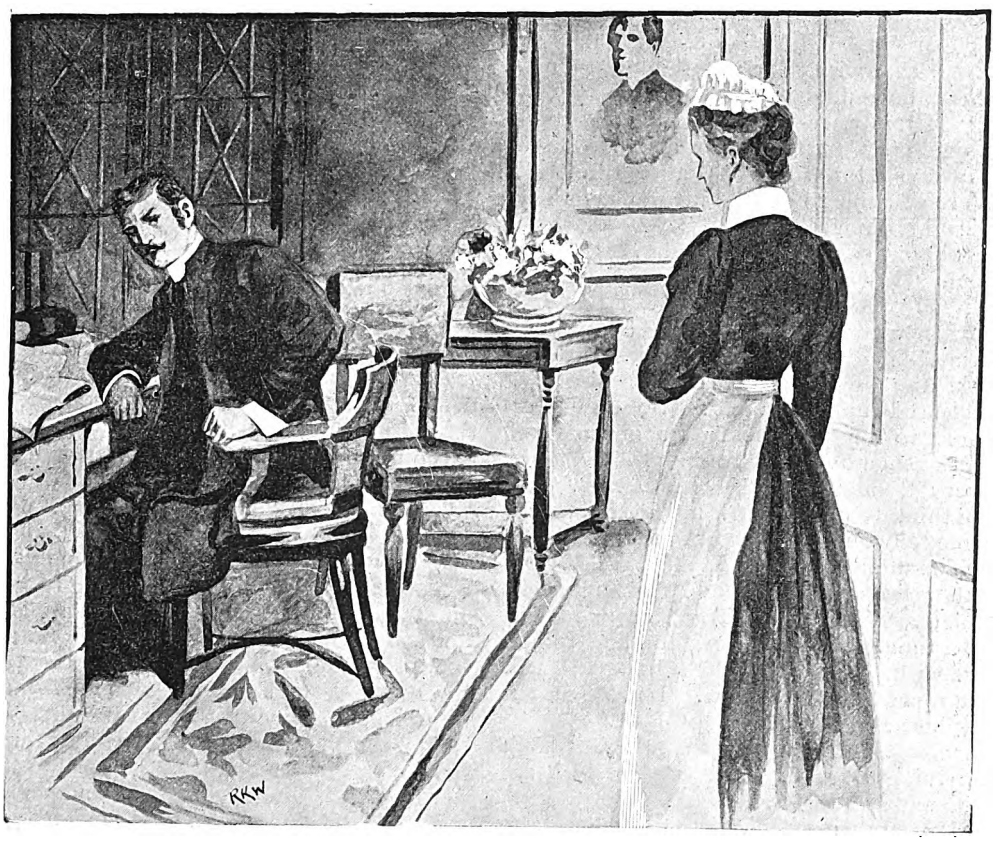
The suspicions of the town were not altogether unfounded, and that Mr. Rutherford learned from a conversation with one of his people, who assured him that he had down in his books some bottles of brandy, which had been sent at the cost of Church people to the home of the Latey's.

Mr. Rutherford scarcely knew what to think, but the storm of indignation which filled him was entirely directed against Tom, whom, he concluded, must have taken to drinking again secretly, and have used his wife's illness as a pretext to get the means. Still, there was a lurking dissatisfaction in his mind, and the whole affair appeared mysterious, and all the more, because there was a pained look in Tom Latey's eyes whenever he met the minister's, which puzzled him. And he waited anxiously for the explanation promised by Mrs. Latey when she should get well.

It was written down, however, in the decrees of The Eternal that Mary Latey should find no restoration here. She grew rapidly worse, and at last there came a night when the bell of the minister's house rang hurriedly and the message reached him that Mrs. Latey was dying. Her husband was away working at a distant hamlet, so the minister saw her alone. She was just conscious enough to whisper, "I wanted—to tell you—something—but ——."

What that something was he never learnt from her. He knelt and commended her to a Diviner Companion on her unknown journey, and was departing, when she opened her eyes and the longing of her life seemed to find expression in

Digitized by Google



"CAN TOM LATEY SEE YOU, SIR?" SAID THE SERVANT.

the husky whisper, "You'll—take—care—of—Tom?" The minister nodded and the eyes closed again, and never more did he have speech with her, though she did not pass away that night, and at the wish of the husband he came again the next, just in time to see her die.

The weather was sultry and the small room of the cottage was intolerably hot. Around the bed stood the children, the neighbours and a relative or two, watching the death agony of the departing woman who quietly passed away, and a moment or so later her face took on a settled look of rest.

"Poor dear!" murmured her husband, bending over in a very passion of tenderness, "Good-bye! Good-bye!"

Mr. Rutherford went downstairs with him, promising to look in on the morrow, but when the morrow came it found the minister prostrated with a bad attack of influenza, and in the slight delirium which seized him, Tom Latey haunted his thoughts. The whole week had to be spent in the enforced rest of a thoroughly worn-out man, and several days after succeeded before he was well enough to see one of his people. Meanwhile the problem how he was to keep his promise to the dying woman puzzled him perpetually. If the man only came to chapel now, he could do something with him, but time was all too precious to spend over a rickety man of Tom Latey's stamp, who had proved that no reliance was to be placed on him. In his inmost heart he wished he had never made the promise; still, there it was, and the first engagement written down on the tablets of his mind was to see this poor needs-be-bolstered-up man.

"Can Tom Latey see you, sir?" said the servant one evening, as Mr. Rutherford sat over a new book in his study. Almost a frown of impatience crossed his face as he said, "By all means! Show him up."

In came Tom with a cheery "Good evening, sir! We've all been sorry you've been so ill; but I thought as I'd like to have a chat with you about things—you've always helped us afore."

Digitized by Google

"Certainly, certainly! If there's anything I can do you must tell me. There is always a lot of business after a funeral. Were you able to get the insurance money all right, Tom?"

"Yes," said Tom, proudly. "Forty pounds it was, whichever one died first. And as you were so queer that I couldn't advise with you, I settled everything myself—paid all the bills, the girl's mourning, and all the rest, and," hesitating, "cleared up all round. So now I've come to say I want to go into chapel work real hot and strong. I'll be there every Sunday, and if you can give me anythink to do I'll work me fingers to the bone for you. You've bin real kind."

The minister listened, amazed. What had come over the man? Then he said quietly, "Thank you, Tom, but one thing at a time. Let me understand how things are with you. Your wife's little will will want proving, you know. I made it out for her, and she left it all to you."

"Yes, I know, sir, but there wasn't anything to leave. The Post-office book, did you say? Why, sir, she'd had it all out."

Mr. Rutherford stared. It was not long before that he had known her to put £30 away, out of a legacy she had been left by a cousin. "All gone!" he thought. "Well, sickness has its expenses certainly, but she had had good friends, too!" Aloud he continued, "Ah, well, Tom, the balance left out of the forty will come in very acceptably to you in future, I've no doubt."

"Please, sir, there ain't no balance," Tom answered, shifting uneasily in his chair; then, looking nervously at the door, as though he were afraid someone might be standing there listening, he said, "I—I think I'd better tell you all about it, sir. Not as it matters much, though"—meditatively—"the poor dear's gone, and all the talking won't mend matters; but I feel as if I should like to get it off my mind, sir, for it's well-nigh stunned me."

Mr. Rutherford looked his astonishment, inwardly wondering what was coming.

"When I came to look into things," Tom continued, "there was a heap of money owing all round. 'Twasn't only the folk in the place, but right away at Notley." Notley was a town four miles distant.

"But what for?" said Mr. Rutherford. "She'd everything she wanted, hadn't she? I know you never stinted her."

"Not me!" said Tom, emphatically. "Folks who cut their missus down ain't no class. But what it was for I can't make out nohow. Seems as if she'd always been in a muddle like, and left me in the dark about it. And that's what I call the blackest part of it, for I thought no end of my mate, and never asked to see no books, nor nothing. If it hadn't been for that there forty pound, it 'ud been the ruin of me. The doctor only charged seven pound for all he'd done, through all those months. And when I paid him, 'Tom,' he says, 'she's been a good wife to you.' And of course I let him think so. I wasn't going back on Mary to him. Then there was drapers' bills and grocers' bills. Lor, sir, there was a heap on 'em, and what with the funeral and all of it, it took up the forty, and four more I'd got of my own. Why!" he exclaimed, with an impatient movement, "now I come to see it, my eyes are opened. I used to think her no end of a manager, and used to tell her as much, and she'd smile and chuck me under the chin, and tell me to get along, and all the time there was this money owing. You know, sir, she seemed powerful bent on saying something to me, during the last few days. I think it was a-troubling her. But it never came off, though I believe she'd ha' told me if she'd been spared."

The minister had listened transfixed with astonishment to this strange recital. If it were true, how he had been deceived in Mary Latey, and what right had she to ——? But Tom interrupted his thought by continuing: "It's me as was the donkey for not seein' into things, sir. It'd happened once before. You remember, sir, when Mary joined your chapel and I was, well," hesitating and colouring, "not-all-I-ought-to-have-bin?"

Mr. Rutherford nodded assent.

"Well, it was then I first found it out. I was going to a drawer, a-looking for my club card, while she was out, and I come across a book of Foster's the grocer, and something made me open it, and then I saw she owed him eight pound ten, and had been a-paying of it off, by six shillings a week. You could 'a knocked me down with a feather, as the sayin' is. So I put on my hat and went down to see Foster. 'Mr. Foster,' I says, 'ow is it the missus owes you all this?' 'Oh, it's all right!' he says. 'No, it ain't, I tells him. 'You'd no right to let her, or any woman in her station o' life, get into such a muddle, without lettin' me know.' Well, he hums and ha's, but the long and short of it was, I went home, and as soon as I'd hung up my hat, I lit my pipe and sat opposite her by the fire, till the children had gone to bed. I suppose I was very quiet, for the missus asked me if I wasn't well. So then I said calm like, 'Mate, whatever made you owe Mr. Foster all that money?' She looked at me thunderstruck, and says, 'I don't owe Mr. Foster nothing. Who's been a-tellin' you lies?' I looked at her dumbfounded, as they say, and then I said, 'Missus, however can you go down to the chapel and all the meetin's, and sit there and tell me that lie?' Then I showed her the book, and I says, 'Why ever didn't you come to me, mate, if you was gettin' behind. I'd 'a turned to and helped you all I could. I've never kept you short yet, have I?' 'No,' she says, 'you haven't, Tom!' And then she fell to crying, and so did I, sir, for I was that upset; but I forgave her, and told her I'd pay it off, if I had to give up the beer for it. And next day I began. Lor, sir, it was hard at first, but somehow it stuck in my throat that Mary 'd bin afraid of me; and I saw I'd been a bit hard, p'r'aps, and, what with one thing and another, seemed like as if I'd got a lot to be forgiven for myself. And I got desperate a thinkin' about my sins, till one day, in Warner's forcing-house, that I was a-painting up, it seemed to me as if an angel came to me and said, 'Tom, if you can forgive yer wife, the Almighty can forgive you.' And I believed it, and ever since I've tried to be a better husband and father. You know I've kept out of the beerhouse, and if Mary hadn't got so ill we'd 'a bin well off now."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Rutherford remembered the very different account given by Mrs. Latey of her husband's conversion, and marvelled greatly at the woman's glib lies, for he read that, in all the man had been saying, he was uttering the truth.

"Tom," he said gently, "I'm so glad you've told me, for I'm afraid I've been thinking wrong things all this time. Do you know," he proceeded, "that your wife has been having a lot of help from the people at the Church during the last months?"

Tom's face was a study; then he burst out, "Now I see it all! It was a puzzle at the time, if you like; for after I'd been away from chapel a few Sundays, thinking the missus 'ud be lonely, she began to worry me to go to Church for a change."

The minister started, but unheeding, Tom continued, "'Tom,' she'd say, 'you was brought up at Church, and used to be in the choir; I'm sure you'd like a service, just for a change. I don't want you to leave chapel, but if you'd only go just a Sunday or two, it'd please the rector's wife.' Well, after a deal of persuadin', I went. Then when my mates saw it, they put it about I went for what I could get, and as I thought, p'raps, you'd think the same, I never come near you no more. And to think they was right!" he went on bitterly. Lor, how I've been fooled!"

"Ah!" said Mr. Rutherford, "you are not the only one." And the vision of this simply trustful man struggling on to help this woman, not only raised the man to giant stature in his mind, but filled him with supreme contempt for his own erratic judgment. "Tom!" he said, "come and see me as often as you can. I'll be better soon and we can work together."

"Right, sir!" said Tom, taking the outstretched hand heartily, and rising to go.

But at the door he hesitated and came back, speaking nervously. "You don't think, sir, as how it'll make a difference to Mary on the—the other side, do you?"

The minister was nonplussed.

"I've been thinking all the week," Tom went on humbly, twirling his hat, "that the debts and things were owing to that 'ere morphia she took so much of for her pains. 'Praps," I said, "she weren't responsible like! And don't you think, sir, the lies might go down in the morphia bill too?"

"Yes, Tom, I do! Morphia would do it all. And if you can put it down to that, God may do so too. The Old Book says, 'He knoweth our frame.'"

"Then He'd know all about hers, and p'r'aps He'd remember it in her favour like?" wistfully.

"Yes, He would remember," the minister said, huskily.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Hazel, the heroine of this story, is an English girl, who having married Mahomed Ali, a Mahometan student, while he was in England, insists upon going out to join him, in utter ignorance of what it means to be incarcerated in the seclusion of the Zenana. When she finds it out, she is dominated with one idea —that of escape, and at the end of Chapter II. she has climbed into a tree to reconnoitre the surroundings outside the walls.

CHAPTER II.—(continued).

HER heart stopped beating for an instant before she answered, rather huskily: "I am so glad you have come, Ali; how lucky! I was just wondering how I should get down. You have no idea how delightful it is up here. Yes, do bring a ladder, and come up, too."

She looked down over the wall as she spoke, debating whether she should jump down while he fetched the ladder and brave the stinging cactus and the slimy water; but the buffaloes daunted her; she dared not dash in amongst those huge forms and wicked-looking horns. In any case Mahomed Ali never gave her the chance. He stood against the wall and blew a whistle, and Hazel saw a flutter of skirts at the terrace door and on the steps, and three or four women came running across the compound. They brought out a ladder after some delay, with much vociferation and gesticulation, and Mohamed Ali mounted gravely and sat down beside her. He looked down at the cactus and the buffaloes and away over the paddy fields, with their little banks and canals, to the tall, straggling hedges and nullahs and waste places covered with tangled and thorny growths that lay between them and the red road in the distance. Then he turned and looked straight into her eyes with a smile. At that moment Hazel hated him with the impotent hatred of the helpless.

"It was very fortunate you happened to come home this morning, wasn't it?" she said; but though she smiled, she could not keep the sneer out of her voice nor the contempt out of her eyes.

"Very fortunate," said Mahomed Ali, calmly. He cared not at all whether she knew that he had never left Madras. His pretext of a journey was only the polite fiction usual in such cases, involving no discredit to anyone.—"What would you have done if I had not happened to come?"

"I suppose if I had shouted and waved to them on the terrace, someone would have seen or heard me and come to my rescue in time. I will get down now, please, Ali, the stone is hard and I am tired of sitting here."

Mahomed Ali did not come to dine with his wife that evening as she had expected and dreaded. He had presumably started again on one of his urgent and mysterious journeys, and Hazel had time to reflect on the consequences likely to follow her latest escapade. For three or four days she waited, too full of dread and apprehension to make any new plans; but nothing happened. She went every day and sat for hours in the early morning and in the cool of the evening in her favourite mango tree, for the simple sake

Copyright, 1902, by Paget Baxter, in the United States of America.

Digitized by Google

of the peace and solitude and freshness that she always found there.

A fortnight passed on with monotonous sameness, until her husband saw fit to return once more from his travels and shed the light of his countenance upon his lonely wife. This time he remained almost constantly with her for nearly a week, and was more tender and lover-like than she had ever seen him since the old happy days they had spent in England, before he left her and went back to his own country. During those days he did not appear to resent or even to notice the coldness she was literally unable to hide from him. He strolled about the compound with her in his indolent fashion; he sent for Nautch girls to dance before her on the terrace, and singing girls to beguile her with their melodies. As Hazel said ungratefully to herself, in the zenana the one idea of amusement was the ungainly antics of the dancing girls and the harsh discordant music of their singing sisters.

After a week of this soft dalliance he bade her good-bye one morning with great affection, begging her to take every care of herself during his absence, from which she understood that he would be again invisible for a time. But she made no remark and asked no questions.

During that week she had made up her mind that it was useless to make any new projects until she had mastered the language of her husband's people, and could understand what was going on around her and what the orders meant that were given in her presence. Amongst so much eternal chatter and gossip it seemed to her that she must pick up many hints that would be useful to her.

THE ONE IDEA OF AMUSEMENT IN THE ZENANA.

A few of the women were not "Gosha" (as they call the secluded zenana women), and were allowed to go out more or less freely and transmit orders to the men servants who were always lounging about the front of the house, the stables, and the apartments used by the men of the family; some of them were allowed to go out into the bazaars, and they had at all times free intercourse with the men of the household and with anyone who came to the house. Hazel reflected that she might be able to make use of one or other of them later on; but until she knew Hindustani perfectly she was completely isolated in her father-in-law's house.

Digitized by Google

As soon as Mahomed Ali was gone, Kair Unissa Begum and her rabble of attendants returned and took possession of Hazel's apartment. And Hazel set herself seriously to learn their language, studying the Hindustani grammars and reading books and dictionaries she had brought with her, listening with earnest attention to the chatter of the women and joining in the conversation herself with such scanty remarks, such few words as she had at her command. The vocabulary in use in the zenana is an extremely limited one. Politics are not discussed there, nor art, nor literature, except such literature as was to be found in the romances that Asha Bee, the reader, was continually reading aloud to them. But, small as the vocabulary was, there were many words in frequent use that Hazel could not find in her dictionary, until one day Kair Unissa with lazy good nature sent one of her women secretly into the bazaar to buy a dictionary not expurgated for the use of missionary ladies.

As soon as Hazel began gradually to understand the language well enough to follow the romances and appreciate the jests and witticisms of her companions she entered upon the worst phase she had yet known of zenana life. The grossness, the coarseness, the hideous vulgarity of those women's minds was inconceivable.

One day Hazel turned angrily on her own women. "The first one of you that I hear talking in that vile way again will go at once, that very day. I will not have such people about me."

Kair Unissa looked at her curiously. "Where would you send them, Hazari Bibi?" she asked.

"I would send them away. I don't care where they go. They will have to find another mistress," Hazel answered.

"Are there places in your England where you send your disobedient slaves to be beaten?" Kair Unissa asked. "We do things much more simply here. If one of my slaves annoys me I tell the other girls to beat her. Do you want them to beat your Taj Bee? It is true they ought not to laugh when you are angry, but why do you let them?"

Hazel shrugged her shoulders impatiently. "We don't beat our servants in England," she answered; "if they are bad servants we send them away."

"Where to?" asked Kair Unissa. But she was not much interested in the subject. She did not care to hear about English ways which she could never understand. "Shall I tell them to beat one of your girls? You don't seem to care to see them laugh, perhaps it would amuse you to see them cry. Taj Bee was the worst, and she always cries the loudest. They can go and get some sticks in the compound."

Two of the women moved towards the terrace and Taj Bee began to cry. Hazel laid her hand kindly on the girl's shoulder. "Don't cry," she said. "No one shall beat you. I will not have her beaten, Kair Unissa. You hear, all of you, no one is to touch her." Then she went away quietly herself to her refuge in the mango tree.

But she had made one friend for herself in that hostile camp. From that day Taj Bee was devoted to Hazel heart and soul. She had never seen anyone interceded for before when punishment, merited or unmerited, was to be meted out to them; and she felt her mistress had had cause to be offended with her.

That night when Hazel was sitting sadly alone on the terrace in the dark, after Kair Unissa Begum and her noisy crowd were gone, Taj Bee came out humbly to her and kissed her feet. Hazel passed her hand softly over the girl's dark head, "What is it, Taj Bee?" she said.

"The kind Begum Sahibe is sad," said the girl, "What can I do?"

"Yes, I am sad," said Hazel gently, "because I am very far from my own country and my father's house. But no one can help me, Taj Bee, I have no friend in this strange land."

The slave sat down at her feet. "I know," she said. "Twice you have tried to run away from the zenana, and my Lord Mahomed Ali is angry, and that is why he never comes now to the zenana; and they watch you night and day. And the big Nabob Sahib is very angry, too, but Mahomed Sahib will not let him do anything. He says, Wait a little, she will grow gentle and good, this life is strange to her; but she loves me, and she is my heart's delight.'"

Digitized by Google

For a moment Hazel hesitated to discuss her troubles, but she was too forlorn and friendless to stand upon her dignity with the meanest slave who felt kindly towards her.

"What could the Nabob Sahib do to me?" she asked.

"Many things, Hazoor. He can give medicine to make you always sick and tired, to make you die perhaps. He can shut you up in the black hole where you would never see anyone. He is afraid you will run away and go to the English people and they will be angry, and it will hurt him with the Sirkir and the Lord Sahib. But Mahomed Sahib says you will not run away, he will not let you, and so he watches you always.

"Does Kair Unissa watch me?" Hazel whispered.

"No, Hazoor. She does not care, she does not listen when they talk, she eats opium and thinks of other things. The old Begum, too, eats much opium and thinks always of other things. But they fear the Nabob. He wants Mahomed Sahib to marry another wife.

"Oh, Hazari Begum! go no more to the compound," continued the girl. "Some day there will be a snake in the tree where you always sit, and it will bite you and you will die."

"I must think," said Hazel.

"If they knew I told you these things they would kill me," said Taj Bee. "Cannot you be happy here like the other begums, Hazoor?"

"I ought never to have come," said Hazel softly.

Then the girl kissed her feet again and went away.

Hazel sat on in a panic that bewildered all her thinking faculties. Only one idea kept beating on her brain; that she must get away from the zenana and all its dark and dreadful possibilities. She had unconsciously hoped something from Kair Unissa's wedding. She knew that English ladies came sometimes to these native festivities and were admitted into the zenana to see the bride, and she had hoped she might get speech of one of them unobserved among the crowd of visitors; but Taj Bee's words had killed this hope. She was sure the terrible old Nabob would never risk such a chance of her meeting her own countrywomen. She had asked Kair Unissa once whether any of the ladies of the Zenana Mission ever came to the house, but Kair Unissa had never heard of them. One of the servants repeated some vague gossip of the bazaars of English Mem Sahibs who visited some of the poorer Mahometans and taught them to read and to make knitted comforters and babies' caps and gave them funny little books that were translated from the English. They had some children, too, who lived in their house and wore shoes and stockings; they were mostly orphan children from the last famine, or children of pariahs who had become Mahometans. But the Mem Sahibs never came to the Nabob's house, and none of the Mahometan ladies who visited there knew anything about them.

A good many visitors came to the house, wives and daughters of the Nabob's friends and relations. They always drove up in close-shuttered carriages, packed full of women. All the men of the household withdrew out of sight while they were admitted, veiled and muffled, through a little side room, up to the apartments of the Begum, where they smoked their hookahs and chewed betel and nut and gossiped with the Begum and her attendants. The same precautions were observed when they departed, a slave going on before to clear the way for them, so that they might reach their carriage unprofaned by the eyes of any man.

Hazel thought of all these things now, but in none of them could she see any opening of escape for herself.

"I must trust myself to Taj Bee," she said at last; "she knows all their ways so well and hears everything that is going on. I will get her to help me, and if she betrays me I can but die. I shall never be able to do anything by myself."

She remembered bitterly her two frustrated schemes of escape, that had seemed to her so subtle, and that must have been so childish and simple in the eyes of these Orientals. She had thought herself a match for them once, but she did not think so now.

CHAPTER III.

Next morning Hazel had not made up her mind to renounce her cherished retreat among the branches of the mango tree beside the garden wall. So she rose early as usual, and went softly out across the terrace; but in the dim light of the early dawn she missed her footing on the worn stone steps of the narrow staircase, and fell down, nearly the whole flight, twisting her ankle under her in her fall.

Digitized by Google

"I wonder I never thought of doing this before," she said to herself, as she sat at the foot of the steps, nursing her injured ankle; the pain was so great she was sure she must have really hurt it seriously; and when she tried to rise she found it impossible to stand upon it. "I shall have to see a doctor, of course. Ali cannot refuse me that. He will have to send for some one to attend to my ankle," and in the midst of her pain new hopes sprang up that she might at last communicate with the outside world. Before she decided to call for help, her ankle had begun to swell, and the pain of it was intolerable. She blew her whistle at last and some of the women came to her assistance.

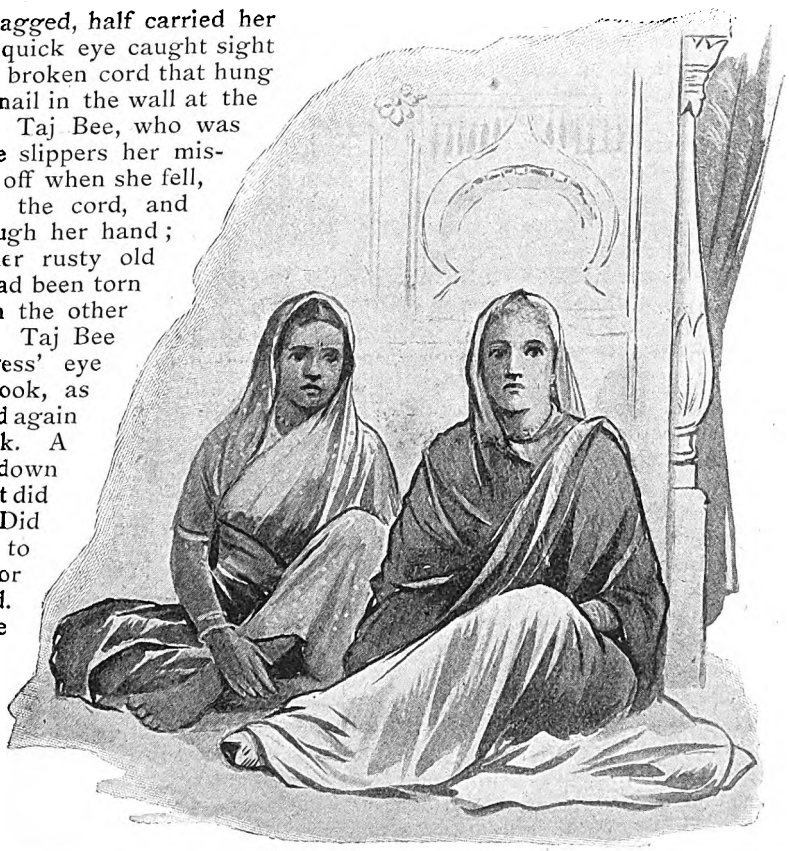
As they half dragged, half carried her up the stairs, her quick eye caught sight of a long trail of broken cord that hung from a rusty old nail in the wall at the top of the steps. Taj Bee, who was following with the slippers her mistress had dropped off when she fell, stooped and took the cord, and drew it idly through her hand; at the end another rusty old nail dangled that had been torn out of the post on the other side of the steps. Taj Bee caught her mistress' eye with a meaning look, as she dropped the cord again without any remark. A cold thrill ran down Hazel's spine; what did that cord mean? Did they want her to break her neck, or only to be disabled.

As soon as the servants had laid her on her bed, she sent for her husband. The fiction of his absence from home was not alluded to, and he came immediately at her summons, and was full of sympathy and regret for her sufferings. He went out and looked at the steps, and Hazel heard him scolding and questioning the servants. The cord was no longer to be seen and Hazel did not mention it. She could only wonder whether it was by his orders or unknown to him that the cord had been stretched at the top of the stairs to trip up her unwary feet as she descended them.

"I suppose those lazy servants never wash the steps," he said, coming back into the room; "they must have been slippery with grease to throw you down like that."

"I am sure my foot is very much hurt, Ali," she said, "the pain is dreadful; please send at once for a doctor."

"Do you think that is necessary, dear?" he asked, touching the swollen ankle tenderly; "some of the women understand very well what to do for accidents of this kind. They will bathe your foot and bandage it for you."



HAZEL AND HER SISTER-IN-LAW.

Digitized by Google

"Indeed I must have a doctor," she insisted; "there may be something broken or dislocated in my ankle, and if it is not properly attended to, I may be lame all my life."

A neglected lame foot or a badly-set broken arm are not uncommon in the zenana, and are considered of very slight importance, so that Mahomed Ali thought Hazel's insistence to have a doctor somewhat exaggerated; but he was a kind young fellow, and tolerant, as all Mahometans are, of the unaccountable caprices of the zenana; so he answered now:

"Of course, dear, you shall have a doctor if you really wish it. Katheeja Bee, go down and tell one of the men to run at once and fetch the Hakeem to attend to the Begum Sahib's ankle; and you, Gause Bee, get a purdah ready."

The women bustled about, and brought out a wide, heavy sheet like the one upon the floor, which they unfolded and placed ready by the side of the bed.

Presently the doctor arrived, but before he was admitted into the room two of the women raised the sheet and held it up between them, effectually screening Hazel from view; only one corner towards the foot of the bed was lifted so as to expose Hazel's delicate white foot and now swollen ankle.

"My ankle is very painful; please touch it gently, doctor," Hazel said, as she heard him approach the bed.

"The Hakeem Sahib does not understand English," said Mahomed Ali.

And at the same moment Hazel felt a cold, clammy touch laid gently on her foot.

"What!" she cried; "isn't he a proper English doctor?"

"He is a very good doctor," said her husband, coldly; "he is the doctor who always attends the family."

The sudden disappointment was more than Hazel could bear. With that and the pain together she fainted away, and when they brought her back to consciousness her foot was bandaged and the doctor gone.

"He says there are no bones broken, Hazel dear," said her husband; "but the ankle is badly sprained, and you must not put it to the ground for many days."

"What does he know about it?" said Hazel faintly, then she caught a warning look from Taj Bee; "though to be sure he has made it feel a good deal easier and more comfortable," she added hastily. "I will follow his advice, of course, and I dare say it will soon be all right again."

With many expressions of sympathy, and strict injunctions to the servants to look after her carefully, Mahomed Ali left her.

"Go and get me some breakfast," said Hazel, when he was gone, "you, Taj Bee, stay here and wait on me. And don't you others be all day gossipping in the kitchen, and keeping me waiting for my breakfast."

"Did you see the cord they had stretched across the stairs, Taj Bee?" she whispered, as soon as they were alone together.

"Yes, Hazoor, I saw it; but it is gone now," said Taj Bee.

"Do you know who put it there?"

"Who knows, Hazoor?" answered the maid. "They do not want you to walk about at the young Begum's wedding, and perhaps speak with some of the English ladies who will come to see the tomash; and I heard that Mahomed Sahib is going away, truly, for a few days before the marriage, and if you tried to run away while he is out of the house who can tell what our Lord the Nabob would do? The Nabob is very terrible when he is angry. But now with your broken foot you will be safe here while Mahomed Sahib is away, and also when the wedding people come."

"Did you hear them say so, Taj Bee?"

"No, Hazoor, but I know. I was born in the house of the Nabob Sahib, I have lived here all my life, and I know the hand of my lord."

"And the wedding will be in a fortnight," said Hazel presently. "To think I have been here three months, and I am no nearer my freedom to-day than I was the first day I came into this dreadful house! Oh, Taj Bee! If I had only known what a zenana meant I would have run away out of the compound that first day when Mahomed Ali brought me home."

"You will still run away, Hazoor?" the slave asked anxiously.

"I shall never leave off trying to get out of this hateful prison till they kill me," said Hazel desperately, "and if you really love me, Taj Bee, you will help me."

"I am your slave," said Taj Bee sadly. "If you cannot live here and be happy like the other Begums I will help you to go away, and if they kill you they can kill me also; and when you go I will also follow you. But it cannot be yet, Hazoor—not till the broken ankle is well, and you can walk again."

Digitized by Google

"No, of course not. I don't expect you to carry me off on your back or to fly out of the window with me," said Hazel, and she laughed a little with the renewed hope this unexpected ally had brought her; "but we can think and talk about our plans and what we will do as soon as I am well again."

"And will you listen to your slave's advice, Hazoor?" said Taj Bee, earnestly. "I am a poor woman, and ignorant, but I know my own people, and I know the ways of my lord the Nabob, and they are not as your ways and your thoughts, Hazari Begum. For he will say one thing and do one thing, and in his heart he shall think other thoughts. It may be they will let you go into the big Begum's room at the time of the tomash to see the bridegroom ride up to the door on the great day of the tomash. And also from this terrace they will let you look out upon the fireworks in the garden. And it may be, Hazoor—I cannot tell, but it may be—that some of the English ladies will come to see the tomash and to walk about and look at Kair Unissa Begum; but, Hazoor, do not try to get speech of them. I pray you listen to this advice. It will seem easy to you to get speech with them, and it will seem that no one is looking at you; but do not trust to that—that is the way of the Nabob, that he will try you. Every moment you will be watched, and the English ladies cannot help you. If you see any, hide yourself from them. If one speaks to you, answer her in Hindustani only, do not let her know that you are English; so shall you blind the eyes of my lord the Nabob, for it is not that way you must try to escape. But I do not know even that they will let you see the guests. If they tell you 'Stay in this room,' stay, and do not even look out, lest they think you are trying to get speech of the English ones. For truly I tell you, Hazoor, they would hide you away or kill you before anyone could come to take you out. If there was one of them that would take you by the hand and say 'Come out with me, I will not leave this house without you,' it would be well, Hazoor; but they will not do that. They will say 'I must tell this thing to my husband, and to-morrow I will return with him and make enquiry into this matter'; but to-morrow is too late for you, Hazari Begum. When you are dead or hidden in some other place no one will ask about you. The Nabob is a great man and rich, and his zenana is very sacred. My lord will throw dust for the English sahibs, and the English meddle not in the zenana."

"You are wise, Taj Bee. I will follow what you tell me," said Hazel, sadly, recognising the truth of the slave girl's view of her position.

Taj Bee went on to another subject. "And, lady beloved," she said, "do not make the lord Mahomed angry against you. If he is angry, and loves you no more, he will say to his father, 'She is nothing to me; do with her as you will.' And the Nabob will be glad, and that will be the end."

"I daresay you are right," said Hazel. She had felt angry with Mahomed Ali, and had classed him with her enemies, but now she thought that perhaps, after all, he was doing his best to protect her in that strange household. It was natural that, accustomed all his life as he had been to the seclusion of the ladies of his own family, he should not have understood that his wife would take the life of the zenana so hardly.

"I will go now, Hazoor," said the slave, "and tell them in the kitchen to bring your breakfast. I will say that you are angry that they delay so long, so that they shall not think we have any secret matters to talk together."

"Yes, we must be very prudent," Hazel agreed. "But where shall we be able to talk where we can be sure of not being overheard?"

"I will think, Hazoor," the slave answered, hurrying away to warn the laggards in the kitchen.

Later in the morning Kair Unissa Begum came and looked at Hazel curiously, and asked a few questions about her accident. And, between two opium pills, the old Begum roused herself enough to send a message to her daughter-in-law that she was much afflicted at her hurt, and that she prayed Allah would be pleased soon to make her well again.

"Is the doctor coming again?" Kair Unissa asked.

"I do not know," said Hazel.

Digitized by Google

"Mahomed Sahib said he would not come again," Gouse Bee answered. "I was holding the purdah and my lady was fallen into a swoon, and I heard the Hakeem say, 'Shall I come again, Mahomed Sahib?' and Mahomed Sahib said, 'There is no need to trouble you again, unless I send for you.'"

"Then old Zeinab Bee will have to bandage it. One of you come and tell me when she is going to take off the bandage. I want to see what it looks like," said Kair Unissa.

She had wanted Hazel to have the bandages undone at once, so that she could see the injured ankle, but this Hazel had politely refused to do. She was never able to find out whether her young sister-in-law suspected her of shamming hurt, or whether her curiosity was merely the idle curiosity of the zenana, where every incident that stirred the dull monotony of existence was made the most of.

The doctor had recommended that Hazel should be kept very quiet that day, for fear of fever, and Hazel took advantage of his order to escape from the hated reading and dancing, singing and story-telling, that filled Kair Unissa's day. On the same pretext she sent away her own attendants, Katheeja Bee and Gouse Bee, telling them they might go with Kair Unissa's women, that she only required Taj Bee to wait on her, and that she could not bear so many people in the room with her when she was ill. They went gladly enough, accounting to themselves for Hazel's strange taste for solitude and quiet as one of the curious fancies of the foreign Sahib folk to which she belonged.

"Well, Taj Bee, what are we going to do? Have you thought of anything?" Hazel asked, when she and the slave girl were alone together, all the restlessness of fever being added to her natural impatience.

"We must go slowly, very slowly, Hazoor," said the girl. "We must not begin anything until the marriage feast for the little Begum is finished."

"But have you thought of any way we can escape after that?" asked Hazel.

"Oh, Hazoor, you are too much in a hurry," Taj Bee answered. "Until my lord's suspicions are dead, and he ceases to watch all your goings, we can do nothing. You do not see the danger, Hazoor. You do not know the zenana and the things that are done here."

The words sounded ominous. "Have you seen things done here, Taj Bee?" Hazel asked—"here, in this very house, I mean?"

"It is better not to talk of such things," said Taj Bee evasively.

"I should like to hear just one of the stories of things you have really seen yourself. I won't say a word to anyone about it afterwards, however horrible it may be."

Taj Bee submitted: "I will tell you a story of something that happened to my mother's sister here, Hazoor, many years ago, when I was a child. The Nabob was a young man then, and my mother's sister, Bibi, was one of the Begum's women. And because she was very fair and pleasant to look on, the Nabob looked on her with favour. The Begum was very jealous in those days, and would not have the Nabob look on any other woman, so they kept it very secret, and no one knew, and that is a strange thing in the zenana, Hazoor, where there are eyes and ears everywhere. But Bibi never said anything to make suspicion because she loved the Nabob very dearly. But there were other young girls growing up in the zenana, and one of these took the fancy of the Nabob; and he was tired of Bibi and loved her no longer; and Bibi was jealous and in great unhappiness, and when she met the Nabob in the passages going to and fro, she spoke to him, and reminded him of his old love for her; and one day one of the other women heard her and told the Begum that there was a slave who loved her lord. The Begum was very angry and spoke bitter words to the Nabob, and the Nabob denied it, and swore that the tale-bearer was a liar. I know not who was the tale-bearer, the Begum never told; that is the custom of the zenana, Hazoor. But one day Bibi went to the bazaar, and never came back."

"Well, I don't see anything very dreadful in that," said Hazel, rather relieved, when Taj Bee stopped in her narrative.

The slave went on in a more impressive tone, "Hazoor, they said she went to the bazaar. But one day the Nabob, meeting her alone in the passage, spoke to her kindly and said it was really her whom he loved, but that he feared the Begum because her tongue was bitter; but he would meet her in the garden that night, but none must know of her coming. Under the terrace, Hazoor, there is a little door in the wall, and inside there are steps that go down into a little room, very dark and damp and full of many rats and ugly

Digitized by Google

"How could anyone know?" she whispered.

"How can I tell, Hazoor? So it was. It was known in the zenana."

"Do you think anyone can hear us now?" Hazel asked rather anxiously.

KAIR UNISSA AS A BRIDE.

beasts, and when Bibi came to the Nabob in the garden, the little door was open, and he pushed her into that dark room and locked the door. Bibi came no more out, nor did any man ever hear her cries."

Hazel listened with the hair stirring about her head, and cold drops standing on her forehead.

"I think not, Hazoor. Who would listen to hear the talk of a lady with her poor slave girl? And you are not of our country, Hazari Begum. No one will think that Taj Bee can love you, and do your will against the will of the lords of the house."

Hazel lay very quiet for a while. That simple sentence of the slave girl, "No one will think that Taj Bee can love you," stung her to her very heart. How lonely, how friendless indeed she must be when no one, not even her own servant who was always about her, could be suspected of caring for her fate. Taj Bee had mentioned it as a subject of congratulation, but it hurt Hazel as nothing had hurt her yet in that most hateful house.

Digitized by Google

"Tell me all you have heard in the house about me, Taj Bee," she said, presently. "You say the Nabob, my father-in-law, is angry with me. What does he want to do with me?"

"How can I tell, Hazoor, the heart of the Nabob? He talks every day to Mahomed Sahib that he should marry the daughter of Sultan Mirza Khan. He had promised a long time ago that Mahomed Sahib should marry Aziz Unissa Begum. But my lord Mahomed answers always, 'It is too soon; I cannot yet bring another wife into the chamber of Hazari Begum.'"

"He can bring home ten thousand Begums if he will only let me go back to my own country," said Hazel, indignantly, revolted at the villainy of her unknown father-in-law."

"He will never let you go back, Hazoor," said the slave girl, with conviction. "It is a shame for a great lord like Mahomed that a wife should go out of his zenana to be seen of other men. But you will always be the first wife, Hazari Begum. And, truly, I think not that my lord will take another wife. He will say to his father, 'Wait, wait,' and one day Sultan Mirza Khan will be tired, and he will find another husband for Aziz Unissa Begum. But if Hazari Begum is not kind to Mahomed, it may be, some day when he is angry, he will say, 'Bring Aziz Unissa into my zenana.'"

Hazel moved restlessly on her bed. "If he were to take another wife, would she come here, into this room?" she asked.

"Surely, Hazoor, where else could she go! This is Mahomed Sahib's zenana."

To think that she, an English lady, should ever have lived to hear her own room spoken of as any man's zenana! "How vile and hateful it all is!" she said in English.

"Aziz Unissa is very gentle and merry," said Taj Bee, soothingly; "she will love Hazari Begum and be to her as a sister."

"Good heavens! Are they women at all, these zenana creatures!" cried Hazel passionately.

Taj Bee perceived that her last remark, reasonable and comforting as it was, had not pleased her mistress. "Mahomed Sahib has great love for the Begum," she went on, hastening to retrieve this mistake, "and surely if she is kind, he will never bring home another wife, if it is not pleasing to her."

"I shall never degrade myself to fight for my own husband's love with another woman," said Hazel, hotly. "All I want is to get out of this hateful place, and go home to my own country, where people can live decently and openly. And you must help me, Taj Bee."

"I will help you, Hazoor. And if they kill me, a woman's life is not so happy that I should be sorry to leave it," the slave answered submissively.

"I would far rather die myself than stay here," said Hazel. "We must get away together, or we must die together, Taj Bee."

If she had wavered for a moment in her intention of making her escape that hint of a second wife for Mahomed would have fixed her determination. If he were true to her for a time even, she knew there would surely come a day, when her youth had waned and her beauty faded, when Mahomed would bring home a younger bride to take her place in his heart and home, to make that zenana life she hated more intolerable.

A few days later, Taj Bee informed her that Mahomed Ali had returned; he had really been absent this time, but he did not come up to see her.

The house was full of the bustle of preparation for Kair Unissa Begum's marriage, and there was a constant flow of visitors through the zenana. On the day of the great tomash Hazel's servants helped her to hobble into the Begum's apartment, where Unissa sat on a charpog, under a canopy of red, gold-bespangled gauze, speaking to no one, eating nothing, with her head bent down almost to her knees, mourning, as the Mahommetan custom is, for three days, the end of her maidenhood. The room was full of visitors, who stared with much interest at the mourning bride, and chattered and gossipped ceaselessly among themselves

Digitized by Google

GOING TO THE HOUSE OF THE BRIDE.

Digitized by Google

with the futile talk and coarse jests that obtain in the zenana. Hazel sat on the floor amongst them, joining when she could in their conversation.

Suddenly a servant darted into the room, in a great state of excitement. "Some English ladies have come," she cried. "They are coming up here to see Kair Unissa Begum." There was a dead silence; some of the women of the house looked curiously at Hazel. Taj Bee, who sat behind her, plucked her veil gently.

"I think I had better go to my own room," said Hazel; "I am very tired, I cannot talk any more. Have I leave to go, Begum Sahib?"

The Begum nodded and waved her hand, and Hazel's women helped her to withdraw. In her own room she told them they might go back to see the English ladies, she herself would lie down and rest awhile.

"I will stay," said Taj Bee. "What do I care for the white-faced English folk? I see too much of them driving through the bazaar in their great carriages," and she looked significant at her fellow slaves, who hurried off, apparently much relieved, for it was well understood amongst them that their state prisoner was never to be left alone when Mahomed Sahib was not with her.

"If only this tiresome foot was well, I am sure I could get away with those English ladies," said Hazel impatiently.

"It is very good that you came away, Hazoor," said Taj Bee earnestly. "They would never have let you speak to the English lot. The women had their instructions. They would stand round you and talk and sing and make much noise, so no one should hear what you said, and if the English ones ask, 'What is that?' they would say, 'It is a poor slave girl who is possessed with a devil. We will carry her into another room, so that she shall not disturb your highnesses.' Then would they bring you in here, Hazoor. And the Nabob would say, 'Hazari Begum is a wicked woman who will bring shame and trouble upon my house. I must put her away where no one can hear her mischievous words.' There is always the black room under the terrace, Hazoor. But the Begum is wise to come away. Now will they say to the Nabob, 'Hazari Begum cares nothing for the English folk; she flies from before them; there is no fear for her.' And Mahomed Sahib will say, 'See, my wife is happy in the zenana. She cares no more for her own people. She will try no more to escape away from us who love her.' Surely the Begum has done wisely."

"It is very hard though," said Hazel, lying on her bed with the slow tears rolling down her pale face. "And if it had not been for your advice, Taj Bee, I should certainly have tried to get those English visitors to help me."

Later on in the afternoon, when the English visitors had gone, to join in the tomash in the reception rooms downstairs, Hazel went back to her mother-in-law's room, to watch for the arrival of the bridegroom. He came, riding on a white horse, hidden in gorgeous trappings, and decked with flowers like some sacrificial beast. He himself was literally veiled in white jasmine blossoms; on his head was a garland, from which depended on every side, long ropes of flowers that completely covered him from crown to knee. A crowd of his relations and friends and retainers, on foot, surrounded him and guided his horse. At the foot of the steps they lifted him from his horse, and led him up the steps to where the wedding guests awaited him in the verandah and the rooms behind.

"Will he come up here?" Hazel asked, with some interest.

"Up here!" they cried, shocked at the idea. "No, indeed! To-morrow he will come to take her away, but he will not see her till she comes into his zenana, and he removes her veil."

"And she will not see him either?"

"Oh, yes, she has seen him many times from the window, when he came with his father to visit the Nabob."

There was now a general rush of the guests to the terrace outside Hazel's room. A high trellis had been fixed up there the day before, so that the ladies could look down on the garden without being seen. The garden was full of people, some in gorgeous raiment of silk and satin, some in clean cotton garments, some in dirty rags; the eternal contrast of splendour and squalor that walk always hand-in-hand in the shining East.

Hazel could see a few English ladies and gentlemen sitting on a row of chairs below the terrace. On the lawn a white sheet was spread where the jugglers gave their magic performances and the swords-men displayed their feats of marvellous dexterity ; cutting a melon in halves with one sweep of the sword while it lay on the naked breast of a man, without so much as scratching his skin ; slicing a banana on his face ; and in many other ways sweeping the weapon within a hair's breadth of his body without even grazing his skin.

Digitized by Google

The juggler showed his tricks that have never yet been understanded of the European, or explained to his satisfaction ; he grew his mango from a seed, in a little heap of earth, under a cloth, and handed the perfect miniature tree with roots, and a half ripe fruit growing upon it, to the company for their wondering inspection. He hewed in pieces a boy of his troupe, and threw the bleeding limbs into the air, to the manifest horror of the English ladies, who could, some of them, never be completely reassured by the sight of the same boy running up to them from another part of the compound. He set a ladder on the ground, and ran up it, and drew it up after him, disappearing with it into space, to return a moment after, prepared with other wonders. He showed them the time-honoured basket trick, and many more, for he was a very clever juggler who had never spoilt his own hereditary magic by learning the conjuring tricks and sleight of hand of his Western confrères.

All the time refreshments were handed about, sherbet and fruit, cakes and sweetmeats.

At sunset the gardens were lighted up with innumerable little lamps, all along the paths ; the trees bore splendid fruit of gorgeous Chinese lanterns, and there was a very brilliant display of fireworks.

Many of the zenana guests did not go home that night, but slept on cushions and rugs on the floor, invading Hazel's apartment as well as those of the other ladies.

Hazel lay awake half the night, wondering in great bitterness of soul whether after all she had done wisely to refrain from making any attempt to communicate with her fellow-countrywomen on the only occasion on which she was ever likely to meet any of them. Her lame foot seemed to her her only excuse for having let slip an opportunity that might never return.

Next day Kair Unissa Begum's bridegroom came with carriages close-shuttered to bear away his bride and her women to their new home ; the bride still apparently plunged in the most profound grief.

Hazel was unspeakably glad of her departure. The whole atmosphere of the zenana seemed purer and cleaner when she and her following of coarse ribald women were removed from it. Hazel was left to the companionship of her own three women ; the Begum's servants had no longer any excuse for perpetually invading her retirement as they had done when Kair Unissa brought her singing and dancing women there to enliven Hazel's solitude.

The zenana returned to its normal state of stagnant monotony, rarely broken by the visits of the few Mahometan ladies who still came to pay their respects to the Nabob's wife. The Begum slumbered on her charpoy, and Hazel ate her heart out with longing for freedom in her prison above the neglected garden.

Her ankle was quite well and strong again, when Taj Bee came to her one evening where she sat on the terrace, and whispered in her ear : "Hazoor, I have found a way of escape!"

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

A Quarrelsome Neighbour.

IT was only a chance meeting in the street of Rockton, but the young doctor, who courteously raised his hat to the gracefully-dressed girl, walked on with a new spring to his steps, and somehow to her the sun seemed to be shining with greater brilliance.

Robert Stewart and Elise Gordon were drawn to each other by a strong magnetic attraction. He had scarcely settled in Rockton two months; they had hardly me, texcept in the most casual way, yet there was that about Elise which strangely appealed to him; and there was something about his dignified appearance and quiet, reserved manner which also unconsciously impressed her.

The fact that they had met so seldom was peculiar, peculiar in the sense that it owed its origin to an inveterate hatred which old Robert Gordon, Elise's grandfather, cherished to the whole medical fraternity. Having owed the early loss of his only wife to the carelessness of one medical practitioner, his savage dislike of that one tree was extended to the whole forest.

The Gordons' house was only next door to the doctor's residence, but beyond the ordinary civility of a call, he forbade his grand-daughter to cultivate his acquaintance. And as between their two gardens ran a high brick wall, and as the doctor's house had not a single outlook over the wall, they were as completely apart as though they had lived miles distant.

Every now and then, though, Elise would run against the doctor as she left the front entrance of their house, or he would meet her in the street, and had it been known it might even have been put on record that sometimes from the doctor's windows a pair of black eyes watched her walking past, and sometimes from the Gordons' house a pair of blue eyes watched him.

When they had happened to meet in Society, the young doctor and Elise Gordon had simply changed eyes, but before the affection which was already there could be recognised or expressed in any other way than by eye-telegraphy, there was that sturdy barrier of an old man's unreasoning dislike to be broken down.

This afternoon Dr. Stewart walked on briskly, rightly interpreting Elise's pleased glance of recognition. "I'll win her yet," he muttered, "grandfather or not! But the puzzle is, how to get nearer to her than now. Of all the unreasonable things! I might as well hate all grandfathers as he hates all doctors, and, by Jove! if he keeps me apart from Elise, I believe I shall."

. . . . .

Three months later!

Dr. Stewart was no nearer familiarity with his next-door neighbours; on the contrary, he had contrived to draw down the old gentleman's hearty dislike upon his own head, independently of his profession, and it was no longer with Mr. Gordon a case of "those scamps," or "those humbugs," but "that scamp!" "that humbug!"

The reason was very simple.

In an evil day it had occurred to Dr. Stewart that as his own bedroom was without the sun the greater part of the afternoon, on the side that faced Mr. Gordon's, it would be nice to have two windows put in.

"Elise! Come here!" thundered her grandfather one morning, "do you see what that scamp is having done now? My privacy will no longer be respected!" —fuming—"I'll—I'll have the law of him! Let him put the windows up by all means; he shall finish them to the uttermost, then I'll make him take them down! The wretch! the—the insolent wretch!"

"Serial rights for America reserved.

Digitized by Google

RUN FOR THE DOCTOR QUICKLY! GRANDFATHER HAS HAD A FIT!

Elise went pale at the old man's excitement, but was too wise to attempt any eloquence but that of silence. "Bah!" continued the irate old gentleman, shooting a suspicious glance at her, "there's not a doctor anywhere who is a gentleman."

"Dr. Stewart always strikes me as being that particularly, grandpa," she returned with quiet dignity. "You would think so too if you knew him better." And without waiting to see the effect of her declaration she walked off.

The windows were in, and immediately Mr. Gordon moved for an injunction against them; but in his desire to put his enemy to the greatest expense possible, by allowing him to finish them, he overreached himself and lost his case. His solicitor had warned him of this beforehand, but all remonstrance was so much further provocation; fight he would, and absolutely refused to hold any communication with Dr. Stewart.

Digitized by Google

"Gone against me, has it?" he said calmly, "then I'll appeal. I'll ruin the scamp in costs if nothing else."

His solicitor smiled. "There would be no appeal allowed, I'm afraid. You see it's a point that has been settled already. But there are ways of driving Stewart out of the place"—cunningly.

The hint was not lost on the old man, and all manner of rumours to the discredit of the doctor began to get abroad. In addition to which another young doctor arrived on the scene, only too plainly backed up by Mr. Gordon's support.

But Dr. Stewart stood his ground, though with increasing difficulty.

All baseless rumours he could despise, the effect upon his practice would be transitory, but the competition of a rival cut up a good living into a small income; yet he determined to wait. He intended to win Elise, and stuck to his opportunities of just seeing her with bulldog tenacity.

. . . .

"Run for the doctor, quickly!" exclaimed Elise to the servant. "Grandpa has had a fit."

"Yes, miss, but Dr. Griffith's ill with typhoid, and——"

"Then give my compliments to Dr. Stewart, and request him to come to me at once."

Dr. Stewart came, only too willingly. Chance seemed to have delivered his enemy into his hands, but it was with the sternest feelings that he gazed at the old man whose unreasoning hatred separated him from his love and then tried to ruin him.

"Why shouldn't I let him die? He is as near death as possible now," he thought, as he looked at the flushed face and blue lips, and listened to the puffy breathing.

But Elise, who had been watching his face, whispered: "Be good to him! All Rockton will lose a friend in him if he goes."

"All but myself," he answered, gloomily.

"You will win him over yet!" suggested Elise. "If you pull him through, perhaps——"

A moment he stood considering. Was it possible that there was a gentle side to this vindictive old man?

"Suppose I am able to save him?" he queried gently, "and when restored he hates me still—tell me will you, will you"—hesitating, then boldly—"will you love me?"

"I do!" she answered readily. "I love you both. Poor grandpa!"

Day and night care, day and night nursing, and at last out of the Valley of the Shadow the old man came, gentle through weakness and bitterly humiliated at owing his life to his enemy.

"Had you wished to kill me, I could have understood it better," he said, humbly.

"I did wish," Dr. Stewart returned frankly—the old man liked him all the better for it—"but you'd have been even with me if I'd lost the case this time. You must pay costs again"—jokingly. "I mean, I want you to give me Elise."

"Heavier damage than the last," grumbled the old man, humorously; "but if you take her"—laughing—"there's one thing, I'm out of all indebtedness to your wretched profession, after all. She's beyond price."

Digitized by Google

How the Sunshine Society Grew.

"DEAR, oh dear, you have broken the back of your little messenger!" exclaimed a young lady to a friend as she leaned over her shoulder, and read the words she had just written on the fly-leaf of an Easter booklet.

"Why, what makes you say that? What in the world do you mean?" The writer dropped the pen, took up the gift, and read aloud the inscription :—

For my dear friend Mabel, I wish all the blessings of Easter.

JOSIE.

New York,
April, 1901.

"Surely no one needs the blessings of life more than Mabel. She is away out on the desert plains of Arizona. I doubt that another Easter greeting will reach the camp. You know she had to go because of consumption. That old library where she worked nearly killed her. Her mother is with her. The only people they ever see outside of the camp are Pima Indians."

MRS. CYNTHIA WESTOVER ALDEN.

"Well, you see I belong to the Sunshine Society," said the other, "and I could not conscientiously scribble all over that book as you have done. I have said you have broken the back of yours. It can't go any further than you personally send it. With all that 'Mabel and Josie' written on him he'll find himself tucked away in some box of cards in Mabel's trunk, and there he will stay dead forever to the world. Now, just let me tell you the history of that little fellow if sent out on his Easter journey by a 'Sunshine' member. Suppose that I send him. We must play that this is a fresh booklet without a mark on it. Now I will take one of my calling cards and write on the back of it the same that you have spread all over this first page. Then I will pin the card on the fly-leaf. Note that I say pin——"

"Yes, yes; I'm 'catching on,'" laughed her companion, who was listening eagerly.

"But for fear Mabel might not 'catch on,' too, I am going to write on one corner of the card the motto of our society."

In plain letters she printed "Pass it on."

"You don't want her to give it away, do you?" exclaimed the pupil.

"Wait! Wait just a minute. You are too impatient! Now we will suppose it is mailed—it arrives safely, and Mabel is delighted. 'How sweet to remember me!' she says, and perhaps her eyes will fill with tears of joy. 'I wish I could buy something like this for mamma. Mamma's life here is like that of a prisoner, but she won't go away and leave me.' All at once she spies the words 'Pass it on.' Now I can't even describe to you the expression that comes over her face. You will have to imagine it. She does the booklet all up in the tissue paper and again ties the pretty pink ribbon about it, slips under the ribbon a loving message all her own, and places the package on mamma's plate at lunch time. Now once more you must make your own picture, and this time of the mother's pleasure. The booklet is read, and the little verses copied into the scrap-book to be used at the Easter service already planned for camp. Then we hear mamma say :—

Digitized by Google

"'Mabel, dear, don't you think Mrs. Alexander, who is too sick to come to the meeting, would enjoy this?' 'Oh, let me run over with it,' cries Mabel. 'I was going to give her this rose, anyway.'

"Mrs. Alexander enjoys the gift for an hour or so. She sees the motto, and with the true Sunshine spirit, sends the messenger into the next tent to a young man who is homesick.

"'Well!' he says. 'Isn't this luck! The only Easter card in camp. I'll send it over to Miss Mabel, she——'"

A peal of laughter here interrupted the teacher. "Why," exclaimed her pupil in Sunshine, "Mabel's got it again. Really, for a minute you made me think everything was true."

"'Well, I'd like to impress upon you that the truth goes way ahead of any imagination. Mabel would have a good laugh and start the messenger out on another round of duty. There is no limit to the sunshine that one wee card or booklet can scatter if it's 'back isn't broken' by some in the very start. Here endeth the first lesson," said the teacher, and her eyes twinkled right merrily.

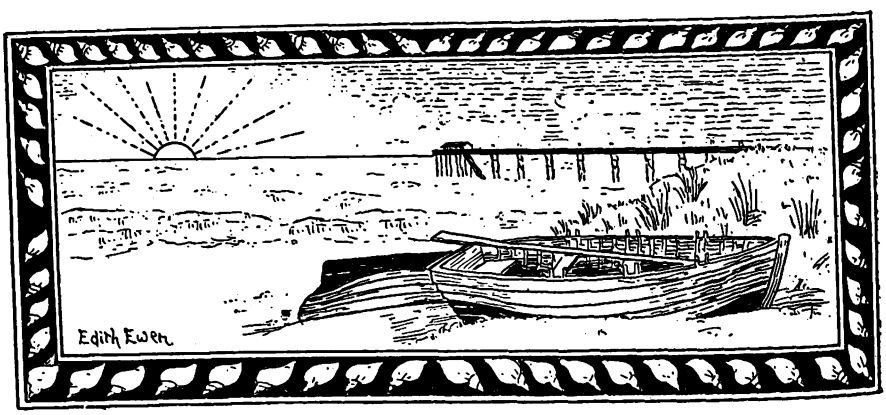
Her pupil reached for the booklet and tore out the fly-leaf, saying: "There, sir! I've mended your back, my little man, and may you do even more than has been prophesied for you."

It was just so that the Sunshine Society started. Mrs. Cynthia Westover Alden, when editor of a department in a busy daily paper, objected to the staff giving her cards written upon, and a lecture something like the above was delivered one Christmas time. Eighteen cards were passed on as a result, and the story was the first report issued by the society. It started the sun a-shining, and now there are hundreds of well-organised branches. Miss Susan Parsons is president. All communications should be directed to her Room, 99, Bible House, New York City.

The striking growth of the International Sunshine Society, especially in churches and Sunday Schools of various denominations, has aroused much interest in many quarters. Mrs. Alden, founder and President-General, explains that the organisation was calculated to be helpful to all denominations.

"If Methodists come in," she said, "the work makes them better Methodists.

"If Episcopalians join they will find their church dearer than ever. If Baptists become Sunshiners, they find themselves more enthusiastic Baptists than ever. If Presbyterians fall into line their church will be all the stronger."



Digitized by Google

A BORN POET.

HIS SORROWFUL HISTORY.

THERE was no doubt he was a poet! Three persons at least had reached a state of solemn certainty about that—his mother, his sweetheart and himself. He had been a poet from the age of eleven years, at which period of his life his father had suddenly died, and under the influence of his boyish emotion he had written three commemorative verses. The feet were rather mixed, iambic and trochaic being used impartially, but the lines rhymed. His mother was proud of them and showed them to her minister, who had called on an errand of condolence; and in an unguarded moment he inserted them in the church magazine.

Since then the poet had not been much in print. But this was not his fault! If not familiar with printer's ink, he certainly was with another kind. It dyed his fingers and iron-moulded his cuffs. Unfortunately, the cuffs were bought and paid for, and the poems were not. Still, hope stirred strongly within his youthful heart, and by the time he was fifteen he had comforted bereaved friends, exhorted himself and others to high aspirations, and celebrated the birthdays of his many acquaintances—all in poetry. Then he went to business.

It was a hard life. Anyone who had him to train found it so. They tried him at sending off invoices, but he covered the back of one of them with a striking couplet that occurred to him, and unwittingly sent it off.

They tried him behind the counter, but the shopwalker, missing him, found him at last reading Tennyson under the counter. The poet said it was "absence of mind," and the other replied that he quite believed it; but they couldn't get rid of him, owing to his indentures; so there he stayed, and, roasted from morning till night, the poor poet had a bad time of it.

At last he was out of his time, and he was not asked to stay on. He had great difficulty in getting any employment, for he wore his hair so long, and cultivated an appearance of eccentricity; but folks who didn't understand called it untidiness. Meanwhile, his poor mother kept him, and his girl waited for him, and he rewarded them by reading them all he wrote. It was not much of a public, but everyone must have a beginning—and an end. So it came to pass that his mother died. The patient fingers which had worked for him dropped working for ever. But he wrote this verse for her memorial card—

> The golden sun was setting in the west,
> When her sweet spirit sank to rest.
> Oh, may we all like her thus pass away,
> To those bright realms of everlasting day.

After this he starved for a time. Then he married—not the girl who had waited for him so long, but an elderly widow who fell in love with his "uncommon" appearance. But, alas! she drank; and the widow also died. With the salvage of her money he emigrated, thinking that in a new country there would be room for genius.

When last heard of he was labouring for the meat which perisheth as a baker's journeyman in a New Zealand settlement. Cured? Not a bit of it! He still fills the poet's corner of the local newspaper, and uses the little spare cash he has to send copies to his friends in the old country.

Digitized by Google

WHERE THE SUNBEAM LAY.

A CHILD walked with her mother on the beach. The sun was nearing the west, and was shut in with struggling mist and clouds, but a long, narrow beam of sunlight slanted across the waters and seemed to the two almost to touch their feet. They walked on and on, and still the sunbeam lay at their feet.

"Mother, mother!" cried the child, exultantly. "See, the sunbeam moves with us. When we stop it waits for us, and if we go back a few steps it follows us."

The mother smiled, and the child prattled on.

"Oh, mother! all the little boats between us and the sun are in the sunlight, and the others are grey and dull. How sorry they must be when we move on."

And still the mother smiled. A sudden thought seized the little one.

"Mother," she said, "I want to see if it is you or me that the sunlight follows. I will run down the jetty and see."

And she darted off, while her mother stood still on the beach. It seemed to the child that the ray of light changed its direction as she ran along, so that it pointed always to her, and when she stopped at the end of the jetty it paused and lay once more at her feet. She raced back triumphant.

"Mother," she cried again, "the sunbeam is following me, not you. It left you and came with me!"

"No," said the mother, "it may have gone with you, but it stayed with me all the time."

Out upon the rippling waters a little boat was dancing exultantly and calling to another.

"The sun loves me," it said, "dearer than all the others. A ray has been sent straight to meet me and kiss me; and see, all the boats in a line with me are in the gleam, and you and all the others are left grey and gloomy."

"No, no!" cried the other boat. "What a great mistake you are making. The sun-ray is kissing me, not you. Yes, and it is kissing one other little boat between me and the sun. It is you who are out of the gleam, if you would only own it. What dreadful stories you tell!"

And they quarrelled about it. The ray of light said nothing, and perhaps only the sun itself knew the whole truth about where the sunbeam lay.

On the heaving sea of life many vessels ride, and sometimes the Sun of Truth is shut in with many mists, and only one struggling ray seems to slant across the waters to them.

By the shores of Life's Sea, where many sand castles are built and many children play, you may hear one calling to another that the Light of Truth has sought him out and left his fellow untouched and unglorified.

And perhaps only the Light of Life Himself could pierce the mystery and tell us where His sunbeams lie.

B. B.

Digitized by Google

Audrey's Promise

CHAPTER I.

"MIND, whatever happens," Georgie Amyot cries to Audrey as they come downstairs together, "you are not to let mother come for me before half-past six. If you cannot keep her any other way, you must take her into the club and make her have some tea, and tell her I am always in the smoking-room, where non-members are not admitted. You mustn't, on any account, let her find out, or even suspect, that I have not been at the club the whole time. She would never let me go again, and goodness knows how much would come out if she began ferreting about."

"You can trust me, dearest," Audrey answers, with the instinctive loyalty she has always shown her sister.

The trees were still leafy, the grass green and smooth, the wide gravel paths cool and shady and almost deserted in that little old corner of Ranelagh Gardens that is still left down by the Embankment. In one of the most secluded paths a pair of lovers paced slowly up and down. An incongruous pair they looked at the first glance—a tall, handsome, soldierly young fellow in a sergeant's uniform, and a dainty little fashionable butterfly, exquisitely dressed, with a piquant dark face, a fairy figure, and bright, vivacious ways.

"It is awfully good of you to come down here and meet me, sweetheart," he was saying, tenderly. "I only wish I was not obliged to come out in uniform. It would look so awfully bad for you if anyone were to meet us."

"Oh! no one is likely," Georgie, answered, brightly. "And you look awfully well in your uniform, you know, Leslie. I wish all the officers were obliged to wear their uniforms always—they would look much nicer. But I am afraid I shall not be able to come again for some time, and you must be very careful, dear," she continued, with a slight note of anxiety in her voice, "not to tell anyone that you know me. You must never mention my name to anyone, or seem to know anything about me. You know, if anything ever got to mother's ears, it would get me into a dreadful row. Of course, I mean to tell her about you some day, but I think it wiser to wait until you have got your commission; you are sure to get it soon, aren't you?"

"I can't tell, dear," said the young soldier, with a sigh; "only you may be quite sure I should never mention your name to anyone. Our love is much too sacred a thing to me for me ever to want to talk about you to anyone."

"I wonder how you came to enlist," she said, looking at him rather curiously.

"The Camerons have always been soldiers," he answered, with a proud uplifting of his handsome head. "I couldn't get through my exams., you see; and then I was the third son, you know, and there was not much money forthcoming for coaching and so on; and I daresay I was an idle young fool, and wasted my time, so that I couldn't pass the exams. As I could not go up the steps to the front door, I just slipped in by the side door; and here I am sergeant, and likely to remain one, as far as I can see. If only I could get sent out to South Africa—out to the front, you know—there would be some chance for me then."

"But you might get killed," said Georgie. "You mustn't go away and leave me. What should I do without you?"

Digitized by Google

She looked at him, her brown eyes tender and velvety under the shadow of her wide grey hat, with its soft grey plumes. "I can do nothing at all about it, worse luck," he said ruefully. "If they don't send my regiment out, I shall have to stay at home."

They stood to listen to the clock at the Chelsea Barracks striking six.

"Six o'clock! I must go," cried Georgie. "You can write to me just as often as you like, and I will write as soon as I possibly can. Don't come to the gate with me, dear. My hansom is waiting for me there. Good-bye, good-bye, my dearest. I will come again as soon as ever I can."

"HERE WE ARE AT LAST," SAID MRS. BRUCE-AMYOT.

He watched the little figure, in its delicate French-grey robe, tripping lightly down the path to the gate. She climbed hastily into her hansom, and was whirled away to her club.

A little later, Mrs. Bruce-Amyot and Audrey walked into the drawing-room where she was waiting for them. "Audrey is a little brick," she said to herself, as she noted the weary look on Audrey's pale young face. She seemed to see written there all the tiresome conversations, all the worldly talk and chatter and scandal of the fashionable drawing-rooms where Audrey had lingered with her mother that afternoon, to give her time to meet her soldier lover in the Gardens.

"Here we are at last, my dear," said Mrs. Bruce-Amyot. "I am sure you must be tired of waiting for us. Audrey is getting to be the most complete little gossip. She had so many last words to say, and so many confidential chats in the doorways with the girls we met, that I really thought we should never get away at all. And now we really must be getting home. Are you quite ready, pet?"

Audrey nodded to her sister, as who should say, "Yes, you see, I managed it quite cleverly." She looked very lovely standing there in the pale blue draperies that clung about her tall, graceful figure, and the black picture hat that showed off the splendid gold of her hair and the lily white of her skin to such advantage. Georgie caught her hand and gave it a grateful squeeze as she sat down beside her in the carriage.

. . . . .

A week had passed away, and Audrey was singing softly to herself at the piano, when a smothered cry from Georgie startled her, and she turned round quickly.

"Oh! Audrey, Leslie's regiment is to go to South Africa. He begs me to meet him this afternoon. He says it may be the last time we shall be able to see each other. What on earth am I to do? How can I possibly get away this afternoon? You know I am going to Lady Willoughby's garden-party with mother."

Digitized by Google

Audrey looked at her helplessly; she was never good at plottings or expedients. "Can't I go with mother instead of you?" she suggested.

"No, the only thing I can see for it is this—— Are you going to help me, Audrey?"

"Of course."

"You must go and meet him for me. Yes, child, there is no help for it, unless you want him to be cruelly disappointed, waiting about down there all day for me. It can be managed quite easily. I shall ask you to go to the club for me. You can have the little brougham to take you there; then you must take a hansom and drive down to Chelsea Gardens and meet him."

"But Jones will wait at the door for me," Audrey objected; "he will see me take a hansom."

"No, he needn't, baby. I see I must arrange every bit of it all for you, or you will make some mistake. You go into the club; then, ten minutes after, you send out to say you are going to stay and have tea at the club, and he can go home and come for you again at half-past six. Then you will take the hansom, and make the man wait for you outside Chelsea Gardens, and you will get back to the club in plenty of time. It is as simple as possible."

"What am I to say to him?" asked Audrey.

"Tell him how it was I couldn't come—he will understand—and try to arrange some other time for us to meet. You know what engagements I have. Perhaps he may be able to get leave once more before they start, either before they go to Aldershot or while they are there. Tell him I will do everything I possibly can to see him before he goes. I must see him. I cannot let him go all that dreadful long way, perhaps to be killed, without saying good-bye to him.

Audrey carried out her part of the programme faithfully. As she turned into the broad, shady avenue in Chelsea Gardens, she was aware of a tall young fellow in a scarlet uniform, with the three gold stripes on his arm, advancing with martial tread towards her from one end of it. As soon as he reached her she took her courage in both hands, and bravely accosted him.

"Are you Mr. Leslie Cameron?" she asked.

She knew she must be right, for he had a fair moustache, and he looked at her with two surprised grey eyes as he saluted her and answered, "Yes, that is my name."

"I am Audrey Bruce-Amyot," she said in a sweet, clear voice, looking up at him with grave blue eyes. "I have come here instead of my sister Georgie; she cannot come. Georgie hopes you will be able to arrange some other meeting before you go. You will be able to get leave again, won't you?" she went on.

"Of course I shall try, but I am afraid there is not much chance. We go down to Aldershot the day after to-morrow. But you must tell Georgie that my going to South Africa is the very best thing that could possibly happen for us. I am sure to get my commission. It is a splendid chance for me. And when I come home we can be openly engaged, and have done with all this hole-and-corner business. I shall be able to come forward openly and claim her honourably, as a man should do who is honoured by her love."

AS THEY PASSED OUT AUDREY ALMOST BRUSHED AGAINST HER OWN LOVER.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, I know," said Audrey, gently.

They talked together a little longer, and Audrey gave him a little note from her sister, in which Georgie set forth the days and hours on which it would be impossible for her to get away from home to meet him, and the more propitious moments when she could be at his disposal. Then they began to walk slowly towards the gate together. He forgot Georgie's precaution of always parting from him in the avenue below—he was, perhaps unconsciously, less careful of the sister than of his adored one herself—so he walked on calmly to the gate.

"I cannot help being very sorry you are going," she said kindly, and her blue eyes were a little misty as she raised them to his face.

They had reached the gate by this time. As they passed out Audrey almost brushed against her own lover, Lord Carstairs, who, as ill-luck would have it, was on his way to make a call in one of the flats near by. He must have heard those last words of hers; he must have seen that mistiness in her eyes, and that martial figure by her side was blatantly conspicuous.

Audrey's presence of mind forsook her, as it always did on an emergency, and she did the most foolish thing she could have done under the circumstances—she turned in obvious confusion to Leslie Cameron, shook hands with him abruptly, then fled to the waiting shelter of her hansom, and was driven off, leaving the two men staring at each other transfixed.

CHAPTER II.

Audrey was dressing for dinner in a dull, mechanical way when Georgie flitted into her room on her return from the garden party, a gay, gossamer figure in white chiffon with lustrous gleams of old gold shining through its folds, and an old-gold picture hat frothing over with snowy plumes, with dainty white-shod feet, and broad bracelets of dull gold on her white-gloved hands. She glanced curiously at Audrey sitting in that dull way at her dressing-table.

AUDREY DID NOT HOLD OUT HER HAND IN GREETING WHEN HE CAME TOWARDS HER.

"If you don't want Elise any more, Audrey, I wish you would let her go to my room and get my things ready," she said. "I will wear the red surah, Elise, with the white lace overskirt and bodice." Then, as the maid left the room, "What on earth has happened, Audrey? You look as if you had committed a murder."

Audrey turned to her sister with a gasping sob.

"Oh! Georgie, I am a most unhappy girl," she said.

"Tell me about it, dear," Georgie said, putting her arm tenderly round her young sister's neck.

"Who would ever have thought of such an unlucky thing happening?" wailed Audrey. "Harold was passing by Chelsea Gardens, and he saw me with Leslie."

"Whew!" Georgie blew a most unlady-like whistle. "That Harold! I have no patience with him! He is always spying about just where he is not wanted. Don't worry about him, my pet. Perhaps he didn't see you after all. Tell me exactly how it happened; it may not be so bad as you think."

Digitized by Google

"Everything went all right at first, and I saw Leslie, and I was coming out of the gardens. In another five minutes I should have been safe away. It did seem cruel he should have been there just at that moment. As we came out of the gate we walked right into him."

"'We!' Do you mean to say Leslie came right up to the gate with you?" cried Georgie. "How idiotic! He really ought to have had more sense! He knows I never allow him to come beyond the avenue with me. Well, what did you do then? I know you too well to suppose you made any attempt to turn it off. I wish to goodness I had been there to make up some story to account for Leslie. What did you say?"

"I didn't say anything," faltered Audrey. "I—I just shook hands with Leslie and got into the hansom and came away."

"Shook hands with Leslie;" Georgie groaned. "And never attempted to make any explanation! My poor Audrey! you will never have any more gumption than a baby! How could you give yourself away like that?"

"No explanation would be of any use now," said Audrey, gravely, "except the whole true one."

Georgie looked down with a shamed colour in her piquant face. She felt, selfish little butterfly that she was, that Audrey ought not to be allowed to sacrifice herself. Harold ought to be told the truth.

"Don't say any more, my dearest," Audrey said presently. "I could never try to get happiness for myself by hurting you. I daresay you are right about Harold; at any rate we will not risk it; we will let things remain as they are."

"You know if the worst comes to the worst," Georgie went on, "and he does break off the engagement now, directly Leslie comes home again and we are married I will explain the whole thing to him myself. It is not as if he were the kind of man to go and engage himself to some other girl; he never took any notice of any other girl till you came, and you know he is nearly thirty. He will go on loving you just the same, and in a few months, when everything is all right and straight, he will come back and ask you to forgive him."

"GOOD GRACIOUS, AUDREY! WHAT ON EARTH ARE YOU DOING THERE?"

And with this comforting assurance Miss Georgie took herself off, adding to herself in the privacy of her own apartment:

"You will have forgotten him yourself in a few months' time, and serve him right for a meddling prig."

. . . . .

"No letters for me this morning, Elise?" Audrey asked, sleepily.

"Mais non, mademoiselle," said Elise, handing her her morning cup of tea; "il n'y a pas de lettres pour mademoiselle ce matin."

It was a reprieve, though Audrey knew that the execution could not be very long delayed. And she was unprepared with any plan of action when, a few hours later, Harold was announced.

She stood by the window, obviously waiting for him, when he came into the drawing-room. She did not hold out her hand in greeting when he came towards her, but the moment was too tragic to her for her to suffer any shyness or embarrassment.

Digitized by Google

"I thought you would come as you did not write," she said quietly.

"And what have you to say to me?" he asked, with a calmness that did not conceal his repressed excitement.

"There are things you must want to ask—oh! I know it is your right to have some explanation—but I cannot give it, Harold; indeed, believe me, I would if I could. I can only ask you to trust me for a little while, until—until ——"

"Until when?" he asked sternly.

"Until I can clear up the whole of this matter," she said.

"Let us put the matter clearly. You have a secret rendezvous with a soldier—a common soldier—and you part with him in tears. What am I to think of all this?"

His voice softened suddenly, and he took a step nearer to her.

"My darling, trust me! If you have been foolish, I will forgive you, but this secrecy and mystery is breaking my heart. We were to have been married next month, but how can we be husband and wife with this secret between us?"

MRS. BRUCE-AMYOT WENT UP TO AUDREY'S ROOM AFTER LUNCHEON.

But Audrey said never a word.

His heart ached to take her in his arms as she stood there so fair and sad in her cool green draperies, with the sunlight on her golden hair and the shadows deep in her blue eyes; but the figure of that odious "common soldier" in his uniform stood between them.

"You will say nothing?" he asked, the jealous pain in his heart growing into anger.

"I have nothing more to say," she answered then.

"Then he is your lover?" he went on, harshly. "You love him, but you have thrown him over for my higher rank and greater position! It is all plain enough. You met him yesterday in those Gardens to say good-bye before you sold yourself for money and a title. Well, far be it from me to let my worldly advantages stand between two true lovers." He laughed harshly as he turned to take up his hat from the table behind him.

Audrey stood, with hands clenched tightly together, looking her last on the man she loved. With dim eyes she took in every detail—the tall form, the broad shoulders, the proud head; the blue eyes that had looked at her with such adoring tenderness; the clear-cut lips that had touched her own with such melting sweetness — her king among men, who must leave her now for his honour's sake and because she had promised! Well, that was her honour, too, and honour was dear to both of them, and truth, and the keeping of promises.

He walked out of the room without turning again to look at her, without any word of leave-taking; the small civilities of life were forgotten in the ruin that had fallen on them both. When he was gone she slid down where she stood into a limp heap. There Georgie found her later.

"Good gracious, Audrey! what on earth are you doing there?" she cried, stooping over that forlorn figure.

At the sound of her voice and her touch Audrey came back out of a merciful dream of unconsciousness.

Digitized by Google

"Do get up, child!" she urged. "Suppose mother had found you there, or one of the servants! What is the matter?"

She let Georgie put her into a chair, and sat there looking up at her with a face so wild and white that even Georgie was frightened, and rushed off for some wine.

"Here, drink this. Now don't be silly, Audrey; drink it up at once; you are looking like a ghost. I have no patience with that Harold coming here and making scenes. But you do take things too tragically, you silly child! What does it matter if he has gone off in a huff? I daresay he will come round again. If you did marry him I believe you would be dead in a year with his tempers."

Audrey took no notice of her sister's chatter, and by-and-bye crawled up drearily to her own room and lay down on her little white bed.

"Don't come down to luncheon; I will explain to mother," said Georgie, as she left her there.

And Georgie did explain to Mrs. Bruce-Amyot that Audrey and Harold had had some stupid lovers' quarrel and broken off their engagement, and that Audrey was fretting herself ill in consequence.

"Do you know what it was about?" inquired Mrs. Bruce-Amyot, curiously.

AT FIRST WHEN SIR JASPER APPEARED GEORGIE TOOK A GREAT DISLIKE TO HIM.

"I am sure I don't know. But don't say anything to Audrey about it, mother. She really is dreadfully upset, and I don't believe it was her fault at all. Harold has such a vile temper."

Mrs. Bruce-Amyot smiled as one who should say, "Do you take me for an idiot?" But when she went up to Audrey's room, after luncheon, and kissed the pale little face lying on the pillow, she whispered, "Don't fret, my little Audrey; things often come right sooner than we expect," in a more motherly tone than Georgie had ever heard from her.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER III.

Sergeant Leslie Cameron embarked with his regiment without having any other opportunity of meeting his lady-love. She wrote him tender farewell letters, and with these he had to rest contented.

The season was over. Mrs. Bruce-Amyot had taken her two daughters down to the pretty old Dower House in Devonshire to recruit from the fatigues of the season. And it was while down there that they heard, to their delight, that "The Grange," a fine old house that had long been untenanted, had been let to a Sir Jasper Treherne, who had taken it for his mother. Mrs. Bruce-Amyot naturally called there, and the acquaintance soon ripened.

Sir Jasper himself was a slight man of middle height, with a silky black beard, small delicate features, and restless, keen dark eyes; there was a pale waxiness about his face that told of ill-health.

At the first, when he suddenly appeared in the midst of the afternoon tea at the Grange, Georgie had taken a great dislike to him, but after a little his presence seemed to hypnotise her.

Meanwhile, abroad, war had been declared at the Cape, and men's and women's hearts and thoughts were over the sea with the soldiers who were playing the rough game of war, with all the nations of the world for onlookers. Darcy Bruce-Amyot was there with his regiment, and many another kinsman of Bruce-Amyot and Treherne. Every morning Mrs. Bruce-Amyot looked down the lists of killed and wounded in a breathless hush of terrible suspense, only relieved by her "None of our boys, thank God." And Audrey read them through again by herself, looking for Leslie Cameron's name with palpitating heart. There was another out there at the front whose presence there would have wrought up her suspense to the very point of agony had she known of it, which, happily for her peace of mind, she did not. Georgie never read the papers; she was content to hear what the others told her. "She dare not look herself," thought Audrey, filled with tender pity for her sister's anxiety.

One day she read Leslie Cameron's name, with the words "severely wounded" after it. She had to wait till night before she had an opportunity of being alone with Georgie; then she went to her room when everyone had retired.

"Have you seen the list of wounded to-day, Georgie?" she asked, in an interval of that young lady's chatter. "No; you know I never read them," she answered. "I leave that to you and mother, who like harrowing sensations."

Audrey's voice was sweet with the tenderest pity as she went on. "I know, dear, you are afraid to look at them because of Leslie. Georgie, darling, he has been wounded. I saw his name to-day. He is not killed, but he is severely wounded." She stood there like some pitying angel, with the tears in her tender blue eyes, and her gentle arms held out to her sister.

Georgie looked at her curiously. It was true then, wonderful as it seemed, that Audrey alone of all their little company had been blind to Sir Jasper's courtship and Georgie's own willing acceptance of it.

"Poor Leslie! I am very sorry," said Georgie and the words sounded, even to her own ears, absurdly inadequate. But to Audrey it only seemed that she was stunned by the pain and the surprise of this unexpected blow. She held her in her arms, kissing her softly, bending her tall head over her and murmuring words of tenderest sympathy and consolation. Then she went away and left her alone, as she herself would have wished to be left in a like trouble.

Georgie sat down on the side of the bed, drawing the brush slowly through her long dark hair. "Aubrey is really unique" she said aloud, and laughed shamefacedly.

. . . .

Across the pathless veldt, under the blue, clear African sky, two young officers rode gaily side by side—Harold, Lord Carstairs, captain of one of the troops of irregular horse; Leslie Cameron, lieutenant in the East Chalkshire. He had got his commission at last, in that land where commissions might be won by gallant bravery and deeds of derring-do.

"And so you came over from India when the war broke out?" Leslie was saying cheerfully. "Did you have good sport out there?"

"Yes, very good, thanks. At least, I mean—that is to say—I hadn't time to go up country, you know, before I heard of the row over here. No, the tigers will have to wait for me till this war is over," Carstairs answered absently.

Digitized by Google

He was trying to remember where he had seen this handsome youngster before; there was something very familiar about him.

"Will you go back to them when the fun here is over?" Leslie asked, with friendly interest, looking at him at the same time with a certain puzzled curiosity. "What on earth did the man want with tigers in India," he thought, "when he is engaged to that lovely Audrey Bruce-Amyot?"

"I think so; most likely," said the other, answering Leslie's spoken question.

"I only got my commission since I came out here," said Leslie, in his frank way. "I came out in the ranks, you know—a sergeant."

Then suddenly Harold remembered where he had seen those grey eyes and that fair moustache before. This was the man whom Audrey had parted from, with tears, at the gate of Chelsea Gardens.

They shared a tent that night at the camping place. Carstairs was silent and moody, and made no response to his companion's cheery, kindly advances. This meeting with Leslie seemed to tear open again the wounds he had begun fondly to hope were healing after all these months.

Leslie was almost asleep when suddenly his companion asked him—

"You are a cousin of the Bruce-Amyots, are you not?"

"Oh! no," said Leslie, sleepily; "they are no relations of mine."

Having said this, he hesitated a moment. He had got his commission now, he thought, and he and Carstairs had grown very intimate in these last few days, as men do grow intimate who have faced danger together and fought shoulder to shoulder, and the temptation to confide in him was great.

"They are no relations of mine," he repeated slowly, "but I am engaged to Miss Bruce-Amyot."

"Oh!" said Carstairs.

It was true then, incredible as it seemed. His Aubrey, whom he had thought the very soul of purity and honour, loved this man, and yet had been willing to give herself to another for his rank and position. She had deceived them both, for this man evidently knew nothing of her relations with himself.

Leslie waited a moment or two for congratulations that never came, and then wandered away into dreamland.

Next day was the day of the disaster at Nicholson's Nek. A part of the force had been sent on during the night to take up a flank position, and, as everyone knows, was cut off from the main body and made prisoners. Very early in the morning the main body attacked the Boer entrenchments, fighting with the heroic gallantry that has everywhere distinguished our soldiers in South Africa—regulars and irregulars, Australians, Canadians, Natalians—sons of the Empire, fighting shoulder to shoulder in the Empire's war.

The retreat had been sounded on that unlucky field, when Leslie Cameron's horse was shot under him, and, falling with him, broke his rider's leg above the knee. Unable to rise or extricate himself from his struggling charger, Leslie would have died there under the Boer bullets but for the daring rescue of a rider, who dashed back from the retreating lines through the hailstorm of bullets, and, taking the injured officer upon his own horse, carried him to a place of safety, where he was sheltered from the bullets until the ambulance-bearers could come and carry him away to one of the ambulance waggons. Lord Carstairs had seen him fall, and for Audrey's sake who loved him, he risked his own life to save his rival.

A couple of hours later, as Leslie lay feverish and half unconscious with the pain of his leg, the bearers brought in Harold Carstairs, with a bullet in his side, and laid him beside the man he had rescued. There would be no more fighting for either of them for many a day to come.

In due course they were taken to the ambulance hospital, and lay there for many weeks side by side in their narrow cots. In that enforced idleness of pain and fever, they had ample leisure to cultivate a deep and lasting friendship—born on Leslie's side of an immense gratitude, on Harold's of a generous self-sacrifice in favour of the man whom Audrey loved.

But the Bruce-Amyots were never again mentioned between them.

As soon as they were well enough to be moved the two young officers were sent down to Cape Town and shipped home. They had hoped to be able to rejoin their regiments without going home, but they were both so ravaged with fever, so prostrate with weakness, that the doctor had decided that they must go home to recover completely before they would be fit again to undertake the hardships of a campaign in South Africa.

Digitized by Google

At Cape Town they found letters awaiting them.

For Leslie there was no letter from Georgie, though there was other news as good as it was unexpected. His uncle, Sir Hugh Cameron, wrote congratulating his nephew on his commission and the gallant bravery that had won it for him, and offering to make him an ample allowance to enable him to hold his own in the regiment in his new position.

"Though at my death the title will have to go to your eldest brother," he wrote, "I shall make you my heir to every penny that is not entailed."

Leslie read this letter to Harold, as they smoked together in their deck chairs on board the Monarch, homeward bound.

"I am very glad," said Harold simply. "That makes things all right for you, doesn't it?"

"Yes, that makes things all right," Leslie answered joyously. "I am going down into Devonshire for a few days. I wish you would come with me."

Lord Carstairs divined who it was that drew Leslie "down into Devonshire," and he hesitated for a moment before he answered, with a fine air of indifference—

"Very well, I don't mind if I do. I have nowhere else to go particularly at this moment."

Perhaps, he thought, if he could once see Leslie and Audrey together as acknowledged lovers, it might kill the gnawing, aching regret for her that was always tearing at his heart.

And so it came about that a few days later the two convalescent warriors went down together into the soft and pleasant west country where the Dower House nestled in its old-world garden.

CHAPTER IV.

Sir Jasper at last found his opportunity for the declaration that had been burning in his heart all these months; or rather, for the opportunities had not been lacking, he found the courage to seize one before it escaped him. He had made a practice of slipping over the wall by Georgie's favourite walk, and there he often found the girls strolling up and down together after breakfast, reading their letters and discussing their plans for the day.

One cold and windy morning he found Georgie pacing her favourite promenade alone.

"I don't often get the chance of finding you here alone," he said impulsively, as he held Georgie's hand in both his own.

"Audrey has only this moment gone in," said Georgie, "she found it too cold out here. I don't believe you ought to be out yourself, you know you are an invalid; you ought to take more care of yourself now the winter is coming on."

"Yes, the winter is on us, there is no doubt of that," he said absently, looking at her with a rapt admiration. What an enchanting fairy she was! She seemed to him lovelier every time he looked at her. To-day she wore a fleecy cloud about her head that framed her dark curls and her soft little flower-like face most delicately; the dark furs of the long cloak she had wrapped about her, toning with the rich carnation of her cheeks and the velvet of her brown eyes, gave an indescribable impression of softness and richness and hot-house bloom that intoxicated the man as he looked at her.

"My beautiful fairy!" he said.

Georgie made him a little curtsey, smiling up at him in her irresponsible fashion.

But the man grew more strenuous: "Are you playing with me?" he said, gripping her arm with fierce strength. "You must have seen these many days how madly I love you, Georgie! Georgie!"

"I have not been playing with you," she answered softly; her eyes fell, and she leaned a little towards him, though his grip on her arm pained her.

"Is that true?" he cried breathlessly, "do you mean that?"

He loosed his grip upon her arm, to gather her into his passionate embrace, murmuring incoherent words of thanks and blessing as he bent over her, hardly yet daring to kiss the flower-face. She was a little frightened at his vehemence, and yet it stirred her to an answering thrill.

"Do you really love me so much?" she whispered.

"Too much, too much, my fairy witch! I love you to distraction. I have thought of nothing else day or night since first I met you. And you?—do you love me a little, my beautiful fairy?"

Digitized by Google

And Georgie, forgetting plighted troth and other ties in a brief madness, murmured back: "Dear Jasper."

They had a blissful hour to themselves out there under the fast fading autumn trees. Sir Jasper was the most passionate and the most extravagant lover Georgie had ever known in all her rather wide experience. He amused and flattered her immensely. And she made no objection when he insisted on going into the house to see Mrs. Bruce-Amyot and ask her consent to their engagement. This was no penniless young sergeant, nor detrimental younger son who must tell his love in secret to his lady love only; and yet Georgie felt curiously relieved when she found that Audrey was not with Mrs. Bruce-Amyot in the drawing-room when she and Jasper went in to make their confession. Audrey was so impulsive, she told herself, and had so little tact, one never knew what she would say or do if she was taken by surprise.

"OH," SHE EXCLAIMED, "ONLY A PASSING FANCY!"

Mrs. Bruce-Amyot was dignified and gracious, everything that a mother should be whose daughter is about to make an entirely desirable match.

Later on in the day Lady Treherne paid a visit of congratulation, evidently at her son's request; she was very civil, very colourless, and very talkative, as usual; but she stared a good deal at Georgie, with a sort of alarmed wonder in her eyes which was not usual.

Before this visit Georgie had had a short but rather sharp encounter with Audrey, who was even more surprised at the news of her engagement, and even more "impulsive" in her manner of receiving it than Georgie had expected.

"Have you quite forgotten Leslie Cameron?" Audrey asked, staring at her sister, wide-eyed, in great bewilderment.

"Poor Leslie!" said Georgie with a sigh, "that was always such an utterly impossible affair. You must have seen that yourself, Audrey, though I will say you were always most kind and discreet about it. I don't think I could ever have dared to tell mother about it, even if he had got his commission. It would have been a terrible thing to marry a subaltern, without a halfpenny beyond his pay, even if mother would ever have allowed such a thing. After all, you know, it couldn't ever be anything but a passing fancy, though he was a dear fellow, and much handsomer than Jasper."

Audrey stared at her with such pain and bewilderment in her white face and wide blue eyes that Georgie was frightened, and stopped suddenly.

"Oh Georgie!" she said, "only a passing fancy!"

It was for this then that she had lost Harold, her king among men; for this that ruin and desolation had come into the fair promise of her life. She went to the window and stood staring out at the pouring rain and drenched garden that was not more gray and desolate than her life had been since the day that Harold left her with anger and doubt in his heart where love had been.

After that one passionate protest Audrey mentioned the subject no more. Her nature was too loyal and too constant to allow her to keep up any feeling of resentment against the sister she had idolised all her life, but when Georgie rattled on, in her inconsequent way, about Sir Jasper's sayings and doings as she had done once about Leslie's, Audrey listened in silent wonder, and found it very difficult to sympathise.

Digitized by Google

The course of true love seemed to be running smoothly enough for Georgie and her new lover. The first little stone that ruffled the surface of its current was a remark made by Lady Treherne, in the most casual manner. Jasper had been talking before her of the date of their marriage when she interrupted him.

"But you cannot settle anything about that, my dear," she said, "until Gilbert comes home."

Jasper turned on her furiously.

"Gilbert!" he cried, "Gilbert! What has he to do with my marriage? What business is it of his when or whom I choose to marry? Am I the eldest son or is Gilbert? Answer me that!"

His face was transformed with that look of dark and evil meaning, and Georgie saw his mother shrink away and shiver, as she had seen her do once or twice before.

"Why do you ask such foolish questions, Jasper?" she said feebly. "Of course everyone knows you are the eldest. But I thought you would naturally like to consult your brother on such an important question."

"Then you thought wrong. Gilbert is too meddlesome by half in my affairs. But he had better be careful! If he attempts to meddle in this affair it will be the worse for him," said Jasper, hotly.

At this moment Ursula came quietly into the room, and he turned to her.

"You had better write and tell Gilbert to stay away," he said. "I am not going to have him coming down here interfering with me as if I was a child. You tell him it will be safer for him to keep out of the way for the present."

"I don't think he is at all likely to come at present," said Ursula calmly. "He seems to be enjoying himself very well where he is, and I have heard nothing of his coming down here." She glanced warningly at Lady Treherne. "Will you come upstairs, Aunt, I want to consult you about something," she went on; and Georgie noticed that the old lady trembled so, as she left the room, that she had to lean on Ursula's arm.

"I must be going home now, Jasper," said Georgie, a little unnerved by this unexpected scene.

"I HAVE WANTED TO SPEAK TO YOU FOR SOME TIME."

"Very well, dear, I will come with you," he said pleasantly. And he was so pleasant then and afterwards that the disagreeable impression he had made that day on Georgie's mind soon wore off and was forgotten.

Ever since her engagement Georgie had had an uncomfortable feeling that Ursula watched her, and was always trying to get hold of her alone. As Georgie had no desire for a private interview with that young lady, she took some pains to frustrate her attempts in this direction, and it was some weeks before Ursula caught her off her guard and unattended. She was strolling slowly down the drive from the Grange, waiting for Jasper to overtake her and walk home with her, when Ursula came swiftly across one of the lawns towards her.

"I have wanted to speak to you for some time," said Ursula, hurriedly. "I am glad to have found you alone."

"Indeed?" said Georgie.

Ursula dashed into her subject at once, evidently feeling she had no time to lose.

"This engagement cannot go on," she said, "You cannot marry Jasper."

"I don't think you will be able to prevent me, Miss Treherne," said Georgie, looking at her with open dislike.

"He is mad!" cried the other passionately. "He is mad! Are you so blind

Digitized by Google

MY MASTER'S DAUGHTER.

Digitized by Google

you cannot see it, or is it that you will not see?"

"A man always seems mad to his relations when he falls in love with the wrong woman," said Georgie, coldly.

"It is not that," Ursula answered. "He was mad long before he met you. He is sane at times, as you have seen him, but he has fits when he is a raving maniac. I warn you; look here," and she raised her dark hair to show a scar on her temple, "do you see this scar? He shot me once in one of his mad fits, and only just missed killing me."

"An accident," said Georgie, carelessly, "I suppose that is why he never goes out shooting now."

"He is not allowed to go," the other went on, less vehemently. "He is not to be trusted with a gun. This was not an accident. He tried his best to kill me, as he would kill you some day if you married him."

"You are mad yourself," said Georgie.

"You will never marry him," the other said in a tone of finality. "If the knowledge that he is mad cannot stop you, be sure we shall find other means that will."

But Georgie only laughed.

"You would not try to keep him if he belonged to some other woman, I suppose," said Ursula, trying another tack.

"That depends," said Georgie; "not if he was married to the other woman, naturally."

Ursula looked keenly at her, and then went on.

"Jasper and I have been engaged to each other ever since we were boy and girl together," she said. "We should have been married long before this, if his terrible malady had not declared itself; but our marriage has been put off time after time, on account of his health, on account of these outbreaks. He has been better sometimes for long intervals, and we have hoped he was cured. But we have long relinquished all hope of him. For years his mother and I have lived in a daily dread of fresh outbursts of insanity, and from time to time they have surely come. But in the intervals he is at least not dangerous; he is much as you have seen him. I have devoted my whole life to him, he is mine, though I know I can never be his wife."

"That is all nonsense about his being mad," said Georgie, looking with great dislike and distrust at this woman whose personality had always repelled her. "And if you haven't the pluck to marry him yourself, you should not be such a dog in the manger as to stand in the way of another woman doing it. If Jasper still considered himself engaged to you, he would not have asked me to marry him."

"You mean to go on then, in spite of everything?" Ursula asked.

"I don't mean to answer any more questions," Georgie answered impatiently. "You yourself acknowledge that you do not intend to marry Jasper; therefore it can be no business of yours whether he marries me or not."

As she stood, still looking somewhat defiantly at Ursula, Jasper came up to them.

"What has Ursula been saying to you?" he asked with quick suspicion. "She is always watching me and trying to thwart me. You must not listen to her. What has she been saying?"

Ursula moved away towards the house.

"Nothing that need matter to us, dear," said Georgie, who had no mind to raise a storm even against Ursula.

"She and Gilbert are in a conspiracy against me," he said, watching Ursula's disappearing figure with lowering brow. "She is jealous of you, of course, darling. I daresay she has been telling you I was once engaged to her, when I was too young to know my own mind; but that was broken off long ago, before I met you. You believe that, don't you?"

He turned and looked at her with gloomy eyes as he finished.

"Of course, dear, I believe you," she said brightly; "don't let us think any more of such foolishness. What does Ursula matter to us?"

Nevertheless she felt not altogether easy in her mind as she strolled down the drive towards her own home with Sir Jasper beside her.

"I don't choose Ursula to talk nonsense to you about me," he said irritably; "I shall insist on knowing what she has been saying. Come for a turn in the wood before you go home; there we can have it out comfortably."

"It is so dreary in the wood, now all the leaves have fallen," Georgie objected; "it will be so much more comfortable over the fire in the boudoir at home."

"You are afraid to come with me!" he cried violently, "you have been listening to Ursula, you have believed her lies.

Digitized by Google

You too are turning against me! You do not love me!"

"Nonsense, Jasper," she interrupted laughing. "How can you talk so foolishly! What do I care for anything Ursula can say? I never liked her, and I never trusted her. Of course I will come into the wood with you if you really wish it, though I must say I wonder at your taste; nasty, damp place."

"Ah, now you are my own true sweetheart again," he said, drawing her hand within his arm and turning towards the wood, which lay just beyond the park gates, on the other side of the road.

They had had some pleasant rambles there together in the summer and in the early autumn, before the wealth and glory of the trees had been swept from them. Georgie, with her gay and sensuous nature, hated everything that was chill and depressing, and her laughing face looked serious enough as she turned it towards her lover.

"I hope, Jasper," she said, "you do not expect me always to meet you here. That would be a strange way of showing the devoted love you profess for me."

"Forgive me, darling. But, indeed, this is such an important matter. We cannot discuss it properly anywhere where we are liable to be interrupted at any moment."

"I cannot see that anything Ursula says or does can be of sufficient importance to make you slight my wishes," she answered, pouting.

They were now within the wood. He walked on some little distance moodily, without taking any notice of her words or of that charming pout, that sat so bewitchingly on her dark little face. Then he stopped suddenly and looked at her with a sullen and evil look.

"I say it is important," he said; "I insist on knowing every word she said to you. Begin at once."

His tone and look were so menacing that Georgie's heart failed her with sudden terror. They were alone in the wood, there was no one in sight. She clung to his arm in a sort of panic.

"Don't be angry, Jasper dearest," she said, with a catch in her breath. "Of course I will tell you anything you ask. You know I have no secrets from you."

"What did Ursula say?" Jasper repeated.

Georgie's face was white and her lips trembled.

"She does not want you to marry me, you know, dear," she said, "and so she told me you were engaged to her, and that she would never give you up."

"Was that all?" he asked.

"Yes," said Georgie, faltering.

"It's a lie!" he shouted, shaking her off violently, as she clung to him. "It's a lie! She told you that I was mad, and that's a lie, too! But you believed it. Answer me that, did you believe it?"

"No, no, Jasper, of course not! Indeed I paid no attention to anything she said," Georgie answered, trembling. "Pray, pray, Jasper, believe me! Indeed, I have done nothing to make you angry with me. I cannot help what Ursula chooses to say."

"Why do you shake and cower like that, and turn white, if you are indeed my true and faithful sweetheart?" he whispered.

His whisper was so much more dreadful than his shouting had been that Georgie lost all control over her nerves, and shrieked in wild terror. In a moment the maniac sprang upon her and seized her by the throat. But even as he did so there had come an answering shout from the road, and a crackling of dry twigs and branches under the tread of hasty feet. The next moment Jasper was hurled away from her, and Leslie Cameron took her into his protecting arms. In the blind terror and confusion of the moment it seemed supremely natural that Leslie himself, and no other, should have come to her rescue.

"O Leslie! Take me away! He will kill me!" she cried, breaking into wild sobbing.

"There, there, my darling, you are safe now. I will take you home," said Leslie, soothing her, with the most anxious tenderness.

A few paces off Lord Carstairs stood over the fallen figure of Sir Jasper, who seemed afraid or unable to rise.

"What on earth is it all about?" asked Harold, looking at them across the body of the fallen one in much perplexity, "and who is this chap?"

"He is mad," sobbed Georgie, "and he tried to kill me. Take me home, Leslie; I am so dreadfully frightened."

At the word "mad," Sir Jasper sprang to his feet.

"I am not mad!" he shouted furiously. "False and wicked woman, how dare you

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

accuse me? You have deceived me! I will shoot you, both you and your accursed lover!"

And before Lord Carstairs could stop him he rushed past them down the path towards the road.

"He looks mad enough, indeed," said Harold drily. "You seem to know the lady, Cameron. Please introduce me. Good heavens! It is Georgie Bruce-Amyot."

Georgie lifted a flaming face from Leslie's shoulder. The moment Leslie's arms had touched her, that strange delusion of hers that she loved Jasper Treherne fell away from her, and she knew at once and for ever that Leslie Cameron was the one man in the world for her.

Lord Carstairs began to laugh. "We arrived in the very nick of time," he said, "but what was all the trouble about?"

"You are surprised to see us here, I daresay," said Leslie, noting Georgie's bewilderment. "We have been invalided home from Africa, you know. Didn't you get my letter?"

"No, I got no letter," said Georgie faintly.

The smile died away on Lord Carstairs' face.

"Look here, Cameron," he said, "I don't want to seem impertinent, but would you mind telling me which of the two Miss Bruce-Amyots you are engaged to?"

"Why, Georgie, of course," answered Leslie.

"Then where does Audrey come in?"

"I don't understand you."

"I met you in Chelsea Gardens, walking with Miss Audrey Bruce-Amyot, this summer," said Harold Carstairs stiffly. "I did not recognise you at the time, but I know now that it was you."

"It's no use making a secret of it any longer," Georgie broke in. "Audrey went to meet him that day instead of me, because I couldn't get away. I am very sorry for it all now, Lord Carstairs, indeed I am. But mamma didn't know anything about Leslie, and she would have been angry; I was obliged to keep it a secret, and—and—Audrey helped me, and she promised not to tell."

Lord Carstairs looked at her for a moment in grim silence. Through her incoherent explanation he began to see vaguely that somehow amongst them all Audrey had been made the scapegoat.

"Where is Audrey now?" he asked.

"Audrey is at home," said Georgie. "You know the Dower House?"

He nodded abruptly and left them, striding down the road. He had forgotten Sir Jasper Treherne and Georgie's timely rescue, but Leslie had not.

"I want you to tell me," he said very gently, "what was the meaning of that quarrel we interrupted? I saw that the man was a gentleman, and not any stray tramp wandering through the wood. Why were you walking here alone with him, and why did he say you had deceived him?"

And for once in her life Georgie sought for no clever specious fable that should deceive and re-assure her lover, but told him the truth honestly, with tears.

And Leslie Cameron, who, perhaps better than anyone else in the world, understood that wilful irresponsible nature, forgave her, and took her to his heart again.

. . . .

Audrey sat by the fire in the morning room. She had grown to be very chilly of late, as people are apt to be when their vitality is low by reason of much fretting in secret. She often sat idly by the fire in these days instead of going out with Georgie.

She was a little paler and a little thinner than she had been six months ago, but her youth had fought with grief, and kept her rare beauty still undimmed. The perfection of her lily fairness and the splendour of her golden hair showed as exquisite as ever against the deep violet of her dress and the bands of dark fur that trimmed it. She was thinking sadly, as she sat there alone, of the havoc and desolation that had come into the fair garden of her life in its very springtime, and of the hopelessness of any future bringing back sunshine or brightness into its waste places. And because her thoughts could never dwell entirely on herself, she was thinking, too, of Georgie's faithlessness, and the bitter grief and disappointment in store for Leslie Cameron when he should return. She knew that he had got his commission, she knew, too, that he was invalided home, but she never spoke of these things to Georgie, who had not been able to keep faith with her absent lover. It was curious that she should not have known that Harold Carstairs, too, had been at the front, and had been wounded. But she knew no one in his regiment, and among the long lists it was easy not to see names one did not seek for. And she believed him still in India.

Digitized by Google

In upon her sorrowful musings a visitor came quietly, unannounced. Looking up in the gathering twilight, she saw her lost lover coming towards her. In that moment it seemed to her that she had passed the very outermost limit of her endurance. All the pain and bitterness and self-repression of those last months seemed to pour back over her in a flood.

"I cannot," she cried, "I cannot," and, bowing her fair head upon her hands, she broke into wild weeping. She knew that he was kneeling beside her; she felt his arms steal round her; she heard his voice in the old, remembered tender tones.

"Darling, darling, can you ever forgive me?"

And she stayed her weeping to listen to his pleading, to hear how great was his love, how undying his remorse for having so misjudged her; to hear him say, with earnest meaning:

"And I know, my faithful heart, that you will keep your promises to me as you kept that cruel promise to your sister."

[THE END.]

A TRUE BRITON.

THE brave little lad whose picture appears here walked one hundred miles to see the King and Queen. Arthur Lanyon and his chum, both about fifteen years of age, ran away from their homes in Penzance early on the morning of March 3rd, and commenced a daring walk to Devonport for the sole purpose of seeing the King and Queen. They were practically penniless and totally unacquainted with the road. No one seemed to know of their intentions and their parents were in a panic, fearing the worse, but on Wednesday evening news came of their safe arrival at Devonport. Owing to a mistake they took the wrong road when full two-thirds of the journey had been done, and their little error cost them nearly thirty miles of extra tramping, so that altogether quite one hundred miles was covered. The time occupied was from Monday morning till Wednesday evening with very little rest by the way, and a chance meal or two, for which they trusted to Providence. The nights were cold and frosty, and they must have displayed great courage and determination to accomplish such a remarkable feat, but they saw their Majesties several times and were satisfied.

ARTHUR LANYON.

Digitized by Google

REALISING - - OUR COLONIES.

I.—CANADA.

"CANADA? Yes, that is one of our dependencies," we say with smug satisaction; yet the "dependency" is no less than forty times as large as the United Kingdom. If a skeleton be made of the map of Europe, and a child were then asked to cut it out from an atlas, and try to fit Canada into the skeleton map, it would be found nearly to fill it.

Its relative importance in size to our other great possessions is seen from the accompanying sketch.

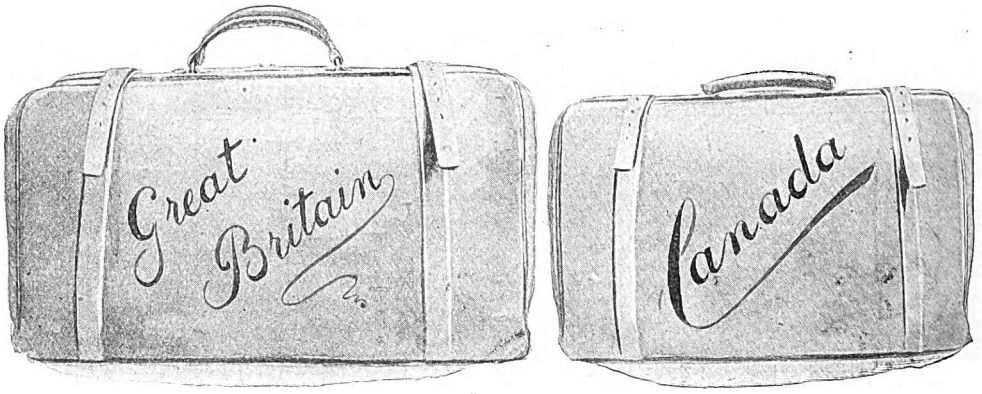
Its possibilities are shown from the fact that, if its huge areas were populated at the same rate as the area of Great Britain, i.e., 323 to the square mile, it would hold the enormous number of eleven hundred and sixteen millions, as compared with the thirty-eight millions who now seem to crowd our soil. At present, only five millions of these have put in a claim to occupy, so in every sense it may be said, "Yet there is room."

Size, however, is no proof of capacity. A desert is large, but quite as uninviting, but it must be said of the great tracts of land in Canada they are indeed "great wastes" for they are wasting for lack of use.

It is enough to make a thinking man sit down by the great rivers of Canada and weep, as he realises that mineral wealth, productive soils, and forests of timber are only waiting for pluck, painstaking, and perseverance to go in and possess them, while numbers of men are starving in the old country. The five million inhabitants who are there are terribly in earnest, as is seen by the business that is done. In the old country each man exports per head £7 10s. per annum, yet Canada runs pretty closely with £6 10s. per head; but owing to its greater facilities for producing for its home consumption, it finds it only necessary to send to foreign countries for about half the value per head we require here at home, Great Britain importing £13 per head and Canada only £6.

Digitized by Google

A clearer proof of how much is ready to hand for those who settle there, there could not be. The people are only half as dependent upon foreign help as those at home, and if the place were as fully worked as here, it would apparently be as powerful in the world markets.



CANADA'S POWER PER HEAD OF EXPORTING IS SEEN TO BE NEARLY THE SAME.

Towards the development, of which it is plainly so capable, Canada has only 5,000 miles less of railway than Great Britain, which boasts 21,000, so that its opening-up can only be a question of a short time. The education of the coming generations is seen to on as liberal a basis as at home, both the Canadian and home systems providing for the instruction of 20 per cent. or the population. Its climate is healthy, having the advantage of being one thing or the other for at least half the year. The perplexing variableness of our home climate is unknown there, one remark alone hitting off the truth: "A man in Canada carries his milk in a basket one-half the year and his butter in a pail the other half."

CANADA'S NECESSITY FOR IMPORTING SEEN TO BE MUCH LESS.

Digitized by Google

A MODERN ESDRAS.*

By WOLFE STREET.

These papers are confessedly an imitation of the 2nd Book of Esdras in the Apocrypha.

CHAPTER III.

I WAS alone in my chamber, and as my custom is before I sleep, I lifted up my heart to God with all its many needs.

Much of my prayer had oft been prayed before, but God had long delayed the answer.

And as I prayed I thought: "Why do I thus? If God wills to send me blessing, He will bless, and if He be not willing, no prayer of mine can change Him."

Whereat I was perplexed, and cast about to see the reason why the Father willed that men should ask Him for the gifts they need.

. . . . .

Now while I mused, I must have fallen in a trance, for Uriel came to answer the bold questions of my heart. And when I saw him I made haste to speak, for my heart was sick with the vain longing to understand.

"Oh my lord," I said, "I cannot comprehend why I, who am but a father in the flesh, will give my child so many things unasked for, and yet the Heavenly Father needeth prayer. I know His Mercy and His Love are far beyond mine own: yet here the servant seemeth almost better than the Master."

"Thy words are rash," he answered. "Thou hast said thou dost not understand: thou sayest well, for thou dost not. Yet must thou strive to do so. Thou must stand under facts of life, stand at their roots, ere thou canst comprehend the ways of God. Tell me, therefore, why dost thou think that men should pray? Does thy request instruct God's wisdom? Is it not written He knoweth ye have need before ye ask? Does it more willing make Him to assist thee than before? Nay, since He changes not, that cannot be."

"This is but as I thought," I answered; "therefore did I wonder!"

"Then, seest thou not that if the need for prayer lies not with God, the need for prayer must lie with thee? Answer me now and I will teach thee! Thou hast a son. For his sake thou dost save and toil; and ever art thou anxious that in his future he should have success. Is it not thus?"

"Even so, my lord," I answered, "and it is natural!" A shade passed over his countenance as though I had offended, and he replied—

"If this then be thy feeling, express it boldly unto God. Say unto Him, 'Be pleased to grant my child great riches. Let him be first in life whoever may be last! Whoever suffers, let him rejoice!' Canst thou pray thus, O Esdras?"

"Nay, my lord, I cannot be thus selfish."

"Then see how prayer can test the quality of thy desires. The thoughts a man ought not to pray he should not think. Once more I bid thee listen. Thou hast an enemy, O Esdras, and sometimes thou dost wish that he might suffer for the things he wrought against thee. Thou would'st not be a little glad if he were greatly sorrowful. Go then, Esdras, crying, 'Lord, deal with this enemy of mine! Let me see him crushed and humbled, suffering and sad! Bring him into a narrow place!'—Say it! Say it!'

* Copyright in United States. T. Y. Crowell & Co., Boston.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"My lord, I cannot! It would prick me to the heart. David prayed thus once against his enemies, but I have read how Christ did pray for His."

"The things then thou mayst not ask thou hast no right to wish. Seest thou what proof of thine heart's wishes prayer can make? Prayer, if 'tis real, bringeth the mind to only ask good things. In life's mad rush the thoughts of men get dark with error, Esdras,—prayer brings them to the light of truth.

"Once more I would remind thee how in prayer thou hast refreshed thy soul. Was it not like breath of mountain air—life on a higher level, thinking high thoughts in company of God? The world's great workers have been men who often prayed. Tell me, O Esdras, the spring and source of all great work?"

"Even God himself," I answered.

"True," he replied; "but also Man—Man looking out on God, or looking in upon Him, perceiving His purposes, hearing His words; then, throbbing with a strange excitement that rushes forth in burning eloquence, mastering the minds of men, waking their sympathies, rousing their love, and kindling in their hearts the self-same fire. The companionship of God is the inspiration of men. That is why thou shouldest pray.

"And yet there is another cause which, if thou ponderest, thou wilt see. Some things there are which can be given to another, such as money and other earthly goods, but canst thou give thy son knowledge without he strives to learn?"

"Nay, my lord, he must be schooled, and of his own will give attention, or in very deed he cannot learn."

"And the more eagerly he tries, the more he learneth, Esdras? Is it not so?"

"Even so, my lord! His mind will open to contain more truth. The size of the measure ever settleth how much it can contain."

"Like as thou dealest with thy son," he answered, "to give him knowledge, so does the wise God deal with thee.

"Truth, Righteousness, and Faith cannot be given, they must be acquired. Think on thine own words, 'the measure of the vessel will ever settle how much it can contain.' The mercy of God desires to lead thee unto Truth, to establish thee in Righteousness, and to increase thy Faith; but these He cannot give thee, as He could give thee money, thou must acquire them. As thou send'st thy child to be schooled, so bids He thee unto His presence chamber. There thy spirit's powers expand by wrestling till He giveth Light and Grace as thou art able to receive."

"But, my lord," I questioned, "did not the disciples of old pray 'Lord, increase our Faith,' as if Faith could be given?"

"True!" he said unto me. "And the prayer was answered. In journeyings often, in perils by land and sea, persecuted of men for the sake of Christ, beaten with many stripes—a hissing and a bye-word amongst the nations, they exercised the little Faith they had, and that increased it. As the muscles of the smith harden by use, and as by work his strength increases, so must it be with Faith. Dost thou wish thine increased, O Esdras?"

"Yea, my lord, for Faith is mighty in its workings."

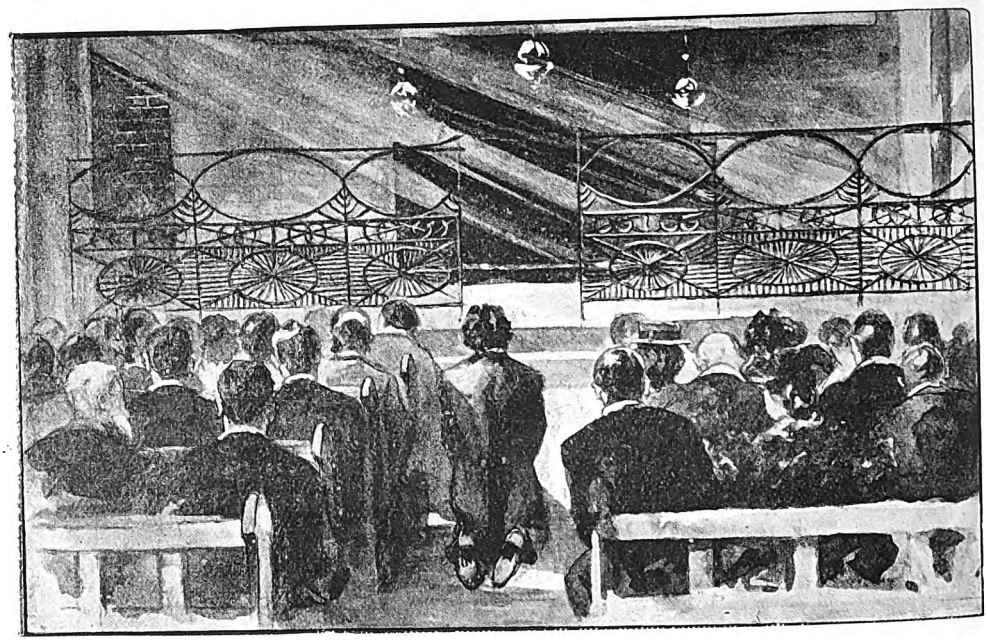
"Have then thy wish! But know, O man, thou shall have trouble in the flesh, and in the Spirit. Times shall there be when clouds shall overshadow thee, with never a silver lining or even a silver fringe. Thy Faith shall be stretched to its utmost limit, even as men stretch the web of elastic, but, unlike that, it keeps the limit to which it has been drawn."

"But, my lord," I said, "why is it that 'tis given unto us according to our Faith? Why should God's gifts depend upon my trust?"

"Does that thing seem so strange," the Angel answered, "which yet is being carried on around? It has been written that lacking Faith it is impossible to please thy God: I tell thee, Esdras, that lacking Faith thou canst not even please thy fellow-men; thou canst not serve them nor thyself without this Faith.

"The world is served by many a law placed by the Lord in Nature for thy use; but the great ruling law which governs all is Faith itself; Faith launches forth thy frail bark on the Ocean, nor can one put to sea without it. Faith lights the fire within thy dwelling: why art thou not afraid that it will be consumed? Faith puts the arrow on the string, and Faith again it is which draws the bow. Before thou usest one of Nature's laws 'tis Faith must set it working. ¶Thou canst not speak or move without some

Digitized by Google



WITHIN THE CHURCH THE LIGHT STOLE DIMLY THROUGH THE RICHLY-COLOURED GLASS.

Faith. It is the key to all things round thee. And if thou has but little Faith it limits thy possessions. The man who says he cannot is not able. Think but thyself without the power to walk—thy limbs will drag upon thee even as if dead. Lose but thy Faith, and thou wilt lose thy health. To the believing mind all things are possible, for in this world thou mayst be sure there is some law to be the servant of thy will, for World and Will alike both came from God."

"My lord!" I said, "whilst thou art speaking the world appeareth simply filled with servants of Mankind. Never before have I beheld it on this fashion. Clearly I see how Faith in Man keeps men together, and Faith in Nature's laws gives increase to their powers. But that which troubleth me is this: Why things we cannot gain ourselves are given us though faith in God, or else withheld because we trust Him not?"

"Come with me now and I will teach thee!" Uriel answered. And in my dream he bore me to that mighty bridge which spans the black flowing river of London, and said to me: "Lean thou over the edge thereof and drop a stone into the waters under thee!"

I did so, and with ever-increasing speed did the stone fall, till its splash was heard as it struck the bosom of the waters.

"How didst thou that?" he questioned.

"I did but do thy will," I answered.

"Yea, but how wast thou enabled? Thou didst but drop the stone, another force than thine compelled it downward. Didst thou not see that ever as it fell it moved more rapidly? Some other force than thine had quickened it."

I answered: "This is that force which men call gravitation."

"And hast thou ever seen it?" Uriel asked.

"Seen it, my lord! It is a law—I know not more about it."

"Did not the world-life go on as smoothly before men gave this law a name?" the Angel answered.

"Even so," I said, "for in its ignorance the world has acted as though 'twere there."

"O Esdras!" he cried, "and Faith is but the name thou givest to the law by which God worketh in the vast unseen. Named or unnamed, still it is there. Seen or unseen, still it is there, and, understood or not, 'twas there from all Eternity. Act thou as if It were and It shall serve thee well. Matter or Spirit is subject unto it. It is the method of the Power of God, and by it God can give thee richly all things to enjoy. Have Faith in God! And as the measure of thy faith, to thee it shall be measured."

. . . .

Digitized by Google

Thus changing eyes with Uriel I saw this universe as the abode of God. I understood at last the world as one vast treasury, and God Himself the treasurer. I saw afresh the Lord of Hosts as Lord of Laws. Laws for our daily life on Earth set there to see that as our Day our Strength shall be; and over all the greater Law of Faith—(the Foreman-servant of that God, Who liveth to serve Man) wearing the livery of God, inscribed with God's great motto

"ICH DIEN!"

CHAPTER IV.

Grey was the day, and leaden-hued the sky, when I arose on one Good Friday morn, and with the early crowd which thronged to many a church, sought to remember the Suffering Son of God.

Within the church the light stole dimly through the richly coloured glass, and the great altar draped in black seemed but to lend an added sadness to the scene. Finding no seat, for many were before me, I fell upon my knees within the aisle, and there in silence waited, worshipping. Backward my thoughts then wandered to the World's Great Tragedy, when the cruel hands of men had crucified the Son of God. And then it seemed as though the altar rolled away and I was gazing on the hill called Calvary. Beside it Uriel stood, and with magnetic gaze still drew me on, until I stood beneath the shadow of the cross.

I looked beseechingly upon him. "Was there no other way than this?" I cried, "to satisfy the Will of God? This is a ministry of Anguish, Blood and Death, a ghastly horror, unlike the workings of a God of Love! Read me this riddle, if thou canst, my lord: Why suffering innocence can thus appease an Angry God."

A moment he regarded me, then with reproachful tone, he said: "Who told thee God was angry?"

"This is the way men view the Cross," I murmured.

"Then they misunderstand it," answered Uriel. "The Father loves thee, not because Christ died! Christ did but live and die because the Father loved thee."

"Why, then, the Cross for Him?" I questioned.

"'Twas on account of men, not on account of God that Jesus suffered there. Death won not love for thee, nor yet forgiveness, they were and are thine own, through God's forbearance."

"Why, then, that cruel death upon the cross?" again I cried.

"That death was needful to do a work for Men; to teach their stubborn hearts how God viewed Sin. Full freely God forgave, but for the sake of men—God cannot treat SIN lightly. The sins of men of olden time cost them a sacrifice. And why? It made God none the richer, but was ordained to show to men the costliness of sin. If God made light of sin to men, men would make light of sin to God. Behold! in Jesus Christ God's object lesson how He regards Man's sin. And that thou mayst see that for Man's sake alone the Saviour suffered thus, tell me, O Esdras, why the Lord was crucified? Others have slept all peacefully to death, or drowned in ocean's depths have swiftly passed—why not the Lord?"

Knowing not what to say, I answered not.

Then said the Angel: "'Twas for the sake of men, so hard to stir to sympathy, He suffered such a cruel death, else without suffering, the Son of God might well have laid aside the human form in which He robed Himself. But so low down are men that nothing but the sight of awful agony moveth their hearts and wakes their sympathy. And that the travail of His Son might bring forth sympathy in men, and win them through their sympathy to higher life, the Saviour died upon the Cross. Not on behalf of GOD, but on behalf of men. 'To draw them unto Him' the Saviour suffered thus."

Awhile I stood and pondered on the greatness of that love which bore so much for us. But when he made as though he would depart, then I restrained him, crying:

"My lord! my lord! The days will pass into the years and many a baffling mystery shall yet come to thy servant. I may not ever have thee at my side to give me light. Canst thou not ere thou leavest for thine own abode, give me a clue to use in the great maze of Life? Some key to open any lock, some lamp unto my feet? Speak, lord! thy servant heareth!"

And at his feet I fell. Yet stay he would not; but as he departed he spake these words: "This is the key—

FOR THY SAKE."

And they have been the lamp unto my feet.

Digitized by Google

THE INITIAL VELOCITY.

THERE was dead silence, and the students gazed at one another amazed. It had been coming for a long time, and now the impetuous lad blurted it out: "Well, doctor, it is a strange thing if God was in Christ that it only showed itself during the last three years of His life!" And Ernest Reader flung himself back in his seat impatiently.

The somewhat ascetic-looking professor smiled feebly. He had been a specialist in the disease of Doubt for a quarter of a century and saw that this young man had it badly.

"Come and see me this afternoon, my lad, and we will talk it over."

There was a titter at what the rest thought a snub, and in the Common Room after lecture the budding sceptic caught it not mildly; but the youngster was quietly cautious of rejoinder, and the baiting fell flat.

. . . . .

Ernest Reader departed from the doctor's house with some theological cobwebs brushed away from his mind, and that night he looked into the jewelled heavens, and thinking of the bright star which had led the wise men of old to a Babe he remembered how they yet found faith to "depart rejoicing." The blood rushed to his head, and he exclaimed excitedly, "If they could find faith for the Babe, then may I in the Man!

> Strong Son of God! Immortal Love!
> Yes, I that have not seen Thy Face,
> By faith, and faith alone embrace;
> Believing, where I cannot prove!

But he was not quite cured, only convalescent, and the disease of Doubt cleared itself up with a rash of speculation. He broke out—all over. Boils of original exegesis painfully disfigured his public appearance, blotches of doctrina animosities irritated his skin. He became subject to delusions, seeing "Cant" everywhere, and growing wildly excited at its presence.

His deacons grew alarmed. One old medical man in his congregation, however, rightly diagnosed his state. "He must have it!" he said. "It's the Original Sin working out! Comes out in the body as whooping cough and measles, in the heart as flirtation, and in the mind as Modern Doubt. He'll get over it. Never fear! Don't 'Lynch' him." And they didn't, for some of them remembered the Rivulet controversy. So though the Campbells were coming, they never arrived. Soon after this the Rev. Ernest Reader married. Henceforth his heterodoxy showed in a mild form at home. "My dear," he said, when their first infant appeared, "please don't try to graft any religious ideas upon the boy. I should like to see if they will come of themselves."

She smiled.

Twenty months later the proud father was carrying the boy round the garden, bright with flowers, and his Human Experiment lisped out in excited tones, with his tiny index finger quivering, "Pwetty frowers! Dord dood-make-'em—Baby!"

He turned to his wife, intending to lecture her for instilling these ideas into the child, but somehow God had never seemed so real as on the lips of his child. The flower-God was good. So he only laughed and kissed him instead.

The Human Experiment had a mind which moved with a momentum of its own, plus the initial velocity his father's nature had given it.

"Isn't God good to send us this Bunny for dinner?" said his mother, desirous of improving the occasion, when one of their people generously sent them a couple of rabbits.

Digitized by Google

The Human Experiment stood on one leg and answered, "Guess Bunny didn't think Him good."

The Rev. Ernest hugged himself when he heard it. "That boy'll be a thinker!" So he was. At six he spelt out in a book: "GOD-GAVE-US-JESUS." "Papa!" he said, "that's funny! Why Jesus is God, isn't He?" The Rev. Ernest groaned, wishing he didn't think quite so much. But that initial velocity was at work.

He tried his hand upon his girl.

"I hate the cant about conduct," he said. "There's nothing unclean of itself." So he had her taught dancing. He surrounded them both with an atmosphere of freedom and unconventionality. But as they grew up he began to be puzzled as to how he should manage these unruly steeds—their galloping pace alarmed him.

So the years passed. His son was a fine young fellow, physically superb—captain of the football team, mentally keen, scholar and fellow of his college; his daughter was accomplished and graceful, a clever smart journalist, and the magnet which drew many a heart. He had reason to be proud of them both, but their minds were drenched with the scientific scepticism of the day. All this brings the story up-to-date. This is the sequel.

. . . . .

"Sir, you must put an end to it, I say!" thundered Mr. Reader's wealthiest deacon. "I will never let my son marry that free-thinking, worldly daughter of yours. Tell her she must dismiss him!" And he fumed, and fretted and sweated.

"Is a matter of opinion to stand between two young hearts?" asked the minister, gently.

"Opinion, sir! opinion! It's a matter of conviction! it's life here, and the life to come that turns upon it. How a man can marry a woman from whom he must separate for ever when they die is beyond me. My son is a Christian, sir, and your daughter is an atheist."

"I GUESS BUNNY DIDN'T THINK HIM GOOD."

"Not that, not that!" said the minister, hurriedly. "Only a materialist. She believes that knowledge is limited to phenomena—that which can be proved by experiment."

"Well, it's the same thing!" returned the other, impatiently.

The minister opened his mouth to speak, but it was such a long way down to this man, who physically towered above him, that the father held his peace.

With a shaking hand the minister sat down to report the interview to his daughter. "Poor girlie! How she will fret," he muttered. But in answer to his letter came a wire, "What a joke!"

The minister gasped.

While the telegraph form still spake, the maid announced "Mrs. Hinchcliffe." A charming woman entered, who, since the death of the minister's wife, had been a deaconess in all but name. "Oh, Mr. Reader, do look at this!" And she handed him an epistle from his son, asking for her daughter's hand. "My husband declares he can't have an unbeliever for a son in-law. And he's so clever, too! Such a splendid future before him! What a pity he isn't a Christian! Whatever shall we do? And Nellie confesses she's so fond of him!"

Digitized by Google

"I think, Mrs. Hinchcliffe, we'd better let it alone. Perhaps through her love he may be led to believe in the existence of a 'Love of infinite degree.'"

It was no good opposing the marriages in either case. Cissie Reader, on the strengh of her appointment as an editress of a flourishing ladies' journal, snapped her fingers at the threat of her father-in-law to disinherit them. Frank Reader obtained a capital appointment as headmaster of a large grammar school and immediately installed Nellie Hinchcliffe headmistress.

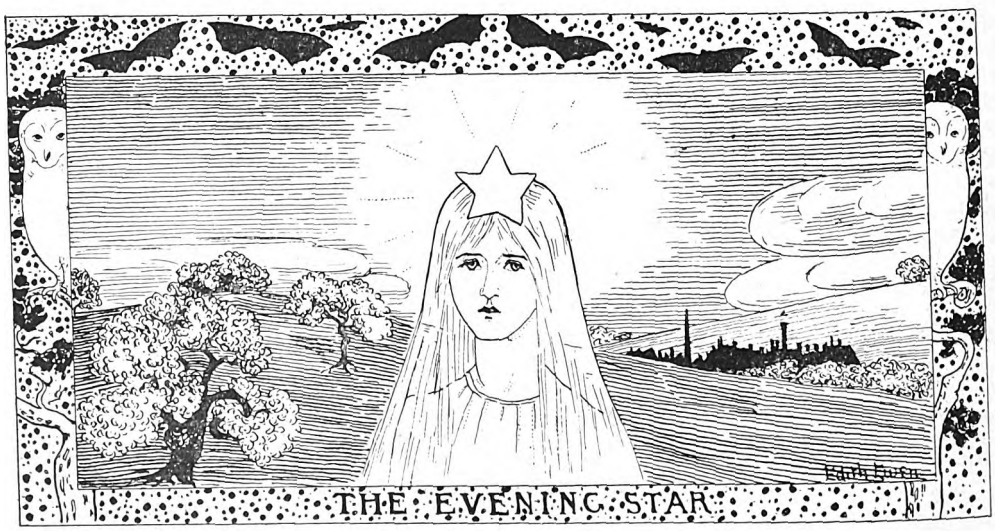
There came a time, however, when the headmaster stood by an open grave, where, with many a pang, he laid the first blossom of the spring of their married life.

"Don't tell me, don't!" agonised the mother, "that I shall never see my darling again!"

He didn't dare to say it, somehow he couldn't think it. Philosophy was dumb in the season of his sorrow. He had never felt the lack of anything but the material, now his heart yearned for things-not-seen-as-yet. And his feelings ran away with his intellect till he "settled it in his heart" in the old-fashioned way, "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me."

Cissie found her way to light through the entrance into the infant school. The children "wanted to know you know," and somehow scientific materialism couldn't explain. Family experiences shed light upon the great human family and the Divine parentage, till in humility she sat at the Father's feet crying:

> Forgive me, where I fail in truth,
> And in Thy wisdom, make me wise!



Digitized by Google

A SURFACE CURRENT.

By BETH BANNESTER, B.A.

THEY had just arrived at that stage of intimacy at which one woman says to another—

"Dear, do you know, you don't make half enough of your hair? It's such lovely hair, I should love to do it for you."

Margaret Compton had put the final hair-pin into Vera Gray's thick coils, and stood contemplating her handiwork in the mirror with great complacency.

"Do you know what a charming picture you make?" she said softly. "Do you know the thought that comes to me whenever I look at you?"

Vera blushed as she answered, "I cannot tell."

"That you are just throwing yourself away on Somebody."

Vera straightened herself, and there was a perceptible touch of annoyance in her tone as she replied—

"If you mean Mr. Somerville, I cannot agree with you."

Margaret knelt down beside her friend and put her arms round her.

"There, I knew you would be angry and freeze me up. I cannot help it, dear. I can't bear to think of your spoiling your life like that. You, with your face, with your talent, shutting yourself up in some little country manse (for he will never get anything better), and ——"

Vera cut her short.

"What makes you say that?" she asked.

"It is so difficult to put it plainly without hurting you, dear. I know you like him for something you think you see beneath the surface. But cannot you see the difference between him and the young men of our set? He may have brains enough, but he hasn't the intangible something which will make him go down in society. It is not to be expected from him. You know his people are quite plain farming-folks. And there is someone, Vera, who wants you so much, and who could give you such a different position. You might do just what you liked with my brother Fred. You would make a man of him."

It was the word too much. Vera sprang to her feet.

"Thank you," she said icily. "Hugh Somerville is a man already."

Margaret bit her lip and wished that she had held her tongue. But in truth she was succeeding better than she knew. Vera Gray was a loving, true-hearted girl, yet she was being insensibly influenced by her friend's flattery, and Margaret had been staying with her for a fortnight, and almost succeeded in persuading her that marriage with Hugh Somerville would be an act of immense condescension on her part. As yet she had not acknowledged this even to herself, but the feeling was there, and it was bound sooner or later to show itself in word or action. There were two alternative dangers ahead for Hugh Somerville—either that Vera would throw him up altogether, or that she would prove the minister's worst drawback, a worldly wife, ever chafing at her social position and fretting at the restrictions of her lot.

Her lover, as he strode along the street that morning with knitted brows and quick determined stride, was quite unconscious of the subtle change that had stolen over her. He was a broad-shouldered, squarely-built fellow, but his features, though massive, had the stamp of refinement which intense and concentrated thought sets upon some men's faces.

Digitized by Google

The door-bell rang about twenty minutes after the conversation give above, and Vera went down to meet her lover, too preoccupied to notice the look of trouble in his face.

"I am off to catch the next train home," he said abruptly, after the first greeting. "Read this, Vera."

He took a black-bordered letter from his coat-pocket. It was from his sister, announcing the sudden death of their father.

For a few moments Vera forgot herself in her sympathy with Hugh. Then something prompted her to ask:

"And when shall you be back in college, Hugh?"

"I am not coming back at all," he answered decisively. "At any rate, not for two or three years. Do you realise, Vera, that my mother and sister are dependent on the farm, and that my brother is only nineteen, and will need an older head to guide him for two or three years at least. So I must turn into a farmer instead of a shepherd of souls, as I had hoped."

Vera's face fell.

"Oh! Hugh," she cried, "how dreadful! A country manse would have been bad enough, but a farm ——"

"A country manse would have been bad enough!"

What evil angel prompted Vera to utter those words? She could have chosen none that would have put a wider gulf between herself and her betrothed.

A thunderbolt would not have startled Hugh Somerville more. He had fully believed that Vera was in sympathy with his aims and aspirations. He had come, feeling sure that she would understand the terrible blow that had fallen upon him in the postponement of his cherished hopes. He had intended to tell her that he never meant to give those hopes up, that he would work faithfully and patiently at the task to which outward circumstances had called him, but always with the determination in the background to seize the first lawful opportunity to leave it, that he might obey the inward call to higher service. He had meant to ask was she willing to wait, perhaps through weary years, till the golden time should come, when, with no neglected duty in the background, they might join hands in loving service for God and man?

When he next spoke all the softness and gentleness had gone out of his tones.

"And now, Vera," he said, "I have only to ask you to release me from my engagement."

"Release you?" faltered Vera, startled and frightened by his tone.

"Yes, to release me," he went on, with stern decision. "A farm would be no place for you, and even if I ultimately enter the ministry, it will probably be through a back door. There will be little chance of my completing my college course. The annuity from which my father paid my expenses dies with him."

Vera felt as if the ground were crumbling beneath her feet. She only retained her self-possession by a strong effort. Never until this moment had she realised what Hugh's love was to her.

"And you don't care, Hugh?" she asked, in a tone which the very intensity of her feeling made constrained and cold.

"There can be no question of any personal feeling in the matter," he answered harshly. "We have to face the hard facts of life. Our betrothal was a mistake from the beginning. The mere fact that you dread life in a country manse is proof enough that we should be ill-mated."

Five minutes later, Hugh Somerville was striding down the street, and Vera was standing motionless in the middle of the room. Hugh had left her. That was the one fact that seemed real to her. Her petty vanity, her selfish day-dreams, seemed to have fallen away from her like a discarded veil, and left her face to face with an awful loneliness. Hugh had left her. And he did not care!

If she could have seen Hugh's face behind the newspaper which he held upside down before it in the train, if she could have seen him as late that night he paced the little gabled garret in the old farmhouse, she would not have added that last clause. For in truth, Hugh Somerville was in the great straits of life. The woman he loved had been, as he thought, only the creation of his own fancy; the God whom he believed to have called him to service and sacrifice, now seemed to mock and reject him.

Vera knew nothing of all this. She went through the day's routine like one in a dream, and at night dressed mechanically for a party. Then at the last moment she pleaded headache, and insisted on Margaret Compton's going without her.

Digitized by Google

By-and-bye a sweet-faced old lady, sitting alone in a big room crowded with old-fashioned furniture, heard a gentle rap at the door.

"Come in!" she cried, and Vera entered.

"May I sit with you, granny? I'm tired and out of sorts, and this is the only restful room in the house."

"Only too glad to have you, dear child," and the elder lady stretched out a hand of loving greeting to her orphaned grandchild.

But Vera seemed as if she could not rest. She knelt beside her grandmother for a few seconds to watch the sunset, then she paced up and down the room, finally she paused in a corner of the room before an antique spinet, and, leaning on a chair-back, let her fingers wander idly up and down among the keys. She played a few stray chords, then insensibly glided into an old melody that she and Hugh had often sung together. The mellow tones of the old instrument lent themselves to the pathos of the air, and it seemed to her that she heard Hugh's rich full voice in the background. Suddenly

SHE LET HER FINGERS WANDER IDLY AMONG THE KEYS.

Digitized by Google

the music ceased, and a low sound of convulsive sobbing was heard from the corner.

"My child, what is it?"

In another moment the elder lady was standing beside her, with her fingers resting on the bowed head.

"Nothing, granny, don't worry about me. Only that I have thrown away all that is worth having in life, and I have found it out too late."

"Child, how I wish I had spoken to you before. But I thought you would only resent it, and that I might do harm."

"Then you have seen how I have been feeling, granny."

"I have seen a difference in you, Vera. I hoped it was a phase which would pass away in time. But, now, tell me all about it."

And with her head resting on her grandmother's shoulder, Vera told her "all about it."

Two hours later the pair were still clasped in each other's arms, and Vera was gazing wistfully at her grandfather's portrait opposite.

"And you never wished for a different life, granny?"

"Never, dear. Mine was a joy that comes to the lot of few women, for in obeying the dictates of the earthly love I never came into conflict with the impulses of the heavenly. Oh, to have been a help, however small, in such a life-work as your grandfather's! It is a joy that will never leave me. Death itself could not take it from me!"

The old lady clasped her hands in a sort of ecstasy.

"Ah! child," she went on, after a moment's pause, "if you had seen what I have seen of the world's sin and misery and wrong—of the awful suffering beneath its crust of gaiety—if you had seen, too, the miracles of moral healing that I have seen as a result of my husband's work—he hope that has been kindled in despairing hearts, the wretched homes that have become bright and peaceful, you would feel as I do the utter pettiness and vulgarity of the world's tawdry ambitions. There is only one thing worth living for—only one joy that never palls, and that is to follow the Master of us all in His work of helping men and women. He that will lose his life the same shall save it."

The tears stole down Vera's cheeks. She understood Hugh at this moment through her grandmother's words as she had never understood him before. For in truth, Hugh had unwittingly done her a great injustice. He was a man who seldom brought his deepest feelings to the surface in conversation. When he had spoken of them to her it had been in language which left much to the imagination. He had supposed that starting from the basis of common beliefs and aspirations she would go through just the same processes of thought and religious experience as he had done, and he had taken it for granted that she stood on the same spiritual platform with himself, instead of stretching out a hand to raise her to his side.

Vera had been brought up by an uncle and aunt, who had spared no expense in her education, but who understood nothing of the training of character. She would have been sadly spoiled but for the loving care of the grandmother, who shared her son's house. To her the girl now turned as her only comforter. The old lady was somewhat of an optimist, and felt sure that Hugh would write before long. Possibly her prediction might have been verified if a false report of Vera's engagement to Fred Compton had not reached his ears. As it was, three weary months stole by, and hope had become very dim in her heart. She had forfeited his love, and with it the privilege of helping and comforting a noble soul.

. . . .

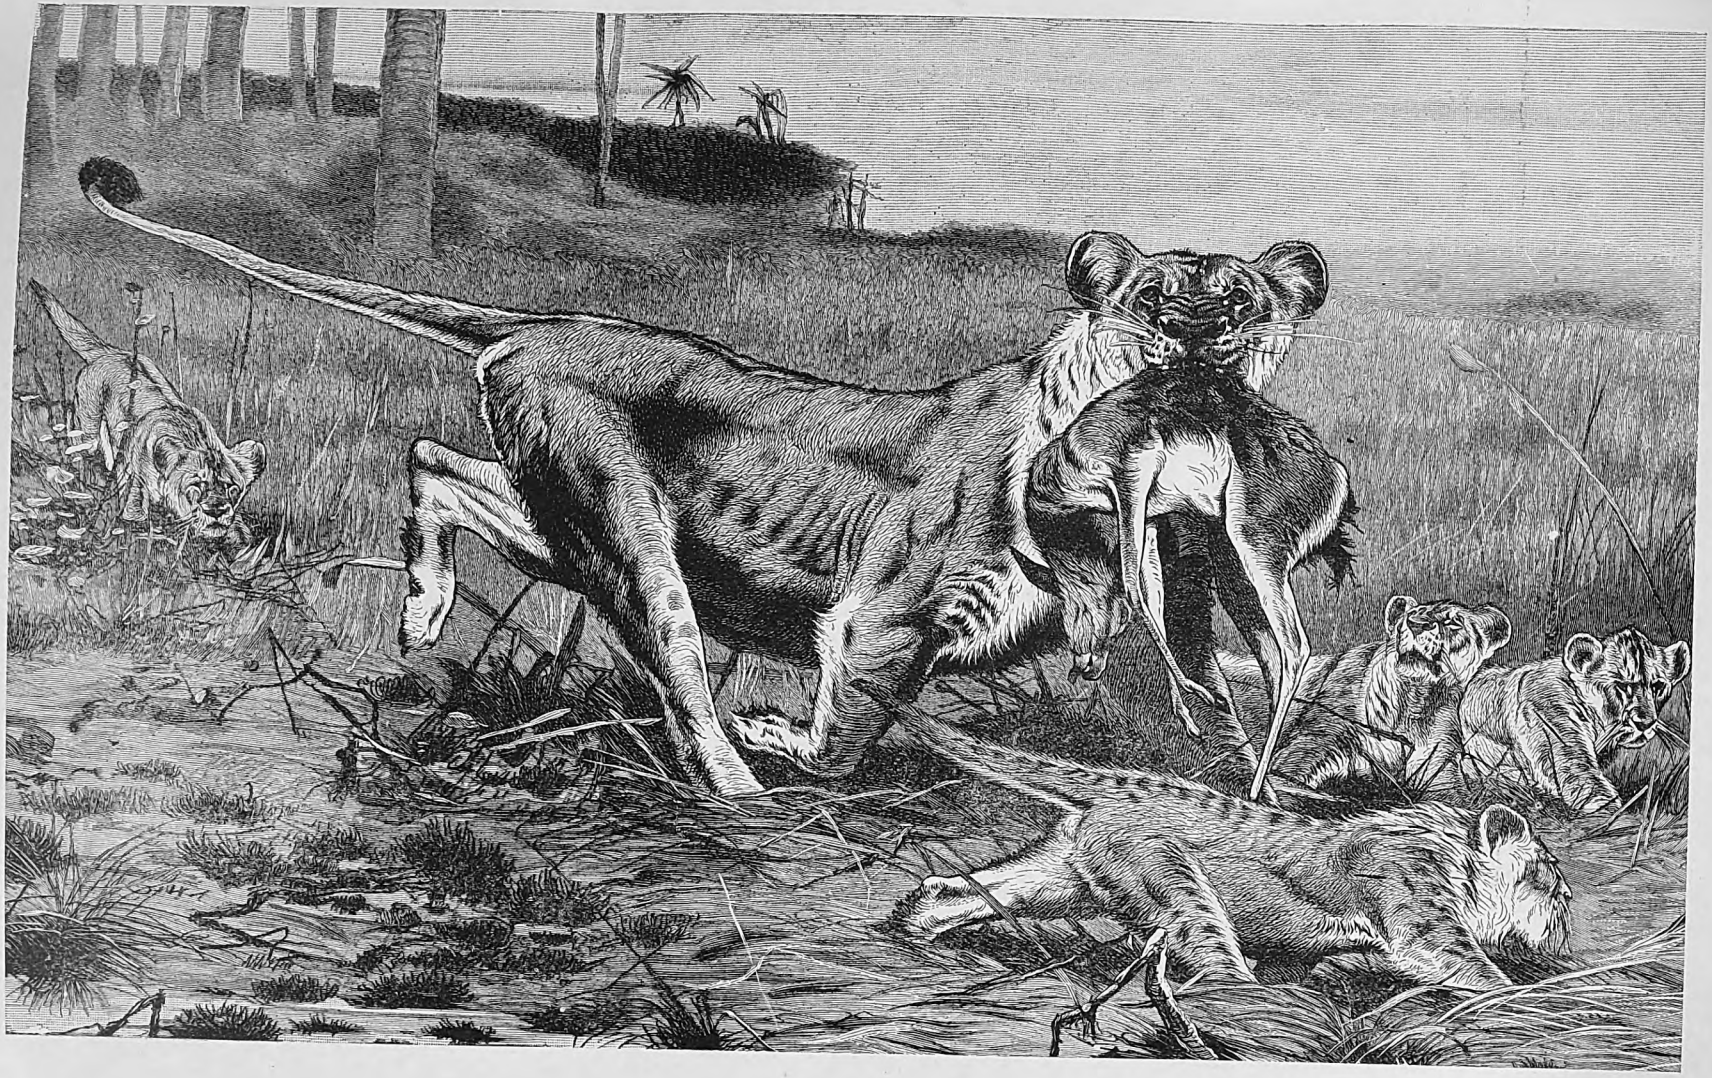
"Ah! Mees Gray, it is von touzand peeties that you use not your talent, your genius. Tere are many professors of music who would give zeir ears to play as you have played zis night. You might make vair mosh money."

Vera had heard this before. She was about to reply listlessly that she did not want money. Her uncle had given her plenty of pocket-money, and she had never troubled herself about the future. But now, a sudden thought struck her. Hugh had said that lack of funds would prevent his returning to college. Oh! if after all, she could help him, without his ever knowing or guessing.

"Can you help me, Professor Reiter?" she asked eagerly. "Uncle is sure to let me do what I like. I have a great wish to earn some money myself."

Vera proved as great a success as a teacher as she was as a performer. Before

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

long her hands were full of work, and her friends were prophesying that she would kill herself. Some thought she worked to stifle her remorse for having jilted Hugh Somerville, others said it was to show she didn't care that he had jilted her. Vera worked on and took no notice of any of them.

Just two years after the morning on which her betrothed had said farewell to her, a letter arrived at the farm addressed to Hugh. As he broke the seal, bank-notes to the value of one hundred pounds fell out of it. Both address and enclosure were type-written, and the letter ran,—

"Will you accept this from one who took a deep interest in your career when you were at —— College, and who has heard of the way in which you sacrificed your prospects? It is not so much a gift to yourself as a contribution to the work to which you pledged yourself. It is sent with only one condition, that you use it for the purpose of qualifying yourself for the ministry as soon as you can conscientiously leave home."

"It is very, very strange," said Hugh to his sister, "that this mysterious packet should have arrived on the very day after your engagement to Will Slater, and his offer to live here and manage the farm."

"I am not sure," she answered simply, "that it is so strange after all, if we have any confidence that our lives are ordered for us. I have always felt sure that God would not disappoint my father's life-long wish and prayer that his son should be a minister. There is no doubt but that you ought to accept it, Hugh."

Hugh did accept it, but Vera did not know that he had done so until she saw his name at the head of a theological honour list.

When, three years after this, Vera was asked to take part in a sacred concert at a city church, she had no idea that the vacant pastorate had just been offered to Hugh Somerville. Hugh came in late, at the back of the hall, too far from the platform to see who the performer of the moment was. He was always deeply moved by the best music.

"That is divine," he murmured to himself, as a great yearning pathos filled the air—a pathos that seemed to come straight from the cry of a human soul rather than from any instrument. "Let me see your programme," he whispered to his next neighbour.

When Vera entered the performers' room, Hugh Somerville was standing there alone.

"Then you are not married?" he said without preamble or explanation.

"Married! Hugh!"

She could not have said less, her quivering lip could not have said more. She did not know that the audience were clamouring for her return; she only knew that she was folded close in an embrace which seemed as if it would never let her go.

. . . .

"Do you know," said Hugh, the day before their wedding, "that my two years' apparent waste of time was the best thing that ever happened to me? I may have known something of theology before—I know something now of the real human struggle through which my people have to go. My training would have been sadly incomplete without it. And I have learned a little more patience," he added, slyly. "I do not now mistake the surface currents for the real tides of feeling."

"I am so glad you don't regret it," said Vera.

"There is only one thing I regret," he answered." And in reply to her questioning look, he went on, "That I was such an idiot as not to know where that hundred pounds came from."

Vera crimsoned. She had had no idea that Hugh had guessed her secret.

"There is only one thing I regret," she whispered, softly.

"And what is that, little woman?"

"That I have lost the chance of showing you how gladly I would share your work in a country manse."

Digitized by Google

The Protestant . . Reformation Society.

FOR seventy-five years the society, whose work is the subject of this article, has steadily adhered to its original programme of "maintaining the religious principles of the Reformation," and of all the many productions resulting from the religious philanthropy of the great Nineteenth Century, none more deservedly claim the sympathetic attention, the interested zeal, and the practical help of Protestant Christians.

(1) The Society has a noble past. All along its career its earnest defence of Protestant principles, and its loving endeavours to enlighten and evangelise the Roman Catholics of this land have attracted the warm regard of those who have followed its work. To recall its Photograph by THE SECRETARY (MR. WALTER A. LIMBRICK) F. L. Huntley.

Addressing Government workmen at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, on "The King's Protestant Declaration."

Digitized by Google

WILLIAM JOSEPH FRASER, ESQ.

Member of Executive Committee since 1880 and now Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Society.

earlier years at once associates the mind with some of the greatest names in the story of Evangelical Church life. And since then not a few of its agents have achieved special distinction, and of these Mr. Walter Walsh, who formerly laboured for the Society in Oxford and Nuneaton, is a conspicuous example. It would be difficult rightly to measure the enormous influence for good exercised by this Society upon former generations, and, through them, upon the national Protestantism of to-day.

(2) The Society is doing a great work in the present. These grand traditions of the past have been cited simply as a healthy stimulus to patient, strenuous, and successful effort. Is the Society at the close of the century worthy of its past? The answer is, emphatically, "Yes!" Whether it be tested by its supporters, its agents, its methods, or the work it is accomplishing, it will be found closely following its appointed path. Methods of activity may be altered or modified to suit changing circumstances, but the purpose and spirit of the Society's founders is loyally followed. Such names as those of Colonel Sandys, M.P. (the President); the Bishops of Durham, Sodor and Man; the late Bishop Ryle of Liverpool; Archdeacon Taylor and Canon Woodward; Canon Christopher of Oxford; Preb. Webb-Peploe; Sir T. Fowell Buxton, Bart., K.C.M.C., and others, all of whom are, or were, actively interested Vice-Presidents, are sufficient to indicate the present character of the Society's supporters. As to its agents, it may fairly be doubted whether in the whole kingdom a man more specially fitted for the post of Clerical and General Superintendent of the work could have been found than the Rev. Charles Wright, D.D., whose unselfish acceptance of this office, without regard to its probable consequences upon his prospects of well-deserved promotion, deserves the grateful recognition of all Protestants. The Executive Committee includes such well-tried men as Mr. W. J. Fraser, Chairman; Archdeacon Taylor, the Rev. W. R. Mowll, Rev. J. B. Barraclough, Rev. Dr. Hamilton, Rev. Charles Neil, Rev. F. B. Johnston, Major G. H. Johnston, and many others. Mr. Walter A. Limbrick, the Secretary, belongs to the younger men of the Protestant party, and brings to his duties an intimate knowledge (so necessary in these times) of the detail of business matters gained during a long connection with an old and honourable City of London firm of merchants; and of all the Missionaries, and the Secretary for Oxford (Rev. C. J. Casher, B.D.) it may be justly said that they are not only trained for their work in the technical sense, but are specially fitted for it by spiritual sympathies and deep conviction. It would be impossible within the compass of an article like this to detail at length the Society's methods of operations. Stress should be laid, however, upon the fact that great importance is attached to the employment of only trained agents. Everyone who knows anything of the difficulties of controversy or of dealing with persons trained in the Romish faith, feels the necessity of employing only those who are quite familiar with the subtleties and arguments of that Church. Hence the P.R.S. requires its agents to be well trained in this direction. In former days agents were trained by the Rev. R. P. Blakeney, LL.D., and later by Canon Hobson, of Liverpool. At the present time preference is given to candidates who have been trained by the Irish Church Missions or the Irish Society, the character of whose work so nearly resembles that of this Society.

Digitized by Google

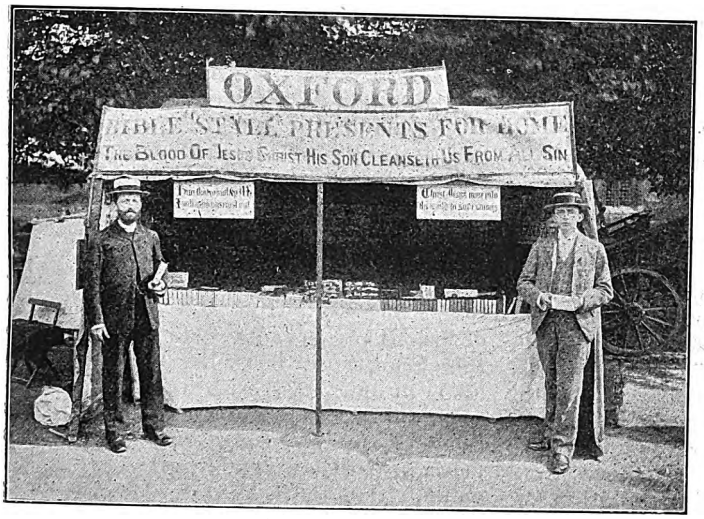
MR. H. WOLSTENHOLME AND THE WESTON-SUPER-MARE CYCLE MISSION BAND.
Photograph by T. J. Kerslake.

THE REV. DR. WRIGHT.
Clerical Superintendent of the Society.

The methods of operation in the mission centres vary with the different circumstances and needs of the locality. Generally speaking, the work is carried on under the supervision of a local committee and honorary superintendent, but close touch is maintained with the Parent Society. Monthly and quarterly reports, signed by the Local Superintendent, are regularly received at the London Office, which are carefully read and

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



REV. C. J. CASHER, B.D., AND HIS BIBLE STALL AT OXFORD.

a cycle band, and the visitors by services on the sea front. In Hastings, St. Leonards and district, quite a network of Protestant educational classes effectively teach numbers of people; and at Mayfield, Tunbridge Wells, where there is a scattered population, clubs for boys—in which instruction is given with recreation—form a special feature. And all these are in addition to the regular work of meetings, domiciliary visitation, Bible-classes, discussions, lectures, and the like.

Nor should the direct work from the London office be overlooked. Every officer is on the Missionary staff and is actively engaged in its work. The special work of the Secretary supplies a distinct want. For years the teaching of Church history in a popular form has been monopolised by the High Church and Ritualistic party and it is to this department Mr. Limbrick has addressed himself. Aided by a fine apparatus, popular educational lantern lectures are given north, south, east, and west, with great acceptance. These regular efforts are supplemented from time to time with occasional lectures by eminent Protestant speakers. Special work at the Universities or training colleges for the clergy by Dr. Wright — grants of books to libraries, gifts of literature for distribution, the publication of a quarterly paper, the Protestant Churchman—and the frequent issue of new books, pamphlets, etc., are other features of the work. Tributes of warm approval are frequently received from those qualified to judge, and if space permitted, many such testimonies might be cited.

So far, we have dealt only with the past and the present, with the history and the work of this noble Society. We conclude with some observations upon its future and its needs. It cannot be doubted that with wise guidance and adequate support the Society has before it a great future. The gift of £250 per annum by an unknown clergyman through Canon Christopher, supplemented by generous help from other friends, made the important appointment of Dr. Wright as Superintendent practicable, and for this step in advance there is cause for thankfulness. But there is much more that needs to be done, and to be done immediately. At Liverpool four missionaries could be well employed instead of one, as at present, and, for a population of 1,500,000 Roman Catholics, at least thirty or forty trained men should be available instead of twelve, as at present. The Protestant Dictionary now being prepared by the Society at great expense needs special help, but the truth is, the support given to the Society is miserably inadequate, and there is a strange apathy on the part of English Protestants with regard to their duty towards English Roman Catholics. A few statistics will vividly display the truth of the statements. In the province of Quebec there are 600,000 Roman Catholics out of a population of 1,500,000, i.e., less than one-half the R.C. population of England, yet for the evangelisation of these, the PRESBYTERIANS ALONE maintain thirty-six mission fields with ninety preaching stations, a staff of sixty-seven active agents and two schools in which 4,000 French Canadians have been educated since 1880. The Irish Church Mission carries on its grand work amongst a population of about 3,000,000, i.e., about double the R.C. population of England, and receives between £15,000 and £20,000 per annum for this purpose. As against this, the total income of the P.R.S. for the past two years, exclusive of a special legacy, has been only a little over £3,200 per annum. Is not this a grave reflection upon the Protestants of this wealthy land?

MR. WALTER A. LIMBRICK.
The Secretary.

Digitized by Google

And surely there is no duty more apparent than that of sending the Gospel to the Romanist in our midst! With a steady income of only £7,000 per annum, the Society could do much to wipe out the present reproach. Who amongst the readers of THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will hearken to this call for help and service? Who will come forward to raise this Society to a worthy position amongst the Protestant Evangelical agencies of this country? We cannot do better than conclude this article with the words of two leaders in our religious life of to-day.

The Rev. Canon Christopher writes: "The usefulness of this Society, both as the only Mission to Roman Catholics in England, and also in its other work of the promotion of the Religious Principles of the Reformation, has been greatly increased during the last two years, through God's blessing on the able sermons, lectures, and literary efforts of its learned Clerical and General Superintendent, Dr. C. H. H. Wright. I entreat those who thank God for the Reformation, and desire to preserve its good fruits, to help this Society by large-hearted gifts, and also by moving, with the energy and hopefulness of faith and love, their friends to aid it to the utmost promptly at this crisis in the Church of England."

The Rev. F. S. Webster, M.A., Vicar of All Souls', Langham Place, says: "We welcome a Society like this, and I urge you to support it with your offerings. Let them be liberal. Buy this Society's literature, read its literature, understand these things that are talked about to-day. For, let me tell you, this battle between Popery and Protestantism is not a mere war about words which busy men, men who have to live their lives, can leave alone for mere theorists, it is a battle of life and death, it is a battle of freedom against tyranny."

Contributions will be most thankfully received by the Secretary, at the Society's Office, 62, Berners Street, London, W

[At this time, when Roman Catholic propaganda of every kind are seen so busily at work, the need for such a Society as the above is only too evident. The principles of the Reformation, on which war has been confessedly declared, even within the Established Church of England itself, need to be insisted on with positiveness carried to the point of dogmatism. There are many things which "do not matter," but the Romanising of our English Church, our theology, and our schools is not one of them. Help these people to carry on the war against it if you can.—ED.]

Digitized by Google

A Scientific . . . . Discourse.

FOR

THOUGHTFUL MINDS.

A Record of Facts,
Principles, and Discoveries.

Free (or unoxidised) Phosphorus in its relation to the Improvement and Preservation of Human Life on Earth.

"That our medical men of every school, our greatest chemists, physiologists, philosophers, and men of science generally; as well as the inventors of, and those who deal in and adopt the numberless methods and preparations which are advertised in all directions and in every conceivable manner for the cure of the "Ills that flesh is heir to," suffer almost as greatly, and decay and die as quickly as the least educated in society, is matter of positive fact as well as of regret; and although it may be conceded that much good has been done by every system which has yet been proposed, there is certainly still a deficiency; still humanity suffers; and it is painfully evident that something more is urgently wanted—something more simple, more decided in its action, less of the character of ordinary physic or medicine, and more of the nature of a preserving and protecting aliment. This important desideratum medical science has, so far, failed to supply."

"Let us hope that the preparation now described is the beginning of a series of improvements in the right direction and of victories over the natural world."

These were the words of the late Dr. Samuel Birley, M.D., when introducing to the world, a few years ago, the results of his investigations, which had been the outcome of a lifetime's work and study.

What the medical world of to-day is beginning to recognise, he had many years ago satisfied himself upon: namely, the supreme control which the nervous system exercises, not only over the main functions, but over the most minute and apparently insignificant processes taking place in the body.

Dr. Birley's great rule is, therefore:—"Look after the nervous system; keep it well-nourished, and in perfect working order, and disease will little affect us."

Dr. Birley devoted many years to the discovery of some remedy that would fulfil the above indications. He carefully analysed the brains of persons who had died from various diseases, as well as of those who had been killed by accident whilst in the full vigour of health. He was struck by the deficiency of Phosphorus found in the brain matter of the weak and ailing, compared to what normally existed in the strong and healthy. From this fact the suggestion naturally arose that perhaps the loss of phosphorus had much to do with the weakened nerve force, and that its artificial administration might help to give back what had been lost. Such a thought was no less that prophetic, but simple as it appeared to be in this early stage of the investigation, it was found impossible to carry it out with any satisfactory result, or the following reason:—

Ordinary phosphorus, as understood by the chemist, cannot, by any known method, be made to be PERFECTLY SOLUBLE in the blood. It may be finely powdered and given in pills, etc., or dissolved in oil, alcohol, ether or chloroform, but in all these forms it is precipitated into a fine dust immediately on mixing with the juices of the stomach.

Many of these particles do not pass into the blood at all, but of those that do, they are completely stopped when they arrive at the liver, through which organ everything passes from the stomach before entering the general circulation. Hence Phosphorus administered in this form cannot possibly reach the nervous system, and cannot therefore aid in its restoration.

Knowing these facts, and convinced of the necessity of phosphorus as a Food, rather than a medicine, for the Brain and Nervous System, Dr. Birley experimented in many ways for the purpose of discovering a means of preparing it so that it would be free from these drawbacks.

His aim was to find out a form which would not precipitate in this manner, but remain in perfect solution throughout the system.

In the end he was rewarded by the discovery of a new process of preparation (by distillation) which rendered it, when taken by the mouth, absolutely soluble in the blood, and was perfectly satisfactory in its effects in every way. It could pass through the liver in a fluid state and thus reach the nerve tissues, which alone were in need of it.

No better proof of the value of this new form of phosphorus could be required than the very severe tests to which Dr. Birley put his invention. That it really does pass into the circulation, and enter into the composition of the Brain and Nervous System cannot be better discussed than in the inventor's own words:—

"The question has often been put to us—What proof have you that your PHOSPHORUS, when taken into the stomach, actually reaches and combines with the substance of the brain?

As it is truth only, and not opinion or hypothesis that we care for, our answer must be perfectly candid, and such only as practical investigation permits us to give. Because we cannot, or rather have no opportunity to, analyse the living human brain, before a course of PHOSPHORUS has been entered upon, we

Digitized by Google

admit that the evidence is not direct and positive. We are obliged to depend upon implication and analogy. The following items, however, force the conclusion we have maintained upon us :—

1ST.—PHOSPHORUS is a constant element of the brain and nervous system of all animals.

2ND.—The amount of PHOSPHORUS is different in persons of different mental and physical powers.

3RD.—In the brain and nerve-matter of those who have during life been characterised by great powers of mind and body and who have been in the prime of health suddenly killed in battle, or accident, or by other violence, a much larger amount of PHOSPHORUS has been discovered than is ever found is the brain-matter of ordinary persons who have been killed in a similar manner.

4TH.—The brain-matter of idiots contains the least amount of PHOSPHORUS. A little more PHOSPHORUS is found in that of persons not completely imbecile, but physically and mentally weak, languid in action, deficient in pluck and energy, full of apprehension, weak in memory and in application of thought and purpose, who hesitate in their resolves, and shrink from the general bustle of commercial life. The same may be said of persons who are fretful, low-spirited, anxious, fidgety, and odd-tempered, and of the positively ill-tempered and disagreeable.

5TH.—Persons who in early life have enjoyed a fair amount of mental and physical power, but who have suffered many years from great anxiety and sorrow consequent upon family bereavement and other losses and trials, have been found after death to have lost a great portion of the PHOSPHORUS which is common in the brain of similar persons who have not suffered in the same way.

The same may be affirmed of those who, beginning life with a good constitution, have excessively indulged in alcoholic preparations. Alcohol has the property of dissolving and carrying away the PHOSPHORUS of the brain and nervous system. We have personally known and carefully watched the career of many who in the "prime of life" were brilliant, energetic, first-class men of business, full of dash and assurance, carrying all before them, and succeeding in almost every undertaking. We have observed some of these to gradually wane in their mental and physical powers ; little by little to have become anxious and apprehensive ; matters which once were trifles, unworthy of attention, have seemed to be of great consequence ; enterprise and speculation have become less and less ; a fear of losing or failing has gradually crept in, until a general tameness and insipidity have been observed. A few years longer, and the once bright, confident, venturesome business man has dwindled to an eccentric, nervous, despondent, and miserable human remnant, incapable of concentrating his powers, vacillating, absent-minded, forgetful, and almost heedless of the world or its pleasures. Deafness, failing sight, impaired susceptibility, necroencephalus (softening of the brain) and general inanition, have gradually terminated in death. In some cases we have been enabled to procure the brain and a portion of the spinal cord, and have found by analysis that the PHOSPHORUS has been greatly deficient and much less than has been found in the brain-matter of persons who had the same vigorous character during early life, but who have died suddenly by violence in the midst of their career, and when all their powers of mind and body were most intense. In several instances different parts of the brain have been found to contain different proportions of PHOSPHORUS.

Striking as are the foregoing examples, and forcible as they are in the way of evidence, they are not in themselves sufficient. We require a synthetical process before we can form a satisfactory conclusion.

We have treated with PHOSPHORUS cases of every class. We have seen the prematurely old, the worn and exhausted, the nervous and miserable of every position in life, gradually restored to a most vigorous and perfectly healthy state. From a lean and cadaverous condition they have become full in flesh, the countenance clear and ruddy, the eyes bright, sight improved, deafness overcome, the hair become abundant, the step and gait again elastic and determined, the spirits high and generous, the temper cheerful, the love of song and harmony returned, the brain again active, perception quick, memory tenacious, and the whole system and character changed from the most pitiable condition to the highest state of existence.

In several instances the stir and excitement of mercantile life have created a longing to return to business. Some have done so, and are now as keen and successful as at any former period.

If then in all cases of mental and physical debility where we have been able to analyse the brain after death, we have found a deficiency of PHOSPHORUS, and if in precisely similar cases during life we have administered PHOSPHORUS, and found such conditions pass away, what other conclusion is it possible to arrive at than that this new form of Phosphorus gradually assimilates with the brain and nervous system, and brings up the depressed and wasted constitution to the normal standard?

The preparation which has repeatedly produced such results as those above described, we have called 'Plain' Syrup of Free Phosphorus, because it is the simple solution formed by distillation, combined with sugar and without the admixture of any other substance or medicament."

Free Phosphorus in combination with other Medicaments.

The Phosphorus prepared as above described permits of our taking advantage of the well-known principle in medical science, that different articles of the materia medica have the property of acting specially on different organs of the body. These various properties are very valuable in cases of special diseased action, and we are able to take advantage of them in using the syrup of phosphorus here described. It will combine with many remedial agents, and thus the power of the phosphorus may be determined to different organs of the body as local conditions may require.

Where the heart is weak, and the whole muscular system flabby and greatly debilitated, in addition to great nervous debility and exhaustion, the best combination is that of protoxide of iron with the "Plain," and which we have named the "Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus."

In the course of many years' private practice Dr. Birley was enabled to considerably modify and perfect a number of combinations of his Phosphorus in addition to the "Ironised" above named. For debility of the muscular and general system in LADIES particularly ; when "Below Par," and suffering from poorness of blood and lack of colour, a special preparation called the "Sub-Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus" has been found to be wonderfully successful.

Hence the fifteen standard kinds enumerated in the adjoined list have been formulated and have earned a unique reputation for the complaints named therein.

Digitized by Google

DETAILED LIST.

The result of over Half a Century's Experience. All have been proved in a Large Private Practice before being offered to the public.

PLAIN. SYRUP OF FREE PHOSPHORUS. A Vitalising food for all Brain and Nervous Affections from whatever cause—worry, late hours, overwork, &c.; and for Hysteria, Vitus' Dance, Headache, &c., &c. A sustaining and life-giving element. The basis of all Dr. Birley's Preparations. Of especial value to Professional Men, Clergymen, Solicitors, Barristers, Literary Men, Schoolmasters, and all engaged in mental occupations 4/6

IRONISED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Muscular Debility, Heart Disease, Paralysis, Rupture, Sciatica, Lumbago, Scrofula, Obesity, Dropsy, and General Debility. Of great value also as a restorative after an attack of "influenza" .. 4/6

SUB-IRONISED. Especially prepared for Ladies and Delicate Persons suffering from the above, instead of the "Ironised." And for Bright's Disease, Mumps, Varicose Veins, and when "Below Par" 4/6

MAGNESIAN. SPECIAL REMEDY for Pulmonary and other forms of Consumption 4/6

BRONCHIAL. SPECIAL REMEDY for Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Quinsy, Congestion of the Lungs, Diphtheria, and Throat Affections generally 4/6

GASTRIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Indigestion and Liver Complaints 4/6

ANTI-RHEUMATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for every form of Rheumatism and Gout. (In some cases the Ironised or Sub-Ironised will aid the action of this preparation when taken on alternate days with it) .. 4/6

ANTI-STIPATIO. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Constipation, Flatulence, Piles, Spasms, Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, &c. 4/6

ACIDIFIED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak, Fading, and Falling Off of Hair, and for Actual Baldness (internal use only) 4/6

VIRILITIC. Prepared for men suffering from Nervous Debility and Loss of Vitality 4/6

TOMATINED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak and Partial Loss of Sight, Deafness, Defective Taste or Smell 4/6

ANTI-NEURALGIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Neuralgia, Pleurisy and Erysipelas .. 4/6

CUTANEOUS. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Skin Diseases, Eczema, Psoriasis, &c. 4/6

The 4/6 Bottles contain between 70 and 80 Doses, and are sufficient for nearly ONE MONTH'S USE.

A SPECIAL OFFER.

We have the fullest confidence that where we can introduce these medicines into a household we are assured of a firm footing, and of recourse to them on all future occasions of illness or indisposition.

This coupon entitles you to a 4/6 Trial Bottle of any one kind of Dr. Birley's Phosphorus Compounds at 2/6; but if forwarded by parcel post, 4d. per bottle extra must be enclosed to cover cost of carriage within the United Kingdom. We guarantee safe delivery. Should a Trial Bottle also be required for a friend or relative, we will extend the offer to them if ordered at the same time.

Orders may be sent with the Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these Trial Bottle Coupons, and if we are not the money will be returned.

For Residents abroad the date will be extended sufficiently to allow of ordering. Postage of 1/4 per bottle is required for abroad.

COUPON.

4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/6

Or by Parcel Post 4d. extra—viz.: 2/10

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Available until May 31st, 1902.

The above Coupon to be cut out and sent with order. These Trial Bottles can be had direct only from the

Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers:

GORDON, MURRAY, & Co., Ltd.,

10, ADAM ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

STRONGLY RECOMMENDED.

Among some hundreds of others we may mention the following Reverend Gentlemen, who have proved the value of the medicine, and from whom we hold some excellent reports:

REV. C. H. SPURGEON, London, S.E.
REV. DR. COCKREM, London Orphan Asylum, Watford.
REV. W. T. CRANFIELD, Stoke.
REV. R. FLETCHER, Hull.
REV. J. JAMES, Abercanaid.
REV. J. W. MORRIS, Gly Neath.
REV. C. EARLE, Langford.
REV. F. CLEMENTS, Hanham, Bristol.
REV. GABRIEL MOLLAN, Clonmetham.
REV. E. I. DEVENISH, Teignmouth.
REV. G. COOK, Church Gresley.
REV. G. DALE COPELAND, Pudsey.
REV. A. A. BROOKS, Wigan.
REV. A. E. REALFF, Leicester.
REV. F. JONES, Malton.
REV. W. BARTON, Hull.
REV. G. HOMEYER, Claycross.
REV. J. B. GRATTON, Leominster.
REV. W. FRY, Blandford.
REV. J. D. WOODHALL, Bolton.
REV. R. FRAME, Birkenhead.

THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN AGE" says:—"Doubtless the 'Christian Age' enters many a home where there is some weakly one whose feeble health makes existence a burden, or perhaps it is a disease considered incurable which is wasting away life. Wherever there is such a case, we sincerely wish one of Dr. Birley's Preparations of Phosphorus might have a fair trial. These preparations are the result of scientific studies and experiments extending over many years, and the success which has already attended their use has been almost marvellous. We have seen hundreds of letters (not copies, but the original documents), some from persons well known to us, all testifying to the curative effects of one or other of these preparations. And more than this, we know of cases in which they have been the means of restoring to health when to all appearance recovery was almost impossible."

EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."—"Our readers know quite well how careful we are not to recommend anything but what is thoroughly trustworthy, but so many voluntary testimonials of unmistakable genuineness are before us that it is simply impossible to question the efficacy of the Medicines to which we are calling attention; hundreds of letters from all classes of people, including titled nobility, clergymen, physicians, &c., among which we notice several well-known names, all bearing remarkable testimony to the benefits derived from them."

EDITOR OF THE "FAMILY DOCTOR."—"One Thousand Original Letters of Testimony have been submitted to us by the Proprietors of Dr. Birley's Preparations."

Digitized by Google

PRICE ONE PENNY WEEKLY. 20 or 24 pages Large Quarto.

THE

CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated Journal of Religious News. It always contains about TWENTY PICTURES and PORTRAITS;

AND SERMONS BY

Revs. Dr. TALMAGE

AND LATE

C. H. SPURGEON,

and an Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson by Mrs. M. BAXTER. It has likewise a Weekly Summary of Current Events, Temperance Items, Short Stories, Accounts of Missionary Work, Numerous Anecdotes, Brief Biographies, Singular Occurrences, and a

GRAND SERIAL STORY

By Rev. SILAS HOCKING.

Together with a Summary of Events; and Anecdotes of Christian Work among the Soldiers.

"Christian Herald" Office, 6, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

Sent post free for 12 Months, 6s. 6d.; for 6 Months, 3s. 3d.; for 3 Months, 1s. 8d.
Payable in advance. Also in 5d. Monthly Parts.

It gives a Free Railway Insurance of £750 for Death; and of Disablement, £250; and Partial Disablement, £125; also a Special Insurance for £12 for Railway Employees.

TWO MOTOR CARS FOR SALE.—Owner buying larger car needs stable room. 5-h.p. DECAUVILLE three-seated car, electric ignition, speed to 25 miles per hour, double cylinder, heavy pneumatic tyres, same as ran 1,000 miles without stopping; cost £225, accept £115. BENZ., four-seated, 3½ h.p.; cost £240, price £80.—Apply B., 2, Highbury Crescent, Highbury Station, London, N.

Digitized by Google

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

CALL OR WRITE. DESIGN No. 601. 10/6 10/6 DESIGN No. 613. CALL OR WRITE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S SHOW ROOMS,
At 47, Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.
Are open daily from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Saturdays until 1 o'clock.
Ladies are invited to call and inspect their goods.

Design No. 732, 10/6.
New Chesterfield Coat for the Spring Season. 30 in. long. Made in stylish Tweed Covert Coating, or Vicuna Cloths. Colours: Fawn, Brown, Grey, Greeny Fawn, and Black. All sizes in stock. Price only 10/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra.

A SPECIAL LINE OF CYCLING SKIRTS
In all Colours.
PRICE ONLY 7/6.
Carriage, 5d.

Write for our Spring Sketch Book. Patterns Post Free. Every Lady should see Allen Foster & Co.'s New and Fashionable "Coronate" Cloth.

Design No. 601. 10/6
The fashionable Eton Costume for Spring and Summer wear. Coat trimmed with three rows of cording and two rows of narrow braid and six small fancy buttons, very smart. Produced in all the new shades of the world renowned Specialite Serge or Vicuna Cloth. Price only 10/6, carriage 6d. Skirt only 6/6, carriage 5d. A marvellous Costume for the money—the best value in the Trade. This Costume may be ordered in the new Coronate cloth, price only 21/-, in all the latest Pastel shades.

DESIGN No. 949. 6/6

VALUE FOR MONEY.

DESIGN No. 934. 8/11

Design No. 613. 10/6.
Stylish Costume made with the fashionable Russian Coat, produced in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s Specialite Serge or Vicuna Cloth in all shades. The Coat is trimmed with braid, and the skirt is cut in the new fashionable bell shape. Costume complete, 10/6; carriage paid, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage paid, 5d. extra.

Design No. 949. 6/6.
Fashionable Costume Skirt. Made in Vicuna Cloth or in the world-renowned Specialite Serge, two sterling cloths, unsurpassed for durability and wear. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Fawn, Light and Dark Grey, Royal Blue Grey, Cardinal, Green, Purple, etc. This Skirt has the new graduated flounce, which is lined with good linenette. Price only 6/6; carriage, 5d. extra. All sizes in stock. Money returned if not approved.

Design No. 934. 8/11.
Superior Costume Skirt, with three shaped frills, graduated at back. Each frill is trimmed with braid. There are three additional rows of braid at top of frills. Made in all shades of A. F. & Co.'s Vicuna Cloth or Specialite Serge. A Great Bargain for 8/11; sent carriage paid, 5d. extra. This Skirt can be ordered in the new "Coronate" Cloth, trimmed glace silk in place of braid. Price, 15/11; carriage, 5d.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,
47, GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"Madam, do you love your children?"

—SHAKESPEARE.

Then it will be your first care to ensure to them health and happiness in the future, by providing them with the food which nature intended should be used for their proper growth and nourishment during childhood.

MELLIN'S FOOD

is an accurate article of diet prepared on nature's plan. Sample post free. Mention this magazine.

MELLIN'S FOOD WORKS, PECKHAM, LONDON, S.E.

Subscriptions to the Coronation Gift should be made to KING EDWARD'S HOSPITAL FUND 81 Cheapside, E.C.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

Connoisseurs of COFFEE

DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST & AFTER DINNER.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary Coffee.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Digitized by Google

IS THIS AN IMPRINT OF THE BODY OF OUR SAVIOUR OR NOT?

See Article Inside.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

Vol. 6. JUNE, 1902. No. 9.

Price Sixpence.

Digitized by Google

"You look unusually fresh this morning, dear!"

"I really feel so; I use

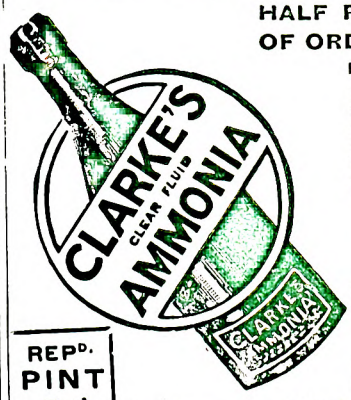
CLARKE'S AMMONIA

in my bath."

HALF PRICE and DOUBLE STRENGTH OF ORDINARY HOUSEHOLD AMMONIA.

Retains its Strength to the Last Drop.

Used in the Bath all the year round, this popular Ammonia gives a delightful, refreshing feeling to the person. Its cleansing properties are manifested when used for washing China, Glass, Silver, Clothes, &c. It is a necessity as well as a luxury, and its low price brings it within the reach of all.



REP^D. PINT 6^d.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE.

If any difficulty in obtaining, send us a postcard, and we will forward name and address of nearest dealer.

Large Sample Bottle Free on receipt of 3 penny stamps for postage.

REP^D. QUART 10½^d.

Address:—CLARKE'S, 360, Old Kent Road, S.E.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 11 10 1902

Digitized by Google

For Home use or when Travelling.

HARTMANN'S HYGIENIC TOWELETTES

ANTISEPTIC AND ABSORBENT.

Highly recommended by the Leading Doctors throughout the United Kingdom, and superior to any Sanitary Towels.

Obtainable at less than the cost of washing from all Drapers and Chemists, in 6d. packets (one doz.); 1/- (6d. per half doz.); 1/4 and 2/- per doz. Hartmann's Sanitary Sheets for Accouchement; in three sizes, 1/-, 1/6, and 2/6. HARTMANN'S DEPOT, 26, Thavies Inn, London, E.C.

HOVIS

TRADE MARK.

Is always nice for tea.

Most Family Bakers make Hovis Bread daily. Should your Baker not make it we will send local agents' addresses on request. HOVIS, LTD., MACCLESFIELD.

NOTE.—No Loaf is genuine unless stamped "HOVIS."

FOR RICH AND POOR.

"FRAME-FOOD"

FOR BABIES FROM EARLIEST INFANCY.

Parents who try it are Thankful!

BABIES easily digest it, and flourish exceedingly. No longer fretful, they may be seen to develop and improve every day. The only infant's food to which the soluble phosphates and albuminoids extracted from Wheat are added! Thousands of unsolicited testimonials. Sold in tins, 16 oz. 1s. FREE TEST. ¼ lb. Sample Tin of "FRAME FOOD," or 5 oz. Sample Jar of "FRAME FOOD" JELLY, sent free on receipt of 3d. to pay postage; both samples sent for 4d. postage. (Mention "TEMPLE.")

FRAME-FOOD CO., LTD., BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

HUNDREDS OF LADIES

are testifying to the value of

DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS.

They eradicate the imperfections, and make the Skin pure, fresh and velvety. Sold by Chemists in boxes at 2/9 and 4/6. Sample Box, post free, 2/6.

Postal Dept., S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., S.E.

Digitized by Google

THE THREE GREAT SCOURGES,

ALCOHOL, MORPHINE, COCAINE.

The Hutton-Dixon Vegetable Antidote,

A HIGH-CLASS, UP-TO-DATE, PHYSICAL HOME CURE FOR

ALCOHOL and DRUG ADDICTIONS.

Also of great value in cases of Insomnia, Neurasthenia and Nerve Exhaustion. Can be carried in the Pocket and taken Privately—thus obviating the Publicity, Expense, and loss of time of an Institute treatment.

WARRANTED FREE FROM NARCOTICS.

Patronised by the Nobility and All Classes.

AN IDEAL HOME CURE.

This humane discovery has been publicly endorsed before the Congress of Bishops, and at Father Matthew's Anniversaries, also by Clergymen from their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in nearly every quarter of the Globe. Over Six Thousand Cases have been treated successfully.

In this treatment there are no hypodermic injections, it being a purely vegetable medicine taken by the mouth, can be carried in the pocket, and taken in perfect privacy at home or anywhere. In from one to three days, and often in as many hours, after commencing this treatment the desire or crave will have so completely disappeared that the victim would not give a penny for all the liquor or drugs in the country for his own use. Among the immediate effects of this treatment are calm, restful sleep, steady nerves, clear brain, increased appetite for food and pronounced benefit in every way physically and mentally, with a positive guarantee that there shall be only good after effects and a permanent removal of all appetite for intoxicating liquors or drugs of any kind, all of which is indorsed by scores of physicians, clergymen of every denomination, and men and women in all phases of life in many parts of the world. This is an absolutely harmless home treatment, and an up to date physical cure backed by and vouched for by testimonials unapproached by any other treatment for these habits.

Full particulars and indisputable testimony sent free in a plain sealed envelope. All correspondence strictly confidential.

N.B.—The Testimonials published in my circulars are unique, inasmuch as I print (by kind permission) the full names and addresses of the subscribers thereto, so that the genuineness of the certificates can easily be verified. Glowing letters of recommendation may readily be written and left unsigned, or signed with initials only, but what the public need now-a-days are the hard facts which cannot be denied or controverted, and these I furnish.

Address:—ALEX. H. DIXON, 5, Cannon Place, BRIGHTON, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

See SPECIAL OFFER at Foot to those who have not tried KOKO.

Guaranteed to PREVENT HAIR FALLING, and CLEAR the HEAD of SCURF & DANDRIFF.

Supplied by special Royal Commands to H.I.M. THE EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.

Prevents Hair Turning Grey.

KOKO

FOR THE HAIR

Ensures Magnificent Tresses.

Her Majesty the Queen and H.R.H. Princess Marie of Greece, the Princesses Beatrice, Victoria, Maud, and Hohenlohe use "KOKO," for the Hair, and speak very highly of it. The letters may be seen at the Offices of the Koko-Maricopas Co., Ltd., 16, Bevis Marks, London.

Windsor Castle—Colonel G. J. Ivey wrote: I can conscientiously state that "KOKO" for the Hair has performed all you say. I have found it most efficacious, and shall certainly recommend it to all my friends.

KOKO IS DELIGHTFULLY COOLING, REFRESHING, AND INVIGORATING.

A Doctor writes: (The original may be seen at the Company's Offices). Gentlemen,—After using your "KOKO" for over six months, I must acknowledge its superiority over any other dressing for the hair which I have tried. It keeps the head perfectly cool, and it does eradicate dandrift, and gives the hair a fine glossy appearance. The medical treatment of dandriff may be summed up in six words—viz., "Keep the head saturated with oil." No doubt this is efficient; but if we adopt this method, the head becomes dirty for the simple reason that all moving particles are caught and retained by the oil; and again, bed-linen is rendered disgusting by being stained. Now, your "KOKO" possesses none of these disadvantages, and is equally, if not more effectual. It is for this reason that I prefer it to any other dressing. Since first trying it, I have used no other, and have great pleasure in recommending it to my friends and patients. I send you this little note merely to let you know how well pleased I am with your preparation.

KOKO, being a strong Nerve Tonic, is Strengthening to the Brain.

Write to the Koko-Maricopas Co., Ltd., 16, Bevis Marks, London, E.C., for Dr. Wm. M. BAIRD'S Pamphlet—"GOOD HAIR—HOW KEPT," and Book of Testimonials. Sent post free.

SPECIAL OFFER to those who have not yet tried KOKO.

A 4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/-

Any person forwarding this Coupon and P.O. for Two Shillings, and Four Stamps to pay postage, packing, &c., will receive immediately for trial, by Parcel Post, under cover, prepaid, ONE REGULAR TWELVE-OUNCE BOTTLE OF KOKO FOR THE HAIR, the price of which is FOUR SHILLINGS and SIXPENCE, provided it is ordered within TEN DAYS FROM THE DATE OF THIS OFFER. In no case will more than one bottle be sent for the use of the same person on this Coupon, as we make the offer solely for trial, knowing that it creates a demand when once used; and this large bottle gives it a fair trial. We find it better to thus practically GIVE AWAY one bottle to make a customer than to spend large amounts in advertising. ANY PERSON INTO WHOSE HANDS THIS OFFER COMES MAY AVAIL THEMSELVES OF IT. Address all Orders with Coupons to

The KOKO-MARICOPAS CO., Ltd.,
16, Bevis Marks, London.

Orders may be sent with this Coupon after the expiration of date, providing we are then issuing these trial bottle Coupons, and if we are not, the money will be returned. This Coupon will be received at 16, BEVIS MARKS, E.C., or 113, REGENT STREET, W., and TWO SHILLINGS only will be required when presented personally. KOKO is sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., at 2/6 and 4/6 per bottle.

For the sake of a greater profit, you may be asked to buy some other Hair preparation. In justice to yourself and to us, kindly insist on having KOKO.

Digitized by Google

See Special Offer at foot to all Readers of this Paper.

DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS

GUARANTEED
PERFECTLY HARMLESS

(Medical Certificate accompanies each box.)

THESE Wafers have long been known to possess the "wizard's touch" in producing, preserving, and enhancing beauty of person in male or female, by surely developing a transparency and pellucid clearness of complexion, brilliant eyes, soft and smooth skin, where by Nature the reverse exists.

The great difficulty hitherto has been how to make this beautifying principle safely available, and at the same time avoid what is detrimental and injurious. Dr. Mackenzie's Wafers are prepared expressly as a "Beautifier of the Complexion and Skin," and are guaranteed harmless. In the direction for which they are intended their action and effect is simply magical, the most astonishing transformations in personal appearance being brought about by their steady use. Even the coarsest and most repulsive skin and complexions, marred by freckles and other disfigurements, slowly change into an unrivalled purity and texture, free from any spot or blemish whatever, the pinched features become agreeable, the form, before angular, gradually transforms itself into the perfection of womanly grace and beauty. Used by men, the favourable result is the same. In the Complexion Wafers as prepared by the undersigned all danger is averted, and the remedy, taken in the manner directed on each box, is absolutely innocuous, while the peculiar virtues of the remedy remain unimpaired and intact. Powders, enamels, so called "blood purifiers," &c., &c., are a delusion and a snare. From the use of these Wafers FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, VULGAR REDNESS, ROUGH, YELLOW, or "MUDDY" SKINS, and other facial disfigurements are permanently removed, and a deliciously CLEAR COMPLEXION is assured.

Wonderful TESTIMONY to their efficacy:

59, BEAUMONT SQUARE, MILE END, LONDON.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. The others have done me a great deal of good."
H. MASON.

DUVAUX FARM, GUERNSEY.—"Kindly send another box of Dr. Mackenzie's Wafers. I have tried one box, and it has done me much good."
MISS EUNICE L. OGIER.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. I am much pleased by the effects produced by the first."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

31, EVINGTON ROAD, LEICESTER.—"Please send me a box of Wafers. I have derived great benefit from the others I have taken."
Yours truly, M. E. WARD.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Please send me a box of Dr. Mackenzie's Wafers. I find your Soap so good, I now want you to send me three cakes of it, also a box of Complexion Wafers."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

MELBECKS, KIRKBY STEPHEN, WESTMORELAND.—"Kindly send me another box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers. The last has worked wonders."
SARAH G. PAGAN.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF THE "TEMPLE MAGAZINE."

T.M.

COUPON

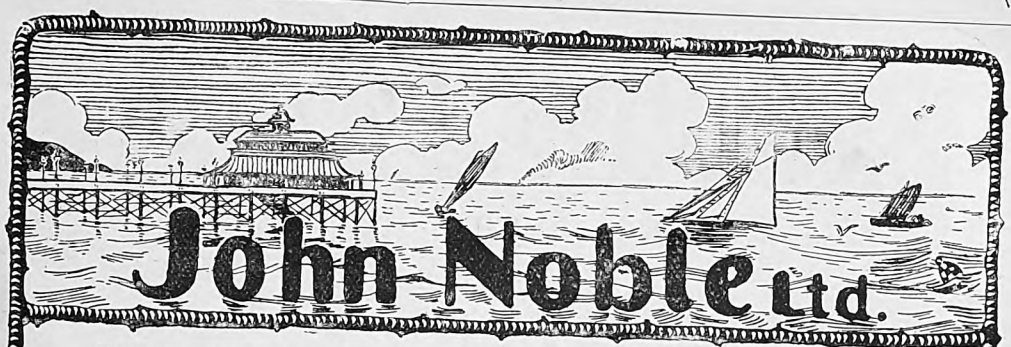
JUNE 1ST, 1902.

A 4/6 TRIAL BOX FOR 2/-

Any reader sending this Coupon and Postal Order or Stamps for Two Shillings will receive immediately a 4/6 Trial Box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers, this great reduction being made to induce our readers to give this wonderful preparation a fair trial, as we know one trial will convince all of their unique merits. This coupon must be sent in within 10 days of this date. Address all orders to

S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., London Bridge.

Digitized by Google



John Noble Ltd.

FOR SEASIDE & HOLIDAY MODES

DESPATCHED DIRECT FROM THE ACTUAL MAKER TO YOUR DOOR.

PATTERNS POST FREE of the FABRICS in which these Costumes are made.

MODEL 1043.

In the New Herring-Bone Tweed—Grey, Blue, Green, and Fawn effects. Price complete, 10/6. Also 10/6 in the "Sovereign" New Wool Serge—Black, Navy, Crimson, Pink, Blue, or Cream. Price 27/6. In Cotton Drill, 16/11. In Shrunk Costume Linen, 18/9. Carriage, 6d.

MODEL 1119.

Carried out in J. N. Serge or Coating, with Collar and Revers prettily embroidered. Price 12/9 Also in the "Sovereign" New Wool Serge—Black, Navy, Crimson, Blue or Cream. Price 29/6. In Shrunk Costume Linen, 19/6. In Cotton Drill, 17/6. Carriage 12/9 6d.

MODEL 1113.

Child's Sailor Dress in J. N. Serge or Coating trimmed Russia braid. Collar in Crimson and Cream. Lengths 21, 24, 27, 30, 33, 36ins. Prices 10/6, 11/9, 13/-, 14/6, 16/-, 17/6 ea. Also in the "Sovereign" New Wool Serge, Black, Navy, Crimson, Cream, etc., 13/11, 14/11, 15/11, 16/11, 17/11, 18/11. Carriage, 6d. extra.

MODEL 1113. MODEL 1119. MODEL 1043.

Please mention the "Temple Magazine," when writing to—

JOHN NOBLE LTD. BROOK ST. MILLS MANCHESTER

Digitized by Google

SANDOW'S PERFECT SYSTEM OF PHYSICAL CULTURE

Successfully taught by post for 2/6.

Owing to the large number of communications received from all parts of the world asking advice on my system of Muscular Development from those unable to attend my Schools of Physical Culture, it became apparent to me that something would have to be done to cope with the ever-increasing demand for more knowledge of my methods; and to meet the intense interest which has of late been centred upon this subject by men, women, and children, and after giving the matter due care and consideration, I have decided to introduce my Physical Culture system by Post. No pains have been spared to make this system perfect, and one of its greatest features will be the attention given to every application. The general health and strength is most carefully considered from the filled-up form beneath before the course most suited for the student's individual requirement is despatched. I have been so far successful that I can produce proof in flesh and blood which will fully bear out my assertions that it is the most perfect system yet introduced for Developing the Body and Improving the General Health.

It is undoubtedly the next best thing to a personal course of training at my well-known Physical Schools.

Fill up this Form and send it with Postal Order to the address at foot of page.

ADDITIONAL MEASUREMENT FORMS SUPPLIED FREE ON APPLICATION.

MEASUREMENT FORM. (The Temple Magazine.)

1 Month's Course, 2/6; 3 Months', 7/-; 6 Months', 12/6; 12 Months', 21/-.

Money enclosed ..... Course desired .....

DATE..... 190

NAME.....

ADDRESS .....

PARTICULARS.

Heart, condition of ..... Age.....

Lungs, condition of..... Sex.....

Digestion, condition of ..... Occupation.....

Nature of illness, if any..... Athletics, if any, and when.....

How long ago?..... Have you a "Sandow Developer"?.....

Physical peculiarity, if any..... Have you "Grip" Dumb-bell?.....

Reference No..... ...of last Course, if any. Do you read "Sandow's Magazine"?.....

NECK.	CHEST CONTRACTED.	CHEST EXPANDED.	UPPER RIGHT ARM.	UPPER LEFT ARM.	FOREARM RIGHT.	FOREARM LEFT.	WAIST

THIGH RIGHT.	THIGH LEFT.	CALF RIGHT.	CALF LEFT.	HEIGHT.	WEIGHT.

Sandow's Large Dumb-Bell Chart given free with each first course, usual price, 1s. 6d.

ADDRESS :—

SANDOW'S POSTAL INSTRUCTION DEPT., 17-18, Basinghall St., London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

TOO LATE!

The troubles and trials and lost opportunities those two short words recall. Those high resolves and great ambitions which were to be achieved "some day." "Too late, too late" is echoed every day, yet the best is to our hands did we but recognise its worth.

AN OPPORTUNITY IS OFFERED YOU NOW!

To obtain not only the Best Watch made in this country, but a Solid Silver Chain for nothing!

H. SAMUEL'S WONDERFUL OFFER!

To celebrate the Fact that the sale of his World-Renowned "ACME" PATENT LEVER has now reached the astounding total of over ONE MILLION he has determined to present every cash purchaser with

A MASSIVE SILVER ALBERT FREE!

H. SAMUEL'S FAMOUS "ACME" LEVER, 25/-

The handsomest, most reliable and hard wearing watch ever produced at the price. Contains H. SAMUEL'S valuable improvements, protected by Royal Letters Patent, designed to strengthen its wearing qualities and durability. Only to be found in H. SAMUEL'S Watches.

If you would like it on approval send 5/- only and the balance in a week. With acknowledgment we will forward a Real Silver Chain as a bonus for your cash purchase. If you return the Watch within the time we refund your deposit.

WRITE NOW FOR A COPY OF

H. SAMUEL'S FREE GUIDE.

ABOLISHES SHOP PROFITS.
OPENS THE FACTORY DOOR TO ALL.
260 PAGES. 3,000 RICH ENGRAVINGS.
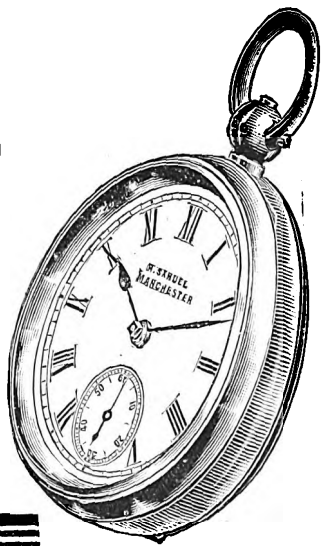
DIAMONDS, WATCHES, CLOCKS, RINGS, CHAINS, &c.

FREE FOR A POSTCARD.



H. SAMUEL,

DEPT. 61, MARKET ST., MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

A FREE GIFT

TO EVERY READER OF THIS ISSUE.

A SERIES of MINIATURE ILLUSTRATIONS of our

GENUINE

Steel-Plate Engravings

and CHARMING ENGLISH GRAVURES, will be Presented Free of Charge

To EVERY READER of THIS ISSUE

applying at the Offices of The City of London Fine Art Society, 5, Victoria Avenue, Bishopsgate Street, London, E.C., or same will be forwarded to any Reader (at home or abroad) on receipt of the following Coupon duly filled up.

A FULL-SIZE Specimen Plate of our 3s. 6d. HIGH-CLASS PICTURES, 30 by 22 inches (superior to many Guinea Prints), will gladly be sent ON APPROVAL to any Reader.

SPECIAL COUPON AVAILABLE FOR EVERY READER.

The Reader must cut out this Coupon, fill in Name and Address in full, and forward same with Three Stamps for postage.

*Name in full*_____

*Address in full*_____

Send at once the above Coupon, with your Name and Address duly filled in, enclosing Three Penny Stamps for the postage of the parcel.

CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY,
5, Victoria Avenue, Bishopsgate Street, London, E.C.

[PLEASE TURN OVER.

Digitized by Google

DISTRIBUTION OF GENUINE STEEL-PLATE, ENGRAVINGS & ENGLISH GRAVURES

TO THE READERS OF THIS ISSUE.

FOR INSTRUCTIONS SEE BELOW

Coupon No. 1 'In the Cornfields.' John Constable, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 2 'Crossing the Brook.' J. M. W. Turner, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 3 'A Scotch Headland.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 4 'A Rock-Bound Coast.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 5 'THE CHALLENGE' Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 6 'THE SANCTUARY' Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 7 'The Market Boat. W Clarkson Stanfield, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 8 'The Ferry Boat.' W Clarkson Stanfield, R A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 9 'BOLTON ABBEY.' Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 10 'In the Highlands.' Sir Edwin Landseer R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 11 'THE LAND'S END, CORNWALL.' Alexander Mortimer On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 12 'THE NEEDLES, ISLE OF WIGHT.' Alexander Mortimer On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 13 'ESCAPED.' Richard Ansdell, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 14 'A Day on the Moors.' James Hardy On Plate Paper 30 by 22in	Coupon No. 15 'The Glebe Farm.' John Constable, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No 16 'FLATFORD MILL.' John Constable, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No 17 'Lincoln Cathedral.' J. R. Hutchinson. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No 18 'Lichfield Cathedral.' J R. Hutchinson On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 19 'A Surging Torrent' Jacob Ruisdael. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No 20 'A Mountain Stream.' Jacob Ruisdael On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 21 'RETURNING FROM MARKET.' Sir A. Callcott, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 22 'IN THE DAYS OF LONG AGO.' H Stacy Marks, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 23 'THE CLIFFS OF OLD ENGLAND' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 24 'THE HOME OF THE SEAGULL.' Alexander Mortimer. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 25 'Waiting the Word.' James Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 26 'ON THE HILLS.' James Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 27 'HAPPY DAYS.' Fred. Morgan. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 28 'CROSSING THE STREAM.' Fred Morgan. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 29 'Early Morning.' B. W. Leader, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 30 'Departing Day.' B. W. Leader, R.A On Plate Paper 30 by 22in	Coupon No. 31 FISHING SMACKS LEAVING HOME.' T. B. Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in	Coupon No. 32 'RETURN OF THE FISHING BOATS.' T. B. Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.
Coupon No. 33 'In the Nick of Time' R Caton Woodville On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 34 'ENRAPTURED!' Life. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 35 'A Good Day's Sport.' James Hardy. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in.	Coupon No. 36 'OUT OF REACH.' Richard Ansdell, R.A. On Plate Paper 30 by 22in

INSTRUCTIONS.

Our Readers must detach the Coupons for the particular Subjects required, and forward them to THE CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY, 5, VICTORIA AVENUE, BISHOPSGATE STREET, LONDON, E.C., together with a Postal Order for 3s. 6d. for One Subject, 5s. 6d. for Two, 7s. 6d. for Three, 12s. 6d. for Six Subjects, or One Guinea for Twelve. £3 for the complete 36 Subjects.

Readers preferring INDIA PRINTS (giving a softer tone and superior effect) can secure the Pictures on India Paper, and MOUNTED ON PLATE PAPER (32 by 24 inches), at double the above prices.

These payments will cover all charges, including Plates, Copyright, packing, case, carriage and all other expenses.

EVERY READER SECURING THESE PICTURES WILL BE GIVEN A SIGNED GUARANTEE THAT THESE GENUINE STEEL-PLATE ENGRAVINGS and GRAVURES ARE ALL PRODUCED DIRECT FROM THE ACTUAL PLATES.

We have also made arrangements to supply these Pictures BEAUTIFULLY COLORED by HAND in WATER-COLORS, at the nominal cost of 5s. each EXTRA, and lovers of the artistic will find this an opportunity that they should not fail to take advantage of. Each Water-Color Painting will be signed by the Artist to enhance the Value of the Picture.

If the instructions given above are faithfully carried out, and the Coupons are sent (with name and address carefully written), THE CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY, 5, VICTORIA AVENUE, BISHOPSGATE STREET, LONDON, E.C., undertake to forward the Pictures, carriage paid, TO ANY PART OF THE WORLD (Foreign and Colonial Parcel at 2s. extra), securely packed in a stout case, so that they will arrive in good condition. Money returned in full if the Pictures are not approved.

N.B.—A certain portion of the Issue will be reserved for Foreign and Colonial Readers.

[COPYRIGHT].

[PLEASE TURN OVER.

Digitized by Google

NO CURE, NO PAY!

CHRONIC

CHEST DISEASES.

GOOD NEWS TO SUFFERERS.

HELP FOR THE CHEST DISEASES CURED HOPELESS

ASTHMA . . .
BRONCHITIS .
CONSUMPTION

POSITIVELY CURED PERMANENTLY.

All sufferers will rejoice at the good news that at last there is a safe, certain, and permanent cure for those three dread diseases, Consumption, Asthma, and Chronic Bronchitis, with such distressing Symptoms as Cough, Phlegm and Blood Spitting, Wheezing and Tightness at Chest, Difficulty in Breathing, Suffocating Sensations, Pains in Chest and between Shoulders, Loss of Flesh and Strength, &c., &c. The most severe cases have been quite cured, which can be proved beyond dispute.

READ THESE LETTERS.

Grosvenor Street, Pendlebury, October 4th, 1901.

DEAR SIR,—I advise all sufferers from Consumption to place themselves under your treatment without delay, for I am sure that your treatment can cure any case as bad as mine was, and mine could not have been worse. Hoping that you may long live to cure other sufferers, and with all my heart again thanking you for curing me, Believe me, dear sir, yours truly gratefully,

(Miss) F. L——.

Derwent Street, Belper, Sept. 22nd.

DEAR SIR,—I am glad to tell you that I am quite a new man altogether; I don't know myself. I have lost my cough, and my breathing is quite different altogether, and I am gaining flesh, for I have gained 7 lbs. in weight. I can walk up hills or anywhere now, and not take the slightest notice of it. It is only your remedies that have done it. I shall have another month's medicines in the course of a week or so.—Yours truly,

F. W. S——.

Long Lane, Aughton, Jan: 27th, 1902.

PROFESSOR HERN,—DEAR SIR,—I am very pleased and thankful to be able to say that since I was under your treatment last year I have never had an attack of bronchitis. My chest seems to be getting quite strong. I shall ever be very grateful to you, and I pray that by God's help you may go on with your great work, looking ever unto Him to help you.—I remain, your ever-grateful friend,

A. M——.

The full names and address of these patients and hundreds more supplied to sufferers doubting the cure.

Professor Hern is the originator of the most Successful System of Treatment ever discovered for Chest Diseases. It comprises separate Cures for each kind of Chest Complaint, and each Cure is specially adapted to meet the particular requirements of each individual case. The treatment strikes right at the root of the disease, and entirely eradicates it in a remarkably short time. No minerals, poisons, or dangerous remedies are used, and there is no experimenting. Patent Medicines afford only a little ease, but never cure these diseases—a special treatment is required.

Arrangements can be made for Treatment to be paid for after the cure has been effected.

Sufferers wishing to be quickly restored to perfect health and strength should write to Professor Hern, naming complaint, mentioning the TEMPLE MAGAZINE, and enclosing six penny stamps, when full information will be sent by return of post. Those sufferers able to call at either of the three permanent Consulting Rooms should do so. Consultations free.

PROFESSOR HERN,
Specialist in Chest Diseases,
89, Corporation St., Birmingham; 268, Oxford St., Manchester; 85, Lord St., Liverpool.

GOOD! IT'S MASON'S

A 6d. BOTTLE of MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
Makes 8 Gallons of the Finest Non-Intoxicating
HERB BEER.

There is no thirst-quencher in the world to equal it. Most Palatable, Refreshing, Delicious, and Healthful. Enjoyed by abstainers and non-abstainers alike.

Imitated but not Equalled. Of all Chemists & Stores.
Also try MASON'S WINE ESSENCE and MASON'S COFFEE ESSENCE.
Sample bottle of either of above POST FREE for 9d. Two assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three assorted, 1s. 8d.
AGENTS WANTED:—
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MACKINTOSH'S EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE.
Sold Everywhere. A Very Large Sample Packet sent Post Free Eight Penny Stamps.
J. Mackintosh Ltd., Toffee Mills, Halifax.
Wholesale and Retail Dealers should stock this Toffee, as it sells at sight.

THE KING AT HIS CORONATION TAKES THE FOLLOWING OATH:

Act for Establishing the Coronation Oath, 1688-9, 1 W. & M. c. vi.

ARCHBISHOP OR BISHOP—

"Will you to the utmost of your power maintain the Laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant Reformed Religion Established by Law? . . . And will you preserve unto the Bishops and Clergy of England and Ireland, and to the Churches there committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain to them or any of them?"

KING—

"All this I promise to do."

After this the King, laying his hand upon the Holy Gospel, shall say—

"The things which I have here before promised, I will perform and keep. So help me God."

[The above Act requires that this Oath shall be administered to every King or Queen who shall succeed to the Imperial Crown.]

THE PROTESTANT REFORMATION
ESTAB.] SOCIETY [1827.

Is the Oldest Society of the Kind in the Empire.

Its Principal Objects are

1. To Maintain the Scriptural Principles of the Reformation.
2. To Evangelize Roman Catholics in England.

Readers of THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE should write for two booklets, entitled—

"A NATION'S DANGER AND A NATION'S DUTY,"
"ENGLAND'S SHIELD,"

which will be sent POST FREE to applicants.

SUBSCRIPTIONS and DONATIONS for the Support and Extension of this Work are urgently needed, and will be thankfully received by

WALTER A. LIMBRICK, Secretary,
62, Berners Street, London, W.

Digitized by Google

A WONDERFUL INVENTION . .

for the

LAME.

As Supplied to the War Office for the Wounded from South Africa.

THE O'CONNOR EXTENSION CO.'S PATENT APPLIANCES

Enable those with Shortened Limbs and Weak Ankles to dispense with Unsightly Instruments, to Wear Ordinary Shoes, and to look like other people.

FLAT FOOT.

The New Patent . . . . Arch Support

CAN BE ADAPTED TO HELP ANY CASE OF FLAT FOOT.

A New Book on the Mechanical Treatment of Flat Foot will be sent FREE.

TENDER FEET.

The New . . . . Patent Socks

CAN BE MOULDED TO FIT THE SOLE OF ANY FOOT.

Describe the case, send a pair of old boots or shoes and 5/- A pair of Socks will be sent POST FREE. (United Kingdom).

GOLD MEDAL, LONDON; HIGHEST AWARDS, CHICAGO AND PARIS.

ADDRESS:

The O'Connor Extension Co.,

SURGICAL APPLIANCE MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT,

2, BLOOMSBURY STREET,

LONDON, W.C.

PAMPHLETS FREE on mentioning The Temple Magazine. Please give particulars of the case.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Edited by CHARLES HERBERT.

CONTENTS FOR JUNE, 1902.

			PAGE
I.	Frontispiece
II.	The Sacred Shroud of Turin	Illustrated	745
III.	How the Germans took London. Illustrated.	T. W. Offin, junr.	751
IV.	A Costly Experiment. A Complete Story		757
V.	The White Lady of the Zenana. Serial Story. Chapters IV. and V. Illustrated by Fitzgerald.	Miss H. Bourchier, M.D.	759
VI.	A City of Refuge. Illustrated.	Rev. J. E. Shephard, F.G.S.	771
VII.	On Mean Means	A Tinworker	774
VIII.	The People's Friend; or, the Adventures of Carlton-Hawes.—(III.) Illustrated.	Charles Herbert	775
IX.	Bishop's Stortford College	Illustrated	782
X.	The Needle's Eye. New Serial Story. Illustrated.	Florence Kingsley	787
XI.	A Lost Revenge. Complete Story	Illustrated	797
XII.	A Page of Literary Autographs		802
XIII.	When Night had Come	Illustrated	804
XIV.	"Writ Sarkastic"—(I.) How We Heard the Candidates. Illustrated.	Wolfe Street	807
XV.	That Mighty Penny		810
XVI.	Provincial but Prosperous—(I.) Haverhill. Illustrated.	Onlooker	811
XVII.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.	Onlooker	813
XVIII.	The Conquest of the Air Illustrated.	Onlooker	816
XIX.	Martinique, the Island of Destruction. Article.		818
XX.	The British Chautauqua		821
XXI.	A Trip to Tarifa. Illustrated	Elizabeth Higgin.	823
XXII.	A Little Royal Lady of Long Ago. A Fairy Tale. Illustrated.	Dorothy D.	829

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. The Editor will be obliged if, before sending any manuscript, a letter is sent him describing the purport of the article or enclosing a précis of the story. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to THE MANAGER, 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. MATHER AND CROWTHER, BRIDEWELL PLACE, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

INSIST ON HAVING

PETER'S

THE ORIGINAL

MILK-CHOCOLATE

IMITATIONS LACK THE CHARM AND DELICACY OF PETER'S.

A SWEETMEAT AND A FOOD

Sold Everywhere in 1d., 2d., 3d., 6d. and 1s. Tablets; 6d. and 1s. Croquettes.

Sole Agents: S. J. MACKENZIE & Co., LTD. London

COOLS AND REFRESHES THE SKIN.

"BEETHAM'S Regd Larola"

After exposure to the Sun or Wind. Removes and prevents all HEAT, SUNBURN, TAN, IRRITATION, etc., and during the Heat of Summer. Its effect will delight you! Bottles 6d., 1s., 2s. 6d. of all chemists.

Keeps the Skin Soft, Smooth, and White

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

BEST IN 1894.

THE

BEST NOW.

PALMER TYRE

The ONLY HIGH GRADE TYRE

NOW ON THE MARKET.

For Durability, Palmer Tyres stand alone.

FULLY GUARANTEED.

Write for Manual containing 11 Sectional Road Maps and 1 Key Map of the British Isles.

The PALMER TYRE, Ltd.,

Dept. T.M., BIRMINGHAM.

These Tyres are manufactured under license from the North British Rubber Co., Ltd., under Bartlett's Patent.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

The Sacred Shroud.

THE existence of sacred relics, especially of those which have possessed, or are supposed to possess, wonderful healing powers to those who had faith in them, has always provided science with subject matter for scoffing. In fact the most dearly cherished beliefs of the Church have often been in opposition to the experimental observations of the scientific world. It therefore causes something like a thrill of curiosity, if nothing deeper, to find that to, at any rate, one branch of science, i.e., photography, we are apparently indebted for a confirmation of some of the statements of Holy Writ with regard to the death and burial of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is now many hundreds of years since it was written by St. Matthew that "when Joseph had taken the body, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth." And by St. Mark that "Joseph bought fine linen, and took him down, and wrapped him in the linen." And by St. John that "There came also Nicodemus which at the first came to Jesus by night, and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes about a hundred pound in weight. Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes with the spices as the manner of the Jews is to bury." The italicised portions call our attention to two facts: first, a linen shroud; second, the saturation of the shroud with aloes and myrrh and spices. In the old account these statements naturally passed as mere details, and although it was claimed that in the Cathedral of Turin the identical shroud itself was preserved, it was looked upon simply as a relic. But now science, in the shape of photography, has stepped in and revealed the fact that a veritable photographic impression has been left on the shroud by the presence of the sacred body of the Lord Jesus Christ. And science also undertakes to explain how that impression has been made. First of all, look at the fact of the impression being there.

The shroud itself is a yellow-coloured sheet of linen bearing certain reddish-brown stains, and was contained in an urn over the altar of Turin Cathedral. According to tradition it was venerated in Constantinople until 1205, when it disappeared, being recovered in 1353. In the fifteenth century it passed into the hands of the house of Savoy, and was deposited at Chambéry. Finally it was transferred in 1578 to its present resting place by Duke Emmanuel Philibert, who wished to spare Carlo Borromeo, the sainted Archbishop of Milan, the fatigue of a pilgrimage to its distant Savoyard shrine.

The stains have long been considered to represent an impression of Christ, but it had been almost forgotten when it was taken out of its reliquary in 1898, on the occasion of an Exhibition of Sacred Art. Then some photographs were specially taken by Signor Secondo Pia of Turin, and the negative on being developed showed the exact positive image of a corpse. The assertion led to a great deal of controversy. Some people contended that these extraordinary images were supernatural, while others declared they were nothing but common paintings dating from 1353. Eighteen months ago they came under the notice of M. Paul Vignon, doctor of science in Paris, and M. Colson, assistant professor at the Polytechnic School of Government Engineers and Artillery Officers, and they began a series of experiments, the result of which was communicated to the Academy of Sciences by Professor Yves Delage, the well-known zoologist and physicist. The apparent inference was that the marks on the shroud were themselves a negative imprint, and this remarkable fact led the investigators to begin researches. They found that the shroud bore a startlingly exact image of a dead body which had been nailed by the wrists and feet, had borne flagellation by Roman scourges weighted with lead, and had received a thrust in the side, while the head and face distinctly showed signs of wounds from thorns and of having been smitten.

Digitized by Google

As it had been suggested that they might have been common paintings transformed later on into negatives by a chemical action, he demonstrated that was impossible on the ground that no mediæval artist would have thought of attempting such a realistic presentment of a corpse, in which even the drops of blood were of the natural spherical shape. The communication to the Academy proceeds as follows:—

"Moreover, the images are infinitely superior from the anatomical point of view to anything that could have been produced in the Middle Ages, and they correspond to all the geometrical conditions of the marks. They consequently do not constitute a pictorial work. The winding-sheet has really preserved the marks of a body which bore the stigmata, or marks, of astonishing realism."

LOOK AT THIS, THEN TURN IT ROUND AND LOOK AT IT FROM THE TOP.

Dr. Vignon finds in the image all the stigmata of the Passion. He demonstrates by the photographs of the shroud that the body of the man buried in that shroud had worn a crown of thorns placed far back on the head. On the upper part of the forehead blood had flowed from several wounds, and trickled slowly down in a furrow to the eyebrow, where it had coagulated. Another photograph shows the traces of the scourging. The whips found at Pompeii would have produced wounds and lacerations of the form found on the shroud. The mark of the lance is there, and also the mark of the nails driven, not through the hands, as they are generally represented in pictures and on crucifixes, but through the wrists. The weight of the body would, in most cases, tear the hand. M. Rénan affirmed, in his "Life of Jesus," that, generally, when criminals were crucified, they were beaten astride on a piece of wood. All these marks are to be found reproduced on the shroud with surprising correctness and realism.

These, then, are the facts and now for the explanation. The problem was how could the image have been produced on the linen by natural causes. At this stage Dr. Vignon started certain experiments. He was given the clue to the solution of the problem by an experiment made by Commandant Colson, Professor at the Polytechnic School, who demonstrated the possibility of producing negative images by vapours capable of acting chemically on a suitable substance. He found that a corpse shortly after death emits ammoniacal vapours, and that the latter react chemically upon oil mixed with essence of aloes, the substance with which the shroud of Christ is recorded to have been impregnated.

Digitized by Google

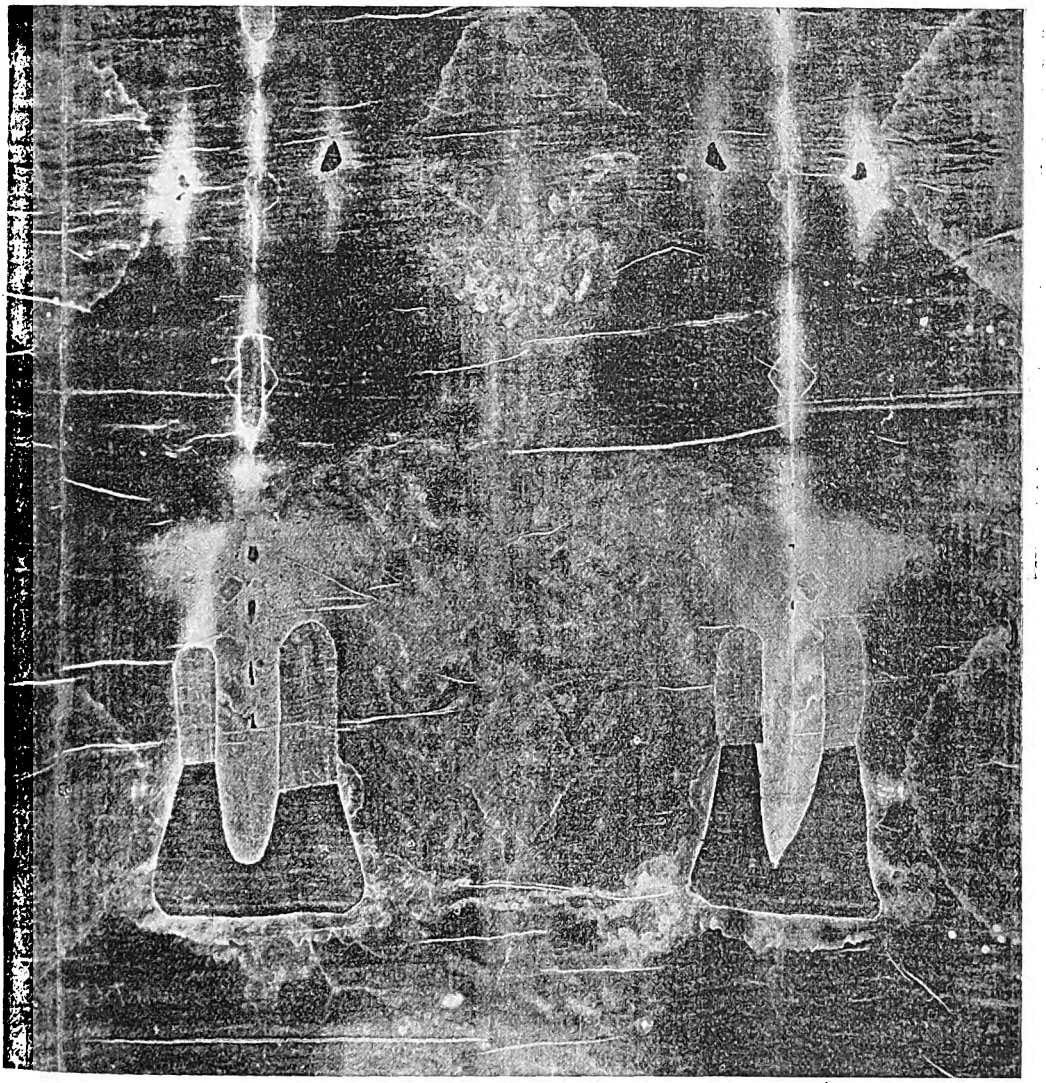
Dr. Vignon proved that a linen sheet smeared with this oil will reproduce with the exactness of a photograph the imprint of a body, giving out the ammoniacal vapours which permanently dye the linen a reddish brown.

Proceeding, the writer of the paper maintains that there is a remarkable agreement with the historic circumstances of the burial. It was necessary the body should be neither washed, anointed, nor bound in winding sheets, and a perusal or the original text of the Gospel will show that it was thus. Finally, it was also necessary that the body should not have remained in the shroud sufficiently long



THE LACERATIONS OF THE BACK.

Digitized by Google

THE IMPRESSION OF THE HEAD ENLARGED.

for it to decompose. Everyone, no matter what may be his religious opinion, says the communication, knows that on Easter Sunday the tomb was empty.

The French Academy of Sciences, while displaying the keenest interest in Professor Delage's communication, declined, on the ground that the matter was controversial, to follow his suggestion to appoint an official committee to inquire further into the question, and the Times wisely declines to discuss the validity of the shroud, but the Lancet, taking up the scientific study of the facts, says :—

"We have frequently recorded in our columns the fact deduced in an elaborate research by Dr. W. J. Russell, F.R.S., that almost all substances are able in the dark to act on the photographic plate and to produce a picture. The phenomenon would appear to be established always in the presence of an oxidising process, and Dr. Russell at length came to the conclusion that peroxide of hydrogen was the main factor concerned. In the case of the sheet in which tradition says that the dead Christ was wrapped, we have the analogue probably of a photographic plate or sensitised film. The cloth was impregnated with oils and aloes. It is well known that fixed oils are sensitive to oxidation and aloes contain constituents allied to the pyrogallic acid series, which would probably turn brown in the presence of an oxidising process. The action by which, therefore, the image of the dead Christ was recorded on the cloth would appear to be due to chemical change rather than to the effect of light. On this explanation an exact image, even to minute details such as wounds produced by the thorns and the marks of the blood drops and of flagellation by whips of a definite kind, is not by any means beyond the bounds of probability. It is an intensely remarkable and interesting instance of the light which the very latest developments of scientific search may throw on traditions and controversial matters in history. We are face to face undoubtedly with a set of new phenomena, giving distinct indications of the existence of emanations hitherto not recognised from both animate and inanimate bodies. The discovery of these emanations has been due to the fact that they affect the sensitised silver film, but there is no doubt that there is a very large number of substances also which are affected in a similar way, though not to the same degree as silver in the presence of albuminous substances. Natural photographs appear on all sides, as is proved by the simple experiment of placing an opaque object on grass or on fresh gravel exposed to the light. An exact outline of the shape of the object will be found on removing it after a time. The property of radio-activity is different, the substance in this case actually emitting radiations itself. The images due to the emanation of vapour are yet another but not less interesting phenomenon, as is abundantly manifested in the case of the traditional winding sheet of Christ."

Digitized by Google

Now for the objections. First, there is the historical objection to the authenticity of the shroud itself raised by Father Thurston, of Farm Street Church. He notes that the Abbé Ulysse Chevalier claims to have proved to demonstration that the winding sheet is a spurious relic manufactured in the fourteenth century. The abbé is a scholar of distinction, and of his perfect loyalty to the Catholic Church there can be no possible question. The Jesuit organ, Analecta Bollandiana, states that the abbé's discussion of the subject is final, and that "it only remains to declare 'with a clear and unmistakeable voice,' as Pope Clement VII. declared it, that 'this figure . . . is not from the true sweat of our Lord Jesus Christ.'"

It is affirmed, too, that the story of the "image of the shroud" given by Geoffroy de Lirey to the college founded by him in 1353 is not lost in the mist of ages, and does not happen to present any of those obscurities by which the historian who wishes to impart his own laboriously-acquired conviction to others must at times find himself baffled. We have, for instance, the document addressed to the Pope by Bishop Peter d'Arcis, in which he denounces the fraudulent dealing of the Chapter of Lirey, who for motives of avarice pretended that miracles were worked by this shroud, whereas his predecessor in the see of Troyes had officially investigated the matter and proved it to be a forgery. The Avignon Pope, Clement VII., permitted the exposition of the winding sheet on condition that it should be explained to the people that it is not the real shroud but a devotional representation of it.

Father Thurston concludes: "We are not, of course, in any way bound to believe that those responsible for the subsequent veneration of this alleged relic have been guilty of conscious fraud. Just as in the case of so many facsimiles of the Holy Veils, what was in the first instance a mere copy for devotional purposes has come in time to figure as an original—the wish, no doubt, being father to the thought, but probably without any deliberate insincerity."

Scientific objections have also been raised, for instance:—

M. Roux asked Dr. Vignon why he had not attempted a decisive experiment with a whole body obtained from an anatomical institution. Dr. Vignon replied that he had thought of doing this, but he had at present been unable to do so on account of the difficulty of obtaining a body which united the necessary special conditions.

Dr. Andrew Wilson, in the Illustrated London News, also says:—

"Those who have followed Dr. Russell's experiments on photographing in the dark will remember that he demonstrated the possibility of an imprint being left on a sensitive plate through contact with any object from which peroxide of hydrogen was evolved. There is, of course, no parallelism between a linen shroud and a sensitised plate, but it might probably be argued that science has not yet exhausted all the possibilities whereby an imprint might even be left upon the former in virtue of certain purely chemical reactions. There is nothing known in photographic science which can lend countenance to the notion that the shroud at Turin, acting as a 'plate,' received a negative imprint thereon. As for a photograph of the shroud developing a positive imprint of the body enclosed in it, this is equally inexplicable, unless we are to translate the description as meaning that on a photograph of the shroud there came out markings or appearances suggestive of the configuration of a human body. This, of course, is a very different thing from the assumption that an actual negative photographed on the shroud was reproduced in the photographic obverse. Several things concerning the Turin shroud incident need investigation: chiefly one point of extreme importance, which appears to constitute 'the little rift within the lute' in the case of Dr. Vignon's experimentation. As we have seen, he demands the existence of ammoniacal vapours proceeding from the body enrolled in the sheet as a condition for the reproduction of its imprint. Ammonia is one of the products of animal putrefaction and decay. As it is an accepted dogma of the Christian religion that the Saviour's body suffered no decay, it may be interesting to learn whence the ammoniacal vapours, postulated by the French savant as the cause of the imprint on the Turin shroud, could have been derived. It has been suggested that the ammoniacal odours could have arisen from the sweat of the body enclosed in the shroud. Perspiration is a more or less evanescent secretion, and that the small amount of ammonia which might be contained in the skin-products could assist in producing an exact reproduction of the body, is, to my mind, almost inconceivable. Be that as it may, the whole case rests on unverified experiment."

Digitized by Google

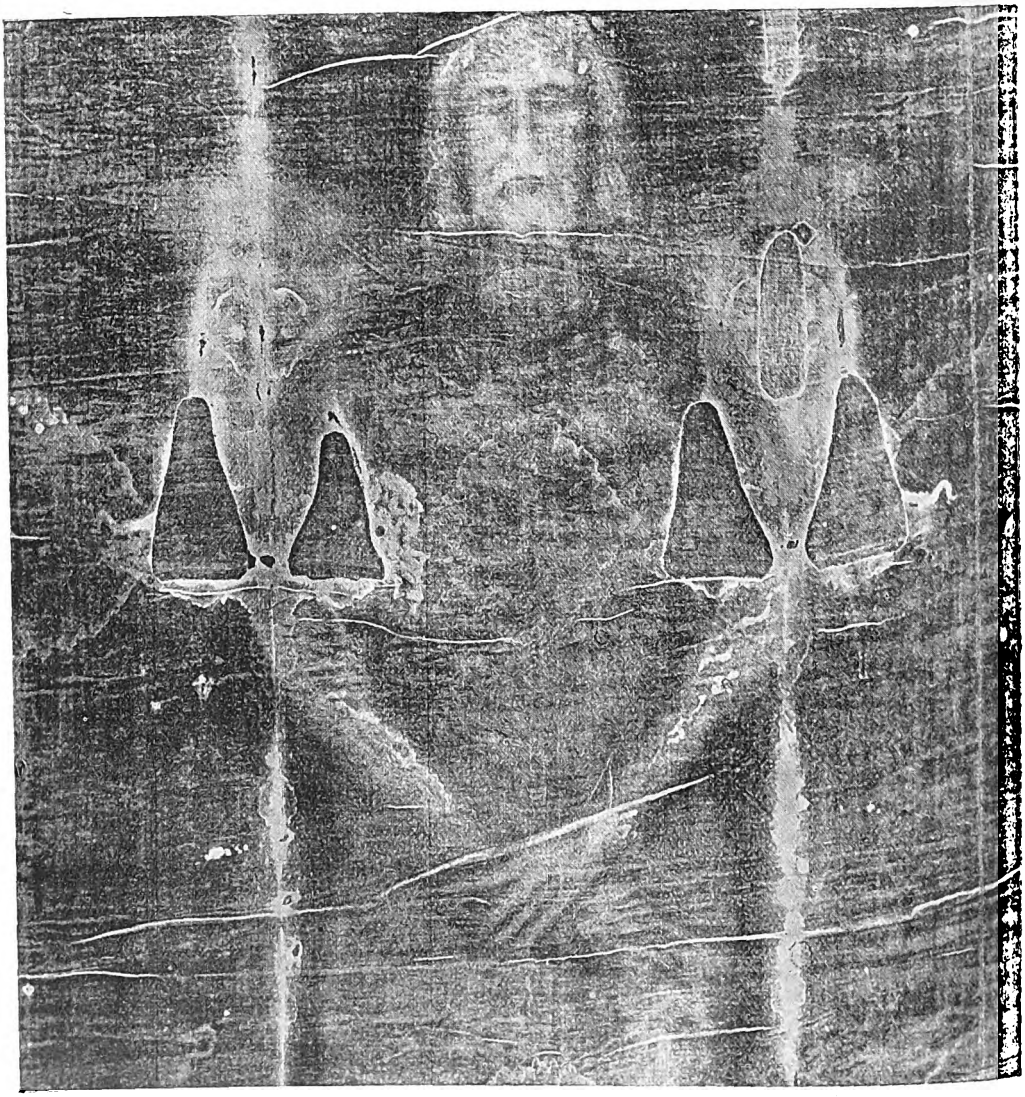
We have submitted the photographs to our readers to give them an opportunity of judging for themselves.

EDITOR.



THE UPPER PORTION ENLARGED.

Digitized by Google

How the GERMANS took LONDON

An Imaginative Sketch that might be Realistic.

Extracts from "THE DAILY SIGNAL."

Wednesday, May 23rd.

A RUMOUR is current in the City that some thousands of German clerks have been warned by their Government to hold themselves in readiness to return to their country for military service.

It is further stated that they will be enabled to give their employers a week's notice. Naturally, various comments are being made as to the necessity for such a step.

Thursday, May 24th.

A definite step has been taken by the German authorities which now confirms the rumour referred to in our columns yesterday respecting the German clerks, etc., employed in London. It seems that the directors of certain railways have been notified that a large number of trains will be required for taking several thousand passengers to Harwich and Tilbury.

They have, however, fortunately for us, been given to understand that they will be required to take this heavy traffic in hand on a Sunday, the German Government not being willing to seriously interfere with the important City traffic arrangements, more than is absolutely possible.

It also transpired in the City that the German authorities had given orders for all the excursionist steamers they have chartered to rendezvous at Tilbury, so it is supposed they wish to have these vessels in readiness to fetch over some of the German clerks that will be leaving London, and it is now supposed that we may expect to hear at any moment that these men have received instructions to hand in their week's notice.

Naturally, great jubilation exists among City clerical circles; higher wages, more employment, and a good time generally are looked forward to; but, for a time, some disorganisation will naturally exist, and there is a disposition to feel grateful for the week's notice that has been promised.

May 26th.

News has reached us from Harwich that several German officers have been staying at Parkeston for the past few days, presumably for the purpose of completing arrangements as to the embarkation of the small army of clerks from London that will be returning to take up military duties in the Fatherland.

They have been enjoying themselves when at leisure by exchanging civilities with local military officials, and they take daily excursions into the country. Some of them have hired a couple of motors and get almost half over the country between daylight and dark. It is said that they have made arrangements for large supplies of food stuffs to be sent into the town for the "emigrants" when they arrive from London on Sunday, and the local farmers and cattle dealers have been doing good business.

Digitized by Google

The German ironclad "Fürst" has arrived at Sheerness, and is taking in coal.

The "Kaiserin," a German cruiser, is now off Gravesend, and, judging by appearances, is very fully manned.

The German man-o'-war "Berlin" appeared to-day off Portsmouth and took up her anchorage, after exchanging the customary salutes. A couple of torpedo boats are with her.

The destroyer "Teufel," flying the German flag, and two torpedo boats are now lying off Portland. Officers coming ashore have been enquiring for coal.

Two German torpedo boats have just arrived at Southampton, and are expected to remain several days.

Saturday, June 2nd.

It is stated that at the very last moment the Germans leaving London to-morrow have been instructed to provide themselves with railways rugs, overcoats, and provisions for two days, the reasons given for this being that, as a large number are expected to be leaving London, some delay may take place in entraining and embarkation, and being Sunday, when hotels, inns, etc., will be closed for the greater part of the day, the travellers will not be entirely dependent upon outside sources for sustenance.

Some comment has been made on the local cattle market at Chelmsford to-day respecting two strangers who made large purchases of fat and store stock. It turns out that they were also at Romford on Wednesday, and effected large purchases of fat stock quite early in the morning, and before the usual buyers were in attendance. Some of these found themselves awkwardly situated when they found their usual source of supply interfered with in this way. It seems they paid in each case with Bank of England notes, and what caused some surprise was the fact that all their Chelmsford purchases were sent upon the Southend road in charge of the usual drovers attending the market, and their instructions were to get them as far as Rochford. Some are wondering if the two parties in question will continue their buying at Colchester to-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY COLUMN.

Saturday.

An hon. Baronet enquired if the Government were prepared with the terms of peace to be offered to the State of Uliska, as it would appear that recent developments had now brought the early termination of the war within the region of practical politics.

A Member of the Government, on rising to reply to the hon. Member, was noticed to be very ill at ease, as if somewhat disconcerted by the query addressed to him, and it was some time before he seemed to strike the line of his reply. He commenced by stating that all the Members of the House—he might say both Houses and include the country generally—were more or less surprised at the duration of this war with Uliska, and at the greatly unexpected loss to us both of valuable lives and money. He would not recapitulate all the advantages now known to have accrued to us, but would go straight to the point at issue. Well, in this case, when there was every probability of war breaking out, certain pourparlers were addressed to us by two of the European powers—one in particular—he need not mention names—[shouts of "Germany, Germany"]—as to the line we proposed to take when it came to discussing the terms of peace.

We were practically given to understand that annexation pure and simple would not be tolerated.

As the situation had now dawned upon everyone, and Members were excitedly whispering in knots of twos and threes all over the House, exclamations of "I told you so," "Just what they expected in the City," were distinctly audible in the Press gallery, and when at last the hon. Member was allowed to proceed he was evidently labouring under great emotion, and continuing, he said, "Well, I can only warn hon. Members and the country generally not to expect too much. Practically our hands are tied, and we shall not therefore be able to reap the full benefits of our very costly victories."

Here the hon. Member resumed his seat, and then the commotion was something to be remembered. The House got completely out of hand. The sense of humiliation was so great that it was impossible to restore order for several

Digitized by Google

THE EXODUS OF GERMAN EMPLOYEES FROM FENCHURCH STREET.

Digitized by Google

minutes. The Speaker was greatly distressed.

At last another hon. Member rose to speak, and quiet was temporarily assured, and he proceeded.

"With all due respect to the feelings of the hon. Member, I feel that I must still inquire if the Government has reason to suppose that the general exodus of Germans now about to take place has any connection with the coming crisis so explicitly referred to by the last speaker."

Now, it is passing strange what an extraordinary effect this question had upon the House. No one else had given the matter a thought in connection with this state of affairs, and each Member sat silently endeavouring to think the matter out for himself.

From a Sunday Paper, Sunday, June 3rd, 1902.

On making final inquiries at the War Office last night for the latest news from the front, information was conveyed to the effect that communication with Uliska was entirely suspended for the time being, and no accountable reason for this was forthcoming; but a terrible uneasiness existed when, after fruitless efforts, it was found utterly impossible to get into touch with Uliska by any single route. A theory existed that a terrible earthquake had taken place, dislocating all the cables along the coast. This, under the circumstances, was the most comforting explanation suggested, and the majority were disposed to accept this as the true state of affairs, but terrible excitement was caused when it became generally known at the West End clubs. Fortunately Sunday intervenes, or something like a panic might ensue with the public in its present state of mind.

Special Edition—Sunday.

Startling information is supplied by the Central News Agency. At the present moment England is entirely isolated from the outside world. Not a single cablegram can be sent from this country in any one direction. It is supposed that some foreign Power, or combination of foreign Powers, has secured the control of all the cables, and severed connection with this country for the time being. The West End—where by some means the news has already become generally known—is in a state of unparalleled excitement, and all sorts of rumours are afloat.

Many personages of high authority were astir in the early hours of the morning, but nothing has been allowed to transpire.

The City.

The exodus of Germans commenced soon after the railway officials had disposed of their ordinary Saturday night's traffic. It soon became evident that the company were in for a very big thing, as ever since eleven o'clock in the evening a steady flow of emigrants had set in, some thousands of whom were making their way to Fenchurch Street and some to London Bridge, but by far the greater number were congregating at Liverpool Street, the authorities responsible for the exodus having at the last moment accepted the hint and provided a number of steamers to take some of the crowd to Tilbury by water.

Extra Special Edition—Sunday Afternoon.

A rumour is current that a full Cabinet Council is now sitting, and that, in addition to the members of the Cabinet and Defence Committee, the Commander-in-Chief and other high officials from the War Office and Admiralty have been seen quietly making their way there, and that in consequence a crowd is gradually growing.

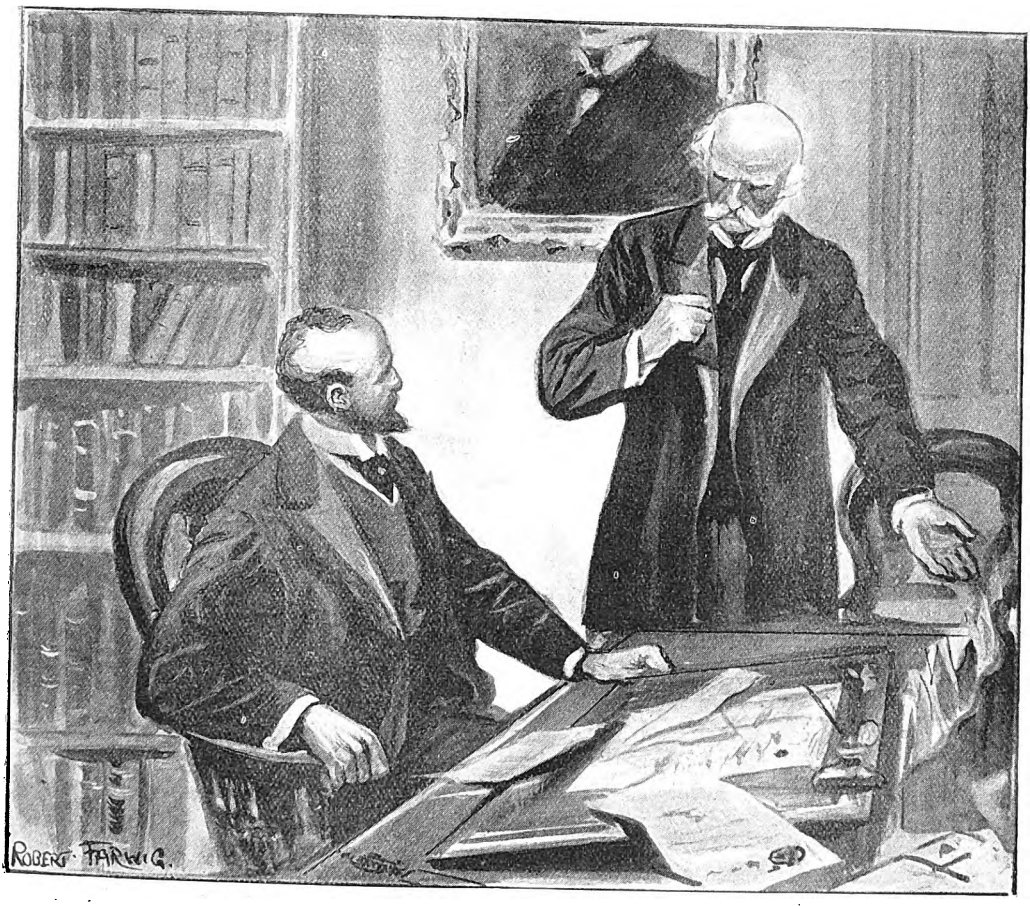
The City.

It would seem that natural curiosity induced many thousands of people to make their way to the City in the hope of seeing what was going on at the railway stations. This was particularly noticeable towards the afternoon, when all sorts of rumours were floating about. However, they were doomed to disappointment, as the precautions taken by the police effectually prevented the passing of any but those who could show an occasion for entering the City.

A DECLARATION OF WAR.

Ministers having retired to their residences after an anxious and trying week, one of them was exceedingly astonished to have the German Ambassador announced about eleven o'clock on Saturday evening, with a request for an immediate interview. A sense of terrible foreboding oppressed him, and on entering the room

Digitized by Google



THE GERMAN AMBASSADOR DECLARES WAR TO THE MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

he was evidently ill at ease. The German Ambassador also showed great agitation, overcome with the terrible shock he was about to give—and a shock it proved to be, when he handed him the following declaration :—

"From Herr Von ——, as representing Germany. To the Right Hon. ——, as representing Great Britain and Ireland.

"GREETING.—Whereas we well know an agreement was entered into by our respective Governments having regard to the terms of peace to be submitted by his Majesty's Government to the State of Uliska, and now it having become clear that the subjects of his most gracious Majesty King Edward will not allow their Government to carry out the terms of the contract entered into by our respective Governments, I am commanded to make a formal declaration of war against England and her Colonies, which is to take effect from twelve midnight this 3rd day of June, 1902."

Some seconds elapsed before the English Minister realised the situation; yet, after the Ambassador had taken his departure, the Minister took instant action to communicate with the other members of the Cabinet, and, engaging a special train, travelled rapidly to town. This, of course, took up two or three hours, and it was getting well on towards Sunday morning before some half-dozen of his confrères could reach Arlington Street. Of course, it was not long before they desired to get in touch with the Fleets, and then they saw the significance of the report concerning cable communications. These were found to be still defective. Suddenly an incident relating to a signal-book "missing" occurred to their minds, and then it dawned upon them that the enemy might also be in possession of their private "Cipher" Code, in which case, as they controlled the cables, all sorts of fictitious messages might be despatched, sending the fleets and vessels on the wildest of wild-goose chases—even, possibly, causing them to take steps that would land them forthwith in another war with France or Russia; perhaps both.

Digitized by Google

The terrible danger of their position, and their utter helplessness was overwhelming, but it was deemed advisable not to let the real state of affairs become known until Monday, fearing an onslaught might be made upon the poor German clerks who were at that time rapidly leaving the City (as they supposed) and they would be wanting full control of the railways.

It afterwards transpired that in course of conversation with a British Minister—who was prostrate and all but speechless with astonishment—the German Ambassador had suggested that as arrangements had been made to embark his countrymen who were leaving London as rapidly as possible, steps should not be taken to interfere with these—at present innocent of the true state of affairs—or at any rate proper care should be taken to afford them protection. Sunday had been fixed for the transit out of consideration to the railway authorities and the convenience of the British public.

We know now how the bait was taken.

Copy of notice mysteriously posted to the country police authorities in the districts bordering on the Great Eastern and London, Tilbury, and Southend Railways, and received at all the Metropolitan Police Stations by the first post on Monday morning:—

"Whereas it will become known that war has been declared against the people of this country by Germany, and that for the time being the two railways have been seized by German troops, the police forces, both town and country, now under control of his Majesty's Government, are expressly advised to warn the inhabitants under their control or protection not to approach the railways in question, or in any way to interfere with the rails, wires, or traffic under the penalty of being shot on sight.

"The police authorities will be allowed full scope to exercise their usual functions and, in fact, are invited to do so, and while acting in this way they will be treated as non-combatants; but they, in common with other inhabitants, must take heed as to approaching or to interfering with the said railways in any way.

"Any interference with his Imperial Majesty's forces by non-combatants—i.e., unattached or non-uniformed troops—will be instantly and severely punished (the penalty for firing on troops by non-combatants is death), and a severe lesson will be dealt out to the inhabitants of any town or village sanctioning or assisting in an attack of any sort.

"All stores or supplies requisitioned will be paid for.

"(Signed)

"COUNT HERBERT VON KRIEG,

"Commanding the Invading Forces."

(To be continued.)

☞ See Next Issue for Startling and Thrilling War Events.

Digitized by Google

A Costly Experiment.

"GOOD-BYE, then, dear," and for the second time the minister lingeringly kissed his wife. She looked at him perkily, as in the old college days, when that same coquettish look took his fancy, and replied—

"Now, John, don't put yourself into a fever, or you will spoil everything by your nervousness. Just act as if you were in your own place, and you will preach as well as anyone they are likely to hear. Good-bye, dear."

The 'bus drove up to the manse, and the Rev. John Stanley took his departure to preach at the flourishing church of Adnell, in Birmingham, then without a pastor. There was no telling what might occur as the result, so the good man had been in a state of expectation and restlessness ever since he had received the offer of a Sunday there. The church was a great way off from his own home, necessitating a journey to London, even before he could get a train for the great Midland city to which he was bound. On alighting at Liverpool Street he found, to his disgust, that he would have to cross London in a heavy storm. He looked somewhat ruefully at his boots, which were too thin to resist the damp long, but making up his mind for the inevitable, he strode rapidly the not inconsiderable distance to the tram which would take him from Finsbury to St. Pancras. Trams were cheap, and if nothing came from his visit, it would be as well not to have spent money on a cab. But other persons beside the minister were bent upon the cheap trams, and being Saturday afternoon, crowds were leaving the City, so that in a downpour of rain he had to wait his chance. By the time that he had arrived at St. Pancras, what with the damp, the sharp east wind, and the fact that he had only been able to procure a draughty seat close to the door, he felt thoroughly chilled. He was not by any means a strong man, and the exposure found him out. To his great annoyance he discovered, as he sat down at supper-time with his host, that a cold was putting in evidence of its presence.

"I am afraid you are not very well," observed Mrs. Langton, his hostess, noticing the slight hacking cough. Anxiously he hurried to assure her he was never better. He felt it would not do to make any fuss on an occasion like this. If he should produce any impression that he was delicate, it would be all over with his chances. During supper he partook heartily of the substantial meal set before him, thinking it was better to observe the good old maxim, to "feed a cold and starve a fever." But in the night he paid for it. A severe pain in his left side, catching his breath, attacked him, and made him sleep a fitful, troubled sleep. In the morning he felt terribly ill, all his bones seemed aching, but with sheer force of will he managed to appear quite bright and cheery in conversation. He joked with the children, and kept them all lively by the stories he told. "He is quite an interesting companion," said his hostess to her husband. "If he preaches as well as he talks, I should think he'll do. He's very different from Mr. Fletcher, our old minister."

And preach he did. Although he felt himself almost disabled by the terrible stabbing pain in his left side, and somehow felt unable to draw a deep breath, still he struggled on, for was not his future and that of his wife and children dependent upon it? After the service

Digitized by Google

there were many congratulations, and the Sunday-school superintendent invited him to visit and address the school in the afternoon. He would have liked to refuse, but he dared not. Yet, as he walked from the school in the afternoon his breath was so laboured that he wondered how he should get through the service at night. A cup of tea somewhat revived him, and earnestly asking strength for the task, he fought his way through the final service, and without a doubt produced a great impression. But the strain was too great, and feeling as if he would fall off his seat, he at last excused himself to his host on the ground of being tired, and withdrew for the night, but first of all running out ostensibly to place a letter in the post-box, and seizing the opportunity to call into a chemist's and get some mustard leaves. These he applied to his side now and again through the night, but with little success. He stole about his room, making very little sound lest it should be noticed, and so the night passed slowly enough in agony. In the morning he was surprised to see the colour of his face—it was a bright scarlet—and finding himself so thirsty, he concluded he had a terribly feverish cold. He left by the earliest train he could conveniently catch, and making the best of his way home, no sooner got into his own dining-room than he surprised his wife by fainting right away. The indomitable will was conquered. The doctor soon diagnosed his illness as an attack of pneumonia. "There is no telling how this will end, Mrs. Stanley," said he; "his temperature is very high, and the inflammation most acute. We will do our best, though."

IN VAIN HIS WIFE STROVE TO SOOTHE HIM.

For a fortnight the minister battled for his life, and then emerged from the Valley of the Shadow weak as a babe. In his delirium he had prattled ceaselessly of the church. Sometimes with wild, staring eyes he said to his wife:

"Isn't to-day Saturday? The church meeting was Thursday night. There ought to be a letter! Ah, that's the post. Run, dear. Oh, if I only get it!"

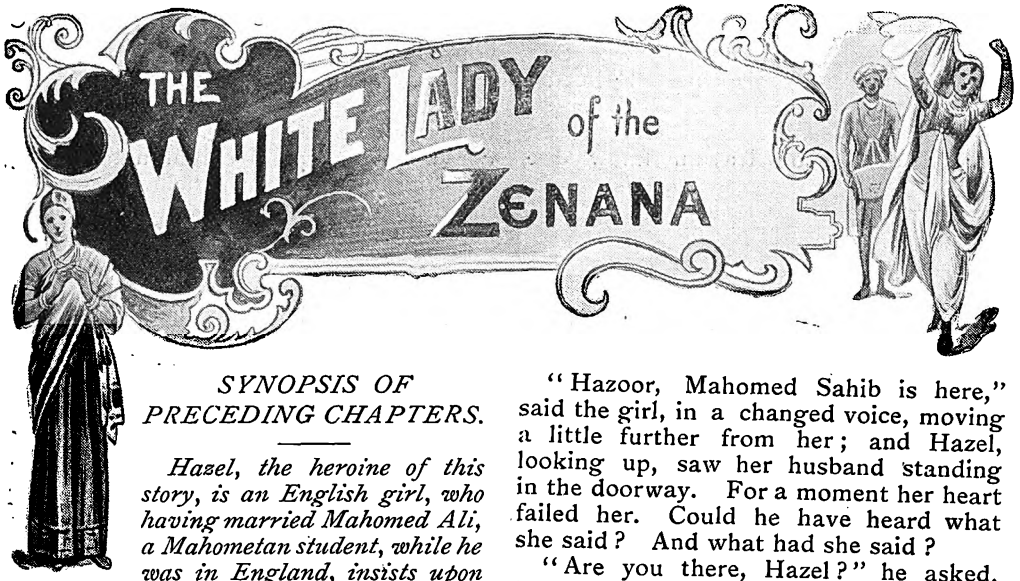
In vain his wife strove to soothe him. Not till he regained consciousness did the mind cease to relieve its anxieties by these babblings.

Three weeks after, when he was convalescent, the invitation came which meant so much to them all.

"Ah, wifie. It was worth it, wasn't it?" he said.

"No," she answered, severely, "it was not. You might have left us altogether. And if only I have you, my darling, I'd willingly be as poor as a church mouse."

Digitized by Google



SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Hazel, the heroine of this story, is an English girl, who having married Mahomed Ali, a Mahometan student, while he was in England, insists upon going out to join him, in utter ignorance of what it means to be incarcerated in the seclusion of the Zenana. When she finds it out, she is dominated with one idea —that of escape, and at the end of Chapter II. she has climbed into a tree to reconnoitre the surroundings outside the walls, but is surprised by her husband. After this, although he apparently takes no notice, he pretends to depart on urgent and mysterious journeys, during which time Hazel grows more familiar with the true inwardness of Zenana life, and is more disgusted with it. One of the slave girls, Taj Bee, won by Hazel's kindness, promises to assist her to escape, and her determination to do so is increased by hearing that her father-in-law wishes her husband to bring home Aziz Unissa, the daughter of Sultan Mirza Khan, to be his second wife. While she is musing, devoured with indignation, Taj Bee comes to her and whispers, "I have found a way of escape!"

CHAPTER IV.

"OH, Taj Bee! Quickly! Tell me what it is?" gasped Hazel.

"Is your foot well enough now to walk far, Hazoor—to run if they come after us?" Taj Bee asked.

"Yes, yes! it is quite well," Hazel answered, breathless with excitement. "What is your plan? Make haste and tell me quickly."

"Hazoor, Mahomed Sahib is here," said the girl, in a changed voice, moving a little further from her; and Hazel, looking up, saw her husband standing in the doorway. For a moment her heart failed her. Could he have heard what she said? And what had she said?

"Are you there, Hazel?" he asked, looking out into the darkness.

"Yes, I am here," she answered, going slowly to meet him, without any demonstration of welcome.

"How are you, dear?" he said, taking her hand, "I hope your ankle is much better."

"Thank you, it is still rather painful, and I cannot use it much," she answered, by a sudden inspiration.

He helped her back to her chair with tender solicitude and sat down beside her.

"I am afraid you will miss Kair Unissa," he said, "she was here a good deal with you, wasn't she?"

"She was here a good deal, certainly," said Hazel dryly, "but I do not know that I shall miss her very much. We could hardly have very much in common, you know. I was not brought up in a zenana."

"I thought perhaps you would like to have a friend to stay here with you for a little while," he said.

"I have no friends in this country," she answered shortly.

"A companion, I ought to have said," he corrected himself, "a young girl of your own age who would be bright and pleasant and keep you from being dull here all by yourself, now Kair Unissa is gone. One of my father's friends has to go to Bombay on business, and he has an only daughter whom he does not want to take with him, so we thought it might be pleasant for you to have her to stay with you till her father comes back to Madras."

Digitized by Google

While he was speaking, with a sudden shock the truth flashed upon Hazel. She almost cried out, "Aziz Unissa!" but by a tremendous effort she controlled herself and stopped the words upon her tongue; it would be fatal to betray any knowledge that had come to her through Taj Bee. But her voice shook a little as she answered: "It was very kind of you to think of it, Ali; but I am really not at all dull, and I would very much rather not have anyone here. You see we have only this one room, and I think it is pleasanter to keep it to ourselves."

"She will have Kair Unissa's room, of course. I never thought of her coming in here to disturb you. But I hope, dear, you will try and be kind to her, and let her come in here sometimes to be with you," he said.

Hazel was nearly suffocated with indignation. Nothing but the hope inspired by Taj Bee's whisper of a plan of escape could have kept her indignation from bursting forth. But she held it down and asked indifferently:

"Is it really settled that she is to come? Because if she is only coming on my account, I would much rather not have her."

"I am afraid it is settled," Mahomed answered, and there was a note of relief

HE SAT DOWN BESIDE HER.

Digitized by Google

in his voice. Hazel had evidently not understood the true inwardness of his proposition. "My father saw his friend Sultan Mirza Kahn this evening, and invited him to send his daughter here, when he leaves Madras."

"When does he leave?" asked Hazel.

"Oh, not for a week or so, I think. I do not know the exact date yet myself, but I daresay I shall hear to-morrow." He put out his hand to take hers, and she dared not refuse. Her mind was too bewildered for the moment for her to know what line of action to take, but she felt that in any case she must not commit herself till she had talked to Taj Bee on this new development. So she accepted his caresses with a little less coldness than she had shown him in their later interviews.

He was graver and more quietly tender than she had ever seen him, and she noted, with something like a pang of regret, how much he had lost of the youthful brightness she remembered in London. After all, she had loved him once, and she had been very happy with him in the early days of her marriage. He was soft and peace-loving and submissive as the men of his warlike race have become in the enervating softness of the climate of Southern India. And to-night, at any rate, she was disposed to blame his father rather than himself for driving him into a course he would never have entered upon of his own accord. Perhaps if she had understood the conditions better, and been kinder and more gentle to him in the first days of her coming to his father's house he would have withstood his father for her sake. But she had drawn away from him in her first disappointment and resentment, and left him to stand alone. And now an evil thing had come upon them both. So she meditated within herself, sitting with her hand in his, out there on the terrace, in the balmy hush of the evening, with the soft perfumes of the garden beneath wafted up to them on every breeze.

She would have been glad if he had left her then, so that she could consult Taj Bee, but he stayed that evening, and nearly the whole of the next day; it was not till the late afternoon that he went downstairs for a little while, presumably on business connected with this new marriage. Then she was able to call Taj Bee to her counsels.

"Why did you not tell me what they were saying downstairs?" she asked, looking with some suspicion on her handmaiden.

"About Aziz Unissa Begum, Hazoor?" said the girl. "No one knew anything about it until last night. Sultan Mirza Kahn came yesterday; but he comes often, and the Nabob talked long with Mahomed Sahib afterwards; but he has talked many times about this marriage, as I told your Honour. Last night the Nabob told the big Begum that my lord had consented; Ameeda Bee was there, behind the charfroy, and she heard him, and this morning she told me. Before that I knew nothing. What did my lord say, Hazoor?"

"He said only that a young lady was coming here to be a companion for me, and he said her father was Sultan Mirza Kahn, and then I knew," answered Hazel.

"And what did you say, Begum Sahib?" the slave asked, with evident anxiety.

"I said nothing. He does not know that I have ever heard of Aziz Unissa."

"The Begum guides herself with wisdom," said Taj Bee, approvingly. "He must not know that Taj Bee has told you anything, or he will take me away from your service, and then I cannot help you. They will begin soon the marriage ceremonies, and Mahomed Sahib will be much away, but we must be very careful for a little while. I shall hear the servants talking, and we shall know all their counsel."

"You said you had found a way of escape. Tell me what it is before Mahomed Sahib comes back."

"It is this, Hazoor. You have seen when the ladies come here to visit the Begum, they bring many strange servants with them; and when they go away, one goes before and cries: "Gosha! Gosha!" to the men, so that they shall all go away out of the path of the ladies. Downstairs there is a little room on the side verandah and there the ladies wait, till they get into their carriages, and all their faces are covered with the thick sheets, and no one looks towards them. This is my plan, Hazoor. You will put on a servant's dress; I will get the stuff in the bazaar and make it, and when the ladies come down from their visit to the Begum, you and I will go with them to the little door. No one will look at us; when they are getting into their carriage we will walk down the path very quietly to the gate, and if they see us, they will think we are servants going to the bazaar. They do not know all the servants of the Begum, or who is Gosha, and who goes to the bazaar. I will get some walnut juice for the feet of your Honour, and your face and hands, and nobody will look twice."

Digitized by Google

Hazel bent down and kissed the girl, in a passion of gratitude. "You are a clever girl, Taj Bee!" she said. "We must go before Aziz Unissa comes into the house."

"Yes, Hazoor. It is no use to wait for that; it would make it more difficult if there were more women about to watch us. They do not watch you now so much—they think you are tired of trying to get out. Since the wedding they do not suspect you so much, because you did not try to talk to any of the English folk. But they must not think you know about this new marriage and are angry because of it. And do not tell anyone that your foot is well, Hazoor, but go limping still, that they may think you cannot walk quickly."

"GOSHA! GOSHA!"

"Here, Taj Bee, quickly; take one of my rings to sell in the bazaar—you will want money to buy the dress and the walnut-juice and things," Hazel said, slipping off one of the many rings from her finger.

They are not scrupulous in the bazaar; Taj Bee would be able to sell it easily enough, without any questions being asked of how she came by it.

Before they could say any more, Mahomed Ali came back; more grave and sad than before, it seemed to Hazel. But she herself was bright and almost gay, with the best hope she had had yet of making her escape.

Mahomed was much with her in those days, but whenever he left her, she went and sat in the old Begum's room, that she might not miss any visitor that came, and that Taj Bee might hear all the gossip that went on among the Begum's servants.

Digitized by Google

"I have got the dress all ready," Taj Bee told her one day; "but we cannot go yet, while Mahomed Sahib comes so much to the zenana; he might send for you, and miss you before we had got safely outside the gate."

"I must be gone before that other woman comes," Hazel answered; "whatever happens I will not sleep under the same roof with Aziz Unissa."

But this feeling was beyond Taj Bee's comprehension. "My lord has greater love for your Honour than for her," she remarked timidly. "And if you love my lord so much that you are jealous he should bring home another wife, why do you want to go away from him, Hazoor?"

"It has nothing to do with love," said Hazel, with her face in a flame. "I am his wife; he insults me when he brings his mistress to his house where I am living. I wish we could have a carriage waiting for us outside, Taj Bee. Couldn't you hire a man to come and wait in the road for us?"

"It wouldn't be safe, Hazoor," the slave answered decidedly. "The man might talk to any of the Nabob's servants, if they saw him waiting in the road. What will you do when we are safe outside, Hazoor? I know not the ways of the English folk."

"I have thought of that," said Hazel. "When I tried to run away before I meant to go to one of the Sahibs' houses and ask the Mem Sahib to give me clothes and money to go home to England; but I do not like to go in this dress, they might not listen to my story. Can you get some of my own clothes from the boxes downstairs?"

"I do not know, Hazoor. The boxes are put away in a godown, and I think the Nabob has the keys, or Mahomed Sahib, but I will see."

The boxes had been put away and forgotten in a godown, but they were not locked up there, and in one of them Taj Bee found a rusty bunch of keys hanging in the lock. It was easy enough to take out anything that Hazel wanted.

"I suppose I must only have a very few things, or it will make too large a bundle," Hazel said, wistfully, when Taj Bee brought her this welcome news. "I must have a dress, of course, and a petticoat, and shoes and stockings and a hat; and gloves will not take up very much room; and I don't see that I can do without some under-things."

But Taj Bee protested against the madness of cumbering themselves with so much baggage. And after long haggling and many earnest representations from the slave that their very lives might depend on her prudence and restraint in this matter, Hazel happily bethought her of a thin dust cloak which might be allowed to do duty for other garments for the moment.

"Bring me that cloak and the smallest bonnet you can find, and a pair of shoes," she said, at last, "and I will make that do."

"I will make a bundle and hide it in my own godown," said Taj Bee, "and when we have got outside the compound, I will come back through the gap in the hedge behind my godown and fetch the things; but if it is a big bundle someone may see it, and ask me, 'What is that?' and when they see the English garments of the Begum they will know all, and we shall be undone."

"It will only make a very, very small bundle, Taj Bee," said Hazel ruefully; "but, of course, I see it would be madness to take anything that would be large enough to attract attention, but those things will go quite easily under your veil. And, after all, if we have any trouble we can always leave the things behind."

And so it was decided between them, and then they had nothing to do but wait their opportunity,

"Sultan Mirza Kahn is going to Bombay at the end of next week," said Mahomed Ali one day, "in about ten days' time, and his daughter Aziz Unissa Begum will come here the day before he leaves. I hope you will like her, Hazel, and find her a pleasant companion."

Hazel was too full of her own projects just then to care very much who came to the zenana, or in what character they came, but there were moments, such as these, when a wave of revolt swept over her at what she considered Mahomed Ali's cold-blooded treachery, and she found it almost impossible to answer him civilly.

"You must please remember, Ali," she said on this occasion, "that she is your guest and not mine; it is not by my wish or my invitation that she is coming. Of course you will not be able to come up to the zenana at all while she is here," she added, suddenly remembering what had escaped her before for the moment, that if Aziz Unissa came to the house simply as a guest she could not be seen by any of the men of the house.

Digitized by Google

"She is my mother's guest, of course," he answered awkwardly, "she will occupy Kair Unissa's room, which is quite out of the way of this one." Hazel was afraid to pursue the subject any further for fear of showing that she knew too much.

Taj Bee came to her, in great excitement that day as soon as she was alone. "My lord is going to bring home Aziz Unissa Begum on the ninth day," she whispered. "He will not come upstairs so much now; he will sit at the feasts at Sultan Mirza Kahn's house, as Abdullah Sahib sat in this house before the marriage of the little Begum; and we can go out the next time the old Begum has visitors."

"You are sure everything is quite ready? The English clothes and the servants' dress and everything," said Hazel, trembling with eagerness.

"Yes, Hazoor, everything is ready."

A few days later the opportunity came. Hazel sat in her mother-in-law's room, with beating heart, half suffocated with excitement, while a large party of visitors talked and chattered and gossipped round the Begum. When Taj Bee plucked gently at her veil, for a moment her heart failed her, and almost it seemed better to stay for ever in the zenana than to risk the unknown vengeance of the Nabob if she was discovered. But she slipped out with Taj Bee to her own room without being observed.

"This is a good time," said Taj Bee. "That Begum always stays a very long time; it will be nearly dark when she goes."

Hazel changed her rich dress, hurriedly, for the common cotton garments the slave girls wear. Taj Bee took off her jewels and tied them in a corner of her veil. Then they went out and sat on the floor in the passage outside the Begum's room, where it was nearly dark at all times, and waited for the visitors to come out.

"I heard some news just now, inside," whispered Taj Bee, as they sat waiting. "Aziz Unissa Begum is not coming; she is going to Bombay with her father. Some say she begged to go that she may buy beautiful dresses in Bombay, to please the eye of Mahomed Sahib when he shall bring her home; and some say they will not have the marriage now at all, and Sultan Mirza Khan has got another husband for his daughter, where she will be the first wife."

"It doesn't matter to me," said Hazel, "whether she comes or whether she stays away, I shall not be here."

"They say," Taj Bee went on, "that Sultan Mirza Khan did not know that Mahomed Sahib had already a Begum, but some of the visitors who come here have talked of Hazari Begum, and now he says he will not let his daughter marry to be the second wife in any man's zenana. That is the talk of the zenana, Hazoor, but no one knows yet what is the truth, only that Aziz Unissa goes to Bombay."

The visitors stayed late, as Taj Bee had said, but at last there was a rustling and chattering in the doorway; a girl ran down the stairs, calling "Gosha! Gosha!" and a troop of veiled women flocked after her. The two last were Hazel and Taj Bee. They met no one as they shuffled down the stairs and through the passage to the little side room opening on to the verandah round the angle of the building. Two carriages were waiting outside; but there were no coachmen on the boxes, and not a male creature was in sight.

It seemed much lighter out here than it had done in the Begum's dingy apartment.

Taj Bee caught Hazel's hand and led her round to the farther side of the carriages, while the ladies and their attendants packed themselves into the first carriage. Like shadows the two fugitives flitted down the short drive, and reached the gate and passed out into the road. How easy and simple it all seemed, now it was over!

Taj Bee hurried Hazel down the road for a short distance, then across the corner of a compound into a banana tope, where, amongst the large-leaved, close-growing bananas they were completely concealed.

"Wait here," Taj Bee whispered, "while I run back and get the clothes out of my godown."

"No, no," said Hazel, holding her, "don't go back. It is not safe. Never mind the clothes, we can get some more to-morrow."

"It is better that I should go back, Hazoor," Taj Bee insisted. "No one will suspect me. I shall hear what they say in the house, and where they are going to look for you. It is well for us to know

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

the counsels of the Nabob. I will go very quickly; my godown is close to the hedge between the compounds: no one will see me get through the hedge."

Taj Bee had perhaps some treasured possession of her own she did not wish to leave behind her; and Hazel very reluctantly let her go. She herself sat down, to wait for her return, on the little path between two rows of bananas.

The time seemed endlessly long as she sat there trembling at every rustle of the leaves, at every sound of passing voices in the road. The sun went down suddenly, and it was dark; and then the moon rose and lighted all the land, almost as if it had been day, and still Taj Bee did not come.

When Taj Bee had been gone an hour Hazel began to feel very uneasy. When two, and then three, hours had passed she gave her up for lost. "They have caught her," she thought, "and God knows what those cruel men will do to her! Perhaps they will torture her to make her tell where I am. I will wait one hour longer, and then I will go back. They shall not torture her for my sake." She sat with her watch in her hand for an hour. Then she put it away, and stood up, very quiet and pale and determined. "It is impossible she can have been four hours gone, unless they have taken her," she said; "I will go and give myself up."

She took the path she had seen Taj Bee take, through the bananas and across the back of the compound, to the thin hedge that divided it from the side of the Nabob's grounds, where some of the servants' huts were; still hoping as she went that she might meet Taj Bee returning. But there was no one. She slipped through the hedge into the compound and went towards the house. On the gravel path by the side door she saw a noisy group standing, shouting and gesticulating, and in the midst was Taj Bee, torn and dishevelled and woe-begone, crying shrilly to the men to let her go. Hazel saw one man strike her, asking loudly: "Where is the Begum Sahib, your mistress? Tell me where she is, and you can go. The Nabob is out, but when he comes home he will kill us all for letting the young Begum go."

But Taj Bee cried and protested that she knew no more than they did where her young mistress was hidden.

As Hazel drew nearer, she saw her husband come up the drive from the gate, with two or three men; and in a flash she knew that he had seen and recognised her; he turned his head away at once, and it seemed to her he tried to draw off the attention of the men with him that they might not look towards that side of the compound. And seeing that, Hazel forgave him for many things, and never again, through all that was to come, did she count him amongst her enemies; he had done his best for her in that moment. But she came on bravely towards that noisy group, drawing her veil over her face, not to shame her husband.

"It is I, Hazari Begum," she said. "Let my servant go."

The men turned to look upon her, stupefied. Taj Bee laughed jeeringly. "What is that mad woman saying?" she cried. "That she is the Begum? A pretty Begum! Do not heed her—she is a slave out of the bazaar!"

The men stood doubtfully, not knowing what to do, looking for orders to Mahomed Ali. How it might have ended no one can say, but, as they stood there, there was a great clatter of wheels and horses' hoofs, and the Nabob's carriage drove up through the further gate.

The time for hesitation was past. Mahomed went forward a step or two, and took his wife by the arm to lead her within.

Taj Bee seemed to realize that all was lost.

"Oh, Hazoor!" she cried, "why did you come back—why did you come back? What is the life of a slave-girl worth, O blessed one, that you should risk yourself for me?"

The men dragged her away, lamenting and beating her breast. And Hazel, in silence, with despair in her heart, went with her husband back into the house and up the stairs to that room she hated and had hoped never to see again.

The room was empty. Mahomed locked the door while she stood silent, her face hidden in her veil.

"Take off those clothes, and come out to me on the terrace. I have to speak with you," he said. He spoke in a tone she had never heard before; there was no anger, no sternness in his voice, but it sounded thin and hollow, like the voice of one who was weak after long illness. He went out to the terrace, and there, when she had put off her disguise with trembling, fumbling fingers, she joined him.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

He stood, leaning against the balustrade, and she went and stood near him, dumb and stunned.

"You make it very hard for me, Hazel," he said, "I know not even if I shall be able to save you, this time. It was nothing less than madness to come back, when you had once got away."

"I was afraid of what they would do to Taj Bee," said Hazel, simply.

"You have done her no good, and you have put your own life in danger," he answered.

"What do you mean?" she asked, in a faltering voice.

In this extremity he seemed to cast aside the veil of subtlety with which an Oriental hides his thoughts and purposes, and spoke openly, almost as an Englishman might have done.

"My father has been very angry, many times," he said, "and I have stood between you and his vengeance. I have had to make sacrifices you know nothing of; and I have made myself responsible to him that you would not escape and bring disgrace upon us. This time you have gone too far; and you have intrigued with the women of the zenana to help you. I do not know that even my influence can save you from his anger."

"Will he kill me?" she whispered.

"Women have disappeared from the zenana for less than this," Mahomed Ali answered. "At any rate he will make it impossible for you ever to attempt again to escape. God knows, when I saw how unhappy you were here, I would have let you go long ago. But he would never hear of it. And lately I have thought you were trying to get used to the life of the zenana, and be contented in it."

"I wish you had told me all this before, Ali," she said.

"You would not believe in my love for you," he answered; "you looked upon me as your enemy."

She put her hand gently on his arm. "If I had known you were really on my side, Ali, I would have tried to be more patient," she said.

"I could not have helped you to get away," said he, "and nothing else would have satisfied you. And now, if I can save you from death or worse things, it is as much as I can do. I must go down now and see my father."

Her hand tightened on his arm: "Do not leave me," she whispered.

He put his arm around her, and drew her closer to him.

"And what of Taj Bee?" she asked.

"I can do nothing for her; she is a fool," he answered shortly. "You must let me go now, Hazel. You need not be afraid. You are quite safe here. No one will come here to-night. And if I cannot come back to you you must try and remember that I am doing the best I can for you."

"Oh, Ali, why can't you protect me?" she cried. "Take me away from this dreadful place. Let us both go together, now, at once. An Englishman would take me away to a safe place and fight for me."

"I am not an Englishman," said Mahomed Ali, and so saying left her.

CHAPTER V.

Hazel sat, white and desperate, behind her closed venetians, with her women and the Begum's women crowded about her, staring at the scene outside.

The terrace was lighted with lamps; on one side were chairs, and there Mahomed Ali sat with his father, their attendants standing behind and about them. For the first time Hazel saw the terrible old Nabob. He was a tall large man, with the straight, high features that his son inherited; they were thickened and sensualised, but they still bore the stamp of the dignity and power of a long race of irresponsible rulers of men.

As Mahomed Ali passed before her windows to his seat, he whispered to her in English: "For God's sake make no sign."

"What are they going to do?" she asked the women about her.

"Hazoor, they will punish Taj Bee, who has made the great Nabob angry," the women answered. They sat and stood about her, silent, in a fearful expectation; their busy tongues stilled by an excitement that was half terror, half pleasant anticipation.

Through the little door at the side came Taj Bee, unveiled, her face ash-grey, her hands bound, driven forward by two men who followed her out of the darkness of the little staircase. She would have thrown herself on the ground before the Nabob, but the men held her up. Her screams rang in Hazel's ears. At a sign from the Nabob a man came forward with

Digitized by Google

SHE ROAMED RESTLESSLY TO AND FRO LIKE A CAGED PANTHER.

Digitized by Google

a little vessel full of grey powder in his hand. Screaming and struggling, Taj Bee was laid on the ground, and held by the two men, while the third knelt down beside her head.

"They are putting the fire pepper in her eyes," one of the women whispered.

The fear screams of the victim grew into shrieks of mortal agony.

"Taj Bee! Taj Bee!" cried Hazel, but her voice was drowned in the screams of the woman. She shook the venetian doors, trying to burst them open. Mahomed Ali looked round apprehensively; the old Nabob, staring straight in front of him, with a mask of cold implacability upon his face, seemed to take no heed of her disturbance.

The man with the powder rose slowly from his knees, the others loosed their hold of Taj Bee; and the slave scrambled to her feet; she stumbled blindly about the terrace with her hands over her eyes, shrieking, praying and cursing in a delirious agony.

Hazel within roamed restlessly to and fro, like a caged panther, with helpless hands beating upon each other, going now and again to the window to shake the venetians and call, "Taj Bee! Taj Bee!"

The women tried to restrain her, fearing both for themselves and her if the Nabob's displeasure should be turned in their direction. But Hazel shook them off. She would have bearded the Nabob, face to face out there on the terrace, if she could have got at him.

The Nabob sat impassive, apparently unconscious of Hazel's presence behind the venetians. It may be some long-dulled chord in the Nabob's heart had vibrated to that act of heroic courage when Hazel came back and gave herself up to her enemies for the sake of a wretched slave girl.

When Mahomed Ali went to him the evening before to plead for his wife the Nabob had turned away impatiently.

"Pshaw!" he said, "she is mad, like all these English folk; you must look after her better in future."

Never before in all his life had Mahomed Ali known his father to stay his hand when one had offended him, and that one was in his power.

The Nabob rose at last from his seat on the terrace. One of the men caught Taj Bee by the arm to draw her aside out of the path of his lord, and she turned upon him as helpless and feeble creatures will turn when they are driven to distraction; she struck him wildly and blindly in the face, so that he dropped her arm and staggered back. The Nabob and his train passed out, and Taj Bee was left raving and stumbling upon the terrace alone.

"Help me to open the doors!" cried Hazel. "Bring her in, and I will bathe her eyes." And she called to the slave outside: "I am coming, Taj Bee! I am coming!"

"We cannot open the doors, Hazoor," said one of the women.

"We must bring her in. She will die out there," Hazel urged. "Go, one of you, and get the key from Mahomed Sahib."

"She will not die, Hazoor," one of the women answered; "the fire-pepper is not to kill. Your Honour knows Ameeda Bee of the Begum Sahib's women—she, too, has had the fire-pepper in her eyes."

"The blind woman?" asked Hazel, shuddering.

"Yes, Hazoor," said another; "she will see no more with her eyes, but it may be she will live, and it may be she will die. Allah knows. But we cannot bring her in till my lord the Nabob gives order to unlock the doors."

"She would have us too punished by the lord Nabob," muttered another.

And the women began to slink away out of the room. It was not always safe, they told each other, to do Hazari Begum's bidding, although she was their mistress. So they crept away, and Hazel was left alone.

She tried her strength again upon the venetian doors, but they were too strong for her. She tried to talk to Taj Bee through the laths, comforting her; but Taj Bee had been rapt away into a distant land of pain and confusion where the voices of this lower earth could not reach her. She had sunk into a moaning heap by the balustrade, and took no heed of the voice of the "blessed one" she had loved to her own undoing.

Hazel threw herself upon the bed, and buried her head in the pillow to shut out that horrible low moaning, but it sounded in her brain, and would do, she told herself, as long as she lived.

(To be continued.)

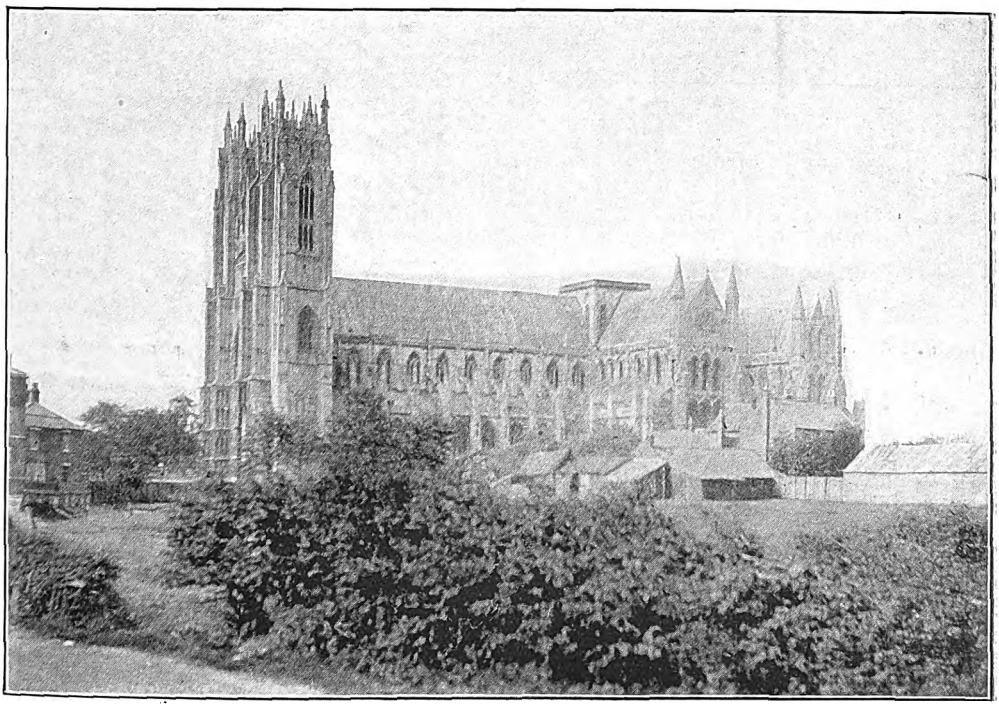
Digitized by Google

A CITY OF REFUGE.

By REV. J. E. SHEPHARD, F.G.S.

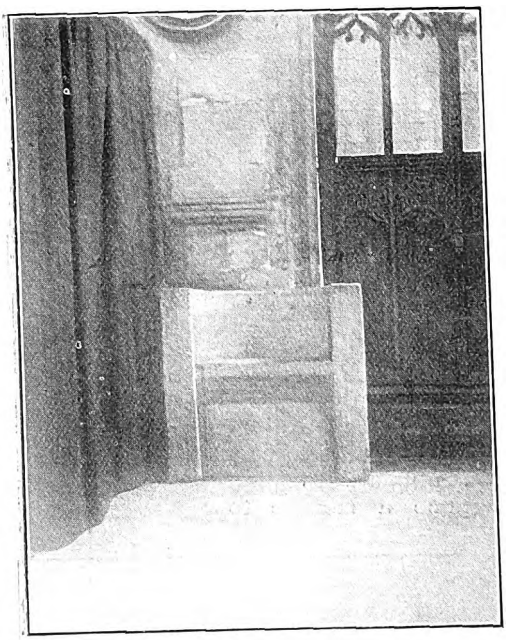
A CITY OF REFUGE, into which the manslayer might flee, leads us back to Old Testament times, where we find provision made for six such cities. In our own country we had similar institutions in the days of old. Their value and importance will readily be seen when you remember how often a man or woman forfeited his or her life for some minor offence, not so many years ago. With the increase of light, and a fuller Christian charity, with perhaps clearer conceptions of justice, we have become more humane in our treatment of the wrong-doer. Thus the need of such places has ceased to exist. Then very often these places became the hotbeds of crime, full of corruption. The fugitives from justice often remained, and did not always reform, so that they became a menace to public morality.



BEVERLEY MINSTER.

Take the city of which we deal as a specimen. In the thirty-first year of Edward I. the sanctuary men of Beverley, and many thousands of thieves and outlaws, had been allowed to enlist, and were in bad repute for deserting, especially after receiving their wages. For the most part they were criminals of the worst type, and these cities became worse than gaols.

Digitized by Google



SANCTUARY STOOL, BEVERLEY.

Some thirty miles from York, and one hundred and eighty north of London, stands the beautiful Beverley Minster. It is seen for many miles, although it seems to be in a valley. The town itself nestles at the foot of the wolds which shelter it on the south-west. History gives us an account of this place as far back as the time of Paulinius, 627 A.D. John, Bishop of Hexam, built a little parish church here in 662 and dedicated it to St. John the Evangelist; he rebuilt and converted the church into a Monastery, with fourteen priests and clerks. Attached to the college of priests was a school, which developed into the Grammar School. In 866 the Danes almost demolished it; four years after, however, it was restored. It is the shrine of St. John of Beverley, who died A.D. 721. In 938 Athelstan, first monarch of England, gave several privileges to the Monastery, one being the conferring on it the privilege of Sanctuary. This was not merely for manslaying, it was open to all wrong-doers except those who had been guilty of treason. For ordinary offences, such as horse stealing, cattle stealing, being backward in accounts, or being in receipt of suspected goods, a man came into sanctuary about a mile from the Monastery or church. There used to be four crosses upon the main roads leading to Beverley, marking the limit of the area. The well-preserved one in our illustration stands in a field on the York Road, a little over a mile from the gate shown here. Another stood on the road to Ferriby, where at one time a ferry conveyed passengers over to Lincolnshire, where there is a road running south. The place of the other crosses is uncertain; it is, however, more than likely that one would be placed on the road to Hull and the other on the road to Driffield. In cases of manslaughter and murder it was not sufficient to be within one of these crosses. Before the fugitive could claim sanctuary he must enter the church and seat himself in the stone chair, known as the "Frid stool" or "Freed chair." The photograph here given is that of the old chair as it is still to be seen behind the choir in the Minster.

To this place many fled for refuge from all parts of the country. There are records of how in their flight they would leave their horses at one stage, and steal another to take them on their journey to the next. They were not very hotly pursued, because by their flight they forfeited their goods and chattels to the King: to say nothing of the King's officers, who would doubtless get a picking. In the course of time it became necessary to register them, and there are several interesting documents extant showing who they were and what they did. The earliest recorded list at Beverley dates from A D. 1478-1539. There are 469 cases recorded during that period, or an average of nearly eight per year. How many there may have been before that period is not known, but it is more than likely that the percentage would be much higher.

SANCTUARY CROSS, BEVERLEY.

Digitized by Google

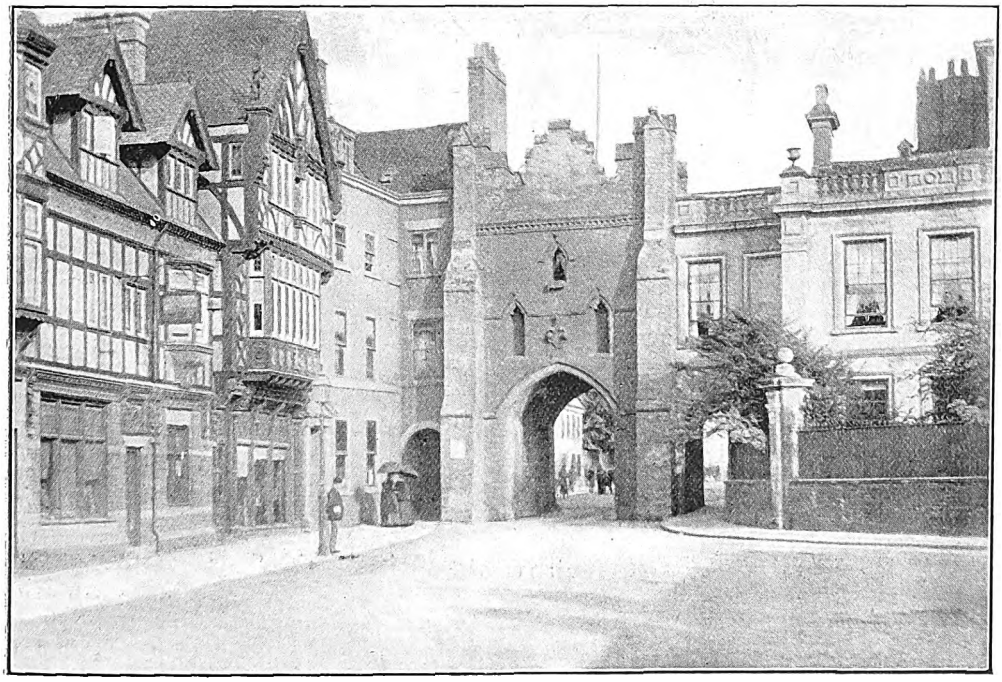
From the ancient records we gather that sanctuary was limited to forty days, during which the fugitive had to appear before the officer appointed, clothed in sackcloth, to confess his guilt, and take an oath to adjure the realm. In 1530 an Act was passed imposing the penalty of being branded upon the brawn of the thumb with the letter A. If they tarried beyond the time limit they were denied adjuration, and it was unlawful for any-one to furnish them with food. Still, in many cases they did tarry, were fed, and not a few became burgesses of Beverley. During the forty days, too, the Church would intercede for them, and arrangements were generally made for them to atone for their sins. Should these pleadings prove of no avail, and they be sentenced to leave the country, they would take their way to the port of Hull, bearing before them a cross, to show that they were under the protection of the Church. At Hull, arrangements were made to ship them to a land where, let us hope, they would begin a new and better life.

The present Minster, as it appears in our illustration, was commenced in the early part of the reign of Henry III. There are many things of interest connected with Beverley. In 1405 Henry IV. visited it, and again in 1408. In 1421 Henry V., accompanied by his Queen, visited the shrine of St. John. In 1488 Mother Shipton was born, and baptized by the Abbot of Beverley. The earliest account of a printing-press, north of the Trent, is of one at Beverley in 1509. It is a quaint old place, full of interest. Its Westwood is one of the finest open spaces in the country, and is the spot where the Minster should be viewed from. There is an ancient church besides its Minster, full of beauty and well worth a visit. This, however, has no connection with Beverley as a city of refuge.



THE GATEWAY, BEVERLEY.

Digitized by Google

On Mean Means.

AN ECONOMIST.

I MAY explain that I make my living by pulling disused meat, sweet, and other cans to pieces, and making them into price tickets for green and tea grocers, butchers, and other tradesmen. Now as the resulting profit is so small the utmost economy must be observed if solvency is to be retained. I am an old bachelor living alone in a house of but one room—the smallest house, I believe, in the county of Essex. I thought I would give my weekly housekeeping budget to the public, as the element of the actual seems to be so frequently absent from lists of poor people's expenditure :—

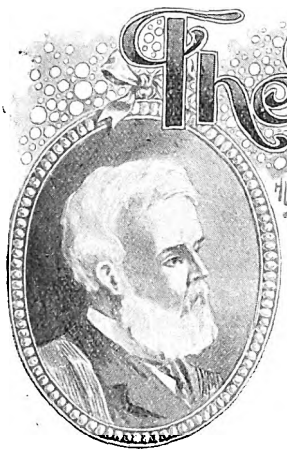
	s.	d.
Bread, seven half-quarterns... ...	1	5½
Butter, ½ lb.	0	6
Tea, 6 oz.	0	6
Milk	0	1½
Coals, ¾ cwt.	1	0¾
Paraffin oil	0	3
Tobacco...	0	6
Blacking, soap, matches, blacklead	0	0¾
Rent	1	6
Total	5	11½

As an instance of loose writing on this subject, a letter lately appeared in the Daily Mail, professing to record a poor man's weekly payments, containing the item "lucifer matches, 2½d.," from which it would seem that he used twenty boxes of matches a week. One box lasts me a fortnight. Sugar I have relinquished, one consequence being that eczema is held at arm's length. I do not contend that laborious work could be done on my dietary scale, but it is what I have to live on, having, seven years ago, taken to a trade which barely keeps body and soul together, and out of which I do not know how to get. An "excavator" once said to me: "When I first went navvying I used to reckon a shilling would just get me a dinner; that was, a pound of beef, a half-quartern loaf, and a pot of beer." A navvy's exercise would be requisite for anyone wishing for sufficient appetite for such a meal. I have had a good deal of enforced experience, and I believe my list is the lowest that ordinary work can be performed upon. I find tea is the most economical beverage, cocoa takes too much milk, and coffee too much trouble. I have many and many a day lived on dry bread, but it is not sufficient to work on; one can distend the stomach with bread alone, yet afterwards feel unsatisfied and irritable; in fact, broken is the grand old rule that a healthy person has no business to know that he has any inside. Butter or cheese supplies what is required, butter being the most economical, as cheese goes at the rate of a pennyworth a meal.

It has often been thrown at me that if any man won't work, neither shall he eat; but it is quite as true that "If any will not eat, neither shall he work."

A TINWORKER.

Digitized by Google



The People's Friend

OR,

The Adventures of Carlton-Hawes.

By CHARLES HERBERT.

III.

"I CAN'T understand it, so there!" exclaims Mrs. Wright, with irritation in every tone. "When my husband was alive I had only to ask and to have; now I'm perpetually told 'the business cannot afford it.'"

The young manager standing before her looks rather cynical as he hears the remark, and answers with a tinge of bitterness in his tone, "I am doing all I can to make the business pay, Mrs. Wright, and I am very sorry for the worry you have over it. Wouldn't it be better for you perhaps to sell it?" This last with emphasis.

A young lady, who till now has been seated at the table, drumming idly upon it with her fingers, looks up suspiciously at this remark and its emphatic tone, and the manager, catching her glance, colours deeply.

"But, Mr. Bertram, if the business is going down in the way you say," she interrupts, "what is it likely to fetch?" And she fixes upon the manager a glance of suspicious questioning that makes him feel decidedly uncomfortable.

"It is impossible to say, Miss Somers," he replies; "but of course it would not fetch anything like the price it would have done some time back."

"Precisely!" Miss Somers retorts jerkily. "Nothing like the price it would have fetched before it got into your hands to manage."

The implication was unmistakeable, and without replying the manager turns in some confusion to Mrs. Wright, who hastily says: "Oh, do be quiet, Mabel! I believe Mr. Bertram has done his best; but business is slow, and perhaps, after all, it will be well to try and sell it. I don't mind parting with the business if you can get a good price for it, Mr. Bertram. Suppose you try? Anything will be better than this everlasting worry."

"I will do everything I can," he answers, and with a kindly smile from his employer and a freezing bow from Mabel Somers he departs, but in such evident nervousness that immediately the door closes upon him the two women look at one another and laugh.

"Ah! it is all very well for you to laugh, Nellie," says Mabel. "I believe that Arthur Bertram has not acted straight over that business. I never liked him. Why"—disgustedly—"the creature cannot even look one in the face for a moment without dropping his eyes."

"Rubbish!" exclaims Nellie flippantly. "My husband thought the world of him, and I never knew him to make the least mistake in his estimate of anyone."

"Well, my dear, we shall see!" returned her young sister, with the tone of her voice expressing the adamantine unconvincibility of the unconvinced.

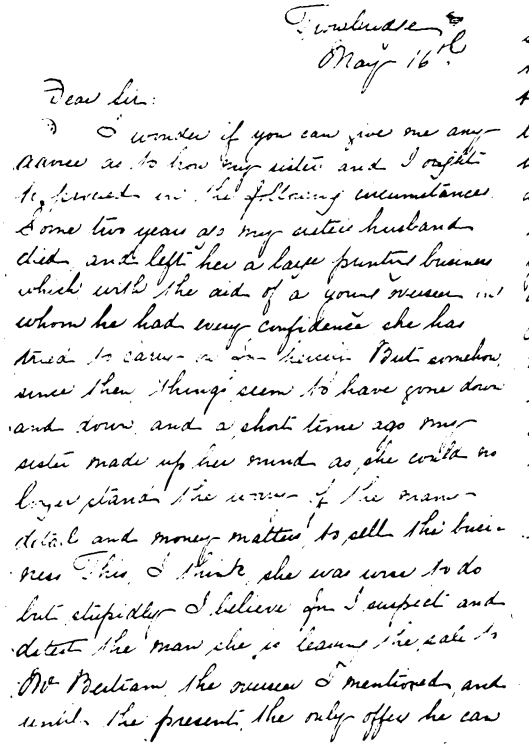
. . . . .

Four weeks later Carlton-Hawes was in his office, wading through a mass of correspondence, and as he laid down one letter out of the huge bundle he exclaims, "Faugh! Another case of 'left in the hands of women!' Whenever will husbands learn to be more sensible? If they saw as much of the business incapacity of women as I do it would be a shock to them."

All Rights Reserved in Great Britain and the United States.

Digitized by Google

And he again peruses the letter thoughtfully.



Fowlsdale
May 16th

Dear Sir:

I wonder if you can give me any advice as to how my sister and I ought to proceed in the following circumstances. Some two years ago my sister's husband died, and left her a large printing business which with the aid of a young person in whom he had every confidence she has tried to carry on since. But somehow since then things seem to have gone down and down, and a short time ago my sister made up her mind as she could no longer stand the worry of the financial and money matters to sell the business. This I think she was wise to do but stupidly I believe for I suspect and detest the man she is leasing the sale to Mr Bertram the person I mentioned, and until the present the only offer he can finds it worse to get money out of the business, now that her husband is dead, secure is £2.500. For I have a strong impression that if we let it go in that he will to make a good deal of money out of the business himself. For my sister often heard her husband declare that it was worth at least £4.000. Nellie my sister does not know I am writing to you, but I want you to tell me whether you can think of any way in which we can keep a check on what he does. Nellie will have no other means except what she gets out of the business and a small annuity and as I live with her you will naturally understand why I am so anxious to make her see that she cannot trust him. I could say a great deal more if I could see you. Will you make an appointment with me, and talk it over?

Yours faithfully,
Mabel Somers.

Mr Carlton-Hawes.

"Poor women!" he thinks. "It looks as if they were in the hands of some unscrupulous rascal, and I'll bowl him out if I can."

And he writes her to come and see him.

The next Tuesday she enters Carlton-Hawes's office, who regards her with a slightly puzzled glance when she is shown in. From her letter he had expected to see a lady somewhat severe of aspect and suspicious of look—but this young and radiant vision of loveliness! Smilingly he gives her a chair, then produces her letter from a pigeon-hole, and settling back in his seat with a professional air, he says:—

"Now, Miss Somers—to business! You wish, I believe, to give me further information with regard to this rascal Bertram."

"Yes, that's just what he is!" she exclaims, eagerly. "I believe he is just trying to get the business and ourselves into his power. Nellie has had an awful difficulty with him. She declares she than when he was alive. I believe he wanted to drive her to sell, and to sell it through him, so that he could make a good thing out of it."

"Possibly," exclaims Carlton-Hawes. "But who is this Mr. Bertram? What makes you think that he would be a man likely to act as you say?"

"Well, the very first time I met him I took a great dislike to him. And if you could see him for yourself I don't think you would wonder! He drops his eyes whenever you look at him, as though he thought that you were suspecting him, and that in itself is a suspicious sign. And taking into account his conduct to my sister, it seems to me only reasonable that he is a man who ought to be watched. There is his photograph!"

Carlton-Hawes takes it and regards it fixedly for a few moments, then he lays it down and begins to think. "It certainly does not look like the face of a man who would do a shabby action," he ponders, and furtively he looks at the face of the girl before him as though to scan whether she is likely to have formed an impulsive estimate of the other's character and motives. "Well!" he exclaims at last, to the eagerly waiting girl, "it is an easy matter to find out. I will undertake to look into this matter, and let you know the results. I presume the sale of the business has been advertised, and, if so, you had better let me have a copy of the advertisement; then I will see what I can do. Meanwhile, keep your sister from selling, whatever you do."

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

. . . .

Three days later Arthur Bertram receives a rather belated reply to his advertisement from a firm of agents Carlton-Hawes employs to hide his own personality, and, frowning as he read it, casts it aside in irritable fashion, muttering, "No one shall get it into their hands if I can help it." One day, two days pass, it is almost a week since their communication, and at last, thinking the suspicions of the girl must be well grounded, Carlton-Hawes decides to visit the Trowbridge Press as the representative of his agents. Nothing rouses him like injustice to a woman, and he is prepared to go any lengths to unveil the villiany of this scoundrel. So inwardly boiling with indignation he sends in the card of the agents, and ask to see Mr. Bertram. Immediately Carlton-Hawes meets him, he is distinctly impressed by his appearance, but remembering that the best of men may trip into villainy "when it is in the power of their hand," he proceeds deliberately: "We sent a reply to your advertisement the other day, and as it seems a likely thing for a client of ours, we though it best that I should run down and have a look into things. Why did you not reply?"

And he looks him straight in the face.

Arthur Bertram hesitates, and his hesitation produces a bad impression upon Carlton-Hawes.

"Well, to tell the truth," says the manager at last, "we have already received a very good offer, and——"

"Perhaps our client can go one better," interrupts the other suavely. "At any rate, as I am here I should like to be put in possession of particulars."

Arthur Bertram looks rather annoyed, but says: "I shall, of course, be pleased to answer any questions." And at once Carlton-Hawes begins to ply him with queries as to the returns of the shop and works, the book-debts, the expenses of working the business, the rent and rates, and so forth—to all of which he gives straightforward and ready replies.

Carlton-Hawes listens, and begins to be exceedingly mystified. If all these statements are true, the business is not worth anything like the £4,000 mentioned by Mabel Somers, and the man who has offered £2,000 is little short of a madman.

"Have you had many offers?" he enquires.

The other looks dubious. "Scarcely a fair question, is it?" says he. "We certainly have had, and are considering one very decent offer. What, may I ask, do you feel inclined to offer for the business?"

"What is the lowest you will take?" —quickly.

"What do you say to £3,000?" queries the other, anxiously.

"Just a half too much. That is all," says Carlton-Hawes, firmly.

"I have had £2,000 offered already," says Arthur Bertram, triumphantly.

"Why even £1,500 would be a fancy price for it, man; the business is so clearly going down!"

"Think so?" returns Mr. Bertram; then, off his guard, he adds impulsively: "It never shall go down while I can help it."

Like lightning Carlton-Hawes sees the implication in the words, and says: "Oh, so you have an interest in the business yourself, have you?"

The other flushes and answers: "How do you know that?"

"Simply because if another man bought it you would not be sure of being in the position to 'help it' or not any longer. But if you think that you can succeed in future why haven't you in the past?" —suspiciously.

"That is my affair!" returns the manager haughtily, "and if you have nothing further to offer I may as well bid you good morning!"

"Come, come, Mr. Bertram," Carlton-Hawes continues quietly. "It is a pitiable thing to see a young man like you letting down a business to get it into your own hands." Sternly: "What if I were to make it my duty to see your employers, whoever they are, and tell them?"

"But for answer Arthur Bertram looks

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

him straight in the face and says, "Then that would be the worst day's work they ever did in their lives. If they listened to you, that is. You are only a stranger to me, but I cannot stand such an imputation from a stranger." And he turns on his heel and leaves Carlton-Hawes decidedly puzzled.

"Wanted, a motive!" mutters Carlton-Hawes, as he journeys back to London by the next train. "Of course, it will be an easy matter to write Mabel Somers that I have discovered the business is worth no more than, and not so much as, is offered for it. But it is clear he is buying it for himself, or someone who has an interest with him. I should say offhand that he has let the business down with that intention, but the man doesn't look that kind. I must send Allcott down to enquire into his character and the antecedents of Mrs. Wright's husband and the business. I'll get to the bottom of it somehow. If he has been letting it down, I'll get another man for them, and he can work it up for them instead of selling."

Three days later, he sits in his office receiving his man's report, who rapidly reads from a note-book.

"Went down Trowbridge. Gossipped around. Business established some years. Better once. Two rivals in town now. Former proprietor drank a little. Speculated good deal. Generally lucky. Present manager well spoken of. Member of chapel. Generous giver. Specially lately. Lived with uncle till recently, when uncle died. Uncle miserly wretch. Thought it likely left manager money. Looked it up. Found it so. Down in will £3,000. That's all, sir!"

"Very well!" says Carlton-Hawes. "Leave your note. "I'll think it out."

He sits there for half an hour, then taking out and reading Mabel Somers' letter, he says: "Of course the husband when alive could have let his wife have more money from his speculations, which accounts for her having no such bother as at present. Then the rival shops account for damage number two. His uncle's money furnishes the means of buying the business. But why does the fellow want to buy a rotting concern at a fancy price — especially with all these odds against him?"

And again he falls musing. Presently he smiles broadly, muttering "that might be the explanation certainly," and as he recalls a certain remark of Mabel Somers —"He drops his eyes whenever you look at him"—he thinks he sees a light.

Carlton-Hawes is nothing if not rapid, so a wire brings Miss Mabel up to town on mischief bent.

"Well?" she says merrily, as she steps into the sanctum of the sage and drops the man of mystery a mocking curtsey. So radiant and so young does she look that Carlton-Hawes catches the infection and smiles brightly in return. "You have found something out?" she says, breathlessly.

He nods.

"But not what you expected. The business would be dear at £1,500."

Her face falls.

"Then why," she asks, "did anyone offer more?"

"No outsider did. Mr. Bertram is buying it himself—and I must say I think him very foolish. There are the rival shops now, and the business is not likely to be what it was."

She looks more amazed than ever.

"Where is he getting his money?" she asks. "I always thought him poor. They lived in a wretched house."

"Uncle died—I understand he was a bit of a miser. At any rate, he left him enough to buy this business. Now look here, Miss Mabel"—lightly—"please don't talk, but listen. I want to tell you a story."

With a pretty little shrug of her shoulders she is all attention.

"Once upon a time," he says, "as they say in the fairy tales, but this is no fairy tale, there was an agent put in charge of a market-garden by the owner when he died. For a little while all went well, but the owner's wife soon found the profits were far less than her husband had been in the habit of giving her. She did not know that her husband has given her more from other sources that ceased at his death, and imagined that all the money had come from the market-garden. Seeing she expected so much, the agent tried to give it her, but later on the money he had given her was wanted to restock the grounds and pay the heavy working expenses, and, as he could not get it, debts increased, and the grounds could not be stocked. As a matter of course the business decreased and her worries increased. At last she said, 'It will be better to sell this market-garden and live on what I can get from it. I will ask the agent to sell it for me.' But when he tried he could get no offers; so he said within himself: 'The mistress and her beautiful daughter whom I love must be helped, and I have just sufficient to enable me to buy it. I will give them more than it is worth for the love that I bear to the daughter.' And he did so. But by some means or other the daughter heard of it, and the story says it won her heart at once."

Digitized by Google

There was a moment or two's quiet in the dim room, during which Carlton-Hawes drums the table with his fingers; then he says—

"Do you think it was strange of the daughter?"

"Not at all!" she replies. "Very natural!"

"Then," he answers, "go thou and do likewise! For that is the story of your sister's business. The agent is Mr. Bertram, and you are the sister instead of the daughter."

She springs to her feet with heightened colour, crying, "Are you quite sure of this?"

"I feel sure that is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth! You told me he could not look you in the face, but when I went down he was straightforward enough. A man of rare decision, whose face is the face of a good man. He could hold his own with me at any rate. I made enquiries that show me my reading of his character is correct, and the only motive for his foolish action must be his interest in you. Come, young lady! Look back a bit and see if you can't remember some incidents that back up my belief." She sits a minute or so, with her colour coming and going, then says, "I believe you are right, and"—looking at him in startled fashion—"I—I have been blaming and suspecting him."

"Well, well," he says, cheerily, rising and holding out his hand. "Change the verb suspect to the verb 'to love.'"

She goes to the door in shame-faced fashion, all her confidence gone; then on the threshold she looks back and says: "But—all the trouble—you must have taken—I am in your debt. What is your charge?" And she fumbles for her purse.

He steps to her side and says simply: "A slice of your wedding-cake when you can send it, and please let it be soon!"

Six months later he has it, and Mr. and Mrs. Bertram join the crowd to whom the thought of Carlton-Hawes is as the fragrance of a flower.

Digitized by Google

Bishop's Stortford College.

A GREAT NONCONFORMIST COLLEGE.

THE school which was opened in 1868 grew out of one which had previously existed. This, known as the Collegiate School, owed its origin, in 1850, to the desire of some of the townsmen of Stortford to obtain better means of education than then existed. This school attained a fair measure of success under the headmastership of J. Bell, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, and turned out such men as Prof. A. S. Wilkins, of Owens College, and Rev. W. Field, M.A., for some time Headmaster of Silcoates. In 1868 a movement was set on foot among Nonconformists in the Eastern counties to provide facilities for the education of their sons which would enable them to obtain a public school education without exposing them to influences calculated to undermine their Nonconformity. This movement resulted in the establishment of a company—the East of England Nonconformist School Company, Limited—to provide such schools throughout the Eastern Counties. Among those who took a prominent part were Mr. E. Grimwade, of Ipswich, and Mr. Samuel Morley, of London. They were helped by Rev. W. Cuthbertson, then minister at Bishop's Stortford, and he reported to them that the Collegiate School was suitable for their purpose. These buildings and grounds were therefore acquired, and the school refounded as the Nonconformist Grammar School, and the Rev. R. Alliott, M.A., was appointed to the headmastership. Mr. Alliott, whose father, grandfather, and great-grandfather had all been ministers, was educated at Bedford Grammar School, and was then a minister at Knutsford. The school, when he started, contained only about twenty-five boys; but from the first was an enormous success, and in 1875 had grown to such an extent that enlargement of the premises became necessary. The school was affected by the agricultural depression which set in in the early eighties, but always maintained a good number of boys, and the results of its education and training were most satisfactory. During Mr. Alliott's headmastership several scholars who have since become well known passed through the school—Rev. W. E. Blomfield, of Coventry; Rev. J. W. Ewing, of Wandsworth; Mr. W. B. Hayward, the headmaster of Blackheath; and C. D. Whittaker, the headmaster of Taunton. Mr. Alliott resigned in 1899, owing to ill-health, after thirty-one years' work, and only survived his resignation one month. After careful consideration the directors choose Mr. F. S. Young, M.A., himself an old Stortfordian and pupil of Mr. Alliott's, in his place.

A VIEW OF THE COLLEGE.

Digitized by Google

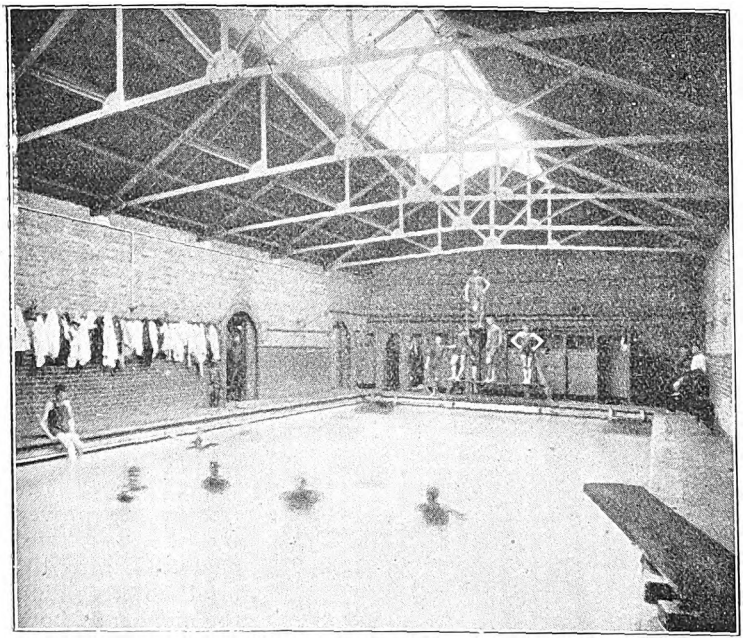
F. S. YOUNG, ESQ., M.A.
Headmaster.

As a boy he was a leader in all departments of school life, captain of cricket and football elevens, as well as head of the school, and at the close of his school life an open science scholarship at Queen's College, Oxford, attested the value of his work and training at Bishop's Stortford. On leaving Oxford, he was appointed science master at Mill Hill, a post which he only resigned on his selection as headmaster, to take up the work which Mr. Alliott had made of such importance. At Mill Hill, in addition to his science work, he devoted himself to the organisation of the games, basing his work upon the principle of seeing that every boy, and not only those of special capacity, had his share of attention and took his share in this important part of school life. Changes are always a severe test of an institution, but that the foundation had been laid by good workmanship has been abundantly proved by the last two years. During the brief interregnum, the number of boys had decreased somewhat, but instead of the 86 in January, 1900, there are now 130.

The ideals which Mr. Young has set before himself are high, and therefore not easy of accomplishment; but he has brought to his task strength of purpose, practical experience, and full acquaintance with the problems that have to be faced, and with the solutions that the great examples of the teaching profession have found for them.

Just before Mr. Young's headmastership, in 1894, some additions had been made to the school. Up till that time the grounds had been confined to a gravel playground and a playing-field of about two acres. Another field was now acquired, and on part of it a swimming-bath built. This is one of the buildings of which the school is justly proud, and it is an institution which is greatly appreciated by the boys. It cost over £2,000, is 60 feet by 30 feet, and as the water is heated it can be used all the year round. Swimming races are held in the summer term.

Digitized by Google



THE SWIMMING BATH.

Since Mr. Young's headmastership improvements have again been effected. The first was the addition of science rooms, comprising physical and chemical laboratories and lecture theatre. Then the living accommodation was altered, at the same time giving far larger and better class-rooms. Formerly, the studies were built over the class-rooms in a building outside the schoolhouse. The whole of this block was converted into class-rooms, and the studies built in the school-house. This enabled the school-house to hold over eighty boarders, in the opinion of Mr. Young one of the greatest moves forward. He believes that the principle of large houses is false. It prevents the house-master from knowing his boys properly, prevents the ideal system—the provision of as near an approximation as possible to home life, and renders necessary what Thring expressively described as "barrack discipline." Further, if good masters are to be attracted, prospects must be offered them, and the opportunity of a boarding-house of their own provides this. About the same time as the other additions a gymnasium was fitted up, and the new field acquired in 1895 levelled and turfed. This increased greatly the provision for school recreations and games.

A short time ago it was obvious that the school-house would not much longer contain room for the increasing number of boarders. A preparatory school was therefore acquired, in which all boys under twelve are placed. This has only just been opened in the charge of a house-master, and the large number of entries secured in the first term makes the success certain.

As the school-house still almost full, notwithstanding the acquisition of the preparatory school, it is expected that another boarding-house will shortly have to be opened.

The generous help of the governing body, and the loyal support of the parents, have been freely accorded to the headmaster's efforts; and last, but by no means least, the enthusiastic and effective co-operation of the assistant masters. In all ways the hopes for the school's future are high.

It may not be out of place to give some details of the boys' life. As has been stated, there are at present two houses for boarders, the school-house, and Newbury House for the boys in the preparatory school. In the school-house are about eighty boys; at Newbury House, at present, eight; and there are forty-two day boys—eight in the preparatory school and thirty-four in the college. The school-house is under the control of the headmaster, who is helped by two other masters, while the college day boys are, for purposes of discipline, work, and games, constituted a house under a house-master, whose special duty it is to interest himself in all the life of his boys. This system, which was but recently introduced, gives promise of working admirably, and has been welcomed by the day boys.

It is an essential principle of the school that as much as possible should be entrusted to the monitors. The monitors are responsible for general discipline in the house when the house-master is not with the boys taking preparation or otherwise engaged with them. This does not by any means imply that the headmaster does not know his boys: he comes into contact intimately with them at a large number of times. He endeavours to know as much as possible of each boy in relation to every part of his school life. In a public school, however, if it is to train boys for after life, when they will have to "do that which is right in their own eyes," the boys must be trusted, and with a good monitorial system this can be done to a very large extent. Such a system, it is believed, has been developed at Bishop's Stortford during the last two years, and no small part of the good work done has been due to the monitors. They are close to the headmaster, in consultation with the head or two head monitors, and are not only confined to or necessarily chosen from the sixth, but may be chosen from the fifth form; fitness to govern being the guiding principle of the choice. The monitors and sixth form have studies, and also, as far as they are available, boys in the fifth. The rest of the fifth form live in a common room of their own; the rest of the school-house boarders in the big school-room.

Digitized by Google

THE RACQUET COURT.

In the summer work commences at 7.15, when preparation is taken by the headmaster or one of the masters in the house. This, however, is not taken in the two winter terms, but the day commences with prayers in the house at 7.50. Breakfast is at 8. At 9 the whole school assemble in the big school for prayer before morning school. This lasts from 9.10 until 12.25, and is divided into four periods of forty-five minutes each, with an interval of five minutes between each. At 12.25 forms are free, and gymnasium instruction, choral singing, and various duties fill in the time until dinner. Most boys are free entirely, however, four days in the week, and play cricket, football, fives, etc. On summer afternoons school is from 2.30 till 4.5, and the rest of the time, from 4.5 until 6.30, given to games; but in the two winter terms school is from 4 till 5.40, and the time for games between dinner and school. Tea is at 6 in the winter and 6.30 in the summer term. Evening preparation is from 6.30 till 8 in the winter, and 7 to 8.15 in the summer. The forms up to the fourth are supervised by a house-master, while the fifth and sixth forms are by themselves, in their room or studies. Prayers are taken by the headmaster in the school-house after preparation. Then comes supper, and boys below the upper third go to bed. They have a dormitory to themselves, and are not afterwards disturbed. The rest of the boys are free to utilise the time after supper until 9.45 as they please. It perhaps gives an appearance of greater efficiency if fixed rules are made for the employment of boys at this time, but if a boy is not allowed to take the initiative in spending his time at some part of the day, the boy with originality is handicapped seriously; and, again, it must be remembered that the great object of the training at school is to teach self-reliance and a sense of duty to train him for that time afterwards when he will depend on himself. At 9.45 all go to bed. The monitors are mainly responsible for the discipline, but the masters go in and out. The headmaster takes one dormitory, and one of the masters in the schoolhouse another. At 10.15 the monitors stop all talking. There are few parts of the school to which greater attention is paid by masters and monitors, and this will be appreciated by all who understand school life.

Digitized by Google

Much more might be written on the life of the school. All is, however, subsidiary to the real issue, to which all the many and various departments of the life are aids—the work, the play, the societies, the recreations—the influence on them for good or ill. This influence will be exerted by the general spirit of the school, and, secondly, by personal contact and help. It is this latter which the headmaster most strongly believes. Unless a headmaster, or indeed any master, can sympathise with a boy, realising all his difficulties and trials, and is one whom the boys feel that they can approach for advice and help, he fails in the most important of his duties. If boys are entrusted to him by the parents, he must take the place of the parents, and they would be poor parents of whom their boys simply stood in awe, and in whom they did not feel they had a friend. A wise parent will be firm, strong to rebuke evil, yet sympathetic, and yielding everything to his boy's ultimate good; and a schoolmaster must try to take his place. This is the ideal aimed at by Bishop's Stortford. It is like all other ideals, one which no human can perfectly realise, for even the ideal parent does not exist. Yet, on making all the arrangements—buildings, teaching, rules, absolutely everything in fact—helpful in striving to realise this ideal, the future of Bishop's Stortford College will depend.

GETTING UP STEAM FOR MISCHIEF.

Digitized by Google

The Needle's Eye

by

FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER I.

A WINTRY DAWNING.

ABOVE blazed myriad stars set close in a heaven of infinite darkness; below shone the dimly luminous face of earth, piled high with fresh-fallen snow. Betwixt the two a bitter blast whined fitfully, the snow leaping up in misty swirls to greet it, only to sink again in fantastic ripples and curiously-wrought crests in fence-corners and hollows.

Erastus Winch emerged from his house into this mystery of cold and night, and stood for an instant, staring about him with the blank, unseeing eyes of one newly aroused from sleep. The wind hurled itself upon his heavy, stoop-shouldered figure, tearing savagely at his garments, which became on the instant all white and sparkling with the trans-figuring snow-crystals. He raised his smoky lantern that he might consult the thermometer, which rattled uneasily on its rusty nail beside the door. "Five below!" he ejaculated, scowling at the unoffending register of temperature. "Humph!"

The immediate result of his subsequent cogitations appeared in a brisk reopening of the closed door. "'Liz'beth! I say, 'Liz'beth! Be ye goin' to lay abed all day? It's more'n four o'clock a'ready; ye'd ought to have yer fire a-roarin' by this time. Consarn it! didn't I tell ye yiste'day I was goin' to kill to-day?"

The sound of stove-lids and poker in active co-operation appearing sufficient answer to this harangue, the door clapped to a second time, and, without further pause the man plunged into the drifted path leading to the barn, which loomed huge and black amid the spectral whiteness of the surroundings. As he opened the door with difficulty, because of the clogging snow, a mingled odour of hay and feed, of steaming bodies of cattle and horses, of harnesses and waggons, grease-besmeared; of huddled fowls, of nests and haunts of swallows, rats and mice—an odour indescribable and not to be mistaken—in a word, the smell of a barn, as tightly closed as possible against wind and cold, rushed out like an invisible presence to greet him.

Erastus Winch loved this smell, though he was doubtless unaware of the fact; it was the pleasantly suggestive odour of "prop'ty"—as he was wont to term his material possessions. With the odour came sounds, also indicative of the presence of "prop'ty." There was a subdued but expectant stirring in the darkness, a noise of shuffling hoofs, of deep-chested breathing, of heavy bodies rubbing uneasily against frosty stalls, of grunting and squealing from the pen of the condemned swine, the quick flutter of wings, and the shrill note of the cock challenging the familiar twinkle of the smoky lantern. Pleasant sounds every one, and as welcome to the ear of the farmer as the "All's well!" to the sailor on board his flying vessel, or the long-drawn call of the muezzin to the inhabitants of an Eastern city.

The master of the barn responded to these tokens of fealty from his dumb slaves after the manner of his kind. "Whoa, thar!" he bawled, loudly, as he set down his lantern on a convenient barrel. "Ha'n't ye got no more sense 'an to tear yer insides out, ye tarsal critters?"

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

There being manifestly no possible answer to this inquiry, the man proceeded to his task of forking down hay into the mangers, of measuring grain and chopping turnips for the hungry cattle. In the midst of these operations another sound smote upon his ears, a sound which caused his heaped measure to drop from his shaking fingers. It was unmistakably the cry of a young infant. It seemed to arise from the black depths of the hay-mow.

Now, if there be anything on earth more helpless or more harmless than the young of the human species, it is yet to be found. Perhaps because of this, a baby's cry shakes the soul of a man and wrings the heart of a woman. Erastus Winch had heard this sound once before on a winter's morning—a single cry, then silence. Whether he would or not, in the stillness that followed this singular interruption of his labours, he lived over again the hour which saw his own only child breathe and wail—once.

He frowned as he refilled the measure. "I hope I ain't fallin' into the ways of them fool spiritoolists," he muttered. Enlivened by the humour of this conceit, he called loudly upon the poultry to approach and be fed. Sounds of satisfaction, of greed, of anxiety, of anger, arose here and there from feathered throats. Into the midst of the clamour struck again that other sound, faint, yet insistent, the cry of the helpless human atom newly arrived out of eternity. The man seized his lantern and strode determinedly towards the hay-mow. "I ain't no fool," he strenuously assured himself. "If thar's anythin' in that thar hay 'sides fodder, I'll find it, or my name ain't Winch."

There was something. Having found it, he stood stark still for a full minute, at a loss for words of sufficient significance to express his wonder. What he saw by the light of the lantern was solemn enough and mysterious enough and sad enough to have melted a heart of stone. Lying on the hay at his feet was the form of a woman. This much he saw at a glance; then his amazed eyes told him more. This motionless figure was not huddled frowsily together, after the manner of homeless vagabonds who take refuge from the storm and cold in the first rude shelter that offers; it lay upon its rude couch in the majestic attitude of a queen, who, having relinquished an earthly crown, passes on into kingdoms eternal.

The woman was dead—this much was evident even to the dull perceptions of Erastus Winch. He stared at the still loveliness of the white face unwinkingly. "What—what——" he muttered, stammering thickly in his bewilderment. Then he stooped to draw aside the folds of a heavy cloak which concealed something that had hitherto escaped his notice. The something stirred feebly, and for the third time sent forth its piteous appeal for human aid.

"'Liz'beth! 'Lizbeth!"

The woman turned quickly from the hot stove where she was superintending the frying of the matutinal pork. She recognised in the tones the familiar appeal of masculine inability to feminine efficiency. "Wall, 'Rastus," she said, resignedly, "what's happened now?"

"What's happened!" repeated the man, stamping the snow off his cowhide boots with vicious emphasis. "You kin well ask! Say! how many tarnation times hev I got to tell ye to lock the door to the barn? You must ha' left it open agin las' night when you fed the calves, and a tramp's got in thar an' died."

"You don't say!" The woman's hands were uplifted, sympathy and horror dawned in her dim eyes. "In the barn! An' we asleep an' warm in our bed! Why didn't the poor fellow come to the house? He could ha' slep' by the kitchen stove 's well as not."

"Not much he couldn't," growled her husband, unwinding the woollen comforter from about his neck. "'Tain't a man, anyhow; it's a woman, an' thar's a baby. Come now, ye don't need to fly off the handle like that; if 'tain't dead a'ready, 'twill be time you see it. I want my breakfast first thing, d'ye hear?"

The woman had snatched up the lantern, and, casting the skirt of her calico gown over her head in feeble defiance of the storm, was already out of hearing.

"Women are such consarned fools!" soliloquised Erastus Winch, regarding the frying-pan sourly. "Pork a-burnin' an' everythin' goin' to thunder, an' they don't keer, ef thar's a baby in a hunderd miles of 'em!"

He clumsily removed the smoking utensil from its position over the blazing sticks, spattering his hands with the boiling fat as he did so—a circumstance which by no means soothed his already ruffled temper. After which he followed his wife in her hasty flight to the scene of the tragedy, communing with himself as he went concerning the unforeseen circumstance which had threatened to upset his plans anent the inmates of the pig-sty.

Digitized by Google

Elizabeth Winch had found her way to the side of the dead woman, where, first wrapping the baby in warm arms of compassion, she stood gazing into the white purity of the sleeping face.

"Lord save us!" she was murmuring to herself. "Now, did you ever! Poor thing—an' we asleep an' warm in our bed."

"Twa'n't our fault," said her husband, sulkily eyeing the dead woman, whom he conceived on the instant to be the cause of his smarting fingers as well as of his disordered plans. "S'pose I'll hev to hitch up fust thing an' git the cor'ner up here," he continued, with rising irritation. "What bizniss had the likes of her to come sneakin' 'bout other folks' prop'ty—and the poorhouse not a mile further on! The Lord knows I pay taxes 'nough to git quit of paupers, dead or 'live!"

"Now, 'Rastus," protested his wife, "prob'bly the poor critter couldn't walk another step. But, land! I musn't stan' here; she's stun dead—that's plain; but this 'ere baby's as live as a cricket—poor lamb!"

"That young 'un's a-goin' to the poorhouse, soon's I c'n git my breakfas' an' hitch," quoth the man loudly. But Elizabeth, being a thin, agile woman, was again out of hearing.

He repeated his words with added emphasis half-an-hour later. The two had partaken of their meal in haste and silence, the woman casting an occasional glance toward the wooden rocking-chair, where, warmly covered, the waif slept quietly.

Erastus Winch had followed these glances with frowning eyes. Now he pushed back his chair with a loud, scraping sound, and deliberately wiped his mouth upon the back of his hand. This was the familiar signal for a prompt renewal of the grinding labour which made up their daily lives. Elizabeth was wont to respond by springing at once from her chair and instituting a vigorous attack upon the breakfast dishes. This morning she sat still in her place; her eyes, as she lifted them to her husband's face, shone with an unaccustomed light.

"'Rastus," she began timidly, "I wish—that is, I've been a-thinkin' that——"

"Yes!" broke in the man, noisily ruminating the departing flavours of his recent meal; "I know what you've been a-thinkin' well 'nough. You want I should 'low ye to keep that thar young 'un; but I ain't a-goin' to do it. It'll start fur the poorhouse in jes' ten minits f'om now. I'll stop to Dundor's on the way back, an' he'll see to gittin' the corpse away."

He paused with his hand upon the latch, and fixed his greenish eyes full upon the woman. "An' I'll tell ye 'nother thing—I ain't a-going to hev all the women-folk in this 'ere neighbourhood a trapsin' through this house an' runnin' all over my barn, peekin' an' pryin' an' clackin'. Don't ye tell nobody what's up. Time 'nough fur gabbin' when the hull thing's out the way. That's my way of tendin' to bizness, an' it's been my way fur more'n forty years back. I'm goin' out to hitch up the critters now; whilst I'm gone you c'n git the water a-bilin'. I'm goin' to kill them hogs jes' 's I said, if we be late. Consarn the tramp anyhow!"

Elizabeth had not stirred from her chair during this harangue. Her husband suddenly became aware of this. "What you settin' thar for?" he demanded. "Looks like you was waitin' fur kingdom come. I hain't no time to fool away, I tell ye!"

"'Rastus Winch," said the woman slowly, "I'm a-goin' to keep that baby."

"You're a-goin' to keep that baby—eh?"

"Yes, I be. The Lord ain't never givin' me none of my own, 'xcept——" Her voice broke, and she raised her apron to her eyes.

Erastus Winch set his back against the door; his grim face hardened. "You ain't no call to bring that up," he said harshly. "The Lord's done by ye 'cordin' to His will Ye ain't got no children 'cause He don't want you to have none."

"He's give me this one. I'm a-goin' to keep it!"

"Wall, now, I say ye ain't, an' I'm the one to say, I guess! Why, consarn it, hain't ye got 'nough to occ'py yer time? Thar's the cows a-comin' in afore long—thar'll be a dozen or more calves to look arter. An' hens, an' turkeys, an' geese to set, an' chicks an' goslin's to feed ; an' all the while the milk to take keer of an' butter to make. Ye ain't a-goin' to tie yer han's with no beggar brat, if I know it. 'Sides, we can't 'ford it. He'd eat his blamed head off in no time!"

Digitized by Google

Elizabeth Winch arose from her chair. She was a tall, angular woman, whose dress, complexion and hair had long since acquired the hopeless tints of her surroundings. But the eyes in the faded face shone suddenly bright and clear, and the voice rang out in the forgotten tones of youth. "'Rastus!" she cried, "you say the Lord ain't give me no children 'cause He don't want me to have none. Then, why did He give me sech a hankerin' after 'em? He does want me to have 'em, en' He meant I should have 'em."

"Why ain't you got 'em, then?" sneered the man, repenting the words as they escaped his lips in the light of the answering flash from the eyes of the woman.

"You don't need to ask that question," she answered bitterly. "If I'd ha' had half the care you give the milk critturs mebbe—but thar ain't no use talkin' 'bout it. That's my baby in the cheer yonder, an' he ain't a-goin' to the poor farm this day ner any other day."

The man shifted uneasily from one foot to the other, then he burst out in loud, blustering tones, "Whose house is this, anyhow? Ain't it mine? Say, ain't I a right to tell what I'll hev and what I won't hev in my own house? Consarn it! What d'ye mean by talkin' that way to me? I tell ye, ye hain't got no time to fool with that young 'un. It's a-goin' whar it b'longs jest as quick as I kin git it thar."

Elizabeth walked swiftly to the side of the rocking-chair. She laid her work-distorted fingers lightly, caressingly on the soft-heaving wrappings which betrayed, chrysalis-like, the life pulsing within.

"Rastus," she said, tremulously, "this is your house, but ain't it mine, too? Hain't I slaved and worked for what we've got ever sence we was married jest as hard as you have—an' harder mebbe? Ain't I got some rights here? I've took keer of calves an' chickens faithful all my life. Now, can't I give a little time to him? It won't be much, husband. I can do more for you ef I have him."

"Now, 'Liz'beth, you're a-talkin' what ain't good horse sense," said the man, tugging argumentatively at the short tuft of grey whiskers which depended from his chin. "An' what's more, you know you be. You don't want that boy any more'n a cat wants two tails ; an' I'm blamed sure I don't ; so that's settled!" He turned peremptorily as he spoke and laid his hand once more upon the latch. "I'm a-goin' to hitch now. I'll stop at the door fur the young 'un, an' mind you don't hender me with no more of your 'tarnal nonsense." He slammed the door heavily behind him.

Elizabeth dropped on her knees beside the rocking-chair, her thin shoulders shaking with suppressed sobs. "My baby!" she whispered, "my baby—mine, mine!"

When, ten minutes later, the frosty jingle of bells and harness apprised her of the fact that the "hitchin' up" had been accomplished, she opened the door, closed it carefully behind her, and stood waiting ankle-deep in the unswept snow.

Her husband eyed her sourly as he pulled up his horses. "Hand it out," he commanded briefly.

"I've got somethin' to say to you, 'Rastus."

"Wall!"

"If you take that baby away from me, 'Ratus Winch, I'll never feed another chicken ; I'll never look at another calf ; I'll never cook you another meal of victuals, nor lift a finger in your house agin as long as I live. So help me God!" The woman's face was pinched and colourless, but solemn determination was written in every line of it.

The man's jaw fell ; he thrust one leg tentatively out of the sleigh, then slowly pulled it in again, and mechanically drew the blankets closer about his knees. "You're a durned sight bigger fool 'an I took ye fur, 'Liz'beth," he said, with a rasping cough. "You'll be mighty sorry for this afore you're through!" With that he curled his lash with vicious emphasis about the flanks of his shivering horses, and disappeared in a cloud of glittering snow dust, which smote the woman's white face like needles.

"I'll never be sorry for it!" she cried exultantly. She laughed aloud in the face of the rising sun. Long shafts of pink and yellow splendour streamed across the dazzling blue-white of the elds, transfiguring the haggard figure with the celestial tints of morning. From the gnarled orchard closes sounded the gay carol of a chickadee; sparrows called shrilly from their rugged nests under the eaves. The woman stared about her with wide eyes, her starved soul swelling in her shrivelled breast.

Digitized by Google

Then the thought of the dead woman seized her like a threatening hand. "I must look," she muttered. "There'll be a letter, mebbe—or a name. Somebody'll take him away from me!"

There was no letter, no name, no sign—even on the worn clothing in which the unknown was clad. Elizabeth satisfied herself of this. A sweet-smiling mystery, flower-pure, snow-clad, the dead mother vouchsafed no answer to the burning questions in the eyes of the living mother who bent over her. She reverently touched one of the waxen hands. "I ain't like you," she whispered, "but I'll love him an' take keer of him faithful as long's I live!"

Then she uttered a short, sharp cry. There was something after all, lying on the hay and half-covered by one exquisite palm. Elizabeth drew this object toward her with shaking fingers, and, wrapping it in her apron, fled toward the house.

In the rosy light of the new day, which streamed in at the kitchen window, she examined what she had found. It was a book—a Bible, bound in shabby, russet-coloured leather. On the fly-leaf something was written in a delicate hand. To Elizabeth's unaccustomed eyes it seemed almost illegible. She spelled it out word by word: "The stretching out of His wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel!" Below this were two words written in bolder characters. She stared at them intently, but the strangely twisted letters conveyed no meaning to her brain.

"It's a name, mebbe," she muttered. "I—I'll keep it keerful for him."

CHAPTER II.

A MYSTERIOUS STRANGER.

During the three days in which the dead woman lay in the back room of the undertaker's shop in Tacitus Four Corners, all the countryside emptied itself before the door. Solemn-faced farmers with their wives; children on their way to school; grimy young women and grimier young men, operatives in the cotton factory across the river; old people scarce able to drag their bodies from the warm nooks and corners where they dozed away their vacant days, one and all found their way into the bare little room dignified for the nonce by the terrible name—morgue.

There had been set on foot, as a matter of course, certain official inquiries, which had led up, after the frequent manner of official inquiries, to the dead wall of the unknowable. A vast number of excited rumours and gossiping surmises ended at the same impassable point. If the white mystery in Erastus Winch's barn had been dropped there out of the icy arms of the storm, its story could not have been more deeply shrouded from prying eyes.

Eliphalet Dundor—familiarly known on ordinary occasions as Liph—was disposed to regard the present "sad occasion" as an auspicious event in his business career. As coroner and undertaker his professional pride had been deeply gratified by the prominent position in the eyes of his fellow citizens which he now occupied. He wore uninterruptedly his most impressive air of perfunctory solemnity—becomingly tempered with alert politeness, together with his official suit of black clothes.

In the front of the shop certain elaborately trimmed coffins were displayed, at which the visitors cast curious glaces as they passed in and out of that other room, where lay the cold presence of the dead.

"Walk right up, ladies an' gentlemen, an' view these elegant goods at your leisure," said Mr. Dundor, with a professional wave of his hand. "Now that you've taken a look at her, you really can't afford to go away without seeing how comf'table we c'n make the dear departed here in Tacitus Four Corners. There's only jest one thing we're certain of, ladies, in this 'ere vale of sorrers—we must all die some day or another, each and every one of us. An' whilst we're su'vivors it's the greatest of all earthly comforts to feel that the dear departed is laid away by one that knows how to conduct the arrangements so 't you may say it's a pleasure to be the corpse."

Many of the women shed tears excitedly as they left Mr. Dundor's emporium. It was unanimously conceded to be "more interestin' than a reg'lar fun'ral."

The short December day was drawing to its close with a gorgeous pageant of crimsons and purples which streamed far across the wintry land, kindling the

Digitized by Google

"IT'S A NAME, MEBBE," SHE MUTTERED.

Digitized by Google

village vanes and windows into gem-like splendour. This celestial radiance penetrated the dusty window-panes of Mr. Dundor's shop and mingled with the uncertain light of a smoky kerosene lamp, which, for convenience sake, was placed on the upturned end of a pine coffin. After the active duties of the day, the worthy undertaker had permitted himself the relaxation of a short clay pipe stuffed with malodorous tobacco, the while he "set up" a receptacle for the meek figure which lay in the shadows beyond.

The article upon which Mr. Dundor was industriously engaged differed widely from the fantastic affairs which he had displayed to the admiring public earlier in the day; a combination of wood shavings, euphemistically termed "excelsior," with certain scant breadths of sleezy cambric of an unpleasant bluish white, were the simple materials with which he was lining the narrow pine box of ominous shape. It was, in short, a pauper's coffin, on which profits were reduced to a point which brought a commensurate scowl to the workman's forehead. At sound of a shrill tinkle, twice repeated, which marked the opening and closing of the outer shop door, Mr. Dundor laid down his hammer, and tiptoeing across the room, applied one eye to a knot-hole in the partition. After a brief reconnaissance, he hastily divested himself of his overalls and extinguished his pipe.

The new-comer stood in the midst of the shop, glancing at him somewhat uncertainly over the collar of his great-coat. He was a short man, much muffled up, and wearing a slouched hat pulled well down over his eyes; Mr. Dundor's alert eyes took in these details as he advanced on creaking tiptoe from the inner room. He bowed his sleek head with a tentative air of concern and sympathy. "Ah, my dear sir, good evening," he began, sucking in the corners of his lips with a windy sigh. "Was there anything—ah—I could do for you in the mortuary line, sir? A sudden bereavement perhaps—yes, yes!"

"There was a woman," said the stranger, in a harsh metallic voice, at sound of which the undertaker again bowed low, caressing the glossy knees of his trousers with uncertain fingers. "A woman, found dead—in a barn, was it? Can't say; just chanced to see it in newspaper. Detained at your wretched junction for an hour or more. Concluded to pass away the time by looking the matter up."

"There was a woman; yes, sir; certainly—quite right. Found dead, as you say, sir, in a barn. Sad case—very. Funeral to-morrow."

"Let me see her."

"Certainly—to be sure. The public has been admitted as a matter of precaution—that is, with the view of securing some further evidence. I have the honour of being coroner of this deestrict, sir."

The stranger made no comment; but a certain alertness in his manner called forth a further remark from Mr. Dundor. "We have not as yet succeeded in identifying the remains," he said, frowning and thrusting out his mouth with an air of judicial wisdom. "Sad case—very. Now you don't happen to be a possible acquaintance of the deceased, do you, sir?"

They were standing at the side of the dead woman, and the observant undertaker fancied that the aquiline features above the high coat collar quivered for an instant. "You don't happen to—ah—know this unfortunate young woman, do you, sir?" he repeated, with an insinuating smile.

The stranger turned sharply around. "What do you mean—confound you—by asking such a question?" he demanded, in a low, fierce voice. "No; I don't know the woman. Why should I? Didn't I tell you what I came for? I came to please myself—to amuse myself. I said so, didn't I?"

"Oh—ah, yes, certainly, my dear sir; no offence intended; no offence whatever. But as coroner of this deestrict, you know, an' with no evidence whatever—sad case, very, an' a nameless child, too—a very sad an' melancholy occasion, to be sure!"

"A child!" interrupted the other sharply. "But, nonsense, I don't see it."

"There was a child—yes, certainly. The child was living—is living, I may say."

"Humph!"

"I beg your pardon, sir. I didn't quite catch the remark."

The stranger turned his back upon the dead woman. "The funeral is to-morrow, I believe you said?"

"Yes, sir; to-morrow, at ten o'clock sharp, at the expense of the town—an' mighty little expense it is. I've buried the paupers in this 'ere community nigh onto twenty years, an' there ain't a dollar of profit in it—not a dollar."

Digitized by Google

The stranger glanced at the pine box, with its cambric linings. "This is for her, I suppose?" he said, coldly.

"Yes, sir; an' a mighty roomy an' stylish coffin it is for a pauper. She'll lie quiet enough, once she's put away. I ain't sure it makes much difference to 'em anyhow; it's the su'vivors 'at's pertic'lar. I c'n show you some elegant goods in all the latest styles, if you was interested in seein' 'em, sir."

"I have a fancy—mind you, it's a mere whim of mine—to see this—this pauper buried decently," said the stranger, fixing his frowning gaze on the undertaker. "I shouldn't care to think of a dog in that!" He indicated the box with a slight gesture.

"If you—ah—happened to know anyone who is an acquaintance, or perhaps a relative, of the deceased, you——" Mr. Dundor's eyes were roving inquisitively over the person of his visitor, but his words died away into an articulate mumble before the fierce look in the eyes above the high coat-collar. He rubbed his hands together apologetically. "You understand my position, sir, as coroner of this dees——."

"You heard what I said," broke in the stranger, with a scornful shrug. "If you do care to listen to what I say, then do so without remark; my time is limited."

"Certainly, my dear sir; I beg your pardon, I'm sure. I'm always ready an' anxious to ah—serve the b'reaved in any an' all——"

"Have the goodness to attend to me. Place the body of the woman in your best casket. Seal it up and bury it without delay. What has passed between us need not be mentioned. This whim of mine—a mere fancy which came into my mind as I saw the woman—need not become common talk. Do you understand?"

Mr. Eliphalet Dundor's lean hand closed upon the roll of bills which the other man offered. "Very generous of you, sir, I'm sure. Nothing to be ashamed of, certainly. I—ah—quite understand, I assure you. Natural modesty of benevolent gent'man; prevent left hand knowin' right hand's doin's—eh? Everything shall be as you wish, sir; elegant casket, satin linin's, pillers soft and easy to the head, silver trimmin's, an'——"

The sound of the outer shop door as it shut to with a sharp protest from the rusty bell informed Mr. Dundor that he was once more alone.

"Curious circumstance — very," he muttered to himself. "If there had been any marks of violence on the body now, I should have felt justified in making an arrest—yes, to be sure, an arrest! But everything was quite regular; young woman, identity unknown, found dead—froze. Nothing out of the way or suspicious in freezing. Any young woman similarly situated would have froze. Sad case—very. Ah."

Mr. Dundor had climbed to the high stool behind his desk during this soliloquy; the roll of bills lay spread out before him in the light of the smoky lamp. "Ah," he repeated, rubbing his hands as he eyed the crisp green notes, "very generous indeed—very handsome! What a pity not to speak of the matter."

"It would get into the papers," he said, smiling pleasantly to himself. "Something like this, say: 'Mr. Eliphalet Dundor, the well-known coroner and undertaker of Tacitus Four Corners, receives visit from mysterious person, who insists upon paying handsomely for funeral of the unknown woman found dead in that township. Mr. Dundor is a prominent citizen, an' active business man in this thrivin' village. We visited his elegant emporium at the Corners yesterday, an' give the story in his own words.' If there's money in advertisin'—he! he!" he chuckled, "I'd get a plenty of it without paying the printer a red cent."

This brought him back quite naturally to the agreeable presence of the greenbacks on the desk before him. "It'll pay the expenses," he muttered, "an' leave a handsome margin. There's the money from the town besides. I'll have to take that, or they'll ketch on to this 'ere curious circumstance."

He arose, lamp in hand, and walked slowly to the front of the shop; the long shadows of the coffins danced grotesquely on walls and ceiling, mingling with that of Mr. Dundor's own spare shape. "This 'ere's too big for her," he muttered; "they ain't no sense in wastin' room on folks that ain't called on to move. Besides, ol' Mr. Snell's ripenin' for a better world, an' he's a hefty man. If I have to set up one like this we can't have no fun'ral to-morrow at ten; can't fetch it nohow under a day an' a-half. That black cloth case 'ud do, but I as good as promised to set that one 'side fur Mis' Turner, an' I don't like to disappoint her; her second husband's buried in one sim'lar to it. The Lord knows I can't afford to play fast and loose with a big fambly like the Turners an' all of 'em onhealthy."

Digitized by Google

His mind reverted to the meek presence in the back shop. "She ain't goin' to dictate 'bout it, I guess," he said meditatively, as he tiptoed softly to the side of the dead woman. "All any of 'em ask is to be put away comf'table."

The smoky lamp shed a feeble glimmer on the pathetic young face, framed in its masses of red-brown hair. "I'll miss my guess if he hadn't put eyes on to her before," said Mr. Dundor. "But she ain't dressed suitable to be laid on white satin, whoever she is, an' I'm legally bound to stick to my contract with the town."

He turned with decision, and, setting the lamp in its former position, resumed his operations on the narrow pine box of ominous shape.

It was growing bitterly cold in the little back room, but great drops of moisture stood out on the workman's forehead. "Stylish and roomy," he repeated to himself, with a furtive glance at the quiet figure in the shadows, "an' there ain't no su'vivors."

CHAPTER III.

STRETCHING OUT OF HIS WINGS.

On the following day Elizabeth Winch stood in the open door of her house, a smile of timid welcome on her face; the minister's wife was coming up the path.

"Do walk right in, Mis' Holditch," she said, hospitably; "it's awful cold, ain't it? You'd better take your things off, I guess, while you're settin,' or you won't sense them when you go out."

The minister's wife untied her blue veil and unpinned her heavy blanket shawl. "It's cold," she admitted; "but I was well wrapped up." She was a stout, motherly woman, with a countenance composed to a comfortable acquiescence in the inscrutable ways of Providence. "I'd like to see that baby," she added, as she emerged like a substantial beetle from its encumbering chrysalis.

"You—you wouldn't be wantin' him?" asked Elizabeth, hesitatingly.

"Dear, no!" said the other, with a pitying smile. "I know too well what a piece of work it is to bring up a bottle baby! But, of course, we all take an interest in the poor child."

Elizabeth drew her guest into the tiny bedroom off the kitchen. "He's asleep," she whispered, her face glowing with joyful pride. "He sleeps most all the time when he ain't eatin'. He ain't a mite of trouble. He's growin' jest like a little weed—no, I ain't a-goin' to say that neither; weeds is ugly things. He's more like a little pink flower. There now, look at him; ain't he lovely!"

Mrs. Holditch leaned over the sleeping form, a fine motherly smile dawning in her kind eyes. She touched the soft rose of the tiny cheek with a wise forefinger. "I should say he was as healthy a child as I ever saw," she said judicially. "And I guess you know how to do for him as well as if you'd had more experience. You want to dilute his milk with boiled water, and don't feed him every time he cries."

"He ain't hardly cried sence I've had him," breathed the other, with a triumphant smile. "An' jest look at his hair, will you, a curlin' all over his blessed little head? His eyes is as black as velvet, an' he knows me a'ready; you wouldn't believe it, would you now, Mis' Holditch?"

"They're more knowing than most folks give 'em credit for," responded the minister's wife briskly. "What does Mr. Winch say about him?"

Elizabeth's face clouded. "He don't want him," she said sullenly. "But I've made up my mind."

"You might name him after your husband," suggested Mrs. Holditch, elevating her eyebrows with an understanding glance.

"No, he's named a'ready. He's named 'Manuel. I named him first thing."

"Manuel!" repeated Mrs. Holditch, wonderingly. "Why, that sounds kind of a foreign and outlandish name for him, doesn't it?"

"It's in the Bible," said Elizabeth; "an' I seen it on the communion-table over to Turner's Cross-roads once. 'The stretchin' out of His wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O 'Manuel!'"

"I understand now—Immanuel. It means 'God with us.'"

(The remaining Chapters of this Story are full of positions that will appeal irresistibly to human sympathy.—ED.)

Digitized by Google

A LOST REVENGE.

"SIR, it will break dad's heart to have to leave Burleigh. We have lived there for generations. Give him time, sir, and things will right themselves."

"Not I!" returned Mr. Weissmann doggedly. "If he hasn't been able to make matters succeed with farming paying so well, he never will."

"But it was that bill he backed for uncle, sir," pleaded the lad.

"He shouldn't have been such a fool, then," was the reply. "He must pay the rent or go!"

The lad's father went, but it killed him. And by the side of his father's grave Harold Gascoigne registered a vow to humble the man who had refused to allow him any consideration.

He went out to Africa, and there in the diamond mines, by hard work and keen speculation, he made an enormous fortune. He was only thirty-seven when he returned to England, and meanwhile many things had happened. Land had gone down in value, and now it was the landlords who were the paupers.

Tenants were scarce, farms were going begging, and amongst those who suffered most severely was his father's old landlord.

The first thing that Harold Gascoigne did was to buy back the dear old place, which, owing to Mr. Weissmann's difficulties, he was only too glad to dispose of.

"You look very mopish, papa," said Alice Weissmann to her father at the breakfast table.

"Enough to make me," he answered, irritably. "There's a bill I gave to Jones in Lombard Street which I hoped to get renewed, and now another party of the name of Gascoigne has bought it up, and presses for the money, just when I haven't got it."

"I don't understand," said Alice. "A bill!" innocently.

"No, girls don't understand business; but you'll understand having to leave your home when we are all sold up."

"Is it as bad as that?" she exclaimed, turning pale.

"Yes, it's ruin! Nothing less. All I want is time, but this man won't give me any. Funny, too, his name's Gascoigne. Same name as the man who bought the old Chase Farm at Burleigh from me."

"Papa, wasn't there a Gascoigne there years ago?"

"Yes, I turned him out. But I don't suppose this man is any relation. He hails from Africa, and is very wealthy. Wish I had a little of it." And he strode from the room.

"Poor dad! I believe it will simply kill him. I wish I knew where this Mr. Gascoigne lived; I'd go and ask him to give us time. He can't want the money if he's so rich."

She stole into the library unobserved, and ferreting among the papers found his address.

Two days after she made an excuse to go to town, and called to see Mr. Harold Gascoigne.

She was shown into a luxuriously furnished office, and Harold Gascoigne surveyed her curiously. He rose, waiting for her to speak.

"I have come about—about papa's debt to you," she said, timidly. "Oh, sir, you will surely let him have time to meet it in."

"What time did he ever give my father when he turned him out?" he answered.

"Did my papa do that?" she said, all hope dying in her.

"He did, and my father perished of a broken heart."

There was silence for a while, and meanwhile Harold Gascoigne's thoughts flew back.

Only twenty years had passed, and here he was able to keep his vow. This very morning the daughter of the man who let him sue in vain was pleading to him. He looked at her as she stood before him with quivering lips and grief-stricken face.

"She must have been a baby," he thought, "when I left the old home."

Twenty years had made a woman of her, and a very fair woman, too. It seemed a thousand pities that such blue eyes should be clouded by grief.

Somewhat awkwardly, he laid his hand upon her shoulder.

"There, Miss Weissmann, you needn't

Digitized by Google

take on so about it. These things happen daily to a great many people."

"So does death," she retorted; "but that does not make it any easier to bear when it comes in your own home."

He started. He remembered the shock it was to come home when his mother and sisters were all dead. He had found himself without kith or kin, a wealthy man, with none to bless with his wealth.

"Oh, why won't you give papa time?" she sobbed on, entreatingly. "I'm sure—I'm sure it can be no pleasure to you to sell him out of house and home. You don't look that kind of man. They tell me you are rich, so how can it matter to you?" she naively added.

Harold Gascoigne smiled. After all, now that he had his revenge, it didn't seem so sweet to him, and whatever he might feel to the father, the girl was——

"Well," he said, aloud, "go back and tell your father I will come down from town and see him about it. Yes, I will come next week. So dry your eyes and let the sun come out on your face. May I ask your name, child?"

"Alice!" she returned, somewhat haughtily. "But, if you please, I didn't want papa to know I came."

"Oh, I see! It is to be our secret, is it? Very well, it shall be kept."

. . . . .

A few days afterwards Mr. Gascoigne made his appearance, and was closeted for some time with Mr. Weissmann. Then the two joined the girls.

"Alice!" exclaimed her father, pompously, "I thought I would just mention that Mr. Gascoigne has expressed a wish to stay here a little until his old home is ready. I have no doubt you can manage it."

Mr. Weissmann did not mention that Harold Gascoigne was staying as a paying guest.

. . . . .

Two months had passed, and still Harold Gascoigne was there.

One morning at breakfast it leaked out that the day was Alice's birthday.

Later on in the day, Harold placed a small packet in the hands of Alice, saying:

"Will you allow me to keep up the good old custom of birthday presents? I have no sisters of my own, you see."

Alice opened it with some constraint.

At length she drew from it a stamped document, and discovered it was nothing less than her father's bill of sale.

She went white to the very lips.

"What am I to understand by this?" she asked.

"Simply that for the future the question of its renewal will rest with you."

"But I have no right! I cannot accept this!"

"Then give me the right to make it yours! Be my wife, Alice!"

She looked at him speechless with indignation. Then she quietly asked, with a look of scorn:

"Do you wish to buy my hand? You do not leave me free to consult my own inclination. If I accept this, how can I say no? And how dare I decline it?"

Harold looked thoroughly nettled at this reception of his gift.

"May I see it a moment?" he said. And having taken it, he tore it into atoms. "There now, you are free. The bill no longer exists, and I have no claim over your father or you," then turning, he left the room.

Alice stooped down and gathered every atom of paper from the floor and placed them all in a private drawer.

That day at lunch, Harold Gascoigne was not in evidence. A note to Mr. Weissmann intimated that he had been suddenly called to town on business, and did not expect to be able to return.

Mr. Weissmann was amazed, but Alice kept her own counsel.

As the months went by, Alice missed Harold Gascoigne more than she would have thought possible. She wished somehow he had not been so impetuous. She might have come to love him in time. He was a splendid specimen of a man, and she had often admired his massive strength. Sometimes she would sit dreamily picturing him, as she had seen him, strong, bright, and active, but of all her recollections, none were so clear as that of a man, white to the very lips, tearing to pieces the paper that had come between them.

. . . . .

September came, and with it the shooting, and incidentally Mr. Weissman heard that Mr. Gascoigne was down at his old home for the season. He thought it very strange that no invitation came to himself, and loudly expressed his indignation at what he termed the purse-pride of the

Digitized by Google

HE PLACED A SMALL PACKET IN ALICE'S HANDS.

Digitized by Google

man. Hurt at this, Alice at last told him about the gift of the bill, and when he understood the matter he simply swore at her for a fool.

"You might have queened it in the county with his enormous wealth, had you chosen to take what Fortune sent you. At least you might have thought of me and my troubles. He would have lent me any amount of money. There, get out of my sight!"

From that time forth matters did not go very smoothly for Alice.

Such a revelation of selfishness filled the high-souled girl with contempt, and the daily friction of her home life became unbearable. So she determined to leave home and earn her own living.

What a bitter time it was, that constant seeking for employment, the hoping against hope, and the utter failure of it all. Brought up without any really serviceable education, there seemed nothing she could do.

. . . .

One day she journeyed as usual into the village for letters. On her way she stopped to gaze at the little crowd which had gathered around a travelling menagerie.

"Do you know, Miss Wiessmann, that a great big bear escaped early this morning?" said a garrulous old woman.

"Where is it now?" said Alice.

"They think it is in the woods a-belongin' to Mr. Gascoigne.

"Good gracious!" she exclaimed. "And I have to go back alone!"

She was, however, a girl of courage, and finding no letters, she made up her mind to risk the short cut home through the woods.

She had gone some distance and was sorrowfully pondering how different life might have been to her if he had not been so hasty. Suddenly her musings were disturbed by the sound of a low growl near her, and to her dismay she saw the missing bear watching her. Alice screamed with fear, then turning, rushed through the brushwood at the top of her speed. She sprang on to reach an old disused cottage close at hand. The bear followed, gaining quickly upon her, but fear lent her wings, and she just reached the cottage in time to bang the old door to and shoot the rusty bolt. Then she sent up a succession of shrill screams. How long that bolt would have held she did not know; but at that moment she heard a couple of shots, and saw through the paneless window the bear turn towards a man who was making rapidly in its direction. With great joy she recognised him to be Harold Gascoigne. On he came fearlessly, but the bear had lost its native valour in long confinement, and with a howl made for the woods again. Harold emptied two more charges into it, and then came to the cottage.

By the time he reached it Alice was in a dead faint. A sturdy kick or two burst open the old door, and when she came to, she was resting against his knee. The gaze with which he regarded her was one no daughter of Eve could misunderstand; and with delight she saw he loved her still.

Struggling to her feet with the colour dyeing her cheeks, she fell back with a sharp cry of pain. In her flight she had sprained her ankle, though she had passed it unnoticed in her panic.

"I dare not leave you to get assistance," he said, "with that brute about. You must let me carry you to your home."

"It is too far!" she gasped.

"Then let me carry you to mine. That is nearer."

She nodded consent, and in a moment she was in his arms, being borne with steady strides towards safety.

"How strong he is!" she thought. Her weight seemed nothing to him. Then her glance rested on his hair, grown grey in many a battle with the world. His cap had been twisted awry in his haste.

She never knew why she did it, but involuntarily she adjusted his cap. He started at the touch and looked up questioningly.

She tried to meet his gaze firmly, but her eyelids drooped in confusion. Then he kissed her.

"Will you answer me now, Alice? You are quite free to choose. But I have been longing for you all the time."

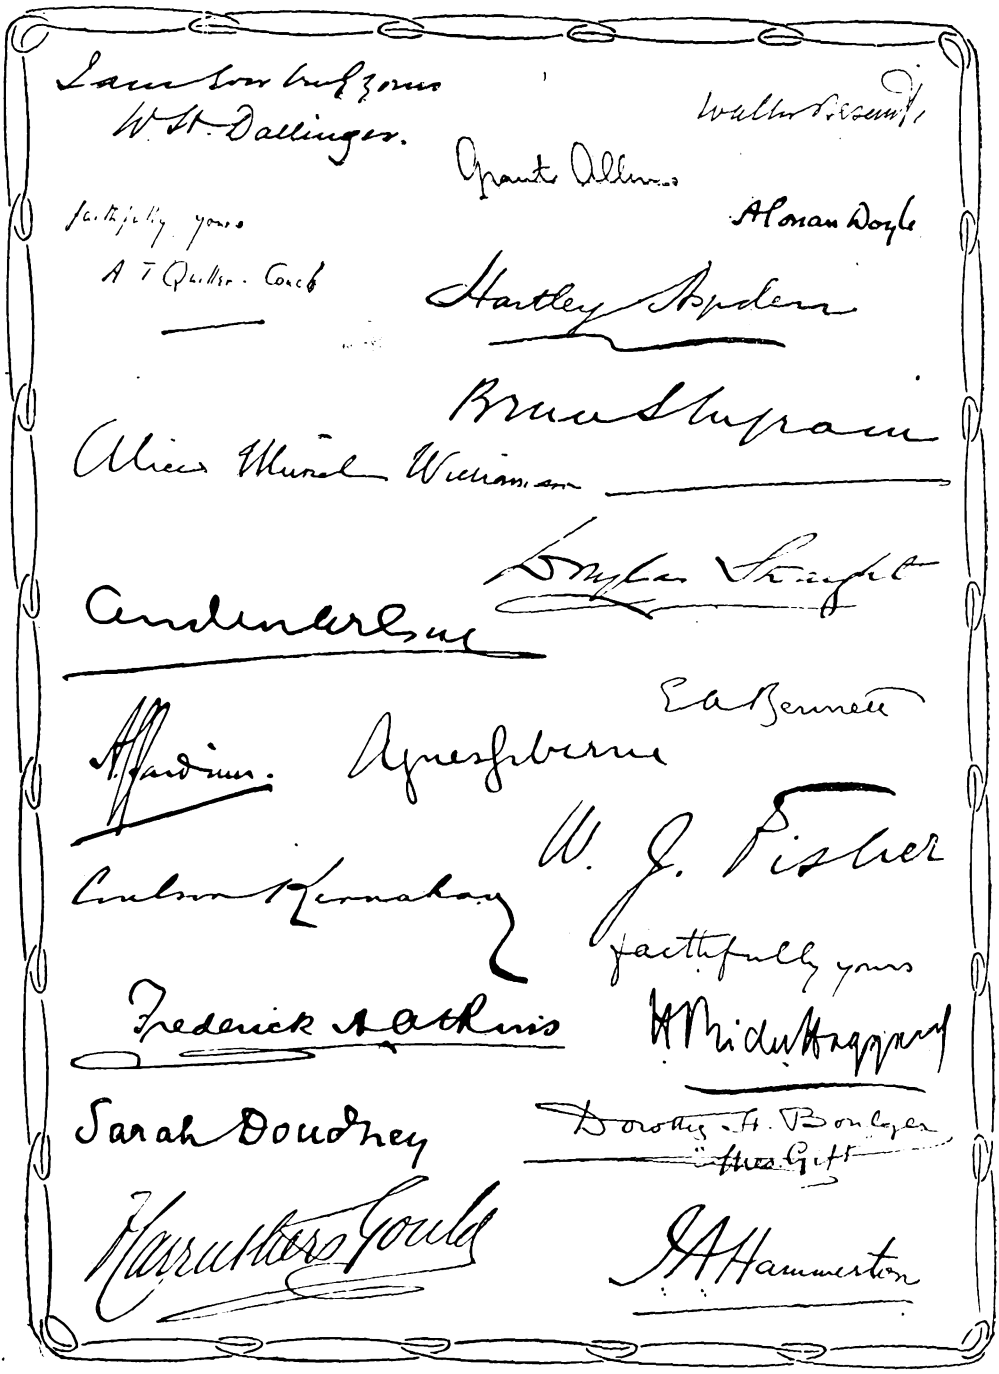
"So have I for you," she murmured.

. . . .

The bear was caught in the woods, disabled by the effect of the shot poured into it; and it now stands in the hall of the Gascoignes' home, a relic of the adventure which brought them both together, in spite of the bill of sale.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



A PAGE OF LITERARY AUTOGRAPHS.

Digitized by Google

A Page of . . . Literary Autographs.

MOST of the names on the accompanying page are too well known and too representative of forceful personalties to need much explanation. But there may be a great outside public to whom the fame of literary men is like the fame of Wordsworth to the tourists who were overheard discussing in the Lake District.

"And who's this Wordsworth they talk so much about?"

"Oh, one of those poets like Virgil. In fact I believe he's called Virgil-Wordsworth; and he lives somewhere hereabout."

For the sake of information, then, it had better be pointed out that W. H. Dallinger is the signature of the famous Wesleyan minister, scientist, and literary contributor on scientific subjects. A. T. Quiller-Couch is better known as "Q" to the public as the author of some charming Cornish tales, and to Fleet Street as a prominent journalist as well—though we pity the compositor's strained eyes who has to set a manuscript in that exquisitely small handwriting. As for the late Grant Allen and Walter Besant, or A. Conan Doyle (otherwise Sherlock Holmes) and Rider Haggard, "what they have written they have written."

"Hartley Aspden" is the signature of one of those men of energy and resource who have laid the foundation of the fortunes of "Harmsworths." Entering their employ as editor of The Sunday Companion, he speedily raised that paper to a large circulation, initiated other periodicals, watched the public taste to suit it, and a year or two since had the honour of being nominated a director by Mr. A. G. Harmsworth. No man in the Fleet Street district is kinder to young writers, or more courteous in his dealings with them. Bruce S. Ingram is known for his splendid work in connection with the Illustrated London News, and Andrew Wilson for his "Science Jottings" in that and other papers. Alice Muriel Williamson made herself known originally (very originally) as the writer of feuilletons, electric in their thrill, baffling in their mystery. Douglas Straight, barrister and journalist, is the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette. A. Gardiner is the man to whom the varying fortunes of the Daily News have been entrusted by Mr. Cadbury, and its marvellous improvement in tone and purpose is the immediate result. W. J. Fisher holds the same position on the Daily Chronicle. E. A. Bennett, "a mere man," is editor of Woman, one of the best of women's papers. Agnes Giberne and Sarah Doudney are names loved by readers of healthy and religious fiction. Coulson Kernahan is literary adviser to Ward, Lock and Co., and has made himself well known as a keen literary critic and author of several brochures, such as "God and the Ant." Mr. Frederick Atkins, as the creator of The Young Man and Mr. J. A. Hammerton as a prolific writer in many magazines, the author of "Barrie and his Books," and as the editor of the many issues of Partridge and Co. are both continually in evidence. Mr. Carruthers Gould is connected with the Westminster Gazette, and Theo Gift is the deservedly well known writer of winsome children's stories.

Digitized by Google

When Night Had Come.

TIRED, ah, so tired!—and the minister leaned his aching head upon his hands. It was Sunday to-morrow, and already it was eleven o'clock; yet the longer he pored over his sermon the less he felt satisfied with it. Oh, the intolerable sameness of the work! If only he might have fresh surroundings to stimulate him. But that would never come now! Forty years is a long period to stay in a place, unless it were London, where the congregations ever change, even though the minister stops. Forty years amongst the same people! No wonder he felt the stress of it. He laid down his manuscript and began to ponder over his life. Rapidly his mind ran over the years. He remembered coming there straight from college, an energetic young man of twenty-eight. How full of hope he had been! How real was the humility which made him seek this small country pastorate! "I can make my mistakes on a small scale there," he had told himself, "and grow richer in experience. While if I do my duty I shall be sure to get a call to a better church, by-and-by."

He had done his duty, but he was still there. He remembered how often at first he had preached at churches "with a view." And, as if it were to-day, he saw himself watching for the postman, lest he should bring the long-expected letter. But somehow that letter never came.

The years rolled on. What a start it gave him when he had reached the first ten, what a shock when it became twenty! How resigned he had grown in the thirties, and now last week completed the fortieth, and he was sixty-eight! All his old friends were dead, and this was an age of recommendation!

Still, he had had his joys here. He had brought his young wife home, and what a fuss the people made of her then! She was old like himself, now. Old at sixty-four! Small wonder, when she had spent nearly forty years in bringing together two ends which would never quite meet. Then how soon the children had multiplied! He remembered his joking suggestion to his wife when the third boy came. "Call him Gad, dear," he had said, "for a troop cometh." But it was no joke when the troop came.

Ah, some of them soon went again! The minister's eyes grew moist as he called to mind the names on the stone in the chapel-yard. He thought all the more of Heaven every Sunday he saw that stone as he passed into the chapel. And those who were left, what an anxiety they had been! He had done the best he could for them. He should have liked to send his eldest boy to college. It was a bitter pill when he went into a draper's shop.

Once he had been ambitious, now his ambitions were as dead as the many men and women he had buried. That reminded him how very many they had been—old supporters who had helped at first. They had gone and their help with them. And no one had come to take their places.

Then that Wesleyan Chapel had been built, and some of the people had been attracted there. They said he was not simple enough. People were always taking exception to his sermons now. He didn't wonder—the modern preachers had such a passion for smartness. He rather admired it himself, but for the life of him he couldn't do it. Somehow thought didn't flow so briskly as it used, and words needed spurring. He studied hard, his books were the best he could buy. But in these days there were always some fresh books coming out—he could not get them all. The students who came down to preach asked him (if he happened to see them) what he thought of Clarke's or Fairbairn's latest work? He had not read them. How full of freshness these young fellows were! Two Sundays ago, when he was away, his people had a young man from Mansfield. They were full of him when he came back. And every word of praise was like a knife to him. Perhaps it was wrong, but he should like to be young again himself, he felt conscious that he was guilty of the terrible sin of being prosy and old-fashioned. There, it could not be long before he would be like the angel in the Master's tomb—"a young man." What kind of a funeral would his people give him? Forty years was a long stay. At least they ought to put up a mural tablet to his memory. He knew he had their respect, though they never told him so now. Ah, it was hard to be unappreciated! The Master knew what that meant, though He was never old.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

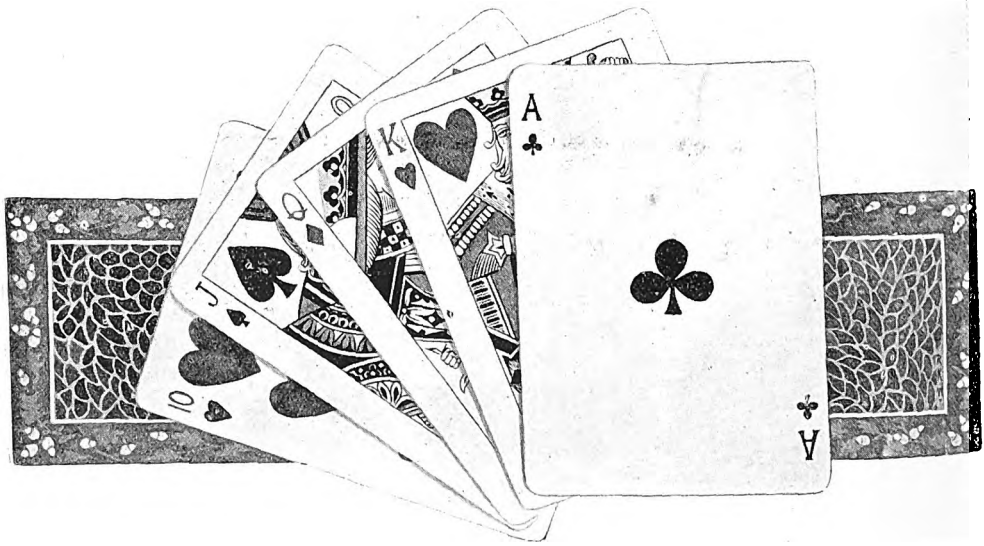
Never mind, he had been faithful, and though he had never had a call to a better church, he had fulfilled the call to make his own better. The rich young blood of his church-life had drifted to the towns—all over the world his thought was bearing fruit. "Oh, if he could see all!"

Did he see it? Was that prayer answered? They found him there, with his manuscript before him, one finger resting on the words: "And let us not be weary in well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." The fire in the grate was out, and his life had gone out with it. He had received his call at last, after forty years.



WASTED! WASTED!! WASTED!!!

THE SEASON-TICKET HOLDERS WHO SPEND TWO HOURS PER DAY CARD PLAYING FOR FIVE DAYS A WEEK, WASTE OVER FOUR YEARS OF EIGHT-HOUR DAYS IN TWENTY-FIVE YEARS, OR ONE YEAR IN SIX.

Digitized by Google

"WRIT SARKASTIC."

(I.)—HOW WE HEARD THE CANDIDATES.

WE HEARD THEM DESPONDINGLY.

THE memory of the pastor, who had spent so many years going in and out our homes, and preaching to us Sabbath after Sabbath, was still held in reverence. True, we had sometimes been glad of a change when he was alive, but when we knew we should see his face no more, we —we missed him. Jenny Hardy found her girl sobbing in the midst of a service. The preacher noticed it too, and thinking he had been the means of touching her was constrained to greater fervour, when after all she was only remembering the good old man who had gone away.

Old Mercy Marsden refused to be comforted. "I want to know who'll bring me wood now?" she said, wiping a tear from the corner of her eye. "It warmed my heart up more than the fire to see the old gentleman every Friday bring in them sticks he'd chopped with his own hands from the pile Farmer Rogers always sent im for the Manse, a-representin' aforehand as how he must cut it up hissen.. 'Ex'cise was what 'e wanted,' Mister Bentley said, poor dear!"

These were only examples of many who had grown up under the old minister. No one as yet could take his place. He had been an authority on Medicine, Law, Politics, and the Gospel too long. So it came to pass that the over-anxious candidates who wrote for a Sunday "with a view" by the next post after reading of the vacancy, came and saw, but didn't conquer. In their case the first were last.

. . . . .

WE HEARD THEM EAGERLY.

At last! For when about three months had gone by the deacons reminded us solemnly, that as the pastorate must eventually be filled, we ought to begin to take notice of the men who came. Tom Jones, who has a reputation for wit, went home and asked his wife, "Why is a vacant church like an infant? Because at first it only cries, presently it begins to take notice, and at last it says, 'I will.'" We had only reached the "taking notice" stage. Realising the position, we began to listen eagerly, and the next few months were an era in the lives of some of us. We had become hardened under the sound of a familiar voice, stereotyped in our methods of thinking, and the old, old story had become worse than old, it was stale. Now under the influence of fresh speakers our hearts began to open, and our minds to widen. A flood of new ideas poured into us. Some began to feel restless who had been satisfied. There were stirrings and searchings of heart. The seed sown in so many years had ripened unto harvest, and the new men put in the sickle. Even the most sleepy kept awake, and Mr. Mason, the draper, who, report said, was never between the sheets till one o'clock on Sunday morning, never even yawned as in the days of yore. These yawns had been a great source of amusement to the children, and they watched for them in vain. Who could get sleepy amidst perpetual change, when in the pulpit you had sometimes a great and strong wind, sometimes an earthquake, sometimes a fire, and sometimes a still small voice? However, as the months went by the spirit of listening for instruction was diluted with a measure of judgment. For

WE HEARD THEM CRITICALLY.

Literally we fulfilled the command, "Take heed how ye hear!" The form our criticism took was to watch for whatever wouldn't do. A spirit of depreciation settled upon us. Rev. —— was a well-known man, in high esteem with the county where he lived, because that by him the Lord had wrought deliverance from debt unto his church, he was also a mighty man in speech; but—and there was always a "but." Presumably we were there to listen to the preacher's word, but some of us listened to his hair, the cut of his clothes, the grace or race of his gestures, the way he sat down and the way he stood up. There was no man so very peculiar as to lack all peculiarity, and however little he had we heard it. Gradually we came to the conviction that we had an especial talent for trying a man. Certainly they all looked very much tried. Some of them seemed so nervous that they must have been afraid of us. One man, however, disarmed our criticism by remarking at the beginning of the service, "My brethren, I am afraid that a church passing through such a period as your own, tends to develop a cold spirit of criticism. Forgive me if I say, that as nothing is further from my own thoughts than candidature, so I trust that all thought of election will be absent from yours. In this service, at least, let us worship God!" That day the services did us good. This man was not eligible. He had another invitation in his pocket when he spoke, and some of us were actually so ready to judge that we wondered if that accounted for it. But, no! it could not have been!

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

. . . . .

Twelve months went by in this process of taking notice, but as yet we had not said, "I will." All manner of hindrances were at work to prevent it. For instance (let us whisper it)

WE HEARD THEM CLIQUE-ICALLY.

The church was divided into little cliques. Mrs. Robertson, the wife of a banker, headed one, and Mrs. Mann, the wife of a doctor, headed another. The bankeress determined never to vote for anyone who had stayed with Mrs. Mann. "If he comes here," she said, "he'll get in with Mrs. Mann and that set." Mrs. Mann was equally sharp concerning the future of guests at Mrs. Robertson's, so the fate of some of the supplies was settled by their destination. Other cliques were formed on the basis of opinion. The thoughtful element in the church wanted a modern man, the evangelical desired one to whom Mr. Spurgeon would have given a certificate of orthodoxy, the teetotalers were anxious to get an uncompromising abstainer who would do away with the curse of fermented liquor at the communion. If a man seemed a kind of Paul and Apollos rolled into one, it mattered not if any of these particulars he failed to please. So we still heard men "with a view"—our point of view.

. . . . .

There came, however, a Sunday when

WE HEARD EXPECTANTLY.

The deacons had been advised by Rev. Dr. ——, a shining light in the denomination, that Rev. Wesley Williams was the very man for them. They had seen copies of his sermons in print and highly esteemed them. He was well known in literature, and clearly was a man, as Tom Jones put it, "able to fill their pulpit; a very different thing to occupying it." He came to preach; expectantly we came to hear. Perhaps we expected too much. Certainly his sermons were not up to the printed samples, and as if to settle the matter, it leaked out that he didn't believe in cup-of-tea visitation. He was not invited.

. . . . .

Then

WE BEGAN TO HEAR SPASMODICALLY;

regular attendants before began occasionally to go elsewhere. It was a strange thing, but as surely as a man had been heard whom many had liked, there were at least a respectable minority who, unfortunately, like Thomas, were "not there." But the end was approaching.

. . . . .

WE BEGAN TO HEAR IRRITABLY.

At the church meetings it became very clear that the people were impatient with the deacons. They were growing sick of putting up supplies, and putting up with them. As Mrs. Roscoe well said, "When you have a spare room nothing is easier, but when to take a supply in you have to put the children three in a bed, make up a bed for your husband, and turn in anywhere yourself, so as to give up your own bedroom, its rather hard. Besides which, if you refer to the minister's room as the 'spare room,' one of the children will be sure to say 'Do you mean your room, mamma?'"

Unfortunately those who had spare rooms had also many friends to use them, and could not spare them much; and on Mondays the senior deacon might have been seen trotting round like a rate-collector from door to door, and just as unwelcome, with one question puzzling his mind: "Where, oh, where shall I place him?" Even when the arrangement was made, at the very last moment "Polly had the scarlatina," a friend had "most unexpectedly arrived," and again the old deacon would depart in search of a prophet's chamber. It was clearly time to put an end to it.

Digitized by Google

. . . .

The Sunday after a very unpleasant church-meeting a young man preached—a very average young man. "Yes, he was a teetotaler." "Yes, he had only stayed at Mrs. May's, the inoffensive wife of a chandler in the town, who took no side and put none on." So Mesdames Mann and Robertson were propitiated. He had used the word "Evolution" in both his sermons, so the modern element was pleased. He talked of the New Birth and urged his hearers to flee from the wrath to come, and the orthodox made a note of it. There was not much in his sermons, but then they were short. Never having had a church yet on which to try it, he believed in visitation, and he was not married.

Two weeks afterwards he received a letter:—

"My dear Sir,—You now receive the cordial and unanimous invitation of the church here to become its pastor. We trust in making this decision we have been wisely directed by the Great Head of the Church, and also that your acceptance or rejection of our call may be divinely guided."

The call was accepted. We had heard many men—degree men, proved men, men of energy, interesting looking men, powerful preachers, subtle thinkers—and we had struck the average.

THAT MIGHTY PENNY.

"News Room, Admission 1d."

Curiously a TEMPLE man made his way in, and having paid his penny, looked round to see what he could get for it. He had expected to see a few tables with the principal papers of the day available for reading. He found instead that the room was an actual press directory, supplying the many papers which the directory only mentions. They were all there, from the Times downward, most of the provincial papers, and even the suburban journals. Many of the readers appeared devoutly attentive to the mass of literature provided for them; and the man began making notes on the spread of the reading habit, when looking closer he saw they were chiefly interested in the advertisement columns, and a glance at their appearance—shabby-genteel, or shabby and not genteel, revealed the cause—they were out of work.

In another room above swarmed the weekly and monthly magazines. Every trade, every profession, and even every sect has it own journal, and the enterprising and Catholic-minded proprietor finds a place for them all. It was a room full of illumination for literary beginners. Without much trouble they could see the style of thing each journal wants and doesn't. A visit here by their outside contributors would save the patience of many an editor and spare their own postage.

Up the stairs, beyond, another room was reached, where a race of scribes were busily employed.

Our representative looked suspiciously at one who seemed to be taking stock of the place. "Ideas float!" he thought. "Could it be that this man was meditating a similar descriptive article? The deities forbid!"

Hastily he sat down and turned his impressions of the place into "copy."

"Yours is a wonderful penn'orth," he said to the proprietor, on leaving. "Does it pay?"

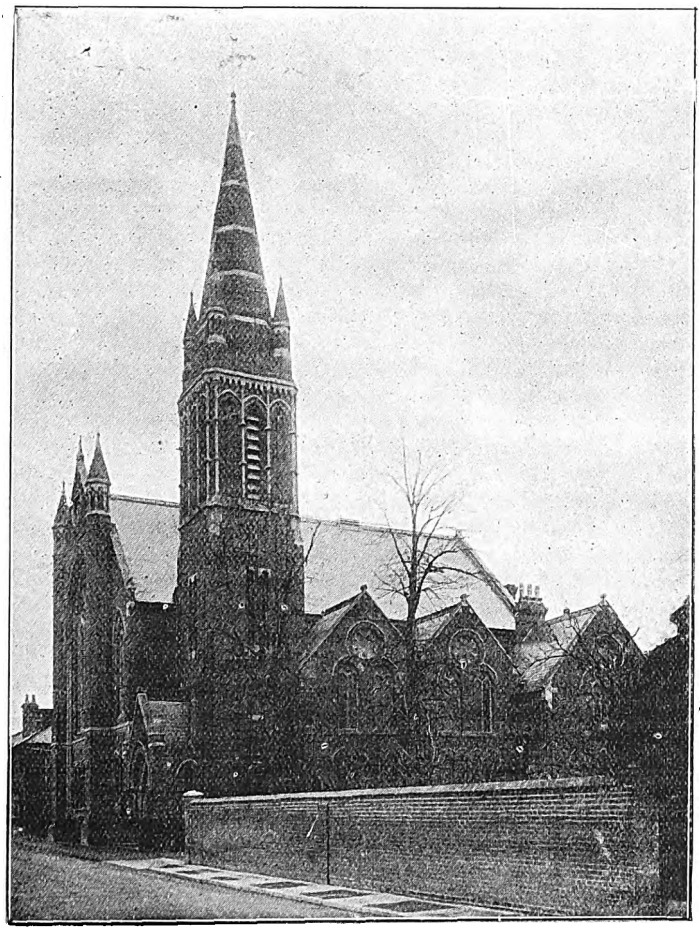
"Yes, indeed. It has been established nearly twenty years, and the place has been generally crowded. Some come for the advertisements, some for reference, many journalists flock in to see if their articles are out yet, and some stay to read, or play chess and draughts. Those who stay to read want to feed, so we supply that too. In fact, it is a club without a subscription, except the 1d. entrance fee."

Digitized by Google

PROVINCIAL = = = BUT PROSPEROUS.

"HAVERHILL!"—Where is Haverhill?

Quaint little town on the borders of two counties—Essex and Suffolk—"far from the madding crowd,"—out of the beaten track of traffic, Haverhill is the last place one would expect to find the home of a surprisingly busy and prosperous church. Two years ago the Essex Congregational Union held its meetings there, and the prevailing note of conversation was one of intense surprise, at the splendid cathedral-like church, and well-appointed buildings. After a long and tedious journey from the outlying districts of the wide-spreading county of Essex, it came with something like a shock to discover that the little town to which they wended their way possessed a church that matched the best in the county, and a magnificent organ that was the envy of all. The reason for its prosperity is not far to seek. Given a really fine church and buildings in such an unexpected quarter as Haverhill, and the natural question is "Find the man!" In the case of Haverhill, an enormous debt has been owed to the vivid interest taken in the place by the Gurteens, whose large factories give employment to hundreds of people, and whose generosity has supported the Congregational Chapel and



CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, AVERHILL.

Digitized by Google

largely assisted in every scheme for the promotion of its improvement and usefulness. Under the last two pastors—the Rev. Richard Fotheringham. M.A., and the Rev. J. F. Shepherd, M.A.—the large place has steadily been filled, and all manner of religious institutions kept in a thriving condition.

but, being a "Noncon." first and a musician afterwards, these offers were reiected.

We published his portrait in the last issue of the TEMPLE MAGAZINE, as Chairman of the Union of his county and his fine utterance in the chair on "The Christ of History" justified the election of the

THE INTERIOR WITH GREAT ORGAN.

No better sphere ot usefulness could be offered to any young minister than to have the opportunity of touching the large numbers of young people who throng the church. The musical gifts of Mr. Shepherd are unique—his skill as an organist having secured him offers of valuable musical preferment if he would be content to sink his Nonconformity, county. The flourishing condition of the many agencies in the Church is as great a surprise as the buildings. There is a large Sunday-school, a Christian Band of sixty members, a Guild with a roll of 220, a Girls' Free Church Guild, a Boys' Life Brigade and drum and fife band, a large institute and gymnasium, in addition to all the usual societies.

Digitized by Google

In the Public Eye

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

WE present our readers with a portrait of the new President of the Devon Baptist Association, whose meetings this year are now being held at Barnstaple. The Rev. William Thomas Adey has been pastor of the historic Baptist church at Kingsbridge, Devon, since the year 1893, having previously exercised his ministry in Darlington, Leeds, Scarborough, and London, where he succeeded the Rev. Charles Clark at Ealing. He was trained at Regent's Park College, under the venerable Dr. Joseph Angus and the great Hebraist, Dr. Benjamin Evans.

Mr. Adey is known as a ready platform speaker, a leader in his own county and elsewhere in the Y.P.S.C.E., and has kept a busy pen; the TEMPLE MAGAZINE has acknowledged his help, and one very popular hymn, No. 393, in the "Endeavour Hymnal" has been in constant demand ever since the World's Convention, when it was brought into general use, and is now quite well known and recognised by its opening stanza:—

There is room for little children
In the Kingdom of the Lord;
Jesus gathers them around Him
By the music of His Word.
While He hushes into silence
All that fain would hinderers be
With these words of gracious blessing
"Let the children come to Me."

As the son of the late Rev. E. Adey and the nephew of the late Rev. John Adey (one of the six young men of Gloucester who revived Sunday-schools and set the whole movement on the voluntary basis), it is not wonderful that Mr. Adey's literary ability should have been largely devoted to the Sunday-school. As he has been before the public eye now for nearly twenty years in the north and for more than half that time in the south of Eng-

REV. W. T. ADEY,
President of Devon Baptist Association.

Digitized by Google

land he has become one of the best known of our provincial ministers. As a naturalist, a bee-master, and a lover of the country he does not find rural life tedious or uninteresting, and is able to establish hearty relationship as a country pastor with the people whom he loves in the picturesque district of South Devon.

As a mission preacher in connection with the Simultaneous Mission, and the later movement conducted by the Sunday School Union, Mr. Adey enjoyed great success. It was no doubt as a recognition of his active services in Devon, Somerset, and Cornwall, and his devotion to the welfare of young people that he was selected last year to the vice-presidency and now to the chair of the Devon Baptist Association.

In north and south alike he has always been known as a zealous temperance reformer, and in politics an earnest and progressive Liberal—reserving, however, his political convictions for the platform. As a preacher he is distinctly expository and evangelical, and, we should judge, has been acted upon and influenced to a large and perhaps equal degree by Spurgeon and Dr. Maclaren, the great leaders of the denomination to which he belongs.

MR. J. LEWIS PATON is one of the men who are helping to increase the debt of London to the Provinces. A Nottingham boy, and the son of Dr. J. B. Paton, who himself has ever been "A man in the Public Eye," it is no wonder that having been placed in a most influential position he should at once emulate his father and seek to use its chances to their utmost extent. Night after night he is lecturing or speaking, and it is apparent to those who know him best that he is likely to make himself as distinctive and as impressive a force in London as Professor Drummond did in the North. When he was one of the Masters at Rugby, he was in great demand as a preacher and speaker at "Men's Owns" and P.S.A.'s, and London and its environs naturally refuses to put him on the "retired list." He is untiring in working in connection with the National Home Reading Union, the Ruskin Society, and the Cancer Society, and other associations to which he has given time he could ill spare amidst his many other duties as Head of one of the greatest public schools in London. There, at Gower Street, he has won the enthusiastic devotion of the boys, to whom he is a warm friend, but one who, in justice to the boys' higher interests, can be sternness itself in the presence of

The Head-master of the University College School, Gower Street.

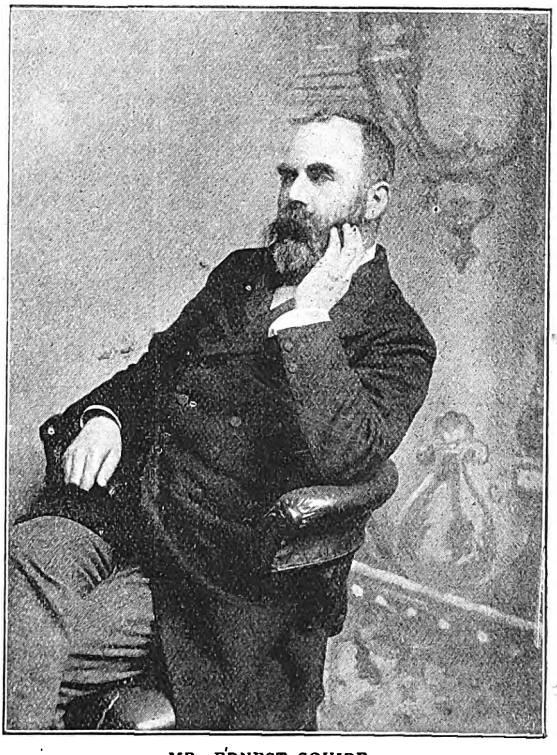
Digitized by Google

MR. PERCY WEBB,
Hon. Director of the British Chautauqua.

any laxity or shiftlessness. That "character is after all the chief asset" is his ideal in training, and towards this end he shapes all his relations with the boys, with the happiest results.

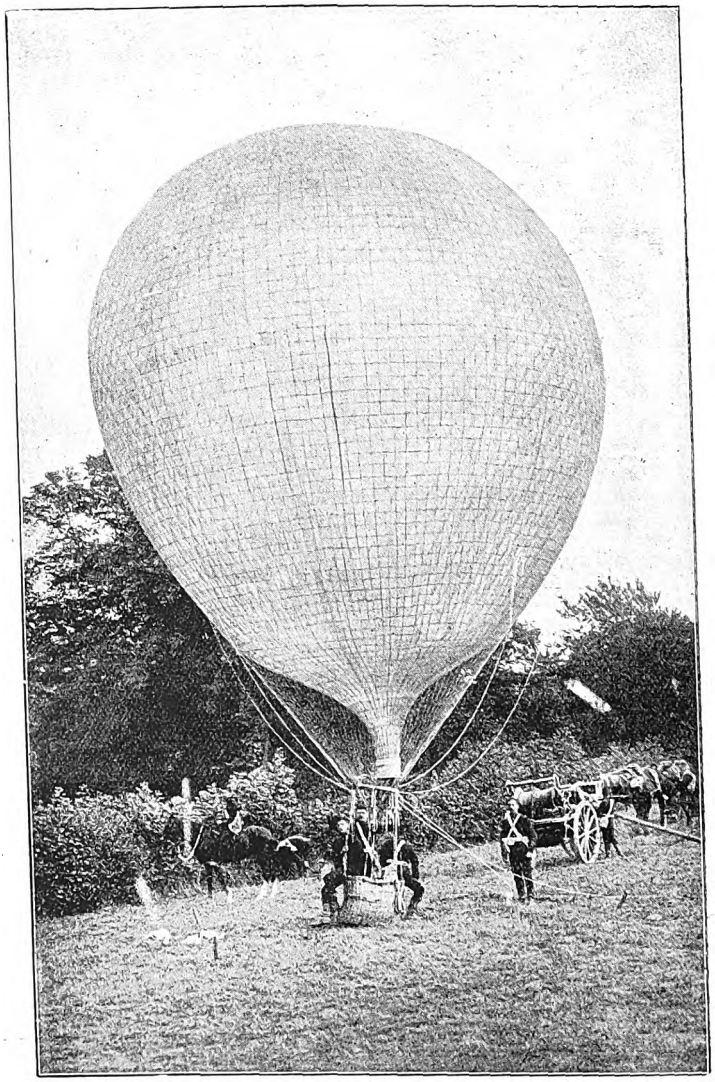
MR. PERCY WEBB, well known as "Percy Webb" to the frequenters of the summer schools that have been held for eight years in connection with the British Chautauqua, is a very fine specimen of the English business man who devotes his leisure to doing good. Some years ago he started the Association for the Promotion of Home and Foreign Travel, and hearing of the huge success of the "Chautauqua" movement in the United States, it occurred to him that the same movement might catch on in England. So he initiated the first of the summer schools. Unlike the American original, the British "Chautauqua" has no settlement of its own, but has to take wing year by year to different places; yet, in spite of this difficulty, there is no denying the success of the movement. Mr. Webb is an old Mill-Hillian, the son of Mr. Conrad Webb, so well known for his generosity. It becomes increasingly clear, regarding Mr. Percy Webb's responsibilities entailed by his business in Carrara and at the docks, that if he can find time for working amongst others, so can any man.

IN the conduct of public business, the men "who do the work" are often out of sight and unknown; yet, as a matter of fact, their energy and initiative practically make the success of their societies. There is a great deal of "office" work, on which a society depends, that can be done by any mechanic; there is a great deal also that can only be carried out by an active brain, an instinct for organisation, a determined purpose, and the dedication of the whole of time and energy. To the last class of workers belongs Mr. Ernest Squire, who, for about a quarter of a century, has been the Secretary of the United Kingdom Beneficent Association, providing annuities for those who really "have seen better days." He is full of kindly sympathy to applicants, and has devoted his whole life to serving the interests of the Society.



MR. ERNEST SQUIRE,
Secretary of United Kingdom Beneficent Association.

Digitized by Google



A MILITARY BALLOON.

Digitized by Google

The Conquest of the Air.

WHAT is the particular charm of the idea of being able to cleave one's way through the air? It certainly appears to have possessed a most weird fascination for many years on many minds, and is still the dream of inventors. One of the most up-to-date issues of the present month is a book by John Alexander, published by Partridge and Co., on the Conquest of the Air, dealing at length in 160 pages with the history of these dreams. It traces, from the earliest crude attempts at balloons to the culmination in the recent Zeppelin airship, Santos-Dumont's and Hiram Maxim's flying machines, a slow but steady development, and we are nearer to its fuller realisation by the facts mentioned in the book. One hundred and fifty years seems a long way to have come for such a small result, but we have done enough to show that flying is practicable, and that the steering of balloons is a possibility. The history of the attempts that have proved this much to us is one as replete with thrilling adventures as any pages of military and naval triumphs. The heroes of land and sea are outmatched by the heroes of the air. The former in a white heat of passion have risked life and limb in enterprises that have scarcely lasted long enough to test the staying power of courage to the utmost, but the latter with dauntless intrepidity have gone into a foreign element, in vessels which could not even be tested without personal risk and danger, and which, therefore, had not been proved. Almost has it been suicide in the name of science, sooner or later the fatal result has seemed certain, and more often than not has come, and the long list of the men who have dared the risk is a list of men who have shared the risk and paid the awful forfeit. From fire balloons to the improved gas balloons, through famous aerial voyages—across the Alps, and the ocean, racing through clouds, round the Eiffel Tower with Santos-Dumont, adventuring, signalling, prospecting, and scientifically observing, Mr. Alexander takes us in his smartly written book, and leaves us at the close discussing with the two latest inventors the possibilities before aerial navigation and its limits. From this discussion we gather that the future of the solution of the problem lies rather in the direction of the use of bodies heavier than the air they displace, and carried along on the principle of the downward beat of the bird's wings, and not in the use of the balloon or its adaptation. This is according to Nature, which knows nothing of balloon-shaped bodies, but abounds with birds heavier than the air in which they fly.

"The Conquest of the Air" (S. W. Partridge & Co.), 1s. 6d.

A Remarkable Article will appear in the next number—"How the Dead have been Raised after Three Hours," being particulars of a Remarkable Discovery by a French Doctor.

Digitized by Google

MARTINIQUE,

THE ISLAND OF DESTRUCTION.

MARTINIQUE is, with two exceptions, Trinidad and Guadaloupe, the largest of that innumerable chain of islands called the Lesser Antilles, which, starting from Porto Rico, the most easterly of the Greater Antilles, and ending off the north-eastern coast of Venezuela, forms the geographical boundary between the Atlantic and the Carribean Sea. These islands likewise form the eastern end of the great American area of volcanic activity and earthquake disturbances, of which the Greater Antilles may be considered the northern boundary, and Mexico, Central America, and the northern part of the Andes the western. The Lesser Antilles are said to contain seven active volcanoes and a large number of extinct ones; but it is difficult to define with exactness when a volcano may be said to be extinct. Mount Pelée, which has caused so much mischief, was certainly regarded as extinct in the middle of last century, and was probably so regarded a month ago. Yet in August, 1851, it burst out in activity, after, according to one authority, having been quiescent for one hundred years; while once more, after nearly fifty-one years' rest, it has again burst forth. In the eruption of 1851, no lava was thrown out, but great quantities of ashes and mud, strongly impregnated with sulphur, were ejected.

Martinique is an oval-shaped island, about fifty miles long, and seventeen wide at its broadest part, its total area being a trifle under 400 square miles. Before this catastrophe it had a population of 190,000, mostly negroes. Like all the larger islands of this chain it has a mountain range running north and south throughout the greater part of its length, the highest and most northerly peak being Pelée, which is 4,450 feet high. There are also six extinct volcanoes on the island. The plains near the coast are well cultivated and highly fertile, being watered by numerous streams which flow through lovely valleys. The portions of the island not under cultivation are densely wooded, even up to the summits of the highest mountains, which gives it a very beautiful appearance from the sea, as well as from the lowlands. It has been described as one of the most beautiful spots on the face of the earth.

The island has many natural advantages, not the least being its good harbours on the west, where it is most sheltered from hurricanes, and the great fertility of the soil. The French have paid great attention to its development, and in consequence it is perhaps the most thriving of all the islands in the West Indies; but it is feared that this calamity will be its ruin. The capital is Fort de France—formerly Fort Royal—but St. Pierre was, until destroyed, by far the larger town and the chief commercial port of the island. Being built on sloping ground, the view from the bay was extremely pleasing, the town seeming to rise in terraces embowered in gardens and groves. The harbour, which was defended by a fort and protected by a lighthouse, was very commodious for such a small island, and was usually crowded with vessels of small tonnage. The face of the country round the town was beautiful, smoothly rising in upland sugar-cane fields interspersed by winding roads and dotted with white houses, while at the back of these to the north abruptly rose Mount Pelée, which—being partly cultivated, and the remainder clad with trees—formed a pleasing background.

Such is, or was, the pleasing side of the picture, but on this earth the most beautiful prospect has its dark side. Martinique has been described as the centre in which the fury of nature in the West Indies concentrates itself. Earthquakes, hurricanes, and floods are too frequent to be phenomenal, while other disasters and plagues occasionally visit it. The town of St. Pierre has been four times destroyed by fire previous to its recent destruction. The island was first colonised by one hundred Frenchmen in 1635, in the days when even the extraordinary phenomena of nature were not recorded by the colonists, but in 1657 an earthquake occurred of sufficient violence to find its place in permanent records. In 1753 no less than thirty-three shocks were felt within a period of three months, while on August 13th, 1766, 440 persons lost their lives and 580 were injured by another. On January 11th, 1839, the town of Fort Royal was almost entirely destroyed and 400 lives lost. In 1891 great destruction of life and property was caused by an earthquake accompanied by a cyclone, when the loss of life was estimated at from 600 to 900. These are but a few of the violent earthquakes, while slight shocks are constantly occurring.

Digitized by Google

It is a curious fact, which may be only a coincidence, that at the time of the great earthquake at Lisbon on October 31st, 1755, an earthquake occurred at Martinique about four hours later, while the town of Quito, in South America, was overwhelmed. This recent eruption of Pelée took place about the same time as earthquake shocks were felt in Spain and Portugal, and also in Central America.

Hurricanes, that scourge of the West Indies, are specially violent in Martinique, and again and again have caused widespread havoc in a few hours. However, on two occasions they proved a blessing by destroying another plague in a manner which is probably unique in the history of the world. In 1763, a plague of ants spread over the island which lasted for three years. These little insects were of a peculiar kind, previously unknown, and were supposed to be brought by the slaveships coming from Africa. When once introduced, they multiplied so rapidly that they completely overran the whole country, doing considerable damage wherever they appeared. All the culinary vegetables were devoured, and quadrupeds were scarcely able to subsist, and the largest trees were infested in such a manner with these insects that the most voracious birds would not alight on them, while the sugar canes and other staple crops were almost entirely destroyed. At length, when they had baffled the art of man to get rid of them, there came a hurricane which swept them all away. In 1780 the sugar ants, as they were called, appeared again and rapidly multiplied as before, but when they had assumed a most threatening appearance there came another hurricane by which they were entirely destroyed.

The inhabitants of Martinique are Roman Catholics of a most superstitious and bigoted type, with the necessary consequence that they are ignorant and unenlightened, both on secular and spiritual matters.

FIT FOR THE KING!

YOUR HOUSE DECORATED FOR A SHILLING.

FESTOONING GARLANDS. LANTERNS, FLAGS, ETC.

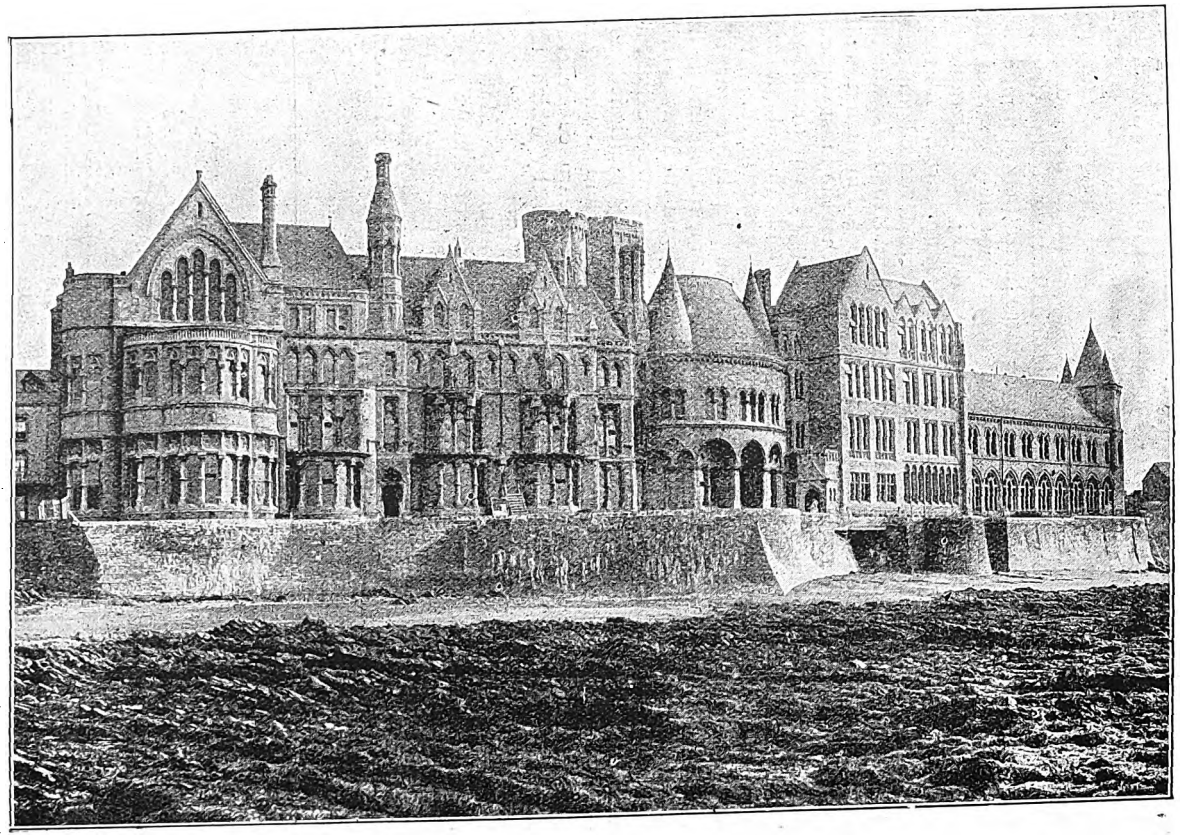
CORONATION CASKETS.

IMITATIVE SEVEN DIAMOND GOLDEN CROWN BROOCH.

Brilliant Gents' Pins, etc., apparent gold, plain, or handsomely woven in crimson, white and purple. E.R., Maltese Cross, Crown, and other designs. Excellent effigies of our King and Queen on pretty gilt sovereigns and medals. Assorted sample recommendation box, post free 12 stamps. Grand consignments, 2s. 6d., 5s. Apply early, T.B.L. House, Savoy Corner, Thames Embankment, Strand, London. Also Box assorted Garlands, Lanterns, Bunting, 12 stamps. Do not buy a Camera until you have seen the T.B.L. Midget. Post free, complete, carefully sent, 2s. 6d.

T.B.L. HOUSE, SAVOY CORNER, THAMES EMBANKMENT, STRAND, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

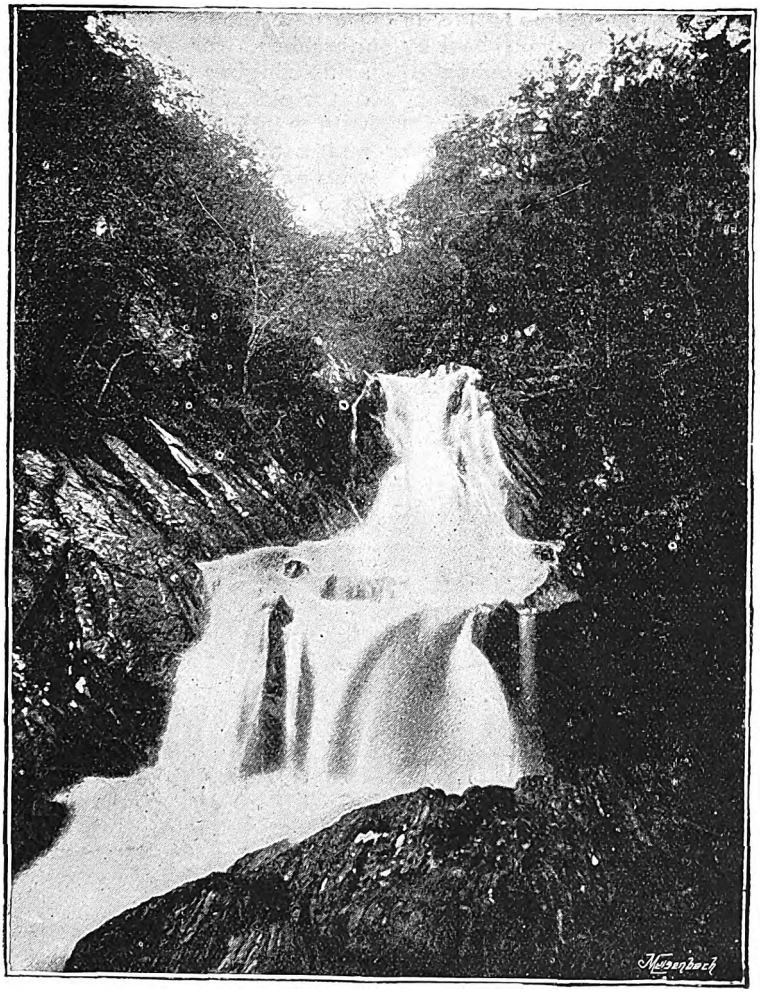


UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, ABERYSTWYTH.

Digitized by Google

The British Chautauqua.

OUR readers may be interested by a short reference to the rather "stick-jaw" title term of the society and its implications. "Chautauqua" is a word which hails from America. It stands first out towards each end, somewhat after the fashion of the figure eight. It is a spot of ideal beauty, in no way spoiled by the picturesque settlement formed on its banks. During the summer months



FALLS NEAR ABERYSTWYTH.

tor a place, secondly for an idea. As to place, it is the name of a lake in New York State, and is of Indian origin, meaning "a bag tied in the middle." The lake is so characterised through its shape narrowing in the centre while broadening thousands of thoughtful people meet here to unite holiday with the opportunity of mutual helpfulness and goodwill. This embodies the idea. Specially to the front is the discussion of subjects bearing directly and indirectly on the religious and ethical training of the young, also the best means and methods of practically preparing for this work. In addition, place is found for suggestions on self-culture, so as to be the better equipped from every point of view for active service in church and civic life.

Digitized by Google

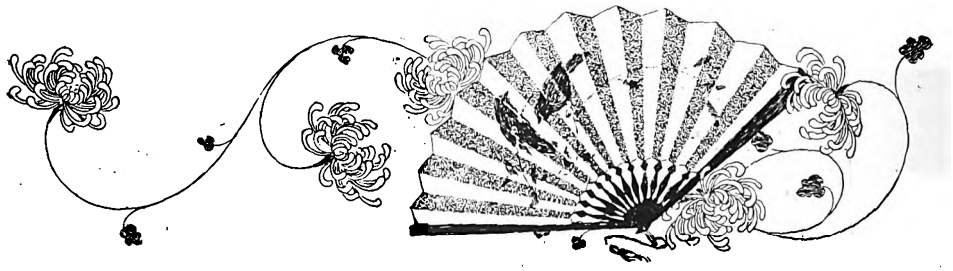
Association with the working of the idea, as presented at Aberystwyth, certainly leads to the conclusion that it is no "goody goody" affair got up in order that its members may meet together to sing hymns and drink milk. On the contrary, the tone of the religious life is raised by the inculcation of a healthy relaxation, not to say hilarious mirthfulness, no less than by the exchange of thought on the more momentous questions of human life and duty. Those whose privilege it is year by year to attend the lectures and excursions find this a perfectly workable combination, and even beyond; the one element serving in no small degree to heighten the positive enjoyment of the other.

The whole scheme is acknowledged to be a big success over the water. There is every reason to believe that "The British Chautauqua" will fully justify the effort that has been made to introduce, under this title, an organisation similar in aims and objects to the older and stronger society in America.

The British Chautauqua, like Wales, is anything but flat. Hill and valley, woodland and pasture, do not present a richer variety to the eyes than the opinions and idiosyncracies of one's fellow-Chautauquans offer to the mind. Here are Anglicans, Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, Presbyterians—pioneers of the new thought that comes victoriously marching over the hilltops, and timid souls clinging to the vanishing garments of the old. Here are sweet girl graduates with theories settling everything in heaven and earth, and white-haired ministers with experience enough to shatter all the theories ever invented. One smiles as one recalls all the discussions—religious, social, economic, æsthetic and literary—that reach the ears over the dinner-table.

There is a unity of feeling unmistakably about the Chautauquans, and a breezy atmosphere that refreshes the mind as much as Aberystwyth does the body.

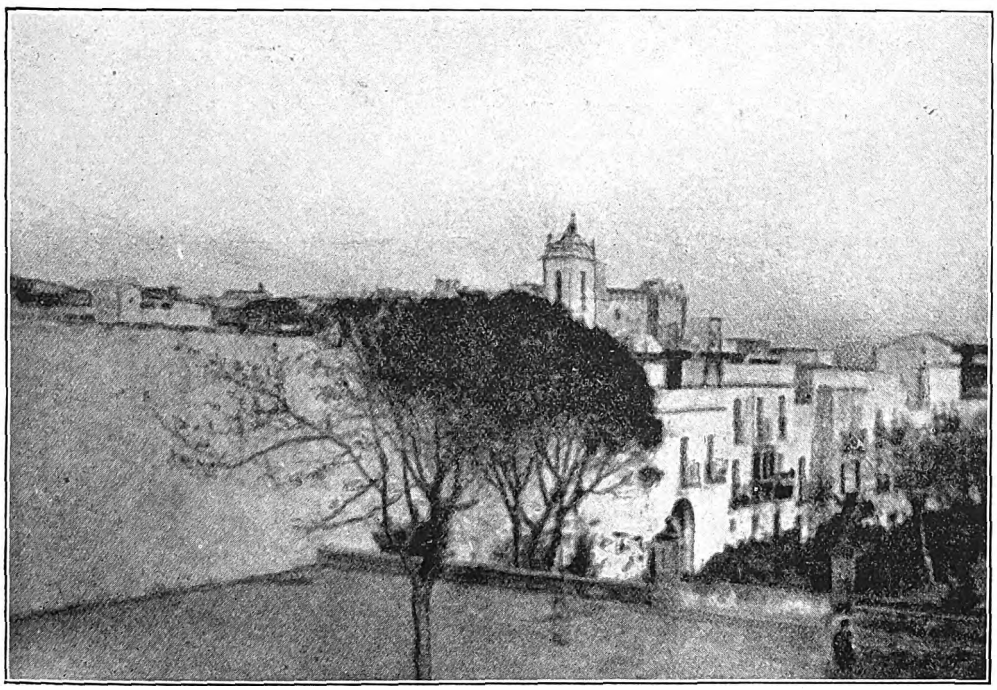


Digitized by Google

A TRIP TO TARIFA.

By ELIZABETH P. L. HIGGIN.

AS the little steamer which plies between Gibraltar and Tangier coasts along the Andalusian shore it passes close to a quaint, old-fashioned town, betowered and battlemented with walls that seem almost to rise out of the water. This is Tarifa, the southern point of Europe—the spot where, in 705, the first Arabs landed to spy out the Promised Land of Spain under their leader Tarifa, who gave his name to the place. So fascinated were we by the appearance of the town during the short glimpse we caught of it from the sea that we determined to visit it if possible, and a few days later, when we were at Algeciras, the railway terminus for Gibraltar, we arranged to make the attempt. Our inquiries elicited the fact that communication with Tarifa is kept up by a diligence three times a week. It starts at the early hour of six, and neither the vehicle nor the thought of our probable fellow-passengers is at all alluring. So we determine to cover the fourteen miles on foot; and behold us, accordingly, one lovely April morning, marching gaily out of Algeciras, each burdened with a string bag containing our lunch for the day and our outfit for the night.



A VIEW OF TARIFA.

The road at once strikes inland, and leads us gradually upwards through grassy meadows, on which a herd of cows

Digitized by Google

(a rather uncommon sight in Southern Spain) are grazing to the music of their low-tuned bells. Beneath us, as we turn to look backwards, lies Algeciras, and beyond, on the opposite side of the Bay, the huge limestone pile of Gibraltar rock rises out of the sea lonely and defiant, connected with the mainland by the low-lying fields of the Neutral Ground. Over the whole scene the Southern sun pours a flood of light. A little further and the African coast, hidden up till now by the green hillocks between us and the sea, rises into view still veiled in mist. Another hour's climb brings us to a one-storied

A WOMAN OF TARIFA.

shanty by the roadside, which to our delight provides refreshments, so we unpack our provisions and make a halt. Our landlady, a hard-featured, sun-bronzed woman, who looks fifty, though thirty is probably nearer her age, is astonished at our energy in walking to Tarifa. Tourists, she tells us, seldom pass that way, though on Sunday she sometimes has a party of cyclists from Gibraltar. Certainly the surface of the road is perfect, but there are many stiff hills to be faced by those awheel. We learn from our hostess that it will take us three hours more to reach our destination, so we seize our slightly lightened bags and start off again. Our way now leads through woods of cork trees with their dark green foliage and naked trunks, from which the bark, the chief wealth of this district, has been stripped and sent down to Gibraltar for exportation. A sudden bend of the road takes us toward the sea, and we stand seemingly just above the Straits. We feel as though we could pitch a stone on to the rugged grey African hills rising sheer out of the water. Opposite to us is Ceuta, a miniature Gibraltar—rocks, low-lying isthmus, and all—the stronghold in days of old of that Count Julian, who, to revenge himself on Roderick, king of the Visigoths, persuaded the Moors to invade Spain. Further along the coast the African Pillar of Hercules, the pendant to Gibraltar Rock, rears itself against the sky. The beauty of the whole scene, the grey peaks, the blue dancing water, cannot be described. We turn away reluctantly and wander on. Our road now winds downhill past a curious crag, which we have noticed from afar. It is cloven in three pieces, though united at the base, and stands a solitary sentinel on the top of a green knoll overlooking the sea. A little further and the landscape suddenly alters. The trees vanish and we only see a waste of dwarf palm dotted here and there with huge boulders. Uphill once more, then round a corner, and Tarifa lies beneath us. Another hour's walk downhill and we reach our goal. We pass through a gate in the walls into a narrow street, and are at once attacked by a rabble of small boys, the usual escort of strangers in Spain. One of the urchins calls "fonda," the Spanish for inn. We have been told that there is only one hostelry in the town, so I say "Si fonda," and our guide leads us to a small house with a sign over the door, where, after some conversation, accommodation for the night is assigned to us.

Digitized by Google

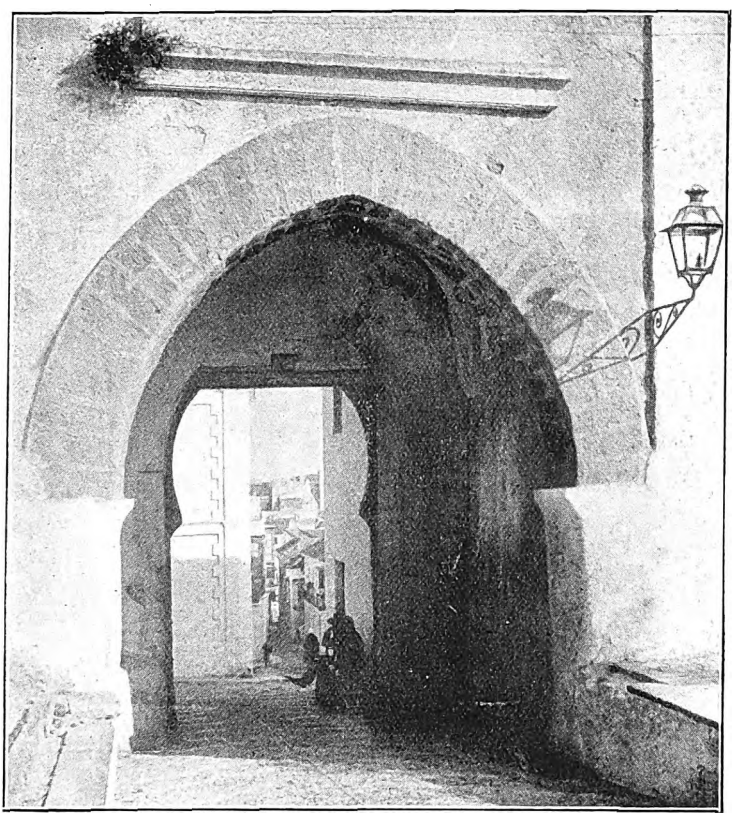
A few minutes' rest sufficed to recruit our strength, and as we wished to make the most of the time at our disposal, we started off to explore the lighthouse, interesting as being the most Southern point of Europe. The piece of land it stands on must originally have been an island, but since the barracks for the garrison have been built on it, it has been connected with the mainland by a broad wall on which runs a path. Scarcely had we left the shelter of our abode when the usual rabble of street arabs began to collect and increased in number while we advanced till our following must have been quite thirty strong. Not content with jeering remarks, they began to pelt us with stones, a by no means uncommon attention in Spain, but at the gateway leading into the island safety awaited us, for our persecutors could not pass the sentinel. A Spanish officer, to whom I applied for permission to visit the lighthouse, very cordially assented, and ordered a soldier to escort us thither. The inmates of the lighthouse, consisting of father, mother, two daughters, and a ragged assistant, turned out to receive us, delighted at the excitement of welcoming strangers. We clambered to the top of the pile and looked out into the fast fading twilight. The African coast opposite loomed grey through the gathering gloom, the waves lapped against the rocks at our feet, to our right stretched the broad Atlantic, to our left the Mediterranean. Our kind host insisted that we should wait for the great ceremony of the day, the lighting of the red lamp, which, according to its attendant, cast its glare out for twenty miles over the sea, though later on, when I sailed down the Straits on my way home, I could only detect a feeble glimmer. The light was waning fast, and dinner, followed by bed, formed an attractive prospect, as we bade our friends at the lighthouse farewell and plodded back to our quarters.



MAIN GATE OF ENTRANCE TO TARIFA.

Spain is said to be the most democratic country in Europe, and certainly our experiences at the fonda went far to prove it. While we were unpacking our meagre outfit, the damsel who attended on us, and who appeared to fulfil the duties of housemaid, rushed into the room without the ceremony of knocking, tapped me familiarly on the shoulder, in proof of friendly intention, and then sat down and watched my modest preparations for the evening. She was followed by a younger girl, who also seated herself comfortably, and then the nurse and baby of the establishment appeared and took the only remaining chair. Things, however, reached a climax when a young guests—all men—among them two officers from the garrison, kept up an animated conversation with the waitress, chiefly about ourselves, for strangers are rare in Tarifa. They were anxious to know of what nationality we were, and how we had arrived, could not credit that we had walked all the way from Algeciras, but supposed that we must have started in a carriage and dismissed it en route. A great clatter accompanied the serving as the damsel dashed down knives, forks, and glasses, and once, when one of man strolled in; but he, to do him justice, only surveyed the scene for a few minutes, and then retired. At dinner, which, according to the time-honored Spanish custom, appeared just an hour after the appointed time, we were waited on by a maiden of most slatterny appearance, with an untidy top-knot of coarse black hair surmounted by a rose, and inches of powder on her face. Soap and water are unnecessary to a Spanish woman's toilette, but poudre de riz is seldom lacking, however poor she may be. The other the officers demanded a napkin, she tossed it deftly to him from the opposite side of the table. The food on this occasion was not so drenched in oil as is common in Spain, and we found the beds, which we sampled with pleasure after our long trudge, clean and comfortable. Our retinue, two young women, nurse, baby, and all, attended the next morning while we were dressing (alas! the doors did not lock!), and were overwhelmed with amazement when they saw us brush our teeth, an operation of which they had neither seen, heard, nor thought. When the most untidy

Digitized by Google

ON OUR WAY TO THE LIGHTHOUSE.

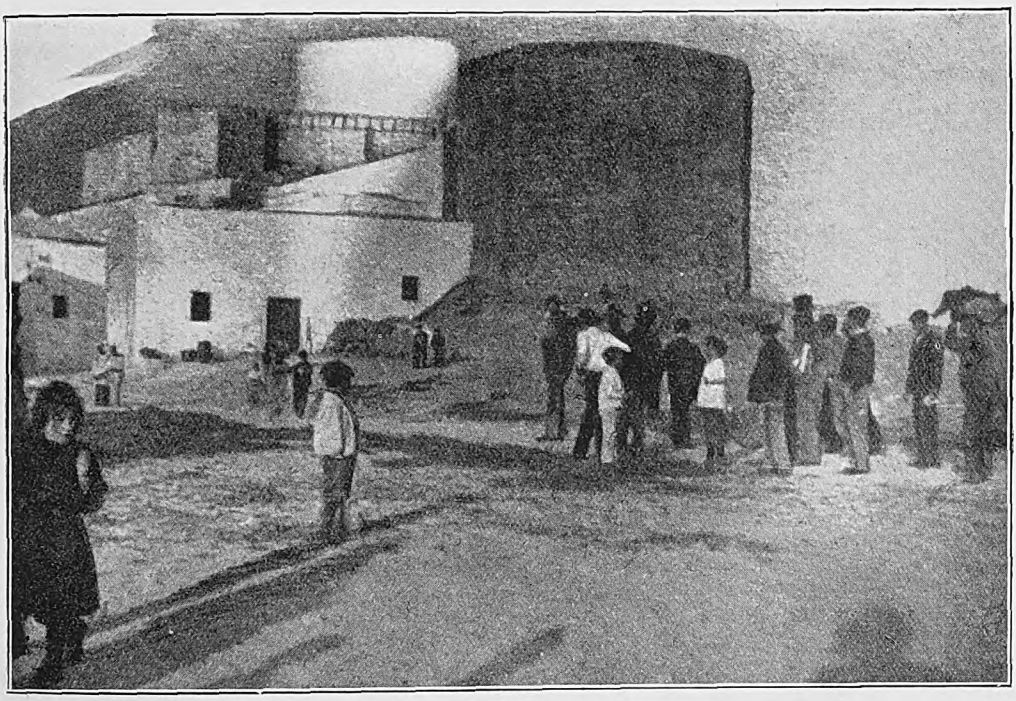
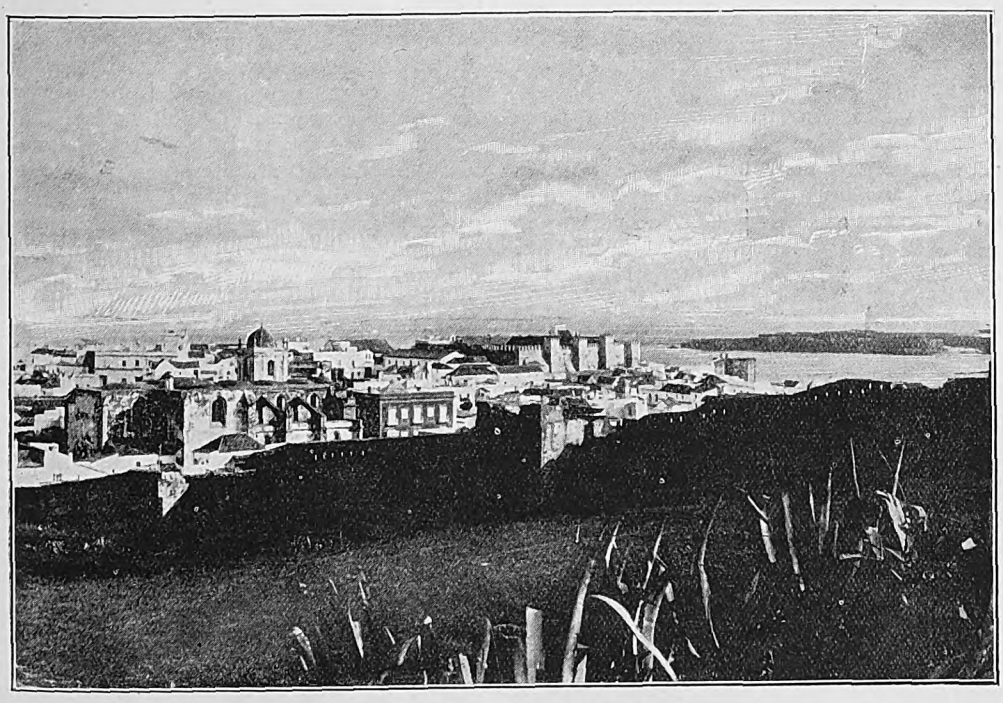
Digitized by Google

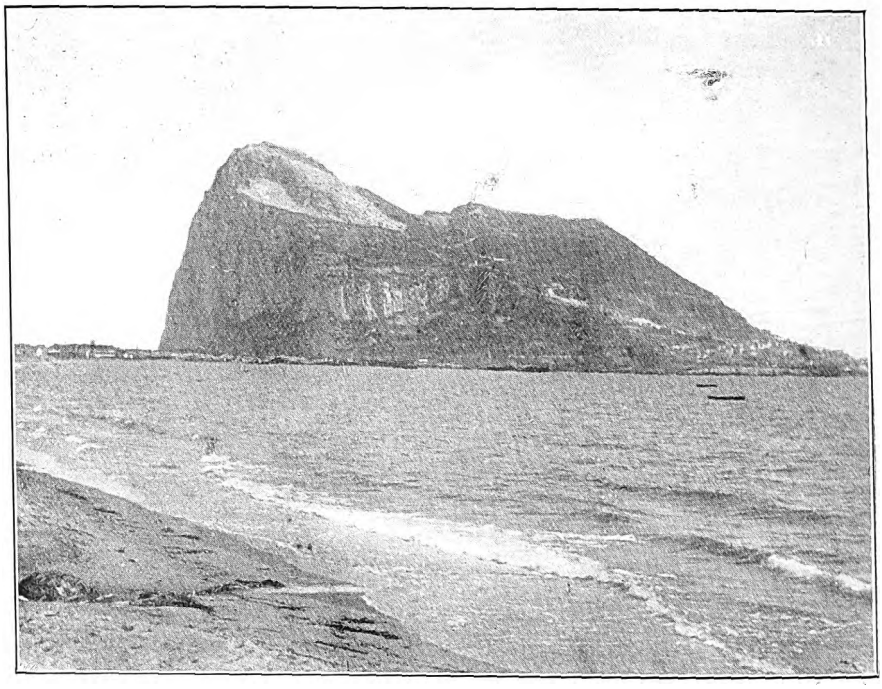


THE RABBLE WHICH PURSUED US.



VIEW OF TARIFA AND LIGHTHOUSE.

Digitized by Google



GIBRALTAR PORT.

maiden, however, seized my comb and passed it through her hair, it was my turn to express consternation, for the mop in question did not look as though it had been touched for weeks.

The visitor to Tarifa seems to have passed at one step from the twentieth century back to the Middle Ages. In olden times it was a celebrated stronghold, and withstood several sieges. Even as late as 1811, it was defended by the English against the attacks of the French. It was in the grim, thick-walled tower flanking the principal gate that Alonzo de Guzman held his own against the Moors in 1232. When the infidels threatened to kill his only son, who had fallen into their hands, unless the town surrendered, the father defiantly threw his dagger out of the window among the besiegers, crying, "I would rather that they slew the boy, and five others if I had them, than betray the place my king has given me to guard." True to their threat, the Moors cut off the youth's head and hurled it against the walls. The father looked out, startled by the cry of horror which burst from the garrison, and merely exclaimed, "I feared they had taken the city." It was easy to conjure up these barbarous scenes of bygone days, for the tide of progress, ever rolling onwards, seems to have passed by this little sea-girt town and left it stranded on the shore of time. The spirit of the long-vanished Moor yet lurks in his ancient haunts. Many of the women still shroud their faces in thick black veils; the old grey mosque stands there unaltered, though it is now used as a Christian church. The sight of a new house in process of construction struck us as an extraordinary anachronism, but it brought us back with a shock to thoughts of lunch and of our return to modern civilisation.

After lunch—a repetition of dinner, with the guests, the bepowdered handmaiden, and the clatter—we once more packed our bags and set forth on our tramp homewards. Upwards, along the wind-swept barren hillsides under the sway of the stormy Atlantic, till we once more reach the cork woods and green meadows over which the Mediterranean breezes wander. Another halt at the halfway house, and then, weary and footsore, back to Algeciras.

Digitized by Google

A Little Royal Lady of Long Ago.

A FAIRY TALE.

BY DOROTHY D.

"FLOWERS! Who ever heard of such stupid things as flowers? They are everywhere, as common as the gravel on the paths. If I only go down the steps, there they are, nodding and bobbing, as if there were no such things as governesses, or hateful, ugly dresses to wear, when one might just as well be dressed anyhow this weather. I think it is horrid!"

So spoke Princess Imogen, of the Middle Ages, in the days of the fairies, elves and pixies. She was sitting at the foot of the marble staircase which led up to her father's palace. All around was as lovely and fair a place as one might wish to see. The beautiful flowers, which had received such undeserved blame from their wilful little mistress, bloomed from the tall vases on the stairhead and ornamented the soft turf. Roses of every hue in which roses are seen twined around the marble balustrade and lay in long wreaths on the steps themselves; roses swayed and shook their petals down from the long bowery archway of rose trees, extending from the staircase to the smooth river, where the stretch of green-sward ended.

The little Princess was generally very pretty, her luxuriant golden hair and blue eyes being her chief charms; but at present her brows were contracted in a very discontented and ugly frown, which spoilt all her prettiness, and drew attention to her great fault—a hasty temper. Her lap was full of roses, white, pink, and red, which she had idly pulled from their stalks as she passed the rose bushes, and was now pulling to pieces for sheer mischief. In this mood she heard her mother's voice calling her, so she ran quickly up the steps, at the top of which stood the Queen—a stately but gentle-looking lady. Now, Imogen had thought lately that her mother had been rather more strict with her than usual, and did not allow her to have her own way quite so much as she used to do; and when she grumbled, which was about a hundred times a day, she caught her mother's eyes fixed upon her very severely instead of taking no notice of her, as before had been the case. Just at this moment the Queen looked very solemn, and when her daughter came running up to her she did not smile, but said: "Imogen, you know I told you that if you continued to be so naughty I should have to punish you in some way. You have not tried to be good at all, and this morning you have been exceptionally disobedient; therefore I have sent for the Fairy of the Mirror—she only comes to children who are very naughty, and teaches them lessons they never learnt before and which they never forget. She has just come, and is waiting to see you. You will go with her until you have learnt to be a better girl than you are now."

Imogen was very much frightened at this, but—partly from curiosity, and partly from the thought that her mother could not mean to send her away—she followed the Queen into the Throne Room, where her father was in conversation with someone—the Fairy of the Mirror.

The Princess really was frightened now, and clung to her mother, begging her not to send her away. But her mother only said, "Listen to what the Fairy has to say." Imogen had not seen her face yet, as she was turned towards the King, but on hearing the Queen's voice she looked at Imogen, and immediately the terrified girl was no longer frightened, for she thought she had never seen such a kind, lovely face before, except her mother's. The Fairy's hair was jet black, and it hung down right to her feet, only caught back by a band of stars on the forehead, which twinkled and glittered every time she moved. But the most wonderful things about her were her eyes. They were large brown ones, and they looked so tenderly upon the Princess that she felt fascinated by their gaze. Her dress was white, and fell softly in long trailing folds on the ground, while all over it glittered those bright stars, peeping out from every fold, till Imogen could not bear to look at it. She expected to hear the Fairy address her in a manner stern and angry, but was much surprised when she only said, "You must come with me, Princess." All fear of the Fairy was now gone, and when she held out a white hand to Imogen, that generally rebellious young lady took it very submissively. At that moment the Throne Room, the Queen and King, all disappeared, and Imogen found herself in a lovely crystal car, with six white doves attached, being borne rapidly through the air. The Fairy of the Mirror sat at her side. Strange to say, Imogen did not begin to cry, as she would have done in any other case, but she did feel rather frightened, and wondered where her father and mother were, and if she should ever see them again. As this thought occurred to her she began to wish she were back again, and she looked at the Fairy, and said, "Oh, please, dear Fairy, do let me go back, or else tell me if I shall ever see my mother again." But the Fairy said not a word, only laid her hand on Imogen, when a little mirror appeared in the wall of the car, in which the Princess saw her father and mother, standing on the palace steps, and looking up, as she rightly thought, at the car, very far away. Then the Fairy spoke. "When you have learnt your lesson, you shall go back," said she. And the Princess, instead of asking any more questions, felt a soft calm stealing over her, and she unconsciously learnt her first lesson—to be patient. On they went, so swiftly through the air, until it grew dark, and the stars, bright as the diamonds on the Fairy's brow, came out to look at the car. Presently it began to get colder, until the Princess shivered, and she looked out and saw below nothing but glistening icebergs, illuminated by the great Northern lights. Imogen then thought, "I expect it is the North Pole; anyhow, I wish it was warmer." She turned to the Fairy and said, "Please, I am dreadfully cold." The Fairy said nothing, but again laid her hand on Imogen's, meanwhile looking at her from out the depths of those clear brown eyes; Imogen felt a warm glow all over her now, and quite forgot the cold.

Digitized by Google

HER MOTHER SAID, "LISTEN TO THE FAIRY."

Just at this moment the car began to descend, slowly and steadily; the icebergs drew nearer and nearer, while a light so very bright that the Princess was dazzled, seemed to hang over all. The car stopped at the foot of a long flight of steps, which sparkled all over with snow. At the top Imogen saw a vast mirror, which reflected all the icebergs round it, and over which hung icicles, like crystals. Imogen thought she never had seen anything so beautiful before. She wondered what was coming next, when the Fairy took her hand and led her to a seat at the foot of the steps, hollowed out in an iceberg. The Fairy herself went on towards the mirror, and, as she went, Imogen noticed that her dress was a perfect shower of bright stars. She seemed to walk in a clear cold light, which shed its brilliance on the ice around, making it more sparkling than before. When she reached the top of the steps she turned, and, looking at Imogen, said, "You have now reached the first part of your lesson, Princess. Here you shall see how the flowers you despise so much have the power to bring to less fortunate ones happiness and peace. You must watch the mirror, and when the cloud which now hangs over it rises you shall

Digitized by Google

"SHE WAS SITTING AT THE FOOT OF THE MARBLE STAIRCASE."

Digitized by Google

see what you shall see." And then the white mist in the front of the mirror lifted slowly, and this is what Imogen saw.

A room, so poorly furnished that it could hardly be called a room, but for the fact that it was beautifully neat and clean. By a large window, through which the sun shone brightly, though it was winter, sat a little child, who looked about eight years old to Imogen. But what a child! Pale and thin, with a look of weariness seldom seen on so young a face, she seemed to Imogen as if a breath of wind would carry her away. I said she sat at the window, but that was hardly right. She lay back in her chair, as if sitting upright were an effort, one hand on a crutch at her side. Presently she spoke, as if to herself: "I do wish I had something to take care of and attend to every day; how lovely flowers would be. I should like snowdrops best, they remind me of the snow. But I never see one." She sighed, then shut her eyes and appeared to fall asleep. Stepping forward the Fairy took from her hair one of her shining stars, and laid it in the child's hand, when it immediately became a bunch of pure snowdrops. Imogen watched breathlessly. She saw the little girl open her eyes, and heard her exclamation of surprise and delight as she gazed on those sweet messengers of a brighter world than ours. The clouds slowly dropped again over the mirror, and the Fairly's lovely eyes again sought Imogen's reproachfully, yet kindly. The Princess felt a strange feeling of sorrow come over her, and when the Fairy said: "Come, Princess, we must not stay here," she took her hand with a sense of relief. They entered the car once more, and ascended higher and higher.

Many more scenes such as this did Imogen witness in her journeyings with the Fairy. They went to the west, where she saw broad fields of corn, others with poppies blazing scarlet in the sun. Cottage homes, too, with happy children playing in the little gardens, which were bright patches of flowers of every hue and kind. Every home was beautified by their presence, while they seemed to say to one and all "Be happy."

They visited the east, and here they saw a great prison, with the prisoners pacing, pacing, up and down one narrow courtyard, which sun and air seemed to shun. One man Imogen noticed in particular. He was old and grey, but more with trouble than real age. His face looked despairing and hard, and as he walked up and down he seemed like a caged lion. Then a gaoler opened the great iron-studded door that led out of the courtyard, and a little girl ran in, her hands full of red roses. She ran straight up to the man and held out her flowers, crying: "Look, father! See what I've brought you to-day." And the prisoner's face grew kinder as he took the flowers from her, for they brought back thoughts of the time, years ago, when he was a free man. With each scene like this, Imogen felt more ashamed of herself than ever when she thought of the flowers in her own home, which she had sometimes even trampled on in her fits of temper. And every time the Fairy looked at her, as she often did, she wished she might do something to atone for her past selfishness. At length the car turned southwards, after three months spent in the north, east, and west. Here Imogen felt herself become more cheerful as they sped swiftly over pretty lakes and thick forests, with mountains in the distance, looking like great masses of flowers. When they passed villages or large towns, the Fairy pointed out to her thousands of men, women, and children busily engaged in weaving and embroidering those dainty, delicate muslins and silks that Imogen had called "hateful and ugly," and which, for all she knew before, might have grown out of the earth specially for her benefit. Now, when she saw the people toiling, with never a moment wasted, until their eyes ached with the bright colours—when even the girls, as they sat at the house doors, had some fine material in their hands, which they were weaving into various fanciful patterns—now, Imogen thought, she had indeed learnt something.

During all this time the car had not stopped at all, but had passed slowly over those places the Fairy wished particularly to point out. As last they descended one evening, and the car stopped on the waters of a large lake, before a grove of waving, feathery mimosa. The Princess thought that she liked this better than the beautiful northern mirror. The yellow blossoms of the mimosa shook with every breath of wind, and were clustered together so closely that they looked like a cloth of gold. There was mimosa as far as the eye could reach, except under foot, where there was soft velvety grass, like a thick carpet. A great bird with beautiful golden plumage sat on the topmost bough, singing loudly enough for twenty birds. When the car stopped, the Fairy said, "This is my home, Imogen, and I brought you here before we say good-bye, that you may see my fairies. When you have seen them, there is only one more thing to do, and then you shall go home." When the Fairy ceased speaking, the golden bird spread his wings slowly, and Imogen watched with great interest for what should happen next. From among the mimosa came twelve lovely little fairies, in dresses of yellow and white made from the petals of the lily and buttercup. They carried in their hands tambourines of cedar wood, and leaves of the great arum lily, while yellow and white flower ribbons hung from them. They first advanced to the edge of the lake, and made a very low curtsey to the Fairy in her car; then stepping backward, they formed themselves into four rows, three fairies in each row, and, while the bird sang on his bough, they danced before their Queen and Imogen, in the mimosa grove. The Princess felt as if she were in an enchanted dream. The dainty way in which the fairies threw the tambourines over their heads, and looked at their Queen with delight shining in their eyes, made her wish that she might dance too. At length it was ended. As the bird stopped singing, the fairies stopped dancing, and again bent to the ground in front of the car, while the prettiest fairy stepped forward, and, holding out her arms, said, "Queen, we welcome you back again." The Queen of the Fairies, for so we must now call her, descended from her car, leading Imogen by the hand, while the little ones clustered round her, greeting her so lovingly that Imogen cried, "Let me be a fairy, too." But the Queen said, "You must go back to your mother and father, dear child, and be good to them. I think you have seen enough to teach you to be unselfish and kind to those who are poorer than yourself, and who are always in need of help from someone. But one more thing you must do before you go. You must show me that you mean to give up selfishness and pride by cutting off your hair. I know you are very proud of it, and that is why I ask for it. Will you obey me in this?" And Imogen, all her pride gone, was only too glad to do something for the Fairy she had learnt to love. Shaking out her long golden curls, she took a pair of tiny scissors from her pocket, and severed them from her head. There were exactly twelve curls, and each fairy took one, and laid it at her Queen's feet while Imogen, looking like a shorn sheep, looked on wonderingly. The Queen picked them up and began to weave them together very quickly, until she had made a broad coverlet, silky and shining. Then the fairies came round, and each took the coverlet in some part of it, and held it aloft. The Queen advanced, and taking Imogen in her arms, kissed her once on the forehead, and laid her on the grass. "Shut your eyes," she said. Imogen obeyed, the last thing she saw being the brown eyes fixed on her face, the mimosa waving all around while the fairies held the golden cloth above her head, and sang, like a lullaby:—

Digitized by Google

HER FATHER WAS TALKING TO THE FAIRY OF THE MIRROR.

The wind sighs softly among the leaves
Mimosa! Mimosa!
And the birds whisper low to the flowers and the trees
Mimosa! Mimosa!

Over the earth the pale moon doth rise,
While Princess Imogen closes her eyes;

Digitized by Google

Dreams wafting her far to her own colder skies.
Mimosa! Mimosa!

Lower and lower falls the great sun,
Mimosa! Mimosa!

Shedding last rays o'er a day that is done.
Mimosa! Mimosa!

Shadows creep slowly o'er earth, sea, and sky,
Far in the dark woods the nightingales cry,
While we sing so softly our sweet lullaby,
Mimosa! Mimosa!

Then the Princess knew no more, until she woke to find her mother and father bending over, smiling once more, as she lay on her own little white bed. "So you have come back again, Imogen," said her mother. "I am so glad. And do you think that you have learnt your lesson?" And I leave it to be guessed what Imogen said. But the most surprising thing of all was her beautiful hair was restored to her again.

DOROTHY D.

AMUSED AND AMUSING.

Digitized by Google

A Scientific . . . . Discourse.

FOR

THOUGHTFUL MINDS.

A RECORD OF FACTS,
PRINCIPLES, AND DISCOVERIES.

Free (or unoxidised) Phosphorus in its relation to the Improvement and Preservation of Human Life on Earth.

"THAT our medical men of every school, our greatest chemists, physiologists, philosophers, and men of science generally; as well as the inventors of, and those who deal in and adopt the numberless methods and preparations which are advertised in all directions and in every conceivable manner for the cure of the "Ills that flesh is heir to," suffer almost as greatly, and decay and die as quickly as the least educated in society, is matter of positive fact as well as of regret; and although it may be conceded that much good has been done by every system which has yet been proposed, there is certainly still a deficiency; still humanity suffers; and it is painfully evident that something more is urgently wanted—something more simple, more decided in its action, less of the character of ordinary physic or medicine, and more of the nature of a preserving and protecting aliment. This important desideratum medical science has, so far, failed to supply."

"Let us hope that the preparation now described is the beginning of a series of improvements in the right direction and of victories over the natural world."

These were the words of the late Dr. Samuel Birley, M.D., when introducing to the world, a few years ago, the results of his investigations, which had been the outcome of a lifetime's work and study.

What the medical world of to-day is beginning to recognise, he had many years ago satisfied himself upon: namely, the supreme control which the nervous system exercises, not only over the main functions, but over the most minute and apparently insignificant processes taking place in the body.

Dr. Birley's great rule is, therefore:—"Look after the nervous system; keep it well-nourished, and in perfect working order, and disease will little affect us."

Dr. Birley devoted many years to the discovery of some remedy that would fulfil the above indications. He carefully analysed the brains of persons who had died from various diseases, as well as of those who had been killed by accident whilst in the full vigour of health. He was struck by the deficiency of Phosphorus found in the brain matter of the weak and ailing, compared to what normally existed in the strong and healthy. From this fact the suggestion naturally arose that perhaps the loss of phosphorus had much to do with the weakened nerve force, and that its artificial administration might help to give back what had been lost. Such a thought was no less that prophetic, but simple as it appeared to be in this early stage of the investigation, it was found impossible to carry it out with any satisfactory result, for the following reason:—

Ordinary phosphorus, as understood by the chemist, cannot, by any known method, be made to be PERFECTLY SOLUBLE in the blood. It may be finely powdered and given in pills, etc., or dissolved in oil, alcohol, ether or chloroform, but in all these forms it is precipitated into a fine dust immediately on mixing with the juices of the stomach.

Many of these particles do not pass into the blood at all, but of those that do, they are completely stopped when they arrive at the liver, through which organ everything passes from the stomach before entering the general circulation. Hence Phosphorus administered in this form cannot possibly reach the nervous system, and cannot therefore aid in its restoration.

Knowing these facts, and convinced of the necessity of phosphorus as a Food, rather than a medicine, for the Brain and Nervous System, Dr. Birley experimented in many ways for the purpose of discovering a means of preparing it so that it would be free from these drawbacks.

His aim was to find out a form which would not precipitate in this manner, but remain in perfect solution throughout the system.

In the end he was rewarded by the discovery of a new process of preparation (by distillation) which rendered it, when taken by the mouth, absolutely soluble in the blood, and was perfectly satisfactory in its effects in every way. It could pass through the liver in a fluid state and thus reach the nerve tissues, which alone were in need of it.

No better proof of the value of this new form of phosphorus could be required than the very severe tests to which Dr. Birley put his invention. That it really does pass into the circulation, and enter into the composition of the Brain and Nervous System cannot be better discussed than in the inventor's own words:—

"The question has often been put to us—What proof have you that your PHOSPHORUS, when taken into the stomach, actually reaches and combines with the substance of the brain?

As it is truth only, and not opinion or hypothesis that we care for, our answer must be perfectly candid, and such only as practical investigation permits us to give. Because we cannot, or rather have no opportunity to, analyse the living human brain, before a course of PHOSPHORUS has been entered upon, we

Digitized by Google

admit that the evidence is not direct and positive. We are obliged to depend upon implication and analogy. The following items, however, force the conclusion we have maintained upon us :—

1ST.—PHOSPHORUS is a constant element of the brain and nervous system of all animals.

2ND.—The amount of PHOSPHORUS is different in persons of different mental and physical powers.

3RD.—In the brain and nerve-matter of those who have during life been characterised by great powers of mind and body and who have been in the prime of health suddenly killed in battle, or accident, or by other violence, a much larger amount of PHOSPHORUS has been discovered than is ever found is the brain-matter of ordinary persons who have been killed in a similar manner.

4TH.—The brain-matter of idiots contains the least amount of PHOSPHORUS. A little more PHOSPHORUS is found in that of persons not completely imbecile, but physically and mentally weak, languid in action, deficient in pluck and energy, full of apprehension, weak in memory and in application of thought and purpose, who hesitate in their resolves, and shrink from the general bustle of commercial life. The same may be said of persons who are fretful, low-spirited, anxious, fidgety, and odd-tempered, and of the positively ill-tempered and disagreeable.

5TH.—Persons who in early life have enjoyed a fair amount of mental and physical power, but who have suffered many years from great anxiety and sorrow consequent upon family bereavement and other losses and trials, have been found after death to have lost a great portion of the PHOSPHORUS which is common in the brain of similar persons who have not suffered in the same way.

The same may be affirmed of those who, beginning life with a good constitution, have excessively indulged in alcoholic preparations. Alcohol has the property of dissolving and carrying away the PHOSPHORUS of the brain and nervous system. We have personally known and carefully watched the career of many who in the "prime of life" were brilliant, energetic, first-class men of business, full of dash and assurance, carrying all before them, and succeeding in almost every undertaking. We have observed some of these to gradually wane in their mental and physical powers; little by little to have become anxious and apprehensive; matters which once were trifles, unworthy of attention, have seemed to be of great consequence; enterprise and speculation have become less and less; a fear of losing or failing has gradually crept in, until a general tameness and insipidity have been observed. A few years longer, and the once bright, confident, venturesome business man has dwindled to an eccentric, nervous, despondent, and miserable human remnant, incapable of concentrating his powers, vacillating, absent-minded, forgetful, and almost heedless of the world or its pleasures. Deafness, failing sight, impaired susceptibility, necroencephalus (softening of the brain) and general inanition, have gradually terminated in death. In some cases we have been enabled to procure the brain and a portion of the spinal cord, and have found by analysis that the PHOSPHORUS has been greatly deficient and much less than has been found in the brain-matter of persons who had the same vigorous character during early life, but who have died suddenly by violence in the midst of their career, and when all their powers of mind and body were most intense. In several instances different parts of the brain have been found to contain different proportions of PHOSPHORUS.

Striking as are the foregoing examples, and forcible as they are in the way of evidence, they are not in themselves sufficient. We require a synthetical process before we can form a satisfactory conclusion.

We have treated with PHOSPHORUS cases of every class. We have seen the prematurely old, the worn and exhausted, the nervous and miserable of every position in life, gradually restored to a most vigorous and perfectly healthy state. From a lean and cadaverous condition they have become full in flesh, the countenance clear and ruddy, the eyes bright, sight improved, deafness overcome, the hair become abundant, the step and gait again elastic and determined, the spirits high and generous, the temper cheerful, the love of song and harmony returned, the brain again active, perception quick, memory tenacious, and the whole system and character changed from the most pitiable condition to the highest state of existence.

In several instances the stir and excitement of mercantile life have created a longing to return to business. Some have done so, and are now as keen and successful as at any former period.

If then in all cases of mental and physical debility where we have been able to analyse the brain after death, we have found a deficiency of PHOSPHORUS, and if in precisely similar cases during life we have administered PHOSPHORUS, and found such conditions pass away, what other conclusion is it possible to arrive at than that this new form of Phosphorus gradually assimilates with the brain and nervous system, and brings up the depressed and wasted constitution to the normal standard?

The preparation which has repeatedly produced such results as those above described, we have called 'Plain' Syrup of Free Phosphorus, because it is the simple solution formed by distillation, combined with sugar and without the admixture of any other substance or medicament."

Free Phosphorus in combination with other Medicaments.

The Phosphorus prepared as above described permits of our taking advantage of the well-known principle in medical science, that different articles of the materia medica have the property of acting specially on different organs of the body. These various properties are very valuable in cases of special diseased action, and we are able to take advantage of them in using the syrup of phosphorus here described. It will combine with many remedial agents, and thus the power of the phosphorus may be determined to different organs of the body as local conditions may require.

Where the heart is weak, and the whole muscular system flabby and greatly debilitated, in addition to great nervous debility and exhaustion, the best combination is that of protoxide of iron with the "Plain," and which we have named the "Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus."

In the course of many years' private practice Dr. Birley was enabled to considerably modify and perfect a number of combinations of his Phosphorus in addition to the "Ironised" above named. For debility of the muscular and general system in LADIES particularly; when "Below Par," and suffering from poorness of blood and lack of colour, a special preparation called the "Sub-Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus" has been found to be wonderfully successful.

Hence the fifteen standard kinds enumerated in the adjoined list have been formulated and have earned a unique reputation for the complaints named therein.

Digitized by Google

DETAILED LIST.

The result of over Half a Century's Experience. All have been proved in a Large Private Practice before being offered to the public.

PLAIN. SYRUP OF FREE PHOSPHORUS. A Vitalising food for all Brain and Nervous Affections from whatever cause—worry, late hours, overwork, &c.; and for Hysteria, Vitus' Dance, Headache, &c., &c. A sustaining and life-giving element. The basis of all Dr. Birley's Preparations. Of especial value to Professional Men, Clergymen, Solicitors, Barristers, Literary Men, Schoolmasters, and all engaged in mental occupations 4/6

IRONISED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Muscular Debility, Heart Disease, Paralysis, Rupture, Sciatica, Lumbago, Scrofula, Obesity, Dropsy, and General Debility. Of great value also as a restorative after an attack of "influenza" .. 4/6

SUB-IRONISED. Especially prepared for Ladies and Delicate Persons suffering from the above, instead of the "Ironised." And for Bright's Disease, Mumps, Varicose Veins, and when "Below Par" 4/6

MAGNESIAN. SPECIAL REMEDY for Pulmonary and other forms of Consumption 4/6

BRONCHIAL. SPECIAL REMEDY for Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Quinsy, Congestion of the Lungs, Diphtheria, and Throat Affections generally 4/6

GASTRIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Indigestion and Liver Complaints 4/6

ANTI-RHEUMATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for every form of Rheumatism and Gout. (In some cases the Ironised or Sub-Ironised will aid the action of this preparation when taken on alternate days with it) .. 4/6

ANTI-STIPATIO. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Constipation, Flatulence, Piles, Spasms Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, &c. 4/6

ACIDIFIED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak, Fading, and Falling Off of Hair, and for Actual Baldness (internal use only) 4/6

VIRILITIC. Prepared for men suffering from Nervous Debility and Loss of Vitality 4/6

TOMATINED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak and Partial Loss of Sight, Deafness, Defective Taste or Smell 4/6

ANTI-NEURALGIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Neuralgia, Pleurisy and Erysipelas .. 4/6

CUTANEOUS. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Skin Diseases, Eczema, Psoriasis, &c. 4/6

The 4/6 Bottles contain between 70 and 80 Doses' and are sufficient for nearly ONE MONTH'S USE.

A SPECIAL OFFER.

We have the fullest confidence that where we can introduce these medicines into a household we are assured of a firm footing, and of recourse to them on all future occasions of illness or indisposition.

This coupon entitles you to a 4/6 Trial Bottle of any one kind of Dr. Birley's Phosphorus Compounds at 2/6; but if forwarded by parcel post, 4d. per bottle extra must be enclosed to cover cost of carriage within the United Kingdom. We guarantee safe delivery. Should a Trial Bottle also be required for a friend or relative, we will extend the offer to them if ordered at the same time.

Orders may be sent with the Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these Trial Bottle Coupons, and if we are not the money will be returned,

For Residents abroad the date will be extended sufficiently to allow of ordering. Postage of 1/4 per bottle is required for abroad.

COUPON.

4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/6

Or by Parcel Post 4d. extra—viz.: 2/10

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Available until June 30th, 1902.

The above Coupon to be cut out and sent with order. These Trial Bottles can be had direct only from the

Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers:

GORDON, MURRAY, & Co., Ltd.,

10, ADAM ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

STRONGLY RECOMMENDED.

Among some hundreds of others we may mention the following Reverend Gentlemen, who have proved the value of the medicine, and from whom we hold some excellent reports:

REV. C. H. SPURGEON, London, S.E.
REV. DR. COCKREM, London Orphan Asylum, Watford.
REV. W. T. CRANFIELD, Stoke.
REV. R. FLETCHER, Hull.
REV. J. JAMES, Abercanaid.
REV. J. W. MORRIS, Gly Neath.
REV. C. EARLE, Langford.
REV. F. CLEMENTS, Hanham, Bristol.
REV. GABRIEL MOLLAN, Clonmetham.
REV. E. I. DEVENISH, Teignmouth.
REV. G. COOK, Church Gresley.
REV. G. DALE COPELAND, Pudsey.
REV. A. A. BROOKS, Wigan.
REV. A. E. REALFF, Leicester.
REV. F. JONES, Malton.
REV. W. BARTON, Hull.
REV. G. HOMEYER, Claycross.
REV. J. B. GRATTON, Leominster.
REV. W. FRY, Blandford.
REV. J. D. WOODHALL, Bolton.
REV. R. FRAME, Birkenhead.

THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN AGE" says:—"Doubtless the 'Christian Age' enters many a home where there is some weakly one whose feeble health makes existence a burden, or perhaps it is a disease considered incurable which is wasting away life. Wherever there is such a case, we sincerely wish one of Dr. Birley's Preparations of Phosphorus might have a fair trial. These preparations are the result of scientific studies and experiments extending over many years, and the success which has already attended their use has been almost marvellous. We have seen hundreds of letters (not copies, but the original documents), some from persons well known to us, all testifying to the curative effects of one or other of these preparations. And more than this, we know of cases in which they have been the means of restoring to health when to all appearance recovery was almost impossible."

EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."—"Our readers know quite well how careful we are not to recommend anything but what is thoroughly trustworthy, but so many voluntary testimonials of unmistakable genuineness are before us that it is simply impossible to question the efficacy of the Medicines to which we are calling attention; hundreds of letters from all classes of people, including titled nobility, clergymen, physicians, &c., among which we notice several well-known names, all bearing remarkable testimony to the benefits derived from them."

EDITOR OF THE "FAMILY DOCTOR."—"One Thousand Original Letters of Testimony have been submitted to us by the Proprietors of Dr. Birley's Preparations."

Digitized by Google

THE KING'S CORONATION.

In celebration of this auspicious event to take place next month a Special

CORONATION - - DOUBLE NUMBER

OF THE

"CHRISTIAN HERALD"

Is in course of preparation, and will be published on JUNE 19, for TWOPENCE.

Among its attractive features it will contain

THE KING'S AND QUEEN'S LIFE-STORIES,

Illustrated with numerous pictures. And with it will be presented a BEAUTIFUL COLOURED

PRESENTATION PLATE

Suitable for framing, containing portraits of the KING and QUEEN and the PRINCE and PRINCESS OF WALES, together with pictures of two of the Royal residences—Windsor Castle and Buckingham Palace, and also of Westminster Abbey.

The usual attractive features of the "CHRISTIAN HERALD" will be retained, and with that same number, for June 19, there will be commenced A NEW SCRIPTURE COMPETITION for £80 in Cash Prizes and 400 Books.

THE ILLUSTRATED LIFE OF DR. TALMAGE

By W. PERCY HICKS.

With Introduction by the Rev. J. GREGORY MANTLE.

In this book the great preacher's interesting life-story is presented by the author in a most attractive form, with a multitude of curious experiences which Dr. Talmage passed through at various periods. The book is tastefully bound in cloth boards, and contains numerous pictures and portraits.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

Orders may be sent at once, through a Newsagent or Bookseller, or direct to the "Christian Herald" Office, 6, Tudor Street, London.

Digitized by Google

ALLEN FOSTER & Co.,

CALL OR WRITE. The London Manufacturers. CALL OR WRITE.

Buy Direct at First Cost from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

30/- DESIGN No. 610. 8/6 8/6 DESIGN No. 623. 30/-

Design No. 1055, 8/6.
Ladies' Silk Shirt, trimmed narrow tucks. A leading line for 8 6; carriage 3d.
COLOURS: Helio, Sky, Pink, and Black.

3/11½ 3/11½

Design No. 877. 3/11½.
Morcen Underskirt.
Special value for 3/11½; carriage, 3d.
COLOURS: Blue, helio, red, pink, and black, Other leading lines at 2/11½ and 4/11. Send for one.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S SHOW ROOMS, At 47, Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C. Are open daily from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Saturdays until 1 o'clock. Ladies are invited to call and inspect their goods.

A SPECIAL LINE OF ALPACA SKIRTS In all Colours. COSTUME SKIRTS, 6 6, 7 11, and 9/11 each. Carriage, 5d.

Write for our Spring Sketch Book. Patterns Post Free. Every Lady should see Allen Foster & Co.'s New and Fashionable "Coronate" Cloth.

Design No. 610. 30/-
Up-to-date Eton Costume, made in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S 'Coronate' Cloth, all shades. Short Coat, trimmed stitching and glace silk, and small steel buttons. Lined throughout, striped lining. Bell shape Skirt with belt, also trimmed strappings of glace silk and steel buttons. Sterling value for money. Perfect fit guaranteed. Price only 30s. DIRECT AT FIRST COST from the 'ALFOSCO' Factories. Send for one. In sending order, please give bust measurement under arms, inside sleeve, size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

DESIGN No. 949. 6/6

VALUE FOR MONEY.

DESIGN No. 934. 8/11

Design No. 623. 30/-.
The Costume of the season, made in all the lovely Pastel shades of the "Coronate" Cloth. This charming costume is lined throughout, and made by most experienced workers. Jacket in Russia style, pouch front, steel buttons, trimmed strappings of glace silk. Stylish well-made skirt with frills also trimmed silk to match jacket and shade of material. One of the best lines in costumes on the market. Colours: Heliotrope, Rose Pink, Cornflower, Coral, Salmon, Blue, Royal, Light Green, Light Grey, Dark Grey, Fawn, Brown, Black and Navy. Send for one. Price only 30 -.

Design No. 949. 6/6.
Fashionable Costume Skirt. Made in Vicuna Cloth or in the world-renowned Specialite Serge, two sterling cloths, unsurpassed for durability and wear. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Fawn, Light and Dark Grey, Royal Blue Grey, Cardinal, Green, Purple, etc. This Skirt has the new graduated flounce, which is lined with good linenette. Price only 6/6; carriage, 5d. extra. All sizes in stock. Money returned if not approved.

Design No. 934. 8/11.
Superior Costume Skirt, with three shaped frills, graduated at back. Each frill is trimmed with braid. There are three additional rows of braid at top of frills. Made in all shades of A. F. & Co.'s Vicuna Cloth or Specialite Serge. A Great Bargain for 8/11; sent carriage paid 5d. extra. This Skirt can be ordered in the new "Coronate" Cloth, trimmed glace silk in place of braid. Price, 15/11; carriage, 5d.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,

47, GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"Your Children shall be Kings."—SHAKESPEARE.

That is, they shall possess more than power or riches, for they shall have the priceless gifts of strength and happiness if they are fed on which contains in abundance all the essentials to healthy infant nutrition and vitality. Sample bottle post free. Mention this Magazine.

MELLIN'S FOOD

MELLIN'S FOOD WORKS, PECKHAM, S.E.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS, AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. Thompson & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.
London: Printed for the Proprietors by the National Press Agency, Limited, Whitefriars House, Carmelite Street, E.C., and Published at 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, London, E.C.

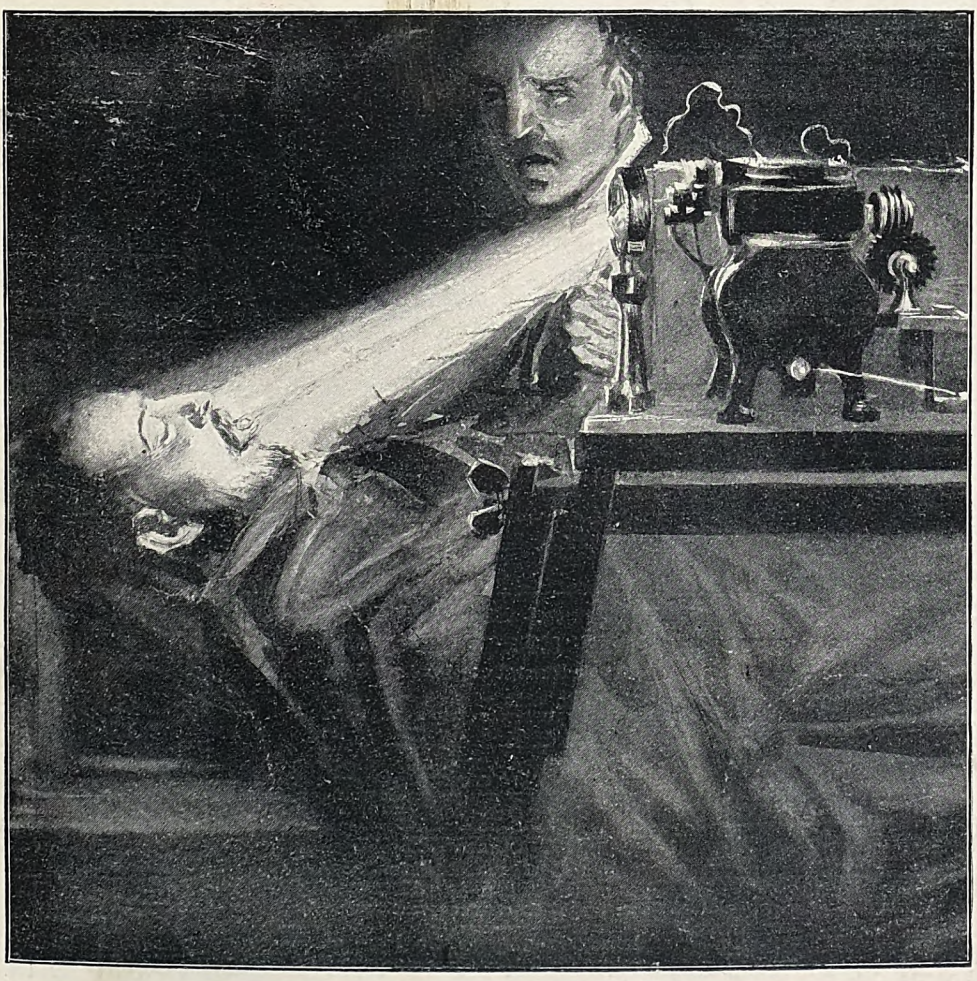
Digitized by Google

REVIVING THE DEAD.—See Article, page 835.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

Vol. 6. JULY, 1902. No. 10.

Price Sixpence.



"Every being whose heart no longer beats and who has apparently ceased to exist, may, provided he has no lesion of his principal organs and is not exhausted by disease, be brought to life again."

Dr. J. V. LABORDE, of the Faculty of Medicine, Paris.

Digitized by Google

"You look unusually fresh this morning, dear!"

"I really feel so; I use

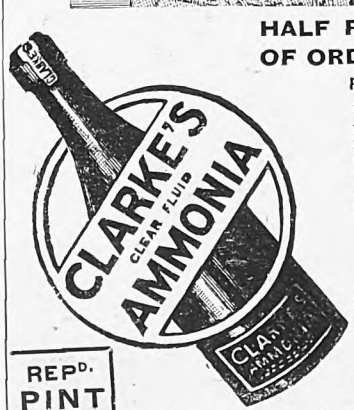
CLARKE'S AMMONIA

in my bath."

HALF PRICE and DOUBLE STRENGTH OF ORDINARY HOUSEHOLD AMMONIA.

Retains its Strength to the Last Drop.

Used in the Bath all the year round, this popular Ammonia gives a delightful, refreshing feeling to the person. Its cleansing properties are manifested when used for washing China, Glass, Silver, Clothes, &c. It is a necessity as well as a luxury, and its low price brings it within the reach of all.



AGENTS EVERYWHERE.

If any difficulty in obtaining, send us a postcard, and we will forward name and address of nearest dealer.

Large Sample Bottle Free on receipt of 3 penny stamps for postage.

REP^{D}. PINT 6^{d}.

Address:—CLARKE'S, 360, Old Kent Road, S.E.

REP^{D}. QUART 10$\frac{1}{2}$ 1^{d}.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 11 10 1902

Digitized by Google

FOR RICH AND POOR.

"FRAME-FOOD"

FOR BABIES FROM EARLIEST INFANCY.

UNIQUE! WHY?

It contains the soluble phosphates and albuminoids extracted from Wheat, is therefore highly nutritious, and can be easily digested by the weakest infant. No other food can claim anything higher than this; and these two facts—nutrition and digestion — are indispensable in building the foundation of a strong and healthy constitution. Thousands of unsolicited Testimonials. Sold in Tins, 16-oz. 1/-. FREE TEST—¼-lb. Sample Tin of "FRAME-FOOD," or 5-oz. Sample Jar of "FRAME-FOOD" JELLY, sent free on receipt of 3d. to pay postage; both samples sent for 4d. postage.
(Mention "TEMPLE.")

FRAME-FOOD CO., LTD., BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.

GOOD! IT'S MASON'S

A 6d. BOTTLE of MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
Makes 8 Gallons of the Finest Non-intoxicating
HERB BEER.

There is no thirst-quencher in the world to equal it. Most Palatable, Refreshing, Delicious, and Healthful. Enjoyed by abstainers and non-abstainers alike.

Imitated but not Equalled. Of all Chemists & Stores.

Also try { MASON'S WINE ESSENCE and MASON'S COFFEE ESSENCE.

Sample bottle of either of above POST FREE for 9d. Two assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three assorted, 1s. 8d.
AGENTS WANTED:—
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

HUNDREDS OF LADIES
are testifying to the value of
DR. MACKENZIE'S
COMPLEXION WAFERS.
They eradicate the imperfections, and make the Skin pure, fresh and velvety. Sold by Chemists in boxes at 2/9 and 4/6.
Sample Box, post free, 2/6.
Postal Dept., S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., S.E.

Hovis

Trade Mark

Bread

is as Good as it is Nice

The Lancet says "Its food value is double that of bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."

Most Family Bakers make Hovis daily. If not known, local agents' addresses will be sent on request. HOVIS LTD., Macclesfield. Be sure that the loaf is stamped HOVIS.

1-2

Ladies Travelling and for Home Use.
6d., 1/-, 1/4 & 2/- per doz.

HARTMANN'S
HYGIENIC
TOWELETTES
Obtainable at less than the cost of washing from all Drapers and Chemists. Superior to any other Sanitary Towels:
HARTMANN'S SANITARY SHEETS for Accouchement, 24 x 18 in., 1s.; 26 x 20 in., 1s. 6d.; 32 x 32 in., 2s. 6d. each.
Hartmann's Depot, 26, Thavies Inn, London, E.C.

SOLD EVERYWHERE, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s.

Owbridge's
LUNG TONIC,
THE WORLD'S CURE
FOR COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, &c. &c.

MACKENZIE'S SWEETS

SOUTOUMA
THE FAMOUS SWEET
Most Delicious Creamy Flavour.
1d., 3d. and 6d., Sold Everywhere.
Wholesale:—S. J. Mackenzie & Co., Limited, London.

Digitized by Google

THE THREE GREAT SCOURGES,

ALCOHOL, MORPHINE, COCAINE.

The Hutton-Dixon Vegetable Antidote,

A HIGH-CLASS, UP-TO-DATE, PHYSICAL HOME CURE FOR

ALCOHOL and DRUG ADDICTIONS.

Also of great value in cases of Insomnia, Neurasthenia and Nerve Exhaustion. Can be carried in the Pocket and taken Privately—thus obviating the Publicity, Expense, and loss of time of an Institute treatment.

WARRANTED FREE FROM NARCOTICS.

Patronised by the Nobility and All Classes.

AN IDEAL HOME CURE.

This humane discovery has been publicly endorsed before the Congress of Bishops, and at Father Matthew's Anniversaries, also by Clergymen from their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in nearly every quarter of the Globe. Over Six Thousand Cases have been treated successfully.

In this treatment there are no hypodermic injections, it being a purely vegetable medicine taken by the mouth, can be carried in the pocket, and taken in perfect privacy at home or anywhere. In from one to three days, and often in as many hours, after commencing this treatment the desire or crave will have so completely disappeared that the victim would not give a penny for all the liquor or drugs in the country for his own use. Among the immediate effects of this treatment are calm, restful sleep, steady nerves, clear brain, increased appetite for food and pronounced benefit in every way physically and mentally, with a positive guarantee that there shall be only good after effects and a permanent removal of all appetite for intoxicating liquors or drugs of any kind, all of which is indorsed by scores of physicians, clergymen of every denomination, and men and women in all phases of life in many parts of the world. This is an absolutely harmless home treatment, and an up to date physical cure backed by and vouched for by testimonials unapproached by any other treatment for these habits.

Full particulars and indisputable testimony sent free in a plain sealed envelope. All correspondence strictly confidential.

N.B.—The Testimonials published in my circulars are unique, inasmuch as I print (by kind permission) the full names and addresses of the subscribers thereto, so that the genuineness of the certificates can easily be verified. Glowing letters of recommendation may readily be written and left unsigned, or signed with initials only, but what the public need now-a-days are the hard facts which cannot be denied or controverted, and these I furnish.

Address:—ALEX. H. DIXON, 5, Cannon Place, BRIGHTON, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A WONDERFUL INVENTION . .

for the

LAME.

As Supplied to the War Office for the Wounded from South Africa.

THE O'CONNOR EXTENSION Co.'s PATENT APPLIANCES

Enable those with Shortened Limbs and Weak Ankles to dispense with Unsightly Instruments, to Wear Ordinary Shoes, and to look like other people.

FLAT FOOT.

The New Patent . . . . Arch Support

CAN BE ADAPTED TO HELP ANY CASE OF FLAT FOOT.

A New Book on the Mechanical Treatment of Flat Foot will be sent FREE.

TENDER FEET.

The New . . . . Patent Socks

CAN BE MOULDED TO FIT THE SOLE OF ANY FOOT.

Describe the case, send a pair of old boots or shoes and 5/- A pair of Socks will be sent POST FREE. (United Kingdom).

GOLD MEDAL, LONDON; HIGHEST AWARDS, CHICAGO AND PARIS.

ADDRESS:

The O'Connor Extension Co.,

SURGICAL APPLIANCE MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT,

2, BLOOMSBURY STREET,

LONDON, W.C.

PAMPHLETS FREE on mentioning The Temple Magazine. Please give particulars of the case.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Edited by CHARLES HERBERT.

CONTENTS FOR JULY, 1902.

			PAGE
I.	Frontispiece
II.	Reviving the Dead	Illustrated	835
III.	Two Faded Hearts. A Complete Story	Illustrated	839
IV.	Coronation Embroideries	Illustrated	851
V.	The People's Friend; or, the Adventures of Carlton-Hawes.—(IV.) Illustrated.	Charles Herbert	856
VI.	Photographs of Jesus Christ		863
VII.	The White Lady of the Zenana. Serial Story. Chapters V. and VI. Illustrated by Fitzgerald.		865
VIII.	Innocence		878
IX.	Is Aerial Navigation Possible?	John Alexander	879
X.	To the Crown and After. A Complete Story		884
XI.	Redskins of To-Day	Roy Carmichael	893
XII.	The Modern Chemist		896
XIII.	The Needle's Eye. New Serial Story. Illustrated.	Florence Kingsley	897
XIV.	Awful Results of the Martinique Explosions on Great Britain	Beth Bannester, B.A.	909
XV.	How the Germans took London.—(II.) Illustrated	T. W. Offin, junr.	913
XVI.	In the Public Eye	Illustrated	921

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. The Editor will be obliged if, before sending any manuscript, a letter is sent him describing the purport of the article or enclosing a précis of the story. They must be addressed to MR. CHARLES HERBERT, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to THE MANAGER, 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. MATHER AND CROWTHER, BRIDEWELL PLACE, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

COOLS AND REFRESHES THE SKIN.

"BEETHAM'S Larola" Regd

After exposure to the Sun or Wind. Removes and prevents all HEAT, SUNBURN, TAN, IRRITATION, etc., and Keeps the Skin Soft, Smooth, and White during the Heat of Summer. Its effect will delight you! Bottles 6d., 1s., 2s. 6d. of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

BEST IN 1894. THE BEST NOW.

PALMER TYRE

The ONLY HIGH GRADE TYRE

NOW ON THE MARKET.

For Durability, Palmer Tyres stand alone.

FULLY GUARANTEED.

Write for Manual containing 11 Sectional Road Maps and 1 Key Map of the British Isles.

The PALMER TYRE, Ltd.,

Dept. T.M., BIRMINGHAM.

These Tyres are manufactured under license from the North British Rubber Co., Ltd., under Bartlett's Patent.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

REVIVING THE DEAD.

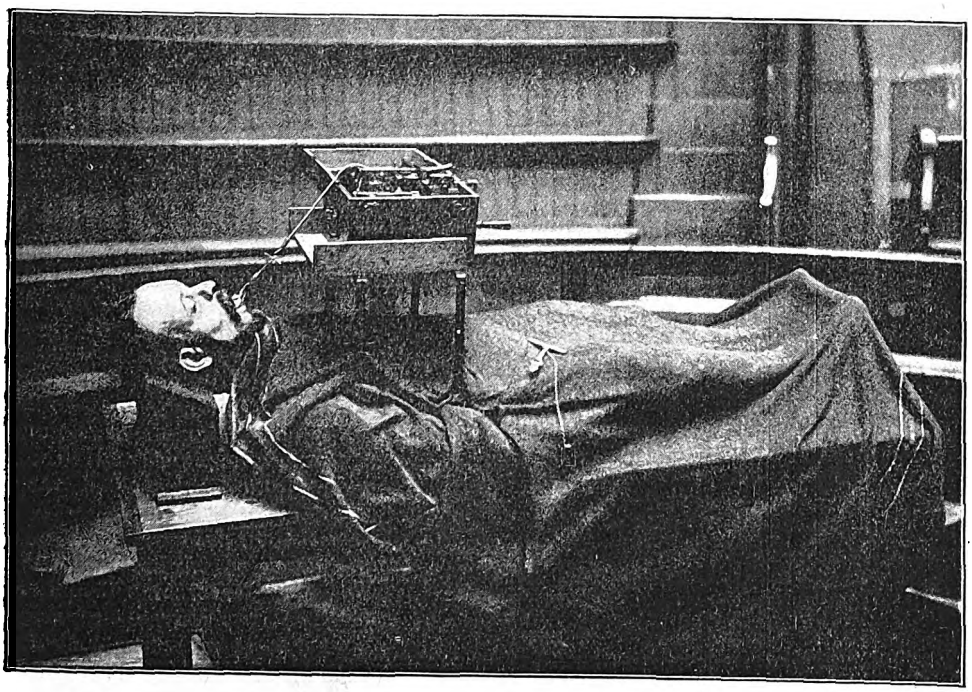
An account of a visit paid to the Faculty of Medicine in Paris to witness the wonderful results of the Rhythmical Tongue Traction Treatment in the resuscitation of persons even after three hours' apparent death.

SOME few weeks since I chanced upon a little paragraph in my morning paper in which a brief account was given of a paper that had just been read before the Academy of Medicine in Paris, by Dr. J. V. Laborde, in which he gave some startling facts regarding the Tongue Traction Treatment which he had invented for restoring to life persons who were apparently dead.

I had heard some rumors of this wonderful new medical discovery before, and I had corresponded with Dr. Laborde on the subject, as it occured to me that English physicians and the English public could not fail to be interested in a discovery, promising to be of such world-wide value and importance.

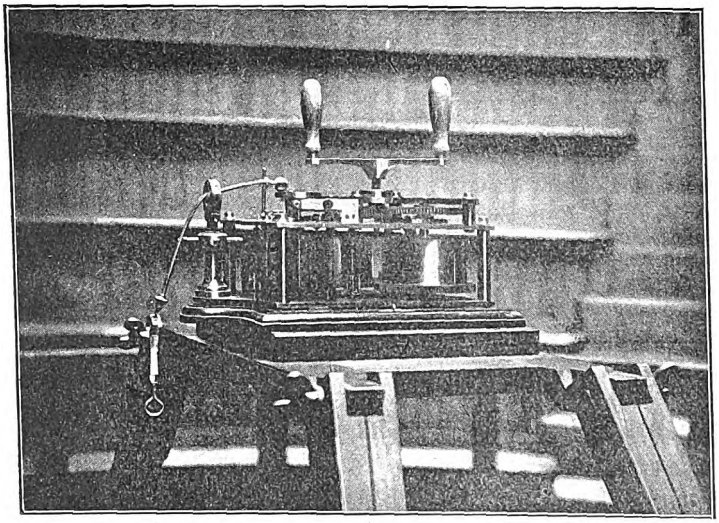
Dr. Laborde had very courteously sent me a copy of his book entitled, "Les Tractions Rythmies de la Langue; moyez rationnel et la plus puissant de laneiner la fonchoi respieratoire et la Vie" (Paris: Félix Alçan), others I had perused with the liveliest interest.

The treatment inaugurated by Dr.



THE LINGUAL TRACTOR AT WORK.

Digitized by Google



INSTRUMENT FOR INCREASING TRACTION.

Laborde is to be seen at work only in France and I therefore decided to run over to Paris from London in order that I might see it in actual operation and thus might the better be enabled to give some account of the apparatus and of the results already obtained for the benefit of the readers of this Magazine.

Dr. Laborde holds the post of "Chef des Travaux Physiologiques" to the Faculty of Medicine in Paris. He is also a member of the Academy of Medicine and has been awarded the grand diploma of honour of the "Société des Sauveteurs de la Seine." Unfortunately Dr. Laborde was very ill and unable to see me. He was suffering from nervous exhaustion and breakdown, the result of overwork. He, however, handed me over to his assistant at the Faculty of Medicine, Dr. Camus, who very courteously gave me all possible help in the preparation of this article and in the taking of the photographs that are here reproduced. I desire here to acknowledge the very obliging manner in which Dr. Camus gave up his time to render me assistance.

Before describing the apparatus as I saw it at work I must say a few words regarding the origin of the invention that promises to be of so great utility in many cases of apparent death. The principle upon which Dr. Laborde bases his researches is this: "Every being whose heart no longer beats and who has apparently ceased to exist may, in many cases, provided he has no lesion of his principal organs and is not exhausted by disease or extreme destitution, be brought to life again."

The physician distinguishes between apparent death and real death, between suspended animation or the objective external death of the organism, and complete definitive death. Dr. Laborde has pointed out that few have any idea of the persistence of "latent" life, in those who, seemingly, have ceased to live. Although all signs of circulation and respiration have disappeared and the organism has ceased to live externally, it may yet live internally.

Life continues in a latent state through the persistence of the functional properties of the organic elements and tissues and it is only after the lapse of a certain length of time that the organism can be pronounced to be really extinct.

There are, of course, many methods employed in the resuscitation of apparently dead persons and many of these depend on artificial respiration, for the function most indispensable to awaken—the primordial function in fact—is respiration.

So far as we know, no one had attempted to use the "Lingual Tractor" before Dr. Laborde took it up. This method has many advantages over some of the other ones resorted to, to restore respiration, and has been found effective when other methods have failed.

Dr. Laborde has found that in the case of persons who have lost consciousness through narcotic poisoning, through collapse after anæsthetics, through electric-shock, through drowning, through being struck by lightning, through asphyxiation, through suffocation in mines, sewers, etc., through syncope, or through committing suicide by hanging themselves, it is sometimes possible to revive them, even when they appeared to be dead and after all other methods of restoration had failed to have any effect, if the tongue be drawn rhythmically backwards and forwards for a certain length of time either by the hand or by an electric motor.

Digitized by Google

Dr. Laborde's "Tracteur Lingual," or Tongue Tractor, has indeed astonished the medical world, who, had they not witnessed the Doctor's experiments in the resuscitation of persons who were apparently dead, would have declared the results to have been impossible of attainment by any means known to science.

One of the most remarkable cases of restoration to life after apparent death was mentioned in a report by M. Vauter, director of the customs region of Marseilles to the Director-General of the Custom House, on June 7th, 1898. Bowman Aguel, of the Huveause, was on duty on the point of the Mediterranean coast known as "Aux du Prophète," when he heard cries of distress proceeding from a sixteen-year-old cabin-boy named Igardens. The boy was bathing at a distance of about thirty yards from the shore when he disappeared beneath the water owing to the fact that he had imprudently jumped into the sea immediately after partaking of a heavy meal. The cabin-boy's master, Ricard Shawe, happening to be near by, jumped in to save him. Unfortunately, he himself began to sink, and was just on the point of disappearing beneath the waves when Bowman Aguel arrived on the scene. Immediately the last-named threw himself into the water without stopping to remove his blouse. Reaching Ricard, he held him until he could hand him over to a second rescuer, who carried him to the shore.

Aguel then made another dive in order to find the cabin-boy, and very fortunately succeeded in bringing him to land. But Igardens, who had remained under water at least ten minutes, was seemingly dead, and the by-standers declared that there was no hope of resuscitating him. Aguel, however, recalling the directions given in Circular No. 2,463, of November 2nd, 1894, applied to the boy the process of "rhythmic traction of the tongue" recommended by Dr. Laborde, of the Academy of Medicine. For a long time the unfortunate lad gave no signs of life, but Aguel refused to be discouraged, and continued his operations for three hours. At length his patience and determined efforts were rewarded, and the boy's respiration was re-established, he sat up, and was soon out of danger. Commenting on this wonderful recovery, M. Vauter remarks :—

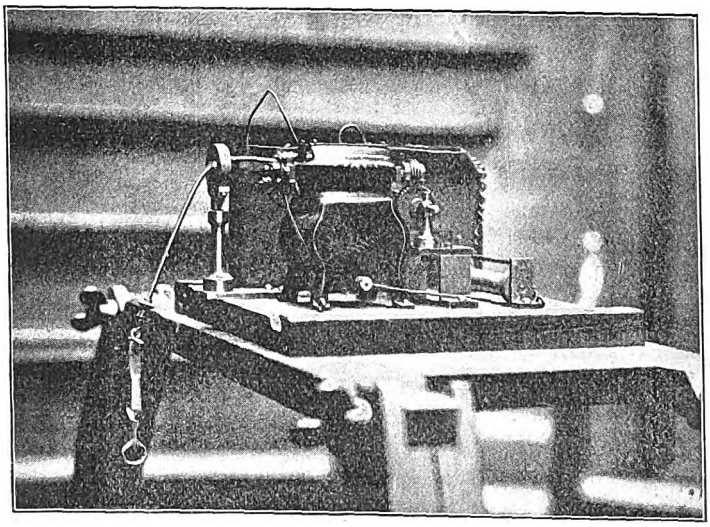
"A single officer of the administration has been able, after three hours of rhythmic traction of the tongue, to restore to life a boy who had remained ten minutes under water. After three hours! Up to 1898 no physiologist or physician would have dared to claim that latent life could subsist for hours. And yet three hours is doubtless not the extreme limit, and it might perhaps be possible to meet with success much beyond this length of time."

Everyone knows that the population of France is steadily declining. This is regretable, and many suggestions have been made with a view to prevent the depopulation. One of these is to attempt to reduce the infant mortality statistics. Dr. Laborde has turned his attention to this question and has related some "cases" at the Academy of Medicine. In one case the child when born was livid and apparently dead. Dr. Matiquoi, of Bordeaux, applied rhythmical tongue traction, and after an hour the child gave signs of life. In another case the newly-born infant was livid and to all appearances lifeless. Before attempting Dr. Laborde's method, alcoholic friction flagellation, mustard baths, and the artificial injection of air into the lungs were all tried, but with no success. Finally, Dr. Nicolas resorted to the rhythmical traction of the tongue, and after a prolonged effort succeeded in restoring the child to life.

What length of time ensues between apparent death and real death? The answer to this question is difficult because it necessarily varies with various individuals, but in the case of a subject whose organs are healthy and are not affected by disease, the time is at least three hours.

Dr. Laborde soon saw that if the tongue had to be submitted to his treatment for two or three hours, or even more, some mechanical apparatus would have to be used in place of the manual power. M. Mouchel accordingly constructed for Dr. Laborde a small clockwork driven piece of apparatus that gave 120 tractions per minute, with all the rhythmic intermittence desirable. This was the first machine of the kind ever constructed. It had its drawbacks, however. The spring of the clockwork did not permit the apparatus to operate for more than five minutes, and it was often necessary to wind up the movement a great many times during each experiment. Ultimately a small electric motor, fed by accumulators, was substituted for the clockwork apparatus, and this will keep the tongue tractor going for three hours or more.

Digitized by Google



ANOTHER TRACTION MACHINE.

Dr. Laborde has pointed out that his method constitutes a ready means of determining whether a person is really dead or not. If the respiratory movements fail to answer more than five or six hours after apparent death, the life may be surely pronounced extinct. He also suggests that tongue tractors should be placed in hospitals, fire-stations, humane societies' stations, mines, etc.

Dr. Camus presented me with a copy of the "Instructions for the Application of the Method of Rhythmical Tractions of the tongue," which are issued under Dr. Laborde's direction, for the guidance of physicians and others who may desire to imitate the inventor's methods.

So far, I believe, the tongue tractor has not been tried in this country, but it is to be hoped that it will be introduced before long, and will be used at all the Royal Humane Society's stations, in hospitals, in mines, and in other places where it is likely to be of use.

By the kindness of Dr. Camus I saw the rhythmical tongue traction treatment applied in three different ways. The first was by the hand alone, the mouth of the patient having been opened, the tongue was seized by the fingers and was drawn rhythmically backwards and forwards with a speed of 20 to 25 movements in the case of adults, and 25 to 30 in the case of infants.

More generally, in place of the fingers an instrument invented by Dr. Laborde and termed a "pince à traction" is used. This is rather like a small pair of shears, and it is furnished with a pair of supports at the end for the doctor to take hold of and practise the rhythmical tractions.

In cases where it is necessary to continue the treatment for some hours recourse is had to a motor worked either by clockwork or by electric current. To restore persons to life a three hours' application of the method is sometimes necessary, and to make quite sure that death has really taken place and in order to avoid the terrible possibility of premature burial an application of six hours is recommended.

Digitized by Google

TWO FADED HEARTS.

PART I.

THEY had lived all alone, those two old ladies, in their neat well-ordered little house for a great number of years, no one quite knew how many, nor why they should thus have elected to pass their lives together. During the passing years no kith nor kin of either had come to disturb them, and it was generally believed in the village that they had no living relatives.

Miss Margaret Fulford, the elder of the two, must have been very beautiful in her earlier days; even I, across so wide a gulf of time, could mark its traces in her face. Ann Price the younger—younger only by a mere couple of years—must also have been comely in that long-forgotten youth of hers. Yet had they chosen, when still quite young women—fate and death leaving them utterly alone in the world—to join their paths together.

Both had been left well provided for, and neither lacked any of the comforts of this world. The house in which they lived had come to Miss Price through the death of some distant relative, and in it they had lived year in, year out, in that remote English village for close on half a century. I first made the aquaintance of my two old friends when as quite a little child I had been brought on a visit to a neighbour of theirs. As I grew older I had returned at intervals to the village, never forgetting to call on the old ladies as my first care on arriving. Thus a close friendship had sprung up between us. By degrees, when I came to the little place, I was not merely their neighbour, but was also their guest, for I spent long visits with them whenever I was able to do so. I had begun to look upon them as almost entirely belonging to me, and had a vague feeling of responsibility regarding them—they were growing so very very old—they had no one to care for them, though, indeed, they were happy enough together, and appeared perfectly devoted to one another. To me there was something almost tragic in the lives of those two poor old women; their quiet uneventful days were so empty, so utterly void of all that so many count as making life blessed. I could hear of no change, no difference of things; so far as I was able to trace backwards in the flight of time, life had gone on for them in the steady monotone in which I had found them, ever since they had first come to bury themselves.

Round them hung a cloud of mystery; enquiries as to their former history, their young days, brought me but little light. The oldest inhabitant in the village dimly remembered them as young women, living much the same retired life as they did when I knew them—contented with their lot, indifferent to the outer world, wrapped up in each other; this was all I could ever glean. Finally, I was forced to remain unsatisfied as to the story of their ealier days.

They grew older and frailer, my visits therefore increased; to me they had ever been so kind, so utterly loving. I could not bear to think of them alone. Looking back, I know I am not wrong in saying that some of my happiest days were spent in their quaint home; and at times, I believe, my sun was at its height when it shone for me as I wandered in their old-world garden, so full of the tenderly-cared-for, sweet-smelling flowers they both loved. Dear, dainty, old ladies! they are to me in these later years as sprigs of their own fragrant lavender laid between the pages of my memory's book.

Digitized by Google

At last, for me, the cloud of obscurity was dispelled. The secret—if secret it could be called—was made clear. Strangely enough, both those poor old hearts were, all unknown to one another, laid bare to me on the self-same day. Lips that had remained sealed for over fifty years opened within a few short hours to ease hearts grown old and tired, terribly tired, of one pathetic little memory.

Later, I no longer wondered at their lives. I thought I fully realised the wherefore of the quiet unshared days, the total obliteration from the paths of men. I understood at last why over me as I grew older, stole ever that strange, buried and long-forgotten sensation when with my friends. The touching pathos of the little story moved my heart deeply; in secret I suffered with each, whilst admiring and pitying. Time in its flight was to prove to me more fully than I then dreamed of how deep was the wreck of life and sad the waste of human vitality, how pitiful the whole little story, how great, how irretrievably great, the utter squandering of a life-time on the part of each. The underlying tragedy and pity of it still makes my eyes fill with tears, my heart ache.

I had arrived on one of my usual visits to them, a few days previously, and had noticed since my arrival a curious unaccountable change in both my old friends; they appeared more awakened, more excited than I had ever beheld them before. It was the month of June, warm and sultry. Their garden, where we spent most of our days, was a blaze of beautiful sweet-scented colour. It was to me then, is to me now, and must ever be, the loveliest and the dearest garden I had ever known then, that I know now, or can ever hope to know. They both took a deep pleasure in it; it was to each, I believe, the embodiment of all they had lost—or missed—on earth.

One afternoon I sat alone with Miss Fulford in their little cool, old-fashioned drawing-room, so full of the treasures I had known and loved since childhood; through the open window came to me the hum of the bees, and the scent of the roses and pinks out in the sweet shining garden. I sat endeavoring to sew, doing, alas, but little: drowsily I fell to contemplating how much I loved, for a short space, so placid, so uneventful a life; but how long, I wondered, would it have been before its monotony, without one change or break, had driven me crazy, had I come to it for ever, as my old friends had done, long years ago when still young and full of life; for always the quiet, the still nothingness around me—truly "the common round, the trivial task." Each summer for fifty years the scent of the flowers, the hum of the bees, for always and ever the same! For a short space how much I loved it—how gladly I came. For altogether—how impossible! My young blood would surge in my veins, my pulses leap and dance with the longing to fly away and leave the quiet old house behind! How was it that neither of these two, who had lived there so many years, had never pined to run away?—or had they, I wondered?—out into the world again, to be loved and admired, as they must once have been: to enjoy, to live. Ah! yes, that was it! live, not vegetate. What was at the root of their years of calm indifference, their self-imposed burial alive? Thus I pondered, and thus thinking, lulled by the hum of the bees, soothed by the hot scented air, my eyes were slowly closing, when Miss Fulford's voice recalled me to consciousness.

"Mary," she said, laying her endless "Penelope's Web" of knitting on the table by her side, "has it ever come to you to wonder why it was that Ann and I should have been so content to live out our lives here, and had no longing for other things?"

I noticed a faint pink flush slowly rising to the withered cheek. What was coming?

"Dear Aunt Margaret"—for thus I ever called her—I stammered, not knowing what to reply, so thoroughly had she read my thoughts, "I have at times wondered, but I suppose you and Aunt Ann both preferred peace and quiet, and hated the noisy world outside." And I pointed vaguely out of the windows, and beyond the garden, to where the long, white, dusty road, might—or might not—lead to "The World" to which I referred.

"I am going to tell you why, dear," she replied. "You are a woman now—the years slip by us so quickly—and perhaps you understand such things as I am going to tell you better than I myself. After all there is nothing like a young heart; and mine is old, so old, and Ann is old too, how could she know or understand? All these years I have kept my secret jealously to myself. I have had no one to speak to—not that I wished it; but now I feel I must talk of it to someone. Who, better than you? Not even Ann knows what I am going to tell you. But you—you are like my own child." "My own child," she repeated softly, resting her hand tremulously on mine for an instant.

Digitized by Google

"Therefore I wish to tell you my little 'romance,' more of it than any other knows — save one. And where that one is now I have no idea, no thought.

"When I was quite young, I lived, as you may know, in quite a different part of the country," she began. I did not know. I knew nothing of my old friend's former life ere she came to the little village, as I have already stated. But, unwilling to interrupt her, I remained silent.

"Ann lived near here in her youth; she has lived in this part of England all her life," she continued, "but with me it is different. I have seen more of the world, have wider experience than she has," and Miss Fulford nodded and smiled mysteriously. Poor old lady! I thought of the fifty years of life in that dreary village, and wondered, as my heart ached for her, where her vast experience of this world had come from!

"We, Ann and I," she went on, "had been friends always, our parents were

THEY THOROUGHLY ENJOYED THE GARDEN.

Digitized by Google

friends before us. I cannot remember any time of my life when I did not know her. When death left us alone in the world we decided to live together. For me the world was done, finished!"—this with tragic emphasis—"and when Ann proposed that we should come and pass our days 'the world forgetting, by the world forgot,' in this little house of hers I readily agreed.

"At that time I was very unhappy, I had had a terrible experience, a deep love affair." She paused as if to lay stress on the importance of her last words, and drew herself up almost proudly. It would seem that she was raised in her own respect by that memory, which in those dead, long gone years must have proved, indeed, a platform of pain and sorrow.

"I had met," she continued, "and grown much attached to someone who in return loved me with a deep devotion, and for whose sake I have gladly spent my days alone. There had been others," with a touch of revivified vanity, "but this one was different. My dear, you should have seen him. They were men in those days! From what you tell me, I have myself no personal knowledge, the the race must have sorely changed for the worse."

I flushed hotly at this calm misrepresentation, and remembering of some careless words of mine; but finding no defence ready, let it pass in silence, anxious to hear more of the old lady's story.

"How noble he was! How true and just! incapable of a mean action, placing Duty ever before his own wishes and desires, the very soul of all that was best in man. Well, my dear, knowing all that of him, remembering him in those days, I have never once regretted that all my life has spent itself in memory of him. It seems strange, perhaps, to you, does it not?—to hear an old woman like me talking of men and love. But I was young then, and I have lost the world for love.

"The most vivid recollection of my life is the day on which he asked me to be his wife. How well, how clearly I remember." She paused, as if living through that halcyon time once more. Then continued, a faint smile curving her lips.

"I wore white muslin—he said I was beautiful," she mused half to herself with a touch of pride, then sighed and broke off abruptly. I followed the direction of her eyes; they had fixed themselves upon her wrinkled withered hands, the truest sign, alas, of age in woman.

"I was very happy," she went on again briskly, as if putting all saddening regrets from her mind. "I was, alas, so unworthy of one so good; yet I gave all my love, and love counts for something in this world, let us hope. There was only one blot, one shadow upon the sun, our engagement was by his express desire to remain for a time a secret between us, 'a precious secret' Charles called it, 'between we two,'—'we two,' she repeated softly and smiled.

For one fleeting instant, I who listened in the shadows of approaching night to this tale of youth and morning, had a brief vision in that smile of what she, who sat beside me old and faded and at "the end," must have looked like, when in those buried days she wore "white muslin," and listened to the tale that for the heart of woman grows never never old, as it fell from the lips of this long dead "Charles," whoever he had been. For dead I felt he must be; otherwise Miss Margaret Fulford had not been Miss Margaret Fulford all her days.

"Dear Aunt Margaret," I asked gently, when—how—did he die?"

"He did not die, dear," she answered, "we parted." Again the look of pride in herself at having lived through in her youth a "love-tale," with which to cheer her mind when age had crept upon it; and in that look of vanity I lost the fleeting glimpse of what she must have been in the days when such things mattered.

"When we had been engaged to one another for some little time, the brightest, happiest part of my life, the blow fell. After staying for a protracted visit in our neighbourhood, he left, returning to his own home. He said 'Good bye' to me with many bright promises and tender words. His first letter repeated all that he had said, and spoke again of our happy future together. Then came the letter which was to end all. He told me he was poor, very poor; it had been madness for him to dream of marrying, for though I am a rich woman to-day, Mary, in those days I had no prospect of possessing even a half of what is now mine. But that is no matter. His father, he told me, looked to him to raise the fallen fortunes of their house by marrying wealth which I did not possess. The bare suggestion of there being another to whom, though unblessed with the goods of this world, he had given his love, had caused a terrible scene between them.

Digitized by Google

"His father urged his marriage with a woman of greath wealth whom he had chosen—he was heart-broken—he loved me alone in all the world; yet what must he do? In despair he asked me what course he must take. On one side lay his duty to his father, his old home so sadly needing the help of wealth to retrieve it from decay; on the other stood I myself, whom he loved so dearly. But, alas, I stood alone.

"His letter was despairing, hopeless, yet through it all I read that we must part, that he asked me to release him, and I, knowing that it was for his good, for his future welfare, wrote and bade him good-bye for ever. His last letter of farewell nearly broke my heart. Did I say 'nearly'? It were better had I said did entirely break it.

"I never saw him again; I remained firm to my decision. I loved him too well to spoil his career, and to prove it I gave him up. Had he been less worthy of love, it had killed me, had he tired of me and left me of his own will; but I know his heart was mine always, and I have been content to live here all my life knowing, though I have never seen him again, that the man I loved loved me in return deeply and truly. My life has not been wasted, not for one instant have I thought that.

"My parents died shortly after I received his last letter. I make no doubt he had married the woman his father had chosen almost at once, for though I found myself a rich woman within a few years I heard no more of him; the last card had indeed been played!

"I came here with Ann, and here we have lived together ever since; she only knows that I had suffered, that love had brought me shadow and no sun; I could never tell her any more. She did not know of my happiness when it was happiness; why should I tell her when it was all at an end? I believe she, too, had some unfortunate little affair about that time, but Ann has always been different from me. She was never 'romantic,' and is colder, therefore she can never have felt as I felt or suffered as I suffered."

I raised my head and watched her, her eyes were bright, her voice unfaltering, and in my heart I wondered.

"We agreed to ask no questions, to understand each other and silently give sympathy, but no more. I have told you, dear, because I want you to give me a faithful promise. When Ann and I are dead you will find that all you see and everything we have is yours. Yes—" as I tried, overcome with mingled feelings of grief and gratitude, to speak—"you have been much to both of us, we wish you to possess the house you have—young though you are—so often loved to come to and cheered so often with your presence.

"If I die first, all, for Ann's lifetime, will be left as it is at present; all that I possess will go to her first; but when she dies then all as we leave it comes to you, dear child. There is one thing which I would ask you to do for me—the day you come here to take what will belong to you. It is this: On my writing-table have you ever noticed a small black box? It has stood there for many years, and is very dear to me. The key is here," and she raised the long ribbon of black silk which hung round her throat, to which I now observed for the first time, as well as her watch, was attached a small key.

"I wish you to open that box and destroy its contents for me, dear. Before doing so you may look at them—they will illustrate to you the story I have just told you—they are relics of a byegone time. I cannot even now find courage to destroy them. I have kept them too long, and therefore I leave it to you, Mary, to do for me."

Miss Fulford ceased speaking, seemed indeed to have forgotten my presence. The sun still shone out in the garden, and sparkled on the flowers; but as I looked, the roses and long lines of sweet pinks danced in blurred rows mistily before my eyes. A great pity for this poor old woman filled my heart. All those years to have remained faithful to a man separated from her by more than half-a-century, and who, in all likelihood, had in no way been worthy of so deep a love. I judged him with the clearer eyes of youth, unblinded as hers, had been by love, and doubted.

I looked at her as she gazed out of the open window, a smile on her lips, an air of almost conscious vanity seeming to possess her, as if she had proved that, after all, she had lived her little part in the world. I rose and gently kissed the old face, promising to do all she wished me when the time should come. It was very touching, very beautifully pathetic; but I wondered if I, or any girl of these latter days was capable of so long a devotion, so blind a sacrifice for "one who loved and rode away."

Digitized by Google

He must surely have been worthy of it, and I made excuses for him even to myself for having judged him perhaps harshly without thought. Women must have been different in those days I concluded; or, perhaps after all Aunt Margaret was right, and it was the men who were otherwise from what they appeared now-a-days; but to me there was a touch of sadness infecting the whole little story that went to my heart and made it ache for the long lonely life, hugging its secret to itself, and sharing it with no one, not even the old and trusted friend, who had shared so much of the life but so little of the memory.

Here the entrance of Miss Price, herself, bidding us come to tea, broke the strange spell that had fallen on the little room, and interrupted my meditations.

We ate our meal gaily; the old ladies talked brightly as usual of the many small trifling happenings that interested them—the flowers, the bees, the old house—but rarely, very rarely, the doings of the great world that lay so widely distant from this quiet old-fashioned spot. I noticed that the opening of that old grave had cast no shadow on Miss Fulford; rather was she brighter, cheerier than I had seen her for many years; neither, I noticed, had it impaired her appetite. Later, whilst I wandered alone in the garden, I pondered deeply over her story, and arrived at the conclusion, that though the memory of the love remained, the love itself was dead; not killed, as too many are, alas, cruelly and suddenly by the very hand that caused the love to grow, but just fallen into a deep sleep through old age—a calm slumber—a fading away. Thus passes in the end even the bitterest sorrow from off the face of the earth. The woman who had loved still lived, the empty husk remained, but that which had caused all those years of waste and calm indifference was gone for ever.

. . . .

A sound of footsteps on the path behind me! I turned to find Miss Price following me—the woman of whom Miss Fulford had said "she does not quite understand these things." I waited for her, and noticed something almost unusual in her manner.

"Dear," she said softly, looking up into my face, reminding me as she ever did of some bright little bird—perhaps a wren, "Margaret is resting, the day has been so warm; at her age she feels these extremes more than I do" (she was but two years younger) "so I came out to you. I want very much to talk to you of something—something I have never talked of to anyone before. It relates to a time in my life, passed away for many many years; but I feel the seal of silence lifting from my lips; I wish to speak of it, and so it shall be to you—you, so young, so fresh, so full of life, you will understand such things. Poor Margaret is different, she could not know of these matters, or sympathise."

Where had I heard similar words before? Why, that very afternoon in their little drawing-room, and from Miss Fulford talking of Ann! Poor old women, they were so infinitely pathetic! I wanted dreadfully to cry.

Suspecting another love tragedy I laid my arm around Miss Price's frail old shoulder, and kissed her wrinkled cheek, while I told her to tell what she willed.

"It is only right that you should know, dear Mary," she commenced, "that Margaret and I have agreed that all we have shall be yours when we are both gone. This house is mine, I wish you to possess it. It is a dear little spot, is it not? Yes, child, do you know, or would you believe me when I say that when I first came to live here, I hated it—yes, hated it!" she repeated with a vehemence I had not credited her with.

"But it is wonderful how one gets used to things in this world; it does not do to grumble. I fear I have been a sad grumbler in my day—right down inside my heart, I mean, of course," she added hastily. "Such things are best kept to one's self, I think, don't you? But there! I did not come out here to tell you that," and she laughed brightly. "What I did want to tell you was that you were to inherit our little home and all we are possessed of. In return I ask of you one small service when I am dead and gone. Don't look so sad, Mary," she went on briskly, "such things must be, you know."

Digitized by Google

I LAID MY ARM AROUND HER FRAIL OLD SHOULDER.

Digitized by Google

Ann Price was ever the brightest and most philosophical of the two; now it began to dawn on me that I should find her the most human also.

"You will find in my room," she continued, "a little box, the key of which is here." She pointed to the bunch of keys and seals at her watch chain. "Even Margaret knows nothing about what that box contains—she would laugh terribly if she did, and with every reason. My dear, I am a sentimental old woman, and it is ridiculous at my age, but I have not the courage to destroy the contents of that box, and I wish you to do it for me. Does not that sound strange? And yet, Mary, some things there are that never grow old. I have faded, turned grey, but the one love of my life remains as young as when I was your age. In short, dear, in that box are some letters and one or two trifles that have survived the wreck of the years. The letters are from the man I was to marry—very good, and true and noble he was. I gave him all my love, no one could have ever taken his place; I never dreamt of such a thing, only of him all my life. It's absurd to think of an old woman of my age talking like this, but, do you know, I really believe I could not bear to meet him even now. It seems odd that such things can be, doesn't it, after more than fifty years?" And she looked up into my face with a wistful, questioning shadow in her eyes.

I stroked the old hand in mine gently, my eyes brimming with tears.

"Dear Aunt Ann," I answered, "I quite see how such things are possible." She sighed.

"I am glad, I was afraid you would think me merely an old fool; but as you don't, I will go on.

"He, this man was very poor; so, alas, at that time was I. We were engaged secretly for a short space, the best bit of life for me, and for which I still thank God, though I am an old woman on the brink of the grave.

"In the end we parted, no matter how, it's all over, such endless years ago. He married, I believe, to please his people, but his love was mine, his heart broke the day he wrote me his last letter of farewell."

She held up her head proudly, and that was the only time in all my acquaintance and knowledge of her, that I ever beheld a touch of pride in Ann Price.

"You may read his letters, dear, they will help to show you what a good, true man he was, how much he loved me, how deeply he grieved. Where he is now I have no idea, I fear he must have long since passed away. He went out of my life completely when we parted, I never heard of him again. I gave him up for his own sake, and there it ended.

"Margaret and I came here shortly after, and we have lived here ever since. She knows very little—nothing indeed—but that I had loved, and, like too many other women, lost. She, I believe, had also suffered, but we never exchanged confidences. She knows nothing of what that little box of mine contains, you and I are the only two, and I trust you, dear. I am just a silly old woman, but I have not lived quite in vain, have I?" the old voice quavered anxiously. "Why, Mary, you are crying," as my tears, no longer to be restrained, fell fast. "My child, you must not, this will never do, how selfish of me to trouble you. Think, dear, there is nothing to cry for, the best man I ever knew loved me dearly with all his heart, with the memory of that I have tried to be contented, and in time peace did come. I have been very happy in this home of ours, out of the 'storm, and you know, dear, it's a poor heart that never rejoices. I am grateful for his love, grateful to think I won it. So come, Mary, dry up those tears, my little story is not worth them. Some day you will have love given you as I had, only please God," she added earnestly, "with a happier ending. Then it will teach you why I, old and done with life, can say to-day—I am content."

"Had he been merely false to me, grown tired, that would have been very different, would have broken my heart." She paused abruptly. I saw her mind had travelled back through all those years; once again she lived and loved, in that "spring-time" of hers, when she made choice and shaped her life.

Suddenly she exclaimed anxiously, "child, you are shivering; it is growing chilly. Come we will go in."

She was once more her bright cheery self, her story put away, hidden by her thought for others.

"See," she pointed, "there is Margaret waving for us." I saw Miss Fulford standing at the open window, and we quickly retraced our steps. Whilst I went, I mused how strange it was, that for over half a century these two old friends had lived among the roses and carnations, surrounded by the bees, the pinks, the shaven lawns; year in, year out had lived their lives apart; each unknown to the other treasuring within her heart the memory of the man who had left her so long ago. How strange a coincidence. How little either dreamed of the love, dwelt on so proudly by one, remembered so sadly, so tenderly by the other.

Digitized by Google

How strange, too, that in the "twilight," after so many years of unaccepted, unsought sympathy, both should have chosen to lay bare the little sorrowful story, to a girl unversed, as I know myself to be, in such matters. The village, the neighbours, all who knew them, how little did they guess that the two old ladies, so quiet, so eccentric, so unassuming as they appeared to be, had each in her secret soul made of their little rose-covered house a temple to love, from whence had risen up through all those years the smoking incense that burned on two silent altars to the memory of the wine of life!

PART II.

The following winter it so happened that owing to circumstances relating to my own family I was obliged to go abroad. It was with uneasy forebodings I visited the "little house" to bid my old friends a most unwilling farewell, and bitterly did I regret the necessity that forced me to go so far from them.

Alas, I never saw either again. In the first days of winter's cold Miss Fulford fell ill and quickly sank, being followed to the grave within two short weeks with pathetic rapidity by her old friend, who never recovered the shock of her death.

Owing to no settled address, and several efforts on the part of letters to find me proving fruitless, I did not hear of my double loss until all was over; till the old churchyard of the little village had received two new graves, and the old house had lost its two tenants of over fifty years' standing.

On my return to England, I found all had come to me, as had already been told me, by the express desire of the old ladies themselves. On account of my enforced stay in foreign parts it was not, therefore, till the first crocuses were beginning to fade and wither in the garden, yielding place to the later spring flowers to show in all their glory, that I was able—sadly enough alas!—to find my way to my new inheritance.

As soon as I was able to do so, I went to spend a few days in the "little house" among my new possessions. So bleak, so empty, so unaccustomed did it appear without those two strange old personalities, and many times did I feel my eyes fill at memory of them. Ever mindful of my double promise to each of my old friends on that June day, so few months distant, I made it my first care to carry out their wishes.

Having found their little secret "treasure hoards," I took them to where a bright fire blazed in the drawing-room, in which I meant to destroy their contents after reading them, according to promise. The keys of both being forthcoming, I opened Miss Fulford's first, very sadly, very reverently, mindful of the pathetic story it was to illustrate for me. The contents were but slight, a few letters—very few—tied neatly together by the inevitable faded ribbon; a withered flower in a yellowing envelope, inscribed on the outer side, in the fine handwriting our grandmothers wrote before us: "Given me by Charles, from the Rose Garden, Stancy"; a knot of ribbon, with no clue to its story, but which I could guess at; and as I sadly gazed at it I wondered if it had adorned the white muslin frock Aunt Margaret had worn that day, when the "Charles," who was to me merely a name, had told her she was beautiful; a miniature—and this I examined more closely, instinct telling me I was, in it, to make acquaintance of the man who had so desolately shaped my old friend, Margaret Fulford's life. A young man of about eight and twenty, dressed in the blue cloth coat of his period adorned with gold buttons, and wearing the high stock, long since a thing of the past. It was a handsome face, but one that did not attract a younger generation—the eyes of a light brown appeared too close together, unless that were a fault of the artist—light curling hair, and straight refined features; the whole spoilt by a mouth which, to me, was a strange mixture of weakness and cruelty.

I sat in silence with the miniature in my hand; through the window came a few gleams of cold spring sunshine; it shone in mockery on the withered rose, that no sun of this earth, however warm, could restore to sweet-scented life again; on the faded knot of ribbon; and reflected a half-mocking smile on the face of the miniature I held. "You doubt," the painted lips seem to say to me, "yet do not these same relics stand as evidence of the love I could inspire, long before you were born."

Digitized by Google

I raised it, looked at it attentively; no, truly not a face worthy of a life-long devotion. How had that handsome face, those shallow eyes, so deceived a woman of so much character as my aunt? That "I may be judging harshly," I thought, "so long ago . . . I have no right . . . and yet . . ." I sighed, and remembered Aunt Margaret's words, snatches of them came to me while I untied the fading ribbon. "So true . . . so good . . . so noble." "I was not worthy of him." . . . "I have never regretted that my whole life has been spent in memory of him. . ."

I looked at the weak, painted face, and hated it! in a guilty way feeling as if in so doing I was committing a crime against the woman who had loved it so utterly; then directed my attention to the letters.

I SAT IN SILENCE WITH THE MINIATURE IN MY HAND.

must remain for me an unanswered puzzle I thought sadly, as I laid the portrait down impatiently and took up the bundle of letters. "They will help to show you what a good, true man he was," a voice from the dead came back to me, softly whispering in my memory. But I shook my head. "You were not worth it. I can't believe, with those eyes, that mouth, you were in the least what Aunt Margaret thought you," I said to the miniature, half aloud. And the mocking eyes looked up at me from the picture with a straighter gaze than I believed they had ever looked at anyone in life.

The first I opened was long, rambling, exaggerated, full of mock sentiment, mock eloquence, which struck a wrong chord in my heart, and filled me with fierce unavailing anger. How had such things so deceived? How was it possible that so long a life as Margaret Fulford's had been laid waste by one so little worthy? Fruitless, helpless scorn of this long-dead or vanished "Charles" filled my thoughts, and raised in my heart a spirit of revolt against the Powers that can let such things be.

Two or three other letters did I read, including the one in which he told the broken-hearted girl of the interview with his father. Vainly through them all did I search for traces of true nobility, that nobility that Margaret Fulford had so loved and missed the world for; each rang untrue, and a false note—that poor love so often too blind had closed her eyes to—ran through all. There still remained the last, and shortest letter of the pitiful little packet, and I took it up more tenderly, knowing which one it must be, and read as follows:—

Digitized by Google

MY ONE AND ONLY LOVE,—You, so strong, so good! you have decided, decided for Duty, and my fate—our fates, are sealed. My heart is broken, but I bow before your decision. Yes! we must part—must, as you say, meet no more—must forget we exist to each other. Heart of my heart, how long will be the road! How desolate the life I must lead without you! My pen has never so reluctantly made one stroke since first I wrote as now, now when our "dream" is over, and there is nothing left me to do but say "Good-bye." . . . Good-bye . . . farewell . . . for ever my one, my only love. Never shall I forget you. Your image is graven on this poor broken heart. Out across the miles that part us do I stretch my arms to you, to hold you once again. Do not utterly forget the miserable man for whom the light of love, of joy, of hope goes down for ever this sad day. Think of me in your happy future. Let a tear fall on the grave of our love sometimes, my darling, and pray—I beseech you pray one little prayer while memory lasts, for the man who loves you to-day and for ever, though Fate and Duty—stern Duty—divide our pathways. For the last time, love of my life, I sign myself, your broken-hearted CHARLES.

For long I sat silent when I had finished—the letter in my hand. Then thought came. And this, this is the man who was "so good, so noble," I cried to myself. "I don't believe it, not one word! and I don't believe in you." I turned angrily to the miniature on the table by my side. "You were a fraud; this broken-hearted letter of yours is not worth the paper it's written on! You imposed on one of the dearest, sweetest women that ever lived, and I hate you, 'Charles,' I hate you!" I repeated. I picked up the portrait, and in my unavailing wrath shook it, as it lay in my hand. The shallow eyes smiled back into my angry ones unconcernedly. As little must he have felt love and tenderness when he wrote the words, "Do not utterly forget the miserable man for whom the light of love, of joy, of hope, goes down for ever this sad day."

I rose angrily; either I have no love, no "romance,"—as poor Aunt Margaret spoke of—in me, or my eyes see too clearly, I thought. Why cannot I merely see the love, the broken heart? No more? Why should I doubt, and judge, and dislike unjustly, and without cause no doubt? After all, "Charles" did not make his eyes light brown, or his mouth cruel! "I am over hasty, and hard . . . hard . . . because I do not understand such things," I mused quietly; then laid Miss Fulford's treasures aside, and began to open Aunt Ann's little box, hoping that they would prove more convincing that love is worth a life-time of waste—is worth any sacrifice, and I resolved to judge her long-dead "romance" more tenderly.

"Are the love relics of all women the same?" I pondered, as I gently viewed Miss Price's. A faded flower . . . a glove . . . a bundle of letters! These I seized eagerly, heedless of what else the box contained. Quickly I opened them, and read. As I read, the first few doubts chased through my mind. I raised my eyes from the faded writing and looked perplexedly to where Miss Fulford's letters lay. No, I had not moved them. They were where I had placed them. These, undoubtedly, were Ann Price's. Yet something in the wording, in the fine sharp-pointed writing, struck me as oddly familiar. Where had I read and seen all these expressions, those long, over-exaggerated sentences before. I read the letters carefully; at last took up the only one remaining of the bundle.

"MY ONE AND ONLY LOVE,—You, so strong, so good—you have decided . . . decided for Duty, and my fate—our fates, are sealed. My heart is broken, but I bow before your decision . . ."

I broke off abruptly, read the letter quickly through, repeating almost before my eyes saw the words what I knew I should see:—

"Heart of my heart, how long will be the road. . . . Do not utterly forget the miserable man for whom the light of love, of joy, of hope goes down for ever this sad day. . . . Pray I beseech you, pray one little prayer while memory lasts. . . ."

I knew without looking what the ending must be, and behold I was right!

"Love of my life, I sign myself,
"Your broken-hearted
"CHARLES."

Digitized by Google

I rose, and compared Aunt Margaret's letter with this one. Could it be merely an extraordinary coincidence? Or could it be two "Charleses," friends, all unknown to the women who had loved them—friends to the extent of copying each other's love-letters? Or could it be . . . ? Oh! not that, surely!

Noticing something remaining in Miss Price's little box, I hastily picked it up, hoping to find some clue. It was wrapped—with what tender care—in a little filmy lace handkerchief. As I opened the packet it proved to be another miniature; and as I laid it on the table all doubts were set at rest for all time. It was the same face—the same man! the same handsome light brown eyes, the same weak mouth, straight features, and soft curling hair. My suspicions were confirmed! No room for doubt remained. The loves of Margaret Fulford, and of Ann Price had been one gigantic waste, failure, fraud. I might call it what I willed—the farce, the pity of it remained.

Overcome by anger, sorrow, and helpless unavailing rage against the man who had broken two hearts to cheer his idle moments, I laid my head down on the table among the letters, the withered flowers, and poor pathetic trifles, and sobbed as bitterly as ever in my life I had sobbed before.

How it was he had known both the women, made love to them, without even mentioning the name of either, or in any way betraying himself, I shall never know. I was filled with rage to think that such things can be, that lives can be so wasted. I fell to wondering, had discovery come to both when they were still young—one hour's softening, one hour's confidence on the part of either—how different might their lives have been. Just time to recover from the wounds such base cruelty had inflicted, and then a facing of the world again. Surely hearts that could so love could have just as strongly resented, as strongly hated. And what a different story each might have known. How I hated the "Charles" who had played so base a part. But as I grew calmer, it came to me perhaps after all, in spite of waste, of desolation, their lives had not been so unblest. They had died believing, trusting, loving; was it not better they had never known? And now—now they understood and saw it all as I did, only a thousand times more clearly, in a Land where such things mattered not, and where no sting of earth could cause one pang. They had never known, and for them sleeping in their last resting-place so quietly, so soundly, my tears fell softly as I murmured: "Everything after all is for the best. God knows, and always knew, and willed it so."

But for myself, for the woman who had laid bare so cruel, so pitiful, so poor a farce! there remained but one thing to do, for the sake of two poor lonely women's hearts. I had been told—asked pathetically—to destroy the relics of a long dead and buried past. And I would! Gathering, with sudden fierceness, all that lay there on the table into my hands, I flung them to the heart of the glowing fire. And as they crackled and burned I felt I had avenged the broken lives of my two old friends. I watched with satisfaction the miniatures slowly burning, cracking, crumbling away. For the last time the weak lips smiled, the light eyes mocked. It was to me as if the man himself burned there at my mercy.

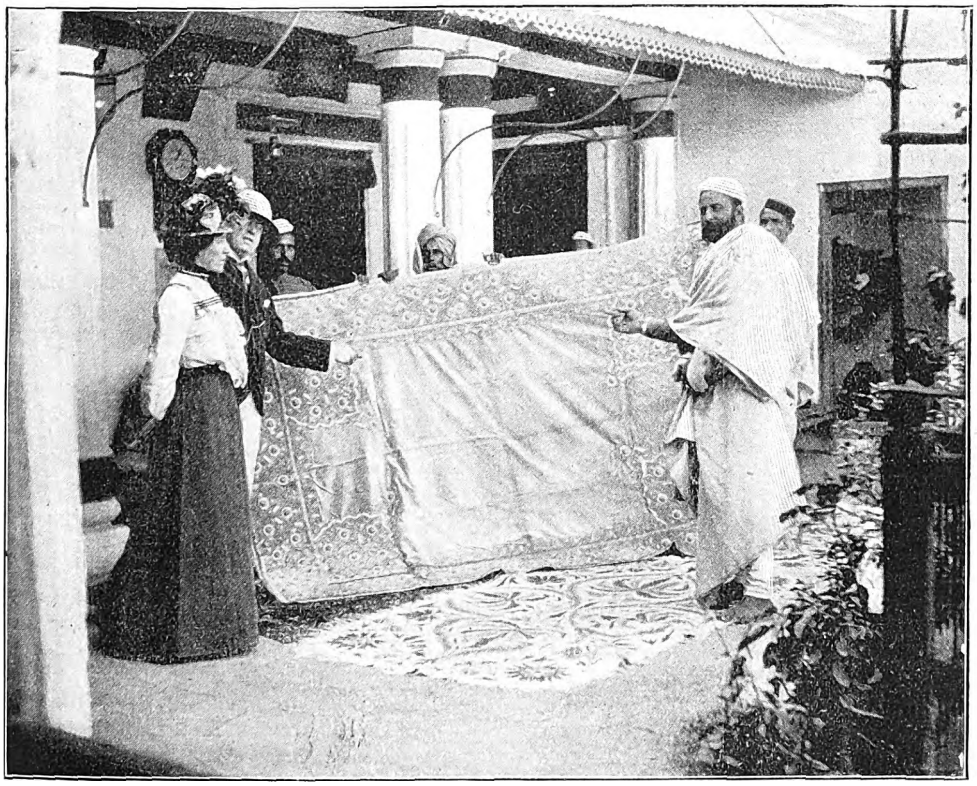
I stood and watched with eager merciless eyes. Then when only grey ashes remained a darker shadow in the bright fire, I fell on the rug beside it, burying my face in my hands which trembled with excitement, and wept long and softly over the cruel pathetic irony of those two sad lives.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

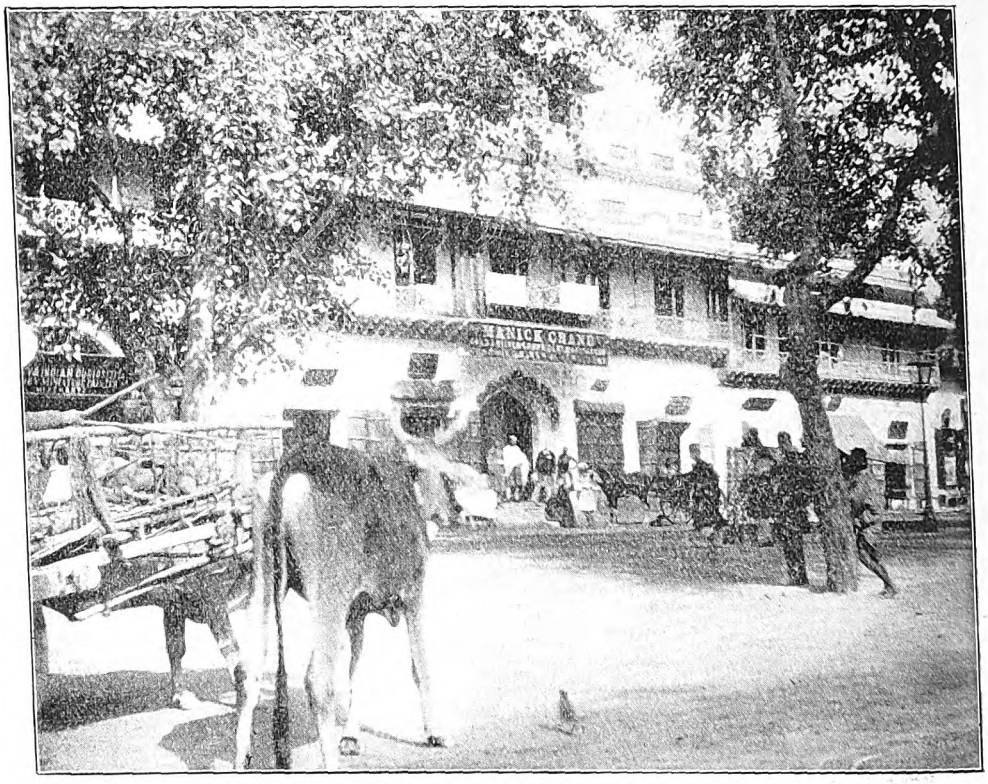
The Making and Makers of Coronation Fabrics and Embroideries.

THE splendours of the Coronation have long formed a leading topic of conversation not only with the many peoples of the British Empire, but with, practically, the whole newspaper reading world. For many weeks, aye months, past details concerning the stately ceremony to take place in Westminster Abbey, and the brilliant pageants which are to accompany and follow it have been flashed by electric wire, or transmitted by post to every corner of the earth inhabited by civilised man. These details have been read everywhere with eagerness, have been discussed everywhere with animation, and it is safe to say that the ceremony of June 26th is now being awaited with a universality of interest never before excited by a coronation. It is equally safe to say that when anticipation has given place to reality, and reality has, in turn, given place to retrospection, the fact that the royal splendours of King Edward's



EXPLAINING THE EXCELLENCIES OF A £100 TABLECLOTH TO GLOBE-TROTTING CUSTOMERS.

Digitized by Google



EMBROIDERER'S HOUSE AT DELHI.

crowning were entirely the handiwork of King Edward's subjects, will be held to be one of the chief glories of an all-glorious occasion.

There is no rose without a thorn, and Free Trade, which brought the blessing of cheap food to the whole English people, also brought silks and velvets of foreign manufacture which, by their cheapness and superficial beauty, soon spoiled the market for native productions of this kind, and so ruined the English silk weaving industry. The hand-loom weavers suffered especially, for the fabrics they created, though most economical of all in the long run by reason of their durability and indestructible loveliness, necessarily retained their high prices, and so were tabooed by a public whose appetite for cheapness grew keener the more abundantly it was fed. Now and then something would occur to demonstrate the fact that English hand-woven silk had no equal in the world; as, for instance, in the seventies, when the King of Bavaria sent our weavers a piece of eighth century brocade to copy because none of their Continental brethren could reproduce its exquisite colourings and texture; and, again, when the adoption by the Roman Catholic Church of the doctrine of Papal Infallibility made it desirable that the Pope should be furnished with a vestment of symbolic significance in the form of a cope woven without seam. On that occasion the Catholic countries were scoured in vain for craftsmen capable of making silk of the requisite width and quality, and eventually the order for it was placed (not, we may be sure, without reluctance) among the British-born descendants of the French Protestant weavers whose faith had caused them to be driven hither from their native land by the Edict of Nantes.

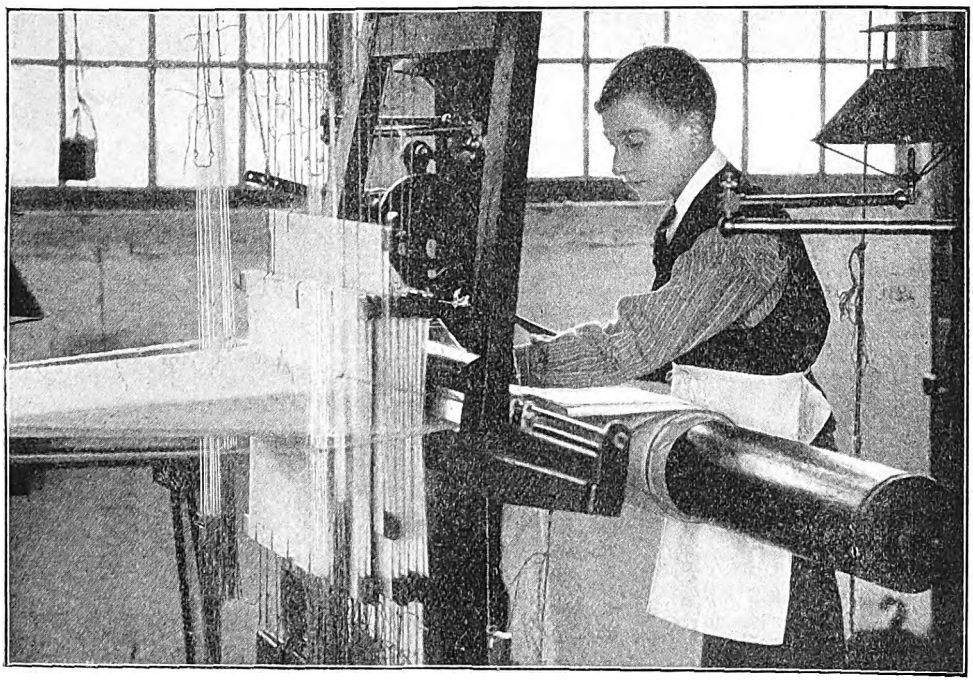
In spite of occasional tributes to its supreme excellence, such as these, our hand-made silk trade languished sadly. The first really vitalising stimulus afforded it was when an order for the bridal satin of the present Princess of Wales was placed with Messrs. Warner, of Newgate Street, for execution by their hand-weavers at Spitalfields. What oft-repeated appeals to patriotic sentiment had failed to effect,

Digitized by Google

Royal example accomplished forthwith. Ladies who had, hitherto, turned a deaf ear to praises of British silk, became suddenly attentive when they found that the bride-elect of an heir to the throne had chosen the home-made article for such an important garment as her wedding gown, and from that hour our trade in hand-made silk began to improve. The King's recently expressed hope that native arts and industries would be patronised by peers and peeresses ordering raiment for the Coronation, gave it a great impetus, with the result that hand-looms have, for the best part of a year, been going busily day by day at Sudbury, in Suffolk; at Leek, in Staffordshire; at Canterbury, where silk weaving had long been entirely discontinued; and at Braintree in Essex, whither the Messrs. Warner moved their Spitalfields and Bethnal Green workers in 1895.

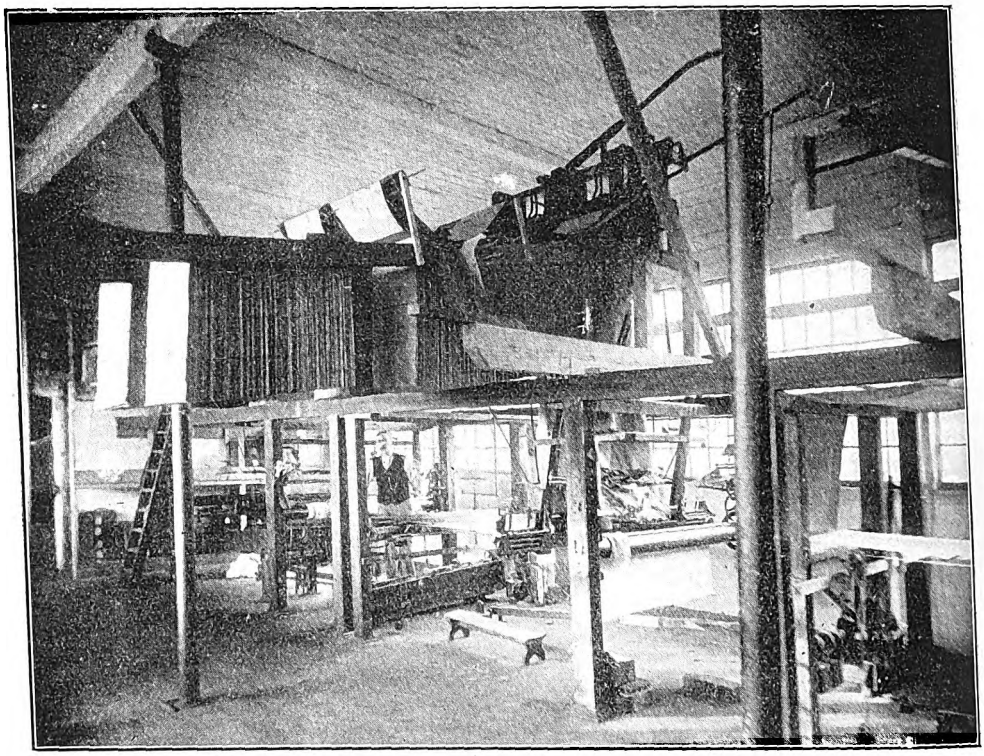
In the weaving gallery of the Braintree factory many a sumptuous robe length of velvet and dress piece of silk, destined for Coronation wear, has grown to its required dimensions. Some looms have been busy in the production of a superb purple velvet, the exact colour of a fresh English violet, for the Coronation robes of the Princess of Wales, the Princess Christian, and other Royal ladies. Other looms have been glowing with velvet of the rich fuchsia red, which custom has decreed to be the correct colour for members of the peerage to wear at the great ceremony. In the centre of the gallery I saw a lovely white satin, pure yet warm, brocaded with a ribbon design in delicate mother-of-pearl tints of pink, and green, and mauve, and gold, being woven for the Princess of Wales. Perhaps it will be worn at the Coronation ceremony. Most certainly it will display its beauties to the public eye at one or other of the great functions appertaining to that historic event. On another loom a gown length of cloth of silver was being created by fingers that knew their work well and did it lovingly; while, hard by, a lad of fifteen was weaving an exquisite ivory satin for wear at the crowning of the King. I may mention in this connection that silk weaving is to some extent an hereditary craft, and many of the men and women now practising it are lineal descendants of the French and Flemish refugees by whom it was first introduced into this country.

The two most skilled workers of all the skilful band employed at Braintree are Albert Parchment, who wove the satin for the Princess of Wales's bridal gown, and



AT WORK—WEAVING.

Digitized by Google



SIDE OF WEAVING GALLERY SHOWING CORONATION COPE ON LOOM.

William Shoulder, and to these experts was entrusted the task of weaving the King's Coronation mantle of gold, which looked like concentrated sunshine on the looms as it grew inch by inch beneath their deft fingers. It took them nine weeks to make the twenty-seven yards of gold tissue necessary for that regal vestment, and every ell, as it was finished, was carefully covered with jewellers' cloth to preserve its glittering loveliness intact. At night the looms containing it were guarded by an armed watchman, and proud as the Messrs. Warner naturally felt at being chosen to supply the splendid fabric for the Coronation cope, one cannot help thinking that they must have experienced a sensation of relief, as well as satisfaction, when it was finished and consigned to the King's robe-makers. The finding of a weaving that would produce a fabric stiff enough to stand alone, yet supple enough to hang in graceful folds and adapt itself to every movement of the wearer, was, in itself, no light matter, but after many experiments the desired end was attained by using warp of silver thread and a woof of gold so pure that it contained infinitely less alloy than the metal of which our sovereigns are minted.

The King's Coronation cope has been embroidered with Sovereign and National emblems at the Kensington School of Art Needlework, but much of the beautiful embroidery that will be seen in the Royal Procession, was worked by his Majesty's Indian subjects, in the far-off city of Delhi. The fame of the Delhi needlework is world-wide. From father to son the craft has been handed down through more centuries than we have record of, and for the last hundred years Manick Chand, embroidery merchant and metal worker, of Chandi Chowk (Silver Square) Delhi, has enjoyed the reputation of supplying the finest specimens of it procurable. This reputation was built up by the grandfather of the present owner of the name, the proprietor of the business. When the King went to India as Prince of Wales he inspected Manick Chand's stock with interest and bought largely of it, and when his Majesty conceived the statesmanlike idea of enabling a typical Indian industry to play a part in his Coronation pageant, he sent the Manick Chand of to-day an order that kept forty of Delhi's most skilled embroiderers employed for four months. The designing of the work was carried out by a Mohammedan who has been chief designer to the Manick Chand's for thirty years, and enjoys the (for a native worker) colossal salary of four shillings a day. The needleworkers pursue their beauty-creating labour in the humblest fashion possible, squatting on the bare ground of rickety-looking sheds round rudely made bamboo frames. Their pay ranges from sixpence to one and fourpence a day, according to the measure of their skill—little enough in all conscience, considering that most of them have to drop work at forty, because at that age their eyesight has generally lost the keenness, and their fingers the delicacy of touch necessary for the finer kinds of embroidery. Yet they are content, and we may be sure that when the splendours of the Coronation pass from lip to lip in the bazaars of India—where, by some mysterious process, everything is talked about before it is known elsewhere—there will be much proud satisfaction in the knowledge that native India had its share in the creation of those splendours.

Digitized by Google

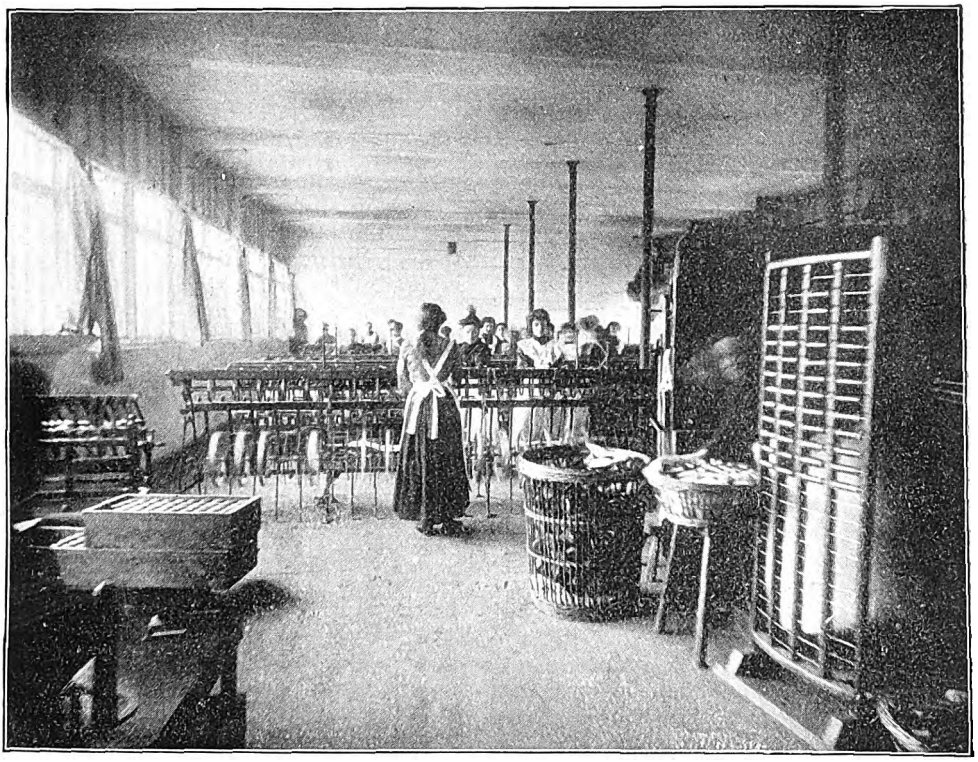
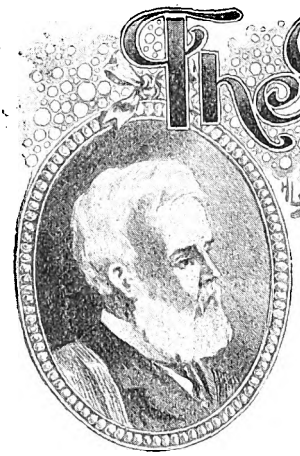
ANNIE G. PIKE.



WINDING AND WARPING FLOOR.

Digitized by Google



The People's Friend

OR,

The Adventures of Carlton-Hawes.

By CHARLES HERBERT.

IV.

"GENTLEMEN of the jury," exclaims the coroner, as the twelve jurymen file in, amidst the expectant hush of the throng in the vestry-room, "have you considered your verdict as to how William Ruthven met his death?"

"We have, sir," respectfully answers the foreman, "and," here the hush in the room grows deeper, "we find a verdict against Percy Kingston of 'Wilful murder.'"

A young girl at the back of the court rises with an exclamation of protest, but she is silenced, and the coroner proceeds to commit the unfortunate man to take his trial before the magistrates on the charge of having on the 10th day of May stabbed William Ruthven, his employer, in an office in Holborn.

Scarcely realising his position, he is at once arrested and moved off by the policemen, the crowd in the room file out, and very soon the empty benches proclaim that the first act in the bringing of a murderer to justice is over.

For some days past "The Holborn Mystery," as it was called, had absorbed the attention of the public; but little by little it grew very clear that there was no mystery about it. Temper on the part of a clerk named Percy Kingston, and injustice on the part of the employer, William Ruthven, having led the first to take up a keen paper-stabber that was on the table and stab his master to death. There had been words between them early in the day, and the clerk returning about nine at night to finish some work that was behindhand, had found his master there and stabbed him in a fit of rage. At least, that was the theory of the prosecution. The office had been closed at half-past six o'clock, and Mr. Ruthven had stayed on, presumably at work, but his night had soon come when no man can work, for three hours later he was discovered by the clerk dead in his chair. Percy Kingston, the clerk, was the only one who had the key to the office in which the tragedy occurred, and suspicion naturally fell upon him, especially as he was the first to find the murdered man that night and to give the alarm.

"What had he returned for?" said the prosecution. Even Percy Kingston himself was willing to admit that for him ever to return to the office was a most exceptional thing. The great chances were that he had never left the office at all, but waited about to have words with his employer, and that then he killed him, leaving the office in fright and only coming back so that the protection of being apparently the one to discover the crime might be his. It was cleverly planned, but it failed to gull either the Police or Public, and that night, when the verdict of the coroner's jury became known, there was scarcely a reader of the papers who did not sympathise with the verdict.

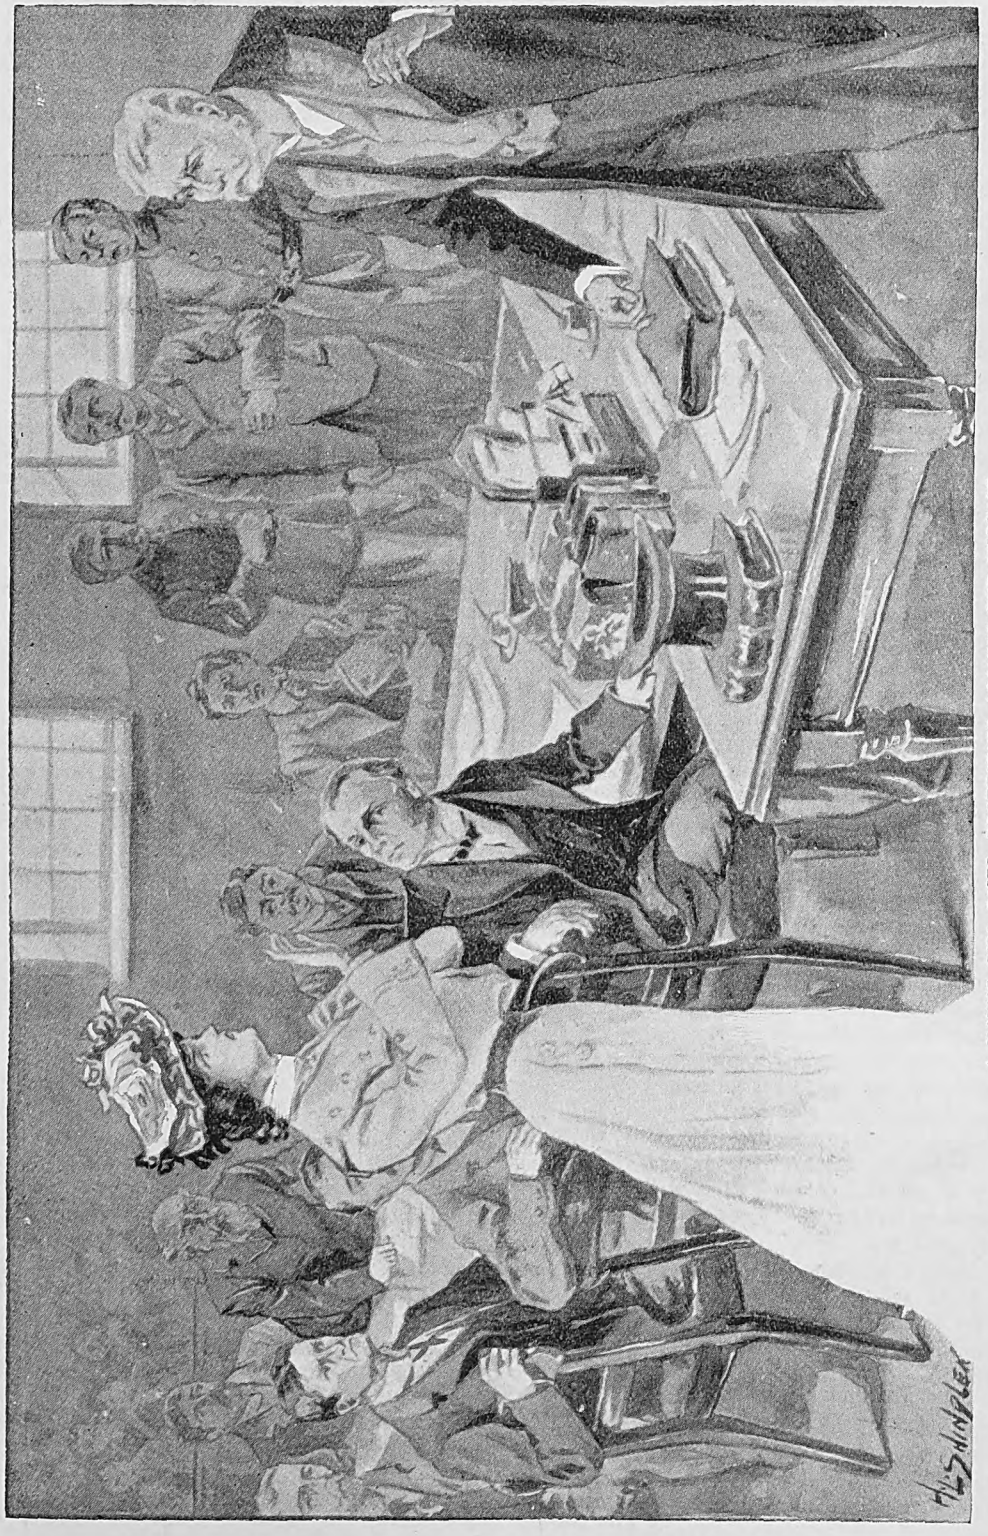
. . . .

Three days later.

Carlton-Hawes is sitting in his office, thoroughly vexed. Like the public at large, he has been interested in The Holborn Mystery, but, unlike the public or the police, he is by no mean so certain as to the guilt of Percy Kingston. As the

All Rights Reserved in Great Britain and the United States.

Digitized by Google



A YOUNG GIRL RISES, PROTESTING AGAINST THE VERDICT.

Digitized by Google

result of his reading the reports of the coroner's enquiry, he had sauntered down the day before to the head-quarters of the police and put a leading question or two to the inspector in charge of the case. They were old friends, and Inspector Burbridge chatted away openly enough. "It's no good, Mr. Carlton-Hawes," he said. "You are always ready enough to argue the case as if the prisoner were innocent; but all the facts are against you here. There is, first of all, the coming back of the clerk—looks suspicious, specially as he owns he rarely did it. Depend upon it, he knew his employer was there and meant to quarrel with him, though, of course, I don't believe he meant murder."

Carlton-Hawes nodded, and quietly observed, "Don't forget it is his own admission that he rarely went back. He would more probably have said he often did it, if he had anything to hide. That, to me, is one point in his favour. The one ugly feature of the case, to me, is that only the clerk had the key of the front door and of the office."

"Precisely," said the Inspector. "A fact enough to hang a man."

"Perhaps," said Carlton-Hawes dubiously, "but, by-the-bye, would you mind telling me what you found in the pockets of Mr. Ruthven after the murder?"

"Certainly, you can see them. Two five-pound notes were lying on the table, his purse was decently full, and the letters are all on business; there was his card case, a bunch of keys, and that was all. Here they are." And he laid the miscellany before Carlton-Hawes.

He stood some time fingering the bunch of keys, then put his finger enquiringly on a long slender key. "Key of his lodgings, I suppose?"

"Yes," said the Inspector.

"And that was all you found?"—turning over the cards in the cardcase absent-mindedly.

"All," was the uncompromising reply. "As a rule there is generally a letter or two that gives us no end of trouble, tracing probable connections, but here it was all plain sailing. Kingston appears to be the only one to have a quarrel against him. Their voices were heard by the people above, and I believe he killed him then, and afterwards came back to pose as having found him dead. Oh, he'll be found guilty, sure enough!"

"It looks like it, certainly;" said Carlton-Hawes, "and, if so, one of these cards will do to go in my museum. May I keep one?" The Inspector nodded, and Mr. Carlton-Hawes departed, apparently satisfied.

But he was not. His shrewd judgment had detected a flaw in the case for the prosecution—a flaw so serious that he marvelled it had escaped the notice of the police—but he put it down to the extraordinary blindness often manifested by those who "get up" a case either "for" or "against" a man, and simply argue matters out from that point of view.

It was on this flaw that he had been fixing his attention the greater part of the night; sleep generally became impossible while his mind was pondering a difficult problem, but he is no nearer a solution when he comes to his office this morning. His letters lie unopened, his newspapers unread, nothing possesses his thoughts but the conviction that a fellow-creature, in all probability, is being wrongfully accused of an awful crime.

The morning wears on, and he still has this look of worry, when suddenly the page asks if he can see a lady, who refuses to send in her name.

"Ask her, then, to put down her business on this slip, and put it in this envelope," he says, and, when he receives it, he starts with amazement, for he discovers written upon it,

THE HOLBORN MYSTERY.

In another moment or two she is shown in, and he glances at her interrogatively as she nervously takes a seat and looks anxiously at him.

"I have only come to you, Mr. Carlton-Hawes, because of all I have heard of you as 'The People's Friend.' I want you to take this case up, for the accused is a poor man, I understand, and I am afraid it will go very hard with him. You may look to me for any expense to which you may be put. Only, I want it kept an absolute secret that I am backing you in this."

Carlton-Hawes bows, then he says, "I suppose you are the young lady mentioned in the newspaper reports as having been engaged to him? Do you know where he was that night during the two hours or so he declares he was away?"

"I do not," she declares, with rising colour, and beginning to stammer, "I—

Digitized by Google

I—am not—not the young lady you refer to—in fact I have—never—even—met—Percy—Kingston." This in a rapid rush of words. "I—I only saw him at the coroner's trial, and I"—recovering her self-control, she smiles or rather tries to—"I felt so moved with pity for him that I thought of engaging counsel for him, and then I remembered you."

"It is very good of you," he says "Miss——?" "Mrs. Bartlett is my name," she says. "I am a widow. I—I lost my husband a year ago. My address? Well, won't it do if I come and see you every day or two, for I don't want to get known in connection with this matter at all? So I had rather, if you don't mind, keep my address back."

"Certainly," says Mr. Carlton-Hawes. "If you call in two days I will let you know how things proceed."

"Good morning, then," she says. "All you have to do, really, is to prove an alibi."

He smiles as she departs, but the minute she has gone he says, "This is nothing else but the very Finger of God;" and writing something rapidly on a slip of paper he places it with some notes he has already made on the case and looks up with serener brow, as the attendant enters.

"Can you see a Mrs. Kingston, sir, and a Miss Waring, who is with her?"

A look of blank astonishment fills Carlton-Hawes' face, as he answers, "Show them in instantly," and mutters to himself, "the mother and the girl!"

The mother waits for no introduction buts breaks out with the true eloquence of directness, "O, sir! I've come to see if you can save my son. He's my only boy, and they've taken him up for murder."

"Stay a minute, dear," interrupts the girl gently. "How is Mr. Carlton-Hawes to know whom you mean?"

"Yes, yes," breaks in that gentleman cheerfully, "I know all about it, and if you leave it to me, perhaps, we can never tell"—this gravely—for Carlton-Hawes can never quite get over the professional caution he learnt as a medical man—"he may yet turn out innocent."

"Innocent; of course he is innocent!" exclaim both women.

"Well, well, that is what we have to prove," he says cheerily. "I want to have an interview with your son to-day as soon as possible, and if you will come back here this afternoon late I may have something to say to you."

Half-an-hour later he is interviewing the prisoner, whose looks impress him as the most unlikely to be worn by a murderer. He is a man, fair of skin, with a light stubbly moustache just touching the lip, but not sufficiently to hide the weak curves of the mouth.

He colours sensitively as Carlton-Hawes approaches him and announces his errand. "The only thing I ask for from you," concludes his visitor, "is absolute frankness."

The nod he receives in reply is more assuring to Carlton-Hawes than a volume of words, and he proceeds at once to question him, jotting down notes meanwhile.—"If, then, you are sure you unlocked the door and found Mr. Ruthven dead, it must be a mistake or an invention for the caretaker upstairs to declare she heard excited voices in the office?" he queries.

"Oh, I expect, sir, it is one of those statements that originated with a desire to know and say something about it to her neighbours, and now she backs it up with lies."

"Think so?" says Carlton-Hawes. "I'm not so sure." But he makes another note ere he moves to the door, then he stops and hesitates. "Did you ever know anyone of the name of Bartlett?"

"Never, sir, that I can recall, I don't think so? Man or woman, sir?"

"Ah! I see you don't know," observes Carlton-Hawes, and leaves the prison with a rather disappointed look on his face.

When Carlton Hawes leaves the prison, he goes straightway to Holborn and interviews the caretaker, who is willing, only too willing, to pour her tale into his ears.

"'Voices, quarrelling' did you say, sir? I should think I did hear them just! That young Kingston was that excited I couldn't help a-hearin'. Why, sir, his voice rose quite high like, like——"

"Like a woman's, for instance?" suggested Mr. Carlton-Hawes.

"Exactly, sir; and Mr. Ruthven's voice was quite low like. I couldn't hear what he said, but I heard the other say 'You must, you must,' several times over."

"Thank you," says Carlton Hawes, gently, slipping something into the woman's hand. "Oh, by the bye! I suppose Mr. Ruthven had keys of his own, as well as Percy Kingston?"

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"Yes, I know he had, for I've met him coming up the stairs just now and then of an evening, with a lady, as I thought was his wife till I found out at the inquest that he wasn't married."

"I see!" says her questioner meditatively, and goes slowly down the stairs, pondering. Half an hour later he enters the police station and asks for Inspector Burbridge.

"Now, Burbridge, just listen to me for a little. I've been running, nose down, on the trail ever since I left you last night, and I think I have run the quarry almost to earth. Burbridge, Kingston was quite right! He did not commit that murder." Solemnly.

The Inspector smiles carelessly. "That will have to be proved," he suggests rather sarcastically.

"Quite so," says Carlton-Hawes. "And I have the proof with me. Do you see that card?" and he produces the card he had taken from the murdered man's card-case the previous evening. "Look at it!"

The Inspector regards it narrowly. "Well!" he says, as though he sees nothing on it. "Oh! turn it over, eh?" And he scrutinises it afresh. "Why, there's an address here, a woman's! It wasn't here last night when I gave you the card I know. I had searched every one of them."

"Only in the faintest pencil marks, I admit But I happened to catch sight of them and put the card under a powerful microscope and then inked over it."

"I'll have her looked up at once," says the inspector excitedly. "She may know something."

"No need," returns the other calmly. "I have seen her. She called at my office this morning—thought of me as 'The People's Friend,' you see. Wants me to interest myself over getting Percy Kingston off. Said I would. She refused her address, saying she would call frequently. She little knew I had it all the time. I naturally thought her interest very suspicious, and I am going to take you down with me to her, to try a game of bluff. Bring those keys along with you, with which Percy Kingston states he unlocked that door."

In a few moments the Inspector is ready, and comes along.

"Give me those keys," says Carlton-Hawes; "you can have the others. Haven't you got them?"

"What others?" returns the Inspector, mystified.

"Why, the keys with which the murdered man intended to lock his office up, if he had had the chance to go home that night. Where are those keys?"

"Why, I never thought——" exclaims Burbridge. "Of course, they are missing. Kingston must have——"

"No, Kingston didn't!" interrupts Carlton-Hawes. "The door had been locked before he came in, by someone, who had taken those keys from the victim's pocket and fastened the door behind when leaving, never expecting that it would be opened till the morning. The murdered man sometimes came at night to his office; the caretaker has met him there, and says he had keys. One of the voices heard by her at any rate was shrill. Now, Percy Kingston's is deep. It was a woman quarrelling with him, a woman who seized the knife and stabbed him in great excitement, a woman who stupidly, or else fearfully, locked the door, a woman who was too tender-hearted to let another man suffer for her fault, and so came, in secret, to set a friend at work for him, and that woman is Mrs. Bartlett, and you will find she has the missing keys."

It does not take them very long to get to Mrs. Bartlett's house at Shepherd's Bush (the Inspector mentally anathematising himself for not perceiving the important point of the keys before), and together they go to visit the unsuspecting widow.

"Can I see Mrs. Bartlett?" says Carlton-Hawes. "Tell her a gentleman has called, never mind the name!"

"Mrs. Bartlett is out, sir, but she will be back very soon," answers the neat maid. "Will you wait?"

"I will!" says Carlton-Hawes, and in an undertone to Inspector Burbridge, outside, he suggests that he should watch the street, in case by any chance Mrs. Bartlett should get wind of his presence, and not come in.

Half-an-hour later there is a double-knock at the door; and Mrs. Bartlett entering is told by the girl that a gentleman wishes to see her.

"Who is he? Did he give his name?" Carlton-Hawes hears her say in a hurried whisper.

Digitized by Google

"No, ma'am! But he has been waiting a good bit; and there's another in uniform outside."

A pause ensues, apparently of hesitation, then he hears her slowly mount the stairs, and some little time elapses before she comes down and enters the parlour.

Never a sign of amazement crosses her face as she perceives Carlton-Hawes, but she looks at him like an outraged, indignant woman.

"Why do you come here?" she asks. "Something told me it was you."

"Will you not be seated?" he says coldly. "I have news for you, and I found out your address, by means you will hear of later on. I have also discovered that you yourself were a friend of the murdered man's. You did not tell me this!"

"He was no friend of mine!" she says with a choking sound in her voice; "but what if he were?"

"Only that one of the visits you used to pay him, you paid on that eventful night, and when you left him you locked the door behind you."

"How do you know all this? Where are your proofs?" she demands.

"Do you know these?" he exclaims, suddenly rising and standing before her, dangling the two keys upon his finger that the inspector had furnished him with.

The woman looks at him now in amazement; then he sees her face becoming ashen in hue. "Why," she exclaims, then stops short, for her breath fails her; but Carlton-Hawes proceeds—

"Precisely! You thought you had them, and so you have. But I see enough to confirm all my suspicious, and I have, I think, obeyed your instructions as to freeing Percy Kingston, only too well. I am afraid I shall have to trouble you to go with Inspector Burbridge, who is outside for the purpose of arresting you." And he steps to the window. But she stops him with an imperative gesture.

"Stay," she says, between her white lips, white with intense excitement, as Carlton-Hawes thinks. "You are quite right! Percy Kingston is innocent. He did find that scamp Ruthven dead. I killed him! We had been lovers the last four years before my invalid husband died, and he promised to marry me when he died. But he went back from his word! And somehow that night his sneers maddened me, the whole room went dark, and when the light came as in a flash, I saw what I had done. But he deserved it richly!" Here her hands worked convulsively. "But I didn't know what I was doing; so, as I feared it would be found out suddenly, if I left the door open, I took his keys and fastened it and crept out. When I saw that Kingston was very likely to be hung for it, I knew no rest till I came to you. You can tell it all to the public; I shall be dead in a few seconds more!" and she fell into the window recess in a fit.

Carlton-Hawes rushed to her but it was too late. An instinct warned her when she heard of the uniform, and she had taken a corrosive poison before she entered the room, governing her sufferings with heroic effort, till she had told the pitiful tale of the man, who had jested with a woman's love, and found it "from jest to earnest." So she went, not long after her betrayer, to that Land where justice never errs, and every provocation received will be weighed in exact balances.

* * * *

"You can breathe freely," Carlton-Hawes declares to the anxious mother and strained-faced girl, when they return that afternoon, and they receive his words in a silence that is eloquent of real feeling. "The real murderer, or I should say murderess, has confessed, and Percy Kingston will be free, though he will have to take his trial."

"How was it found out, sir?" asks the girl eagerly; but Carlton-Hawes only responds, "You will hear by and bye, child." He cannot say more, for his finely strung sympathies are just then with the worst sufferers in the case, the man whose life has been ended so suddenly in the midst of a selfish career and the woman who has

"Rashly importunate, Gone to her death."

And they do hear of it, for all London soon rings with the story of the man whose keen judgment had seen the probabilities of the case and followed the one little clue till he found in the missing keys the key to the whole truth.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

Some Photographs of Jesus Christ.

IT is sometimes thought a pity that we have no reliable portrait of Jesus Christ, but after all a Being in whom so many varied feelings played could not have looked exactly the same for long together. Even if we possessed a whole series of photographs we should have missed the personality behind them. No photograph could have caught the impression of the Spirit of Jesus or pictured the Diviner expressions of His countenance.

It is far safer to let our imagination draw His face from His deeds and words; for one thing is certain, a real Being, like Jesus, would look what He said: every word would find its answer in His countenance—eyes would speak, lips would curve in sympathy, and the face would soften and harden alternately under the influence of His emotions.

We will try, then, and draw a few pictures of the face of Jesus Christ as it must have appeared at different times.

The first scene in which we will look at Him is as He sits upon the Mount preaching. As we saw His face we should have perceived it to be a deeply thoughtful face, a solemn face, every line of it full of earnestness.

Every sentence in that sermon is a complete thought in itself, the utterance of one who has "dwelt deep." Only a man with the deep set eyes of the philosopher could have come to the conclusions of this sermon. Thirty-one He was when He spoke them, but he must have been thinking, thinking, thinking since He was twelve to have reached such conclusions in nineteen years. It is an old man speaking there, one who has made up His mind and can speak definitely where others are almost afraid to reason or to question. Yes, it was a thoughtful face, and solemn because the mind that saw the truth, saw also how many had missed it. If that Sermon on the Mount were true all the world was wrong then and is wrong now. Its views wrong, its religion wrong, its conduct wrong. Wasn't that enough to give the Christ a visage so solemn that it was more marred than any man's?

And it was an earnest face, because knowing such a state of things would set Jesus quivering with anxiety to put it right, and that anxiety would reflect itself in His face. When He said "Beware!" He said it with face as well as voice; when He cried, "Ye cannot, ye cannot serve God and Mammon," it was a dogmatic face. It was a long sermon, but no one went to sleep during its utterance, for above them all as they listened there was one centre of attraction—a face luminous with thought—solemn, almost pinched with anxiety to make them hear, and set in rigid lines of conviction; and the impression remaining with them was this:—He had spoken with authority.

The second scene is when some anxious mothers brought their children to Him; the disciples' faces expressed annoyance, but the face of Jesus was lit up by the sun of kindly feeling as "the bairns cuddled doon and He mithered them."

Would those children have gone to the disciples like that? What! go to an angry, rebuking face? Try your own three-year-old and see! But they went to the Christ-face: it was loving, it was winsome and "they cuddled doon and He mithered them." Perhaps it was the tenderness of that face that made the mothers think of it; I wonder if they brought them to the Rabbis? It is the tenderness of that face we need to remember in the day when failure proves "We are but little children weak." Will He forgive? will He pity? will He encourage us? Are these your questions? There is the answer! Man, I tell you He had a tender face; He mothered the children and I expect He will mother you.

Digitized by Google

In the third scene all the tenderness is gone out of it. He is speaking of men who make rules for others, but do not keep them themselves, who work out righteousness like a machine, who pay rates and taxes to God just as they pay other rates and taxes, because they must, but most unwillingly; and as he speaks, those lips which to the children curved in tender lines compress into set sternness. The eyes which became like dew to the children lighten and flash; the tongue which spoke with honeyed sweetness to children now compasses the resources of language to find words which sting and whip and burn. The veins swell in his forehead, and his pale intellectual face crimsons with His indignation. It is the face of a real man confronting unreality, the face of the Being who in white-lipped wrath drove them panic-stricken from the Temple. Yet it is the portrait of the Christ, and He is the portrait of God! What shall we say then? What can we say but this? Alas, for the unreal man—the hypocrite, how can he escape the damnation of hell?

So we can multiply our photographs of the face of Jesus Christ.

It contains a mixture of contempt and scorn for the man cruel as "a fox" and cunning as "a fox"; it looks up invitingly to the little man who from his leafy seat looked down; it beamed in love on that splendid specimen of a young man who came questioning about eternal life, although He loved in vain; it brightened with approval at the faith of the centurion and the Syro-Phœnician woman; it looked reproof at Peter and mercy at Mary—it was a marvellous face!

"Those eyes mix dew and flame, and both are well," and they are the eyes of God, for the light of the knowledge of the glory of God is given us in the face of Jesus Christ.

Digitized by Google

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Hazel, the heroine of this story, is an English girl, who having married Mahomed Ali, a Mahometan student, while he was in England, insists upon going out to join him, in utter ignorance of what it means to be incarcerated in the seclusion of the Zenana. When she finds it out, she is dominated with one idea —that of escape, and at the end of Chapter II. she has climbed into a tree to reconnoitre the surroundings outside the walls, but is surprised by her husband. After this, although he apparently takes no notice, he pretends to depart on urgent and mysterious journeys, during which time Hazel grows more familiar with the true inwardness of Zenana life, and is more disgusted with it. One of the slave girls, Taj Bee, won by Hazel's kindness, promises to assist her to escape, and her determination to do so is increased by hearing that her father-in-law wishes her husband to bring home Aziz Unissa, the daughter of Sultan Mirza Khan, to be his second wife. While she is musing, devoured with indignation, Taj Bee comes to her and whispers, "I have found a way of escape!" The plan when unfolded by the girl turns out to be a suggestion that as lady visitors come to see the Begum they are in the habit of bringing many strange servants with them, who, when they go away are preceeded by one crying, "Gosha! Gosha!" and therefore it will be easy for Hazel, by dressing in servant's garb, provided by the girl, to mix in the servants' waiting-room and leave with them. This they try, but the slave girl herself is hindered and captured, and Hazel, who might have got away, returns for the girl's sake. Afterwards Hazel has impotently to witness the slave girl's terrible punishment, who is blinded by Eastern tortures.

CHAPTER V.—(continued).

AND so the night passed; Taj Bee moaning, raving, and delirious outside on the terrace; Hazel within, pacing her room, wringing her hands, crying to herself: "What can I do for her! How can I help her!" Tearing and struggling with the locked doors, and bruising herself against them; or lying sobbing on her bed in acknowledged impotence.

In the morning the doors were opened, and the other slaves carried Taj Bee in from the terrace, in an unconscious stupor. Hazel made them lay her on her own bed, and she bathed her eyes, and tried to feed her. She would let no one nurse her but herself.

For three days Taj Bee lay upon Hazel's bed, moaning and rambling in delirium, or sunk in a heavy stupor, but always unconscious of the tender hands that nursed her, of the tender voice that soothed and blessed her; and on the fourth day, at the breaking of the dawn, she died.

"She gave her life for me," said Hazel, and she kissed the slave girl's dead face solemnly. Then she drew her veil about her, and sat upon the floor, with her head bent upon her knees, and made a vow to Taj Bee and herself that never again should any friend of hers risk life in her service. "If I ever do escape I will escape alone," she said.

CHAPTER VI.

The slaves came noiselessly on their bare feet and carried away the dead body of their comrade. They were half afraid of Hazel, sitting there veiled, dumb and motionless, so they made haste to escape out of her presence. And Hazel was left alone in the darkened room, sitting with her head bowed upon her knees, full of grief for the loss and for the sufferings of the one she had looked upon as her only friend in a strange land; and deeply despondent about her own fate, and the certainty that escape for her was further away than ever.

Digitized by Google

While she sat there she heard her husband's step in the room and his voice calling softly, "Hazel!"

She got up and went to him, and, in her loneliness and sadness, clung to him with more of the old affection than she had shown him since he brought her to her hated prison.

He smoothed her hair softly, and kissed her with great tenderness. "Pearl of my heart, grieve not so," he said, "let my love comfort you. Am I not more to you than many slaves?"

When she would have answered he laid his hand softly over her mouth, whispering in her ear, "Hush, come out on the terrace, we cannot tell who may be listening to us here."

"Not that dreadful place, Ali!" she begged him. "I could not bear to sit out there now. I should hear her screams again; and I am frightened. Cannot we go down into the garden?"

"There are ears everywhere," he answered, "down there in the shadows, amongst the trees, I cannot tell what spies may be listening to carry our words to my father, and you have not a prudent tongue, dear heart."

"But, surely, no one here understands English, except ourselves?" she asked.

"Who can tell?" Mahomed Ali answered gloomily.

Then, trembling and shivering, she let him lead her out upon the terrace where Taj Bee's martyrdom had been accomplished.

The terrace was broad and open, and the moon shone on it; there were no shadows where an eavesdropper could conceal herself, undiscovered. And Mahomed Ali locked the door of the room, so that none might enter to lurk behind the venetians of the windows. He brought out pillows and cushions, and they sat together, with their arms round each other, leaning back against the balustrade in the moonlight, with the warm hush of the evening softly wrapping them.

"What makes you think any of them can understand English, Ali?" she said, leaning her head against his shoulder, feeling for once the rare comfort of comradeship with her husband.

"I have no particular reason for thinking it, dear," he answered, "but it is not impossible, and we cannot be too careful. My father may have had one of the women taught English, all these months, one of my mother's women perhaps. Or one of his own secretaries may be outside the door there, listening to anything we say. Out here no one can hear us. And I want you to understand, darling, that we are really in a very dangerous position just now. My father is very much incensed against you, and your nursing of Taj Bee will have further enraged him. He would not listen to me yesterday when I began to speak for you, and I do not know myself what he is meditating."

"I could not have deserted Taj Bee after all she suffered for me," said Hazel indignantly.

"I am not blaming you, my dearest. But she is dead now, you can do nothing more for her, and we must look to our own safety."

"Do you mean that we should escape together?" cried Hazel, alert in a moment. "Are you going to help me yourself to get away?"

"That would be impossible, quite impossible, at present," he answered uneasily. "Do not ask me to commit an act of useless madness that would only ruin us both. You are constantly watched, and I know that my father does not now altogether trust me. But I will promise you this, my beloved, that when all this fuss and upstirring is past, and my father's suspicions are lulled to sleep again, I myself will help you to go back to your own country, since you cannot be happy in the home I have brought you to; it is for this I want you now to listen to me, it is our only hope, for you to be patient. You must seem to become reconciled to your life here, and to have given up the idea of trying to run away to your own people. The Nabob has meant to give you a lesson in the fate of your slave; he does not know the character of the English; you must pretend to have taken that lesson to heart; to be thoroughly frightened and submissive, and never to think of thwart-ing his will again in anything. You can see for yourself, dear, that it is more important to him now than it ever was that you should not go back to your own people to tell of the things you have seen in the zenana. The English people do not like these severe punishments. The Government does not acknowledge our right to do as we please with our own slaves, as my father, and all his ancestors have always done. And it would injure his credit very much with the English Government if they were to know of how Taj Bee was punished for disobeying and defying her lord."

Digitized by Google

"I should think so indeed," said Hazel. I hope, Ali, you don't mean to say you justify such abominable cruelty, or that you consider it anything but a most brutal murder."

"It is not my place to judge my father's actions," Mahomed Ali answered evasively, "but that is not what we have to consider now. I only want you to understand, the case being so, that my father is not likely to give you any opportunity of leaving this house. He was not altogether careless before, as you know; he will be a hundred times more vigilant now. You must never forget that you are surrounded by spies. Your own attendants will be most anxious to report everything you do and say. They know well enough that the affair of Taj Bee has brought more or less suspicion upon them also; they will be eager to prove that they had no share in her disobedience. You must beware of them, Hazel; should either of them even ever propose to you to help you as Taj Bee did, be certain that it will only be to lay a trap for you, and your answer will be immediately reported to curry favour with their master."

"What shall I do, Ali? What shall I do? It seems such a terrible thing to be surrounded by spies and enemies," said Hazel, despairingly. He did not assure her of his protection, as an Englishman would have done in like case; he knew the zenana too well to flatter himself with any illusion that he could help Hazel at this crisis. He only went on in his level tones:

"There is one advantage you have; it will be extremely easy for you to convince them that you are quite reconciled to your life here. You see they have never been used to any other life themselves; in their eyes the Begum, their mistress, has an eminently enviable position and an existence that any woman might covet; it seems to them unnatural and inexplicable that any woman should wish to change such a very desirable fate. They will be quite ready to believe that you have come to your senses, and that your eyes are now open to appreciate the brilliancy of your destiny, and they will not fail to report the same to the Nabob. Although they are ready to betray you to him, they have really no wish that their mistress should live under the shadow of his displeasure; it would be far pleasanter and more comfortable for them if you basked in the sunshine of his favour, and they would help you to that willingly if you gave them the opportunity." He paused a moment to draw Hazel closer into his embrace. "And if, my wife beloved," he said, "they thought that you had hopes of some day giving me a son all suspicion would fall away from you at once."

"A son! To be born in a zenana! cried Hazel, revolted.

"I was born in a zenana," said Mahomed Ali.

"And I wish, with all my heart, dear, you had been born in any other place on the face of the earth," she answered impulsively, but she put up her hand to stroke his cheek and soothe the feelings she might have ruffled.

"I want you to be patient," he resumed, "and do nothing to increase my father's irritation against you; he is an old man, and he will not live for ever. As soon as he is dead we will go back to England together if you like. Even if we could escape from this house now I have no money to take us over the sea."

"But he may live for years and years, Ali; are we to wait all that time?" said Hazel.

"Well, then, when the time is ripe, I promise I will take you away without waiting for that," said Mahomed Ali.

"If only I can feel you are on my side, Ali, dear," she murmured, "I should not be so dreadfully unhappy and lonely. I would try to bear anything if I could be sure you were really trying to take me away from this dreadful place. If you would only trust me entirely and tell me everything, and be quite frank and open with me; and never, never join with my enemies to cheat and deceive and spy upon me! Let us be true, loyal comrades as well as lovers, my husband."

Digitized by Google

But, there, she asked him more than it was within his power to give her. He could and did love her very tenderly, he would do his utmost to protect her according to his own methods, but it was not in his nature to be "frank and open" with anyone. Even at that moment, while her fair head rested in all trustfulness against his heart, while she entreated him not to deceive her, to trust her as she was ready to trust him; at that very moment he was concealing from her a secret that he knew to be of vital importance to her happiness; a secret she must learn one day in bitterness of soul.

He passed by her appeal. "I will come up here as much as I possibly can, dearest," he said, "and you must try not to be too lonely when I am obliged to be absent. Send word to Kair Unissa to come and see you, and make your women bring singers and dancers to amuse you."

"But the singers and dancers do not amuse me in the very least, Ali," she protested.

"What would amuse you, pearl of my heart?" he asked tenderly.

"Many impossible things, I am afraid," she answered. "But I think there is one, perhaps, that you could manage for me. There must be a circulating library somewhere in the place, will you get me books to read. They will help to pass the time better than anything else."

He looked at her a little doubtfully. Could this be some new plot of hers to communicate with the English community in the town? And she, with her wits preternaturally sharpened by the dangers amongst which her life had drifted, marked his hesitation, and understood something of its motive.

"Look here, Ali," she said impulsively, "you have lived long enough among English people to know that we have a certain regard for our promises. I will make you a promise. If you subscribe to this library for me, they will send me a catalogue of their books, and I shall send back a list of the books I choose. There will be volumes passing backwards and forwards continually between me and the library, and the books will be passed on also to other subscribers. In all this you see a possibility of my communicating with the outer world, and making my position known to my fellow-country women outside. Now, Ali, I give you my sacred word of honour that I will never use this means of communication, that I will never write one single word or stroke in any of these books without first of all asking your permission. I want the books solely for my own reading, to distract my mind in the emptiness of the zenana. Indeed, you may trust me, dear."

"I do trust you, my darling heart," he answered. "I will do as you wish." But to himself he promised to give the closest scrutiny to every volume that should leave the house, so as to make it impossible for Hazel to bring more trouble either on herself or him, by any failure to keep her promise. "They are knocking at the outer door," he remarked presently, "we had better open it."

They went within, and Mahomed Ali lay down on the bed, feigning sleep, while Hazel unlocked the door.

Her attendant, Gouse Bee, stood waiting outside. Hazel opened the door very gently, with her finger on her lip. "Hush!" she said, my lord Mahomed sleeps, you must not disturb him. What do you want?"

"The big Begum Sahib has sent to say she would speak with you, Hazoor," whispered Gouse Bee.

Hazel drew her out into the passage, closing the door softly behind her.

"Where is Katheja Bee?" she asked.

"She is in the Begum Sahib's apartment, Hazoor."

"And who gave you both permission to go and gossip with the Begum's women and leave me here by myself, without food or attendance? Don't let such a thing ever happen again, or I will have you both well whipped. Go back and tell the Begum, my mother-in-law, that I will come and speak with her as soon as the lord Mahomed has awaked, who is sleeping now in my apartment; and bring Katheja Bee back with you, and see you come at once."

The woman departed, crestfallen, and Hazel went back to her husband.

"The Begum has sent for me, Ali," she said, "and I have answered that I will come as soon as you have awaked. What does she want me for?"

"I cannot tell, dear. Perhaps she has some message from my father. I must go down now, and see what is going on below, but I will come again later, and sleep here to-night."

When the two women returned from

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

the Begum's apartment, he got off the bed and went out, first saluting his wife with great respect and affection, and repeating his promise to return.

The women began volubly to excuse themselves for their seeming neglect, and to beg her forgiveness. She might be, as indeed she was, herself under the ban of the Nabob's displeasure, but none the more for that would anyone interfere to protect them if she chose to have them whipped.

HAZEL WAS NOT THE LEAST AFRAID OF THE OPIUM-RULED OLD MUMMY ON THE CHARPOY.

"Well, see it does not happen again," she said, cutting them short, "and now go down and prepare food for me, and when it is ready, wait here till I return from the Begum Sahib. I do not require you to attend me there."

The Begum sat on her charpoy, with her women about her. Instead of her habitual dreamy indifference there was an expression of anger and contempt on her handsome dark face. The Nabob had been with her, and had related to her the enormities of which Hazel had been guilty, and the old Begum, strong in her authority as head of the zenana, an authority that had never been challenged, had roused herself to say to her lord: "Leave her to me, I will manage her." To which he answered: "Women understand women. For my part, I understand them not; only bring down her pride and her rebellious spirit. I leave her to you." All this the women had heard, sitting round their mistress; Hazel's two women Katheja Bee, and Gouse Bee had also heard.

Digitized by Google

"Come here Hazari Begum," said the old lady waving her hand imperiously to Hazel, as she entered the room.

Now Hazel feared and dreaded the Nabob with a very real dread, but she was not the least afraid of the opium-ruled old mummy on the charpoy, so she advanced unhesitatingly, with her usual rather casual manner.

"What is this I hear?" said the Begum. "The Nabob tells me that you, his daughter-in-law, run about the streets like some shameless woman, dressed like a common slave out of the bazaar. Who are you, dog of a foreign woman, that you should make us all to see blackness on the face of my lord the Nabob?"

Hazel laughed. "Indeed, madam," she said, "it is hard you should blame me, a stranger, as you say, for the blackness of my lord the Nabob's skin. You should rather blame his father and his mother, who were doubtless as black as himself."

The Begum's more or less simulated anger became very real indeed at this insulting misconception of her words.

"Are you mad, girl!" she cried, "do you know that I am your mother-in-law, that I can give you the slipper for your wanton ways and your disrespect? That I can cut off your hair, and feed you on bread and water."

Hazel drew herself up with an air of dauntless pride:

"I know this," she said calmly "that if any of your slaves dared to lay a finger on me, my husband, the lord Mahomed would have them beaten to death. And, as for you, if you touch me I will kill you. Eat your opium, Begum Sahib, and meddle not with things that are above your understanding."

The women standing about trembled and drew off from her. The old Begum stared at her blankly.

"Bring me a chair," said Hazel. Now on all other occasions on which she had sat in her mother-in-law's room, Hazel had sat on the floor, like everyone else.

They brought her the Nabob's own sacred chair, in which no one but himself ever sat. It was nothing but a common kitchen armchair, but that detracted nothing from its sacredness. And this foreign Sheitan had the effrontery to seat herself calmly in it.

The Begum attempted to speak, but she was never very ready with her tongue, and Hazel waved her remarks aside.

"I must request you to give me two more attendants," she said, fixing her eyes sternly on the Begum. "I have now only two, which are quite insufficient for my proper state. I must remind you that my husband, the lord Mahomed Shere Ali Mustapha Kahn, is the eldest son of the Nabob Sahib, and that as his wife I shall be the first lady in the zenana when Allah shall call the Nabob to his Paradise."

The incensed Begum raised her nerveless hand in a quick gesture, as if she would have struck Hazel, but Hazel caught her wrist in her strong, young grasp, and held it: "You had better not do that," she said, standing up suddenly with a gesture so menacing that the Begum cowered away from her.

"Let go my hand," she said shrilly. "Cannot one even raise one's hand in your presence without violence?"

Hazel dropped her hand and sat down: "Give the Begum Sahib some opium," she said. One of the women brought out the opium box and rolled a pill in dead silence, and put it into the Begum's unresisting mouth.

"I shall choose two of your attendants," Hazel went on, looking round upon the women, when this ceremony had been performed. "You have too many, and they are too lazy. I will take Fatima Bee and Asha Bee, they are the youngest and the prettiest," she said, pointing out two young girls, who, without hesitation, came forward at once and salaamed to her, and took up their station behind her chair, as accepting the change of service.

The Begum said nothing.

"Call Katheja Bee and Gouse Bee," Hazel commanded. "They are waiting for me in my own apartment."

Her two new slaves ran with willing feet to do her bidding.

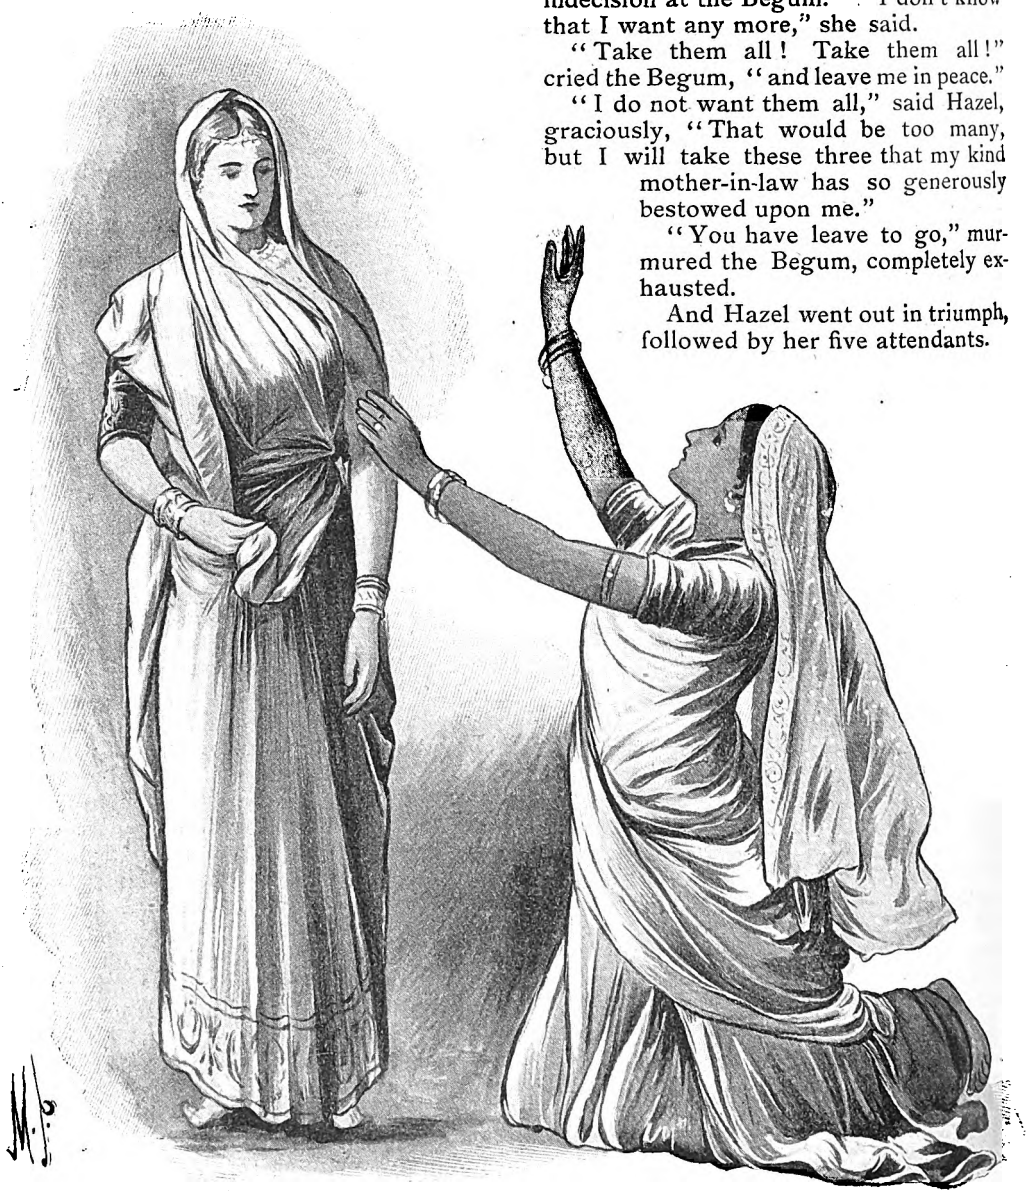
When the four returned she told them to stand in front of her:

"You four are my attendants," she said. "You are the four cleverest and best-looking slaves in the whole zenana; but if you are disobedient or careless of my commands, I will spoil both your beauty and your cleverness."

The vague awfulness of this threat produced fully as much effect on the four girls as Hazel expected.

They salaamed most profoundly, and

Digitized by Google



"TAKE ME INTO YOUR SERVICE, TOO!" CRIED ONE OF THE OTHER WOMEN TO THE CONQUERING HAZEL.

stood grinning and nudging each other, evidently prepared to fly to obey her orders on the slightest sign. One of the other women rushed forward and threw herself at the feet of Hazel.

"Take me too, oh Pearl of the Harem," she cried. "I am clever, I can sew the silver and gold embroidery."

Hazel looked with a pretence of indecision at the Begum. "I don't know that I want any more," she said.

"Take them all! Take them all!" cried the Begum, "and leave me in peace."

"I do not want them all," said Hazel, graciously, "That would be too many, but I will take these three that my kind mother-in-law has so generously bestowed upon me."

"You have leave to go," murmured the Begum, completely exhausted.

And Hazel went out in triumph, followed by her five attendants.

Later in the evening the Begum poured into her lord's ear the tale of Hazel's unparalleled audacity and insolence, and showed him three or four tiny purple marks on her own slender brown wrist, the impress of Hazel's fingers. But the Nabob's brow cleared, even while he condoled with his wife, and agreed with her that Hazel was indeed a foreign Sheitan.

Digitized by Google

He said nothing of his private thoughts in the zenana, being a man of a reticent nature, but he said to his son afterwards: "Now that she has begun to fight in the zenana, we shall have no more trouble, my son. Not that the Begum is much of a fighter. She allowed the young one to take away three of her slaves and bruise her wrist. But it is never wise to interfere between the women in the zenana, my friend."

But it may safely be said that no act of Hazel's since she came under his roof had displeased her father-in-law less than her revolt against the Begum.

Mahomed Ali laughed much relieved, and repeated his father's remarks to his wife.

"I am sorry for the poor old Begum," said Hazel, "but I shall be obliged to go in there sometimes and hurry her, to keep up that illusion of your father's that my energies are entirely taken up with the petty warfare of the zenana."

Mahomed Ali brought her books from the library, and she, ignorant of the searching censorship to which every volume of them was subjected before it was permitted to leave the house, was profoundly grateful to him for this proof of confidence, and reliance on her promise.

Towards her new handmaidens she developed an unheard-of capriciousness. She made them take out all her rich skirts and little fairy jackets from the wardrobes, where they had lain neglected since her coming to Madras; while she lounged in her rocking chair, one or another of the women stood as lay figure for the trying on of these garments till she was ready to fall upon the floor for weariness. None of the dresses pleased her, they must all be altered, this one was too short and must be lengthened, that one was too long, the trimming of a third was odious and must be taken off and something different sewn on in its place. Zairah Bee, the Begum's woman who had boasted of her skill in embroidery had ample opportunity to make good her boast.

This occupation Hazel diversified by setting her women to sweep and dust and purify her bower, and by directing them to change the disposition of the furniture every two or three days; she began also to devise draperies and embroideries for its adornment, and drove her women to work at these novelties as a West End dressmaker might drive her work girls in the height of a London season when there is stress of orders, till the women told each other she did not give them time to drink water.

"I will give them something to talk about," she said to Mahomed Ali, when he chaffed her once about the perpetual bustle that was always going on in her apartment.

"My mother says you are driving her into her grave with your restless ways," he said.

"Yes, I go there every day," said Hazel, "to ask her to advise me about my dresses, or my embroideries, and I make her look at them and talk about them till she is sick of the sight of me and my women and my clothes."

"She told my father yesterday that she wished he had let the foreign Sheitan go when she wanted to run away, for she had never had a moment's peace of her life since."

"She will wish it more still to-morrow," said Hazel, "for I am going to make her come in here to look at the improvements I have been making. She cares nothing for any of it, but I shall make her come."

When she invited the Begum next day to pay her this visit of inspection, the Begum flatly declined.

"I never go out of my own room," she said decidedly. "I am not strong enough to walk, and what do I care for the English tom-fooleries you have brought into my son's zenana?"

"You say that only because you have not seen them," Hazel persisted, "that makes me all the more anxious to show them to you. When you have seen them you will say 'they are indeed beautiful.'"

"You women," she said, turning to her attendants, "tell the Begum Sahib, is not my apartment a palace of delight?"

"Surely, Hazoor, there is no palace like it in the whole of Madras," answered the women, who had become inordinately proud of Hazel and all her works.

"I cannot walk," murmured the Begum.

"Never mind that, I will carry you," said Hazel, advancing nearer towards the charpoy.

But the Begum was mindful of the undue strength of Hazel's grasp, and she shrank away from her.

"No, no," she said, "let my own women help me."

She made no further objection, but with many groans and sighs allowed her women to help her to rise from her charpoy, and, leaning heavily upon them, she shuffled slowly across her own room and down the passage to Hazel's apartment, where she sat down on the side of the bed.

Digitized by Google

"Do you like the way I have set that mirror across the corner," Hazel asked pleasantly, "with that pretty embroidery draping the frame?"

"No, I don't," said the Begum, who thought she had at last found a way of vexing Hazel, "that is not at all the place for it."

Hazel smiled at her: "I am so glad you came," she said, "I wanted some one to advise me, I was not quite sure about that mirror myself. We must move it. Where do you think it would look best?"

"How should I know?" said the Begum, crossly.

"Never mind," said Hazel, cheerfully, "we will move it about to different places, so that you can judge where it looks best."

Moving the mirror, which was in fact a cheval glass, necessitated moving nearly every other article of furniture in the room, and some of the wardrobes and tables were very heavy. But Hazel was not daunted. All the Begum's women were pressed into the service, and soon had the room in a fine state of confusion; with wardrobes standing out in the middle of the floor, and tables blocking the passage to the door. The Begum leaned on the side of the bed, ready to cry with vexation and weariness, for the bed was too high for her to be able to sit on it comfortably. But the women enjoyed themselves like children; they trampled over the Begum's feet in their excitement, and once they nearly let a wardrobe fall upon her.

At last she could bear it no longer; with a supreme effort, she stood up from the bed, and shuffled back to her own room unaided.

"You can go now," said Hazel to the women, as soon as she became aware of this retreat, and the women went off laughing and chattering amongst themselves. No doubt Hazel was a Sheitan, but she brought some movement into the zenana which had become painfully stagnant since Kair Unissa Begum and her singing and dancing women had been translated to another sphere.

"You must give me some money, Ali," said Hazel one day to her husband, "I want to send to the bazaar for some silks and stuffs, and some big flower-pots. I must have some plants to stand on the terrace and in the room. There are some very nice ones down there in the garden, young palms and small crotons that would look very well upstairs. I shall make the servants dig them up and bring them in."

And Mahomed Ali gave her money with great willingness. He was almost beginning to hope that Hazel was becoming reconciled to her life and that there would be no more talk of escaping from the zenana.

When the Begum heard of the big flower-pots that were to be bought, and the plants that were to be dug up and brought on to the terrace, she sent for the Nabob to come and speak to her; and she sent all her women out of the room so that she might confer with the Nabob in private.

"I have been a good wife to you, these many years, my lord?" she said.

"Certainly, you have made my zenana a palace of delight," said the Nabob, politely.

"I have borne you four fair sons," added the Begum.

"You have, indeed, never failed in your duty," the Nabob agreed, "also, I have never brought a second wife into the zenana, being abundantly satisfied with you."

"Now, after all these years, do you wish that foreign Sheitan of yours to kill me?"

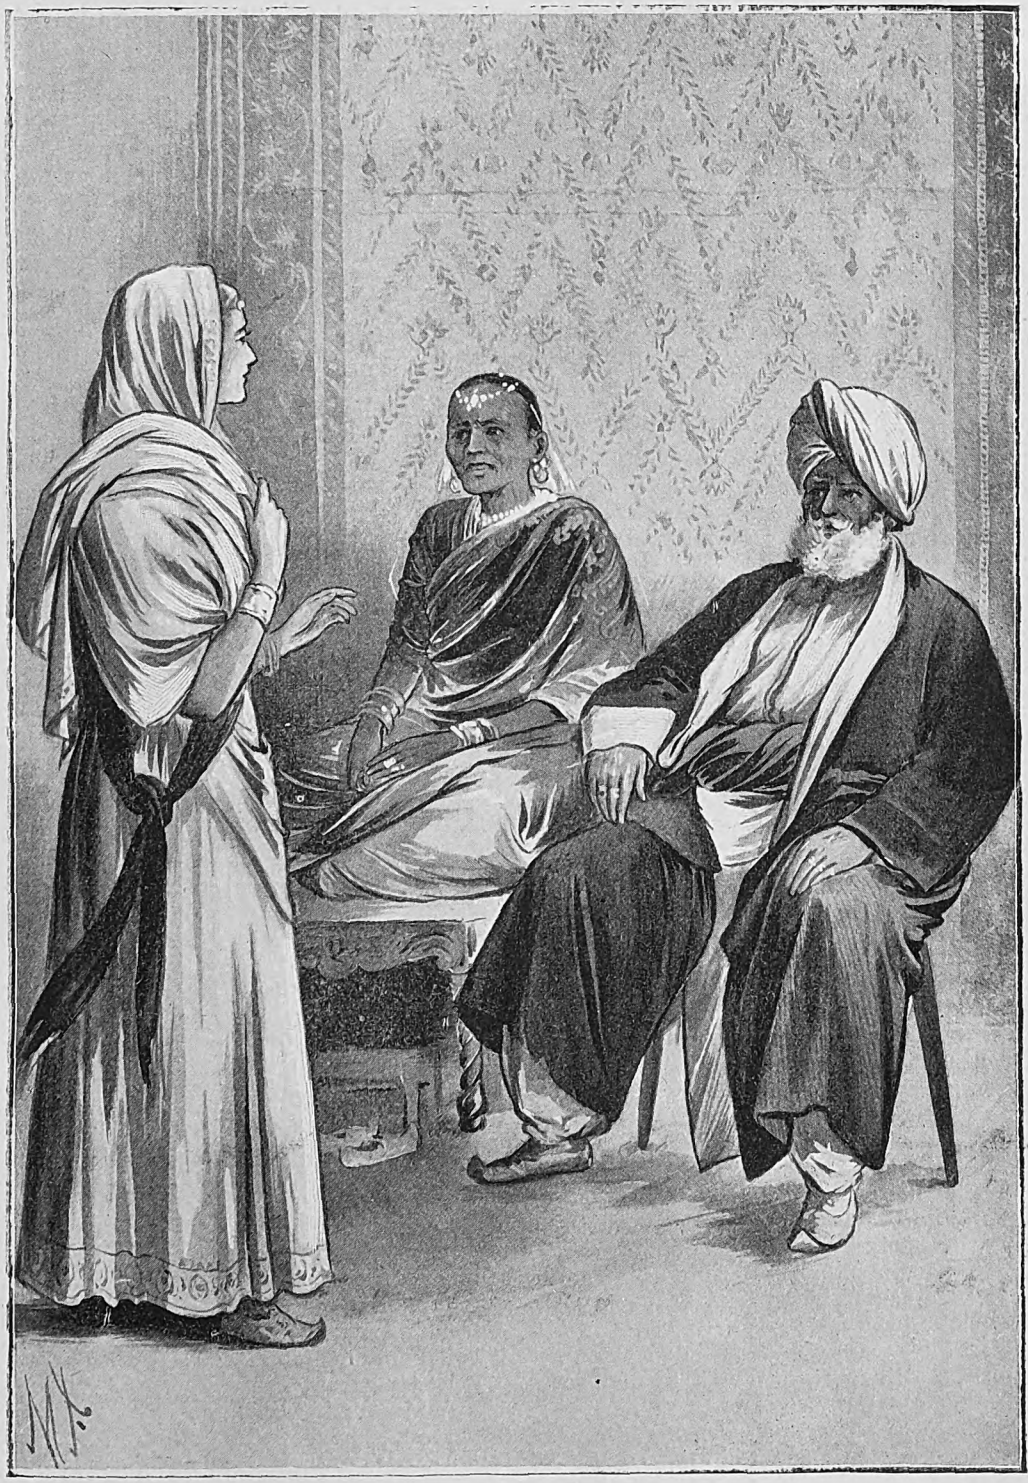
"What do you say?" asked the Nabob.

"She has sent to the bazaar to buy flower-pots; she is going to bring plants in from the garden to put in that fool's cave of hers, which is already like a madhouse; she is going to make her women dig in the garden and carry the flower-pots; and to-morrow or next day she will come and drag me into the garden; she will make me sit there to see her women digging, and to answer her fool questions about her plants. I know her. I shall die down there with the fatigue and the annoyance." And at this dismal prospect the Begum began to cry.

"What do you wish me to do?" asked the Nabob.

"You must give her your order that she is not to ask me to go down into that

Digitized by Google



HAZEL STOOD LOOKING AT THE NABOB WITH HOSTILE EYES.

Digitized by Google

wilderness. Tell her you have forbidden me to go there, because of a vow you have made. She will not listen to me, and all the women do her bidding."

The Nabob stroked his moustache in some perplexity. "Why can these English folk never be at peace?" he said. He had ceased to trouble his mind much about Hazel since she had turned her attention to warfare within the zenana, and he had hardly listened much to his wife's daily complaint of her tyranny and her exactions.

She is a tyrant and a monster," sobbed the Begum. "Some day, when I am dead, perhaps, she will come to you and drive you, and make you run about and obey her orders."

"A man can always get away. You are talking nonsense," said the Nabob uneasily. The vision of himself, running about, harried and driven by Hazel, was not pleasant.

"Not from her," said the Begum, with conviction. "When she has once cast her evil eye on anyone they can never escape from her. What have I done that she never leaves me in peace for a single day? I dare not even take my opium now till after she has been in here and paid her visit, for she will wake me out of my deepest slumber, causing me great pain and discomfort."

The Nabob had indeed noticed of late that the Begum seemed much less dreamy and confused in her mind than was her wont. The Hakeem had warned him that the Begum was killing herself by her immoderate use of the drug; but neither warnings nor entreaties, nor persuasions had ever induced the Begum to forego so much as one pill. The knowledge that Hazel had actually succeeded in diminishing the Begum's allowance of opium when both he himself and the Hakeem had failed, greatly increased his respect for his daughter-in-law.

"What can I do?" he asked again. "A man should not interfere in the affairs of the zenana, that is for the women themselves to settle."

"I hear her laughing now, outside;" said the Begum, "call her in and speak to her yourself."

The Nabob considered. He had heard that she had asked Mahomed Ali for money. She loved to buy her English fancies for that "fool cave" of hers as the Begum called it; and the thought of a bribe came to him like an inspiration.

"Very well, I will see her," he said.

The Begum blew her whistle and one of the servants came in.

"Ask Hazari Begum to come here," said the Begum, "and do not tell her the Nabob is with me."

For a wonder, Hazel was not aware of the Nabob's presence in the zenana, for she was generally kept very well informed of all that went on in the Begum's apartment. So she came in quite unsuspiciously, at the Begum's summons, unattended by any of her women.

When she saw her formidable father-in-law sitting by his wife's charpoy she advanced no further, but stood at the door, looking at him with hostile eyes, though in her heart there was fear and dread.

She saluted them both with distant respect, "I have made a mistake I think," she said, "I understood the Begum Sahib was alone and wished to speak to me."

"I do wish to speak to you," said the Begum, "bring a chair for Hazari Begum," for she was always conciliatory to Hazel in these days.

The chair was brought, and Hazel seated herself with great dignity. The Nabob, who was an admirer of beauty, watched her with evident gratification.

When they were alone again he spoke. "I have heard with great pleasure of the beautiful improvements you have made in your apartments," he said with a courtly bow.

"I have to thank my mother-in-law for much valuable advice in those improvements," said Hazel, in her fluent Hindustani, with a gleam of mischief in her eyes.

"My son is very fortunate to have for his wife so talented a lady, who has been able to learn our language in so short a time, and speak it so beautifully," said the Nabob.

Hazel's heart fluttered with the fear of what these unexpected flatteries might prelude, but she answered bravely, "I am greatly honoured by your praise, my lord, which is much more than I can deserve."

"I hear from the Begum that you propose still further to enrich your apartment and the terrace with plants from the garden. I will instruct my gardeners to give you every assistance you may require," said the Nabob. This was pure, empty compliment, as no man, gardener or otherwise, was ever allowed to set foot in the zenana garden except, of course, the Nabob himself and his sons.

Digitized by Google

"Your words give me great pleasure," Hazel answered. "Perhaps you will be kind enough to assist me in my choice of those which will be most suitable for removal."

"We know nothing whatever about plants or gardens" said the Nabob hastily, "but as we should be so useless, you had better make us pay a fine instead. A hundred rupees to buy yourself a pretty trinket would be much more desirable than two useless people, sitting about among your plants." And the Nabob smiled upon her.

"You value your services too cheaply, my lord," she said, smiling back at him, "only one hundred rupees! Fifty for you and fifty for the Begum, I think five hundred would be a more suitable price."

"If I give you this enormous sum of five hundred rupees, will you engage never on any pretext to ask the Begum to go down into the garden?" said the Nabob.

"It is a great pity," said Hazel regretfully, "the Begum Sahib has such taste, and her advice was so very useful to me; but for five hundred rupees I agree never to ask her to leave her own apartment."

"I will send you the five hundred rupees this evening," said the Nabob with a courtly bow, "no jewel you can buy can be too beautiful or too costly for so fair and beloved a lady."

"You have leave to go," murmured the Begum.

"It is certainly a great sum," said the Nabob, "but we shall hear no more now of her wanting to run away."

"And I shall not be driven about all over the house for her caprices," said the Begum with a sigh of relief.

And neither of them had one instant's suspicion of Hazel's motive in asking for so large a sum of money.

(To be continued.)

HAZEL MEDITATING ESCAPE ALONE.

Digitized by Google

INNOCENCE.

Digitized by Google

Is Aerial Navigation Possible?

By JOHN ALEXANDER,
Author of "The Conquest of the Air."

IT will be admitted that this is emphatically a "question of the hour." Thanks to the exploits of M. Santos-Dumont, the subject has been forced into such public prominence as it has never received since the far-off days when the first balloon was floated over Paris. That was upwards of a century ago. To be precise, in the year 1783, when Etienne Montgolfier first succeeded in floating a balloon by means of heated air. The novelty of the invention gave birth, as all such novelties do, to a period of great activity in aerial experiments, but beyond the application of hydrogen, and eventually coal gas, as a means of inflating balloons, a thousand years and more have passed without any real development in the art or science of aerial navigation.

The performances of M. Santos-Dumont in the autumn of last year, although creating quite a universal furore, meant absolutely nothing, and still mean as little to those who have been interested in ballooning for any length of time. It was the picturesque circumstances in which the intrepid Brazillian burst upon the public ken, his adventures, his mishaps, his final success in winning the Deutsch prize—these were the reasons for the great awakening of public interest in aerial navigation.

Every thing that M. Santos-Dumont did or has done, or is likely to do, has been done before. That is to say, that there have been aeronauts who, by means of a cigar-shaped balloon, have lifted into the clouds a light framework containing an engine of one kind or another—steam or petroleum—and fitted with propellers and rudders. They have also succeeded by these means in following a given course in the air and returning to the point from which they ascended. During the Siege of Paris, Gambetta made his escape from the beleaguered city in an airship of this kind, and its inventor, Colonel Renard, is still alive and active as the head of the French military ballooning service. This, indeed, was more than Santos-Dumont has yet accomplished, for his confidence in his machine does not seem equal to carrying a passenger with him, although he talks quite eloquently of taking into the clouds and piloting for long distances large numbers of people.

In a brief magazine article such as this, it is impossible to enter at any length into a discussion of the technicalities of aerial navigation, and it is certainly out of the question to attempt even a brief sketch of the development of the science to the present day. But in order that the reader may clearly comprehend the situation, it is essential that the nature of the two classes of airships with which experiments are now being made should be explained. All are more or less familiar from newspaper pictures and descriptions, with the principles of Santos-Dumont's various airships. The machines with which he succeeded in rounding the Eiffel Tower and also in falling upon the house-tops of Paris and into the Bay of Monaco have all been of the same type. They have consisted of a large silken envelope, somewhat resembling a vast sausage and pointed at each end. This is inflated with hydrogen gas, and from this balloon the light framework in which the aeronaut sits and upon which are fixed his motors, propellers, rudder, and other contrivances for steering the balloon is hung by means of piano wires. The balloon is required for lifting the machine with its occupant into the air through which it is driven and directed by means of the machinery.

The possibilities of such a contrivance ever being of the slightest use for aerial navigation are limited. Indeed, I am one who will not concede that Santos-Dumont is in any sense a scientific experimenter, because he is experimenting on unscientific lines. He himself admits that it will be necessary to find some method of dispensing with the balloon, and raising the airship by means of machinery. Why then continue experimenting along lines which imply that the first essential is a balloon?

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

SANTOS DUMONT VII.

The reason why it is impossible to perfect an airship which will combine the principles of balloon and motor is explained in a few words. The root idea of a balloon is that it should be lighter than the atmosphere in which it floats. Fill an envelope with hydrogen gas and it immediately floats upward until it reaches a region of the clouds where the atmosphere is almost as light as itself. But the same balloon carrying a car with one or more occupants will cease ascending as soon as it arrives in a region of air that is about the same weight as the entire weight of the balloon and its burden. It will be seen from this that when Santos-Dumont has ascended in his machine the atmosphere surrounding his balloon is many times heavier than the weight of the gas enclosed in his envelope. Suppose that he cut his balloon adrift from its carriage and machinery, it would soar a tremendous height into the skies and disappear. Well, then, it naturally follows that when he is sitting in his carriage directing the movements of his machine at a height of from 1,000 to 2,000 feet above the earth, he is forcing the balloon through an atmosphere sufficient at times to crush it as easily as one can burst a paper bag filled with air.

The moral of this is that with such a contrivance as Santos-Dumont has familiarised us it is only possible to navigate the air when there is little or no wind. If he encountered a hurricane, the only way in which he could avoid destruction would be to stop his motors, let his rudder alone, and drift with the wind like an ordinary balloon. There is absolutely no getting over this fact, and an airship that can only be navigated in calm weather is nothing more or less than a toy.

Another fatal objection to the Santos-Dumont type of airship is the enormous size of balloon necessary to lift a comparatively few people into the air. Some old-fashioned balloons of the non-steerable kind have taken up as many as ninety passengers; but the moment one attempts to lift heavy machinery into the clouds the case is altered. The best illustration of this difficulty is furnished by that great balloon which Count Zeppelin dismantled a few weeks ago, disgusted with his failures and lack of public support. His plan was also that of using a balloon for lifting power and motors for driving it through the air. For a long time he experimented on Lake Constance and his airship was the wonder of Germany. Nor is that surprising, for his cigar-shaped balloon was as large as some of our great battleships, being more than two-thirds the length of the Great Eastern! Imagine this tremendous balloon hovering over Trafalgar Square, and when you are told that it was only able to carry six or eight passengers, you will realise the folly of the thing. Count Zeppellin, after spending many thousands of pounds, has broken up his gigantic airship, and is, I hope, a sadder and a wiser man.

It may be stated with perfect confidence that aerial navigation of any practicable value on the Santos-Dumont lines is impossible. That, given an atmosphere perfectly still, or with only light head winds, M. Santos-Dumont can treat us to many picturesque and surprising evolutions in the air, will be readily granted, and I should not be surprised if, with his remarkable good fortune, he succeeded in winning the prize offered by the Daily Express for carrying a message from its London office to Birmingham. It is also true that Santos-Dumont has shown good sense in so arranging his carriage that such a horrible catastrophe as befell his enterprising fellow-countryman, Senor Severo, is not likely to occur in his case. The cause of that dreadful accident, which, by the way, was foreseen by all who knew anything of the conditions, was the placing of the motor too near the balloon. In order to avoid bursting, all balloons are fitted at the lower side with a self-acting valve, which permits the gas inside to escape when the heavier atmosphere presses on the envelope; and in the case of poor Severo his motor was so near this valve that the escaping gas, which, of course, is highly inflammable, became ignited, with the dire results we know.

Digitized by Google

SIR HIRAM S. MAXIM.

However, when we dismiss the balloon-ships—if I may coin a new word—we have by no means reached the end of possibilities in aerial navigation. Half a century ago experienced aeronauts were agreed that some one would yet invent an aerial machine which would be capable of raising itself by mechanical means and flying through the air with the same machinery as it had ascended. Many attempts in this direction have been made, and all who experiment along these lines are known as believers in "heavier-than-air machines." The earliest of all attempts to fly with wings were of this type, but were rendered impossible by the simple fact that no human being possesses the necessary strength to manipulate wings large enough to lift himself skyward. We have in our midst, however, an experimenter of world-wide fame who has been closely engaged for many years in perfecting an airship which dispenses entirely with the use of the balloon. I refer, of course, to Sir Hiram S. Maxim, the inventor of that dreadful weapon of modern warfare which bears his name.

Sir Hiram determined to go to nature for a guide in his experiments and by a careful study of the flight of birds he arrived at a working basis. This may be briefly explained as the fact that a bird raises itself by beating downward obliquely against the air. Take a still simpler example. Most of us in our youthful days have flown a kite. In order to raise a kite into the air it is necessary to drag it at an angle against the wind and it is thus forced upwards. In other words, it makes its way best in the teeth of a head wind, the wind acting after the manner of a lever. Bearing this principle in mind, Sir Hiram has fashioned a flying machine which consists of a series of what he terms aero-planes. These are held aloft by posts rising from a large platform on which is situated powerful motors working screws and from which extends a large rudder. The aero-planes can be set in almost any direction to suit the air currents and when they are placed obliquely against the wind and the machinery set in motion the action is precisely the same as that of flying a kite, or almost like the downward beat of a bird's pinions. The machine is forced upward and the strength of the propelling power drives it through the air in any direction the aeronaut wishes to pursue.

Here, then, is the principle on which I believe aerial navigation will yet be achieved, though it must be admitted that Sir Hiram Maxim's machine is still by no means perfect. For instance, one of the difficulties with which he is contending is the loss of force between the application of his registered horse-power and the lifting-power of the aero-planes. Thus, with an expenditure of 360 horse-power, he succeeded in getting a screw thrust of 2,200 pounds and a lifting effect of 10,000 pounds, which means that he could scarcely lift five times the amount of his propellers' power, although in some experiments with smaller machines he managed to lift eighteen times the weight of the screw thrust. It should also be pointed out that in order to secure perfect safety in the navigation of such an aerial machine it will be necessary to devise some means whereby, in the event of the propelling power failing while in the air, the great weight of the machine will be automatically supported or, at least, the possibility of a precipitate fall rendered unlikely. This, as I understand it, has yet to be achieved, but I am persuaded that it is on some such lines as these we shall see aerial navigation become an accomplished fact. Thirty years ago M. Camille Flammarion, the celebrated French astronomer and aeronaut, stated that the future airship would have to depend entirely upon mechanical power, and it is not too much to hope that in the hands of such an inventive genius as Sir Hiram Maxim this great epoch-making invention may be carried into effect.

Digitized by Google

READY!

Digitized by Google

To the Crown and After.

"A WOMAN WHO WAS CROWNED."

CHAPTER I.

THERE were great rejoicings in Blickling Hall, in Norfolk, the seat of Sir Thomas Boleyn, for his wife had presented him with a little daughter. Little did anyone dream of the strange destiny which awaited the unconscious infant; had they done so, they would have at once exclaimed: "It were better for her she had never been born!"

The first years of Anne's life were spent at Blickling, in the company of her brother George and her sister Mary.

Near at hand was Norwich Castle, and Thomas Wyatt, the son of Sir Henry Wyatt, its governor, was often a playfellow with the little Boleyns.

When Anne was eleven years old, the greatest misfortune befell her which can happen to a growing girl. Her mother died, and, soon after, Sir Thomas Boleyn married again, and a woman who was of very humble origin.

The duties of her father often took him to the Court, and Anne resided meanwhile at Hever Castle, where her education was very carefully attended to, under the superintendence of a French governess, named Simonette.

It was when Anne Boleyn was thirteen years old, tall and well developed for her age, that a great event occurred in her life.

King Henry's youngest sister, the Princess Mary, was to be married to Louis XII., King of France, and Sir Thomas used his influence to secure for his daughter an appointment as one of her maids of honour, one of Anne's especial recommendations for the post being her intimate knowledge of French. When Anne heard the news she dashed in to her governess: "O, Simonette, Simonette! I am to go to France to wait upon the Queen. No more lessons for me now! I shall get out of this dull old place."

The governess smiled at her pupil's enthusiasm. "Perhaps you may yet be glad to return to old Hever, mademoiselle."

"Never," exclaimed Anne, petulantly.

. . . . . .

It was with mingled feelings of dismay and hope, however, that the young girl surveyed the stormy seas at Dover, across which they must pass to reach the Princess's future home.

They were detained at Dover a whole month, and the child grew sick at heart as she saw the wrecks which lined the coast. She began to wish she were not leaving England. But on October 2nd, she and the other maids were awakened before dawn, to embark with their mistress. At four o'clock in the morning they were on board, and Anne's first experience of a sea voyage began. The ship in which her mistress and herself sailed was soon separated by the stormy winds from the rest of the convoy, and the ladies were in great danger. At last the harbour of Boulogne was sighted, much to their relief. There was bustle and confusion in getting ready to leave the boat, when suddenly a crash was heard. The ship had grounded in the mouth of the harbour. Fortunately, the boats were in readiness and the ladies were conveyed safe to land. Wet through and exhausted as they were, they would have been glad to rest and change, but the quay was thronged with a distinguished company, anxious to pay its respects to their Queen, and Anne's knowledge of French was in speedy requisition. She chatted gaily with the nobles, and remained near the Queen, while in great pomp they were conducted to the town itself.

By easy journeys they now proceeded to Abbeville, when the bride and all her ladies, clad in glittering robes, mounted white palfreys. Queen Mary's steed was decked with cloth of gold, and the ladies in attendance upon her were dressed in crimson velvet.

Then came the French marriage, which took place at the church of Abbeville amidst great state, during the whole of which ceremonial Anne stood near the Queen. Then followed a banquet, at which Anne and all the English ladies were treated with deferential homage.

That night there was little sleep for Anne. The girl's giddy head was well-nigh turned with the many compliments she had received.

The next morning she found her mistress in tears, for all the maids, except Anne, were ordered back to England; and Anne would have shared their fate, but for her familiarity with the native tongue.

In the French Court, Anne soon made her home, and very quickly was as busy as the rest of the maidens of her time in romantic intrigues with the knights and noblemen, who surrounded them with insidious flattery and attention.

It was a bad training ground for a young, untutored mind, and, in judging of the rest of the story of the girl's life, it must not be omitted in the reckoning that she was motherless at an early age, and plunged into the dissipations of the most immoral Court of Europe while yet in her teens.

. . . . . .

They had not been long in France when Louis XII. died.

"I shall return to England!" said Queen Mary to Anne Boleyn. "I have never felt at home here, and I pine for the dear old English surroundings."

"On the contrary, madam! I simply hate them!" observed Anne. "Everything and everybody is so bright here. Yonder in England the life is dull, the men are heavy, the women morose. I shall dread to go back."

Digitized by Google

"Would you prefer to stay here?" asked the Queen. "I can get you into the service of the new Queen of my husband's successor."

"I shall be sorry to leave your Majesty's presence, and to miss your kindness, but, if I may, I shall prefer to stay."

And stay she did.

But her lot was no longer so pleasant. The new Queen had been brought up in a strict religious home, and endeavoured to turn the Court life into one full of moral restraints. She surrounded herself with a number of young ladies, who followed her in state whenever she appeared in public, and kept them in private busy at the loom or the embroidery frame, and all their conversation was confined to religious subjects.

"I had better have been at Hever!" grumbled the lively Anne, again and again; for her vivacious spirit chafed under these restraints.

When she had been seven years in France, of which the latter part had seemed to Anne seventy, she was summoned home; and, with a relief she would never have believed it possible to feel at the thought of coming to England, she sailed for home. She had left it, a wild, merry girl; she returned to it, at twenty years of age, a finished woman of the world.

CHAPTER II.

There had been a family quarrel, concerning the disposal of the estates of Anne Boleyn's great-grandfather, the Earl of Wiltshire, between Anne's father and another branch of the family.

The King had interfered, and suggested that the best way out of the difficulty would be to give Anne Boleyn in marriage to the heir of Sir Thomas's opponent, and he directed Cardinal Wolsey to bring about the marriage. This was why Anne had been recalled.

She came at a time when the whole household at Hever were in a state of great excitement because the King had deigned to pay a visit to the Castle during one of his journeys.

One morning she was in the garden, when the King encountered her by accident. Struck with her exceeding beauty of face and figure, he watched her unnoticed for a time, as she skipped about from bed to bed of the garden singing gaily. Then he stepped forward and exclaimed: "In good faith, fair damsel, but you rival the birds. Are you the maiden who was with my sister in France?"

"Yes, your Grace!" answered Anne, in no way abashed by his presence. "And I would I were with her now!"

"Why?" answered the King.

"Because under her reign in France the Court was sunny in its life. When she left, it might have been a nunnery. Oh! your Grace, the good Queen was so good!" and she clasped her hands as if in prayer, her eyes shining with mischief.

The King laughed loudly, and continued walking and chatting with her for over an hour, thoroughly amused by her sprightliness.

When he returned to Westminster the meeting had made such an impression upon him that he told Cardinal Wolsey: "I have been discoursing with a young lady who has the wit of an angel and is worthy of a crown."

Wolsey at once suggested her appointment as a maid of honour to Queen Katharine.

When Anne heard of the appointment offered her, her delight knew no bounds. She had been afraid that till her marriage with Sir Piers Butler, to whom she was now contracted by her family, she would have to hide her head amidst the rusticities of Norfolk. She departed to Westminster full of glee.

At the Court, in constant attendance upon Cardinal Wolsey was the eldest son of the Earl of Northumberland, Lord Percy. He was an exceedingly handsome man, and carried himself with great boldness wherever he went. He was an especial favourite with the ladies, possibly on account of that very self-confidence which characterised him. But alas for them! he, like Anne Boleyn, was already contracted by his father in marriage with the daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury. He had been very reluctant to fulfil it, and it was still unratified when he came to the Court as a pupil of the Cardinal's. While his patron was closeted with the King daily, he had to kick his heels in an ante-chamber, and seized the opportunity to indulge in flirtations with the Queen's ladies.

He speedily noticed the new arrival. "Who is that?" he asked one of the ladies.

"Sir Thomas Boleyn's daughter. She has just come from France."

The susceptible heart of the young man was deeply smitten by her beauty, and day after day he singled out Anne as the object of his exclusive attention. She was nothing loth herself, and, in fact, fell violently in love with the handsome Northumbrian. They met openly by day, stealthily by night, and at last they exchanged a promise of marriage with one another, altogether reckless of the previous engagements which had been entered into by their parents.

The matter became the talk of the palace. When it reached the King's ears he sent for Wolsey, and, in a towering rage, demanded that he should see to it that their engagement was cancelled. The Cardinal summoned Lord Percy's father, and, under threat of disinheriting him, Anne's lover was persuaded to fulfil his contract to the daughter of Shrewsbury. The King was so full of pique at Anne's behaviour, for unconsciously he was already beginning to be governed by his feelings for her, that he caused her to be dismissed from the Court and sent back home.

"This is my Lord Wolsey's doing," exclaimed Anne, when she received her dismissal. "If ever I get the opportunity I will be even with him. He has robbed me of my lover, and now he sends me away. He is out of my reach now, but some day I may be even with him."

She had been at Hever Castle some week or two when the King paid an unexpected and unannounced visit there. But Anne, still nourishing feelings of resentment against the authority which had separated her from Percy, and, being really ill as the result, kept to her own chamber, and, on the plea of illness, would not so much as see the King.

The King was perplexed and chagrined, and assigning her behaviour to mortification, indirectly offered her an apology by creating her father Viscount Rochford, and, with the intention of drawing the whole family to Court again, made her brother-in-law a gentleman of the Privy Chamber. This he followed up by sending to herself costly presents of jewels.

Digitized by Google

These presents opened the eyes of Anne to the King's real intentions, and she was filled with genuine distress.

The coming of a sin, seen in the distance, will often frighten us more than the sin itself, when near at hand.

Her family came again to Court, and very quickly Henry beset Anne Boleyn with entreaties.

Anne snatched her hands from his, crimson with indignation. "I think," she answered in a voice husky with emotion, "your Majesty speaks these words only to prove me. So, to save you ever asking such a question in the future, let your Majesty listen while I say: I would rather lose my life."

Henry looked amazed at this reception of his suit, which he considered an honour.

"I shall continue to hope," he cried.

"I do not understand the grounds of such a hope," she proudly answered. "Your wife I cannot be, because you have a Queen already; anything else I will never be."

Anne was now afraid to linger any longer about the Court, and using all her influence with friends in France, she entered the service of the Duchess D'Alençon and departed to that country. Henry was left disconsolate and powerless to help himself until a beam of hope shot into his life in a way most unexpected.

CHAPTER III.

The King meanwhile had come to one conclusion. If he were not quite sure of winning Anne Boleyn, he was quite sure that he was tired of Queen Katharine. In an unguarded moment one of his courtiers dropped a hint about the illegality of his marriage (for Katharine had been his brother's wife), and the idea, once having found a resting-place in Henry's mind, sprang up and brought forth fruit. After a time he took Wolsey into his confidence, and, at his request, Cardinal Campeius was appointed a special legate from the Pope to pronounce upon the matter. But delays were many, and, meanwhile, as if to whet the King's zeal in this business, Anne Boleyn herself returned from France, cajoled back by her father, who was supposed to have gone there on diplomatic business, but, in reality, to woo back again the daughter whose influence could be so powerful in their interests.

Time heals all things, and certainly Anne Boleyn received anew the protestations and the gifts of the King without that hesitation which had marked her behaviour before.

Sitting one day at cards with Queen Katharine, Anne Boleyn remarked: "How strange it is I never turn up a King."

"My Lady Anne!" the Queen answered. "You have the good hap ever to stop at a King; but, if you are like others, you will have all or none."

Anne looked down in confusion and blushed. It was the first sign of open jealousy that Queen Katharine had ever shown.

When Wolsey first heard from the King his desire to divorce his wife, he had furthered the suggestion, thinking to himself: "The Queen has ever been an enemy of mine!" But now, when he saw the way the wind was blowing, he preferred the open enmity of Queen Katharine to the bitter animosity of Anne Boleyn, who had never forgiven him his behaviour over Percy. He did his best to delay the divorce, and strove by all means in his power to conciliate Anne meanwhile.

He gave masque after masque, and costly entertainments at Hampton Court and York House in Whitehall, for the express purpose of pleasing her and bringing the King and Anne together.

It was a glorious abode, the grand new palace at Hampton, and Anne, feigning a civility she did not feel, was glad to accept such splendid hospitality.

The ladies would come down from London and assemble, wearing masques at the ball. Afterwards, they would unmask at the rich banquet provided for them.

To these King Henry would steal by river, and enter as if a strange ambassador.

It was his wish to be unknown, and his humour was respected. And, as a supposed stranger, he used his opportunities to make violent love to Anne. They danced together, dined together, monopolised each other's society, and yet, with great womanly tact, Anne Boleyn kept her royal lover at arm's length.

Sitting one day in an ante-chamber of the Queen's apartments, Anne was left alone with an old retainer of the Queen.

"It is a pity!" sighed Anne, as they discussed the ever-present topic of the royal divorce. "After so many years to publicly avoid her thus."

"Yes," said the other. "The hardest heart must feel for her."

"Well, in very deed," exclaimed Anne, "I would not be a Queen, on my honour, I would not!" earnestly, seeing the swift look which crossed the old lady's face.

"I would!" retorted the old woman, irritably, "and so would you, I am bold enough to say."

"Not for all the riches under Heaven," answered Anne.

"It would not take many riches to move me," laughed the old lady, scornfully. "But if the idea of 'Queen' frightens you, what do you say to a Duchess?" looking keenly at her.

"I do not care for the burden of rank," said Anne. "I——"

Here she was interrupted by a message from the King.

The Lord Chamberlain, for it was he, advanced and said: "The King's Majesty commends itself to you and wishes me to announce the honour he is anxious to do you by creating you Marchioness of Pembroke and endowing you with support for the title of a thousand pounds a year."

Swiftly the colour rose in Anne's face, and, in such agitation that she could scarcely speak, she returned her faltering thanks through the chamberlain to the King.

Scarcely had he gone, when the old lady sprang to her feet and cried: "Here have I been begging sixteen years in Court, and never have had a hundred pounds, while you have your mouth filled with a thousand before you open it. Good heavens! Marchioness of Pembroke! I curtsey to your ladyship."

"It is as strange to me as to you," said Anne, striving to keep her temper.

"Strange!" answered the other. "Very! passing strange! I knew a lady once who would not be a Queen for—— But, there, you have heard the story."

"Come, drop your silly jesting," said Anne, impatiently. "But promise me," laying a hand upon her arm in earnest entreaty. "Say not a word to the Queen. She is sad enough."

Digitized by Google

. . . . . .

One would have imagined that pending the event of the divorce, which yet might make the King free to marry her, the Marchioness of Pembroke would have dropped her early tricks of coquetry, but, as a matter of fact, when she thought she was unseen she flirted desperately. Sitting one day very earnestly over her embroidery, Sir Thomas Wyatt was hanging around her laughing and chatting. Suddenly he mischievously pulled out of her pocket a jewelled tablet, which hung by a lace out of the pocket in the fashion of the day.

"Give it me back:" cried Anne, desperately.

He responded by thrusting it into his vest.

"I swear I will hang it round my neck and wear it for ever!" he cried.

And Anne had to be content.

Sometimes he teasingly showed it to her, just to create a subject of conversation between them, whenever Anne showed signs of freezing.

These conversations came to the knowledge of the King, in whom jealousy slumbered like the fires of a volcano.

He watched them narrowly, and felt convinced that Anne was doing her best to avoid Sir Thomas.

One day, in conversation with Anne, the King went further than ever before, and in impassioned fashion he promised her marriage, if only he could procure the divorce from Katharine.

Taking a ring from her finger, he put it upon his own and wore it thenceforward.

A few days after, the King was playing at bowls with Wyatt and some of his noblemen. In high good humour the King asserted that one of his casts had gone further than Wyatt's.

"By your Grace's leave, that is not so!" dogmatically returned Wyatt.

Foolishly, the King, carried away by a passing thought, pointed triumphantly to the ring on his little finger, and exclaimed: "Wyatt, I tell you the cast is mine."

The ring caught the eye of his would-be rival, who knew it at a glance. But not to be outdone, he took from his vest the lace to which hung the stolen tablet, and answered: "If your Majesty will give me leave to measure the distance with this, I hope to show it is mine." He at once proceeded to measure the space, and boldly pronounced that his throw was farthest.

But the King's eye had recognised the tablet, and he withdrew in high dudgeon to seek the fair cause of the real dispute—a cast far more important than the bowls.

"How came you to give your knick-knacks to others as well as myself?" he demanded, angrily, as he burst in upon her.

Anne looked up startled. Drawing herself up rather haughtily, she said: "I do not understand, your Grace. The only thing I have given is the ring upon the hand of your Majesty."

"What of the tablet you gave Wyatt?"

The vivid colour rushed into her cheeks, and the King looked more suspiciously at her.

"Tell me—am I deceived?" he cried, impatiently.

"The tablet was stolen, your Majesty! Sir Thomas took it from me mischievously one day, and, though I have often stooped to ask for it, he would not give it back!" And she burst into tears.

Her royal lover comforted her in lover's natural fashion and kissed the tears away, and left her more enamoured than ever.

And still the divorce proceedings dragged on. Wolsey was determined the decree should never be passed which should exalt Anne. But a letter he wrote to the Pope miscarried, and reaching the Marchioness of Pembroke, was shown by her to the King.

It compassed Wolsey's downfall more effectually than any plans of bitter enemies had succeeded in doing.

Wolsey was dismissed his offices, stripped by the King's order of all his wealth, and died soon after of a broken heart.

With him went the last active obstacle to the divorce, but still Queen Katharine refused to accept any judgment but that of Rome. At this period the Pope wrote a letter to Henry advising him to take back Katharine, whom he had sent away, and to put away one "Anna," whom he kept about him.

The King was at a loss what to do. From Rome the divorce would never come. And other than as his Queen the woman he loved would not accept him.

"Why not," said Thomas Cromwell, who had taken Wolsey's place, "make a decree separating the Church of England from the Church of Rome? Your Grace can then enrich your coffers from the vast wealth of the monasteries, and as for your matter touching her Majesty the Queen, leave it to a tribunal of your own judges. An English matter should surely be decided by English law. Your Majesty, like your predecessor Henry, will not humble yourself at Canossa."

"Never!" cried the King, with an oath.

And the thing was done.

The Church was severed from its ancient connection, the Pope's authority rejected, the King proclaimed head of the Church, and in an assembly at Dunstable the decree of divorce was pronounced.

CHAPTER IV.

The people of England are, as a rule, gifted with great common-sense, and the voice of the people declared against the injury done to the Queen. The popular clamour was so great that Henry was really frightened.

As soon as the decision of the court had been made known, it appeared that they degraded Queen Katharine from the position of Queen to that of Dowager-Princess of Wales.

In the quiet old town of Ampthill, in Bedfordshire, in one of the adjacent manor-houses, the Queen lay upon a sick-bed. She had determined to fight, but the fighting had worn her out.

With the certainty that her husband would not abandon his attempted divorce came the reaction, and in bitterness of spirit she took to her bed.

"Your Majesty," announced one of her maids, "the Lord Mountjoy has come to see you from the King."

"I cannot see him. He must wait till I am well."

Several days Lord Mountjoy had to await her pleasure, and when at last he was admitted to an interview with her, he had hard work to carry on the conversation between her fits of coughing.

"This is the deed, madam," he said, "which appoints your Grace to the style and title of Princess-Dowager of Wales, and divorces you from his Majesty."

Digitized by Google

"Give it me!" she exclaimed, haughtily.

He passed the deed to her, and taking up a pen, she drew it deliberately through the words "Princess-Dowager" wherever she found them used.

"There!" she cried, handing it back to him. "I will never cease to use the title of Queen!"

Mountjoy now summoned her servants to take an oath to serve her as Princess of Wales.

Weak as she was, her voice rang out clearly, forbidding them to do it.

"Not in that name will you ever serve me!"

"But, madam, what are we to do, then?"

"Oh, as to that, you must please yourselves. I will be left without a servant sooner than have one who takes that wicked oath. Queen once! Queen always! A religious rite joined me to Henry, and no religious decree has banished me. In the sight of Rome I am his wife, and what is Dunstable to Rome?"

In the end the King had to give way, and allow her to keep some of her servants on her own terms.

He banished her, however, to the Bishop of Lincoln's palace at Buckton, in Huntingdonshire. As they were moving, one of her maids began to rail on Anne Boleyn as the cause of their troubles.

"Hold your peace!" cried the Queen, wiping away the unbidden tears which coursed freely down her own cheeks. "Don't curse her! Don't curse her—pray for her! I feel sure the time is coming, coming fast, when you will pity her more than you do me!"

The air of Buckton disagreed with her, and she requested the King to let her live elsewhere. He replied by sending her still further off, to Fotheringay Castle, a place well known for its marshy surroundings.

"I will never go there!" she exclaimed, "unless drawn with ropes."

The Duke of Suffolk was sent by the King to break up her home. "Go you must!" he thundered. "You are a subject of the King, and must needs obey."

"Never!" she cried. "I am his wife and not a subject."

"Then you shall go by force. I will leave your home without furniture, or even a bed to rest upon, and if that will not move your Royal Highness, I will pull down the castle round your ears."

The Queen faced him indignantly for a moment, then, bursting into tears, quitted the apartment.

To add to her troubles her income was paid to her so irregularly that often the household was absolutely without money.

. . . . . .

The King, seeing the unpopularity of his projected union with Anne Boleyn, begged her to consent to a secret marriage.

Anne was afraid to keep him waiting any longer, now that he was free, so she reluctantly consented.

In an attic in the west turret of Whitehall, at a very early hour in the morning, the King and two of the gentlemen of his chamber attended, and there met Anne and her train-bearer. The chaplain who was summoned to perform the ceremony had no idea of the cause.

He hesitated.

"Why do you wait, man?" queried the King. "Your master, the Pope, has in private pronounced in favour of my divorce, and in my possession I have the dispensation for my second marriage."

This was a lie, but it served the purpose, and the marriage was performed.

The secret was well kept, till, for family reasons, it became necessary that Henry should acknowledge Anne Boleyn openly and have her crowned as Queen.

Through the length and breadth of England the couriers departed, summoning the wives of the peers of England to be present at the coronation of the Queen Anne on May 19th, to attend her at the Tower, and to ride with her through London on that day.

So out of the obscurity of her early life, after many years of waiting, the throne was within reach of Anne at last. Her sun was rising to full splendour, while Katharine's was setting. Wealth and luxury, flattery and favour surrounded Anne, and the forsaken Queen had even to go into debt for one new gown.

CHAPTER V.

On May 19th, in obedience to the royal order, the Lord Mayor and his train embarked at New Stairs at one o'clock. Fifty barges of the City Companies followed the Lord Mayor, and in addition everyone who could procure a boat, went with him in his train to Greenwich.

The barges were fitted up with numberless little coloured flags, at the end of each hung a small bell which, wavering in the wind, sent forth a love chime. The Lord Mayor and his attendants cast anchor just before Greenwich Palace, and while they waited the Queen's pleasure entertained her with sweet music.

At three o'clock Anne issued forth, arrayed in splendid attire of cloth of gold, and waited upon by numbers of fair maidens. When the Queen entered her barge, the signal was given and the whole procession moved forward to meet the King. At her landing, the Lord Chamberlain and the heralds were ready to receive her, and brought her to the King, who, with loving looks, welcomed her at the postern by the water's side.

As soon as he met her he kissed her, and she turned about and thanked the Lord Mayor very gracefully before he returned to his barge.

For seven days she remained with the King at the Tower, and on the last day of May there was a state progress through the City.

The day before the coronation the Queen was conveyed in an open litter covered with cloth of gold, shot with white, and the two palfreys, which supported the litter, were clad in a garb of white damask and led by the Queen's footmen. Anne was dressed in silver tissue and a mantle of the same, lined with ermine, her dark hair was worn in flowing tresses down her shoulders, and on her head she wore a coif circled by precious rubies.

Over her was borne a canopy of cloth of gold, carried by four knights on foot. Thus the Queen was brought to Westminster Hall, which was richly hung with golden arras, and newly-glazed. Into the midst of the hall, the Queen proudly rode, and having been taken out was placed under a canopy of state. On the left side was a cupboard of ten shelves filled with rich goblets, wonderful to behold. In a short time there was brought to the Queen a repast of wines and confectioneries, and when they had all partaken of it she returned thanks to the Lord Mayor and the rest who had attended upon her. Then she withdrew, and, having changed her dress, remained with the King in Whitehall that night.

Digitized by Google

The morrow was the coronation day, for which she had longed for so many years, and waited and plotted. It was Whit-Sunday, and, as the year was hotter than usual, the summer flowers were used in sweet profusion for the purpose of decoration.

A little after eight the Queen entered Westminster Hall, and stood under the canopy robed in purple velvet, and with her head encircled by rubies. Then came the monks of Westminster, in rich copes, and bishops and abbots in splendid robes and mitres.

Anne was crowned by Archbishop Cranmer, and then returned with her sceptre hand holding the bauble of state, and supported by her proud father, who now saw the realisation of his ambitious schemes. Then she was led into Westminster Hall again, where a magnificent banquet was now prepared. Had she been the daughter of some powerful monarch, no greater splendour could have attended her nuptials. Her husband's love was so great that to him nothing seemed too good for the Norfolk damsel, whose love he had sought in vain for years, and now gained.

In order to exalt her to the utmost, he caused her initial A to be interwoven with his own H, even upon the coins of the realm, the only time this has ever been done. Everything now seemed to be before Anne Boleyn, the ball was at her feet, she had only to set it rolling.

. . . . . .

The Queen's behaviour, once she had gained her coveted position, seemed altogether to change. Those who knew her best, were conscious of some subtle difference in her they could not explain.

The change was not outward in its cause, but sprang from within. Amidst all the strange experiences of her life, there had been given her many causes for reflection on the emptiness of everything the world could give. She had seen Wolsey toppled from power, her own Queen hurled from her position, and it had taught her to rely upon nothing. There had come into her possession a copy of the Bible, a rare thing in those days, and as she read it, there sprang up within her wishes after better things, to which she had hitherto been a stranger.

She became very grave in manner, gave up the entertainments in which she had delighted, specially hunting, and spent the greater part of her time in industrious weaving of tapestry.

Not content with this, she made garments for the poor, and gave largely out of her wealth to many charities.

It was a wonderful change, and one the King did not altogether like. He missed her vivacity, and her perpetual presence with him in the pleasures of which he at least had not sickened.

The Queen soon gave birth to a little daughter, afterwards Queen Elizabeth, but the King, who had confidently hoped for a son, was greatly disappointed. For the sake of this infant, however, the law was set aside, and the succession to the throne settled upon her to the exclusion of Mary, the daughter of Katharine. And thus it seemed as if Anne had at length obtained the very summit of human happiness.

"I cannot understand my lot," she murmured to herself. "It seems so strange that I should have been led step by step up the hill, to stand in solitary grandeur at the top. What is the meaning of it? The sun has been out long, when will the shadows come?

CHAPTER VI.

There was mourning in Kimbolton Castle, for death was laying its hand upon the long-enduring Queen Katharine.

Her maids crept about conversing in whispers, with hearts full of pity for the woman lying upon her couch of suffering.

A few days before, feeling that her end was now fast approaching, she had written a letter to the King commending to him the care of their daughter, Mary, asking him to look after the welfare of her maids, and beseeching, above all, to see him.

The news soon spread at Court that Katharine was dying, and an old and faithful friend of the Queen, Lady Willoughby, started out to see her.

It was mid-winter, and the night was already dark at six o'clock, when Lady Willoughby reached Kimbolton. Perished with cold and exhausted from fatigue, and disfigured by the mud which covered her, through a fall from her horse, she presented a pretty picture to Bedingfield, the Comptroller of the Castle, whom Henry had set there to play the watch-dog.

"Where are His Majesty's instructions for you to see the Lady Katharine?" he demanded.

"Tut! Man!" she exclaimed, brushing past him. "Cold as I am, would you bother me for papers? Oh, let me come to a fire!"—shivering.

"I am afraid I must insist," he said, hesitatingly.

"You shall have the papers in the morning, for certain, but don't bother me about it now. Let me have a warm, then show me the Queen's room. And for Heaven's sake get me some food."

Once she got safely into the Queen's room she did not leave it again. And Bedingfield neither saw her nor her papers.

So the Queen did not die alone.

. . . . . .

At Whitehall the news arrived by special courier and Sir Richard Southwell, who was on duty in the Palace, caught sight of him and eagerly asked his news.

"I will to the Queen at once," he said to himself. "Such news will gladden her."

He was ushered into Anne's presence as she was washing her hands in a costly basin, and on hearing his news she immediately made him a present of both the basin and its rich cover.

The same evening she met her parents, when the look of excitement in her eyes made her father wonder.

"Is anything particular happening to-day," he said, watching her; "you look so pleased."

"Pleased, I am overjoyed!" she cried. "And so you should be. My enemy, Katharine, is dead, and now the crown is fixed firmly on my head. What is your pleasure?"—turning to a chamberlain, who now approached her.

"A message from the King."

"You may speak."

"It is the King's will and pleasure that, in consequence of the death of the Dowager Princess of Wales, the whole Court should immediately go into mourning, to be worn until the day after the funeral."

Digitized by Google

Anne bit her lips in vexation.

"The rest of you may go into mourning if you please," she said, when the chamberlain had bowed himself out, "but I will not so play the hypocrite. I am glad, right glad, she is dead, and I will not ape at seeming sorrowful."

The funeral day came, and Henry himself attended it in mournful state, but Anne, who was violently angry at the honours accorded to the King's former wife, refused to go.

Obstinately she dressed herself and her ladies in flaring yellow, and openly boasted that she had never felt so rejoiced over any event before.

The King was not a man to be crossed with impunity, and anger at the defiance of his will, mixed with disgust at Anne's cruel triumph, made him for the first time in his life cold to his Queen.

"Why should you have been angry, sweet?" he asked. "Sorrow as from one woman for another at least became you, whose beauty charmed me away from her."

"If I am sorry," she retorted, "it is because of all the praises I hear concerning her, and not because of her death."

The King frowned and abruptly left the room.

"Sorry!" exclaimed Anne. "I feel more like singing a Te Deum."

But the King came near her no more for a week.

. . . . . .

Other causes were opening the King's eyes to Anne's defects, and chief among these was the fact that he had discovered the charms of another lady, who was "as willing as willing could be."

Amongst the maids of honour who had been placed near the Queen by political and other influence was Jane Seymour, the daughter of Sir John Seymour. She, like Anne, had been trained in the Court of France and brought back with her to England that very vivacity of manner which Anne was beginning to lose. The King noticed her speedily, and the old process began again, only now Anne was on the injured instead of the gaining side. The Queen's suspicions were soon aroused. One day she was conversing with her maids, and her eyes continually wandered to a jewel which Jane Seymour wore upon her neck.

"Let me look at that!" she exclaimed at last.

"That, I say," pointing impatiently to the jewel.

Jane drew back in hesitation, but the Queen, springing to her feet, snatched it from her neck so violently that she hurt both Jane and her own hand.

Then she opened it. "It is as I thought!" she muttered, "the portrait of the King! Girl!" she almost shrieked, "how came you by this?"

"The King's will is law, madam!" answered Jane. "And what it pleases him to give, it is not for me to be reluctant to take."

"Ah, take it then!" and she flung it violently upon the floor.

That night she upbraided the King in unmeasured terms, and from that time scenes were frequent between them.

The Queen unexpectedly happened on one occasion to go through the King's apartments. She had scarcely entered the ante-chamber before her horror-stricken eyes beheld her husband, in one of the curtained recesses, sitting with Jane Seymour on his knee. Forgetting what agitation might involve to herself, Anne rushed to them, and, smartly boxing Jane's ears, poured out a torrent of abuse upon her husband.

Henry replied in soothing tones, fearing the result of the fearful mental distress she apppeared to be in.

But that night the son they had both desired was born, and born dead.

When Henry heard it he was like a madman. He rushed into the Queen's apartment, dangerously ill as she was, and stormed and raved at her for the passion she had put herself in.

Losing all control of herself, Anne retorted bitterly. She told the King some home truths, the point of which wounded him deeply.

He turned and left her room muttering, and the breach was made which was never healed.

CHAPTER VII.

Anne Boleyn's brother, Viscount Rochford, had been from her childhood her favourite companion.

His home was at Rochford Hall, in Essex, where he retired when he was not at Court. Unfortunately for him, he was married to a woman hot-tempered and overbearing, and as ignorant as she was both. She possessed that strangely monopolising disposition which is jealous of everyone and everything which comes to share in the attention of the being it loves.

Lord Rochford was in the habit of neglecting his uncultured wife for the society of his beloved sister. When in town he was always with her, for the Queen loved to have it so.

Lady Rochford fretted and fumed, but it was to no purpose, and gradually she nourished hatred of the Queen till it became a mania with her. She had jealously watched Anne's advancement, as she swept far out of her reach, and the eventful triumph of her sister-in-law gave her a further attack of spleen.

She withdrew from Court sooner than minister to the state of the woman she hated. But her husband refused to come.

Down at Rochford Hall she nursed her spite, and at last returned to the Court just before the fall of Anne.

One evening she was sitting at her embroidery when her husband came in, whose cheerful greeting she met with a frown. "What, how now?" he said, impatiently. "More storms about. I tell you I do not like it. If I were a man who left you for other ladies I could understand your frowns."

"And so you do!" she passionately retorted. "Your devotion to your sister is common talk."

Rochford went white with rage.

"No such rumours reached my ears," he said, "or I would have forced them down the speakers' throats with my sword. These things exist only in your unclean imagination. Out upon you, woman! Would to Heaven I had never seen you!"

She rose from her work, and facing him cried: "That prayer is the worst prayer you ever uttered for yourself in your life. You shall see me no more. But I will see to it that you and your sister shall bitterly rue the day she came between us."

. . . . . .

Alone in Greenwich Palace quadrangle a lady was sitting, dreamily gazing before her in abstracted fashion. At her feet played her dogs, and her book had fallen from her hands. Every now and then she sighed deeply and shook her head in mournful fashion. It was the Queen of England. She spent the greater portion of her time now in lonely walks in Greenwich Park, forbidding her maids to come near her. What passed in her mind in those times none can tell, but all the memories of years would crowd within and cause a bitter harvest.

Digitized by Google

A messenger approached her, announcing that the King and his Court intended to come to Greenwich to hold a succession of tournaments there.

Immediately all was bustle for their reception, and Anne plucked up heart. She determined to shake off her melancholy, and to greet the King as though nothing were amiss.

"Whatever he is now to Jane Seymour," she muttered, "I am his lawful wife. That, God helping me, that jade shall never be."

Once more she prepared to stoop to conquer.

. . . . . .

On May Day she appeared as Queen-Consort, in state with King Henry, at the May Day jousts.

The pageants were more than usually splendid, and all was passing off satisfactorily, when suddenly the Queen, leaning over the barrier, accidentally dropped her handkerchief. It fell at the feet of Norris, a gentleman of the royal household who had been one of the witnesses to her secret marriage with the King, and to whom ever since she had been very kind.

He picked it up, and before he returned it to the Queen on the top of his lance had the impertinence to wipe his heated face with it.

With an oath the King sprang to his feet and hastily left the royal box.

The Queen appeared especially dismayed, and lost no time in retiring.

The sports broke up, and at the barriers Lord Rochford was arrested. His wife's evil seed-sowing had done its work.

Ere the day was over Norris had joined him in the Tower, and Anne herself waited in suspense for what the day would surely bring.

Suddenly, in the evening, the Duke of Norfolk and others entered, and behind them Sir William Kingston, Governor of the Tower, announcing that it was the King's pleasure that she should go to the Tower.

On the journey there, the Duke of Norfolk conveyed to her the charges against her brother and herself, and the rest, and Anne well nigh lost her reason.

Slowly they reached the gloomy fortress of the Tower. As she passed through the fatal gateway, through which so many had gone never to return, her feelings overpowered her.

"God help me!" she said. "Do I go into a dungeon, Sir William?" turning imploringly to the governor.

"No, madam, to the royal apartments."

Then a fit of hysterics seized her, and weeping and laughing she was supported into the Tower.

CHAPTER VIII.

At the trial which followed, the evil intentions of Lady Rochford bore fruit. Shamelessly she appeared as a witness against her husband, and he was found guilty.

Then Anne was called before the Court.

Rallying all the forces of her mind to meet the awful ordeal, she presented herself at the bar, pleading "Not guilty." She made a stirring appeal, but it was useless, and when she left the court she was sentenced to be burnt or beheaded at the King's pleasure. Clasping her hands and raising her eyes to heaven, she exclaimed:

"Oh, Father! oh, Creator! Thou Who art the Way, the Life, and the Truth, knowest whether I have deserved this death!" Then turning to her judges she said: "My lords, I will not say your sentence is unjust, nor presume that my reasons can prevail against your convictions. I am willing to believe that you have sufficient reasons for what you have done; but then they must be other than those which have been produced in Court, for I am clear of all the offences laid to my charge. I have ever been a faithful wife to the King, though I do not say I have always shown him humility. I confess I have had jealous fancies and suspicions of him, which I had not discretion and wisdom enough to conceal at all times. But God knows, and is my witness, that I never sinned against him in any other way. Do not think I say this in the hope to prolong my life. God has taught me how to die, and He will strengthen my faith. I know these my last words will avail me nothing; but, since I see it so pleases the King, I shall willingly die with this assurance, that I shall lead an endless life at peace at last."

. . . . . .

On Friday, May 19th, at a few minutes before twelve o'clock, Anne came forth to die.

She was dressed in a robe of black damask, with a white cape falling over it on her neck.

Her eyes were feverishly bright, and never before had she looked so beautiful.

She took her stand by the block, and looking round fearlessly, she said, in a clearly ringing voice: "I am come here only to die, and to yield myself to the will of the King. And so I take leave of the world and you, and I desire you all to pray for me."

One of her ladies covered her eyes with a bandage, and then she knelt crying: "O Lord God, have pity on my soul!" and waited for the blow to fall.

Another moment the axe gleamed through the air, and the head that had been crowned had fallen.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Redskins of To-Day.

By ROY CARMICHAEL.

"REDSKINS!"—What visions and memories of our boyhood's heroes does the mere mention of the word conjure up.

Mayne Reid, Ballantyne, Fenimore Cooper and their immortal creations pass in procession before our mind's eye.

We picture to ourselves the grave, tall figure of the eagle-eyed Chingachgook, and we note the lithe, cat-like movements of the unfortunate Uncas as his nimble form appears before us in our reverie.

But, alas, the Red Indian of Cooper's day is now no more, and we must content ourselves with a "look in" on the Red Man as we see him in the flesh.

To read about him in the stirring pages of the novelist is to be enthusiastic and sympathetic; to see him as he really appears stripped of the plumes of honour, generosity and virtue which his ancestors once possessed, and with which confiding "palefaces" still credit him, is to be disillusioned.

Picture to yourselves, my readers, a gipsy encampment, such as you have often noticed during your cycle runs in the country; the men dirty, dissolute, and in every way disagreeable, the women, poor creatures, not much better, and generally burden with a small, brown "papoose" strapped on their backs.

Imagine these gipsies seated round the tripod at the camp fire, waiting impatiently for the boiling of the "billy."

Scatter a few implements of the chase, about, and erect in your mind's eye a conical-shaped structure covered with old hides, birch bark and canvas.

Hobble a couple of ponies and let them graze just without the glimmer of the firelight. Deepen the sunburn on the faces of the men, and let the squaws appear even more hideous than usual, and you have a true picture of the "noble red man" as he can be seen to-day in his home by the lakes, in the woods, or on the prairies of North-West Canada.

In Canada, which is now the only country in which the Indians are treated with any degree of kindness and respect, there are several tribes who still maintain many of their ancient ceremonies and customs.

Of these tribes, the principal are the Siwash in British Columbia, the Cree and Blackfoot in North-West Canada, the Ojibbeway or fishing Indians in Ontario, and the Huron and Iroquois in Ontario and Quebec.

The poor Hurons have, however, suffered much at the hands of their more warlike neighbours, the Iroquois, and there is now but a remnant of them left.

In the North-West there is a portion of the Sioux tribe, which migrated to Manitoba after Sitting Bull's famous victory over General Custer and the United States forces.

The Canadian Government has taken quite a fatherly interest in these Indians, and they are now settled very comfortably on "reserves," where they enjoy a degree of freedom which the lazier portion of their white brethren are inclined to envy.

A few of them, but, alas, very few, have taken to farming seriously; the majority content themselves with occassional trapping and fishing, and in the summer season the squaws make a little money by selling huckleberries (blueberries) and other wild fruits which grow profusely in the woods and fields.

Along the Canadian Pacific Railway

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Company's line, from Moose Jaw westward to Calgary, bands of painted and blanketed braves of the Cree and Blackfoot nations are to be met with, trying to persuade unsuspicious British visitors and emigrants to buy buffalo (?) horns, and moccasins made from buffalo hide, which buffalo horns and hides at one time belonged to Highland cattle, and have been imported direct from Armour's slaughter houses in Chicago.

In the territories, however, there may still be noticed huge piles of buffalo bones awaiting shipment at the various railway stations, and once I noticed an old wrinkled warrior gazing pensively at them, no doubt meditating on the days when (vide penny horrible) "for miles and miles the great sunburnt prairie was one enormous moving mass of buffalo."

Even now the prarie is pit-marked and scarred in places, showing where the buffalo "wallows" used to be.

These are indeed sad days for the old warriors, but perhaps, happily, they are fast dying out, and a new race is springing into being which knows not the buffalo or the scalping knife.

The average Indian is very taciturn, and it is difficult to get into conversation with him, unless you address him in his own language or in "Chinook," the trade language of the West.

Even then he will talk little about himself, his secrets being guarded as rigidly as those of our own Freemasons.

Probably, the rising generation will produce some journalist or novelist from amongst the college-bred Indians who will unfold to the public some of the boundless wealth of legendary lore pertaining to his ancestors, and then, why then the reading public will get a treat.

One very distinctive feature of the Canadian Indian is his unswerving loyalty to the British Crown, united to a deep-rooted hatred of Uncle Sam and all his institutions.

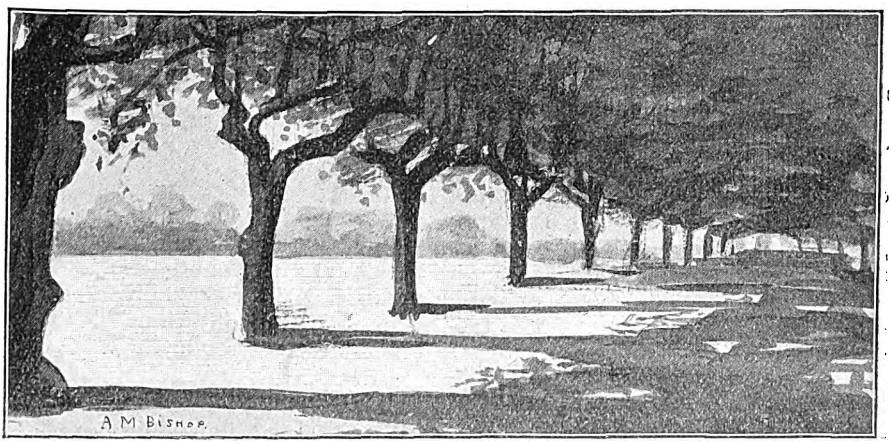
In Winnipeg there is a very smart, well drilled and soldierly-looking corps of Indian cadets, each member of which is extremely, even ultra-loyal, and would like nothing better than (as one of them remarked to the writer) "a little holiday in South Africa."

During the winter the Indian subsists chiefly by trapping, and on the proceeds of his summer sales of knick-knacks, and he may often be seen in his little dog-sleigh setting off to visit his snares.

Our illustrations represent a Blackfoot warrior standing at the door of his lodge, and a Cree medicine man and squaw, with his tribe in the background. All are in "full war paint."

The photographs, which are in their way unique, were taken near Calgary on the occasion of the recent visit of the Prince of Wales to Canada.

ROY CARMICHAEL.



Digitized by Google

The Modern Chemist.

THE old-fashioned array of bottles containing drugs labelled with dog-Latin no longer suffices for the stock-in-trade of a chemist. Much attention has been lately paid to rendering the word "nasty" obsolete when applied to medicine. The tabloid, which is a prescription solidified, is a convenient and pleasant form of taking drugs, and, inasmuch as its coating protects the freshness of the drug, it is far more reliable. Consequently, tiny bottles of these compressed medicines are not only on sale at every chemist's, but prescribed by many doctors.

Chemical foods have also become a distinct and large department of his trade. In these days, when natural mothering is going out of fashion, the chemist is the mother who provides the infant's food. And right away through life we become more independent of the body, and more dependent upon the chemist. Have your organs of digestion broken down? The chemist provides you with ready digested food. Are you ill and cannot eat solids? The chemist supplies you with beef-tea, jellies, and all manner of nourishment ready for use. Nature's complement is now the chemist.

Inquiry, however, into a third department of his business is an enlightenment concerning the credulity of human nature.

The amount annually spent by the confiding British public on patent medicines is £2,500,000.

A well-advertised remedy for a common ailment presents its proprietors with the title deeds of a gold mine.

An asthmatic man, for instance, will try the whole round of preparations for relief, and nervously magnifying his sufferings, magnifies also the power of the drug that relieves them, which is often simply a sedative. One glance at a list of candidates for popular favour in the field of remedies for chest diseases will be sufficient to show the readiness of the public to experiment.

Stomach troubles are another great source of annoyance in this dyspeptic age, and a few simple vegetable remedies, dignified with a catching name, find an enormous sale. And as indigestion impoverishes the blood, and skin diseases are the livery in which poor blood clothes itself, there is yet another fine field for the patent medicine vendor. And in addition to these, the rapid rush of modern life has manufactured a huge army of sufferers from nerves, who form a splendid opening for the advertising quack.

It may interest the reader to know that the basis of the medicines which have the largest sale is as follows:—

Preparations of sarsaparilla and sulphur for the blood; calomel for the liver; rhubarb, bitter aloes, colocynth, and purging linseed as aperients, and the more powerful the better.

Morphia, chlorodyne, and opium for the chest, and stramonium and saltpetre for the cigarettes so largely sold to benefit the asthmatic.

Arsenical preparations for the skin are freely used in ignorance of their contents by the victims; and for any kidney troubles powerful diuretics give an appearance of relief.

The great aim of these medicines is to produce relief and not cure. A cure would defeat the end of the vendors. As a man helped by a stimulant will fly to it again, so a man helped by a patent medicine will keep on using it. Temporary relief is the best policy.

In fact, this use of these drugs under other names is a huge fraud, and instead of a Government stamp protecting the profits of the proprietor, it ought rather only to be affixed when a clear analysis of its contents accompanies every bottle. The public would soon cease to buy.

Digitized by Google

The Needle's Eye

by

FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

The story opens with the discovery of a dead woman, by Farmer Erastus Winch, in his barn. His wife finds a baby there also, and insists, much against his will, on adopting it, as she has never had a child of her own. Before the burial of the woman, a stranger appears in the neighbourhood, and out of curiosity asks to see the coffin, and pays the undertaker handsomely to let it be a good one. On the burial of its mother the child is adopted by 'Liz'beth Winch and called 'Manuel, from the Bible-name "Immanuel."

CHAPTER III.—(continued.)

MRS. HOLDITCH glanced at the soft-heaving wrappings on the bed with a sigh. "Dear me, it's pretty hard to understand the dealings of the Lord sometimes!"

Elizabeth laid her hand on the good woman's plump arm. "'Rastus is jest a-comin' in," she whispered beseechingly. "If you could say anythin' to kind of reconcile him, I'd be terrible 'bleeged to you, Mis' Holditch."

Erastus Winch shook hands with the minister's wife, with a reluctant widening of his grim mouth. "You ain't been out to see us fur quite a spell," he began agreeably. "But, of course, as I was tellin' the parson, las' Sunday, there's them 'at pays more fur his support 'an I do; an' I s'pose they're entitled to his partic'lar 'tention."

"I believe Mr. Holditch expects to see all the members of his congregation at least twice a year," replied the lady with becoming meekness. "He's been very busy this week with funerals."

"Yas, it's a mighty bad season; terrible onhealthy. I've been laid up most all winter with one thing or 'nother. Crops was bad, too, an' what with money scurser 'n hen's teeth, an' everythin' way up in gee, 'tain't a very good time to incur extry expenses. What do you say, Mis' Holditch?"

"It would depend a little on what the extra expense was," said Mrs. Holditch, cautiously.

"Humph!" ejaculated Winch, with a sour look at his wife, "I s'pose you've seen it?"

"Do you mean the baby? Yes, I have just seen it. He's a fine child; he'll soon grow into a strong, active boy."

"He won't be wuth his keep fur ten years," growled Winch. "My wife here is set on keepin' him; but I don't want him. I've been thinkin' of consultin' the minister on the subjec' of a man's rulin' his own house. That's Bible, ain't it?"

"I heard Mr. Holditch say that a likely boy, that cost practically nothing to raise, was a good investment for a farmer," observed Mrs. Holditch, in a hard, practical tone. "You'd have his services till he was of age, I suppose; I should advise you to keep the child."

Mr. Winch had been engaged in cutting a liberal mouthful of plug tobacco with a clasp knife. He shook his head with a surly glance at his wife; his jaws were occupied with the fragrant weed, but they ceased to move for a full minute in the light of the look she flashed him in return; the same unalterable determination he had faced once before shone in the faded eyes.

Digitized by Google

"Wall, I dunno," he said at length. "I guess I'm a blamed fool fur bein' so soft-hearted; but jest to please you, Mis' Holditch, I reckon I'll hev to give in 'bout the boy. 'Tain't likely he'll ever be any good to me; an' Mis' Winch 'll hev to look out 'at she don't neglect no reg'lar dooties a-waitin' on him; can't put up with that nohow, an' money tight as 't is now. The poorhouse 'll be open fur quite a spell yet, an' one day'll do as well 's 'nother as fur 's I'm consarned."

. . . .

Those systematised numerical collections of facts known as statistics, however coldly dull they may appear, are the concise expression of prolonged effort, the colourless residuum in life's seething alembic. If it be stated, for example, that Elizabeth Winch has fried some fifteen thousand slices of pork; that she has washed dishes five thousand four hundred and seventy-five times; that she has fed the chickens and calves two thousand times more or less, upon which occasions she has been the patient recipient of some twenty-seven thousand rasping complaints from her yoke-fellow—all this since the December morning when Immanuel first opened his eyes to the light,—it may be simply inferred that a period of five years has been added to the term of her earthly existence.

Fortunately for Elizabeth, as for many another, she was not accustomed to view her labours from the statistical standpoint. If she was bound to her narrow wheel of labour, she at least forbore to often look at her chain. At times her wan face seemed to reflect the rosy glow which pulsed in the round cheeks of Immanuel.

During these years the child grew in strength and beauty; the spreading of his wings had indeed come to fill the whole land for Elizabeth. That he linked the sordid seen with the celestial unseen she never doubted; the memory of the strangely beautiful face of the dead mother had remained with her in the guise of a living presence. She came to regard herself as in some wise guided and directed by this benign intelligence known in the secret of her own heart as "his mother."

"She couldn't be contented in no heaven whilst he's here," she would say to herself. "More especial as she kin see 'at I ain't no ways experienced in the fetchin' up of children. It says in the Bible 'at we're all ministerin' sperits, sent forth to minister; an' that, I take it, means 'at they ain't allowed to stay inside no pearly gates a-singin' an' playin' on golden harps as long's their own folks needs lookin' after here below."

This curious sense of intimate and helpful companionship so grew upon her that she formed the habit of conversing familiarly with the imagined presence while about her work. "Ain't he growin' perfec'ly wonderful?" she would whisper, stooping to look at the child wrapped in the rosy sleep of babyhood. "Jest look after him a spell, an' keep him asleep ef you kin whilst I step out to feed them chickens."

The unseen mother was often similarly called upon to "keep him mighty still while 'Rastus is round;" and many were the fervent outpourings of gratitude when some dreaded crisis was safely past.

"What in under the sun would I ha' done ef you hadn't managed to quiet him down jest as you did?" she whispered on one occasion, when the child's loud crying had elicited a savage threat from her husband. "Seem's 's'o I'd go crazy; but land! he shet right up the minute he laid his pretty eyes on you! I seen him a-lookin' at you as plain as day. I s'pose mebbe your wings—all shiny like—must ha' 'tracted his 'tention!"

Erastus Winch appeared as unconscious as an animal of the heavenly change in the atmosphere of his home. He went his way after his old surly fashion, and for the most part paid no manner of attention to the child. But the time came when Elizabeth detected a speculative gleam in his dull eyes as they rested upon the boy. Winch was smoking his pipe on the back porch on a summer evening; Elizabeth sat on the steps watching Immanuel as he industriously gathered fragments of wood in a basket.

"What's he doin'?" demanded the farmer, removing his pipe and pointing it toward the child. "Why, 'Rastus he's gettin' kindlin' fer me to use in the mornin'," said Elizabeth, her heart beating fast with pleasure at this token of tardy interest. "He's awful smart for his age, 'Manuel is; he helps me all the while. This morning when I was stemmin' gooseberries for pies, he set an' worked at 'em as stiddy as I did. I wish't you'd notice him a little more, 'Rastus," she added, laying her hand timidly on her husband's knee.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

He recognised the tentative caress with a scowl, continuing to puff at his pipe a full half-minute before he made answer. "I'm a-goin' to take consid'able notice of him f'om now on ef he's got to the pint whar he'll be useful," he said, rising from his chair and knocking his empty pipe against the door-post. "It's 'bout time I was beginnin' to realise a leetle somethin' on my val'able investment—he—he!"

He paused on his way to the barn to look more narrowly at the child, stooping to feel his arms and legs. "Fer all the world as if he was a colt or steer!" murmured Elizabeth, her eyes filling with indignant tears. She called the boy sharply. He came running toward her, his long curling locks flying out in the wind.

"'Manuel!" she exclaimed, and held him fast, her eyes wide with sad forebodings.

The child wound his arms about her neck. "What is it, mummy?" he whispered.

"Nothin'!" said Elizabeth shortly. "Come now, I'm a-goin' to put you to bed. "You must rest while you kin, deary."

The boy drew himself up to his full height. "Here's lots of kindling, mummy," he said joyously. "To-morrow I'm goin' to bring water from the spring. I won't spill it!"

"No—no, child," said Elizabeth, shaking her head; "I don't want you should carry water. I'm a-goin' to send you to school; you've got to get learnin'. Yes, I'm a-goin to sen' you to school to-morrow."

She knelt by the open window for a long time after the child had fallen asleep, looking out with anxious, questioning eyes into the rosy splendours of the evening sky athwart which swallows flitted by twos and threes, crying shrilly to their fellows of night's approach. "I wish 'Rastus wa'n't so hard," she murmured, wiping away one or two slow tears; "seems 's'o he was made of stone. 'Twa'n't always so with him; when we was first married an' come to this house to live, I remember he says to me—'twas right down on the back porch of a summer evening like this—'Liz'beth,' he says, 'ef thar's anythin' I kin get fer you, or do fer you, all you've got to do is to name it.' He was awful kind in them days, 'Rastus was; an' I was willin' an' anxious to work my fingers to the bone fer him. I don't know how it come—I didn't take notice—I know I never stopped a-tryin' to please him. But——"

She started to her feet with a faint exclamation of dismay at the sound of his slow, heavy step at the back door. "It got dark so kin' of gradual like, husban', I didn't think to light up," she said apologetically, as she struck a match in the dark kitchen; "'slong as I'm alone, thinks I, they ain't no use in wastin' ker'sene."

"Humph!" growled the man, "I know what you was doin' well 'nough. I reckon I'm jest a leetle mite smarter 'an you take me for, Mis' Winch. Now I'm a-goin' to set my foot down on this 'ere foolin' once an' fer all, an' you might 's well put yer min' to it first as las'."

"I—I don't know what you mean, 'Rastus," faltered Elizabeth, with an imploring look. "I ain't never neglected nothin' fer—fer him; you know I ain't. I never had better luck with the chickens an'——"

"That ain't the p'int," he interrupted, dropping heavily into the one rocking-chair. "I've had my eyes peeled onto you—an' him too—fer quite a spell back, an' I see 'at yer idees wants overhaulin' on the subjec'. You ain't a-fetchin' up no fine gent'man, Mis' Winch, 'at's a-goin' to dress in broadcloth an' patent leathers when he's growed, any more 'an I'm a-settin' out to raise prize-winnin' trotters. I'm a-raisin' useful critters fer the farm, an' that's what you set out to do; but I guess you kin' of los' track of the idee all these years—eh?"

Elizabeth moistened her dry lips with a furtive look at the grim face opposite. "You ain't serious, 'Rastus, in namin' a child 'at's got an immortal soul alongside of dumb critters, be ye? Course"—she made haste to add—"he'll help 's soon 's he's big 'nough. He doos 's much as ever he kin now. I—I was thinkin' we'd ought to sen' him to school, beginnin' to-morrow."

"You don't say," sneered her husband. "You're gittin' awful smart an' knowin' lately, ain't you? Mebbe we'd better sen' him to college an' make a perfessor outen him. Ef you git to thinkin' so,

Digitized by Google

Mis' Winch, why, o' course I ain't got nothin' to say. I gin in to ye once, an' so you guess you c'n come it over me every time; but I reckon you've got the wrong pig by the ear this time. Now, ef you'll give me your 'tention, Mis' Winch, I'll tell ye what ye'r a-goin' to do—beginnin' to-morrer. First off, you'll cut that redic'lous mop of hair off him, an' then——"

"I was a-goin' to cut his hair, 'Rastus; but it looked so pret——"

"I'm a-talkin', Mis' Winch. After his head's in order, you c'n sen' him out to the barn to me. I'll fin' somethin' fer him to do. That's the kin' of school he'll git fer a spell."

Elizabeth's pillow absorbed more than one bitter tear that night. "O Lord!" she groaned, when the loud husky breathing at her side revealed her slackened chain—"O Lord! You love him more'n I do—more even 'an she doos, an' you kin take care of him. Don't let 'Rastus be ha'sh with him, Lord, cause he ain't much more'n a baby! O Lord—Lord—Lord!" The anguish of her fears found vent in dry, inarticulate sobs, which penetrated the wakeful ear of Omnipotence in guise of compelling petition. The answer was peace and deep sleep.

CHAPTER IV.

A SQUARING OF ACCOUNTS.

"He wants you should help him out to the barn, honey," said Elizabeth. "That's why I cut yer hair; big boys don't want no curls, do they?"

The child looked soberly at the long, bright tresses which hung from Elizabeth's trembling fingers. He shook his head, his dark eyes sparkling. "I'm glad I'm big," he said, squaring his small shoulders. "I like to help."

Twenty times during the morning did Elizabeth strain eyes and ears for some token that all was well with her darling. "I s'pose she's with him," she sighed, while a hot tear dropped on the potato she was peeling. "But I dunno what in creation she c'd do fer him ef Rastus gits mad. He's allers awful ha'sh with colts when he breaks 'em to harness; I remember one time he killed a steer 'at wouldn't turn into the yard jest when he wanted it to. Land! I can't stan' it another minute nohow; I mus' see what he's doin'!"

The barn was empty, but a heap of corn-cobs and a measure of shelled corn revealed the initial task. "With his baby fingers!" muttered Elizabeth, shaking with indignation; "they'll be fairly raw! Well, I kin do that, an' I will after this."

She crept cautiously up into the loft and looked away across the fields. "Rastus'll be plantin' fodder corn this mornin', I reckon," she whispered, then caught her breath in a quick sob. "Yes, I kin see him in his little pink apern; Rastus is makin' him drop corn. The sun's turrible hot, an' he ain't used to 't neither. O Lord—Lord!"

At noon time the small head drooped wearily over the full plate. "I don't feel hungry—very," said the child, smiling bravely into Elizabeth's anxious face; "but I guess I helped a lot!"

"You're a dummed sight more trouble 'an you're wuth, that's what you be," observed Winch, as he shoved back from the table. "You'll hev to do better 'n ye did this forenoon, or I'll try what licking' 'll do." With that he lighted his pipe and strode out towards the barn. To Elizabeth's immense relief, she presently saw him drive away towards the village.

"I guess you'd better lay down on the lounge and rest a spell," she said to Immanuel. "It's nice an' cool in the settin'-room. Come, honey, I'll bake you a big cookie with currants in bimeby."

The child slipped off his chair with a sigh; his eyes wandered wistfully to the open door.

"Would you rather go out, 'Manuel?" asked Elizabeth, tenderly. "It's pretty hot in the sun, but I guess there's some strawb'ris gettin' ripe down by the brook, where it's shady."

She watched the little cropped head as it bobbed in and out amid the lush tangle of greenery which overhung the roadway. An oriole called softly to its mate from the top of the tall elm, which held its swinging cradle; a bumble-bee yellow with pollen boomed past in the sunshine; crowds of bright-faced flowers and tasselled grasses wagged their young heads in the warm breeze. Elizabeth heard nothing—saw nothing of it all. She turned back to her kitchen, and fell to scraping an iron kettle with feverish energy. "Oh, Lord—Lord!" she groaned, to the discordant accompaniment of the broken knife, "I'm awful 'fraid of what's coming!"

Digitized by Google

Immanuel trotted soberly along the dusty road till he came to the brook, which lay across the fields like a twisted ribbon, touched here and there with a glint of silver, where its busy ripples caught the blaze of the sun. The child slipped down the steep bank into the jubilant life of the meadow. A warm, sweet smell of wild strawberries, blent with a thousand subtler fragrances of unfold-buds and full-blown, passionate flowers, greeted him like a kindly presence. He stretched his small, tired body on the earth with a deep sigh of content, all the vague unhappiness of the morning falling away from his spirit like a torn garment. Thousands of fluttering leaves shot through with emerald splendour spread a cool shelter above his head; peace sang in the low gurgle of the stream and breathed in the caressing wind. The child listened drowsily, and presently the sound of the brook carried away into a dream full of comfort.

So Elizabeth found him. "Poor lamb!" she sighed, and wakened him to the sight of a big ginger-bread man, plentifully besprinkled with currants.

At six o'clock of a summer's morning a corn-field is a place of enchantment, even if one be encumbered with a big hoe, the handle of which is higher than one's head. The long arching aisles are full of gleaming lights, where the sun strikes through the blue-green leaves: the wind urges them to mysterious whisperings. Crowds of yellow butterflies—those innocent lovers of midsummer—float in mid-air. Higher up little flocks of snow-white clouds wander peacefully in the blue.

Immanuel dared not look up to watch them; there were too many lusty weeds growing in the shallow trenches under the waving ribbons of the corn. Some of them stoutly resisted the big hoe in the small hands. It appeared that a personal encounter was necessary, but if a long, fibrous tap root has taken firm hold of the tenacious clay beneath the crumbling loam, and its crown of green leaves be succulent, it sometimes happens that one may decapitate a weed without destroying it. Having added a fraction of this fact to his stock of agricultural knowledge, the boy beheaded many weeds with joyful haste, burying the tell-tale stumps of the foe in the loose earth. Thus he travelled down the long row, pausing now and again to straighten his aching shoulders with a long breath of satisfaction.

Through the twinkling green leaves the heavy, stoop-shouldered figure of his task-master could be seen approaching in the opposite direction. The farmer was cutting and thrusting thither and yon with a mixture of skill and strength, which the child regarded with honest admiration. He glanced down at his own small person, righteous ambition swelling in his soul. "I am growing," he said to himself, "and I am learning—every day, mummy says so!" Many times during the past weeks he had sobbed himself to sleep; but always the morning brought the white page of a new day.

Erastus Winch had also paused to mop his wet forehead and ease his aching back. During this period of respite he fixed his savage eyes on the small, toiling figure in the adjoining furrow. In another instant his heavy hand descended with crushing force on the delicate shoulders. "Ye tarnal fool!" he shouted, his face purple with rage. "I seen yer! ye needn't try to lie out of it,—ye doggoned beggar brat! A-pullin' off the tops of the weeds an' hidin' 'em—I seen yer!"

There is no spectacle on earth more revolting than that of helpless childhood cowering beneath the brute strength God has set for its defence. Woe is decreed for the man who thus offends one of the little ones. Aye, let a milestone be hanged about his neck and let him be drowned in the depths of the sea; it were better for him! There was no visible presence in the corn-field, no hand appeared to stay the threatened blows; yet on a sudden Erastus Winch stopped short in his torrent of abuse and stared open-mouthed to the right and left.

"I am sorry," faltered the child. "I didn't know the weeds would grow again. I'll dig up all the roots. I'm sorry I didn't know."

"Wall, you'll be a durned sight sorrier than you be now, time I git through with ye!" growled the man. "Now you dig them weeds, roots an' all; I'll see 'at you don't never forgit 'bout it agin, when I git ye up to the barn!"

. . . . .

"You'll be needin' some help for harvestin' this week, won't you, 'Rastus?" asked Elizabeth, as she set a platter of steaming beef and vegetables before her husband at noon. "Billy Giddings was here this mornin'; he's lookin' for a job. I tol' him——"

Digitized by Google

"I seen him," interrupted Winch, spearing a potato with an iron fork. "He's comin' to-morrer at sun up."

Elizabeth involuntarily glanced at Immanuel, who was washing his hands at the back door.

"We're goin' to tackle the ten acre lot first," pursued Winch. "The boy thar c'n take a holt of the pertaters, ef he ain't too lame come to-morrer."

Elizabeth turned her face aside to conceal the look of satisfaction that crept over it. She could hoe potatoes, and the field was well out of sight of the ten-acre lot. "Come into dinner, honey," she said to the child; "I've got some nice cherry pie."

"You ain't got none fer him," said Winch, speaking thickly through a big mouthful. "That young feller's a-goin' to git his belly full o' somethin' 'sides pie, 's quick's I git through eatin'."

Elizabeth gripped the back of her chair. "What's he done to anger ye, 'Rastus?" she faltered. "He—he's nothin' but a child, husban'. You forgit 'at he's only——"

"I don't fergit nothin', Mis' Winch; I ain't the fergittin' kin'. Fetch on yer pie, will ye? I ain't got no time to fool away."

Elizabeth turned blindly. "Here's the pie, 'Rastus," she said, huskily. Then she walked to the door with sudden determination. "'Manuel," she said, in a low voice, "don't ye want to go down to the spring an' fetch mummy a pitcher of nice, cool drinkin' water; there ain't a drop in the house."

Winch dropped his knife and fork with a clatter. "You're a-lyin'!" he burst out. "Yer bucket's full, an' ye know it. Durn yo! you c'n come back here; I'll 'ten' to yer case now!" The last words were addressed to Immanuel, who, with ready obedience, had started for the spring. "Mummy!" cried the child, his eyes wide with terror.

"Come on!" shouted Winch, seizing a heavy horse-whip, which stood in a corner. "I'll larn ye both who's boss in this house."

Elizabeth caught imploringly at her husband's arm. "'Rastus!" she begged, "don't ye—don't! For heaven's sake—'Rastus! For the sake of our own child 'at's dead—don't ye tech him!"

Without a word the man wrenched himself loose from the clinging hands. In another minute Elizabeth heard the heavy door of the barn shut to with a bang. "Oh, mercy, he'll kill him!" she muttered, wringing her hands weakly.

She darted into the road. There was no one in sight, but from beyond the crest of the hill there arose the faint intermittent creak and rattle of waggon wheels. The vehicle itself shortly hove into view. Elizabeth ran toward it wildly.

It was a long waggon, painted black; the man who drove the single white horse sat stiffly erect. He wore black clothes, and interposed the shelter of a black umbrella betwixt the fierce rays of the July sun and his uncovered head; a straw hat of the same sombre hue, albeit tempered by age, reposed on the seat beside him. In the bed of the waggon, a wrinkled oilcloth, also of rusty black, imperfectly concealed the outlines of a long, narrow box. As this singular equipage proceeded solemnly along the road between green walls of foliage vocal with the joyous voices of birds and insects, the man on the driver's seat was seen to concentrate his entire attention on the broad, dusty back of the white horse. An occasional admonition addressed to this animal resulted now and again in a quickening of the plodding gait into a heavy jog-trot. At such moments the man would glance guardedly over his shoulder at the shrouded shape behind.

Elizabeth threw up her hands with a smothered scream. "It's an awful bad sign!" she muttered. Then the more urgent fear conquered. "Mr. Dundor," she called, "fer pity's sake do stop a minit!"

The driver of the waggon drew up at once. "Is that you, Mis' Winch? I declare I scarcely knew you! I was just on my way to——"

"Don't wait a minit!" cried Elizabeth wildly. "He'll kill the child ef somebody don't stop him! Fer the land's sake, hurry! I'll hold the horse!"

The undertaker scanned the flushed face of the woman in obvious perplexity. "You've been exposin' yourself to the hot sun, I fear—haven't you, Mis' Winch? There's been considerable mortality——"

"It's 'Manuel! He's done somethin'—I don't know what—an' 'Rastus got mad

Digitized by Google

'LIZ'BETH LISTENING FOR THE COMING OF DELIVERANCE.

at him. He's got him in the barn now a-lickin' him! Tell him you called to see him 'bout somethin'!"

"Why—ee, Mis' Winch, I'd like to 'bleege you, I would really, but I can't say 'at I feel called upon to—ah—interfere in a case of discipline. Who'd I understan' you to say was getting c'rrected?"

"Oh, Mr. Dundor, it's 'Manuel; an' he's only six years old. You know 'Rastus, how turrible ha'sh he's allers been. Don't wait another minit. Please get out. I—I'll do most anythin' for you, ef you only will!"

"'Manuel?" repeated Mr. Dundor with exasperating deliberation. "Why, didn't I hear you'd named that there child found in your——"

"Yes, that's him! Won't you go? God bless ye, Liph Dundor!"

Mr. Dundor climbed stiffly down over the wheel, his face curiously mottled as if from the stirring of some strenuous inward motive. "The mare'll stand all right," he said, turning to the woman. "I guess if I was you I'd make myself scurce. 'Twon't do to let him mistrust what we're up to." He made his way through the tangle of blossoming mayweed which bordered the road, the pungent odour bringing an unaccustomed tear to his eyes. "Seein' it's her young 'un I'll do it," he muttered. "It'll kind of square accounts along of that casket." He bent his head to listen, then brought down his whip-handle in a smart rat-tat on the closed door of the barn. A wailing sob from within caused him to repeat the operation with urgent emphasis.

This time the door flew wide, and Winch stood on the threshold, a threateningly belligerent look on his big-featured face. "Wha'd yer want?" he demanded.

"Why, old-hemlock, neighbour! but I'm mighty glad to find ye so easy!" began Mr. Dundor, with a free and exuberant friendliness of manner. "I was just on my way over to Jabez Turnerses with a first-class casket for ol'

Digitized by Google

Mis' Turner; I dunno as you've heard 't——"

"I don't see as that's any of my biz," growled Winch, laying hold on the door, with the manifest intention of closing it in his visitor's face. "I ain't got no time to fool away gassin'."

"Hold on a minit, neighbour—not so fast!" cried Mr. Dundor, with infinite tact. "That's just what it is—a little matter of business this time: it'll fetch you in, mebbe—half a dollar. That's worth a word or two—eh?"

Winch cast a frowning glance over his shoulder, then he stepped out and set his back against the closed door. "Wall!" he ejaculated, with a tentative relaxation of his grim mouth.

"As I was remarkin'," observed Mr. Dundor, resuming something of the solemnity incident to his profession, "I'm on my way to Turnerses with a fust-class, a-number-one, casket for ol' Mis' Turner, 'at passed away yisteday to a better lan' in an apoplectic fit; I dunno as you've heard the sad intelligence?"

"I ain't heerd it," said the other doggedly, "an', what's more, I don't keer now 't I hev heerd. Them Turners was always a meechin' lot. I ain't never took no stock in any of 'em."

"They are a weak set, and that's a fac'," acquiesced Mr. Dundor pleasantly. "They ain't none of 'em long for this vale of tears, I reckon. That's why I stopped here. I got started with the casket, an', think I, when I git there, like enough there won't be a soul 'bout the place able to help me in with it. I want you should get onto the waggon with me an' ride out. If half-a-dollar'll be any injucement, why——"

"Make it a dollar an' I'll go with ye," said Winch. "You c'n put it int' the gen'ral expenses," he added with a wink. "I'll never be able to hev a fun'ral to my place; I ain't rich 'nough."

The two men were walking slowly toward the waggon, when Winch caught sight of the anxious face of Elizabeth. "Confound it all!" he muttered. "I'd like to hev forgot what I was doin'. I'll hev to hev a word with my wife afore I git on to the waggon."

He thrust his shaggy head into the open window. "I seen yer—a-peekin'," he growled. "Say, Mis' Winch, I'm goin' out for a spell; you leave that boy alone whilst I'm gone, d'ye hear? Don't you go nigh him."

"Why, where you goin', 'Rastus?" asked Elizabeth, with well-feigned surprise. "Ain't that Liph Dundor? I was jist a-lookin' to see who 't was."

"Give me my coat then an' shet yer gab," responded Winch agreeably. "An' say! If I ain't home by four o'clock, you c'n hev him drive up the cows; you can milk."

Elizabeth stood in the kitchen door watching the departure of the black waggon drawn by the white horse; the mournful creak and rattle of the slow-revolving wheels floated back to her on the hot breeze. "My!" she murmured, shaking her head with a deep sigh; "it was an awful bad sign—a-meetin' that coffin plumb in the middle of the road!"

CHAPTER V.

REVELATION.

Elizabeth found the child sitting motionless in the hay-mow where his mother had died. Long, cloudy shafts of yellow light descended upon his bowed shoulders from the one window high up in the dim wall. To the tearful eyes of the woman this dazzling glory appeared like mighty wings stretching up and away from the lonely little figure. "Oh, 'Manuel," she whispered, "look up, an' speak to mummy!"

The child threw his arms about her neck with a little sob. Elizabeth covered the small, tear-stained face with passionate kisses. "He's gone, deary," she whispered; "an' he won't be back for a spell. Come in with mummy, an' eat some dinner; I saved a nice little pie a purpose fer you."

The boy shook his head and struggled to his feet. "I want to go," he said, "I want to go out-doors."

Elizabeth involuntarily drew back before the dumb pain in the childish eyes. Then she stretched out her arms longingly. "I want to tell you somethin', 'Manuel," she pleaded. "Jes' wait a minit, deary! I didn't mean to tell you till you was growed up; but I reckon I will—though I don't sca'cely know what good it'll do."

She paused, picking absently at the folds of her checkered apron, "Ef 'Rastus was yer father," she burst out at length, "it 'ud be diff'runt! You ain't like us; I allus knew it, an' the breed's more'n the pastur' every time. Yes—if you was like him it 'ud all be diff'runt."

Digitized by Google

"Who is my father?"

The question brought Elizabeth's wandering thoughts to a standstill. "Your father?" she repeated. "Why, I——" Her face whitened a little under the impact of a sudden, startling thought which had reached her from out of the unseen. "'Manuel," she said solemnly, "I'm a-goin' to fetch somethin' out of the spare room; you stay here till I come back."

When she returned she carried the russet-bound Bible, wrapped carefully in a white cloth. "This 'ere Bible's yourn, 'Manuel," she said, reverently unwrapping it. "I was 'ittin' to give it to you when you was growed; but I'm goin' to give it to you now. This book was yer ma's; it tells all about yer Father which is in heaven."

The child took the book in his hands, lifting grave, questioning eyes to the woman's flushed face. "You are mother?" he said, simply.

"Yes," she said, breathlessly, "as fur's lovin' you's concerned, I be. But your own mother was a beautiful lady; she died when you was a teeny baby. I've been a-takin' care of you fer her. She's with you most of all times 'at I can't be."

"Yes," said Immanuel, nodding emphatically. Elizabeth leaned forward to peer into the downcast face. "But you ain't never seen her, deary."

The child shook his head. "Sometimes I dream of a beautiful lady," he said. "She loves me very much."

"Yes, that's her," sighed Elizabeth, patting the little brown hand which was folded in both of hers. "She was han'some as a pictur'! But yer Father, 'Manuel, loves you a sight more'n either of us women-folks. I couldn't begin to tell you how much store He doos set by you. I'm a-goin' to read somethin' out of this 'ere book right now; then I'll have to go in an' wash the dishes. Bimeby you kin read it yerself; you know yer letters a'ready, an' I mean you shall have learnin'."

"I know all the words on the mowing-m'chine, an' most all the words on this page," said the child, eagerly producing a fragment of newspaper from his pocket. "I found it in the road," he explained; "an' the sounds of the letters make words. I found it out."

"For the land's sake, child, you'd really ought to hev schoolin'," was Elizabeth's comment. "Now you listen, 'cause my dish-water's gettin' stun cold."

She read from the sixth chapter of Matthew's Gospel, and on through a part of the seventh, pausing now and again to wrestle with a difficult pronunciation, then gliding on triumphantly through an easier passage. "There!" she exclaimed, shutting the book with a long breath; "them's the words of Jesus; you've heard of Him frequently a'ready. He knew more'n any other man 'bout yer Father. Somewheres I remember 'at he said you was to call no man on airth father, 'cause there is one 'at is your Father in heaven."

"Where is heaven?" asked the child, wonderingly.

"It's up——" began Elizabeth; then she stopped short, a strange look of triumph dawning in her dim eyes. "It certainly says in this 'ere Bible that yer Father is in heaven, same's I read, 'Our Father which art in heaven.' An' ag'in it says 'at He's everywhere. He made everythin' you kin see—everythin' pretty 'at you set store by—flowers an' butterflies an' the brook; yes, an' strawb'rries an' apples an' sich—everythin'. Now, it jest come into my mind, though I ain't never thought so before, that if yer heavenly Father's everywhere, then heaven mus' be—everywheres 'at He is."

"Am I in heaven now?" asked the child, in an awed whisper. "Is my Father here?"

"O Lord! don't Ye let me tell him anythin' 'at ain't so!" petitioned Elizabeth, silently. Then, with sudden illumination, she cried, "Yes, 'Manuel, you be in heaven now; 'cause it says 'at in Him we live an' move an' have our bein'; an' there can't be anything better than that anywheres! I don't seem to sense it allers when things go cross-ways in the kitchen; but mebbe you kin ef you begin when you're little, an' think 'bout it frequent."

With that she slipped away in sudden trepidation, fancying that she heard the sound of voices from without. "If I've said anything 'at ain't so, Lord," she ejaculated, as she hurried along the narrow path, "jest see 'at he forgits it! I forgit easier'n I remember, an' there's times 'at I'm awful glad of it!—— Good

Digitized by Google

THE CHILD THREW HIS ARMS ABOUT HER NECK WITH A LITTLE SOB.

Digitized by Google

land! I wonder who that is? an' my dishes a-settin' 'round."

Two female figures were standing under the shelter of the stoop at the side door; while beneath the shade of the big soft maple a superannuated sorrel horse nibbled languidly at the fence post. "Well—well! Mis' Winch, here you be at last!" cried the visitors in chorus. "We's been a-knockin' for quite a spell," continued one of them, a stout, purple-faced lady, attired in a much-creased linen gown. "Lidy, she would have it you was out burryin', but I says, she can't be fur, I says, 'cause the kitchen doors an' winders is wide open."

"I jest run out to the barn a minit," said Elizabeth awkwardly, her face on fire as she regarded her disordered kitchen from the coign of vantage occupied by the new-comers. "Do walk right in the settin'-room, where it's cool. I guess you found it pretty warm a-ridin' in the sun, didn't you, Mis' Harney?" she added interrogatively, when her two visitors were seated.

"Yes, 'twas turrible warm," said the person addressed, plying her palm-leaf fan with long, easy strokes. "I s'pose I sense the heat more'n most folks on 'count of my heft. We've been to the buryin' ground, me an' Lidy; it looks real neat at this time of the year—don't it, Lidy?"

"It cert'ly does," assented the other, with a long-drawn, plaintive cry. "An' it's really edifyin' to read off the tombstones; it keeps us in mind of our approachin' end. I says to Mis' Harney, it won't be long, I says, before you'll be a-layin' me away in this 'ere spot. I've got my grave all picked out. How've you been feelin' this summer, Mis' Winch? Seem's so you wa'n't lookin' as well's usual. An' how's that poor unfortinit child you took to raise?"

Elizabeth's thin face flushed hotly. "I guess I'm 's well 's usual," she said stiffly.

"An' the little boy?" persisted the lady, peering sharply out of the shuttered windows. "I don't see him 'round anywheres. But mebbe school ain't out yit."

"'Manuel don't go to school," said Elizabeth, compressing her lips tightly, as she plaited her apron strings into a frill. "He—he's a-learnin' to home," she added, with a defiant lift of the head. "He ain't but six; there's plenty of time fur his schoolin'."

"My Benny had his primer read through twice afore he was six," observed Mrs. Harney, complacently. "But, of course, Benny was extry smart: he takes after my folks, Benny does. Course it ain't to be expected 'at a pauper 'ud ——"

"I never see a brighter child 'an my 'Manuel," said Elizabeth, sharply. "He—he kin read in the newspapers, 'Manuel kin; an' I guess there ain't many childern any smarter 'an that!"

"I want to know!" ejaculated both ladies, in long-drawn incredulity. They leaned forward and stared searchingly at their hostess' flushed face.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

Awful Results of the Martinique Explosions on Great Britain.

EXTRACT FROM THE "BROOKLYN AFTERNOON NEWS SHEET," OCTOBER 4th, 2400.

OUR representative, Mr. J. H——, was this morning favoured with the first of a series of interviews with Herr Reindall, the celebrated explorer, who has safely accomplished the apparently foolhardy feat of exploring the deserted island of Britain, from south to north. We give the interview in Mr. H——'s own words.

"Few," said I, as I took the chair which Herr Reindall smilingly offered me, "expected to see you back alive."

Herr Reindall laughed long and merrily. "Everbody croaked," said he. "My own people took affecting farewells of me. It was really very foolish considering how many other explorers had done the same kind of thing and returned to tell the tale—Nansen, for instance, more than five centuries ago."

"Then," said I, you really put the Arctic explorations of Nansen on an equal footing with your own?"

"I think," he answered, somewhat evasively, "that the dangers of the exploration of Britain have been greatly exaggerated. The difficulties, however, would not have deterred me had they been three times as great. The whole subject has always had a profound fascination for me."

His face lit up. In answer to my inquiring and sympathetic look, he continued: "Everything combines to make the fate of Britain of deepest significance—above all to a student of science. Think of the problems—physical, social, and economic—which it started, as well as those which it helped to solve. The most singular part of it all was," he added, meditatively, "that when the first great volcanic eruption took place in the West Indies in May, 1902, the British seemed to have absolutely and of the change in the climatic conditions of the entire globe which was its inevitable outcome."

NO ANTICIPATION OF ITS FAR-REACHING RESULTS,

"You think there was no prophet among them who saw further than his fellows?"

"As far as I have been able to investigate there was no prediction of the evil to come. The sequence of physical changes that followed, although they seem so natural and obvious to ourselves, were not anticipated even by men of science in those days. The blindness of the people was prodigious. They wrote articles in the newspapers, sent out relief to the sufferers, but no one seemed to guess that a far more crushing blow had fallen on the British Islands than on the islands of the tropics."

"When did the first suspicion begin to dawn on them?" I asked, for though I knew the story, I wished to hear it from his standpoint.

"It is difficult to fix the date, for the scientists were fearful of creating premature panic. As you know

A SUBSIDENCE OF LAND BELOW SEA LEVEL WAS EXPECTED, but no one anticipated the quarter in which it would take place. Of course with our present information respecting the earth's crust, anyone with the most elementary knowledge could have foreseen and foretold it. As it was the greatest astonishment was felt when the land of the

Digitized by Google

THE ARCTIC WEATHER FOUND THEM UNPREPARED.

American mainland north and south of the Gulf of Honduras began gradually to sink. Fortunately the susbidence was so slow that no lives were lost, although a good deal of distress naturally resulted. In three years time all the land of Central America between the parallels 15°47′ and 16°32′ of north latitude was below sea-level, and

THE WATERS OF THE ATLANTIC AND THE PACIFIC MET.

In another six months the submerged land was fathoms deep. Then at last people began to wake up to the real significance of what had happened. Even then, there was scepticism in some quarters."

"Why?"

"Well, an opinion, extraordinary as it may seem, was then held by many scientists, that the Gulf Stream being only a shallow current, could not really have much effect in modifying the climate of Britain. Indeed, some went so far as to assert that its influence was entirely dissipated before it reached the British shores. The effects of its total change of direction alone convinced these doubters that its influence had been more prodigious than even the theorists on the opposite side had dreamed. You perceive that it not only directly raised the temperature of the surrounding waters, but with those floating icebergs which have since blocked every port in the ill-fated island."

ITS FORCE KEPT BACK THE ARCTIC CURRENTS

"You have seen," I ventured, "no reason to modify the current view as to the cause of the climatic changes in Britain?"

"Only one view seems to me to be tenable," he replied. "The equatorial current of the Atlantic, flowing from east to west, and no longer checked by an uninterrupted line of coast, took the path of least resistance. Instead of sweeping round the Gulf of Mexico it flowed westward through the newly-made channel, and joined the Pacific current flowing in the same direction. The Gulf Stream, as such, no longer existed."

"Even this," I remarked scarcely seems sufficient explanation for the fact that the climate of Britain has become many degrees colder than that experienced previous to the twentieth century by countries much further north—Iceland, for example.

"It can only be explained," he answered, "by a concatenation of unique circumstances.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THREE WINTERS OF UNPARALLELED SEVERITY

"in the Northern Hemisphere were followed by a summer of scorching heat. Huge mountains of ice, which the journalists of the day compared to floating continents, were broken off from the frozen mass in the Polar regions. An extraordinary combination of winds and currents wafted them straight to the shores of Britain. The British awoke one morning to find their harbours blocked by the tall and ghostly fleet against which their ironclads were powerless. The rigours of an Arctic winter found them absolutely unprepared. Still, they hoped that next summer's heat at least would melt the intruders. As you know, there has never been sufficient heat in the islands since to effect this, and every succeeding winter left the situation more appalling. The climate is, of course, incomparably more severe to-day than at the date of the exodus."

"You think?" I asked, "that the people showed what is known as British pluck in deserting their homes so soon."

"Yes, indeed," he replied emphatically, "I think they showed British obstinacy in staying as long as they did."

"Yet many hold a different view."

"Perhaps. No one would hold any other after exploring the forsaken homes of Britain as I have done."

"You have found interesting records?"

"I have found almost more than I dare recount," he answered gravely, "lest my story should be deemed a romance."

"Is it true?" I asked, "that you found in the interior some descendants of the few who refused to join in the general exodus?"

Herr Reindall gravely bent his head.

"I will give you full particulars at our next interview," he remarked with a glance at his watch. "The subject is of the profoundest ethnological interest, and must not be hurried over. I must warn you that it is also most painful."

"One word more, Herr Reindall. May we hope for fresh light on the subject of the exodus itself?"

"Scarcely," he replied. "It is, however, a subject of such perennial interest that doubtless even the little I have to say will be welcomed. Few things have made such a lasting impression upon popular imagination as the story of that mighty fleet with its four great divisions, bound respectively for South Africa, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. Painters and poets have vied with each other to depict it waiting outside the inaccessible shores of Britain for the refugees."

"It was an incident unique in the world's history."

"Unique! I should think it was! Never before, not even in the old Greek days, has the learning, the literature, the art, the refinement of an elder country been transported en masse to new ones. Bah! it was no incident—it was a revolution. No quarter of the globe has been uninfluenced by the results."

"The British Empire of course——"

"Time is up," said Herr Reindall. We must discuss the British Empire next time."

(To be continued.)

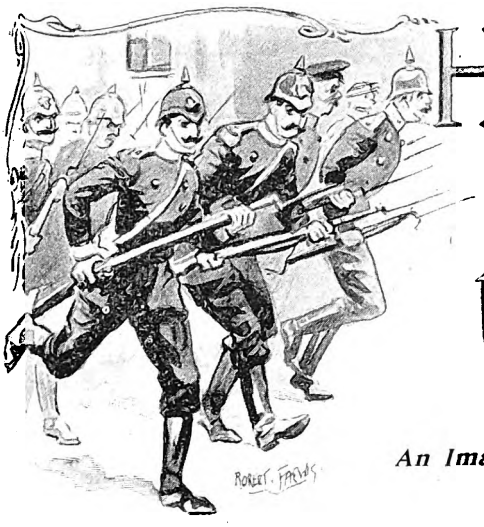
Digitized by Google



How the GERMANS took LONDON

An Imaginative Sketch that might be Realistic.

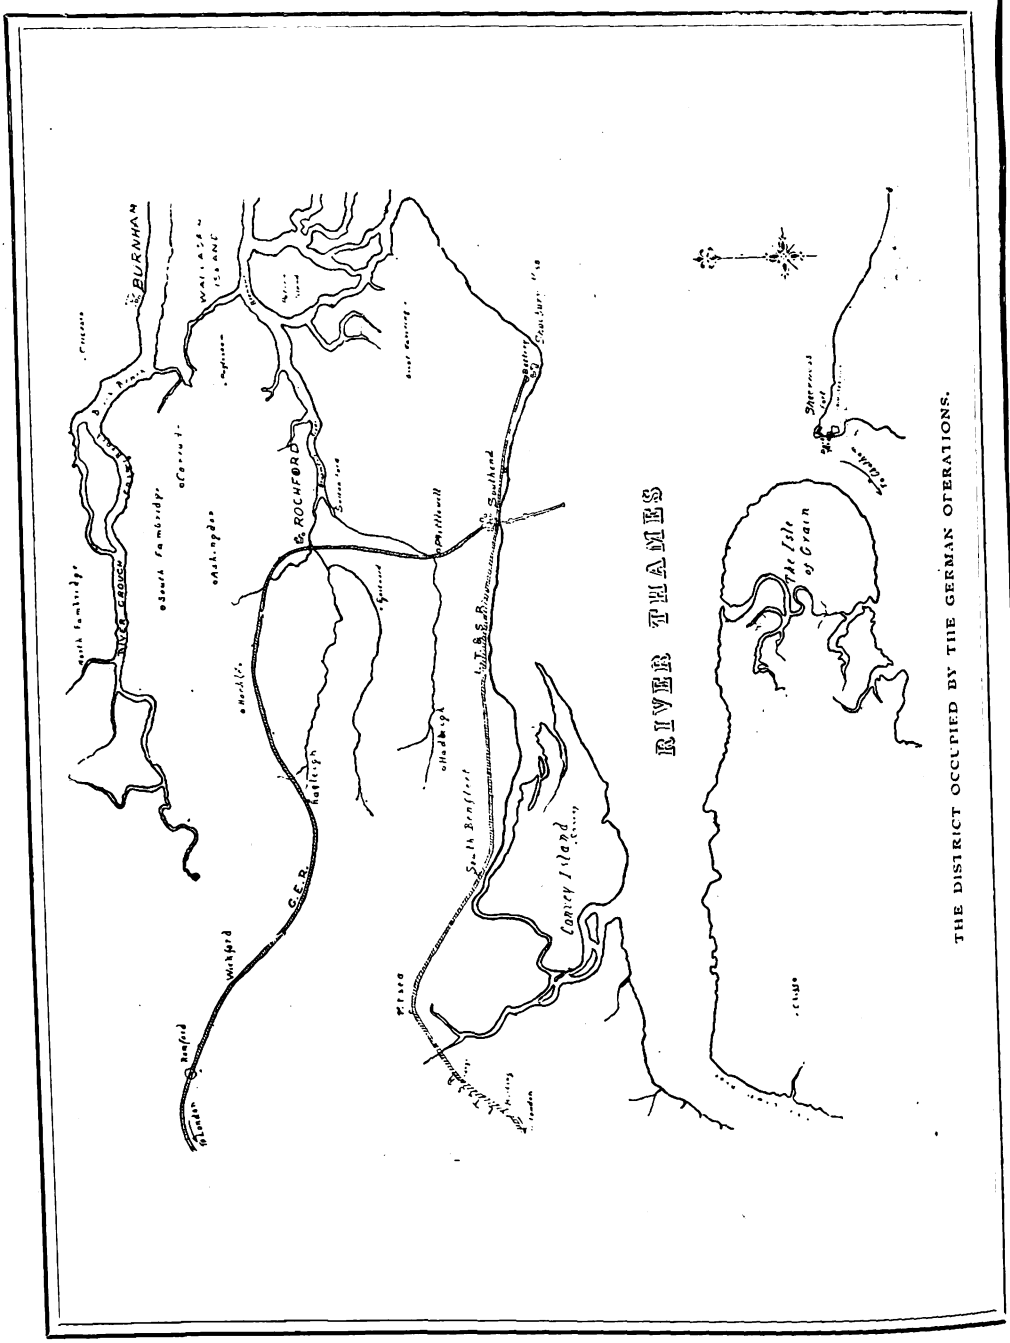
SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS EVENTS.

Great Britain is at war with the State of Uliska, and it appears that Germany intends to have some say in the settlement of terms offered by us to Uliska. Yet, in spite of this, no one suspects that an order issued by Germany to German residents in London to return home means anything, but on one Sunday evening, the very Sunday they all leave from Fenchurch-street and other stations, the German Ambassador declares war. England is found to be isolated, her communication with the outside world cut off, her fleets called away by fraudulent use of a stolen cypher book, and the last chapter closed with a copy of a notice to all English residents not to interfere.

Burnham-on-Crouch.

ABOUT nine o'clock on the eventful Saturday evening a steam launch arrived at the quay, and someone on board announced that a large vessel was in difficulties at the mouth of the river, and required plenty of assistance in discharging passengers and cargo. One man came ashore and enquired for the telegraph office. Word instantly passed from mouth to mouth, and scores of men made off down the river as quickly as possible with the boats at their command; on getting some two miles down, the foremost boatmen were astonished to see ten or a dozen large vessels (large for that river) quite close together, and others apparently coming up behind. On nearing the first vessel they were hailed and ordered alongside, when they discovered the deck covered with armed men laughing and chatting in a language strange to them. Before they could realise what it all meant, they found themselves practically "commandeered" for transport services; as the boats arrived they were called upon and passed to one vessel or another. They soon found out the meaning of this. One by one the boats were filled with soldiers, now seen to be Germans; in addition, each vessel was launching her own boats, and by eleven o'clock a large fleet of rowing boats, some 200 in number, towed by electric launches, each armed with a light quick-firing gun, were passing up the river in perfect silence, each of the native boatmen being threatened with instant death if he gave any alarm, or made any disturbance. In the meantime it appeared that the first launch that steamed up to Burnham had gone off back and turned up the Roach, making for the coastguard vessel there. On arriving alongside, the officer in charge ascended the gangway, and in five minutes had dumbfounded the crew by making them prisoners, then transferring them to the launch, now seen to be armed with a quick firer, for removal to their own vessel, and these were the first prisoners of war secured in this part of Essex. The launch afterwards returned to the

Digitized by Google



THE DISTRICT OCCUPIED BY THE GERMAN OPERATIONS.

Digitized by Google

Witch, and took up its station alongside, for the purpose of preventing the passage of any boats to and from the Burnham River.

Another armed launch had in the meantime stationed itself off Cricksea Ferry in the middle of the river, another at the ferry across to Wallasea Island. The boats now began to arrive in quick succession, and judge the astonishment of those standing on the quay when they were seen to be filled with armed men, making rapidly for the shore, leaping instantly on land, and forming quickly into line at the hoarse word of command in a foreign tongue. In less than five minutes a party of about a hundred marched into the town, turned to the left, marching straight for the railway station, which in ten minutes was under their full control—wires and all. The man landing from the launch had quickly severed the wire from the Post-office to the station.

The Burnham coastguardsmen had at once been placed under guard. Hundreds of men were now arriving and forming up on the quay. It was also seen that a number landed on the other side, and their tall forms could be distinguished in line upon the opposite sea wall. The boatmen who brought in the first load were allowed to have some refreshment brought out to them by their friends on the river bank—a respectable crowd being now engaged watching operations—and then compelled to return for another load of unwelcome passengers. While these operations were going on, another considerable body of men were being rapidly taken in small boats, ships' cutters and electric launches up the Roach, where they quickly landed at Wakering Stairs. These were afterwards found to be the advance guard of the party destined to capture Shoeburyness.

The party landed upon Wallasea Island—some 500 strong—were told off to secure and take charge of the sheep and cattle found upon the marshes. A large number of these comprised the purchases made by the agents previously referred to, at Romford and Chelmsford markets, and which had that day arrived there.

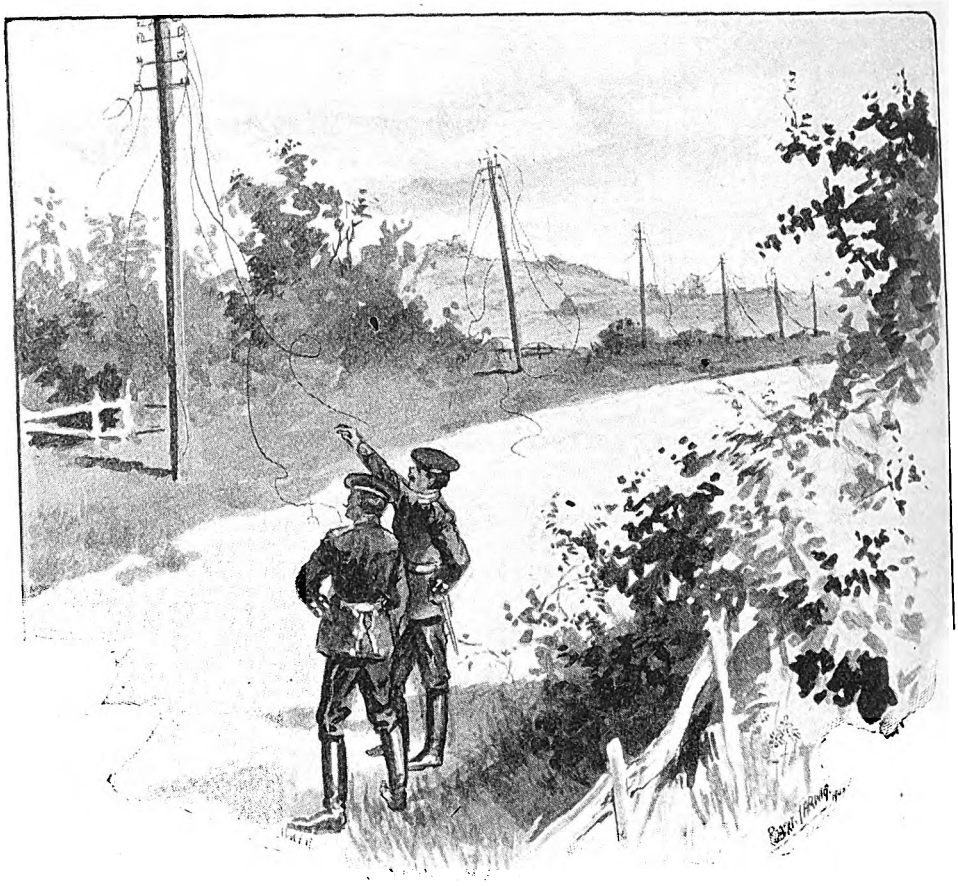
Those who know the spot will admit that a better place for the purpose could not well have been found, as being secure from raiders and easy of protection, there being but one approach from the land side, and a high sea wall surrounding the entire island of some 2,000 acres.

This was evidently to be the base of supplies for one Army Corps. By two o'clock some 5,000 men were occupying Burnham, and they had brought a large number of Maxims and light field guns of various descriptions. One of their first acts was to take possession of the gas-works, and proceed immediately to get a war balloon inflated for observations in the morning. Every road was protected by small bodies of men thrown out some little distance into the country and guns posted by the roadside for use if necessary.

The local police were early informed of the nature of these proceedings, were given copies of notices already prepared and printed in English. (N.B.—The nature of this notice will be guessed by reference to it elsewhere.) In the meantime, the men first landed at Wakering Stairs were gradually being reinforced; one or two onlookers had at once been secured, and effectually prevented from giving any alarm.

By three o'clock on Sunday morning no less than 2,000 made their way along the sea wall and marshes. Steps had been taken to secure the military police in the station at the end of the ranges. The telegraph wires were also cut for the time being. It afterwards transpired that a couple of men had been sent forward to sever the wires between Shoeburyness and Southend. This had been effected by two o'clock. It was considered advisable not to carry out this duty too early in the night, and these bodies of men were instructed to secure the military road by the ranges on the east side of Shoeburyness, take charge of the guns posted there, and then gradually work round by the beach to the south of the town, and occupy the ranges on that side, securing all the guns in position or under cover. The remaining 2,000 men took the main road to Southend, then branching off by the south road, made direct for the open entrance to the barracks. By four o'clock this position was reached; a couple of officers quietly effected the capture of a single sentry on duty; some 500 men were then told off to occupy the roads branching to the south—down to the beach, to the east round by the barracks, and some fifty men sent down to secure the railway station, where they joined a body of 200 sent to establish themselves in the main street of the Old Town. The main body then pushed rapidly forward into the heart of the barracks. A cordon was quickly passed round the block of buildings occupied by the officers—five and twenty men had previously surrounded the Commandant's house just outside the barracks—and some 1,200 men marched direct into the barrack square facing the men's quarters, the sentry and guard having been secured practically without a sound by some twelve men sent first in advance for the express purpose of dealing with them. Steps were now taken to arouse the Commandant and the officers; the situation was explained to them, and astonishment does not express the real nature of their feelings when they found themselves prisoners of war in their own quarters.

Digitized by Google



THE TELEGRAPH WIRES WERE EASILY CUT.

The officer in charge of the German troops was most considerate, and extremely courteous. He told them he hoped they would all do their best to help him to avoid any bloodshed. He said resistance was quite out of the question, as some 4,000 of his men were now occupying the garrison and its surroundings.

He further stated that if the campaign was carried out successfully as planned, it was quite probable that peace would be declared before the week was over. On hearing this cool statement it was somewhat amusing to note their expressions of countenance. They evidently quite failed to realise that the German was speaking seriously. However, they were requested to follow their captors to the men's quarters, and arrange for calling them up. When the "assembly" rang out in the cool morning air, the men rushed to their windows to find out the meaning of this. In the dull dawn they could merely see a strong body of men with Maxims drawn up in their barrack square, but the uniforms seemed somewhat strange. However, they had to assemble in reply to the bugle call, and as they came trooping out they were met by their officers, who, in a few short hurried sentences, explained the situation to them. Never were men more surprised; sullenly they fell into line. No surprise was exhibited at such a small force of men putting in appearance; the invaders evidently knew just what to expect. The officers were made to deliver up the keys of the magazines and armouries, then requested to obtain some of their belongings and get some refreshment. The men were also told off for the same purpose, with instructions to rendezvous in the barrack square preparatory to being marched off to Southend as prisoners of war. No further explanation was then vouchsafed, and now three coloured rockets were seen shooting up into the air from the centre of the square. It was naturally surmised that these were to announce the success of the operations so far.

Digitized by Google

These rockets were followed by answering signals from Sheerness, and from the direction of the Crouch. The witnesses of these aerial messengers were wondering in their own minds as to the meaning of this all-round signalling at such an hour of the night. In the meantime, the local police —two of those, and some pedestrians met with in the march from Wakering Stairs, had been placed temporarily under guard— were handed some printed notices for distribution in the town and villages round about.

By six o'clock a balloon detachment had arrived, with a further 500 men bringing Maxims and quick firers. It had not been thought necessary to bring tent equipments. The enemy doubtless made sure of taking the place and finding sufficient barrack and billeting accommodation for the number of men they intended to leave in charge here. It will thus be seen that without firing a single shot, and without the loss of a single life on either side, the Germans had secured a position of the greatest importance, at the very mouth of the Thames, with any number of guns of all sorts, sizes, and descriptions, some with more than a range of 12 miles, actually enabling them to engage the forts at Sheerness if necessary, and giving them the power to sink any unprotected vessel passing up or down the river. They were not slow to make the most of this. As soon as daylight appeared, they quickly noted the position of all the guns, and, setting to work with a will, they soon had a couple of dozen of the larger ordnance facing the river.

By seven o'clock 1,500 men were entrained for Southend with a compliment of field guns. A balloon was about to ascend, it having been filled from the local gasworks. A further 500 were told off to escort the garrison as prisoners (320 all told, including officers, the war with Uliska having somewhat depleted the ordinary staff) and reach Southend by midday.

At half-past seven the train (two trains in one) steamed into Southend station, and to the utter astonishment of the few people about at the time, a strong body of men filed rapidly into the station yard, forming up into companies with Maxims, which in turn were rapidly marched off into the town; a strong contingent making their way down High Street, and halting at the top of the hill by the pier, some 50 passing further down and taking possession. Other smaller bodies had been told to take up positions commanding all the approaches to the town, and by eight o'clock Southend, with its population of some 25,000, was in full possession of the enemy. The police were at once supplied with a number of notices (similar to those referred to elsewhere), for distribution in the town. The Volunteer armoury was located and placed under guard.

The Royal Hotel was taken possession of as being an excellent site for the Headquarters Staff, affording as it does such an excellent view of the river, upon which very important operations had been carried out during the night.

Southend, Sunday, 10 a.m.

By this time of day the residents of Southend had found out that something very unusual had taken place, and many were making their way down to the High-street to ascertain the cause of the commotion.

Those passing down the Cliff Parade of course had an uninterrupted view of the water. They soon caught sight of the balloon now floating over Shoeburyness, and glancing across to the Kentish shore they perceived an extraordinary accumulation of vessels, large and small, both above and below the pier, although there were no signs of fog or rough weather that might be expected to account for this now interesting sight. Turning into High-street their astonishment can be better imagined than described, on perceiving each side of the street lined with armed men, and devilish-looking little Maxims posted suggestively at the street corners.

Digitized by Google

The German uniform was of course soon recognised, and while debating as to the meaning of all this, another body of men was seen approaching from the direction of the Great Eastern Railway, and as they came closer it was seen that they were escorting a double row of men wearing the well-known English Artillery uniform. Those were of course the prisoners from Shoeburyness, and it was distressing to see their crestfallen looks. The situation was now apparent to everyone, but all doubts were set at rest when men stationed at each corner were found distributing copies of the notice that had been, in the first instance, served on the police.

In the meantime, the batch of prisoners (it should here be mentioned that the officers had been released on parole, on the understanding that they all took up their quarters at the Hotel Victoria) were then taken rapidly in the direction of the Pier. Following their movements, the bystanders saw them marched on to and up the Pier, and they rightly conjectured that their destination was one of the many vessels lying off the Pier head, some of which were doubtless men-of-war. Of course the whole town was now alive with excitement. Some had at once made their way to the Post-office, with the intention of wiring to friends right and left, but, of course, as might be supposed, all the wires were now under the enemy's control.

People in the neighbourhood of South-end Station (L. T. and S. Ry.) about 10 o'clock a.m. saw the arrival of a heavily laden train, and crowds of men in civilian dress rapidly lined up on the platform. Much to their surprise these men were seen to be armed—each was carrying a rifle—and quick words of command were being passed up and down the lines of men. At last they were seen to be moving, some passing to the left and some to the right, but instead of these men coming out into the street as expected, one body of two or three hundred went straight down the line in the direction of Shoeburyness, the remainder turning up the line towards Westcliff.

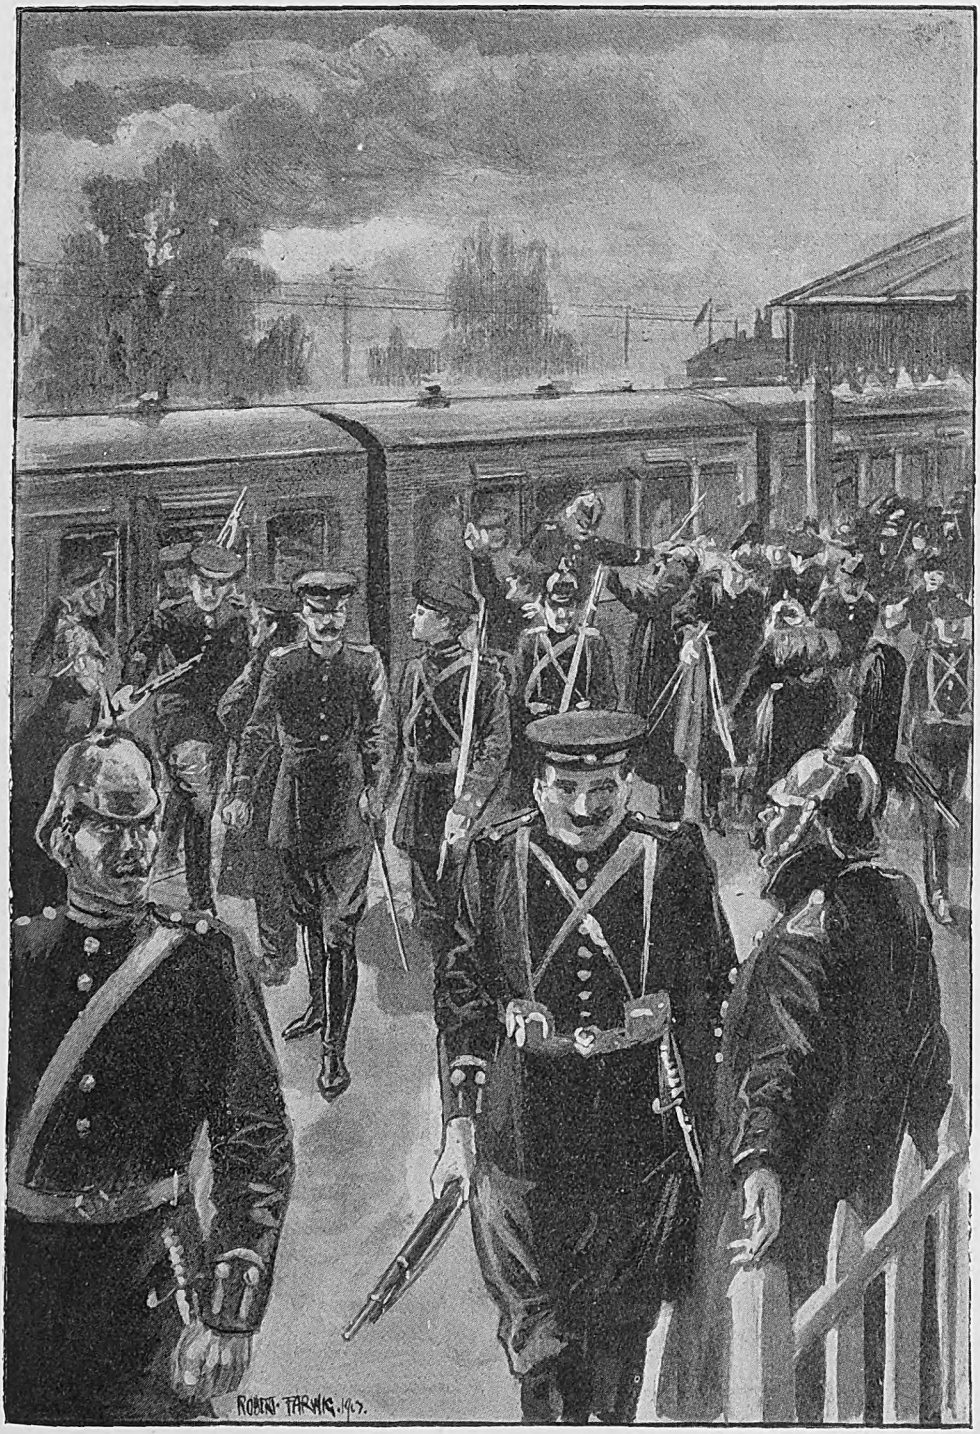
It will now be realised that these were some of the German clerks who were at that moment believed to be well on their way to the Fatherland, and who had been armed at some station en route, and then told off for guarding the lines of communication. They were now being placed in pairs at intervals of 100 yards, with instructions to keep patrolling—one to the left and one to the right—so that every yard of the ground was being carefully watched, and their instructions were to fire on no one unless attacked, but under any circumstances to keep anyone from approaching the railway embankment inside the railway fences.

Events were now rapidly developing on the water—i.e., off the Pier. Scores of small boats, cutters, and launches were seen passing to and from the Pier head, crowded with armed men; and very shortly a continuous line of men four deep was seen approaching the town by the Pier.

Unfortunately, glasses revealed the fact that these men also wore the German uniform. But all the time people were wondering what had happened at Sheerness. No firing could be heard; the Sans Pariel was known to be the guardship at the mouth of the Medway, but she could not be distinguished owing to the crowd of vessels lying between the Pier and Sheerness. However, they were to learn all details later on. And now a word in explanation of the doings off the Pier.

On Saturday evening a dinner party was given by the commander of the German ironclad lying off Sheerness. His guests included the commander and some half dozen officers of H.M.S. Sans Pariel some of the officers in charge of the forts and garrison at Sheerness, and two or three down from Chatham. About 10 o'clock a despatch arrived for the commander of the German vessel, the messenger giving him to understand by private signal that it was of the utmost importance. He asked permission of his guests to retire for a few minutes, but he had been gone some time before he sent them word that he must beg their further indulgence. The nature of this despatch may be guessed, and it was now necessary that the German commander should proceed to carry out the plans that had been agreed upon.

Digitized by Google



THE TRAIN STEAMED INTO SOUTHEND STATION AT 7.30 A.M.

Digitized by Google

The boat that brought the messenger now returned to shore with a couple of German sailors and a junior officer left on duty. Shortly afterwards a launch steamed quietly away, followed quickly by another. These made straight for the mouth of the Medway, one going for the landing stage, the other passing up the river towards Chatham. When the host rejoined his guests they could not help noticing a great change in his manner. He was evidently ill at ease, but of course no questions were asked. About 11 o'clock flames were seen leaping into the air somewhere within the dockyard, and in a short time it was evident that a very serious fire was in progress. About half-past eleven a boat reached the German ship with a message for the commander of the Sans Pareil to say that a serious fire was raging in the docks, and he had been asked to send a strong body of men to render assistance to the dockyard authorities. He at once commissioned two of his officers to return to the ship and take as many men as they might think advisable. Several guests more intimately connected with the dockyard found it expedient to leave, but others were pressed to remain, and did so, the commander of the German vessel promising to send a considerable number of his own men as soon as they could be got ready, and he forthwith gave orders for the men to be mustered.

About a quarter to eleven boats were lowered and some 200 men poured over the side into launches and cutters, word was given, and smartly they started for the shore.

As twelve o'clock approached, the guests remaining on board the ship noticed that their host began to get terribly agitated, and finally rising and speaking with great emotion, he said, "Gentlemen, I have a most painful duty to perform. I have to inform you that Germany has declared war against your country."

No bombshell could have produced such an effect as was now created.

T W. OFFIN, JUNR.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

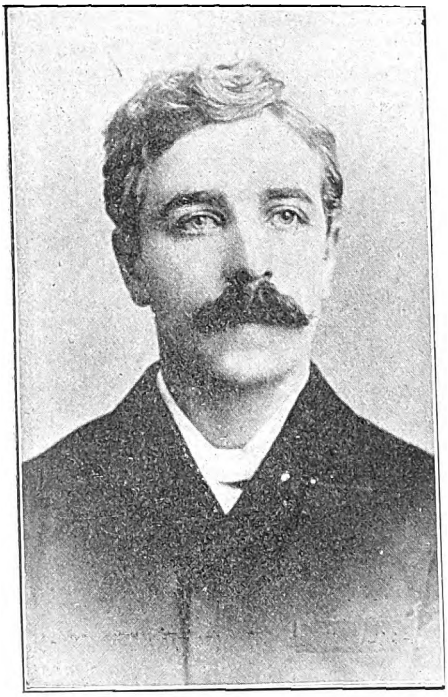
In the Public Eye

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

Our King and Queen.

THE NATION'S LEADERS IN EVERY BENEFICENT WORK.

Digitized by Google



REV. G. H. R. GARCIA, B.A.

REV. G. H. R. GARCIA, B.A., is a native of Southampton, and is only thirty-two years of age. On leaving school as a youth, he continued his education for the ministry at Cheshunt College, London, and St. John's College, Cambridge. He graduated Bachelor of Arts in Honours at Cambridge University. Whilst at St. John's he was president of the College Debating Society and also a member of the committee of the Cambridge Union, the renowned University debating society and club.

When only twenty-three years of age he went into the active work of the ministry by accepting a call to Union Congregational Church, Sunderland. He settled there in 1893. During the nine years which have elapsed since then he has had many opportunities of entering what are usually called larger and more important spheres of labour, but he has steadily refused to be enticed away. He has practically wedded himself to the church of his first pastoral love and oversight, at any rate until the completion of the great social centre scheme which the church has undertaken under his leadership. By this scheme it is intended to provide additional Sunday-school accommodation, billiard room, refreshment room with non-alcoholic bar, recreation room, workshop, baths, gymnasium, etc. The objects of the scheme are to provide musical evenings, meetings for discussion of religious, social, and political questions of the hour, and to provide a bright social centre that will act as a counter attraction to the public-house, and prevent the young people from slipping away from the work and worship of the church. The estimated cost of the scheme is £3,800, towards which £3,400 has already been promised. Mr. Garcia is a member of the Sunderland School Board, and last year was chairman of the Durham and Northumberland Congregational Union. His services are in great request all over the country, both as a preacher and a platform speaker. He has already made his mark in a denomination which includes many able men. Should his health and life be spared he has, from all appearances, a most distinguished future before him. Our Westgate friends are to be congratulated on bringing this scholarly young man, this able speaker and preacher, this bold social centre pioneer, to preach one of their lecture sermons this year.

MR. JOHN ROSS.

Digitized by Google

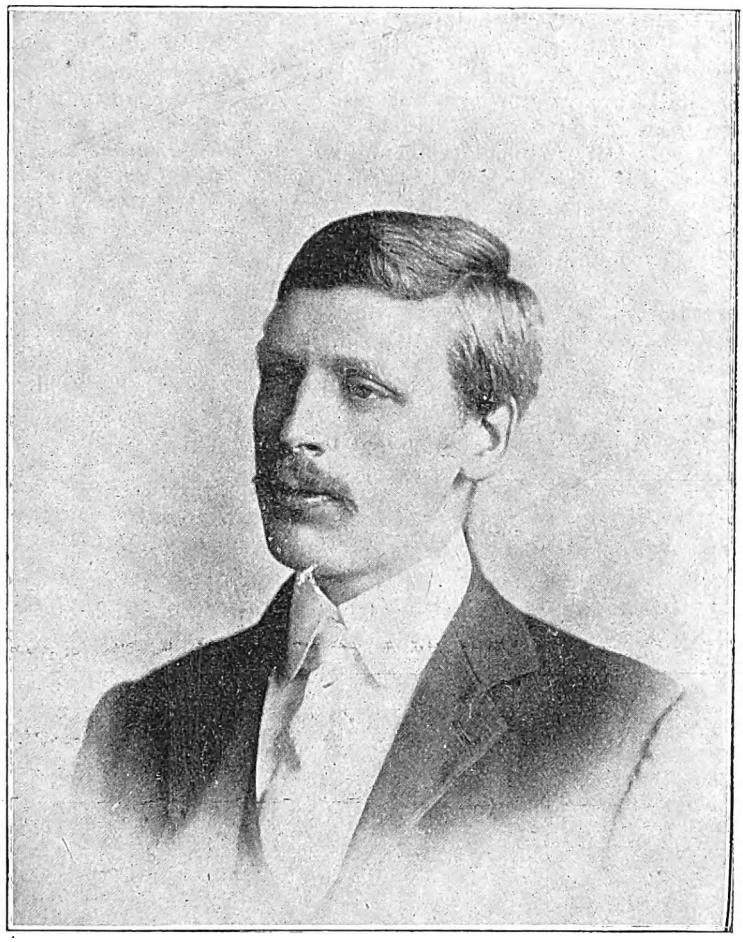
MR. JOHN ROSS, who is the Lay Temperance Secretary of the Retford Wesleyan Methodist Circuit, would most likely not consider himself as a person "in the public eye," yet he is well-known for his work's sake throughout the northern half of Nottinghamshire.

Two years ago, at the request of the Rev. H. W. Pates (the Ministerial Temperance Secretary), Mr. Ross consented to be appointed to the above post to undertake the practical work for which his colleague could find no time owing to pressure of other public duties. At the time there was cause for dissatisfaction with the state of temperance organisation in the circuit as it totalled merely to four Bands of Hope with 153 members, and one adult society with 40 members; this for a wide area extending from Normanton-on-Trent, near Newark, to Gringley-on-the-Hill at the northernmost border of the county.

Under Mr. Ross's endeavours a wonderful stimulus has been imparted to the movement, and to-day there are 28 Bands with 880 members and 4 adult societies with 187, being an ingathering of 864 in the period. The work is still progressing, and a great demonstration was held on Wednesday of Whit-week when about fifteen hundred people assembled from the villages in support of the movement. Before dispersing, a resolution in favor of the Government Licensing Bill was heartily passed. The meeting was attended by speakers from Nottingham and London and presided over by an Alderman from York, which is an indication of the widespread interest the work of Mr. Ross has caused.

Our friend will probably be even more prominently before the public in the near future as a successful and earnest advocate of Temperance principles.



MR. HENRY HOLMES.

MR. HENRY HOLMES is an encouraging example of the force of energy, perseverance, and indomitable resolution in obtaining success under the stress of adverse circumstances. In the first instance, this enterprising young artist studied until his twentieth year, with a view of entering the Civil Service; but, having a strong artistic bias, he afterwards resolved to devote his energies to painting. With this view he took a cottage in the country. Here he studies from nature. Mr. Holmes is a mill employee, whose business hours are from 7.30 to 5.15. He has a four-mile walk daily, to his place of employment. He rises at daybreak and works at painting at meal hours, and in the evenings, determined to conquer every difficulty. The clever picture accepted for this year's Academy painted direct from nature was in the golden sunny evenings of the springtime of last year, and is an étude of sunlight and shadow, with ducks splashing about in the water, in the foreground. Mr. Holmes became a member of the Yorkshire Union of Artists in 1899, and has exhibited in the yearly Exhibition since, entering pictures at the Leeds Spring Exhibition in 1901. He has now a picture, entitled "Weaving," painted in the mill, after business hours, in which he is employed. In the winter evenings the young artist attends the Leeds School of Art to study from life. He has received a varnishing ticket from the Royal Cambrian Academy, Conway, where he now has two pictures: "Midsummer's Noonday Glow," a study of sunshine and shadow, with overhanging trees, and sheep browsing in a sunny field; the other is a brilliant sky effect, entitled "Cloud and Sunshine," painted on a sunny Saturday afternoon in winter.

Digitized by Google

In next month's "Temple Magazine" there will be an interesting article describing the recently discovered Jewish Idols, Baal and Astarte, with photographs showing them as found in the tumulus of Tei-el-Kadi at the source of the River Jordan. Also Articles on Cheshunt College, the Cancer Hospital, etc.

GOOD MORNING!

Digitized by Google

A Scientific . . . . Discourse.

FOR

THOUGHTFUL MINDS.

A RECORD OF FACTS,
PRINCIPLES, AND DISCOVERIES.

Free (or unoxidised) Phosphorus in its relation to the Improvement and Preservation of Human Life on Earth.

"THAT our medical men of every school, our greatest chemists, physiologists, philosophers, and men of science generally; as well as the inventors of, and those who deal in and adopt the numberless methods and preparations which are advertised in all directions and in every conceivable manner for the cure of the "Ills that flesh is heir to," suffer almost as greatly, and decay and die as quickly as the least educated in society, is matter of positive fact as well as of regret; and although it may be conceded that much good has been done by every system which has yet been proposed, there is certainly still a deficiency; still humanity suffers; and it is painfully evident that something more is urgently wanted—something more simple, more decided in its action, less of the character of ordinary physic or medicine, and more of the nature of a preserving and protecting aliment. This important desideratum medical science has, so far, failed to supply."

"Let us hope that the preparation now described is the beginning of a series of improvements in the right direction and of victories over the natural world."

These were the words of the late Dr. Samuel Birley, M.D., when introducing to the world, a few years ago, the results of his investigations, which had been the outcome of a lifetime's work and study.

What the medical world of to-day is beginning to recognise, he had many years ago satisfied himself upon: namely, the supreme control which the nervous system exercises, not only over the main functions, but over the most minute and apparently insignificant processes taking place in the body.

Dr. Birley's great rule is, therefore:—"Look after the nervous system; keep it well-nourished, and in perfect working order, and disease will little affect us."

Dr. Birley devoted many years to the discovery of some remedy that would fulfil the above indications. He carefully analysed the brains of persons who had died from various diseases, as well as of those who had been killed by accident whilst in the full vigour of health. He was struck by the deficiency of Phosphorus found in the brain matter of the weak and ailing, compared to what normally existed in the strong and healthy. From this fact the suggestion naturally arose that perhaps the loss of phosphorus had much to do with the weakened nerve force, and that its artificial administration might help to give back what had been lost. Such a thought was no less that prophetic, but simple as it appeared to be in this early stage of the investigation, it was found impossible to carry it out with any satisfactory result, for the following reason:—

Ordinary phosphorus, as understood by the chemist, cannot, by any known method, be made to be PERFECTLY SOLUBLE in the blood. It may be finely powdered and given in pills, etc., or dissolved in oil, alcohol, ether or chloroform, but in all these forms it is precipitated into a fine dust immediately on mixing with the juices of the stomach.

Many of these particles do not pass into the blood at all, but of those that do, they are completely stopped when they arrive at the liver, through which organ everything passes from the stomach before entering the general circulation. Hence Phosphorus administered in this form cannot possibly reach the nervous system, and cannot therefore aid in its restoration.

Knowing these facts, and convinced of the necessity of phosphorus as a Food, rather than a medicine, for the Brain and Nervous System, Dr. Birley experimented in many ways for the purpose of discovering a means of preparing it so that it would be free from these drawbacks.

His aim was to find out a form which would not precipitate in this manner, but remain in perfect solution throughout the system.

In the end he was rewarded by the discovery of a new process of preparation (by distillation) which rendered it, when taken by the mouth, absolutely soluble in the blood, and was perfectly satisfactory in its effects in every way. It could pass through the liver in a fluid state and thus reach the nerve tissues, which alone were in need of it.

No better proof of the value of this new form of phosphorus could be required than the very severe tests to which Dr. Birley put his invention. That it really does pass into the circulation, and enter into the composition of the Brain and Nervous System cannot be better discussed than in the inventor's own words:—

"The question has often been put to us—What proof have you that your PHOSPHORUS, when taken into the stomach, actually reaches and combines with the substance of the brain?

As it is truth only, and not opinion or hypothesis that we care for, our answer must be perfectly candid, and such only as practical investigation permits us to give. Because we cannot, or rather have no opportunity to, analyse the living human brain, before a course of PHOSPHORUS has been entered upon, we

Digitized by Google

admit that the evidence is not direct and positive. We are obliged to depend upon implication and analogy. The following items, however, force the conclusion we have maintained upon us :—

1ST.—PHOSPHORUS is a constant element of the brain and nervous system of all animals.

2ND.—The amount of PHOSPHORUS is different in persons of different mental and physical powers.

3RD.—In the brain and nerve-matter of those who have during life been characterised by great powers of mind and body and who have been in the prime of health suddenly killed in battle, or accident, or by other violence, a much larger amount of PHOSPHORUS has been discovered than is ever found is the brain-matter of ordinary persons who have been killed in a similar manner.

4TH.—The brain-matter of idiots contains the least amount of PHOSPHORUS. A little more PHOSPHORUS is found in that of persons not completely imbecile, but physically and mentally weak, languid in action, deficient in pluck and energy, full of apprehension, weak in memory and in application of thought and purpose, who hesitate in their resolves, and shrink from the general bustle of commercial life. The same may be said of persons who are fretful, low-spirited, anxious, fidgety, and odd-tempered, and of the positively ill-tempered and disagreeable.

5TH.—Persons who in early life have enjoyed a fair amount of mental and physical power, but who have suffered many years from great anxiety and sorrow consequent upon family bereavement and other losses and trials, have been found after death to have lost a great portion of the PHOSPHORUS which is common in the brain of similar persons who have not suffered in the same way.

The same may be affirmed of those who, beginning life with a good constitution, have excessively indulged in alcoholic preparations. Alcohol has the property of dissolving and carrying away the PHOSPHORUS of the brain and nervous system. We have personally known and carefully watched the career of many who in the "prime of life" were brilliant, energetic, first-class men of business, full of dash and assurance, carrying all before them, and succeeding in almost every undertaking. We have observed some of these to gradually wane in their mental and physical powers; little by little to have become anxious and apprehensive; matters which once were trifles, unworthy of attention, have seemed to be of great consequence; enterprise and speculation have become less and less; a fear of losing or failing has gradually crept in, until a general tameness and insipidity have been observed. A few years longer, and the once bright, confident, venturesome business man has dwindled to an eccentric, nervous, despondent, and miserable human remnant, incapable of concentrating his powers, vacillating, absent-minded, forgetful, and almost heedless of the world or its pleasures. Deafness, failing sight, impaired susceptibility, necroencephalus (softening of the brain) and general inanition, have gradually terminated in death. In some cases we have been enabled to procure the brain and a portion of the spinal cord, and have found by analysis that the PHOSPHORUS has been greatly deficient and much less than has been found in the brain-matter of persons who had the same vigorous character during early life, but who have died suddenly by violence in the midst of their career, and when all their powers of mind and body were most intense. In several instances different parts of the brain have been found to contain different proportions of PHOSPHORUS.

Striking as are the foregoing examples, and forcible as they are in the way of evidence, they are not in themselves sufficient. We require a synthetical process before we can form a satisfactory conclusion.

We have treated with PHOSPHORUS cases of every class. We have seen the prematurely old, the worn and exhausted, the nervous and miserable of every position in life, gradually restored to a most vigorous and perfectly healthy state. From a lean and cadaverous condition they have become full in flesh, the countenance clear and ruddy, the eyes bright, sight improved, deafness overcome, the hair become abundant, the step and gait again elastic and determined, the spirits high and generous, the temper cheerful, the love of song and harmony returned, the brain again active, perception quick, memory tenacious, and the whole system and character changed from the most pitiable condition to the highest state of existence.

In several instances the stir and excitement of mercantile life have created a longing to return to business. Some have done so, and are now as keen and successful as at any former period.

If then in all cases of mental and physical debility where we have been able to analyse the brain after death, we have found a deficiency of PHOSPHORUS, and if in precisely similar cases during life we have administered PHOSPHORUS, and found such conditions pass away, what other conclusion is it possible to arrive at than that this new form of Phosphorus gradually assimilates with the brain and nervous system, and brings up the depressed and wasted constitution to the normal standard?

The preparation which has repeatedly produced such results as those above described, we have called 'Plain' Syrup of Free Phosphorus, because it is the simple solution formed by distillation, combined with sugar and without the admixture of any other substance or medicament."

Free Phosphorus in combination with other Medicaments.

The Phosphorus prepared as above described permits of our taking advantage of the well-known principle in medical science, that different articles of the materia medica have the property of acting specially on different organs of the body. These various properties are very valuable in cases of special diseased action, and we are able to take advantage of them in using the syrup of phosphorus here described. It will combine with many remedial agents, and thus the power of the phosphorus may be determined to different organs of the body as local conditions may require.

Where the heart is weak, and the whole muscular system flabby and greatly debilitated, in addition to great nervous debility and exhaustion, the best combination is that of protoxide of iron with the "Plain," and which we have named the "Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus."

In the course of many years' private practice Dr. Birley was enabled to considerably modify and perfect a number of combinations of his Phosphorus in addition to the "Ironised" above named. For debility of the muscular and general system in LADIES particularly; when "Below Par," and suffering from poorness of blood and lack of colour, a special preparation called the "Sub-Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus" has been found to be wonderfully successful.

Hence the fifteen standard kinds enumerated in the adjoined list have been formulated and have earned a unique reputation for the complaints named therein.

Digitized by Google

DETAILED LIST.

The result of over Half a Century's Experience. All have been proved in a Large Private Practice before being offered to the public.

PLAIN. SYRUP OF FREE PHOSPHORUS. A Vitalising food for all Brain and Nervous Affections from whatever cause—worry, late hours, overwork, &c.; and for Hysteria, Vitus' Dance, Headache, &c., &c. A sustaining and life-giving element. The basis of all Dr. Birley's Preparations. Of especial value to Professional Men, Clergymen, Solicitors, Barristers, Literary Men, Schoolmasters, and all engaged in mental occupations 4/6

IRONISED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Muscular Debility, Heart Disease, Paralysis, Rupture, Sciatica, Lumbago, Scrofula, Obesity, Dropsy, and General Debility. Of great value also as a restorative after an attack of "influenza" .. 4/6

SUB-IRONISED. Especially prepared for Ladies and Delicate Persons suffering from the above, instead of the "Ironised." And for Bright's Disease, Mumps, Varicose Veins, and when "Below Par" 4/6

MAGNESIAN. SPECIAL REMEDY for Pulmonary and other forms of Consumption 4/6

BRONCHIAL. SPECIAL REMEDY for Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Quinsy, Congestion of the Lungs, Diphtheria, and Throat Affections generally 4/6

GASTRIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Indigestion and Liver Complaints 4/6

ANTI-RHEUMATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for every form of Rheumatism and Gout. (In some cases the Ironised or Sub-Ironised will aid the action of this preparation when taken on alternate days with it) .. 4/6

ANTI-STIPATIO. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Constipation, Flatulence, Piles, Spasms Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, &c. 4/6

ACIDIFIED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak, Fading, and Falling Off of Hair, and for Actual Baldness (internal use only) 4/6

VIRILITIC. Prepared for men suffering from Nervous Debility and Loss of Vitality 4/6

TOMATINED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak and Partial Loss of Sight, Deafness, Defective Taste or Smell 4/6

ANTI-NEURALGIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Neuralgia, Pleurisy and Erysipelas .. 4/6

CUTANEOUS. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Skin Diseases, Eczema, Psoriasis, &c. 4/6

The 4/6 Bottles contain between 70 and 80 Doses and are sufficient for nearly ONE MONTH'S USE

A SPECIAL OFFER.

We have the fullest confidence that where we can introduce these medicines into a household we are assured of a firm footing, and of recourse to them on all future occasions of illness or indisposition.

This coupon entitles you to a 4/6 Trial Bottle of any one kind of Dr. Birley's Phosphorus Compounds at 2/6; but if forwarded by parcel post, 4d. per bottle extra must be enclosed to cover cost of carriage within the United Kingdom. We guarantee safe delivery. Should a Trial Bottle also be required for a friend or relative, we will extend the offer to them if ordered at the same time.

Orders may be sent with the Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these Trial Bottle Coupons, and if we are not the money will be returned,

For Residents abroad the date will be extended sufficiently to allow of ordering. Postage of 1/4 per bottle is required for abroad.

COUPON.

4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/6

Or by Parcel Post 4d. extra—viz.: 2/10

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Available until July 31st, 1902.

The above Coupon to be cut out and sent with order. These Trial Bottles can be had direct only from the

Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers:

GORDON, MURRAY, & Co., Ltd.,

10, ADAM ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

STRONGLY RECOMMENDED.

Among some hundreds of others we may mention the following Reverend Gentlemen, who have proved the value of the medicine, and from whom we hold some excellent reports:

REV. C. H. SPURGEON, London, S.E.
REV. DR. COCKREM, London Orphan Asylum, Watford.
REV. W. T. CRANFIELD, Stoke.
REV. R. FLETCHER, Hull.
REV. J. JAMES, Abercanaid.
REV. J. W. MORRIS, Gly Neath.
REV. C. EARLE, Langford.
REV. F. CLEMENTS, Hanham, Bristol.
REV. GABRIEL MOLLAN, Clonmetham.
REV. E. I. DEVENISH, Teignmouth.
REV. G. COOK, Church Gresley.
REV. G. DALE COPELAND, Pudsey.
REV. A. A. BROOKS, Wigan.
REV. A. E. REALFF, Leicester.
REV. F. JONES, Malton.
REV. W. BARTON, Hull.
REV. G. HOMEYER, Claycross.
REV. J. B. GRATTON, Leominster.
REV. W. FRY, Blandford.
REV. J. D. WOODHALL, Bolton.
REV. R. FRAME, Birkenhead.

THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN AGE" says:—"Doubtless the 'Christian Age' enters many a home where there is some weakly one whose feeble health makes existence a burden, or perhaps it is a disease considered incurable which is wasting away life. Wherever there is such a case, we sincerely wish one of Dr. Birley's Preparations of Phosphorus might have a fair trial. These preparations are the result of scientific studies and experiments extending over many years, and the success which has already attended their use has been almost marvellous. We have seen hundreds of letters (not copies, but the original documents), some from persons well known to us, all testifying to the curative effects of one or other of these preparations. And more than this, we know of cases in which they have been the means of restoring to health when to all appearance recovery was almost impossible."

EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."—"Our readers know quite well how careful we are not to recommend anything but what is thoroughly trustworthy, but so many voluntary testimonials of unmistakable genuineness are before us that it is simply impossible to question the efficacy of the Medicines to which we are calling attention; hundreds of letters from all classes of people, including titled nobility, clergymen, physicians, &c., among which we notice several well-known names, all bearing remarkable testimony to the benefits derived from them."

EDITOR OF THE "FAMILY DOCTOR."—"One Thousand Original Letters of Testimony have been submitted to us by the Proprietors of Dr. Birley's Preparations."

Digitized by Google

See Special Offer at foot to all Readers of this Paper.

DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS

GUARANTEED
PERFECTLY HARMLESS

(Medical Certificate accompanies each box.)

THESE Wafers have long been known to possess the "wizard's touch" in producing, preserving, and enhancing beauty of person in male or female, by surely developing a transparency and pellucid clearness of complexion, brilliant eyes, soft and smooth skin, where by Nature the reverse exists.

The great difficulty hitherto has been how to make this beautifying principle safely available, and at the same time avoid what is detrimental and injurious. Dr. Mackenzie's Wafers are prepared expressly as a "Beautifier of the Complexion and Skin," and are guaranteed harmless. In the direction for which they are intended their action and effect is simply magical, the most astonishing transformations in personal appearance being brought about by their steady use. Even the coarsest and most repulsive skin and complexions, marred by freckles and other disfigurements, slowly change into an unrivalled purity and texture, free from any spot or blemish whatever, the pinched features become agreeable, the form, before angular, gradually transforms itself into the perfection of womanly grace and beauty. Used by men, the favourable result is the same. In the Complexion Wafers as prepared by the undersigned all danger is averted, and the remedy, taken in the manner directed on each box, is absolutely innocuous, while the peculiar virtues of the remedy remain unimpaired and intact. Powders, enamels, so called "blood purifiers," &c., &c., are a delusion and a snare. From the use of these Wafers FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, VULGAR REDNESS, ROUGH, YELLOW, or "MUDDY" SKINS, and other facial disfigurements are permanently removed, and a deliciously CLEAR COMPLEXION is assured

Wonderful TESTIMONY to their efficacy:

59, BEAUMONT SQUARE, MILE END, LONDON.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. The others have done me a great deal of good."
H. MASON.

31, EVINGTON ROAD, LEICESTER.—"Please send me a box of Wafers. I have derived great benefit from the others I have taken."
Yours truly, M. E. WARD.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Dear Sir: I find your Soap so good, I now want you to send me three cakes of it, also a box of Complexion Wafers."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT S.W.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. I am much pleased by the effects produced by the first."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

MELBECKS, KIRKBY STEPHEN, WESTMORLAND.—"Kindly send me another box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers. The last has worked wonders."
SARAH G. PAGAN.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF THE "TEMPLE MAGAZINE."

T.M.

COUPON

JULY 1ST, 1902.

A 4/6 TRIAL BOX FOR 2/-

Any reader sending this Coupon and Postal Order or Stamps for Two Shillings will receive immediately a 4/6 Trial Box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers, this great reduction being made to induce our readers to give this wonderful preparation a fair trial, as we know one trial will convince all of their unique merits. This coupon must be sent in within 10 days of this date. Address all orders to

S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., London Bridge.

Digitized by Google

ALLEN FOSTER & Co.,

ALFOSCO REG.D

CALL OR WRITE.

The London Manufacturers.

CALL OR WRITE.

Buy Direct at First Cost from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

30/- DESIGN No. 610.

8/6 8/6

DESIGN No. 623. 30/-

Design No. 1055, 8/6. Ladies' Silk Shirt, trimmed narrow tucks. A leading line for 8/6; carriage 3d. COLOURS: Helio, Sky, Pink, and Black.

3/11½ 3/11½

Design No. 877. 3/11½. Moreen Underskirt. Special value for 3/11½; carriage, 3d. COLOURS: Blue, helio, red, pink, and black, Other leading lines at 2/11½ and 4/11. Send for one.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S SHOW ROOMS, At 47, Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C. Are open daily from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Saturdays until 1 o'clock. Ladies are invited to call and inspect their goods.

A SPECIAL LINE OF ALPACA SKIRTS In all Colours. COSTUME SKIRTS, 6/6, 7 11, and 9 11 each. Carriage, 5d.

Write for our Summer Sketch Book. Patterns Post Free. Every Lady should see Allen Foster & Co.'s New and Fashionable "Coronate" Cloth.

Design No. 610. 30/- Up-to-date Eton Costume, made in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S 'Coronate' Cloth, all shades. Short Coat, trimmed stitching and glace silk, and small steel buttons. Lined throughout, striped lining. Bell shape Skirt with belt, also trimmed strappings of glace silk and steel buttons. Stering value for money. Perfect fit guaranteed. Price only 30s. DIRECT AT FIRST COST from the 'ALFOSCO' Factories. Send for one. In sending order, please give bust measurement under arms, inside sleeve, size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

DESIGN No. 949. 6/6

VALUE FOR MONEY.

DESIGN No. 934. 8/11

Design No. 623. 30/-. The Costume of the season, made in all the lovely Pastel shades of the "Coronate" Cloth. This charming costume is lined throughout, and made by most experienced workers. Jacket in Russia style, pouch front, steel buttons, trimmed strappings of glace silk. Stylish well-made skirt with frills also trimmed silk to match jacket and shade of material. One of the best lines in costumes on the market. Colours: Heliotrope, Rose Pink, Cornflower, Coral, Salmon, Blue, Royal, Light Green, Light Grey, Dark Grey, Fawn, Brown, Black and Navy. Send for one. Price only 30/-.

Design No. 949. 6/6. Fashionable Costume Skirt. Made in Vicuna Cloth or in the world-renowned Specialite Serge, two sterling cloths, unsurpassed for durability and wear. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Fawn, Light and Dark Grey, Royal Blue Grey, Cardinal, Green, Purple, etc. This Skirt has the new graduated flounce, which is lined with good linenette. Price only 6/6; carriage, 5d. extra. All sizes in stock. Money returned if not approved.

Design No. 934. 8/11. Superior Costume Skirt, with three shaped frills, graduated at back. Each frill is trimmed with braid. There are three additional rows of braid at top of frills. Made in all shades of A. F. & Co.'s Vicuna Cloth or Specialite Serge. A Great Bargain for 8/11; sent carriage paid 5d. extra. This Skirt can be ordered in the new "Coronate" Cloth, trimmed glace silk in place of braid. Price, 15/11; carriage, 5d.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,

47, GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MELLIN'S FOOD

FOR INFANTS & INVALIDS.

Prepared as directed, is rich in those substances which nourish and sustain children and sick persons. Always uniform, easily prepared, speedily digested and absorbed.

Sample bottle on application. Mention this Magazine. MELLIN'S FOOD WORKS, PECKHAM, S.E.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS, AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

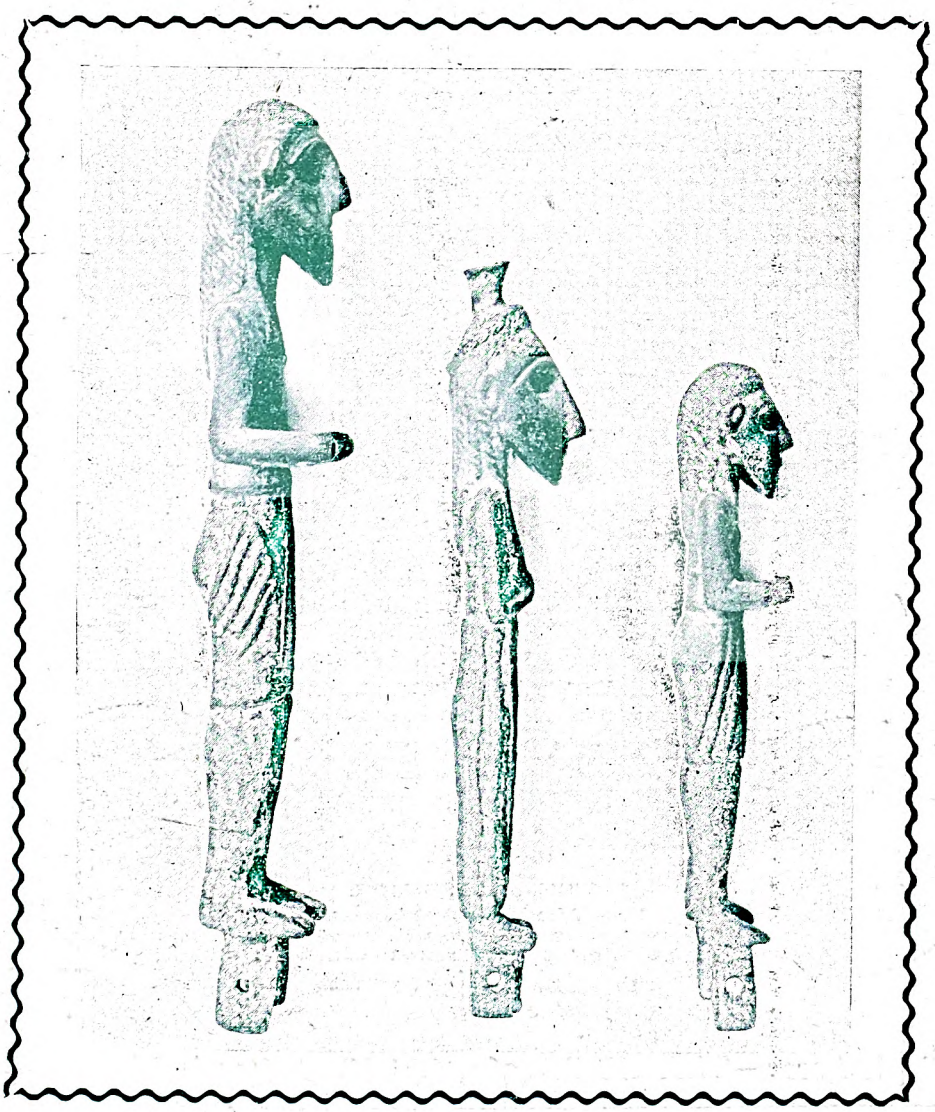
Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. Thompson & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.
London: Printed for the Proprietors by the National Press Agency, Limited, Whitefriars House, Carmelite Street, E.C., and Published at 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

Vol. 6. AUGUST, 1902. No. 11.

Price Sixpence.



Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

NOURISH AND FLOURISH.

"FRAME-FOOD"

FOR BABIES FROM EARLIEST INFANCY.

THE FOOD OF THE FUTURE! It has spread throughout the world, defying all competition. The effect of the soluble phosphates and albuminoids in "Frame-Food," extracted from Wheat, is astonishing! Suited to the weakest digestion, a visible improvement is at once shown in baby's health and development when fed on "Frame-Food." TRY IT, AND YOU WILL BE THANKFUL! Thousands of unsolicited Testimonials. Sold in Tins, 16-oz. 1/-.

FREE TEST — ¼-lb. Sample Tin of "FRAME-FOOD," or 5-oz. Sample Jar of "FRAME-FOOD" JELLY, sent free on receipt of 3d. to pay postage; both samples sent for 4d. postage.

(Please Mention "TEMPLE MAGAZINE.")

FRAME-FOOD CO., LTD., BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.

GOOD! IT'S MASON'S

A 6d. BOTTLE of

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Makes 8 Gallons of the Finest Non-Intoxicating

HERB BEER.

There is no thirst-quencher in the world to equal it. Most Palatable, Refreshing, Delicious, and Healthful. Enjoyed by abstainers and non-abstainers alike.

Imitated but not Equalled. Of all Chemists & Stores.

Also try { MASON'S WINE ESSENCE and MASON'S COFFEE ESSENCE.

Sample bottle of either of above POST FREE for 9d. Two assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three assorted, 1s. 8d.

AGENTS WANTED:—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

SOLD EVERYWHERE, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s.

Ornbridge's

LUNG TONIC, THE WORLD'S CURE

FOR COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, &c. &c.

Hovis

Trade Mark

Bread

has the charm of a very pleasing flavour besides those nutritious and digestive properties that make it so valuable a part of the daily diet.

Most Family Bakers make Hovis daily. If not known, local agents' addresses will be sent on request. HOVIS LTD., Macclesfield. Be sure that the loaf is stamped HOVIS.

2-2

Ladies Travelling and for Home Use.

6d., 1/-, 1/4 & 2/- per doz.

HARTMANN'S

HYGIENIO

TOWELETTES

Obtainable at less than the cost of washing from all Drapers and Chemists. Superior to any other Sanitary Towels.

HARTMANN'S SANITARY SHEETS for Accouchement, 24 x 18 in., 1s.; 26 x 20 in., 1s. 6d.; 32 x 32 in., 2s. 6d. each.

Hartmann's Depot, 26, Thavies Inn, London, E.C.

TO THE DEAF

It you suffer from Deafness or Head Noises, and desire a complete and permanent cure, write at once to Prof. G. Keith-Harvey, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, for pamphlet fully describing an entirely new self-applied method, which he will send you gratis and post free on mentioning "Temple Magazine."

Miss M. A. Hall, 85, Tunstall Lane, Wigan, writes as follows: "I can now hear as well as ever I could, and I am improving every day."

Digitized by Google

THE THREE GREAT SCOURGES,

ALCOHOL, MORPHINE, COCAINE.

The Hutton-Dixon Vegetable Antidote,

A HIGH-CLASS, UP-TO-DATE, PHYSICAL HOME CURE FOR

ALCOHOL and DRUG ADDICTIONS.

Also of great value in cases or Insomnia, Neurasthenia and Nerve Exhaustion. Can be carried in the Pocket and taken Privately—thus obviating the Publicity, Expense, and loss of time of an Institute treatment.

WARRANTED FREE FROM NARCOTICS.

Patronised by the Nobility and All Classes.

AN IDEAL HOME CURE.

This humane discovery has been publicly endorsed before the Congress of Bishops, and at Father Matthew's Anniversaries, also by Clergymen from their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in nearly every quarter of the Globe. Over Six Thousand Cases have been treated successfully.

In this treatment there are no hypodermic injections, it being a purely vegetable medicine taken by the mouth, can be carried in the pocket, and taken in perfect privacy at home or anywhere. In from one to three days, and often in as many hours, after commencing this treatment the desire or crave will have so completely disappeared that the victim would not give a penny for all the liquor or drugs in the country for his own use. Among the immediate effects of this treatment are calm, restful sleep, steady nerves, clear brain, increased appetite for food and pronounced benefit in every way physically and mentally, with a positive guarantee that there shall be only good after effects and a permanent removal of all appetite for intoxicating liquors or drugs of any kind, all of which is indorsed by scores of physicians, clergymen of every denomination, and men and women in all phases of life in many parts of the world. This is an absolutely harmless home treatment, and an up to date physical cure backed by and vouched for by testimonials unapproached by any other treatment for these habits.

Full particulars and indisputable testimony sent free in a plain sealed envelope. All correspondence strictly confidential.

N.B.—The Testimonials published in my circulars are unique, inasmuch as I print (by kind permission) the full names and addresses of the subscribers thereto, so that the genuineness of the certificates can easily be verified. Glowing letters of recommendation may readily be written and left unsigned, or signed with initials only, but what the public need now-a-days are the hard facts which cannot be denied or controverted, and these I furnish.

Address:—ALEX. H. DIXON, 5, Cannon Place, BRIGHTON, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO

KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

SEE SPECIAL OFFER AT FOOT OF PAGE.

KOKO

FOR THE HAIR

That KOKO is the best preparation for the Hair known is proved by the facts that it is used in every Palace in Europe, and that Royal personages never use a preparation of any kind unless it is recommended by the highest authority.

Photo from Life. The original, with other fine heads of hair, may be seen at 113, Regent Street, London, W.

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

is a tonic, cleansing, invigorating preparation, causes the hair to grow luxuriantly, keeps it soft and pliant, imparts to it the lustre and freshness of youth, eradicates dandruff, prevents hair from falling, is the most cleanly of all hair-preparations, and is perfectly harmless.

OLD PEOPLE LIKE IT

for its wonderful power to invigorate decayed hair, and induce an entire new growth when that is possible.

MIDDLE-AGED PEOPLE LIKE IT,

because it prevents them from getting bald, keeps dandruff away, and makes the hair grow thick and strong.

YOUNG LADIES LIKE IT

as a dressing, because it gives the hair a beautiful glossy lustre, ensures a luxuriant growth, and enables them to dress it and keep it in any style that may be desired.

CHILDREN LIKE IT, because it keeps the hair and scalp cool and clean, allays irritation, and keeps the hair in whatever position desired.

THEY ALL LIKE IT,

because it is as pure as crystal, perfectly colourless, contains no poisonous substance, no sugar of lead, sulphur, nitrate of silver, or grease, and does not soil or colour the scalp, face, or the most delicate fabric in clothing, produces a wonderfully pleasant and cooling effect on the head, and no other dressing is needed to give the hair the most beautiful appearance possible. Try it at once, and you will use no other.

IT CONTAINS NO COLOURING MATTER OR DYE.

SPECIAL OFFER to those who have not yet tried KOKO.

A 4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/-

T.M. COUPON Aug. 1/02

This entitles the holder to a 4/6 Bottle on the conditions stated above.

Koko Maricopas Limited

Any person forwarding this Coupon and P.O. for Two Shillings, and Four Stamps to pay postage, packing, &c., will receive immediately for trial, by Parcel Post, under cover, prepaid, One Regular 12-oz. Bottle of KOKO for the Hair, the price of which is 4/6, provided it is ordered within ten days from the date of this offer. In no case will more than one bottle be sent for the use of the same person on this Coupon, as we make the offer solely for trial, knowing that it creates a demand when once used; and this large bottle gives it a fair trial. We find it better to thus practically give away one bottle to make a customer than to spend large amounts in advertising. Any person into whose hands this offer comes may avail themselves of it. Address all orders with Coupons to—The KOKO-MARICOPAS CO., Ltd., 16, Bevis Marks, London.

Orders may be sent with this Coupon after the expiration of date, providing we are then issuing these trial bottle Coupons, and if we are not, the money will be returned. This Coupon will be received at 10, BEVIS MARKS, E.C., or 113, Regent Street, W., and 2/- only will be required when presented personally.

KOKO is sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., at 2/6 and 4/6 per bottle. For the sake of greater profit, you may be asked to buy some other hair preparation instead. In justice to yourself and to us, kindly insist on having KOKO.

KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO

KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO

Digitized by Google

A WONDERFUL INVENTION . .

for the

LAME.

As Supplied to the War Office for the Wounded from South Africa.

THE O'CONNOR EXTENSION CO.'S PATENT APPLIANCES

Enable those with Shortened Limbs and Weak Ankles to dispense with Unsightly Instruments, to Wear Ordinary Shoes, and to look like other people.

FLAT FOOT.

The New Patent . . . . Arch Support

CAN BE ADAPTED TO HELP ANY CASE OF FLAT FOOT.

A New Book on the Mechanical Treatment of Flat Foot will be sent FREE.

TENDER FEET.

The New . . . . Patent Socks

CAN BE MOULDED TO FIT THE SOLE OF ANY FOOT.

Describe the case, send a pair of old boots or shoes and 5/- A pair of Socks will be sent POST FREE. (United Kingdom).

GOLD MEDAL, LONDON; HIGHEST AWARDS, CHICAGO AND PARIS.

ADDRESS:

The O'Connor Extension Co.,

SURGICAL APPLIANCE MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT,

2, BLOOMSBURY STREET,

LONDON, W.C.

PAMPHLETS FREE on mentioning The Temple Magazine. Please give particulars of the case.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Edited by CHARLES HERBERT.

CONTENTS FOR AUGUST, 1902.

				PAGE
I.	Frontispiece
II.	Ancient Idols Worshipped by the Jews		Illustrated	925
III.	The White Lady of the Zenana. Serial Story. Chapters VII. and VIII. Illustrated by Fitzgerald.			929
IV.	The Swoop of the Enemy			943
V.	Peterson's Generosity. The Story of a Multi-Millionaire			944
VI.	"The Stag at Eve had Drunk his Fill"			948
VII.	The Cancer Curse		Illustrated	949
VIII.	"I Forbid the Banns!" A Story Founded on Fact			952
IX.	The Needle's Eye. New Serial Story.	Florence Kingsley	Illustrated	955
X.	Not Fiction			966
XI.	The Jester's Prayer			967
XII.	A Cynic's Repentance		Illustrated	968
XIII.	A Rustic Scene			971
XIV.	How the Germans took London.—(III.)	T. W. Offin, junr.	Illustrated	972
XV.	Cheshunt College: Past and Present	The Editor	Illustrated	980
XVI.	The Heirs of Rossmoyne	By Marian Isabel Hurrell	Illustrated	986
XVII.	Julius and Juliet: Or, A Cabinet Crisis			1003
XVIII.	In the Public Eye.		Illustrated	1007
XIX.	A Little Matchmaker	By Beth Bannester, B.A.	Illustrated	1010

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. The Editor will be obliged if, before sending any manuscript, a letter is sent him describing the purport of the article or enclosing a précis of the story. They must be addressed to MR. CHARLES HERBERT, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to THE MANAGER, 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. MATHER AND CROWTHER, BRIDEWELL PLACE, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

STORY COMPETITION COUPON.

Available for MSS. sent in up to August 23rd, 1902

See page 1008.

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

A SWEETMEAT AND A FOOD.

PETER'S THE ORIGINAL MILK-CHOCOLATE

NO IMITATION HAS THE CHARM AND DELICACY OF PETER'S

INSIST ON PETER'S

1d., 2d., 3d., 6d. & 1s. Sold Everywhere.
Sole Agents (trade only), S. J. MACKENZIE & Co., Ltd., London, N.E.

COOLS AND REFRESHES THE SKIN.

"BEETHAM'S Regd. Larola"

After exposure to the Sun or Wind. Removes and prevents all HEAT, SUNBURN, TAN, IRRITATION, etc., and during the Heat of Summer. Its effect will delight you! Bottles 6d., 1s., 2s. 6d. of all chemists.

Keeps the Skin Soft, Smooth, and White

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

BEST IN 1894.

THE

BEST NOW.

PALMER

TYRE

The ONLY HIGH GRADE TYRE

NOW ON THE MARKET.

For Durability, Palmer Tyres stand alone.

FULLY GUARANTEED.

Write for Manual containing 11 Sectional Road Maps and 1 Key Map of the British Isles.

The PALMER TYRE, Ltd.,

Dept. T.M., BIRMINGHAM.

These Tyres are manufactured under license from the North British Rubber Co., Ltd., under Bartlett's Patent.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Ancient Idols Worshipped by the Jews in the time of the Judges.

THE DISCOVERY OF MONSIEUR DURIGHELLO.

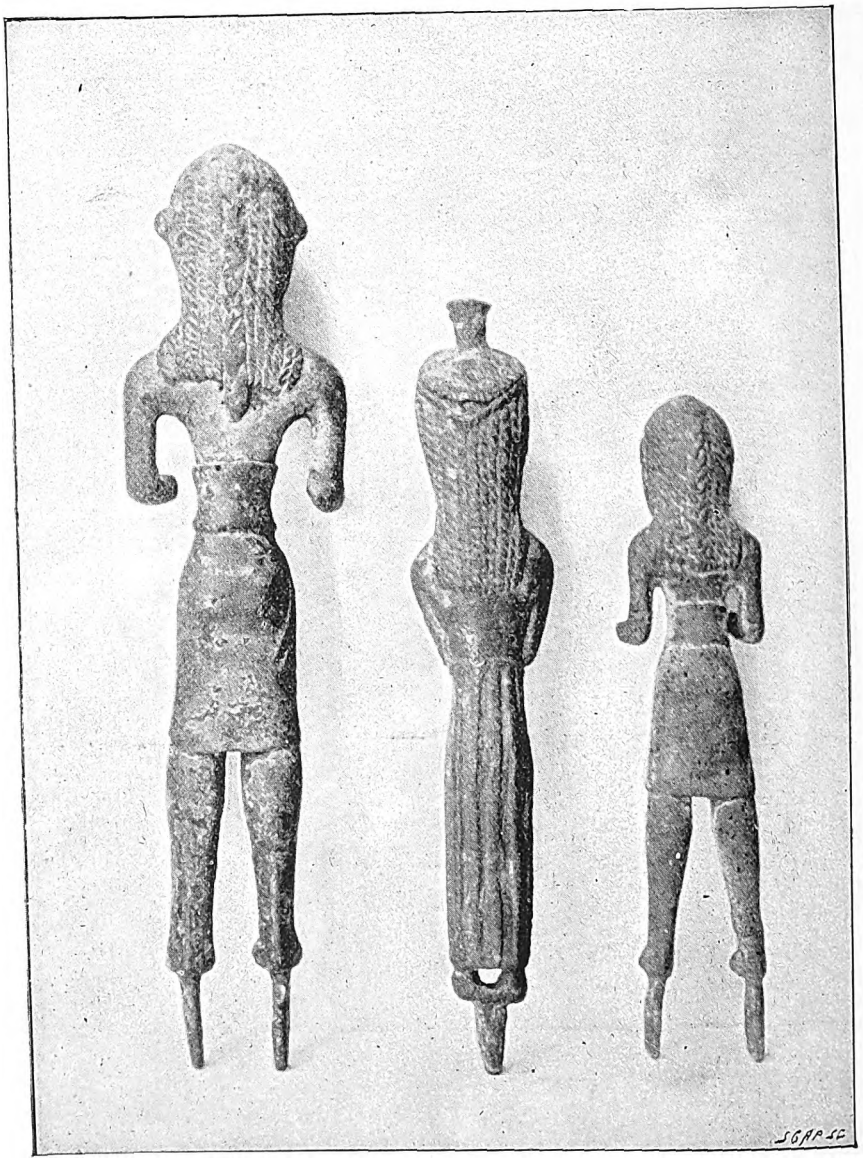
THE Guimet Museum in Paris has been enriched by a wonderful find of statuettes representing Jewish idols. The find was made by a Frenchman, M.

BAAL. ASTARTE. BAAL.

Digitized by Google

Durighello, at Dan, the ancient Laish of the Bible, and the statuettes which we here represent are those of Baal and Astarte. M. Durighello says: "For the last fifteen years I have noticed during my excursions digging in their neighbourhood, but I did not obtain any result.

"Having continued good intercourse with the inhabitants I endeavoured to instil some activity into their minds, which



BAAL. ASTARTE. BAAL.

VIEW OF BACK.

in the environs of Dake Houleh, near the tumulus of Tel-el-Kadi, not far from Baneas (Cesarea Philippi, source of the Jordan) ruins, the broken stones of which distinctly show the traces of conflagration. I tried to make further research by action on my part had the gratifying result that a chief of the district, continuing my excavation work, had the good fortune to find seven bronze statuettes of the greatest antiquity. I must here remark that according to the Bible the Hebrew tribe of Dan settled at Laish at the foot of the mountain of Baal-Hermon, and, after driving out the heathens, took the town of Lais, and called it Dan.

Digitized by Google

"Now the situation of Tel-el-Kadi is recognised by experts as that of Laish, called Dan by the six hundred Hebrews of this tribe, who settled in this district and brought with them the Levite priest from the mountain of Ephraim (Bethlehem), and also the bronze idols of Micah (see chapters seventeen and eighteen of the book of Judges, which I would recommend you to read most attentively). The question is, have we now before us those very idols? This I cannot affirm, but everything points to confirm my belief that they are the very same. I do not know of any statues which have such pure and Semitic features. No collection in the world has anything similar, and they are very different from those found

BAAL. ASTARTE. BAAL.

VIEW IN PROFILE.

Digitized by Google

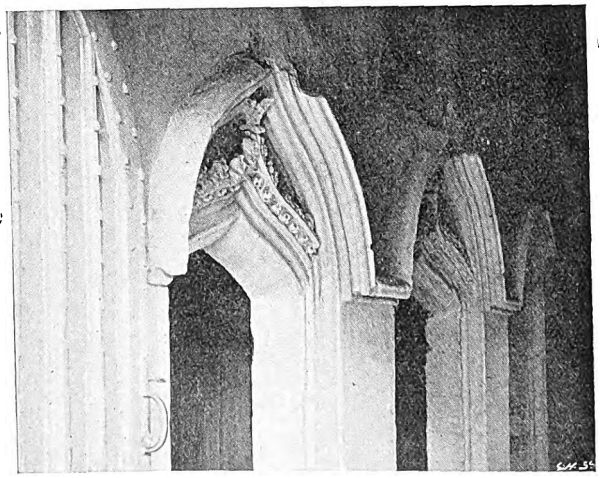
in Syria. These statuettes differ considerably from those heathen and Phœnician ones to be found in Syria, and several of which, belonging to me, may be seen in the Guimet and in other European museums. These idols are, I believe, the first and only Jewish statuettes which have by chance been found during any excavating work.

"That distinguished scholar, Colonel Fraser, who is quite of my opinion, has seen, in fact, in Egypt, a bust having the same features and arrangement of the hair, and the hieroglyphics graven thereon relate the history of a Hebrew king or priest.

"The description of the statuettes is as follows:—Their absolutely pure Semitic type indicates their origin. In the archaic style they are distinguished by interesting details from which precise deduction can be drawn. The hair is dressed according to the fashion of that remote time. Astarte's head bears an ornament like a sort of crown. The lower arms of the gods are at a right angle with the upper arm, signifying dominion. Astarte, on the contrary, has hers crossed, indicating humility or resignation. They must have rested on sockets fixed to their supports. The largest of the statuettes is thirty-seven centimetres high.

"Those who are only superficially acquainted with the history of Israel generally believe that the cult of the holy arch dominated over all others, and that with a few trifling exceptions this cult was the purest expression of monarchism.

"This is an error which has often been contradicted, and which Renan in his 'History of the People of Israel' has entirely refuted by citations."



FINE OLD DOORWAYS.

Digitized by Google

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Hazel, the heroine of this story, is an English girl, who having married Mahomed Ali, a Mahometan student, while he was in England, insists upon going out to join him, in utter ignorance of what it means to be incarcerated in the seclusion of the Zenana. When she finds it out, she is dominated with one idea —that of escape, and at the end of Chapter II. she has climbed into a tree to reconnoitre the surroundings outside the walls, but is surprised by her husband. After this, although he apparently takes no notice, he pretends to depart on urgent and mysterious journeys, during which time Hazel grows more familiar with the true inwardness of Zenana life, and is more disgusted with it. One of the slave girls, Taj Bee, won by Hazel's kindness, promises to assist her to escape, and her determination to do so is increased by hearing that her father-in-law wishes her husband to bring home Aziz Unissa, the daughter of Sultan Mirza Khan, to be his second wife. While she is musing, devoured with indignation, Taj Bee comes to her and whispers, "I have found a way of escape!" The plan when unfolded by the girl turns out to be a suggestion that as lady visitors come to see the Begum they are in the habit of bringing many strange servants with them, who, when they go away are preceded by one crying, "Gosha! Gosha!" and therefore it will be easy for Hazel, by dressing in servant's garb, provided by the girl, to mix in the servants' waiting-room and leave with them. This they try, but the slave girl herself is hindered and captured, and Hazel, who might have got away, returns for the girl's sake. Afterwards Hazel has impotently to witness the slave girl's terrible punishment, who is blinded by Eastern tortures. Hazel is not discouraged in her determination to escape, but decides next time she ventures to venture alone. Meanwhile she asserts herself in the Zenana, and finds her quick wit and ready sympathies easily win her a first place, both with the Nabob and the Begum. The scenes in the last chapter are mainly devoted to life in the Harem.

CHAPTER VII.

HAZEL'S operations in the garden went on vigorously. Though in the first instance they had been designed solely with a view to the harrying of the Begum, they really amused and interested Hazel in this time of enforced retirement. She had her favourite rocking chair brought down into the garden, and she sat there, watching and directing her women; often moved, despite the sadness at her heart, to much laughter by their awkwardness in their entirely new avocation of gardeners.

"Sultan Mirza Kahn Bahadur has returned from Bombay," Gouse Bee remarked one day, pausing to wipe her streaming brow after having assisted three of her companions to wreck and destroy a fine young croton in an unskilful attempt to uproot it. "I met two of the servants in the bazaar this morning."

"I am glad to hear it," Hazel answered, "although I have not the pleasure of the gentleman's acquaintance, and I was not aware he was away from home, if Madras is his home."

"He has been in Bombay a month," Gouse Bee added, "and he has brought his daughter, Aziz Unissa Begum back with him."

Digitized by Google

"A most fatherly and meritorious action," said Hazel, simulating a greater interest than she really felt in this account of the doings of an unknown stranger, but she had taken kindly to the zenana custom of encouraging every sort of gossip from the servants; one could never tell when even their idle talk might reveal something it was useful to know.

"Aziz Unissa Begum went to Bombay to buy new dresses," said Katheeja Bee, with such a marked significance that Hazel suddenly remembered certain rumours she had heard about Aziz Unissa Begum and had since forgotten.

"I suppose that means that you are all dying to go and see the dresses," Hazel said, without any change in her languidly interested manner.

"If you will give us leave, Hazoor," chorussed the women.

"Yes, I will give you leave. Not now, of course, but to-morrow morning three of you can go, Gouse Bee and Katheeja Bee and Zairah Bee, and you other two in the evening. And mind, Zairah Bee, that you look well at the embroideries and remember the new patterns. I want something pretty for the silver embroidering on my new pale blue satin suit. I shall have both the skirt and the bodice much embroidered. They have very pretty designs in Bombay, I know. I think I shall send there for a rose-coloured veil; it will look pretty over that pale blue."

The women went on with their work, uncertain whether Hazel had fully grasped the meaning they meant to convey by their news of Aziz Unissa Begum, but not daring to say anything further without encouragement.

Mahomed Ali came strolling out presently, as he frequently did in the hot afternoons, when the green shade of the garden was pleasant. Hazel received him with her usual smile of welcome, and he threw himself on the ground at her feet.

"I have just heard," said Hazel, "that Aziz Unissa Begum has returned to Madras. Is not she the young lady you wished me to receive as a guest some little time ago?"

"You have a very good memory, my dearest," said Mahomed Ali; "it is the same young lady." And Hazel noticed that his eyes became suddenly bloodshot, which is the native manner of blushing.

"And do you still wish her to pay a visit to your zenana?" asked Hazel, pleasantly.

Mahomed Ali looked at her with the dumb pain of a wounded animal in his dark eyes. "You know that I am not the master in this house," he said, gently; "and you know, too, that our customs are not as your customs. Of my own free will I would never do anything to vex you, but unfortunately you made an enemy of my father from the beginning; and his arm is long and he does not forget."

"Then it is really true, after all we have been to each other this last month, that you intend to bring another wife under the same roof with me?" said Hazel, her voice vibrating with suppressed passion. "It is a most cowardly thing to do, Ali, when you know how helpless I am, and that I shall have to go on living in this house and endure the insult you put upon me. I cannot go away and leave my place to that other woman, I have not even that resource to save my dignity."

"There is nothing in this arrangement to touch your dignity, Hazel," answered Mahomed Ali, who, to give him his due, was really unable to look at the matter from Hazel's standpoint. "You are, and will always remain, the first wife; and be assured, Pearl of my heart, that you will always reign alone in your husband's love."

"Bah!" said Hazel, contemptuously, "what is the use of talking to me in that way? You have lived in England. You know that the deadliest insult a husband can inflict on his wife is to bring another woman into her home, under her roof."

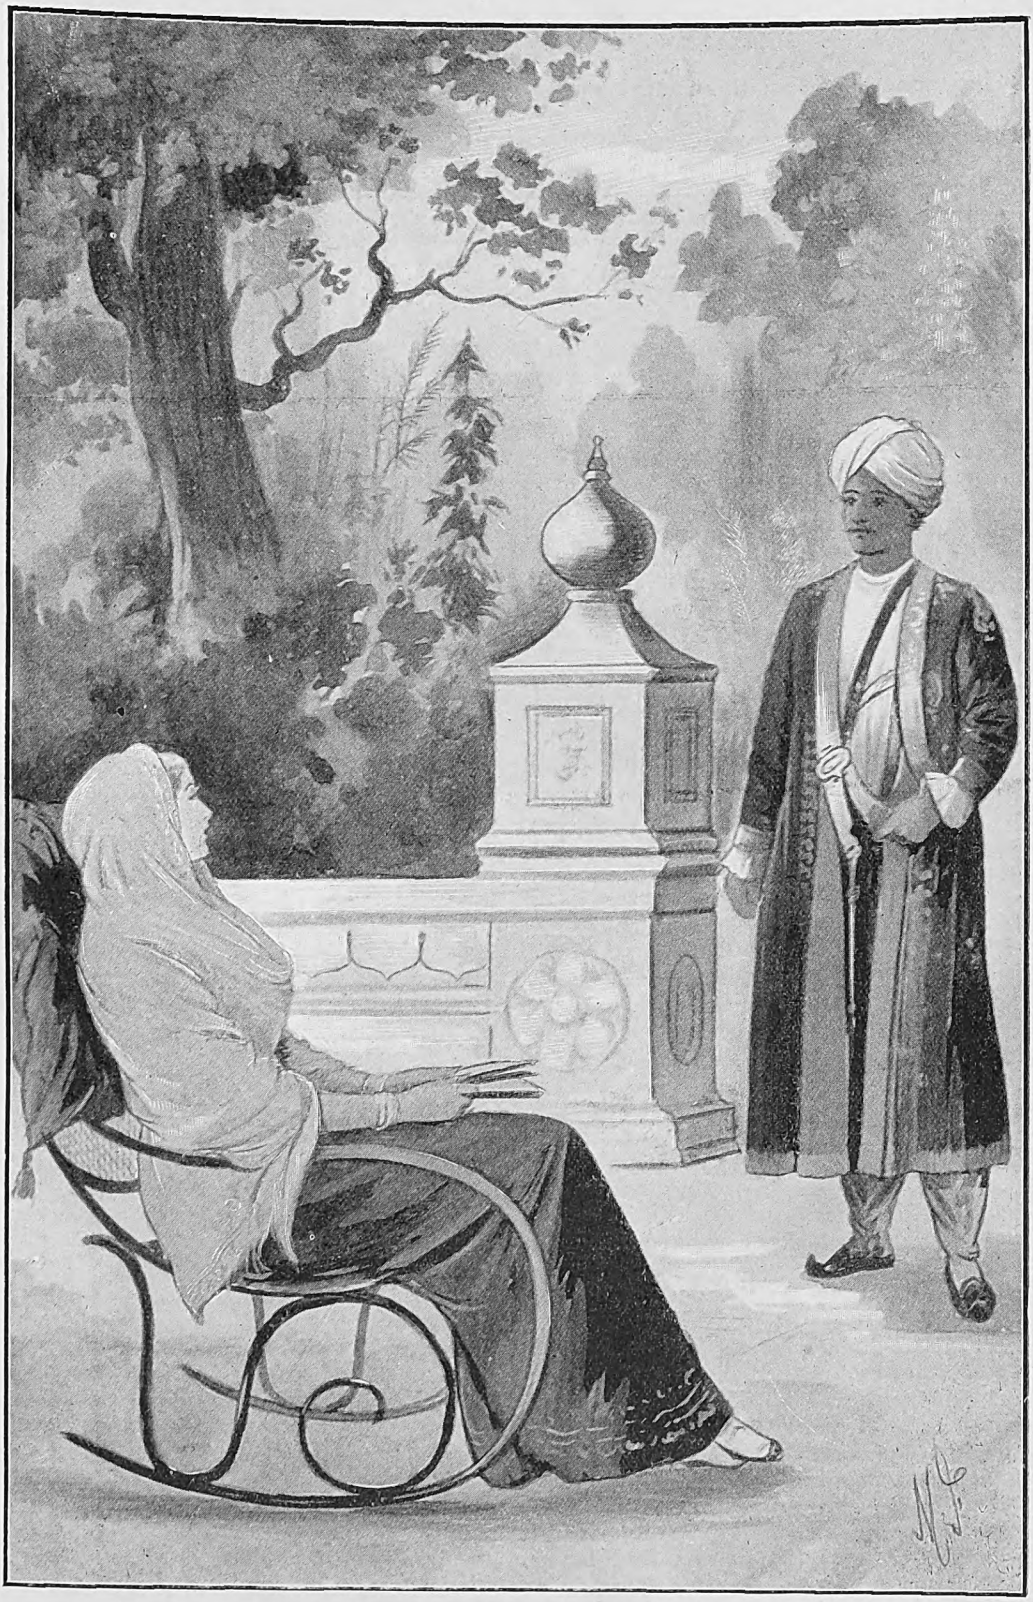
"But it is not so here, Hazel," he urged. "By my religion and my law I am allowed to have four wives. There is no dishonour either to you or to me in my bringing home another wife."

"You knew of this a month ago?" said Hazel suddenly. "It was really settled then?"

Mahomed Ali did not answer.

"And you have let me go on living in a fool's paradise! You have allowed me to believe you would take me home to England! Did you mean to bring her too? But the whole subject is too vile and horrible, I will not discuss it. Only

Digitized by Google



MOHAMMED ALI CAME STROLLING OUT.

Digitized by Google

understand this, from this hour I am no longer your wife. Do not dare ever again to intrude into my apartment; for if you do, since there seems no other way of escape, I will kill myself!"

"It shall be as you wish," said Mahomed Ali, rising up heavily from his place at her feet. "I would have made both our lives very different if I could, but since Allah has willed it thus, it is Kismet." And he walked away sadly and quietly out of the garden, knowing that he should enjoy its cool and pleasant greenness never any more.

Hazel watched him go, with a passion of impotent fury tearing at her heart. She had sworn not to remain under that roof for the coming of another woman, and she was here still, tied and bound, a most helpless prisoner, to whom escape was for ever denied.

"Coward!" she said to herself under her breath, "Coward!" Her hands were clenched and her teeth set, and if blind and raging hate could kill, Mahomed Ali had not gone alive out of that garden.

In the days that followed, Mahomed Ali made no effort to induce Hazel to withdraw her sentence of banishment. He seemed to accept it submissively, as he accepted the arrogant, domineering orders of the old Nabob, with a resigned fatalism that was the great weakness of his character.

"They say, the old ones, that Mahomed Sahib was kept too long in the zenana," Taj Bee once told Hazel. He was the Begum's first child; she had had great influence with the Nabob in his younger days, and he had permitted her to keep her young son over long by her side, in that atmosphere of subservience and tortuous, underhand dealing that pervades the zenana.

Day by day Hazel's women brought her the tidings of how Mahomed Ali went to sit at the feasts in the house of Sultan Mirza Kahn. And a week from the day on which she had driven him out of her presence in the garden, they told her that her husband was setting forth on his white horse, flower-crowned and veiled, to the house of his bride. Most of the servants and people about the house went that day to the great tomash of Aziz Unissa's wedding, and only the plea of ill-health excused the Begum from being of the party.

"To-morrow he will bring her home, Hazoor," said Zairah Bee, who was sitting at her mistress's feet, putting the finishing touches to the delicate silver embroidery on Hazel's pale blue satin jacket, which she had designed from one of the patterns the young bride had brought from Bombay.

"You can, all of you, go and see the tomash," said Hazel, kindly; "you are good and faithful servants to me, and I want you to listen now to my commands. When Aziz Unissa Begum comes to this house, she will perhaps ask some day, 'Can I see Hazari Begum? Can I go into her apartment?' Whenever she says that, you will answer always: 'Hazari Begum sleeps and her door is shut,' or 'Hazari Begum is taking her bath and cannot be disturbed"; and never, on any day, will you open my door to Aziz Unissa Begum. Now you can go."

And in the fulness of time Aziz Unissa Begum was brought to the house of her husband, to the room that had been Kair Unissa's. She brought her women with her; one elderly woman who had been her nurse, and half a dozen young girls like herself, the children of slaves in her father's zenana, who had grown up round her as she grew herself from childhood to womanhood. They had all heard much talk of Hazari Begum, Mahomed Ali's beautiful white wife, and Aziz Unissa had looked forward with very pleasant anticipations to sharing the zenana with her. That Hazel could possibly object to her as Mahomed Ali's wife had never entered into her calculations at all.

Aziz Unissa was a gentle and merry little creature, of small stature; with a soft round face and childish features; without any pretensions to beauty except in the large dark velvety eyes that are the heritage of almost every Mahometan woman.

A few days after her home-coming, she sent, as Hazel had foreseen, to ask if she might pay her respects to Hazari Begum. And Hazel's servants made excuses as they had been instructed to do. They did not altogether understand the situation, but it seemed to them in some vague manner to confer distinction on their own mistress that the well-dowered daughter of so great a man as Sultan Mirza Kahn should request admittance to her presence and be denied.

Hazel went no more into the garden, fearing to meet "the other woman." On

Digitized by Google

"TELL YOUR HUSBAND TO LET ME GO."

Digitized by Google

the terrace, many of the great flower pots stood empty, but in others the palms and crotons flourished and Hazel sat amongst them planning and plotting to escape as she had done in the early days before Taj Bee died. She went but seldom to her mother-in-law's apartments, and when she was there one or other of her women kept watch at the inner door, to warn her of Aziz Unissa Begum's coming. She had long ago ceased to stand on ceremony with the old Begum, and came into and went out of her presence without leave asked or given.

But one day Asha Bee, who was on guard, being young and giddy, was chattering with the little Begum's women, and let Aziz Unissa pass her unobserved, going into the Begum's room. When she saw Hazel seated there in the Nabob's chair of honour beside her mother-in-law's charpoy, she stopped suddenly, and then came forward eagerly, saluting Hazel with the respectful salaam only given from an inferior to a superior. Hazel rose, with a look of annoyance, but the open admiration and shy pleasure on the girl's baby face touched and softened her, and she sat down again, returning the other's salutation.

"Hazari Begum! Oh, my sister, this is a happy meeting!" said Aziz Unissa, gaily unconscious of any cause of offence.

"It is happy, if you find it so," said Hazel, distantly. She was wearing her pale blue satin skirt, with its little bodice open at the throat, both deeply embroidered with the finest silver embroidery and spangles in an intricate and exquisite design. Against the pale blue, her neck and arms and her beautiful face showed of a lily fairness, smooth and pure as the great pearls that clasped her slender throat; the rose-coloured saree from Bombay veiled her from head to foot like a luminous transparent cloud.

"They have, indeed, said truly that you are the Pearl of the zenana," said Aziz Unissa, to whom in that moment Hazel became as a goddess, to be worshipped then and for ever.

"Have I your leave to go?" said Hazel, turning in a perfunctory manner to the old Begum, slumbering on the charpoy.

"Let me come, too, please let me come!" begged the younger girl, "I have so wanted to see your apartment. They tell me you have made of it a very palace of delights.'

"Some other time," said Hazel, faintly. "Not to-day, I am not well."

"Ameeda Bee! Kursheed! some of you. She is ill, what can we do for her?" cried Aziz Unissa in real distress.

"No one can do anything for me," said Hazel in English, "unless, indeed, some merciful soul would put an end to my life in this horrible place."

In her own room she sent for Asha Bee, and, with a severity she had never shown before to any of her slaves, had her well whipped by the other women for her careless disobedience, she herself looking on the while with a vindictive pleasure of which a month ago she could not have believed herself capable.

Aziz Unissa sent her own head woman to ask if Hazel were better.

When Gouse Bee, who opened the door, saw who it was, she slapped her in the face furiously: "Begone!" she cried. "Do you want to destroy us all? Your Begum of misfortune has done harm enough for one day." And she slammed the door in the woman's face. They were all a little upset in the zenana that day.

The woman went, holding her face and crying, to her mistress, who was still in the Begum's room.

"What can I do?" said Aziz Unissa. "I must make excuse to the beautiful Pearl. I would not vex her for a handful of diamonds. Shall I go myself?"

"Don't send again to that sheitan," murmured the old Begum, "unless you want her to come back here and kill us all." But in her heart the old lady was glad to think that now the war would be carried on between the two young ones, and she would be left in peace.

"What would you advise me to do?" asked Aziz Unissa, almost in tears.

"You have leave to go," said the Begum, rudely; she had no idea of being harried and worried for advice by a chit like Aziz Unissa; and that young lady's attendants persuaded her to retire to her own quarters.

"I wish Mahomed Ali came to see me sometimes," said Aziz Unissa; "I could ask him what to do, and why Hazari Begum seems angry."

But Mahomed Ali never came upstairs now, and the slaves had ceased to report his movements to Hazel.

And Hazel, sitting in her rocking-chair, reading novels on the terrace, pined for the garden. It was very hot just then in

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Madras. The other white women had all gone away to the hills; Hazel never saw their carriages now driving along the road beyond the paddy fields, at morning and evening.

"I am sure it is much cooler down there," she said fretfully to her women, "I can see the leaves waving, there must be a breeze. Go down there, one of you, and see if it is cooler, and if there is anyone in the garden."

There was one deep, deep, green, shady nook beyond the lawn, that she could see from the terrace, that seemed to be always wooing her to its cool darkness; there was a seat there, she remembered, and she had sat there once with Ali.

"It is very cool there, and the breeze blows, and there is no one in all the garden, Hazoor," said Fatima Bee, returning from her reconnaissance. "No one ever walks in the garden, and I think the little Begum has never seen it."

This was many days since Hazel's skirmish with the little Begum. She had not been to see her mother-in-law since that untoward meeting in her room.

"I will go down. I am suffocated up here," she said.

They carried down her rocking chair, and she rested in that nook, where there really was a breeze and a cool rustling of leaves, and where the greenness rested eyes that were wearied with the glare of the eternally blue skies.

Now, one of Aziz Unissa's women, with officious alacrity, ran to inform her mistress that Hazari Begum was taking the air in the garden.

"Is there any other way into the garden, except by Hazari Begum's terrace?" asked Aziz Unissa, alert in a moment.

There was only the door in the lower passage, through which Mahomed Ali had taken his wife, that evening, so long ago, that she had first attempted to escape.

Aziz Unissa sent a woman to cry "Gosha! Gosha!" on the stairs and in the passage, that no man might see her pass. She was always very correct in the etiquette of the zenana.

"If she puts her nose into the garden, that white sheitan will bite it off," said the Begum, chuckling. Somehow, the old lady did not care for Aziz Unissa. In spite of all her tormenting, Hazel was her favourite. And perhaps she alone of all the women in the zenana understood something of what Hazel suffered when her husband brought home another wife. For she herself had loved the Nabob very dearly in her youth.

And so it befell that, as Hazel sat rocking in her chair, dreaming she was rocking on the steamer that was taking her home to England, she became aware of voices near her.

"Hazari Begum, let me speak to you," said Aziz Unissa.

"I shall kill you some day, if you will not let me alone," said Hazel between clenched teeth. But she spoke in English, and the other did not understand.

"I am very unhappy, because in some way I have offended you," the soft voice went on. "Tell me, oh beautiful Pearl, in what I have angered you that you will not let us live together as sisters—we who are both wives of one lord."

Hazel gathered herself together: "I will speak to you this once," said she, "and you had better understand me once for all. In my country a man marries only one wife; and if another woman comes into his house, calling herself his wife, she is no wife, she is as the shameless ones of the bazaar, and people spit upon her, and no one speaks to her, and the true wife goes away out of the house that she may not be defiled by that shame. You are to me as those evil women in the bazaar who have no husband, and who take the husbands of other women to be their lovers. You have come here and taken my husband, Mahomed Ali. Be satisfied with that, and do not talk to me of living as sisters with such a creature as you are." The reading aloud, which Kair Unissa Begum had delighted in, had furnished Hazel with many choice epithets by means of which she made her meaning abundantly clear to the rival standing before her.

Aziz Unissa listened, appalled, to this exposition of Hazel's views, and when she had finished she began to cry, sobbing like a child who has met with a rebuff where she expected caresses.

"I am very sorry, Hazari Begum," she said humbly, "I did not know. I never thought you would be angry. My father gave me to Mahomed Ali. He did not ask me anything, and no one told me that you would be angry when he brought me home. I do not want Mahomed Ali, I would rather be your sister than his wife. Tell him not to come to my chamber. Let me be as a stranger to him, I shall not mind, but let me come and live with you. And indeed, Hazari Begum, I have not seen him these many days."

Digitized by Google

"I cannot be friends with you! I will not be friends with you!" said Hazel violently. "It is monstrous that you should ask me. Go away, and leave me to myself. If I could I would go away myself. But I cannot! I cannot! I have tried, but they hold me fast; I am chained! I cannot get away." As she spoke she rose out of her chair and began to walk backwards and forwards in uncontrollable agitation. "Tell your husband to let me go! I am nothing here but a most unhappy prisoner. There are other reasons, too. I will not stay here!" her voice sank to a whisper as she said again, "I will not stay here!" Then suddenly her passion seemed to fall from her, and she became strangely calm. She sat down again in her rocking chair. "You had better go," she said coldly. "Perhaps I have been too harsh to you. It is not your fault. I do not blame you. But if you will do me a kindness let me never see your face again."

And the other girl, swept out far beyond her depth by the torrent of Hazel's passion, was glad to make her escape.

When she was left to herself again Hazel blew her whistle to call one of the women.

"Go and see if Mahomed Sahib is in the house," she said. "I wish to speak to him at once. I will have it out with him now," she added to herself. "He shall make his father send me home. I will promise all the secrecy they like. No one shall ever know anything of what I have seen here, but stay in this place I will not. I will see the Nabob himself. I believe one could make him hear reason better than Ali, after all."

But the woman came back to say that Mahomed Sahib had gone up to Mysore for the feast of the Dussurah with two of his brothers, and would not be back for some days.

And Hazel, again baffled, went indoors dispirited, and wandered aimlessly into her mother-in-law's room. The Begum knew that something had happened. Aziz Unissa had passed through her room in a whirlwind of tears, but all her attendants could tell the old lady was that the little Begum had gone to speak to Hazari Begum in the garden, and they believed the white sheitan had tried to strangle her.

When Hazel came in, the Begum sent away all her women.

"Has that baby been troubling you, Hazari?" she asked. There was a curious note of sympathy in her voice that touched Hazel's heart and melted her hardness; hearing it, she bowed her forlorn young head on her hands, and burst into a passion of tears.

The Begum put out her hand and stroked the bowed head with a caressing gesture that Hazel had never seen her use even to her own daughter. She slipped down on her knees by the old charpoy, and the Begum, who had borne sons and daughters and had a mother's heart hidden away somewhere under her drug-bought dreams, put her arm round her and drew the fair head to her breast. "Listen to me, my child," she said, "you take things too hard. I am old and I have seen many things. In the zenana we must have patience, for we are helpless, and when we try to fight we only beat ourselves to pieces against a fate that is stronger than we are. Why should you trouble your heart about that fool girl? Mahomed will never love her, but you will be always beautiful in his sight. What matters a thousand women under his roof, if you only are in his heart? It may be there are other customs in your country; I have heard it is so. But I think Allah has made the hearts of men alike in every country. Men are weak creatures, my child, and they will always make the hearts of the women who love them to suffer. But we cannot change them. They tell me you will not let Mahomed come now into your presence. That is not wise. His love is the best thing you have; do not throw it away. And by-and-by when the little babies come, they will comfort you. That is the same for all women of any country, Hazari. Allah sends the little babies to heal the wounds in the hearts of women who suffer."

And then Hazel whispered to her the secret that she had meant to tell Mahomed Ali. But she did not tell her that she could not bear the thought that her baby should be born in the zenana, for that, the Begum, old as she might be and motherly, could never have understood.

"Then that will be your comfort," said the Begum, "and your husband will be glad and Aziz Unissa will be as a stuffed doll in the zenana, whom no one heeds."

Digitized by Google

"But it is all so wrong and wicked," said Hazel.

"You are not doing any wrong. And Mahomed does nothing against his religion. Where is the wrong? Only I think it is not wise for a woman of one faith to be the wife of a man of another faith. But we cannot change that now. You are young my child; learn patience, and let the things go past you that you cannot help."

And Hazel, leaning there by the old charpoy, was comforted and took up the burden of her life again and the hope that one day she would be able to escape.

And the Begum took more opium and went back into her land of dreams.

CHAPTER VIII.

Some days later, Hazel sat in the Begum's room. She came there now very often. Though the Begum did not refer again to their conversation, Hazel had a certain feeling of consolation in sitting there beside her, with that silent sympathy between them.

Suddenly there was a movement and bustle among the women, and then a dead silence. Hazel, who was reading a most interesting detective story, from which it seemed to her she might get some really valuable hints on her next plan of escape, took no notice, till one of the women came up and interrupted her.

"Hazoor, I hear them saying downstairs that Mahomed Sahib has returned," she announced.

"I am glad to hear it," said Hazel, without looking up from her book; "I hope he is well."

"There was an accident on the big railway to-day, Hazoor," said Fatima Bee, joining in.

"Was there?" said Hazel.

"They are telling downstairs that it was the train coming from Mysore, your honour," said Fatima Bee.

"You're a chattering magpie," said Hazel, in English, which Fatima Bee took to be words of encouragement, and went on boldly.

"It was a very bad accident, Hazoor, many people have been hurt. Mahomed Sahib was in that train, coming from Mysore; he, too, is hurt, Bibi Sahib."

"What!" cried Hazel, starting up, and dropping her book, as the meaning of all this talk began to strike upon her brain. "What is that you say about Mahomed Sahib?"

"They have brought him home; he is much hurt, Hazoor, and all the time he calls for Hazari Begum, and the Nabob said 'Go, bring Hazari Begum.'"

"Where is he?" asked Hazel.

"He is downstairs, in the men's apartments, Hazoor. I will show you the way. The English Doctor Sahib has seen him; he was there very long."

"Don't say a word to the Begum Sahib till I come back," said Hazel, as she left the room in haste, following Fatima Bee.

The Begum was asleep, and had heard nothing.

At the door of the great room below, the Nabob was waiting for her; his handsome dark face was the colour of ashes, and his proud eyes dull and troubled. He put his hand on Hazel's shoulder, and she felt that it trembled. "He is very bad, very bad," he said; "have they told you?"

"Is he dead?" whispered Hazel.

"No, no. He is calling all the time for you. Come, I will take you in to him."

"Nabob Sahib," she said earnestly, "go up and tell his mother. She is asleep, do not let her hear it from the chattering of the women."

"Presently," said the Nabob, "presently; I cannot go now."

"Go now at once and tell her yourself," said Hazel imperiously, "or the women will wake her and frighten her. She must not hear of it from anyone but you."

And under that strenuous pressure, he went.

Hazel crossed the great room, which was empty, to a smaller chamber at the side that opened out of it. On a low charpoy in the darkened room a helpless figure lay prone.

"Hazel," moaned the figure, "Hazel," and again, "Hazel."

"I am here, my dearest, I am here," she answered, bending over him.

"Is that you, Hazel?"

"Yes, dear heart, it is Hazel."

"Come nearer; put your arm round me; I cannot move," he said faintly.

And Hazel, kneeling down, took his head upon her breast and kissed his forehead softly

Digitized by Google

"LEAN ON ME, DEAREST MOTHER."

Digitized by Google

"My wife! my dearest!" he said. "I am hurt unto death, Hazel Will you forgive me now, and stay with me?"

"I do forgive you, my dear. I will stay with you and nurse you, and you will get well. Oh, my dear! my dear! I have been hard and unkind; forget it now. You shall not die. I will nurse you, I will save you."

"No one can save me now, dear," he answered, "I suppose they told you I was in that railway accident coming from Mysore. I heard the doctors talking, I suppose they forgot I could understand. My back is broken, and I shall never get off this bed again. I am sorry, for your sake, Hazel; it will be harder for you, I am afraid, when I am not here. I did you a great wrong in marrying you, and letting you come out here, I see that now. I have spoilt your life, my poor beautiful Hazel." He moved his head restlessly upon her shoulder, and sighed.

"Never mind, dear heart, we won't talk of that now," she said, with a brave attempt to speak cheerfully. "I must see the doctor, and find out from him what ought to be done for you. Perhaps you ought to have a proper trained nurse; I don't know much about nursing, I am sorry to say, but I will stay with you. Of course I will stay with you."

She would not be allowed to see the doctor, as Mahomed Ali knew well enough, but he was too tired and ill to discuss that question with her now, so he only sighed again and closed his eyes, and presently fell asleep on Hazel's shoulder.

Upstairs the Nabob was doing his best to perform the difficult task that Hazel had set him. The Begum was long before she could understand; railways and trains and accidents, and all such stirring incidents of the active life of men were entirely outside her experience. When at last she did understand the magnitude of the calamity that had fallen upon her, her first words so surprised the Nabob that he thought the shock must have turned her brain.

"Where is my daughter Hazari?" she said, "I want my daughter Hazari."

And when Hazel came to her, she repaid the old Begum for her kindness and sympathy a thousandfold, and was to her in very truth a daughter.

"I must see my son before he dies," she said, turning helplessly to Hazel. The blow seemed to have changed her, in one hour, from middle age into quite an old woman, very helpless and dependent.

"You shall see him, dear," said Hazel.

And when she got up painfully from her couch, for that long journey downstairs, which she had not taken for many years, it was Hazel's ready, strong, young arm that helped her. "Lean on me, dearest mother," she said; "I will not let you fall."

They got her down to the lower room where all the venetians were shut and securely fastened; and Hazel made them bring down her charpoy and her cushions and her opium box.

"We shall stay here," she said decidedly, "until Mahomed Sahib is better," but to her own heart she said sadly "as long as my poor Ali lives."

The Nabob came to them there and told them that his son slept and must not be disturbed, but Kursheed, who was with him, would tell them when he awakened. He watched Hazel as she settled the Begum on her charpoy, with helpful tenderness, and he said to himself that surely the ways of that beautiful sheitan were past finding out, but since the Begum seemed to find comfort in her ministrations he did not interfere.

When Kursheed called them, the two women went in together, leaning on each other to see poor broken Mahomed Ali. The old Begum took on a strange new dignity by this deathbed of her first-born son; there was none of the crying and lamentation and beating of the breast that are the custom among the women of her race.

Hazel left her with him and went back into the outer room to ask when the doctor would return, as she wished to speak to him.

"The doctor sahib came again while you were waiting, Hazoor. It was for that you could not go in before to Mahomed Sahib," said Gouse Bee, surprised at Hazel's unheard of desire to speak with the strange man. "He is gone now, and will not return again till to-morrow. He has told Kursheed what to do for my lord. Kursheed is a very good nurse, Hazoor, and also the little assistant doctor sahib will come every morning and evening. The English doctors are very wise men, Hazari Begum, but they cannot make the dead to live."

Digitized by Google

"THEN THERE IS NO HOPE."

Digitized by Google

"But I said I wanted to see the doctor," said Hazel, cutting her short. "I told the Nabob himself to be sure and send word to me when he came. I am going to nurse my husband myself. He wishes it. And, pray, how can Kursheed understand the doctor sahib's orders? Has she learnt to speak English since this morning? Where is the Nabob Sahib?"

"He is coming in at the door even now," answered Gouse Bee, retiring discreetly.

"Is it true, my lord, that the doctor has been and I was never told?" asked Hazel, bearding her father-in-law as he entered.

"Were you not told?" said the Nabob suavely. "The servants are very neglectful; they should have told you. But now the doctor sahib is gone, and I think he will not come again to-night." And Hazel understood that her father-in-law would never allow her to have speech of the doctor.

"What did he say?" she asked, her anxiety getting the upper hand of her anger.

"What do I know?" answered the Nabob despondently. "If it is the will of Allah that he should die, he will die. He said, 'Keep him very quiet; do not let his mind be troubled. His sufferings will not be great.'"

"Then there is no hope?" she said, looking up, with the slow tears of a profound emotion dimming her grey eyes.

The Nabob did not answer.

The Begum slept that night in the lower room; going once or twice into the inner chamber to look at her son, lying asleep, with his wife sitting beside him, ready with gentle words and soothing ministrations when he woke, troubled and restless.

And in all this, no one ever once thought of the other wife, Aziz Unissa Begum.

In the early morning Kursheed came in and roused Hazel from an uneasy slumber into which she had fallen for very weariness.

"The doctor sahib is here, Hazoor," she said, "he is waiting to come in and see my lord."

"Oh, ask him to come in then. Why do you keep him waiting?" said Hazel, quickly.

"Hazoor, I dare not," said the old woman. "The Nabob waits with him in the verandah. He will not let him come in while you are here. And the doctor sahib is very impatient, he says he cannot wait. And he will perhaps go away again without seeing my lord."

"You had better go into the next room, Hazel," said Mahomed Ali fretfully. "What is the use of keeping the doctor waiting?"

And Hazel, fearing to make a scene in the sick man's chamber, went out with head bowed, and left him.

Peeping through the venetians, she saw the doctor come in from the verandah, followed by the Nabob. She heard his stumbling directions to Kursheed in his halting Hindustani, and she saw that Kursheed, answering glibly: "Yes, your highness," and, "It shall be as your honour says," every time the doctor hesitated for a word, really understood very little indeed of his instructions. She would have liked to call to him through the venetians, that she was there and could understand English, if he would give her his directions.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE SWOOP OF THE ENEMY.

Digitized by Google

Peterson's Generosity.

THE STORY OF A MULTI-MILLIONAIRE.

HUGO PETERSON was in a difficulty. The condition was not an unusual one with him: he had been in many difficulties, but never in one which caused him so much anxious thought.

It was not that he did not know what to do. He knew perfectly well, but his trouble was that he was anxious to find a reason why he should not do it. For the time being sentiment and judgment were antagonistic.

And the most annoying feature about the whole thing was that the amount involved was only £10,000. If it had been as many millions there would have been excuse for his worry. But £10,000! It was a mere drop in the bucket to the owner of £40,000,000.

For, roughly speaking, that was the extent of Peterson's fortune — the remaining extent. He had already given away £20,000,000 in charity. He had endowed colleges, built churches and libraries, and generally had scattered money freely among those he believed were in need of it.

He had indeed been so ready to write out cheques that a great many people had got the idea into their heads that if they wanted money, all they had to do was to ask for it—an idea which had remained until they had put the matter to a test. Then they had discovered that Peterson's generosity was tempered with discrimination.

As a matter of fact, the millionaire had never given a penny without first satisfying himself that he would be justified in giving it. And that was his difficulty now. Would he be justified in giving £10,000 to a young woman who refused to state for what purpose the money was needed?

Sitting before the fire in his comfortable library he asked himself the question for the hundredth time, and for the hundredth time a frown crossed his face when his judgment promptly answered the question in the negative.

The frown remained for a moment or two, but it faded away when he gave himself up to the enjoyment of contemplating the mental picture which invariably accompanied his attempts to dispose of the question.

It was the picture of a neat little woman with auburn hair, a delicately-moulded face, a sweet mouth, and beautiful grey eyes in which joy and sadness seemed to struggle for the tenancy.

It was the eyes which Peterson studied most, both in the original and in the mental picture. Why should sadness seek to lurk in them?

Generally, when he came to that question, Peterson banished the picture and postponed further consideration of the advisability of granting or refusing the £10,000. But to-night he steeled himself to face the question, and the lines round his mouth tightened when he found the answer. There would be no sadness in Ella Darrell's eyes if he told her that he had decided to give her the £10,000.

"Bah!" he reflected, presently. "Why not stretch a point and give her the money without finding out whether the purpose for which she wants it is a deserving one or not?"

Sentiment was pulling very strongly to-night.

"Better to do that and gain peace of mind," he continued aloud, "than to go on this way. When she receives the cheque she will pass out of my life and—and——"

Peterson never finished that remark. He sprang up from his chair, and gazed round the room with a strange expression on his strong face. It was such an expression as comes over the face of a man who has seen something which terrifies him.

Digitized by Google

Presently he sat down again and lit a cigar. His fingers trembled slightly as he did so, but except for the unsteadiness and the want of colour in his face no one could have told that he had just passed through the most momentous time of his life.

Hugo Peterson was in love.

The discovery changed the complexion of his thoughts. He knew now why judgment had failed in the struggle with sentiment. And he knew also that the struggle was a thing of the past. The matter had been settled for him. There was no longer any question as to whether he ought to give £10,000 to Ella Darrell. He loved her, and his whole fortune was at her disposal.

The knowledge that he was in love had come as a great shock to him; nevertheless, it was with a sense of relief that he got up and went over to the table to write a note to the woman he loved, making an appointment for the following day.

When she was shown into his room it struck him that she looked paler than she had done at any other time. There were dark rings under her eyes, too, which he did not like to see. They told of worry, and he would have kept her from that always.

He was so much engrossed in a study of her face that he quite forgot to speak; and she was at last compelled to break the silence which had followed her entry into the room.

"You asked me to call again," she said.

Her voice awoke him to a sense of his duty.

"I beg your pardon!" he exclaimed. "Yes; I asked you to call."

Then there was another silence. She waited to hear what he had to say to her, and he hesitated, because he hardly knew how to begin. He had seen her only half a dozen times.

"I asked you to call again," he continued slowly, "but it was not about your request that I wanted to see you."

"Not about ——." She began to speak before she had realised what his words meant; but when the realisation came to her the sentence died on her lips.

"Not about the £10,000," he said, and his voice was soft and tender. "Miss Darrell—all the money I have is at your disposal."

He had approached close to her while speaking, but she drew back with a cry of alarm.

"I don't—understand," she faltered. "You mean——"

"I mean that I love you," he said, and then the words came freely. "I think I have loved you ever since the first day I saw you. I love you with all my heart and soul. Miss Darrell—Ella, I ask you to be my wife. God knows that——"

"Oh stop!" she cried, suddenly finding her voice. "Please stop! I——" She covered her face with her hands, and was silent.

Peterson stood looking at her for some moments.

"I know that I must have startled you," he continued gently; and I'm sorry. Please don't think that I expect you to give me an answer just now. I want you to consider the matter and—and to take plenty of time. Then, afterwards, you will let me know whether—whether——"

A sound like a sob interrupted him, but she had not removed her hands from her face, and he was not sure whether he had heard aright.

"I have considered that other matter for two months," he continued presently in a tone of regret, "so don't think that I shall be impatient if you take a long time to make up your mind. I want you to try to love me. Will you—dear?"

She took down her hands suddenly and met his gaze, and he saw that her eyes were wet.

"Ah! I have hurt you," he exclaimed. "Please forgive me. I should have warned you before I——"

"No, no!" she cried, and her voice was broken. "It is—you are so kind, but——"

"Don't say anything just now," he interrupted kindly. "Afterwards——"

"I—I thought when you wrote to me that you had changed your mind," she said. "I wouldn't have come if——"

"When I wrote I was wondering how I could summon up my courage to tell you that I loved you," he said. "I knew- ——"

The hopeless expression on her face cut him short. Sadness had gained full possession of her eyes.

"Would it be so difficult to learn to love me?" he asked gently. "I love you very dearly, so dearly that I would gladly give my life for you. Won't you try?"

Digitized by Google

He took both her hands in his, and lifting one of them to his lips kissed it reverently.

"Dear, you must not cry because——"

"Oh, you don't understand!" she cried, wrenching her hands free. "I came to you with a request for £10,000, and refused to tell you what I wanted it for; but I will tell you now. I am engaged to be married. No, don't interrupt me," she entreated as he started. "The man I am engaged to is not strong; he is threatened with consumption. The doctor has ordered him to go to a warmer climate, but he can't do that without capital. That is why I came to you to beg. Do you think I would have come otherwise?"

HE TOOK UP A PEN AND BEGAN TO FILL IN A CHEQUE.

She asked the question with a strange mixture of pride and humility, but Peterson made no reply. Something was gripping him at the heart and he felt that he was suffocating.

"You despise me for coming?" she asked presently. "But you don't know what a woman would do for the man she loves. He is dying before my eyes."

Peterson winced, and a thin smile appeared at the corners of his mouth.

"I think I do know," he said slowly. "You love—him very dearly?"

He hardly knew why he asked the question.

"Love him?" Her eyes flashed, and the sadness fled. "I——"

"No—don't say it!" he cried suddenly, shrinking from the blow. "Will you forgive me?" he asked. If I had known ——"

"I have nothing to forgive," she interrupted. "You have honoured me—greatly—but——"

He stopped her with a movement of his hand.

"I don't think we should say any more," he said with a sigh. "I am very sorry for having caused you so much pain."

"And I am sorry, too," she murmured faintly. Good-bye!"

She was out of the room before he came to himself, but when he heard the front door close he started forward as though to call her back.

Half-way to the door, however, he stopped, and a short laugh broke from him. Give her £10,000 in order that she might marry another man? No—it was too much to expect.

Digitized by Google

He flung himself into a chair and sat staring into space. Only one thought was in his mind. If he stayed his hand, this man, her lover, might die, and then——

He put his hand up to his forehead and drew it away wet.

Then suddenly the single thought left his mind and he began to think of her as she had stood before him. "The man I am engaged to is not strong; he is threatened with consumption." She had meant merely to make a statement of fact, but her love had turned it into a prayer for help. "That is why I came to you to beg. Do you think I would have come otherwise?"

Why did he remember her words so plainly? He wanted to forget, but he even recollected each inflection of her voice.

But he could not do the thing which had suggested itself to him. He had given away millions; he would give away millions more; but to give £10,000 to her was a different matter.

"You don't know what a woman would do for the man she loves."

Peterson sat up suddenly as though some one had spoken the words. What about a man doing something as great, as noble—for it was noble of her to have begged—for the woman he loved?

* * * *

Half-an-hour later Peterson rose and went over to the writing-table. His face was very white and drawn, but there was a look of peace in his eyes. He had seen past the agony.

His hand did not tremble when he took up a pen and began to fill in a cheque. The words were quite firm and clear: "To Miss Ella Darrell, the sum of Ten thousand pounds sterling. Hugo Peterson."

Then he scribbled a short note, enclosed it and the cheque in an envelope, and went out to the post-office.

His generosity had reached the high-water mark.

[THE END.]

THE BROADSTONE OF EAST RETFORD.

THIS is an illustration of a curious and ancient custom that arose in connection with the Great Plague.

At the time of the Plague in 1666, a sort of cross known as the Broadstone was erected close to the market at Retford. When a bargain had been struck between a townsman and a villager, who stood at some distance from each other, the money was placed upon the stone and the purchaser retired.

THE BROADSTONE.

The villager took it up, left his produce in its place, and made his exit, and then the townsman came forward and fetched his provisions.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

The Cancer Curse.

A GREAT deal of importance has been given to the subject of Cancer by the Press recently, in all parts of the Kingdom, so that a large portion of the public has had its eyes open to the foe in their midst, and the attention attracted and the interest roused is not likely to be lost. In medical circles especially, the subject of Cancer has been to the fore, many of the annual lecturers choosing it as their text. Questions concerning the increase of the disease have been asked in the House of Commons, and a Royal Commission pressed for: and the statements of Truth—"I am glad to hear there is a strong probability of a Commission," and of the Medical Press—"That the appointment of a Royal Commission could not fail to be productive of good," have been very representative of the expressed wishes of many writers.

Some of the leading expressions of opinion upon the subject during the year, as far as possible, may be classified thus:

IS CANCER A PARASITIC DISEASE?

This question was answered in the affirmative by Mr. Plimmer in The Practitioner, by Prof. Gilbert Barling, in a lecture before the West Somerset Branch of the British Medical Association, and before the British Gynæcological Society, by Dr. Inglis Parsons. A statement that Dr. Bra had found and isolated the cancer microbe, attracted a great deal of notice, but, according to Prof. Curtis, most of the experiments he carried out, on strictly scientific conditions, with Dr. Bra's injection proved negative in result; and the experiments with the serum "discovered" by Drs. Roquette and Lapo, of Belgium, appeared equally disappointing. Dr. Lambert Lack, of London, claimed to have proved that cancer is always due to a particular injury to the basement membrane of mucus membraneous structures, and also that acting on this theory he had actually produced cancer in some of the lower animals. But later on it appeared that in all probability the experiments had not been performed under a sufficiently rigid test. Dr. Bra, of Paris, still pursuing his investigations, found he could successfully inoculate trees with cultures of human cancer, for in six months the trees were diseased, and one of them died. Dr. Fiessinger, of Oyonnaux, professed to trace cases of cancer to vegetable origin, i.e. to germs received from cancerous trees, having observed cancer to have followed pricks from bramble thorns, and Dr. Lloyd-Jones emphasised the idea that the presence of large trees is especially associated with a prevalence of cancer, and that the part of Cambridge most free from cancer is especially devoid of trees or vegetation, while the disease is especially prevalent in well wooded parts of the town.

LOCALITY AS A CAUSE OF CANCER.

Mr. D'Arcy Power not long since in a paper on "The Local Distribution of Cancer" raised a strong presumption in favour of cancer being an infective disease in the transmission of which locality plays an important part. Mr. Alfred Haviland lately also revived his theory that districts having the highest death rates from cancer were either crossed by or near to rivers, that occasionally flooded large areas, but on the other hand, a valuable study by Dr. Melmoth Scott of the districts around Chelmsford and Maldon showed that when death rates were calculated to standard population, and errors due to variations in age composition of the population thus eliminated, it is found that although the County of Essex consists almost exclusively of clay, yet the cancer mortality is decidedly below that which obtains in England as a whole—a result entirely opposed to Dr. Haviland's theory that a clay soil continually submerged by streams overflowing their banks is favourable to the growth of cancer.

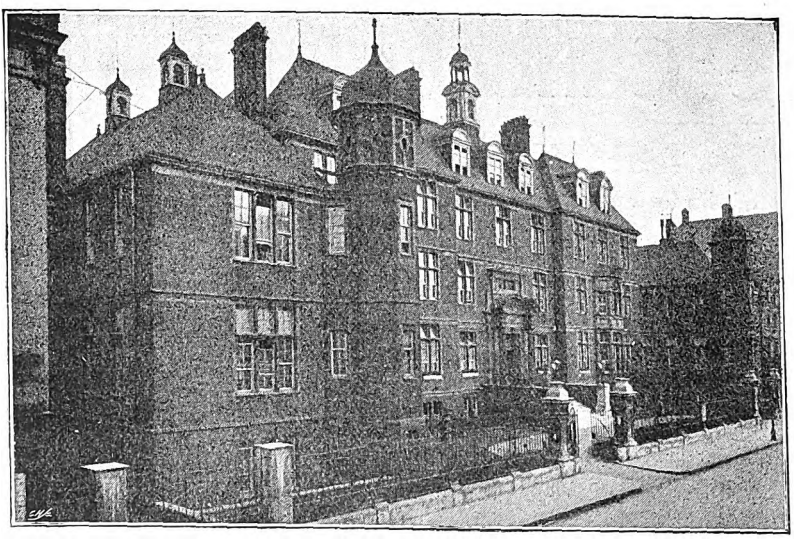
CANCER AND FOOD.

Sir William Banks, in the Lettsomian Lecture, deliberately associated cancer with over-eating; Sir James Sawyer, M.P., writing on the subject, expressed an opinion that the increase of cancer was due to the same cause, especially to the increased consumption of meat; and Dr. Roger Williams has pointed out the rarity of cancer in prisons and workhouses, where but little animal food is allowed.

OTHER STATEMENTS.

At the International Gynæcological Congress, held at the Hague, Dr. Robert Bell, of Glasgow, contributed a very important paper, seeking to prove that epithelioma was due to the existence of a migratory nerve cell. In a lecture delivered by Arthur Jackson, Esq., F.R.C.S., before the Shropshire and Mid-Wales Branch of the British Medical Association, the lecturer expressed his belief that "something in the nature of a specific for cancer would be discovered," and the beneficial effect of thyroid extract in some cases, and the mixed toxins of erysipelas and bacillus prodigiosus in others seemed to point to the direction in which we should look for it. Dr. Murray, of the Glasgow Cancer Institution, entered his protest publicly against "the state of stagnation in scientific research in the treatment of cancers, and claimed that the knife should be sheathed, and other remedies under therapeutics found for them. It was contrary to fact to suppose that unless patients accepted the knife they must die." In the essay awarded the "Scott" prize by the Cancer Society, Dr. Alex Fraser, of Queen's Park, Manchester, gives a record of cases in which he has adopted the hydrogen-peroxide treatment, lengthening life and alleviating suffering.

Digitized by Google



THE CANCER HOSPITAL, BROMPTON, S.W.

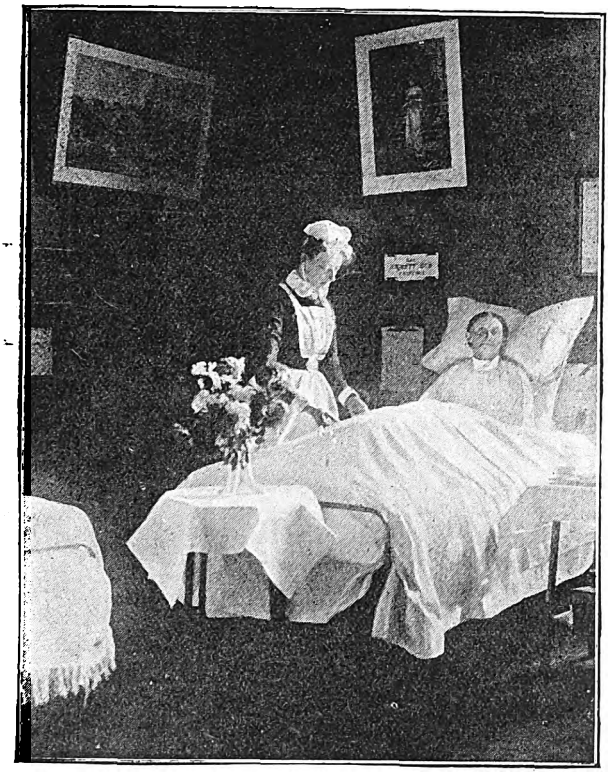
Dr. Herbert Snow, the senior acting surgeon at the Brompton Cancer Hospital, stated at the annual meeting that he felt sure that the mystery of the phenomena of cancer was to be elucidated by experimental research among the lower cellular organisms which had no nervous system, which were at the very bottom of the scale of life. He had long been convinced that certain organs in the body known as the lymph-glands destroyed the cells which were the active agents of cancer; and he fondly hoped that that would be the first law of nature to be examined, and he firmly believed that in the illustrations of that very simple principle would be found the discovery which, if it could be effected, would surely constitute the greatest glory of his Majesty's reign—a non-surgical cure for cancer.

Meanwhile amidst the varying of medical opinion, there is, at any rate, an institution which has been doing for half-a-century useful and pioneer work on the matter, when it was by no means a popular subject to handle.

When the Brompton Cancer Hospital was established 51 years ago, cancer was a disease utterly neglected by the medical profession—in fact, they knew nothing about it, and this hospital was established not only for the treatment of the disease but also for the investigation of the cause and origin. This hospital is one absolutely needed. It fills a great want, and has been a most useful institution. It admits only patients who ought to receive hospital treatment—that is people who are unable to pay for medical advice; and when they are deserving and when they are suffering from this disease or any of the allied complaints, they are received here upon their own application, and at once admitted. There is no waiting about, the doors of the out-patient department are open every day at two o'clock, and they are never closed as long as there is one patient waiting to be seen. Moreover, when they are admitted into the wards they receive every possible kindness, attention and respect—they are treated in exactly the same way as if every one of them came with heavy fees in his hands.

PHOTO OF ONE OF THE WARDS WITH THE MATRON AND NURSES.

Digitized by Google



ONE OF THE SPECIAL BEDS.

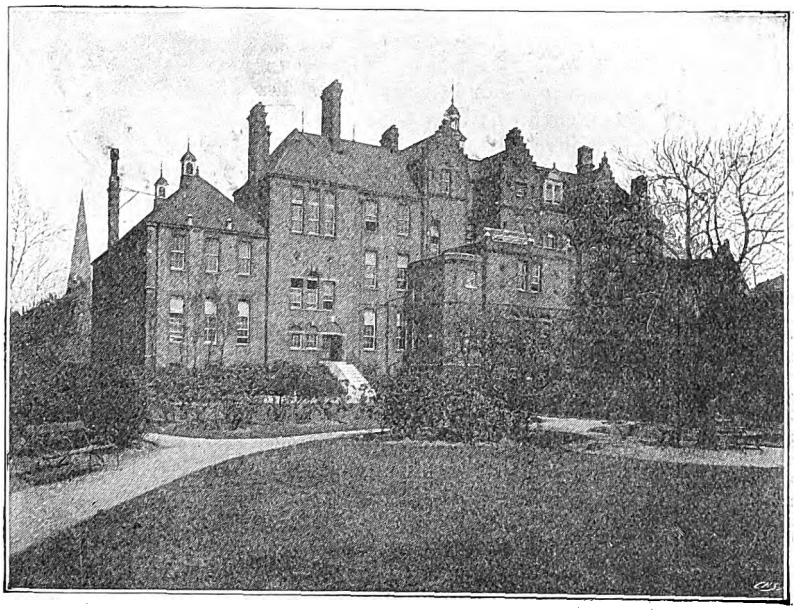
It has had a pathological department in work for many years, and it intends to expend a considerable sum of money upon that department. An expenditure of five or six hundred a year would be amply sufficient. Since 1851, 56,000 cases have passed through their hands, and upwards of 1,500 are constantly under treatment. A very large number of cases yield to treatment—they leave here immensely benefited, and many live for many years afterwards, and die either from some other complaint or from old age.

Our readers will have noticed that the Royal Colleges of Surgeons and Physicians appointed a committee to inquire into the subject. That committee is composed of men of very high position; but they are not men who have had a very large experience in the pathology of cancer itself, and we trust that this hospital will play a very important part in the matter, and that that committee will recognise the advantages it offers for research. If they could once do that, the hospital will rank as one of the first in the country.

We greatly regret to hear as we go to press of the sudden death of Mr. Alex. Marsden, the Chairman of this Institution, and son of its founder.



BACK VIEW AND GROUNDS.

Digitized by Google

"I Forbid the Banns?"

A STORY FOUNDED ON FACT.

"YES, mother, I feel there is nothing for it but to go to those poor Indians in Georgia. And if you had heard what Dr. Burton said yesterday, you would be the first to answer, 'John, go where you are wanted.'"

Mrs. Wesley looked up startled. She had been counting so much on the sympathy and presence of her dear son, John, in this her hour of need. Her widow's weeds betrayed the fact that she had lost the close partner of her life, and naturally she had looked to the companionship of her boys, John and Charles. But Charles already was leaving her to be chaplain to the Governor of Georgia, and now it was her son John!

A red spot on each cheek betrayed the ferment in her mind. But she was the daughter of a famous old Puritan, and with all her father's spirit she replied: "Had I twenty sons, I should rejoice that they were all so employed, though I should never see them more. Last week it was Charlie, and now my other boy will leave me too!" and she looked piteously at John. "But I will not stand in the way! Go, my boy, and the God of all grace go with you."

So they went—the one as chaplain, the other as missionary.

It was in the year 1735, when a voyage to any distance meant dragging out a weary existence for many tedious weeks. The two young Wesleys, however, and their companion, Mr. Delamotte, used the time in devotional pursuits. There were on board a party of Moravian missionaries, and in interchange of thought and experience a warm friendship sprang up between them. General Oglethorp, who had been deputed by the Trustees of Georgia to go out to settle the Constitution and order of the little colony, was also on board, and what he saw of John Wesley made him fix upon him as a fitting instrument to carry out his purposes in Georgia.

"That young man is worthy of better things than preaching to redskins: don't you think so?" he observed to the wife of the resident surgeon of the colony, who was going out to join her husband.

"Yes, indeed!" she replied. "But he is such a fanatic, you'll never keep him in Savannah."

"I suppose I can't," drily returned the General. "But if you can't find some lady to play the part of Circe to him, I shall cease to believe in woman's wit," playfully.

At last, after many delays, Wesley and and his friends sighted the long sandy strip of shore where Savannah, the chief city of Georgia, was built. They landed upon a little uninhabited island, and thence took boat to Savannah. Thus was John Wesley led up of the spirit into the wilderness, there to be tempted of the devil.

Getting to close quarters with the special work which had brought him there seemed impossible at first. Still, he threw himself into helping his brother Charles, and worked with a will amongst the little flock at Savannah, catechising, exhorting, and privately instructing.

One day there sought him for such private instruction a Miss Causton, a young lady who was introduced to him as being in great distress of mind about matters of religion; and that was the beginning of many an interview; for somehow the fair inquirer could not find the Light. She was one of the most bewitching girls John had ever seen, and after her visits to him, or his to her, he felt an unrest he was completely at a loss to explain.

General Oglethorp's interest in the young men soon gave them the run of all the society to be had in the little town. John, who detested society because it interfered with his personal abstemiousness, vainly tried to escape the net. But he was meshed by the courtesies of social life, and wherever he went he found Miss Causton.

Digitized by Google

She had never met his like before. Other men bored her with compliments, he lectured her; but, for the life of her, she could not help feeling more admiration for this young cleric than any man had been able to stir in her as yet. He on his part was captivated by her beauty, and without daring to stop to inquire the cause, felt his pulses bounding at the very sight of her.

The General was not blind to all this and it delighted him. His first opinion of the young man had been confirmed by his actions since. Already the town was talking about him. Everywhere he went, in the work of the Established Church, he asserted his High Church principles. And to all who disagreed with him he showed a galling, haughty intolerance.

One of the most respected men in the Colony, who by the sturdiness of his convictions was a perpetual thorn in the side of the General, was a Dissenter. The Governor simply hated him; and with great delight he heard that young Mr. Wesley had refused him the Sacrament unless he would consent to be re-baptised. The Colony rang with the news of this insult to their highly-esteemed townsman, but, in spite of the outcry, Wesley would not budge an inch.

"That's the man for me!" exclaimed the General. "He can play Laud to my Charles, and between us we'll teach these wretched colonists a lesson. 'Indians!' bosh! He shan't leave here for any Indians if I can help it." And "help it" he did. All manner of hindrances were thrown in the way of the young man getting to the borders. Hospitalities were multiplied, and Miss Causton, to whom her uncle, General Oglethorp, had given her cue, hovered around him. At last, as the effect of social gaiety to which he was unaccustomed, backed by the influence of the climate, he was seized with a fever, and Miss Causton was sent to attend him day and night. Robed in white, she came to his bedside, and played the part of a ministering angel to perfection.

As soon as he was about again, Mr. Delamotte, the missionary who had come out with them, took on himself the rôle of the candid friend, and opened the eyes of the unworldly John to the position into which he was gliding. Then he left John Wesley facing the great temptation of his life. He felt almost certain he had only to speak and the glowing language of her eyes would be translated into words. "Speak! I dare not. But, there, I must have advice. Delamotte doubtless is prejudiced against her, and I had better seek the advice of strangers."

It was the hour of evening prayers at the Moravian settlement. The brother-in-charge had just assembled his little household together, when the sound of a horse stopping at the door brought him to the front. With pleasure he welcomed the friend who had spent so many weeks with him on board in sweet communion. "Come in, Mr. Wesley!" he exclaimed; "we are just going to devotions. I know you will join us."

Reverently the little group bowed before the Father of daily mercies, and the Moravian poured out his soul for the stranger in their midst, especially commending the work God had given him to do.

At the mention of the word, John felt uncomfortable. To these men work was everything, and he knew it. "What, then, must they think of me?" he muttered.

The plain evening meal being over, John hesitatingly unfolded his tale.

For answer the Moravian read from his Testament how that men must leave houses, and lands, and even wife for the sake of Christ. "Isn't yours, brother, a case in point?"

"I can't see it!" said John, irritably. "Supposing that God intends me to settle down in the colony—aren't white souls as good as black?"

With a flash of his eyes, in which smouldered flame at all times, the Moravian replied, "There is no difference in them, the difference is in you. If God has sent you to the Indians, they are yonder, not here."

"But how could I take a girl like Miss Causton there?"

"You could not, of course! And from all I have ever heard of that young lady, she would not let you. She is a society loving girl. 'How can two walk together unless they be agreed?'—My brother!"

Digitized by Google

he said, insistently, "In the name of God I FORBID THE BANNS!"

With a sad heart John rode away that night. He had reached the parting of the ways in his life. All night he turned and tossed, and ever, in his heated imagination, he saw again the one picture which hung on the walls of the little house he had just left; the picture of a suffering Saviour and over His head the words "All this for thee. What for Me?" And still That Patient Figure asked that question, and throughout the whole night, the clock ticked out "For thee—For me!" "For thee—For me!"

The result was seen in the fact that the next day Miss Causton received a polite note from John Wesley, pointing out that their names were being coupled together in a way which made it best that he should see her no more. For marriage was out of the question for one destined, like himself, to a life of hardship.

Pained and enraged, she showed the note to her father, and to the General, and thenceforward there commenced a series of petty persecutions, aimed, out of sheer spite, to keep Wesley from his proposed mission.

* * * *

Some months had gone by when, out of pique, Miss Causton married a Mr. Williamson, but her spite was still so great that she carried it even to the extent of disorderly behaviour in the church services. There, however, she met her match. John Wesley had loved this girl, and giving her up had been like cutting off his right hand; but he was made of the stuff which would have disciplined wife and children if necessary. So he reproved her for her conduct, and at last, finding she would not alter, he steeled his nerves against his heart, and publicly refused the Communion to the woman he loved.

When her father heard it he exclaimed: "I am insulted! I have drawn the sword, and I'll never sheath it till I get satisfaction!" A vexatious lawsuit followed, which wore out John Wesley's patience and kept him dragging out his time in a place where he was hated. Then, at last, he listened to his friends, and decided to abandon his mission; but as he was leaving the country the magistrates refused permission. Nothing daunted, he defied the magistrates, and one night, at eight o'clock, he fled by boat from Georgia, with his brother, to England, saddened in heart, but unquenched in his enthusiasm for work.

* * * *

Many years had passed away, and the name of the great Apostle of Methodism was now well known. At the house of his brother Charles a select company of friends had been invited to meet him, and with one group of them came an uninvited acquaintance. On the entrance of John Wesley, as he saluted the company, with great surprise all who were there saw a tall, military looking man step from among them, and, advancing to John Wesley, take his hand and reverently press it to his lips. It was General Oglethorp!

Thus, even to their enemies, the children of wisdom are sooner or later justfied.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

The Needle's Eye

by

FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

The story opens with the discovery of a dead woman, by Farmer Erastus Winch, in his barn. His wife finds a baby there also, and insists, much against his will, on adopting it, as she has never had a child of her own. Before the burial of the woman, a stranger appears in the neighbourhood, and out of curiosity asks to see the coffin, and pays the undertaker handsomely to let it be a good one. On the burial of its mother the child is adopted by 'Liz'beth Winch and called 'Manuel, from the Bible-name "Immanuel." The child grows up, and as soon as he is any age worth speaking of, the farmer ruthlessly sets the child at work. He is treated in a heartrending way for a long time by the farmer, and idolised by his wife.

CHAPTER V.—(continued.)

AFTER a pregnant pause, Mrs. Harney settled back heavily in her chair. "We've been thinkin' fer quite a spell of takin' a boy to raise," she said, wiping the moist creases of her features with a limp pocket-handkerchief. "Our Benny don't take to the shop; I tell his pa he ain't built fer a blacksmith, and there ain't no use in talkin' 'bout it. I'd ruther he'd clerk it after a spell. Of course, Ben, he's allers wanted the boy in the shop; but Benny's too much like my folks. So I says to Ben the other day when he was going on 'bout it, 'Ben,' I says, 'why don't you take a likely boy an' fetch him up to take a holt in the shop? He could begin,' I says, 'a-fetchin' an' carryin', a-blowin' the belluses, an' haldin' the horses.' Ben says to me, 'Whar's yer boy,' he says. 'I don't want no fool boy,' he says; 'but a smart, likely boy 'at could earn his salt I'd take in a minit.' Then thinks I, mebbe Mis' Winch 'ull be glad to git red of that boy she's got. As I says to Ben, she's done her full share towards fetchin' him up, I says."

Elizabeth, sitting rigidly erect in her chair, stared at the speaker without replying.

"Why don't you tell her right out what's goin' the rounds of the village, Jane?" demanded the other lady, smoothing her bonnet strings with an air of importance. "I believe in comin' right out with the trewth every time—there's nothing so hullsome as trewth. I'm always fur telling things jest as they be without fear ner favour, more especial when I feel's so it was my Christian dooty, as I cert'nly do to-day."

Elizabeth's eyes had shifted from the purple expanse of Mrs. Harney's countenance; her gaze seemed concentrated upon the spinster's ill-fitting artificial teeth, which clicked an animated accompaniment to her words. "Yes," slicked that lady with growing earnestness, "when a child gets abused so it's the talk of the town, I think it's time to interfere."

"Ben, he hears it mentioned at the shop ev'ry once in a while," broke in Mrs. Harney. "Most everybody knows 'at your husban' is a turrible ha'sh man, I says to Ben. I guess Mis' Winch won't be the one to stan' in the way of the boy, ef it's once named to her, I says.

Digitized by Google

We'd give him 'nough to eat, an' ten weeks of schoolin' a year, an' a trade."

Elizabeth had risen to her feet; red spots glowed on either sallow cheek. "You want I should gin you my child!" she cried. "My child 'at I've took keer of all these years! Ain't you 'shamed to set in my house an' go on with sech talk? You'd give him 'nough to eat, would ye, Mis' Harney? Well, I'm turrible 'bleeged to you, but I guess I kin make out with my cookin' 'longside o' yourn any day in the week. I ain't forgot the cake you brought to the donation! My 'Manuel is learnin' to work on the farm, an' of course he hes to be c'rrected same as other child ern, but——"

Her voice died away into silence, as her eyes wandered toward the open door.

Her guests looked at one another with meaning smiles. "I guess we'll hev to be gettin' along," remarked Mrs. Harney, rising with alacrity. "Your man'll be comin' in for his supper pretty soon, I shouldn't wonder. When folks don't git their dinner dishes outen the way 'fore three o'clock in the afternoon, they're likely to git flustered 'long 'bout tea-time."

With this parting shot the two ladies turned their backs on their hostess and made their way down the narrow path to the front gate. The spinster's high-pitched giggle, in evident comment upon some sotto voce remark of the blacksmith's wife reached Elizabeth's ears, and brought the angry tears to her eyes.

"An' I tol' 'Manuel 'at I reckoned we was in heaven a'ready!" she muttered, as she flew about her kitchen with savage energy: "Lord, what a liar I be."

When the child came into the house, holding the book lovingly in both hands, his eyes shining like evening stars after rain, Elizabeth regarded him with a fretful wrinkling of her worn forehead.

"Put yer Bible into the spare room under the bolster of the bed," she said crisply. "You won't hev much time to be studyin' it 'cept Sundays. Then I want you should go after the cows 's quick 's ever you kin. You kin eat this piece of bread an' butter to stay yer stomick till supper's ready."

"The simple idee!" she muttered to herself, as she stood on the back steps watching the little figure armed with the big piece of bread, "Mis' Harney mus' think 'at she's smart."

Erastus Winch returned from his expedition with Mr. Dundor in unwonted good-humour. "I ain't got much app'tite," he remarked, as he reached across the table for his fourth biscuit, "for I e't pretty hearty to Turnerses. Liph, he's a cute one; whilst we was eatin' pie and dough-nuts inside, his mare was feedin' out to the barn. I heerd him givin' Al' Turner speshul d'rections. 'Be sure you rub her down keerful, Al,' he says; 'caskets is heavy haulin'. An' you kin slip an extry feed of oats into the bag, if you don't mind,' he says, kind of mournful like. 'They ain't nobody so free with things temp'ral as the b'reaved,' he says to me, as we was walkin' into the house; 'seems 's 'o they didn't sense it same 's at other times,' he says. 'It doos 'em good to spen' an' be spent; it ca'ms their sorrer an' relieves their feelin's.' Say, 'Lizbeth, if I go first, don't you ferget to keep yer eyes peeled fer Liph. I swan, it 'ud make me right mad to look down f'om above an' see sech goin's on to my place!"

Elizabeth fetched a long sigh of pleasurable excitement. "Be you goin' to 'tend the fun'ral, 'Rastus?" she asked timidly.

"I dunno but I be," admitted Winch, fingering with satisfaction the large round of a silver dollar in his trousers pocket. "Liph, he mentioned my name as one of the bearers. They're goin' to put on style an' sen' kerridges. I s'pose you kin go in the buggy ef you're a min' to," he added grudgingly.

Elizabeth's face lighted up. "My! I'd like to go real well, 'Rastus. I've stayed to hum pretty stiddy lately, an' fun'rals is always so interestin'. To-night's the reg'lar prayer-meetin'," she went on, with a timid cough; "we ain't neither of us 'tended a meetin' for quite a spell."

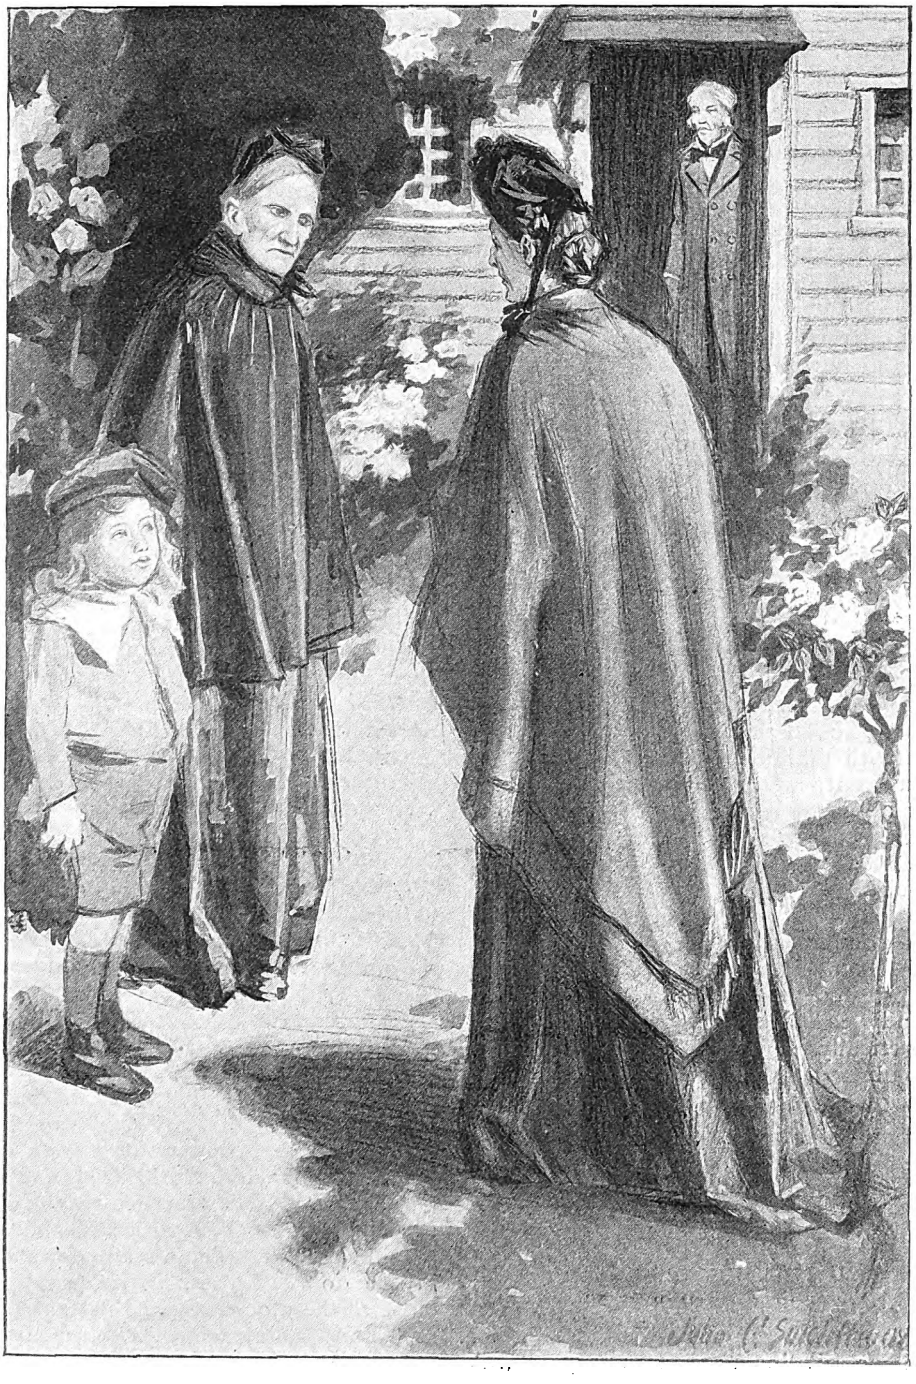
"I s'pose I kin hitch," growled Winch; "you ain't wanted to go 'n 'count of him, an' you know you ain't!"

"Land! 'Manuel's big 'nough to go to meetin'; it'll do him good," said Elizabeth, cheerfully. "We don't want folks talkin' 'bout us anyhow." She ventured the last remark with an apprehensive glance at her husband's grim face.

"Who's been here?" he demanded, pausing with his hand upon the latch. "Some clackin' hen, I'll bet a dollar!"

"Oh, 't wa'n't nothin' of any 'count, 'Rastus; on'y Mis' Harney stopped fer a minit, an' she said——"

Digitized by Google



"WELL, IF YOU MUS' KNOW, MIS' DUNDOR, I TOL' THE CHILD 'AT GOD IN HEAVEN IS HIS FATHER."

Digitized by Google

"Let her min' her bizness, an' do you min' yourn!" responded Winch, with a sudden lapse into his usual marital manner. "An', say!—I ain't goin' to no prayer-meetin' to-night; I've fooled away 'nough time!"

"I might 'a' knowed better," murmured Elizabeth with a resigned sigh.

She was standing with folded arms at the open door of the kitchen. In the west, behind dark masses of orchard foliage, the sky glowed a clear, pulsing amber, yearning toward the violet hues of mid-heaven through illimitable depths of vivid green. At the verge of the velvet hung the new moon, a slender thread of light; above it swung the clear burning lamp of the evening star.

"There now! ef I ain't gone an' seen the new moon over my lef' shoulder ag'in!" she muttered. "All the signs is fer back luck!" Her eye fell upon a small figure perched on the topmost rail of the fence.

"'Manuel!" she called with sudden sharpness, "come right in outen that dew this minit! Nex' thing I know he'll be down sick with milary—what with the hot sun beatin' down on him day-times an' all." The child clambered down from his perch with manifest reluctance. "I was laakin' at it, mummy," he said, pointing his small finger at the solemn pageant of heavenly colour. "I'd like to go there!"

"Don't you be a-talkin' nonsense, 'Manuel!" exclaimed Elizabeth, severely. "You're a-goin' to bed this minit—that's where you're a-goin."

"Does my Father live 'way up on the hill?" asked the child, his eyes turning wistfully to the window, as Elizabeth energetically scrubbed his face with a coarse brown towel.

"I guess so," said the woman, absent-mindedly. "Now I want you should say yer 'Now I lay me,' an' go right to sleep. 'Taint healthy for children to be too smart."

CHAPTER VI.

HIS FATHER.

"Now, mind 'at you set still, 'Manuel, when we git inside, jest 's if you was in church!" The two were walking soberly up the broad path which led to the residence of the afflicted Turners, as Elizabeth repeated for perhaps the twentieth time the exhortation quoted above.

"My! Ain't the flowers han'some!" whispered Elizabeth, pausing wistfully. "I wish 't I had a slip of that g'ranium!"

"Lookin' at the blows, Mis' Winch?" inquired a nasal voice from behind. "It doos seem strange to see 'em a-bloomin' so bright in this vale of tears, don't it?"

"Why, I declare, Mis' Dundor, I don't know when I've seen you before!" exclaimed Elizabeth, turning quickly around. "You ain't lookin' very well."

"No, I ain't well," responded the other with a heavy sigh and a subdued sniff. She was a tall, stoop-shouldered woman with a curiously mottled, lavender-tinted complexion, which contrasted unpleasantly with her pale blue eyes and reddish hair. "I've been awful poorly most all summer; I tell Dundor 'at he'll be buryin' me come fall." The woman's eyes had been busying themselves as she spoke. "I s'pose," she went on, with increasing animation, "that this is the child 'at was born in your barn. I never seen him before."

"Yes," admitted Elizabeth, a mixture of pride and reluctance in her manner; "this is 'Manuel." She picked an imaginary bit of lint from his tunic, and settled his hat more squarely over the short dark curls. "Say, 'How-do-you-do' to the lady, 'Manuel," she added, in a severe voice.

The child glanced up shyly into the watery blue eyes of the stranger. "How-do-you-do?" he repeated obediently.

"Where in creation do you suppose his mother come from?" ejaculated Mrs. Dundor, blinking thoughtfully. "I s'pose you ain't never found out who his father is, have you?"

"No, I never have, an' what's more, I don't never want to," said Elizabeth shortly.

The child lifted his eyes in manifest astonishment. "I know," he said softly.

"It doos seem a nawful pity to be lef' alone in this cold world," sighed Mrs. Dundor. "But it's terrible responsibility to raise a child; you can't never tell how they'll turn out. There's Dundor standin' in the door; I guess if we want seats close to the mourners we'd better be goin' in. Land, child, what do you want?"

Immanuel had grasped a fold of the woman's gown with determination. "I want to tell you about my father," he said eagerly. "I do know who he is. Munny told me." He pointed his finger at Elizabeth, who flushed with annoyance.

Digitized by Google

"You don't say!" cried Mrs. Dundor, nodding and blinking with pleased attention. "I thought mebbe you knew more 'n you was willin' to let on, Mis' Winch! Some folks would have thought twice afore tellin' what wa'n't so in the house of mournin'. Who is your father, bub?"

"Come right along in the house, 'Manuel," said Elizabeth, struggling with her mortification. "Don't pay no 'tention to what he says, Mis' Dundor; 'tain't likely I'd tell a lie ony time, especially right afore the child."

"But you did tell me 'bout my father, munny," persisted the boy. "He lives up on the hill, an' he loves me more'n anybody else; you said so, munny."

"You might's well own up, Mis' Winch, seein' the cat's out of the bag," put in the undertaker's wife, her pale lips widening with a smile of malicious enjoyment. "They say it takes childern an' fools to tell the truth."

"Well, if you mus' know, Mis' Dundor, I tol' the child 'at God in heaven is his Father," said Elizabeth, goaded into speech. "That's Gospel truth, and you con't deny it."

"Fer the land's sake!" ejaculated the other, with uplifted hands. "It ain't no less 'an blasphemious to talk that way, seein' it ain't no ways likely 'at he's one of the 'lect."

Elizabeth turned her back upon the speaker and hastily mounted the steps, dragging the child after her. "What a nawful naughty boy you be!" she whispered indignantly; "you ain't got no manners after all I've done for ye!"

The child's large brown eyes filled with astonished tears, through which he gazed in silence about the dim room into which Elizabeth was pushing him. Presently he was set emphatically upon a wooden-bottomed chair, Elizabeth taking her place beside him with compressed lips. There were a great many people in the room, the child perceived, women mostly, dressed sombrely. Between the closed and darkened windows stood a long, black object, heaped with white flowers, tortured into stiff shapes of stars and anchors and crowns. Among the sad faced women tip-toed the thin, active figure of the undertaker, with all the inconsequent bustle of the blue-bottle fly which boomed at intervals on the window-pane. A broken slat of the tightly-closed blinds gave dazzling glimpses of green sunlit grass, and the scarlet and yellow of nodding blossoms. In the fields beyond, meadow larks called and answered one another in wild sweetness. There were other sounds nearer by, the stamping of restless horses, the creaking of wheels, the shutting of distant doors; men's voices subdued to an inarticulate murmur, the going and coming of hushed feet in the room overhead. High above all struck in the nasal voices of the village choir, tuned to piercing insistence in the long-drawn, dolorous tones of "China."

"Why-e-e should we mourn depa-a-a-arting friends?
Or sha-a-ke at death's a-alarms?"

Immanuel, depressed by Elizabeth's unwonted reproof and the general gloom, hid his face in Elizabeth's shawl; an aching lump struggled in his throat, forcing at last a loud wail from his lips.

"Why, 'Manuel," with an emphatic little shake, "do you keep quiet this minute; don't you see the minister's a-going to speak?"

"'Man that is born of woman is of few days and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not!'"

Again the child's voice filled the solemn pause with a choking sob of inarticulate misery.

Elizabeth glanced about her in perplexed distress to meet a fire of shocked and displeased glances. Mr. Eliphalet Dundor was already tip-toeing his way across the room with an air of professional omniscience.

"I'd let him go outside if I was you," suggested a kindly whisper from behind.

Elizabeth turned, her face on fire. "Oh, Mis' Haskil," she breathed excitedly, "I don't know what in the world ails 'Manuel; I wouldn't ha' brought him only he always been so awful good in church!"

"My Rosy's somewheres in the yard," returned the other, beaming encouragement from her broad, ruddy face; "fun'rals 'aint no place for childern. Run 'long out doors, sonny."

"Yes, do, do, 'Manuel; 'an don't you come back neither. Go quick, before Liph Dundor gets here!" urged Elizabeth.

With a long sigh of relief the child slipped from his chair, and darted swift and noiseless as a frightened bird into the sunshine. Still breathing hard, his shoulders shaken with recurring sobs, he made his way to the far side of the deep, old-fashioned yard where ancient apple-trees, unpruned for many a year, stretched their branches earthward. The grass grew lush and tall here, quite shoulder high indeed, and tasseled out with fragrant plumes. Immanuel dropped on all fours into the midst of this verdant cover, and crept animal-wise into a snug hiding-place roofed and walled with green.

Digitized by Google

The long flute calls of the meadow larks, "Oh—sweet! Oh—sweet! Oh, my own sweet!" flooded the silence with tranquillity. The boy lay flat upon his back and stared into the leafy arches above his head; dazzling reflections of sky and cloud shimmered on the budding spheres which loaded the gnarled boughs. He wondered vaguely why he had wept. The comfort of this one among his Father's many mansions had already penetrated his soul.

A human voice broke harshly into the harmonious chord of peace. "I sez to m' wife, you women-folks gits smarter and knowin'er every day, I sez; but Mis' Winch takes the cake so fur!" The muffled tones ended in a low chuckle.

From his hiding-place Immanuel discerned other tokens of human proximity in two black shadows which blotted out the sunshine among the nodding grass plumes at his feet.

The voice went on in a tone of lazy enjoyment. "We men folks 'ull git whipped clean out at the polls some day or other, an' I'll bet ye on it! Ef the critters don't 'low us the priv'lege of c'rectin' our own young 'uns, onct they git a holt of the franchise they'll keep us from votin' altogether, an' I'll bet ye on it!"

"What yer gassin' about, Lute?" demanded a gruff voice, at sound of which the child involuntarily shrank closer to the trunk of the friendly apple tree.

"Liph Dundor tol' me 'bout it yiste'd'y; he thought 'twas too all fired good to keep, and I'm blamed if I don't. Liph, he tol' me to keep it to myself, but I reckon you'd ought to know it. Say, I'll bet my wife 'ud think twice afore she'd call in anybody offen the street to interfere when I'm busy a-lickin' the boys! Why, ye can't gin 'em too much of it; ez I tol' Liph. Spare the rod, I sez, and spile the——"

"Who's been interfering' with who? What in thunder you talkin' 'bout anyhow?" demanded Winch, raising his voice.

"Don't you git 'xcited now, Ras, or they'll hear ye inside. You was givin' that 'dopted boy o' yourn a little taste of the gad day b'fore yiste'd'y, wa'n't you?"

"Yas, I was; an' what of it?"

"Wall, you'll remember 'at you was int'rupted by Liph kind of unexpected like, an'——

"She didn't dare ask Liph Dundor to——"

"That's jest what she done, by jingo! I thought 't was mighty brash of Mis' Winch, same 's I tol' my wife. But, say, you ain't a-goin' to make no fuss 'bout it, I hope! Thinks, sez I, it's such an all-fired good joke on Ras, 'at mebbe he'll enjoy it as much 's the rest on us!"

"It's mighty enjoyable, thank ye, Lute," said Winch dryly. "Mis' Winch hes enjoyed it a'ready, I persoom. I'll see to it 'at the boy don't lose nothin' by it!"

"I'll bet ye!" agreed the other, with a hoarse laugh, cut suddenly short by a spasm of propriety.

At sound of the long-drawn windy cadence of a hymn, the two shadows moved slowly away. The child sat up and gazed about him with the furtive air of a wild creature confronted with some nameless peril. A friendly gap in the hedge behind the apple-tree offered safe passage into the sunlit, blossoming meadow, where yellow-breasted lovers still called entreatingly, "Sweet—sweet! Oh—my own sweet!"

"My Father loves me!" whispered a small choked voice. "He loves me. I am going to find him!"

CHAPTER VII.

HILDA.

Like other seekers after the Divine in all ages, the boy lifted up his eyes to the hills, whose swelling sides, clothed with multi-coloured squares of corn and pasture, were crowned and belted with dark woods. His roving fancy reverted for an instant to the patchwork quilt with which the provident Elizabeth had tucked him snugly from the night since he could remember. The thought forced large tears, through which the landscape wavered as in a dream. Nevertheless he pushed on determinedly, following the hewn rails half hid in the lavish growth of weeds and low-growing trees.

Digitized by Google

A narrow road winding up by slow degrees from the lap of the valley next tempted his wandering feet. Here the child, mindful of Elizabeth's oft-repeated admonitions, paused to divest himself of his shoes and stockings. For awhile he carried these useful articles in the skirt of his tunic, his brown toes sinking luxuriously into the dust cooled by a recent shower. Then, led by fast-springing hopes, he carefully deposited them behind a clump of mullein, which spread its stately velvet leaves by the roadside. "My Father will let me go barefoot even on Sunday," he thought, and ran forward with a new sense of joy and freedom. A little later the "Sunday hat," bound beneath his smarting chin with a strenuous rubber cord, found its way to a green bank, where he fancied that it might serve as a nest for certain friendly and inquisitive crows, who craned their necks from the fence rails to stare and chatter after the small figure.

Wild raspberries grew by the roadside; the steep bank twinkled with their scarlet fires. Beyond the fence, also, where an upland meadow, clad in sparse grasses, lay sweet and silent beneath the warm afternoon sun. This meadow dipped toward a brook on its further side, and beyond, the white walls of a farmhouse shone through dark trees. Far beneath lay what appeared to the child's wondering eyes as the whole great world—a pageant of field and wood in the bright valley, with houses no bigger than his thumb and the loose-flung coils of the river gleaming blue and silver. On a narrow thread of road dust-white, a line of black dots moved slowly.

The wanderer sat down on the mossy top of a giant rock which shouldered its way out of the hillside and looked long at the amazing picture. For the moment he was quite as happy as the little black crickets which sang at his feet. Like them he was filled with the joyous life which throbs at the heart of all nature.

Wrapt in the sweet silence, the boy did not hear small stealthy footsteps which crept quite up to the big rock, but he felt the touch of warm fingers which essayed to pull from his grasp the cluster of berries, which he had refrained from eating because they were too beautiful.

"I want 'em; they's bigger 'an mine," said a voice, sweet as a thrush.

Immanuel involuntarily tightened his grasp upon his treasure as he turned grave, startled eyes upon the intruder.

Blue eyes, shaded by a fluff of yellow curls, met his look of inquiry gravely. "I want 'em dis minute," repeated the sweet voice imperiously.

"Whose child are you?" demanded the boy, unconsciously assuming the half-stern, half-patronising air with which this inquiry had invariably been put to himself.

"I'm my mamma's little girl," answered the child, and immediately burst into loud crying.

"Why do you cry? Here, you shall have my berries," said the boy, eagerly pressing the bunch of fruit into the small rosy hands which hid the blue eyes. The tears ceased as suddenly as an April shower. "Why did you cry?" he repeated.

"Because," answered the child, puckering up her face as if undecided between tears and berries, "my mamma's gone to heaven—gran'ma says so."

"What's your name?"

"Hilda—that's my name—Hilda."

"You're small, Hilda, much smaller 'an I, an' I'll tell you somethin': heaven's where God is. God is my Father. I'm goin' to find Him. When I do, I think I shall stay with him all the while, an' never never come down."

The child stared at him with round eyes. She made no answer, her mouth being pleasantly filled with berries; but she nodded her yellow head understandingly.

"I'm goin' now," said the boy with decision. "You c'n come if you want to."

"Pick me some more berries, boy; I like berries."

"Will you come then? I guess your mother 'll be at God's house."

Hilda shook her head. "My mamma's gone to heaven in a black box," she said positively. "I saw her go—just a little while ago. I don't want to go to heaven in a box."

"This is heaven," said the boy eagerly. "God made these berries an' that pretty stone, an'—an' ev'rythin'!"

"'Tis not heaven; it's my gran'pa's meadow."

"Yes, 'tis, 'cause——"

Digitized by Google

"Tisn't!"

"You're a naughty girl to conterdict," said Immanuel, with dignity. "This is heaven 'cause God's here. He's ev'rywhere, an' ev'rywhere 'at He is is heaven."

Hilda looked at him with a shrewd twinkle in her blue eyes. "Where you goin' then," she demanded.

"I'm goin'—well, 'way up to the top of this hill, I guess."

"Then I'm goin' home. Aunt Em's fryin' doughnuts, an' I want one. The sugar bush is up there, but there isn't any sugar now, so I shan't go."

"Oh, what a bad, naughty girl to run away! Come here this minute!" The words, delivered in a high-pitched monotonous voice, caused both children to turn suddenly. A stout sun-bonneted figure was coming slowly toward them across the field.

"I—I must go now," stammered Immanuel, a sudden doubt as to the righteousness of his proceedings clouding his bright eyes.

"It's only Aunt Em," said Hilda, coolly, reaching after another berry. "I never mind her, an' you needn't. Let's run: she couldn't catch us."

Immanuel and his little acquaintance stood still, waiting the coming of the sun-bonnetted figure which was drawing nearer. "Good-bye," said Immanuel, oppressed by a proportionate sense of guilt.

"You must stay; I want you." Two imperious hands fastened upon his sleeve. "You shall stay, I tell you. Mustn't he stay, Aunt Em—mustn't he, when I want him?"

IMMANUEL INVOLUNTARILY TIGHTENED HIS GRASP UPON HIS TREASURE AS HE TURNED STARTLED EYES UPON THE INTRUDER.

"What a naughty, naughty girl!" exclaimed the woman, who now loomed tall above them. "I'm 'fraid gran'ma 'll warm you up good fer runnin' away. What little boy is this?"

Immanuel hung his head and dug his bare toes into the earth. "I found him," announced Hilda complacently. "I'm goin' to keep him to play with."

"What an idee!" cried the woman, her fat face creasing itself in a smile.

Digitized by Google

Seen nearer at hand she was not at all formidable. Indeed, she now sat down with a long, easy sigh, and drew the little girl into her capacious lap. "You're an awful naughty girl to plague Aunt Em so, Hildy," she said mildly. "Didn't your gran'ma tell you you shouldn't go out the yard? My, my! jus' see how wet your little feet are. You must ha' waded right through the brook."

"Yes, I did," said Hilda, conclusively. "I wanted to. I want him, too, an' I shall have him."

"Where did you come from, little boy?" asked the woman.

"From down there," answered Immanuel, pointing toward the valley.

"For the land's sake! Where was you goin'?"

"He was goin' to God's house, way up on the hill, an' he wanted me to go too, but I shan't," said Hilda pouting. "I'm going to make him stop with me."

"Why, there isn't any church up there," said the woman with a vague smile. "Well, I guess we'll be going up to the house, perhaps mother'll know." She rose slowly and held out her hand to each of the children. Immanuel held back.

"Come, boy—you've gotta come!" cried Hilda.

"I guess you'd better come 'long," assented the woman; "mother she'll know."

Immanuel reluctantly laid his brown, berry-stained hand in the broad, warm palm which was extended to him, and all three turned their faces toward the farm-house. There's lots of rosb'rries ripe," the woman was saying in a tone of mild satisfaction; "I shouldn't wonder if you an' me'd better come out an' bring our pails after supper, Hildy. Some rosb'rry pie 'ud be nice for dinner to-morrow. Do you like pie?"

"Tell her 'Yes, 'm,'" whispered Hilda, hanging back to address Immanuel across the expanse of lavender-coloured calico which billowed between them. "An', say, boy, when gran'ma talks to you, you mus' speak right up. Gran'ma don't like folks 'at don't speak right up."

"I guess mother'll know," chimed in the woman, pleasantly; "she 'most always does."

"Well, Em'line," observed a crisp voice from the open window, "I see you've found that naughty child. Where was she?"

"In the strawb'rry meadow, ma, but I guess she didn't mean to run away; did you, Hildy?"

"She can come right in here an' set in her chair half-an-hour," said the voice, sternly.

The corners of Hilda's rosy mouth drooped dolefully. "I don't want to!" she muttered. Then her eyes brightened. "I found a nice boy, gran'ma!" she cried in a tone of triumph; "an' we've got him."

"Found what?" A rosy, spectacled face appeared at the window and was hastily withdrawn, to reappear an instant later in the open door. "Where did that child come from, Em'line?"

"I don't know, ma," said she of the sun-bonnet, smiling broadly. "I couldn't get nothin' out of him. He said he was goin' to church up on the hill; didn't he, Hildy?"

"I'm goin' to keep him to play with!" asseverated Hilda, dancing up and down and clapping her hands. "He's mine, 'cause I found him. Isn't he a nice boy, gran'ma?"

"You can come in an' set in your chair."

"Please, gran'ma!"

"Come right in!" The small, rotund figure advanced with an air of authority, before which the smaller individual wilted. With her blue eyes brimming over with tears, the child threw both arms around Immanuel's neck. "I've got to go, boy," she whispered. "Be sure you speak right up an' say, 'Yes, 'm,' an' 'No, 'm!'"

"You go in, Em'line, an' take off her wet shoes. I'll talk to this boy." The spectacles were carefully lowered now, and two brown, bird-like eyes were fixed full upon the fugitive. "Can you tell me whose little boy you are, bubby?"

"Yes, 'm; I'm God's little boy."

"I guess you'd better come in the kitchen and get a doughnut," said the old lady, pursing up her lips. "Do you like doughnuts?"

"Yes, 'm."

"Now mebbe you'll remember what your name is," said his hostess, briskly, when Immanuel had swallowed the last crumb of the crisp, brown cake.

"Yes, 'm; I didn't forget it."

"Well, what is it?"

"'Manuel Winch."

"'Manuel Winch! Why, there's Winches that lives the other side of the

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Corners, ain't there, Emmeline? They go to the Cong'egational Church. But how'd he ever get up in our strawb'ry meadow from way the other side of the Corners?"

"P'r'aps his folks was up this way, ma," suggested Emmeline, beaming placidly at the little boy across the heaped-up pan of crullers. "Don't you want 'nother doughnut, sonny?"

"I want one!" piped a little voice from the door. "I'm hungre-e!"

"Not till you're through a-settin' in your chair, miss; naughty girls can't have no doughnuts. Go right back or gran'-ma'll have to spat your han's."

"Then I'll cry!"

"Yes, indeedy! I just guess you will!" agreed her grandmother, taking two decided steps toward the small culprit who fled shrieking toward her chair. The old lady turned to the boy with a spice of severity in her manner. "Now, child, I want you should tell me just where you come from, an' how you got here."

"I—walked," said Immanuel, winking rapidly to keep back two big tears. "I wanted to find my father."

"Land! did you ever?" exclaimed Emmeline, opening her pale blue eyes to their widest. "What makes him talk so queer, do you s'pose, ma?"

"I guess he's run away; that's what I guess," said the old lady, nodding shrewdly. "Did you run away from your ma, little boy?"

Immanuel shook his head. "I'm goin' to find my father," he said doggedly.

"After supper pa or one of the boys could hitch up, couldn't they?" suggested Emmeline, looking vaguely out of the window.

"I guess that the only thing to do," said her mother, stepping briskly toward the inner room. "Now, Hildy," she began, then threw up her hands with an exclamation of horrified amaze. "Em'line, Em'line! do come here quick an' see what that child's done now! I declare I don't know what she'll think of next! She's got her gran'pa's hair-oil an' poured it all over the top of her head. It's dripping on the carpet! Fetch me a pail of hot water as quick's ever you can!"

Finding himself thus unexpectedly released from the fire of observation and interrogation, Immanuel sidled quietly out of the open door. Then, gathering headway with renewed determination, he ran swiftly across the door yard, frightening into sudden cachinnation a drove of hens which were dozing pleasantly under the lilac bushes, slipped through the palings of the whitewashed fence, and pattered noiselessly down the dusty road; across which the shadows were already stretching long and purple.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

NOT FICTION.

RULING PASSION.

A RICH miser of Paris lay a-dying, and his father-confessor placed a silver crucifix before him, and proceeded to exhort him. Fixing his eyes upon the crucifix, the usurer faintly remarked: "Alas! I cannot lend you much, sir, upon that."

NOT TRUST.

AN honest, industrious countryman had often been brought, by want of employment, into very straitened circumstances, and had experienced many evident interpositions of Divine Providence in his favour. In conversing once on the subject of God taking care of His people, the pious man observed: "It is very easy to talk of trusting in God, with plenty of provisions in the house and money in the pocket; but I do not call that trust; I call it ready money."

WHAT IT MAY BECOME.

ORDERS had been issued (during the American War) to kill all bloodhounds, as these used to be kept for hunting slaves. One day a soldier, seizing a poodle, was carrying it off to execution, in spite of the heartrending appeals of its mistress. "Madam," he said, "our orders are to kill every bloodhound." "But this is not a bloodhound." Well, madam," said the soldier, as he went away with it, "we cannot tell what it will grow into if we leave it behind."

OPPORTUNITIES are importunities. They come begging for use.

BREADTH sometimes means shallowness, but every tiny puddle is not deep.

"As I have made my bed I must lie on it." "No," answers Jesus, "take it up and walk!"

RESPONSIBILITY is ability to give an answer. But a man can't do much at the business till he has asked a good many questions.

MANY BIBLES.

THERE are many Bibles—in fact, each differs from the rest. There is the bible which a millionaire can read, and yet keep his millions, and there is the bible which a widow can read, and feel she must give her two mites. There is a bible which a man can so read that he may keep his sinfulness. There is a bible which, if another reads, he has to cry, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." There is a bible which a theologian can read, and be set thinking, thinking. There is a bible which, if another man reads, he is set doing, doing. There is a bible—a literary gem, beautiful in language, powerful in imagery, and masterly in argument. There is another bible (yet not another) which flames likes the bush in the desert of Midian with the presence of God. Which is the book to us? Word on word, page on page, small type, large type? or is it a book of messages from God, in which there is the sympathetic ring of the Loving God's voice, and the vigorous ring of the Working God's voice?

A MAN knows, and a dog knows. But the man knows that he knows, and the dog does not know that he knows.

"GIVE! give!" said the little stream. "Keep! keep!" muttered the selfish pool. But the pool dried up, the stream is running on.

"SOME men are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them." True; but for the most part men are never great at all.

A FORGOTTEN truth is no truth at all to the men who forget it. A soaked sponge, when dry, will squeeze out no water. You cannot feed a fire on ashes.

Digitized by Google

THE JESTER'S PRAYER.

THE Christmas feast was done; the King
Sought some new sport to banish care,
And to his jester cried, "Sir fool,
Kneel, now, and make for us a prayer."

The jester doffed his cap and bells,
And stood the mocking court before;
They could not see the bitter smile
Behind the patient grin he wore.

He bowed his head, and bent the knee
Upon the monarch's silken stool;
His pleading voice arose—"O Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool.

"'Tis by our FOLLIES that so long
We hold the Earth from Heaven away.
'Tis not by guilt the onward sweep
Of Truth and Right, O Lord, we stay.

"These clumsy feet, still in the mire,
Go crushing blossoms without end;
These hard, well-meaning hands we thrust
Among the heart-strings of a friend.

"Th' ill-timed truth we might have kept—
Who knows how sharp it pierced and stung?
The word we had not sense to say—
Who knows how grandly it had rung?

"Our faults no tenderness should ask—
The chastening stripe must cleanse them all;
But for our blunders,—oh! in shame
Before the eyes of Heaven we fall.

"No pity, Lord, could change the heart
From red with wrong to white as wool;
The rod should heal the sin; but, Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool.

"Earth bears no balsam for mistakes;
Men crown the knave, and scourge the tool
That did his will; — but THOU, O Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool."

The room was hushed; in silence rose
The King, and sought his garden cool,
And walked apart and murmured low,
"Be merciful to me, a fool."

Selected.

Digitized by Google

A CYNIC'S REPENTANCE.

"SO father has been gone five years," soliloquised Mark Grafton, putting down the local paper in which he had been scanning the "In Memoriam" column. "Strange that I should have stumbled on this piece of information the very day after I came back to the old neighbourhood. Well, it decides me on one point. I must go and see mother."

He got up and walked to the hotel window. On the way he stopped before his full-length reflection in a pier-glass and smiled cynically.

"There is fortunately no doubt," he said slowly, "as to the reception you will get, my dear Mark. Even your stern father himself would have welcomed a prodigal who returned in broadcloth and diamonds. Yes, my boy, the fatted calf will be killed for you and no mistake."

We pity the wanderer to whom no man gave of "the husks that the swine did eat." But how far more to be pitied is he who gets the husks, and is satisfied with them, and even persuades himself that there is nothing better even in the Father's house. Mark Grafton belonged to this class. Mistaken harshness had turned him adrift from home seven years before. He had been tossed about on the sea of life, and had at first well nigh fallen a prey to the human sharks that lie in wait for the ignorant and unwary. Then the tide had turned, and he had prospered beyond his wildest dreams. But his generous impulses had given place to a cynicism born of bitter experience. He had no faith in the disinterestedness of man or woman, and it had become a second nature with him to look for low and selfish motives at the back of every action.

And yet even as he spoke, his conscience pricked him. He could not quite forget the patience of his gentle mother, how she had borne with his waywardness and tried to shield him from his father's suspicious anger. He remembered another woman too, a fair-faced girl of eighteen when he left her. For the first time for years he recalled the details of their parting. And he had never written!

"Pshaw!" he exclaimed suddenly. "What a fool I am! Most likely she married long ago, and forgot my existence before I forgot her. My knowledge of the world has taught me enough for that."

He paced the room restlessly, then as if mastered by a sudden impulse, opened a trunk and turned out from it a torn and threadbare coat and trousers, an old pair of shoes, and a much-battered hat.

"Curious," he murmured, "that these should come in useful. I wasn't such a fool for keeping them after all."

In five minutes Mark Grafton was metamorphosed. His faultless collar and cuffs were soiled and crumpled, his diamond pin replaced by a tawdry imitation jewel, and in another five minutes he was on his road to his old home. His native village lay six miles away, and his path lay across lonely fields. It was Sunday afternoon and the air was full of Sabbath peace and quiet.

"No." The smart servant shook her head superciliously. "Mrs. Grafton hasn't lived here the last five years. She lives over there"—pointing some distance up the road to a tiny two-roomed cottage.

Mark Grafton felt another twinge of conscience. So his mother had been in actual poverty all these years.

He tapped at the cottage door. There was no answer, so he lifted the latch and entered. The room was empty. Of course, he might have known his mother would be at afternoon service. His quick glance took in the little room and all its contents. There were a few articles of furniture that he remembered from his childhood—the old clock, his father's chair, and there—yes! that was his own portrait opposite the door, and, on a bracket underneath, a tiny bunch of old-fashioned, sweet-scented flowers. An unwonted lump came in his throat. Stay, what was that on the table by the door? A large envelope, addressed in shaky characters to himself! What could it mean? His mother could by no possibility have known that he was in the neighbourhood. And the ink looked faded and brown. He tore it open, and for the first time for years tears filled his eyes. She knew he would come back some day, the note said, and because she feared he might return when she was not there to welcome him, she always left the door unlocked and placed this letter where he might see it, that he might be sure of her loving welcome. She was waiting for him, thinking of him, praying for him always.

Digitized by Google

THE WOMAN LOOKED ROUND WITH SUDDEN INTUITION.

How he hated himself for his unworthy subterfuge. How small it looked, before the loving, great-hearted words he had just read! He walked slowly down the street and passed noiselessly through the church-porch into the aisle. The congregation were singing the hymn before the sermon. He leant against a pillar and scanned them. There, just in front of him was his mother, her face rapt and beautiful. And who was the fair-haired woman at the organ? Was it——? yes, it surely was Ella Richardson. His pulses quickened in spite of himself at sight of her. Seven years ago! Well, she at any rate would not want him in his rags. What a sentimental fool he was getting! The sneer returned to his lip.

The hymn was finished and the text was given out.

"Whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein."

The preacher was not one who was content with arbitrary dogmatism. He widened his definition of the Kingdom of

Digitized by Google

God till it was as broad as human life, and he showed how inevitably the door into all that was best and highest and truest was shut against him who had lost the little child spirit—the spirit of love, of trust, of faith in the goodness of God and in the goodness planted by Him in human hearts. In the Kingdom of Love, the Kingdom of Hope, the Kingdom of Truth, there was no room for the hard, cynical, sneering spirit. And he ended with a passionate appeal to his hearers to open mind and heart to the gracious influences of Him who came to lead men and women back into the child-like attitude towards the Father of us all.

Mark fell on his knees as the congregation bowed their heads. He had thought himself so rich; now he saw how starved and poor he was in the midst of material prosperity. His ragged clothing was the fit garb for one who had lost the precious jewels of faith and hope and love. He had compared himself in jest that morning to the prodigal; now the prodigal's prayer went up in earnest from his soul:—

"Father, I have sinned against Heaven and before Thee!"

He forgot the presence of others, and his breath came in laboured gasps. The woman in the pew in front raised her head and looked round with a sudden intuition. . . . . .

. . . . . .

"And you have been hard up, mother, all these years?"

"No, no, dear! I am better off than I look. But I have saved every penny I could. I knew you would come home some day, and might want it. It is all yours, Mark. We have watched for you all the time—Ella and I!"

[THE END.]

IN FULL BLOSSOM.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

How the GERMANS took LONDON

An Imaginative Sketch that might be Realistic.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS EVENTS.

Great Britain is at war with the State of Uliska, and it appears that Germany intends to have some say in the settlement of terms offered by us to Uliska. Yet, in spite of this, no one suspects that an order issued by Germany to German residents in London to return home means anything, but on one Sunday evening, the very Sunday they all leave from Fenchurch-street and other stations, the German Ambassador declares war. England is found to be isolated, her communication with the outside world cut off, her fleets called away by fraudulent use of a stolen cypher book. Operations are then carried on on the Sunday in the district around Burnham and Creeksea Ferry. The telegraph wires are cut, and the fort at Shoebury surprised and captured. Then Southend is reached from Shoebury early in the morning. Meanwhile on the water the commander of the German ironclad, lying off Sheerness, invites the officers in charge of the forts at Sheerness and the naval officers in the ships to a banquet. While there a fire breaks out at the docks, to which the German commander sends a large number of men ostensibly to put out the flames, and after they have gone he tells the remaining guests that war has broken out.

"I HAVE to inform you that Germany has declared war against your country," so said the commander of the German ironclad to his guests. Then holding up his hand, he continued—"Yes, gentlemen, I grieve to say that such is the fact, and I crave your earnest attention while I make a few further remarks." [It was now past twelve.] "I must inform you that (taking out his watch) from this moment England and Germany are at war, but I am permitted to tell you that such is the attack we contemplate, that I have every reason to suppose that, although war is now only just declared, all here present may live to meet again within the week as friends and not as foes. Much depends upon yourselves as to the extent of damage that may be done, or the number of lives lost. When I tell you that at this moment the Sans Pareil is probably in our possession, I can, of course, hardly expect you to believe me, but I feel sure that such is the case."

Noticing the terribly agitated state of his guests he begged them to hear him to the end. Continuing, he said, "I have only to fire a rocket from here, and your beautiful ship lies at the bottom of the sea, and God help those on board her. Two rockets sent up from here would cause the best of your vessels at Chatham to be treated in the same manner. Similar steps have been taken elsewhere, and by now a powerful German fleet is within five miles of you, only awaiting my signals to begin wholesale slaughter and damage. I may further tell you, gentlemen, that nothing can prevent our having 150,000 or 200,000 troops in the City of London by Monday night, and when I tell you this, you may perhaps realise what I mean when I say I expect—and may I say I hope—we shall meet again as friends ere the week is past. Now, gentlemen, your position is this. I want you to remain with me, in fact I must detain you until daylight, because I want you to see the force of what I am going to tell you now. Before daylight you will probably see signal rockets sent up from Shoeburyness announcing to me the fact that all is well with us there. By daylight you will see troops disembarking at Southend Pier. I have already sent to take possession of the head of the pier, and our troops from Shoeburyness will do what is necessary at the other end before you and I are many hours older. Daylight will also show you a balloon appearing over Shoeburyness if all continues to go well there, and, by mid-day, all the heavy ordnance you have there likely to be of any use to us will be trained upon your own vessels and forts. Daylight will further reveal to you the fact that a portion of our fleet will be stationed at the mouth of this very busy waterway, and will be gradually accumulating all the larger of the trading vessels and steamers passing out or coming into this river. The object of this is threefold: Firstly, to form a bulwark of your own vessels that will ensure us a certain amount of protection in the event of attack; secondly, to secure a large number of vessels that would be valuable as prizes; and, thirdly, to place ourselves in a better position for securing an early termination of hostilities. Now, gentlemen, you have a very accurate idea of our plan of campaign, but this is the use I wish you to make of the information I have conveyed to you. So sure are we of absolute success, that I want you to realise the utter futility of resistance, and use all your endeavours to avoid useless loss of life and needless destruction of property. I propose to put you on shore in the morning, that you may place yourselves in communication with your authorities; but in the meantime I must ask you to sign an armistice that shall only apply to the immediate locality, and last for forty-eight hours. I must ask you to do this to save the lives of hundreds of brave men, and a terrible destruction of property, as by this time your own guns (those of the Sans Pareil) are trained at point blank range on your own fortifications. Gentlemen, you have not heard any firing or sounds of disturbance, yet you may be sure I am not deceiving you. Your vessel has been quietly captured, partly as a result of that little affair in the Dockyard, gentlemen, which I may tell you was part of the programme, and consequently by this time some of our torpedo boats have quietly passed up the Medway to await my further instructions, which can, of course, be instantaneous. So now, please, gentlemen, realise what I am saying to you."

Digitized by Google

Here a young officer made a dash for the door, with the evident intention of jumping overboard, and trusting to be able to swim ashore and give the alarm, but the door was locked from the outside.

The Commander smiled and continued, "Thousands of your countrymen will live to be grateful to their dying day, if, under stress of the most pardonable circumstances, you for the time being, sink your pride—I know what this means to an Englishman—and collectively sign a document that, for the time being ensures the lives of an unknown number of brave men. Think of the women and children, and the millions of valuable property that can be destroyed in the next few hours if you decide not to grant my wish. You have, I say, only to sign a letter to your officers acquainting them with the state of affairs, and instructing them not to take hostile steps of any sort for the space of twenty-four hours. I should, perhaps, tell you, gentlemen, that at the present moment England is isolated from the entire world. All cable communication has been cut off. You will also find in the morning that I have taken effectual steps for blocking the Thames and Medway for many a day to come, should it be necessary to sink the requisite number of vessels. And now, gentlemen, I will leave you to confer amongst yourselves as to the granting of my request, and I propose to return at two a.m. for your answer, but please understand that time is of the utmost importance to you and yours.

"As the English Minister would only get the formal declaration of war at midnight, you see, gentlemen, we have a good start, and hours must elapse before any organised means of defence can be arranged, so you have little hope of interference with our plans here."

Digitized by Google

EVENTS ON THE Sans Pareil.

About five minutes to twelve, a cutter from the German man-of-war reached the Sans Pareil, an officer mounted the gangway and enquired for the officer in charge. He requested a private interview in his cabin; this being granted he quickly explained his errand to the officer in question—a lieutenant—the poor fellow being terribly taken aback on being told that war had been declared by Germany, and that steps had been taken to torpedo his vessel at five minutes' notice. He was loth to believe anything of the sort, until it was explained that the fire in the docks was created on purpose to draw some of the crew off in order to minimise the contemplated loss of life. The real facts did not strike him at the moment; he was further told that all the officers dining aboard the German warship were now prisoners of war, and that if he would now come on deck, he would find a German torpedo boat alongside prepared to take off the remainder of the crew preparatory to sinking the ship. On going up he found this was the case; he was then advised to pipe all hands on deck, the German officer suggesting that, in order to save unpleasant explanations at a critical moment—his orders being to sink the ship by 12.30, when his vessel was going to open fire on the forts—he should say further assistance had been required in the dockyard (it was a fact that other fires continued to break out in a most mysterious manner), and as all the boats belonging to the Sans Pareil were ashore, it would appear that this was the quicker way of getting them on board for conveyance to the dockyard (as they supposed). The lieutenant then blew his whistle, and the men remaining on board soon came tumbling on deck. They were somewhat astonished on being ordered aboard the torpedo boat. In the darkness they did not notice that she was a strange craft, but somehow they were quickly given to understand that they were wanted ashore to aid in extinguishing the fire still furiously blazing in the dockyard, so they were soon aboard. They did not then know that every man jack of them was clear of the vessel. The instant the last man was on board the torpedo boat she steamed off as if making for the shore. When well under weigh she gave three "toots" and then made straight for the German ship. While this was taking place a number of boats dashed off from the shore and headed straight for the Sans Pareil. These were the German sailors who were supposed to have gone to assist at the fire, and who in five minutes were on board, and in full charge of the Sans Pareil. The English sailors now, of course, suspected a trap, but by this time they were being brought alongside the German ship, when they found themselves covered by armed marines lining the vessel, and ordered on deck, and in five minutes they were all prisoners of war.

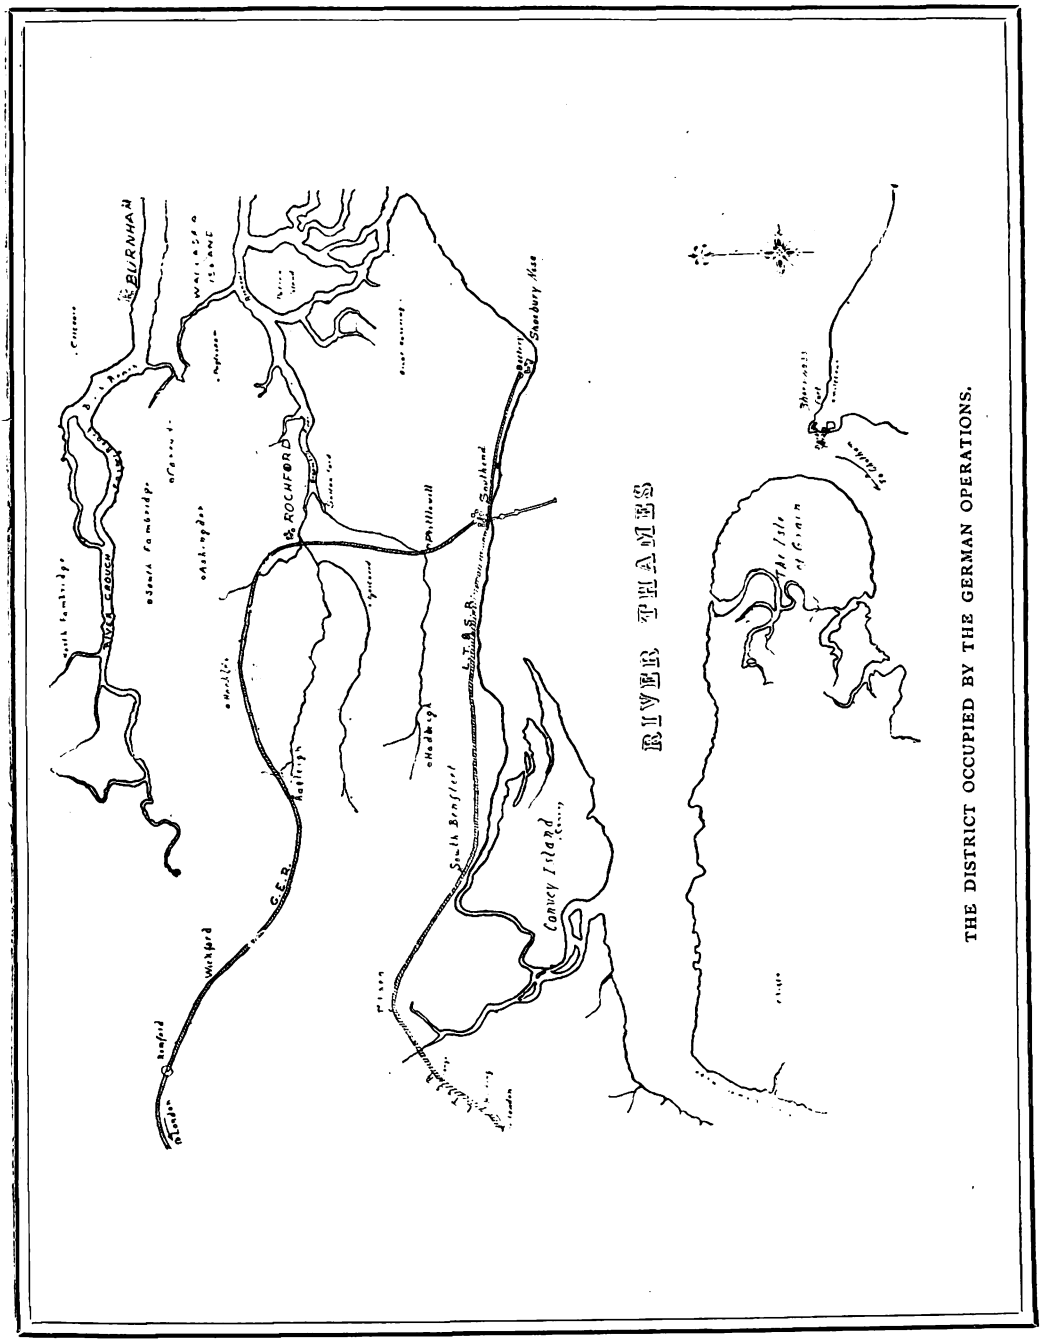
It should be mentioned that a second contingent of men had been sent for from the Sans Pareil owing to the increase of the fire—practically fresh outbreaks in the dockyard cleverly brought about by the two men who, it will be remembered, had gone ashore from the German ironclad earlier in the evening, and who by this time had quietly returned on board.

At two o'clock Commander Hoffman returned to the officers (English) he had left in conference, bringing with him the lieutenant who had been left in charge of the Sans Pareil, and who had been so neatly tricked. He, poor fellow, was certainly an object to pity, and when he saw his fellow officers (looking very glum at being found in this predicament by a junior) he burst into tears, purely out of chagrin. However, the German admiral could not afford to lose any time—he had an anxious and agitated look as he enquired the result of their deliberations.

It had devolved upon the Rear Admiral commanding the Sans Pareil to draft up a round robin for the signature of all the parties concerned. Poor fellows, they had an anxious time of it, and they showed it. They had no option but to sign what, as regards their future, might prove to be their death warrant, or something equally bad, if not worse in the eyes of their fellow men. However, they had decided to comply with the request submitted to them, and they had each signed the following document:—

"We, the undersigned officers in her Majesty's service, having accepted an invitation with others to dine with the Commander of a warship flying the German flag, and which hospitality we accepted in all good faith, and being the

Digitized by Google



THE DISTRICT OCCUPIED BY THE GERMAN OPERATIONS.

Digitized by Google

remaining guests at the close of the evening, when, just upon the stroke of midnight our host suddenly gave us the astonishing information that his Government had declared war against England, and from that moment we might consider ourselves prisoners of war.

"Our host then proceeded to give us an outline of the proposed campaign, which was so startlingly simple, and yet promised such great success, that we were induced to listen to his motives for giving us such complete details, and, judging by the successful accomplishment of certain operations in our immediate vicinity, we were further induced to believe that we were practically helpless in the matter, and that our best policy—both for the saving of many lives and much valuable property—was to grant an armistice for 48 hours, solely for the reasons put forward by our host: hoping in the meantime to get confirmation from our Government as to the outbreak of war, and instructions as to our future line of offence or defence, and more particularly hoping by that time that some of our own vessels would be coming to our assistance. We have therefore sent the necessary instructions to those in charge of fortifications."

Signatures of Officers.

The German commander was asked to attest the document, and a copy of the same, voluntarily undertaking to attach also a statement which particularly gave the contents of his appeal to them.

And thus was another important point gained of the greatest strategical advantage, as will quickly be noted.

The instant the German admiral had secured the dispatch of authenticated copies to the forts and batteries ashore, conveyed by junior officers of the Sans Pareil, who were, of course, qualified to corroborate the statements contained in each document, he ordered certain signals to be made by rockets, which in a few short minutes were replied to from a point some distance down the river. Now all day long on Saturday the German vessels of war lying off various ports in the south of England, steamed off to rendezvous at the mouth of the Thames, timing themselves to reach there about dusk.

It will be remembered that a number of vessels were now lying off Tilbury, ostensibly for the purpose of picking up the Germans coming from London. These vessels had on board a large number of soldiers, who had been kept carefully under cover. Some dozen vessels similarly laden were off Southend pier, and when morning broke nearly the whole German fighting fleet were in the river, and had drawn a cordon of ironclads, cruisers, and torpedo boats right across the mouth of the Thames, and were busily collecting a whole fleet of steamers (English vessels) of all descriptions, large and small. These were being placed in the best positions for warding off torpedo attacks or shell fire from the English guns, either from the front or behind. Similar steps had been taken at early daylight to protect the Sans Pareil (now, for the time being, German), and in five minutes sufficient English vessels could have been sunk in the rear of the Sans Pareil—which, it must be remembered, had not been removed from her moorings—to block the Medway for a whole week.

It will now be seen what a splendid position had been taken up by the German fleet. They could not be covered by guns in either front or rear. They held a large fleet of valuable vessels as hostages, increasing in number hour by hour. Timely notice of the approach of an opposing fleet would be given by their scouts, who in turn would warn those now in charge of Shoeburyness. Thus the English vessels would be engaged by their own guns at Shoeburyness, while the German fleet was lying in comparative safety, and, at the same time, able to do some damage in attack.

The crews had been allowed to remain on board the vessels captured, but they were notified that should they attempt an escape, or interfere with any of the German warships during an action or otherwise, they would be instantly torpedoed.

As the soldiers disembarked and landed from the pier, they were at once marched off to the railway station, where train after train of empty carriages had been accumulating during the morning, showing that by some means both lines of rail were fully under control, the fact being that as they discharged their freights of German emigrants — now civilian soldiers guarding the lines of communication—they were brought on to Southend to pick up the troops now being landed and who were destined for London. All day long the German troops poured unchecked into the town, whence they rapidly steamed away in the direction of London. No private passenger traffic was allowed to take place, and it was announced that none could be carried on until further notice. All goods traffic was likewise entirely stopped.

Digitized by Google

Monday morning arrived, and still the Germans came in shoals, and it was computed that in 24 hours some 45,000 men had passed through in the direction of London.

We may now turn to events happening at Tilbury. It will be remembered that the German cruiser Schwalbe, fully manned, was lying off the fort. About 11 o'clock on Saturday night a launch left this vessel, passing over to the Essex shore, landing three men at the Railway Company's stage. These passed into the station, then into the docks, enquiring for a certain vessel known to be berthed there. Watching their opportunity, these three men quietly separated, and some ten minutes later two outbreaks of fire were noticed. The alarm was soon given, and although it was at once seen that they were both acts of incendiarism, and likely to give some trouble, it was only a question of getting all possible help as quickly as possible. Someone soon suggested sending for the soldiers at the fort. A messenger hurried off at once, and in half an hour's time some hundred men were on their way to assist. After this the launch might have been seen quietly returning to the cruiser, and later, some half dozen boats were making rapidly for the aforesaid landing stage, each crowded with men, ostensibly going to render friendly aid at the docks. They were, however, landed for quite a different purpose. A couple of these men took the road to the fort. Walking up to the sentry, they enquired in good English if further assistance could be sent to the docks, and asked him to get a message to the officer in charge. Calling up one of the guard, he sent word to the officer in command. While he was gone, the two casually enquired how many men remained in the fort. They were told not more than 25 or 30. The messenger was now returning to say a few more men could be despatched. They then retired in the direction of the docks, followed a few minutes later by the second batch of soldiers sent from the fort. These having passed on, a half dozen men next appeared, making their way to the fort, carrying a body on a stretcher. On reaching the fort entrance, the sentry was given to understand that one of the soldiers had been injured in the docks. They were allowed to pass in, when they immediately laid down their burden and pounced upon the astonished sentry. He was quickly and effectually gagged. One of the half-dozen men then stepped outside the gateway and flashed a lantern. This was the signal agreed upon. The remainder of the men landed from the cruiser came doubling up and were all inside the fort in less than ten minutes. This commotion caused the members of the guard to turn out, when they were instantly seized. A rush was then made to the officers' quarters, and inside ten minutes they were—with the remaining men—safely under guard. Steps were immediately taken to signal to the cruiser. The boats returned for another complement of men, who, to avoid suspicion, were also rowed to the landing stage, so that by half-past twelve some 300 of the invaders were in safe possession of Tilbury Fort, and steps were being taken to capture the soldiers returning from the fire, an easy matter under the circumstances.

Folks on the Gravesend shore who were watching the progress of the fire in the docks had witnessed the departure of the two detachments from the German warship, but unfortunately they could not see what was taking place under the opposite sea wall. Later on they were puzzled considerably by the sudden flight of three rockets from the cruiser, but no one could give a satisfactory explanation, and naturally none could guess the real significance of the incident.

It was known that some few thousand Germans leaving London were to embark at Tilbury, but the majority of the "wiseheads" were inclined to think the matter was in some way connected with the preparations being made for their reception.

At two o'clock, signs of a general stir were noticed on the vessels lying off the docks which were said to be chartered for the foreign passengers. Half an hour later scores of boats put off for the Tilbury shore, but instead of being occupied only by the men necessary to propel them, they were seen to be crowded with men, and some could swear they saw the glint of arms in the flickering lights displayed on the masts of the vessels anchored in the river. And they were not far wrong, because, as a matter of fact, hundreds of German soldiers were being rapidly put on shore from vessels supposed to be awaiting a cargo of German clerks. Backwards and forwards the boats kept passing, until it became a fact that 5,000 men were on the Essex shore in full possession of the docks, railway station, and, most important of all, Tilbury Fort. Yet not a shot had been heard.

Digitized by Google

We must now turn our attention to operations in a different quarter. Up to the present, we find the Germans firmly established on the Thames; one of our best-known ironclads quietly captured with the entire crew; a fort halfway up the river, within 20 miles of London, and its garrison now all prisoners, a very small number truly, but its guns, such as they were, available for the deadliest work at the closest quarters.

Shoeburyness, with another small—stupidly small—garrison for a place of its importance, captured, and effectively occupied by 2,000 men. A large portion of the German fleet, reinforced by the Sans Pareil, safely located and effectively protected at the mouth of the Thames; troops pouring ashore by tens of thousands, establishing themselves within 40 miles of London; two important lines of railway leading direct to the Metropolis fully controlled from end to end by the enemy; a base of operations also secured on another waterway—the Crouch—all these operations successfully carried out within 12 hours after the declaration of war, and before nineteen twentieths of the population knew anything of the outbreak of the war. Hitherto not a single life was known to be lost.

Both experts and non-experts will doubtless ridicule the whole idea of such important operations being carried out in the way described. I respectfully submit that where stratagem is carefully employed, it is possible to be successful to this degree, particularly when bearing in mind that the invaders knew war was to be, and had been declared, but the invaded did not. A week's start in preparations for a carefully thought-out campagin makes all the difference in the world to the invader. It will also doubtless be contended that such an accumulation of an enemy's vessels could not cross over to our shores without exciting suspicion, but it must be noted that a very large number of men were already at their destination, brought over in our own vessels, hired previously by the enemy, and, of course, for the time being, flying the English flag, war not having been declared until 12 o'clock at midnight on the Saturday; again the Germans had what was already a mobilised army corps in the heart of the City. As to the enemy's warships, many were already at different points on our coast within easy steaming distance of the mouth of the Thames, ostensibly waiting for coal previous to conveying the transports to China. And it was an easy matter for any number of vessels to leave German ports, and steam direct to our coast after dark on Saturday, so that, a safe approach having been secured to the two points of disembarkation—a fact which was naturally soon communicated by signal—it was a simple matter for the Germans to land the number of men sufficient for the purpose particularly in view. The scene of operations selected by them was, as we can see, perfect for their purpose; not a single fortified town existed on the line of march, not a single spot necessitated the detaching of a very large body of men to protect the lines of communication.

The now small garrison at Colchester was not worthy of the slightest consideration; Warley still less so, and no body of Volunteers could possibly be mobilised in the Eastern Counties that would have had the slightest chance to be of use in time; and as they were sure of getting control of the railways converging upon the very heart of the City (their object in view), making it possible to stop all goods and passenger traffic, the question of transporting any number of men to London was only a matter of a few hours when once they were landed, and this was not a difficult matter, as has been shown. The result of placing 200,000 men in the very heart of the City was, of course, of the very greatest importance, but, once there, the rest was easy, especially bearing in mind that the German fleet was safely established—it might be said "entrenched"—at the mouth of the Thames, and in full control of the life stream of the Empire, the main artery of the English nation.

Digitized by Google

We now have to follow the proceedings at the railway stations in the City. It had been arranged that the first train should leave each station at 12.30 a.m. The object of this was to delay getting them away too quickly from the confines of the City, the German military authorities having arranged to arm all these men. Those who did not leave by the earlier trains were destined to hold the approaches to the City until the regular troops could be rushed from Harwich and Southend, and when sufficient of these had arrived the civilian soldiers (or rather soldiers in civilian dress, as many of them were, drafted quietly over during the week, with definite instructions as to their mode of procedure at a certain critical time, now close at hand) were to be hurried down the line, detrained at certain points, then told off in pairs, equi-distant apart, to patrol the line, a rifle and a bayonet being served out to each on arrival at their destination. These had, of course, been consigned early in the week to the desired spots, and it was only necessary to go to the goods station and get out the cases. It now becomes evident why each man had been ordered to travel with his overcoat, railway rug, and provisions for two days. The whole thing was working like clockwork.

As each train left the platform some men—especially told off for the purpose—were busily employed in handing in at the carriage windows printed circulars. This was not done until the train actually started. To account for this it is necessary to say that the contents of these circulars (of course, printed in German) conveyed to the departing Germans the astounding intelligence of the outbreak of war, the object of their departure, and the nature of the duties they were to perform on reaching their destination. A hint was conveyed that the campaign would prove to be very short; there was no reason for them to expect any organised attack; and they were only to act in defence of themselves. They were further told that the notices issued to the public for general circulation down the line would go far to prevent their having any trouble; but in any case they were not to allow anyone to trespass on the line under their charge.

This was military service at short notice with a vengeance, but they knew there was no getting out of it. Some were inclined to enjoy the situation, and all sorts of jokes were cracked, chiefly at their employers' expense, but the majority were disposed to think this invasion of England rather "a tall order." However, the work quietly proceeded till about two o'clock, when matters took rather a different turn. At both Liverpool Street and Fenchurch Street at about the same moment parties of men, armed with revolvers, took charge of all wires and signal boxes. The same thing was timed to happen at Harwich and Tilbury simultaneously, and later at Southend.

All the officials on the spot were gathered together, and then addressed by a German officer. A number of these were now to be seen in full uniform. The situation fully explained to the wondering captives they were then locked up and placed under guard on the station premises, being expressly warned (this in case of an escape) not to interfere in any way, under penalty of death, with the working of the lines or wires.

By degrees during the night, all railway stations and signal boxes were placed under the care of the civilian soldiers; the signalmen were replaced by skilled German railway men and telegraphists; all goods traffic was stopped, and intimation was conveyed to the station-masters (English) that they were to announce that, until further notice, all passenger and goods traffic would cease.

A double line of sentries from the "army of clerks" was placed all down the line from Liverpool Street to Ilford, and from Ilford to Brentwood a single file of sentries at a greater distance apart was considered sufficient, but at Brentwood a stronger force was on duty with Maxims (it will be seen how the garrison had been dealt with elsewhere), and Chelmsford was treated in the same way. Below this, only small detachments were considered necessary, but, to avoid risk, engines with a truck on which a Maxim had been placed, in charge of half a score of men were used for patrolling the line. At Colchester the line was in charge of the regulars, as we shall see; and so, on down to Harwich, the line was carefully patrolled and guarded, a matter that would have been utterly impossible in the time without the aid of the "civilian" army corps mobilised in London.

[To be concluded in our next issue.]

Digitized by Google

CHESHUNT COLLEGE:
Past and Present.

SELINA, Countess of Huntingdon, the founder of Cheshunt, was a curious and somewhat self-willed personality, and at a time when many of the nobility and gentry gave themselves up to licence, her religious enthusiasm appeared little less than fanaticism. But her burning desire to see the Gospel preached induced her to start the formation of many village chapels, and they are still to be discovered in various parts of the country. It became increasingly clear, however, that if this work were to be successful it would have to be entrusted to thoroughly trained men; but at the time there was no such institution to be used. This condition of things would have daunted any less ardent-minded person, but simply proved to her a provocation to start one on her own account. Wales was selected as the seat of the first efforts, and in Talgarth, Breconshire, the Countess leased Trevecca House, and founded "The Apostolic Society," and from it one hundred and fifty ministers were sent out. It was not till after her death in 1791, that her SIDE VIEW OF COLLEGE.

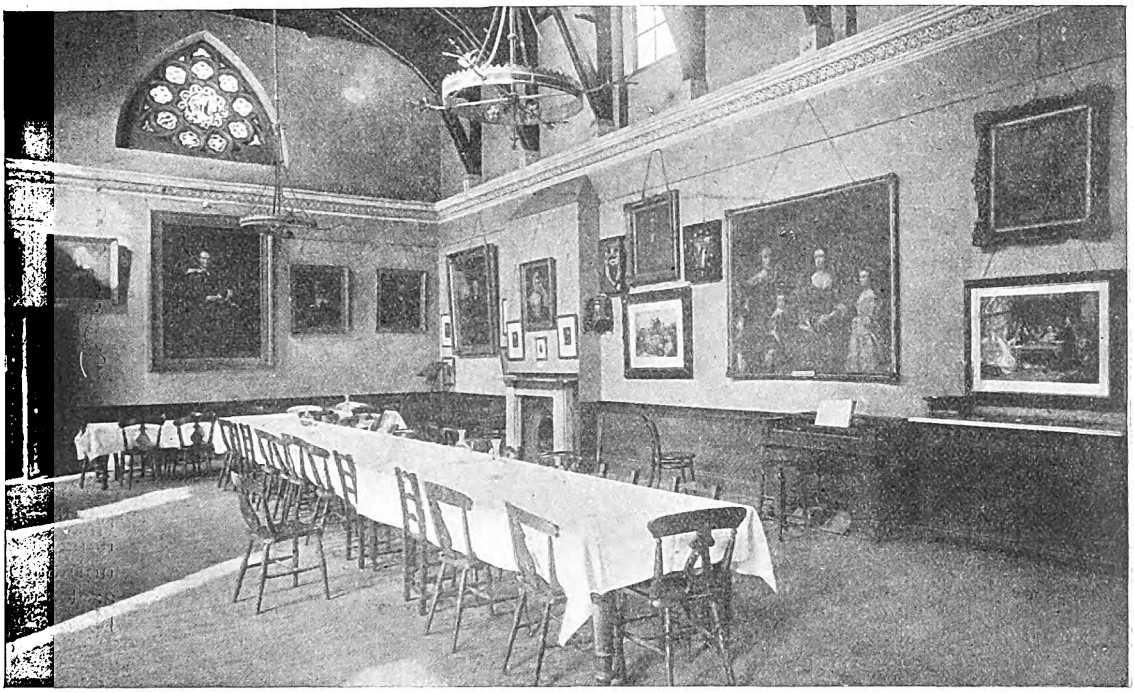
Digitized by Google



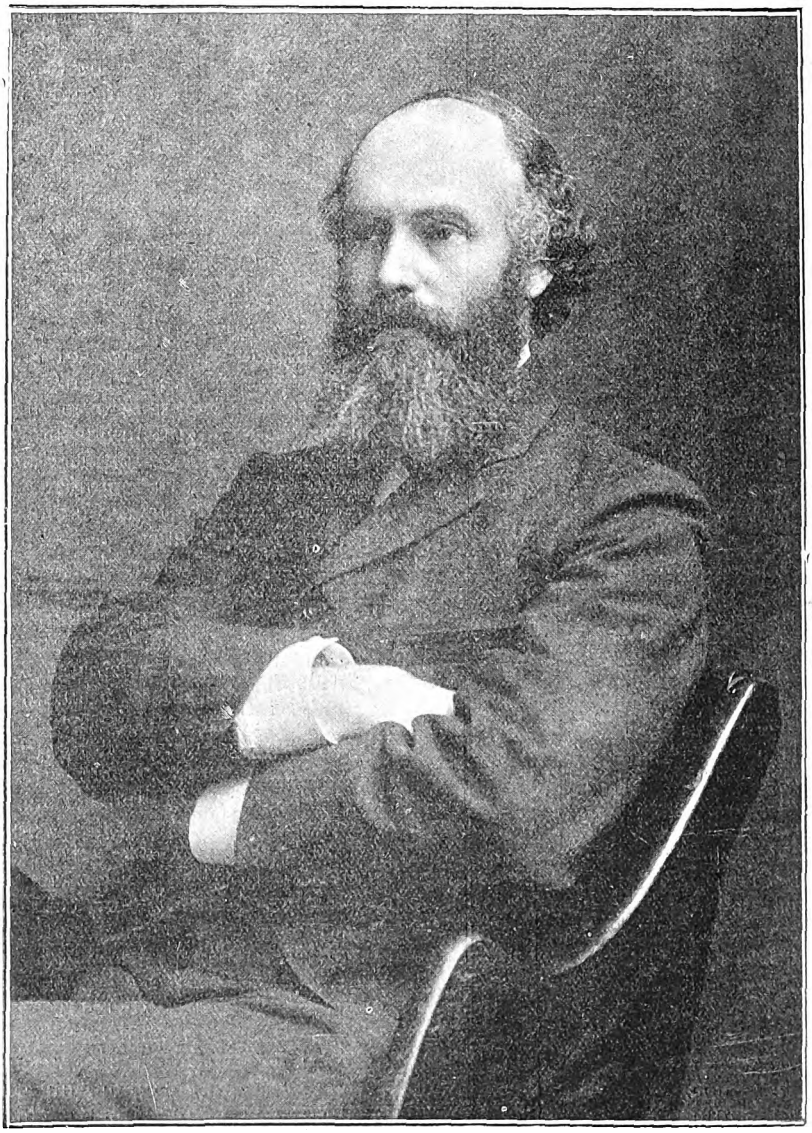
THE DINING HALL.

trustees purchased the house at Cheshunt with nine acres of grounds attached, and it is there that the work of training students for the ministry at home and for mission work abroad has proceeded ever since. The old College of those days has its place now taken by modernised and enlarged buildings with chapel, Principal's house, lecture rooms and new wing, library and dining hall, and in place of the old curriculum of study there is now a far more severe course, owing to the fact that the College is now recognised as one of the Theological Schools of the London University.

The eleven acres of the grounds at Cheshunt are, in the spring and summertime, fully worth a special visit from London, and, year by year, many hundreds of people go down to the famous "Cheshunt Anniversary." This fête is very characteristic of Cheshunt College. Opening with special reading of the Morning Service of the Established Church Common Prayer Book, a sermon follows by a Dissenting minister, chosen from any denomination and any school of thought. Spurgeon and Baldwin Brown, Binney and Dale, Fairbairn and Clifford, Monro Gibson and Robert Horton have uttered their messages in the little pulpit which is put up for the occasion, half of which is in the chapel and half of it in the grounds, so that the preacher really faces the wall. As for the presidents at the anniversary, they have varied from Lord Shaftesbury to Dean Stanley and Dean Farrar. Cheshunt, in fact, has long been a ground where Church and Dissent have met together, not as foes, but friends, retaining the traditions of the founder, Lady Huntingdon, who kept her friends in "the old church" while she herself founded "A New Connexion." And this tendency still shows in the retaining of the Church prayers in her chapels, and also in the fact that not a few of the students enter the Church after their five or six years' study at Cheshunt.

No mention of the old College would be complete without reference to the man who could say with perfect truth concerning the students who have gone out in the last thirty-five years—"Ye are my epistles, read and known of all men." From 1860 to 1895! Thirty-five years! Years forming part of a period of critical thought, to keep pace with which must have taxed the profoundest scholarship and most alert intellect. Yet Dr. Rey-

Digitized by Google

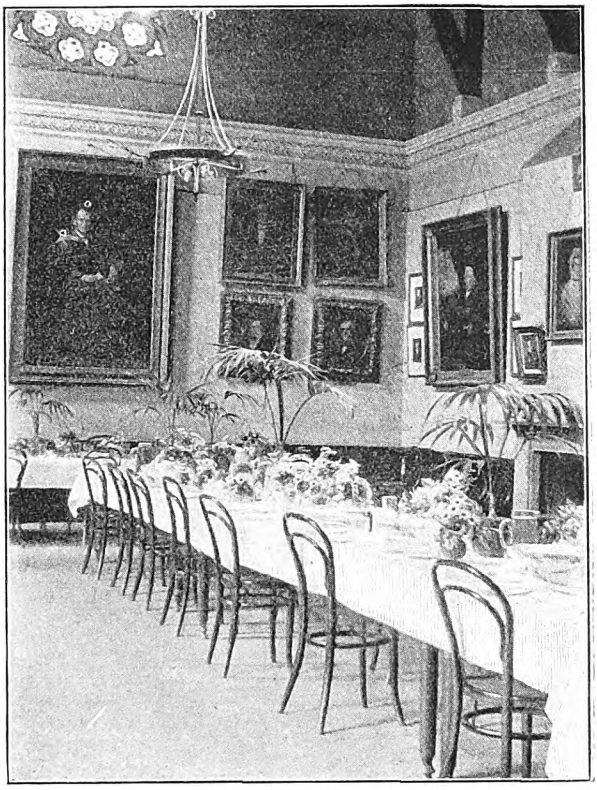


REV. O. C. WHITEHOUSE, M.A., D.D.,
Principal of Cheshunt.

Digitized by Google

nolds not only proved by his contributions to theological literature that he had done this, but he was able to inspire others to go forth in these trying times and prove themselves workmen that need not be be ashamed.

The names of Wardlaw M'Call, Colmer Symes, William Essery, Dr. Deane, Professor Shearer, Urijah Thomas, William Braden, Septimus March, "Bishop" Richardson, Wardlaw Thompson, W. Garrett Horder, Professor Lyon Turner, James Mountain, Charles New, John Yonge, Professor Whitehouse, Rhys Evans, Hirst Hollowell, Alexander Sandison, H. H. Carlisle, and of many younger men, the zenith of whose influence is not yet reached, bear testimony to the stimulus of his training. And in the mission field, amongst a large brotherhood, the names of G. O. Newport, James Gilmour, and James Chalmers are fitting representatives of the zeal with which many foreign labourers were fired at Cheshunt, and which has flamed ever since. Nearly 300 students passed through his theological classes, always urged by him to face fearlessly the questions of the times. One of Dr. Reynolds' favourite pieces of advice to his students was to make their own theology. And by the methods he adopted to induce research among them he certainly encouraged the practice.



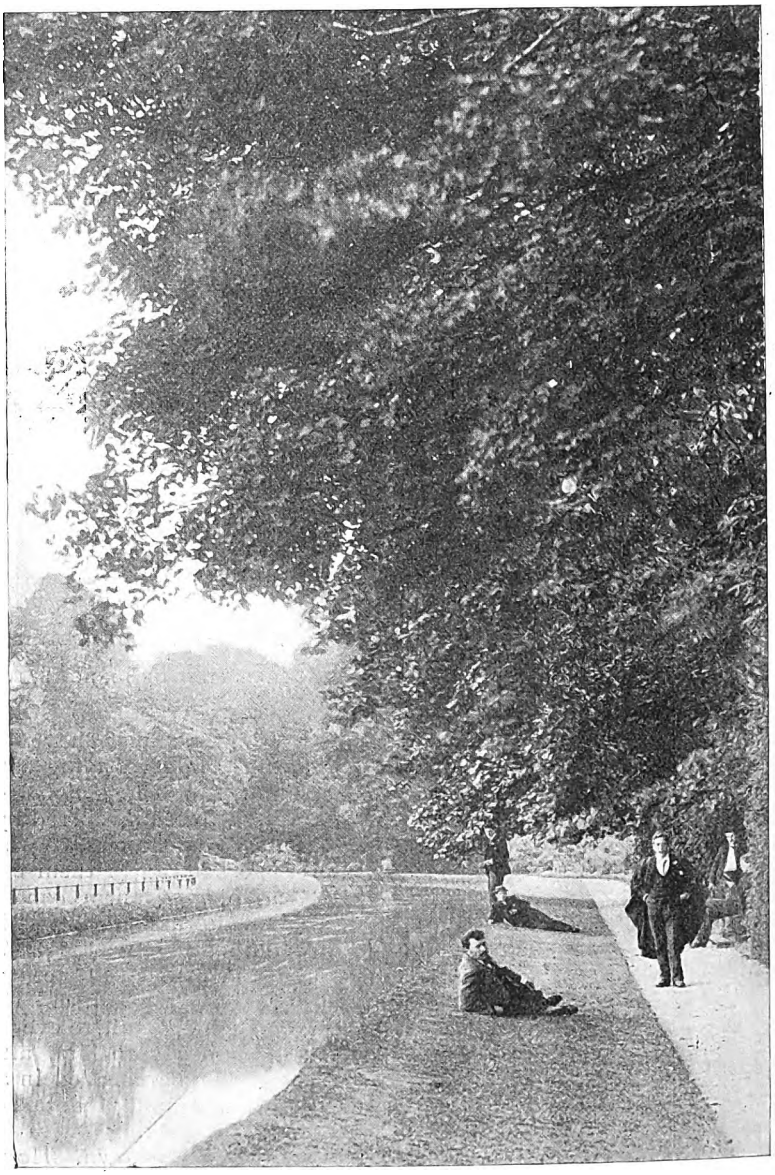
ANOTHER VIEW OF DINING HALL.

The theological course under Dr. Reynolds was no mere cramming with dogma, but an incitement to personal and careful study of the foundations on which we rest our faith. Questioning was not snubbed but invited, and though an occasional questioner concerning the deity of Christ might be smilingly told to "See my commentary on St. John!" most queries were discussed till the objector was satisfied. Excelling in power of New Testament exegesis, Dr. Reynolds had the great gift of being able to impart a real love of it to his students. In the ecclesiastical history classes, he plunged his sword into ancient heretics with a zeal which would have done credit to Cyril of Alexandria, and as a result many a missionary, who has now to encounter a resurrection of the heresies which assailed the faith of the Early Church, must have felt better equipped for wisely dealing with them.

It is not, however, simply as a teacher that he will be remembered by old Cheshunt men. Memories of the personal interest he showed in them come uppermost. None of them can forget the occasional afternoons spent with Mrs. Reynold and himself, when the professor (never very prominent) was altogether laid aside and the friend showed itself. For courtesy to his students was there ever his equal? The writer has seen him, although unwell, standing bareheaded in a draughty corridor, uncapping because a student while talking with him had naturally doffed his own. How well, too, we remember the hearty handshake he would give us all after the Saturday morning prayer meeting, and his tactful inquiries concerning our personal work. These are the memories which cling to us all and make us feel that his death has left a great gap in the old college.

Dr. Reynolds's successor at Cheshunt, Rev. O. C. Whitehouse, M.A., DD.,

Digitized by Google



THE RIVER RUNNING THROUGH THE GROUNDS.

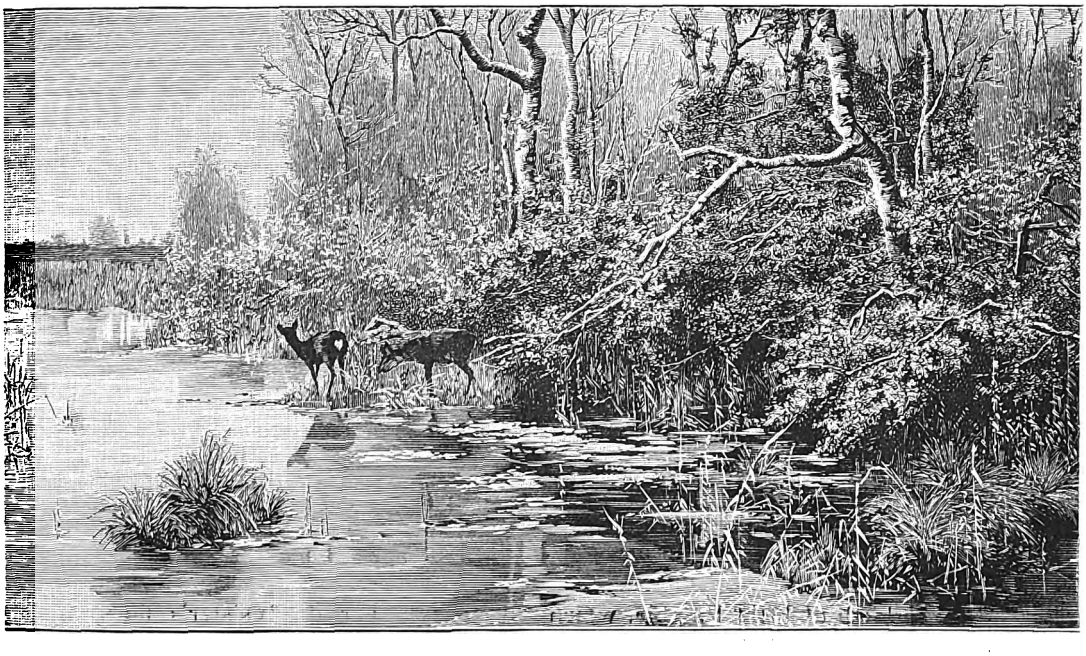
Digitized by Google

was himself a pupil of Dr. Reynolds, so it is not surprising that, while possessing a strong individuality of his own, he yet reproduces many of the ways of "the old Doctor." And he is as representative also of Old Testament scholarship as Dr. Reynolds was of the New, having in this department of research forged his way to the very front rank, besides making himself widely known as a judicious critic and reliable expositor. The Encyclopedia Biblica and Hastings Dictionary have welcomed many articles from his pen, and there will shortly appear his volume on Ezekiel, to be followed later by another on Isaiah, in the "Century Bible." It is certain that in his hands the scholarly traditions of Cheshunt training are likely to be enhanced.

The type of life at Cheshunt is peculiar to itself. Nowhere, perhaps, have the students a freer hand, or more chance to keep and develop their own personal characteristics. The internal government of the students' affairs is left pretty much to themselves, and, as an old Cheshunt man, Dr. Whitehouse is certain to respect the old order of things, which consisted in putting men on their honour to be loyal to themselves, their work, and their College.

Unfortunately the friends of the College do not seem to realise lately how much it stands in need of funds, and how the anxieties of its management are terribly increased by a stubborn debt. Never was there a time when such work as that of Cheshunt needed doing more, and it should be the aim of every old student, whether abroad or at home, to express his rememberance of the rock from which he was hewn, by making known its claims.

THE EDITOR.



Digitized by Google

THE HEIRS OF ROSSMOYNE

BY

MARIAN ISABEL HURRELL.

CHAPTER I.

NITA and Cara Marchioni were twin sisters, and so marvellously alike that it was a very difficult matter or a stranger to distinguish one from the other.

The two girls in their early childhood were left orphaned and desolate, and it was this fact, combined with their beauty, which touched the heart of an English lady, Mrs. Arnold by name, who was at the time residing in Italy. As she was both widowed and childless, she decided to adopt the pretty little twins and bring them up as her own.

When the girls were about two-and-twenty years of age, Nita became engaged to a young English tourist, named Ralph Westbury, but soon after their engagement was announced, Mrs. Arnold died, leaving the girls penniless.

Ralph Westbury, by his persuasions, at length won Nita's consent to a speedy marriage, and Cara, who was of an indolent disposition, decided to accept her brother-in-law's offer of a home with them.

After the birth of little Ralphie, which took place about a year later, Nita's state of health caused her husband some uneasiness, and he determined to travel, but before any satisfactory arrangement had been made, the anguish of widowhood had fallen upon Nita, and upon Cara devolved the task of consolation as well as the care of the child.

The shock proved too much for the young mother.

When Cara went into the room one day she was terrified to see the change which had come over her sister.

"Take care of my little Ralphie, Cara mia," she whispered. "I want you to see that justice is done to my baby; promise me."

Cara Marchioni faithfully promised to fulfil her sister's behest, and then, seeing that Nita was well-nigh exhausted, bade her rest.

During the night which followed Nita seemed better, but towards morning a change for the worse took place. Hastily summoning the mistress of the house, Cara, robed in her dressing-gown, bade her send for a doctor, as her sister was seriously ill.

Presently Nita aroused from the stupor into which she had fallen, and, looking up into her sister's face, she said in weak, tremulous accents, "Cara—I am going home to God—and my dear husband—take care of Ralphie."

Then a dead silence filled the room, and ere many minutes had elapsed the breath of life had flown, and the palpitating heart was stilled for ever.

Then it was that a sudden temptation assailed Cara, to which, without much parley, she yielded. Taking the wedding ring from her dead sister's finger, she slipped it upon her own. Scarcely had she done this when footsteps were heard ascending the stairs, and she braced herself to carry out the deception she had so hastily planned.

The doctor was ushered into the room

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

by the landlady, who stayed behind to render her services.

Cara, looking terribly white and agitated, gave the doctor a brief account of her sister's sudden illness and death.

"And the lady's name?" queried the doctor.

"The Signorina Marchioni."

The landlady gave a surprised glance into the face of the lady who uttered these words, for she was under the impression that it was the married sister who had been taken ill so suddenly, although Cara had not, as it happened, mentioned her by name. Concluding, however, that she had made a mistake in the dim morning light, owing to their marvellous likeness, she gave no further consideration to the matter.

* * * *

The present owner of Rossmoyne, Sir Lionel Westbury, was a man of imposing appearance, of unimpeachable honour, and the possessor of no mean fortune.

His wife, to whom he had been devotedly attached, had died, leaving him with three children. Ralph, the eldest, of whom we have already heard, was of a selfish and pleasure-loving nature, and on account of his wandering proclivities, supposed to originate through his love of art, he was nicknamed "The Rover."

Horace, the baronet's younger son, was extremely popular both in the household and in the neighbourhood, chiefly because of his winning disposition and nobility of character. After a highly creditable college career, he was now studying for the medical profession, in which it was his ambition to excel.

Margaret, the youngest child, was her father's pet and darling. In his eyes there were none to compare with his "peerless Margaret," and indeed her beauty and talents were undoubted. "As good as she is beautiful," was the verdict of Northbrook concerning the youthful mistress of Rossmoyne.

CHAPTER II.

"It's getting time we heard from 'The Rover,'" said Horace, as the family were seated at breakfast.

Sir Lionel's face clouded at his words. "He has been disgracefully neglectful lately," said he irritably. "I can't think why it is."

"He has never been quite the same since he wrote and sent the photograph of Nita, the Italian girl," remarked Horace, thoughtfully. "I sometimes think that was a little more than a passing fancy."

"I trust a son of mine would never forget the duty he owes to his family name and honour," said Sir Lionel, proudly. "He knows well I should never countenance such an alliance."

"Perhaps he is on his way home," suggested Margaret in a conciliatory tone. "It would be good to see Ralph again."

The baronet echoed his daughter's words. "It would indeed be good," he said, with a yearning note in his voice. "I shall write to-day and ask him the reason for his prolonged stay abroad."

The sharp double knock of the postman at this moment echoed through the hall, and a maid presently entered with the letters. Horace and Margaret leisurely perused their correspondence, until an ejaculation of grief and dismay from their father's lips arrested their attention.

"What is it?" asked Margaret, fearfully.

"Read for yourselves," answered Sir Lionel, handing the letter to his daughter. "It is trouble upon trouble."

Then, without another word and with bowed head, he left the breakfast-room, and shut himself up in his library.

Margaret, after reading the letter—Horace looking over her shoulder meanwhile—burst into tears, whilst her brother grew pale with agitation.

"Ralph dead. I can't believe it," said Horace, brokenly.

"It is too sad to believe," sobbed Margaret; "and to think of his leaving a wife and child."

Once again the girl took up the fateful letter and read it through carefully, though the tears well-nigh blinded her sight.

"I wonder what father will say to Nita when she comes," she said after a while, "because she will naturally expect to find a home at Rossmoyne with her little one."

Horace shook his head doubtfully. "The pater's prejudices are very strong," replied he sadly; "but one thing I know, Margaret,—that, for poor Ralph's sake, you and I must receive her kindly."

About a week later, whilst Sir Lionel and his son and daughter were talking together of the blow which had befallen them, there came a sound of carriage wheels on the drive, and a few moments later "Mrs. Ralph Westbury" was announced.

Digitized by Google

Sir Lionel arose to meet her, but there was no warmth in his welcome. The plaintive expression in the dark eyes awoke a feeling of sympathy in the heart of Margaret, and both she and Horace spoke a few kindly words of greeting.

The slightly foreign accent in which the lady spoke proclaimed her nationality, although her English was remarkably fluent.

"I intended to have arrived some days earlier," said she, "but my baby was taken ill in London, so I was unavoidably hindered."

At this moment the child in her arms gave vent to a wailing cry, which awakened all the tenderness in Margaret's nature.

"Let me take him, Nita," she said gently.

"May I ask if you will call me 'Esma' instead of 'Nita'?" she asked in a pathetic voice. "It is a name by which I was called in my childhood, and I much prefer it to 'Nita.'"

"Very well," answered Margaret, kindly, "it shall be 'Esma,' if you would rather."

Then, seeing that the dark eyes of the Italian were heavy with weariness, Margaret volunteered to take her to her room, an offer that was accepted.

When Horace and his father were left alone dead silence prevailed for a few seconds, the hearts of both being too full for speech.

Sir Lionel was the first to break the dreary pause. "Well, Horace, what do you think of her?"

"She is a handsome woman," he answered slowly, "but she looks as if—as if she had a will of her own."

"Temper, you mean,—yes, I can see that for myself,—but she is not coming here to upset the peace of Rossmoyne."

"I suppose," said Horace, "that Ralph's wife and child ought to find a home here—for his sake, dad, we must treat them kindly."

"Kindly!—yes, of course; I'm not likely to do otherwise," replied Sir Lionel, irritably. "But, Horace, mark my words—that child shall never inherit Rossmoyne; you must be master here when I am gone."

* * * *

A ten days' mission at Northbrook was well-nigh ended; a rich harvest of souls had been gathered in, and many weak and wavering ones had received strength and comfort.

John Farquhar, the missioner, and an old college chum of Horace Westbury, at the close of an afternoon's service, was wending his way across the fields to the vicarage. The October day was closing in; already the glow had faded in the west, and the shadows of evening were falling around.

Suddenly, whilst deep in earnest thought, he stumbled across a dark object in his path, and, to his consternation, he discovered it was the unconscious form of Sir Lionel Westbury.

He had evidently been thrown from his horse and had sustained injuries to his head, for a wound on his forehead was bleeding profusely.

Mr. Farquhar, first having staunched the blood with his handkerchief, looked anxiously around to see if anyone was near to render assistance. But no one was in sight, and he was therefore compelled to leave Sir Lionel while he went in search of help.

As soon as possible, Sir Lionel was removed on an impromptu ambulance to his home, where he was at once attended by the family doctor, but before close of the day, the soul of Sir Lionel Westbury had passed away, and Horace and Margaret were left desolate.

* * * *

The little infant heir of Rossmoyne lay asleep, whilst over him bent Esma, her eyes gleaming with triumph. She did not feel that her presence was needed downstairs in the library, where Horace and Margaret, with numerous relatives, were discussing the last will and testament of Sir Lionel Westbury.

"It's all right, baby," whispered Esma softly—"right both for you and for me."

The child turned restlessly on his pillow and finally fixed his eyes on her eager face.

"Ah! Ralphie mia, what a deal you owe to me, and I to you! Do you hear what I say, my little Sir Ralph?" The infant's only response was a fretful cry, hearing which Esma rang the bell for the maid, and left the room to muse upon her triumph.

One by one the visitors departed, until only Mrs. Fortescue—a widowed sister of

Digitized by Google

IMMEDIATELY SHE RECOGNISED HER VISITOR, AND GREW PALE TO THE LIPS.

Digitized by Google

the late Lady Westbury—remained. She was one who had drunk deeply of the cup of sorrow, and by her tender sympathy she was enabled to be of much comfort to the bereaved household. The death of Ralph was in itself a heavy blow, but their father's loss was greater still to the brother and sister, who, in their mutual sorrow, were knit together more closely than ever.

Mrs. Fortescue, who was a keen judge of character, instinctively felt a great distrust for Esma, though she wisely forbore to prejudice her relations.

"I should like to have seen you the owner of Rossmoyne," she said, as she regarded Horace affectionately. "If you will forgive me for saying so, I consider your dear father made a great mistake in his will."

"Had he lived, Aunt Barbara, he meant to alter it in my favour," said Horace quietly.

"It would have been better for all concerned had he done so, as the property is not entailed." Then, turning to Margaret, she added, "Remember, my child, if ever you need a friend, you may rely upon Aunt Barbara."

With tears in her eyes Margaret thanked her warmly. The future indeed looked dark and desolate to the young girl, whose life had hitherto been comparatively smooth and fair.

CHAPTER III.

Three years have rolled away since the death of Sir Lionel Westbury, and to Margaret, who found daily contact with a woman of Esma's calibre well-nigh intolerable at times, they were years of discipline and trial.

Horace, who was now a rising young London doctor, was unable to make any lengthy stay at Rossmoyne, much to Esma's satisfaction. She had a fixed conviction in her mind that Horace was jealous of the child, and owing to this false impression she barely tolerated his presence.

Horace spent much of his scanty leisure in work for his Master, seeking to follow in the footsteps of Him who went about doing good. His old college friend, Mr. Farquhar, had a large parish in one of the poorer districts of London, and whenever opportunity offered, Horace was one of his helpers.

Margaret, for a while after her father's death, was in bitter sorrow; it seemed to her in the darkness of her desolation as if God had forgotten to be gracious, and that nevermore would she know the meaning of true happiness.

At last, however, her burden was lightened, and it was on this wise. She was spending a few days with Mrs. Fortescue, who lived within an easy distance of Horace's rooms in Kensington.

Whilst staying there she went with her brother to hear Mr. Farquhar preach, and it seemed to her bleeding spirit as if he knew by intuition the sorrow which oppressed her.

"Come unto Me . . . and I will give you rest." These were the words of his text, and to many a soul in that large congregation the message fell as balm.

At the close of the sermon, Margaret remained long on her knees, and when she arose, although there were tears in her eyes, there was peace within her heart.

Margaret had much need of this gladness to comfort and strengthen her in the days which followed, for Esma was a constant thorn in the flesh.

It was summertide. The gardens at Rossmoyne were aglow with roses, and Esma, with some dainty piece of needlework in her hand, was sitting under the huge cedar-tree on the lawn, whilst near her played little Ralphie.

Presently they were joined by Margaret, who, with her tennis-racquet in hand, was about to make her way to the rectory.

"Good-bye, Esma," she said in her usual bright voice. "I shall be home in good time this evening."

"Me go too with Auntie Marget," echoed a little voice at this moment.

"Very well, darling. Come along," said Margaret, knowing that Mrs. Gurney would be pleased to see the child, despite the fact that he was uninvited; and as there were little grandchildren staying at the rectory, he would have companions to play with.

But there was one guest there whom Margaret had not expected to see, and this was John Farquhar. He had come to the rectory for a few days' rest and change. and it must be said that the thought of meeting his young colleague's sister, to whom he was much attracted, added considerably to the pleasure of his visit. He had met her several times at her aunt's pretty Kensington home, for Mrs. Fortesque took a great interest in his parish work.

Digitized by Google

Esma, left alone, found the child's absence no little relief, and, throwing her work aside, buried herself in the pages of the latest novel. Presently the opening of the garden gate attracted her attention, and she lifted her eyes. Immediately she recognised her visitor, and grew pale to the lips.

"Ha! you know me, my lady," said the woman, who approached her. "I have found you at last."

Esma's worldly wisdom told her that it would be utter folly to make an enemy of her visitor, for Susan Lee, as the woman was named, was not one to be trifled with. Controlling herself with an effort, she answered calmly, "Yes, of course I know you; but I must say I'm rather surprised to see you."

"And not very pleased, I'm thinkin'; but I ain't satisfied with the money you sent last, so I tell yer."

"How much more do you want, then?" said Esma, half angrily.

"It ain't no use yer losing yer temper, 'cause I've got yer in my power," was the woman's fierce reply.

"Hush!" said Esma, fearfully, "someone may hear you. "How much will satisfy you? Come, tell me quickly, and be gone."

"A hundred pounds, then, that's what I want; and then I won't trouble you no more."

Esma looked aghast!

"A hundred pounds!" she repeated in dismay. "I really couldn't; I haven't so much by me. You see, I'm not entirely mistress here."

"No, but your son is heir, ain't he?" said the woman, with a visible sneer.

Esma quailed beneath her glance. "If you speak above a whisper, I'll give you nothing," she said.

"H'm! you can't afford to make an enemy of me," was the reply. "It was only by chance I found out where you lived. My 'usband and me has a caravan now, and we were passing through this mornin', when I saw yer a-gettin' into yer fine carriage."

"I think we have prolonged this interview long enough," said Esma, rising. "I can't give you so much money as you want. Will this suffice you?" and, drawing a magnificent diamond ring from her finger, she placed it in the woman's palm, adding thereto three sovereigns, the contents of her purse.

"It'll do for a time, if you promise me a good sum within a week," replied the avaricious woman, as she critically examined the ring.

"I promise you faithfully," said Esma; "now go."

CHAPTER IV.

"Where's Ralphie?"

"He is out in the meadows, dear, with Gladys and Hugh," was Mrs. Gurney's answer to Margaret's question. "I daresay they will be here in a few minutes," she added, seeing that Margaret was ready to return home.

The minutes passed by, and still there was no sign of the children's coming; and at length Mr. Farquhar, who, during the afternoon had never been very far from Margaret's side, volunteered to go in search of the missing bairns.

Just as he was about to make his way through the gate which led to the meadows, he saw the nurse, Hester by name, hastening homeward with the rector's two grandchildren.

"Where is little Sir Ralph?" he questioned, as they drew near.

"He's lost!" cried the children, with a look of distress in their sweet childish eyes.

"What is this the children are saying?" said Mr. Farquhar, somewhat sternly, to the frightened and trembling nurse.

"It is quite true, sir; we can't find him anywhere," said poor Hester, bursting into tears. "He wanted to go into the next field to pick some flowers, so I let him go."

Nurse did not add that she was so deep in the pages of a novelette that it was quite ten minutes before she went in search of him.

"Why did you not go into the next field to look after him?" questioned the clergyman.

"Because, sir, the other children did not want to go, and I couldn't leave them alone in the meadow where there was a pond. I thought little Sir Ralph would be safe enough picking flowers, so I didn't trouble about him."

Mr. Farquhar at once decided to return to the house and acquaint Mrs. Gurney and Margaret with the facts of the case, and then go himself in search of the missing child.

Digitized by Google

Margaret was much distressed on hearing the news, for the little lad had completely won her heart, and she feared lest some harm had befallen him.

Truth to tell, although no coward, she dreaded intensely the idea of returning to Esma without the little one, full well realising the passionate reproaches which would be heaped upon her. It was no slight relief to her when she saw, to her surprise, the figure of Horace at the rectory gate. The young fellow soon saw that something had happened to ruffle the rector's peaceful household, and Margaret's white anxious face convinced him that it was something serious. Margaret was almost too agitated to give a clear account of what had happened, and Mrs. Gurney came to her assistance.

"Your coming is a God-send, Horace," said the lady in conclusion, "as unexpected as it is welcome."

"Margaret wrote and told me she was coming here this afternoon," said Horace,

"YOU KNOW YOU WOULD BE GLAD—YES, GLAD!" SHE RAVED. "HE IS MURDERED, AND YOU HAVE DONE IT."

Digitized by Google

"so I decided, instead of going direct to Rossmoyne, I might as well call here, and we could return together."

"What have you done to your hand, my boy?" said the rector, coming forward.

"Oh! it's a mere scratch," answered Horace, lightly, glancing at his left hand, which was bound round with a handkerchief. "I came from the station by the short cut across the meadows, and caught my hand on a nail on one of the stiles. But there, never mind about me. We must find the little chap somewhere. Come, Margaret," he added, "don't look so hopeless; he can't be far away."

"Farquhar and several others have already gone to look for him," said the rector, who in his heart thought there was much ado about nothing, never dreaming that the child was really lost.

Horace and Margaret joined in the search, but, despite their united efforts, no trace of little Sir Ralph could be found.

At length, after an hour's fruitless scouring of the adjoining meadows, one of the rectory servants discovered in a ditch a little blood-stained sailor hat, which was presently identified by Margaret as the one which Ralphie had worn that very afternoon.

After this distressing occurrence, Horace put the matter in the hands of the police, and he and Margaret returned to tell Esma the direful tidings.

"Do you mean to say the child is dead—murdered?" almost shrieked the woman, when Horace, as gently as possible, had broken the news.

"We do not know what to think, Esma," said Horace. "God grant it may not be so."

"I don't believe you; you know you would be glad—yes, glad," she raved, losing her self-control utterly. "He is murdered, and you have done it! See, there is blood on your hand! Get out of my sight, both of you!"

"Hush, Esma!" said Margaret sternly; "you do not know what you are saying."

But Esma only reiterated her cruel statement, gradually working herself up into a state of violent hysteria.

The news spread like wildfire through the village, that little Sir Ralph Westbury had met with his death by foul play, and an hour later darker reports still were spread (which, alas! owed their origin to Esma's ravings), that Horace was guilty of the shameful crime of murder. Before nightfall, to Esma's unconcealed satisfaction, a warrant was issued for his arrest.

Early on the following morning Mr. Farquhar made his way to Rossmoyne, where he was received by Margaret in the library, Esma utterly refusing to see him.

"Where is Horace?" he said, after a few words of greeting, taking the girl's cold and nerveless hand within his own. In the agitation of the moment Margaret did not appear to notice that it was some minutes ere he relinquished his clasp.

"They have taken him into custody," said she, with a look of intense anguish in her beautiful eyes.

"Into custody!" repeated Mr. Farquhar in grieved dismay. "I heard a report of this, but could not believe it to be true."

A tearless sob escaped Margaret! save for this, she was absolutely impassive. For awhile Mr. Farquhar felt too unmanned to speak; the girl's stony grief touched him unutterably.

"Margaret," he said, for the first time calling her by her Christian name, "my dear, my dearest, do not despair. Horace and Ralphie are both in God's keeping. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" murmured he, as much for the strengthening of his own faith as for that of Margaret.

"There is no justice, no right anywhere," cried the girl passionately; "and I sometimes think that there can be no loving God: else why has all this bitter sorrow come upon us?"

"Margaret, my dear one," he said, his voice trembling with impassioned tenderness, "we know there is a loving God, and that He is our very present help in trouble. We cannot, dare not, doubt the King, whose subjects we are."

Then it was that a heaven-born courage filled the heart of Margaret, and, looking up through a mist of tears, she said brokenly, "I will trust Him for His grace, and perhaps by-and-bye we shall see His smile. You have done me good," she added softly. "God helping me, I will be brave and strong."

"Would to God, Margaret, I had the right to comfort you altogether."

This utterance was wrung from the man's inmost heart as he stood face to face with the girl who was to him the dearest, sweetest specimen of womanhood it had ever been his lot to meet.

Digitized by Google

Her eyes fell before the intensity of his gaze, and in that moment the souls of John Farquhar and Margaret Westbury were knit together for ever.

Esma's vindictive rage against Horace increased rather than decreased, and seemed to swallow up all natural grief for the lost child. Her wrath and disappointment were patent even to the servants of the household, when Horace after his trial (for lack of evidence) was set at liberty, her only consolation being the stain of suspicion which still clung to his otherwise honoured name.

Her coarse brutality jarred and angered Margaret inexpressibly, so she left Rossmoyne, and made her way to Mrs. Fortescue's home in Kensington, where she knew she could find a haven of refuge; and Esma, to her entire satisfaction, was mistress of the situation.

Horace, on the day following his release, had returned to his duties, only to meet with the cold suspicious glances of his senior partner, who showed evident unwillingness to receive him back on the old terms. The young fellow therefore determined to accept—for a time at least—an offer which came to him one morning when his heart was sorest—viz., the post of ship's doctor on one of the ocean liners—and, despite the remonstrance of the family lawyer, he embarked the following week.

To Margaret the peaceful atmosphere of her aunt's home was restful in the extreme, for Mrs. Fortescue was one who knew just the right comfort to bestow. The loss of little Ralphie still grieved her unutterably, for the child was far dearer to her than to his supposed mother. She positively refused to believe him to be dead, an opinion which John Farquhar and the majority of people fully endorsed. The young clergyman's frequent visits to Mrs. Fortescue's house were sources of mutual happiness, although Margaret refused to enter upon an engagement until Horace's name was cleared.

"Then, dear love," said he, "since your heart is set on this, God helping me, next to my Master's cause I will make the establishing of Horace's innocence my special work, and then after it is successfully accomplished——"

"Then, dear John," interrupted Margaret, "I am ready whenever you want me."—And with this assurance John Farquhar was perforce content.

CHAPTER V.

"What! you here agen, parson? Curse yer! I tell yer I won't have no parsons here. Turn 'im out, old woman, turn 'im out!"

David Lee, the man who spoke these words, glared at John Farquhar with mingled fear and wrath in his eyes. Excessive drinking had brought him to a state of delirium tremens dreadful to behold.

Mr. Farquhar, for answer, drew nearer to the bedside and took the man's fevered hand within his own.

"I reckon you're a good sort, parson," said Lee, for the action appeared to soothe him considerably. "P'raps if you held my hand a bit you could keep the bobbies and devils away. Sometimes it's one, sometimes another, and times it's both, and then between 'em they try to drag me down to hell."

After this speech Lee seemed thoroughly exhausted, and in the brief interval of quiet which succeeded, Mr. Farquhar turned to leave the room; but at this moment a terrified cry from Lee arrested his footsteps.

"Good God! there's the child now, all a-bleedin' about the head. Get out of my way, boy, or I'll smash yer," shouted he. "He's cleared off now, ain't he?" questioned the unhappy man, peering uneasily round about the room.

"Yes, there's no child here," said Mr. Farquhar, calmly, as he approached the bedside once again.

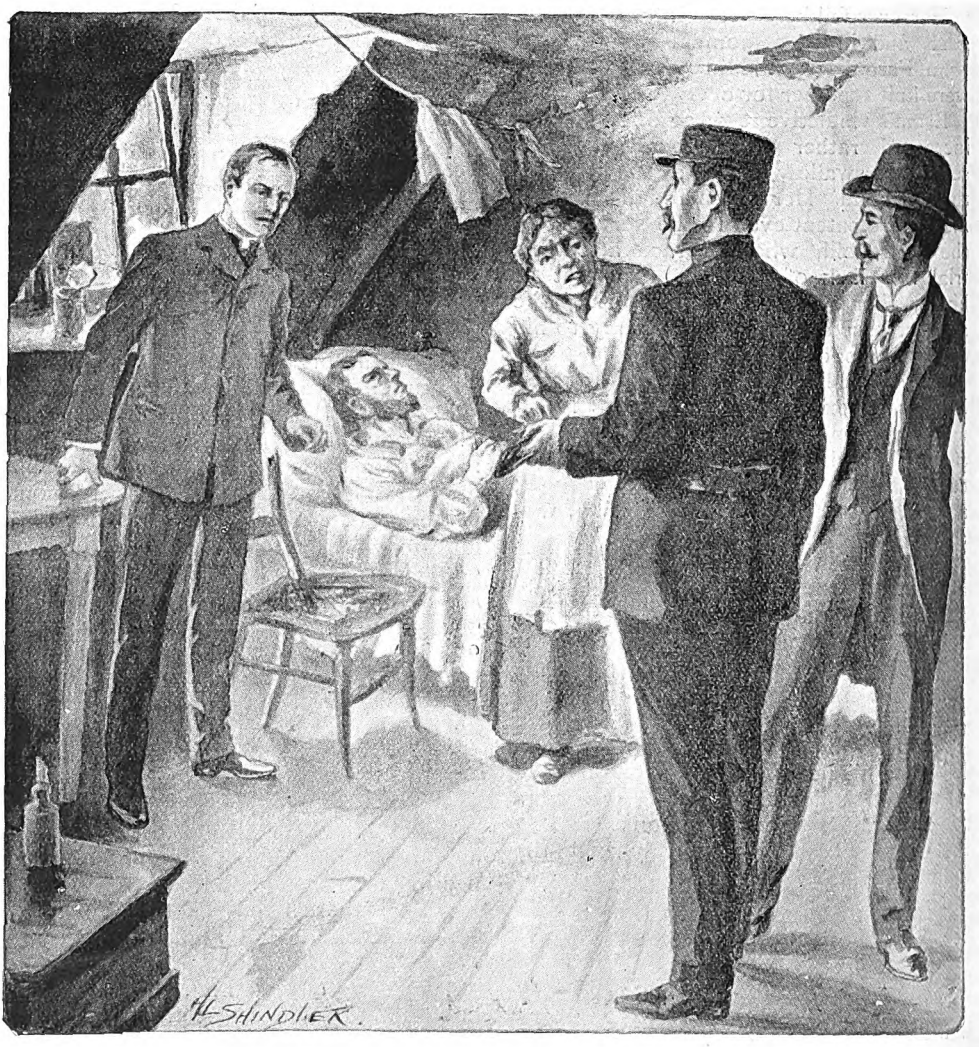
"I never harmed him, yer know; the bobbies and devils can say what they like. I only did it for the reward, and then, lor bless yer! if the little imp didn't slope just as I was about to claim it."

At this moment a neighbour entered the room, and, seeing that his presence was no longer needed, Mr. Farquhar bade good-bye; and forthwith made his way to the police station, where he told the story of his visit to David Lee, and the sick man's strange wanderings concerning the child, whom he rightly conjectured to be little Sir Ralph, the missing heir of Rossmoyne.

* * * *

Drink had completed its deadly work at last. David Lee no longer wandered in delirium; the violence of his attacks had gradually subsided, and now, as weak as a child, he was awaiting the end,

Digitized by Google



EVERY PREPARATION WAS MADE TO TAKE THE DYING DEPOSITION OF THE ERSTWHILE GIPSY.

which he knew was slowly but surely coming.

"Where's the parson to-day, Sue? He ain't been yet, has he?" he questioned, anxiously looking at the clock, on the third morning after his admissions concerning the child.

"Yes, he was here an hour ago," answered his wife, "but you were asleep; 'spect he'll be here agen presently."

In a few minutes the clergyman's footsteps were heard ascending the stairs which led to the room where the dying man lay in the heart of London.

John Farquhar could see at a glance that but a few days at most remained for the sick man, and with almost womanly gentleness he bent over him. After a few words of greeting he said, "I think there is something you would like to tell me before you enter into the presence of God?"

The man's eyes, so lately fired with delirium, sought the clergyman's face eagerly. "Aye, that I have, sir," he answered in a weak tone of voice; "'tis about the child—Ralph Westbury."

At a signal from Mr. Farquhar, a police officer, accompanied by a magistrate, entered the room. He had purposely left them waiting in the room below whilst he gauged the state of the sick man's mind. In a few seconds every preparation was made to take the dying deposition of David Lee, the erstwhile gipsy. The facts were as follows :—

Digitized by Google

He, with his wife, was passing through the town of Northbrook one Saturday afternoon, some two or three months previously, when a child's cry of distress, proceeding from a meadow near the road-side, attracted their attention.

In some curiosity, Lee stopped the caravan, and bade his wife get out and see what was the matter. In obedience to her husband's commands, the woman alighted, and, opening the gate which was close by, she entered the meadow, and there saw a child with his forehead streaming with blood, and sobbing with pain. In an instant she saw the cause of the accident —in gathering flowers the little fellow had fallen upon a scythe, carelessly left amongst the grass, and had cut his forehead badly. The brim of his little sailor hat was terribly stained with blood, and the woman with kindly intent, took off his hat and staunched the bleeding wound, as she asked :—

"What's your name? and where do you live?"

"My name is Ralphie 'Estbury, and I live at home with my mother and Auntie Marget," the little fellow had answered, lifting his beautiful dark eyes, which were drowned in tears, to the woman's face. By this time Lee himself had alighted, and was leaning over the gate listening to the child's reply.

"Who be he? he asked, not quite catching the little lad's name.

"He's little Sir Ralph Westbury up at the great house yonder," answered Susan Lee, pointing with her finger down the road, for the towers of Rossmoyne were visible at some distance.

"Well, I'm blowed!" was Lee's ejaculation, "there would be a fine reward out for he, old woman, if he was missin', wouldn't there?"

"Aye, that there would," answered his wife, "but I tell yer once and for all, I ain't goin' to be party to that sort of thing."

But Lee was the ruling power, and to her anger and dismay she found herself utterly unable to prevent him from carrying out his wicked design.

"You hold yer tongue," he said roughly; then, turning to the child, he added in a gentler tone, "Look here, young master, I'm a-goin' to drive yer home; you'd like a ride in my kerridge, wouldn't you?" —Ralphie nodded, and Lee, utterly unmindful of his wife's protests, came forward, and taking the child into his arms, he carried him into the caravan, and only the blood-stained sailor hat was left to tell its sorry tale.

With all possible speed he then drove on to the neighbouring town, where he disguised the child by a complete change of dress. His beautiful curls were severed from his head, and his sailor suit was exchanged for a girl's shabby frock.

When the transformation was complete, Lee announced his intention of leaving his wife in care of the caravan and taking the child to London, until the reward had reached such an amount as would justify him in giving up the boy to his relatives.

When safely established in London lodgings, Lee wrote home to his wife, bidding her to let him know when the reward should mount up to a thousand pounds. Ere many days had elapsed, the woman wrote off in haste to inform him that the sum offered for the safe recovery of little Sir Ralph Westbury had reached the required amount.

On the evening before the receipt of this letter, Lee, having met a boon companion, spent several hours at the nearest public-house, leaving Ralphie alone. It was during his absence that the child, probably finding the loneliness intolerable, made his way from the attic into the street, for, on Lee's return from his drinking bout, little Ralphie was nowhere to be found. A woman who lodged in the room below testified as to having seen him go out of doors, but this was all the information Lee was ever able to glean. On the following morning the man received the letter from his wife containing the news of the thousand pounds reward which was offered for the missing child.

Disgusted with the failure of his plans, and disheartened by his fruitless search, the gipsy resolved to quit his wretched lodgings and to shake the dust of London from his feet.

Such was the sum and substance of the sin committed by David Lee and his wife, the former assuring his listeners that upon him alone rested the guilt. A few days later the wretched man had passed from earth's judgment to a higher tribunal. His wife, after certain legalities were ended, was permitted to go free, it being clear that she was an unwilling accomplice in the crime.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Thus was Horace Westbury's innocence established, and John Farquhar won his heart's desire. Despite the mystery which still shrouded little Ralph, Margaret's thankfulness knew no bounds that Horace in the eyes of the world was cleared of the shameful imputation of murder. On her knees she gave thanks to the Giver of all good, beseeching Him that, if it were His will, little Ralphie might yet be restored to them again.

Needless to relate that Horace (on his homeward-bound voyage) was acquainted at the earliest possible opportunity, by cable, of the vindication of his honour.

CHAPTER VI.

Esma was sitting in her pleasant boudoir at Rossmoyne when the maid entered with a telegram. In some haste she opened it and read as follows: "Come at once. Ralphie found.—MARGARET." Her eyes gleamed with triumph. Now would her position be effectively secured at Rossmoyne, thought she—a position for which she had steeped her very soul in duplicity and cunning.

With all possible speed she obeyed Margaret's summons, and ere many hours had passed away she had arrived at Mrs. Fortesque's pretty home, where she found Margaret awaiting her coming. There was a strange expression of doubt and distrust on the girl's face, which Esma was quick to see. By her express desire, she received Esma alone, and, as briefly as possible, she told how she had been the means of discovering the child.

It had happened on this wise. About a fortnight after the death of David Lee, Margaret, at John Farquhar's request, visited a girl who was dying of consumption in his parish. One morning, when she was bidding good-bye at the door, a child's voice fell on her ears, and, turning round suddenly, she beheld in the passage little Ralphie, the boy who for well-nigh three months had been missing. A scream of delight greeted her ears as the little fellow, seeing that the lady was none other than "Auntie Marget," rushed into her arms.

A querulous voice was heard at this moment calling the child, and Margaret, tightly grasping Ralphie's hand meanwhile, made her way to the room whence the sound proceeded. There she was met by Susan Lee, a new-comer to the house, who eyed her with suspicious and unfriendly glances.

From Susan Lee's appearance Margaret judged her to be in a bad state of health, the pallid hue on her face betokening some secret organic disorder.

During Margaret's recital Esma grew deathly pale, but the girl proceeded with the story.

"The strange part of it is, Esma," said she, "the woman utterly refuses to give up the child, for she says he is her own, and that while she is living she will not part from him."

"But you don't believe this wretched lie, Margaret, surely?" exclaimed Esma, rising from her chair. "Take me to the woman at once. She must be a lunatic, or some vile impostor, who wishes to obtain money by fraudulent means."

"She is as sane as you or I, Esma," said Margaret, ringing the bell as she spoke for the maid to procure a cab.

Esma declined any refreshments—indeed, she was far too agitated to eat—and Margaret, seeing that it was useless to press the matter, would not further delay the momentous visit.

At the sight of Esma the woman, who was lying on a couch, gave a quick gasping sob, for she was in reality in too weak a condition to stand much agitation, and said:—

"The child is mine. 'Twas wicked of me to give him up, and I don't care now who hears me confess my wrong-doing."

Esma turned pale, for, as she well knew, Mrs. Lee in this mood was far more dangerous than when demanding money for her silence. She made a vain attempt to carry off her duplicity with an air of scornful contempt, but it was of no avail.

At this moment the welcome voice of John Farquahar was heard—welcome at least to one in that room. He was about to visit the sick girl, whose room adjoined Susan Lee's, and was exchanging friendly greetings, as was his wont, to one and another whom he encountered at the lodging-house.

Margaret, realising how tense was the situation, on a sudden impulse called him by name, a summons which he immediately answered. He was somewhat surprised to see Susan Lee once again, as immediately after her husband's death she had disappeared, and nothing further was heard of her whereabouts.

Digitized by Google

"You didn't expect to see me, sir, did you?" said the woman; "but I'm main glad to see your face. I'd like you to take my confession, same as you took my husband's."

A look of fear, which she could not altogether control, was in Esma's face as Mrs. Lee told her story.

About three or four years previously, Susan Lee was in great straits owing to her husband being in prison, and was reduced to begging in London streets. Her little babe, a child of about a month old, was in her arms, and, being herself weak and faint for want of food, the burden seemed more than she knew how to bear.

A lady, seeing her plight from the window of a house near by, with the apparent intention of befriending her, invited her into her lodgings, and after giving the poor woman monetary aid, she laid a proposition before her.

There was a wildness about the lady's face which Susan Lee was quick to note, but nevertheless she was not a little surprised at the words she uttered.

"I want you to exchange your baby for mine," she said; and, beckoning the woman to follow her into the adjoining room, she pointed to a child who lay in the last calm sleep of death.

"Hush!" she whispered, "no one in the house knows he is dead but myself, for he died only five minutes ago in a fit of convulsions, and although I rang for assistance, I could not make anyone hear. No one ever need know of this, if you will only do as I ask you."

Mrs. Lee shook her head, and Cara Marchioni, for it was she, as a means of emphasising her request, drew five sovereigns out of her pocket and placed them in the woman's hand.

"You shall have far more than this later on," she added, "and your child will be infinitely better off, for he will be brought up as a gentleman amongst every luxury."

The bait proved too tempting to be resisted, and Susan Lee, stifling a sob (for she really loved her one wee baby), agreed to the lady's proposal. The dead child was rapidly clothed in the living infant's shabby garments, and as a means of disguising the little white face, a shawl was wrapped around the tiny form. The dark-skinned little gipsy babe was then robed in wee Ralphie's pretty baby clothes, and thus was the exchange effected.

Little Ralph Westbury was interred as George Lee, the infant son of David Lee, whilst the changeling was introduced at Rossmoyne as Sir Lionel's grandchild by his doubly-fraudulent relative.

The little fellow on the eventful morning when he wandered away from his cruel guardian as far as possible, was found by a kindly woman, who took the child into her care, and Susan Lee, a few mornings after her husband's death, discovered him playing on the doorstep of the house.

"It is an utterly false statement," said Esma—"a tissue of lies. Believe it if you will, but I take possession of the child."

John Farquhar laid his hand upon her arm. "Take my advice, Mrs. Westbury," said he. "To avoid a scene, leave him here to-night."

Unwillingly Esma at length agreed to this, for a guilty conscience made her afraid to act contrary to the clergyman's suggestion.

As John Farquhar was turning away, after escorting the ladies to Mrs. Fortesque's door, a gentleman touched him on the shoulder, saying: "Excuse me, sir, but may I ask if one of the ladies who accompanied you just now was Miss Cara Marchioni?"

"No," said Mr. Farquhar, somewhat stiffly; "it was her sister (Nita by name), Mrs. Ralph Westbury."

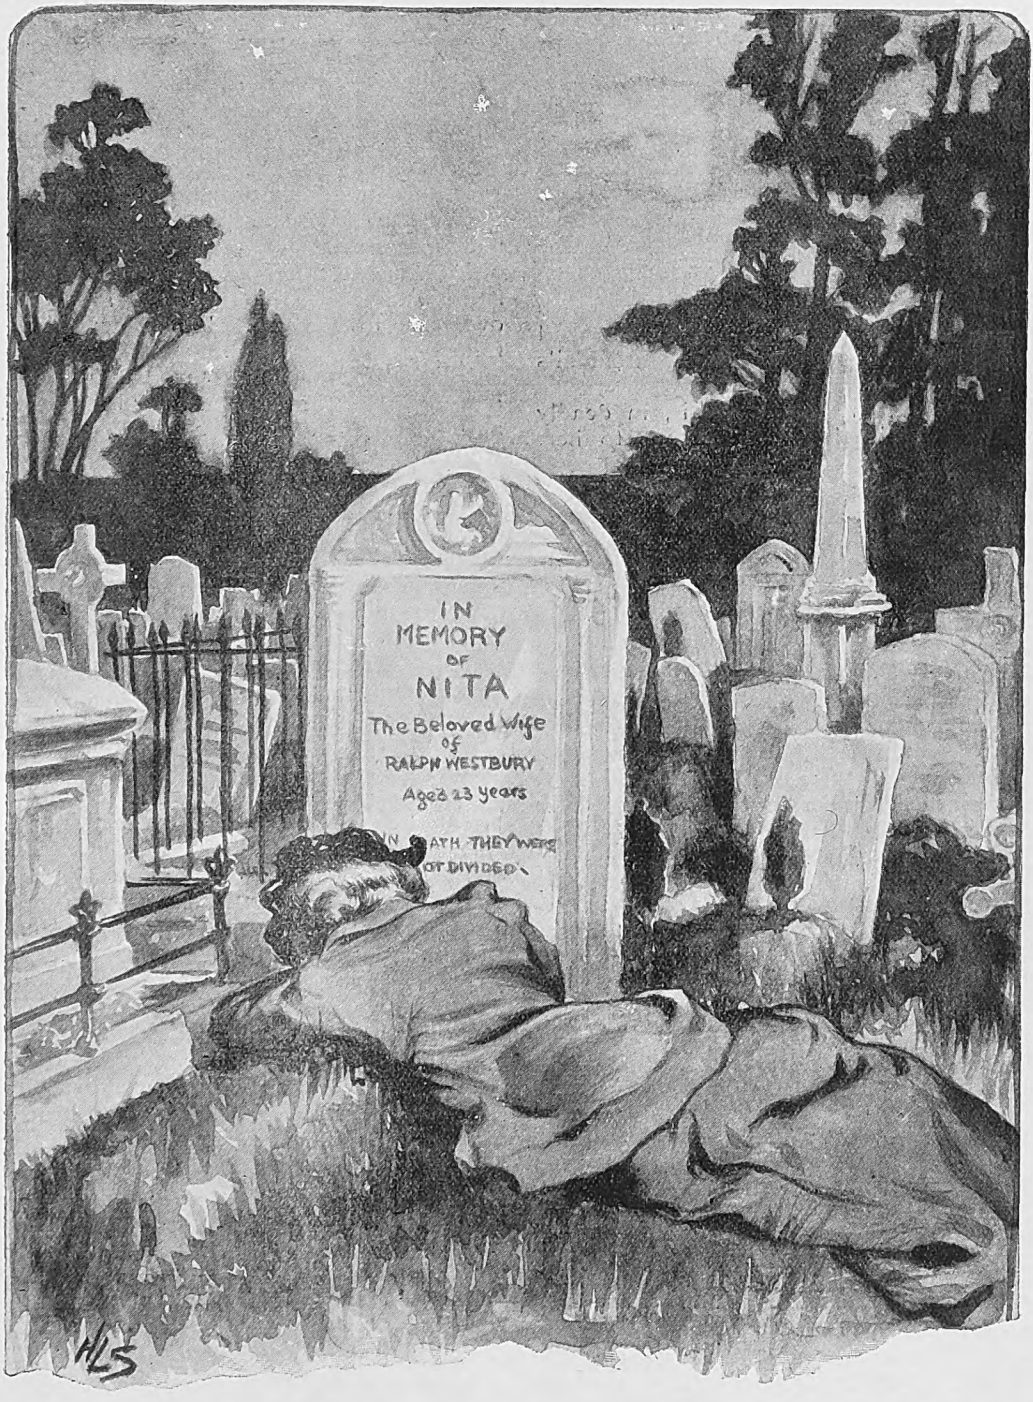
"I think not," was the reply. "I knew them too well ever to mistake them, though a stranger easily might. However, I will take the liberty of calling to see the lady for myself," which he did, and when Esma found herself face to face with a discarded lover of her early youth, she knew her game was played out, and feeling that it was useless to attempt to carry on her fraudulent career, she made up her mind to throw herself on the mercy of Eric Stanford and tell him all her miserable story.

"Cara," said he, after the narration was ended, "give it all up and come to me. I have loved no other woman but you, and, before Heaven, if you will be a good, true wife to me, I will never reproach you for this and all your past deceptions."

Cara hesitated but for a moment, and, seeing no other way out of the difficulty, she consented.

"There is one condition I must make,

Digitized by Google



THE TWILIGHT SHADOWS FELL, THE TWINKLING STARS CAME OUT ONE BY ONE, AND STILL SHE MOVED NOT FROM THE QUIET GRAVE.

Digitized by Google

Cara," said Stanford—"we must start fairly, you and I. I haven't been so perfect myself that I can throw stones at you, but I do insist on this matter, that you make a clean breast of all your guilt to the Westburys."

"But what about prosecution for fraud?" queried Esma, fearfully.

"For the family's sake, I don't think they would care to do that; but if you are afraid, make your escape, and let your confession be by letter."

This suggestion met with Esma's approval, and thus it was that, within the space of two hours after Stanford's departure, Margaret held within her hand an entire confession of Cara Marchioni's double deception.

Meanwhile, the writer of it, in deadly fear of justice being meted out to her, was speeding on her way to a remote village on the south coast, where dwelt an old servant of the Stanford family, who had been apprised by telegram from "the young master," as she still called Eric Stanford, of the lady's coming. There Cara remained until the day of her marriage with her old lover, which took place very shortly after her flight.

Seven years have passed away—years of unbroken prosperity both at Rossmoyne and at St. John's Rectory, the home which Margaret Farquhar has long graced by her gentle presence.

Little Ralphie has now grown into a tall sturdy boy, and is regarded as a loved elder brother by Margaret's bonny boys and girls.

At Rossmoyne, too, there is the happy ring of childish voices, for Sir Horace Westbury has wooed and won the fair daughter of one of his old patients, Sir Harry Desmond, and is now the proud father of two merry-faced lads and one winsome little daughter.

* * * *

Far away in a sunny little Italian cemetery there is a grave marked with a simple headstone (which, after a considerable amount of legal difficulty, Sir Horace Westbury had caused to be placed there) with these words inscribed thereon:

"In memory of
NITA,
The beloved wife of Ralph Westbury,
Aged 23 years.
'In death they were not divided.'"

Thither one day a broken-hearted penitent found her way. Beside the grass she knelt awhile, tears raining down her cheeks meanwhile. Presently she drew from her pocket a letter, which she read over and over again. It commenced as follows:—

"Dear Esma,—Both Horace and I have long forgiven you, and in your loneliness and need we ask you to come to us, and we will love and care for you."

"Love and care for me," muttered the unhappy woman. "Ah! what have I done to deserve such words? Surely this must be the religion of Christ. If they can forgive me, perhaps He will."

A strange magnetism had drawn Cara Stanford to the scene of her terrible temptation. Widowed, childless, alienated by her passionate nature from all her husband's friends, she at length had turned to Margaret for help and pity, both of which were nobly and instantly bestowed.

A strange languor had come over the woman, a weariness born of ill-heath and bitter grief. The twilight shadows fell, the twinkling stars came out one by one, and still she moved not from the quiet grave. The heart malady from which her sister had suffered had of late affected her also, and well Cara Stanford knew that at any time the cord of life might suddenly be broken.

In the chill light of early morn reverent peasants bore her away from the sacred spot; the stamp of death on her brow, and her eyes closed for ever to earth's sin and weariness.

The last words which had fallen from her lips were these: "God be merciful to me, a sinner."

Digitized by Google

JULIUS AND JULIET;

OR, A CABINET CRISIS

THE few stragglers around the Senate House had just time to raise a cheer as a carriage dashed out of the narrow street, and they caught sight of the well-known minister's face within; then the splendid horses bowled him away from them rapidly, as though they knew they were going to home and rest.

But amidst the cheers there had been some hisses, even from that small crowd, and the sibilant hiss appealed to him with greater force than the attempt at a jubilant cheer.

He smiled sarcastically—he always did, it was a pose of his to appear "serene alike in peace and danger!" None of his bitterest enemies in the senate had ever seen him disturbed. Rising in debate with that perpetual smile upon his sharply chiselled features, he could make his enemies feel the keenness of razor-edged retorts, as he gashed their feelings: without betraying that he had suffered in the least himself. "Don't you find it Arctic, sitting where you do?" a would-be wit had once asked of the minister who sat on his right on the Government Bench.

The minister had stared wonderingly, till it dawned upon him that it was a hit at the frigidity of the well-known statesman. Then he laughed heartily, and took great care to repeat the bon mot, which in due season reached the powerful man himself, who smiled again, a trifle more coldly than ever, and, indifferent alike to the sneers of friends and enemies, held on his way apparently undisturbed.

It would have been better for him if sometimes he could have let off steam as other men did, for their rage and excitement was not half as wearing as the rigid control that had become a second nature with him. Like them he writhed under criticism, smarted under gibe and sneer, and resented ill-natured opposition or wooden obstruction; but unlike them he added to all this the determination never to reveal what he felt. It was this strain that was fast ageing him, and it was a haggard-looking man that stepped out of the brougham, for it was the nature of this man to think more of the hiss than the cheer. In his estimate one hiss equalled six cheers. His friends would have marvelled and his enemies rejoiced if they had known that the minister had gone home that night from the Council with a fit of soul smart. That soul smart was destined to keep him awake for an hour or two yet.

Entering his library he began to work hard, astonishing his secretary by the savage manner in which he attacked the papers before him. Paper after paper was annotated and handed over to the secretary to be dealt with, but every now and then, as though oblivious of his presence, the minister threw himself back in his chair with a brooding, absent look on his face, remaining in that fit of abstraction some time, till, suddenly becoming conscious of his more immediate surroundings, he would attack his work with fresh vigour.

At last, quite unexpectedly, he said, as he gave a fresh set of papers to his somewhat jaded assistant, "I think you can leave me now, Reichardt, I have done enough to-night. I wish one could get more rest."

"A consummation most devoutly to be wished," assented his secretary, "but not likely to come in the way of a state official, especially with war threatening."

Digitized by Google

"Especially with war threatening," emphasised his chief, with a curious intonation on the "threatening," "It ought to have been declared before now, but——" and here he relapsed into a meditative silence.

Reichardt fidgeted about slightly, wondering whether his chief would open up any further, then as silence still reigned supreme, he simply said "Good-night, Monsieur."

"Good-night!" And the man on whose actions, at this particular national juncture, millions were hanging with eager interest, was alone.

Alone! No, troops of thoughts thronged his still busy mind. Memories of the past disturbed him. He saw himself many years back, engaged in the turmoil of business life, keenly enlisting in the mind-to-mind encounters that brought him an early fortune. He remembered his first speeches, his diligent mastering of his country's business, his gradual progress since his acceptance with his Imperial Master, and the hatred of his enemies—jealous of his growing influence.

"Ah, and they detest me still!" he said to himself fiercely, "in spite of my growing power! If war is declared I shall be the scapegoat if it fails, the hero if it succeeds. The stake is tremendous! My whole career ruined, or ——" and he stopped, "or," he went on solemnly, "crowned at last."

"There I am again!" he continued, irritably, to himself. "These personal considerations! I feel sure that war is right, but if it is declared and fails, the Left scores. And I believe that they all would enjoy seeing me baited. Well, I will see Juliet. If I go under it is 'good-bye' to her. If I succeed——!"

And, at the prospect of what the "if" meant, for once the impassive mask fell off and the face literally glowed.

* * * *

"Well?" interrogated Madame Klein, with an arch smile, when Count Julius called next day—"have you come to tell me anything?"

They were old acquaintances, these two, and the Count, who had been a widower for five years, was earnestly anxious for closer terms of intimacy. But Madame Klein was as ambitious as she was rich.

She aimed at playing a very leading part in the social functions of the day; nothing less in fact, than that of the wife of the Chancellor, and she believed that in marrying the Count, she would through him achieve her desired end.

Yet she had twice refused him in the last year.

"No, no!" she had said, laughingly. "We are very good friends now, Count. But I have aims, you know. We women are terribly ambitious, perhaps, but the rôle of a Minister's wife does not exactly satisfy my cravings. Come to me as the Chancellor, and > "You need not woo on your bended knee, > I'll be as willing as willing can be!"

The chance was not so remote to her mind as it seemed to the man chiefly interested in the matter. And at the present moment, while the fate of the nation's peace hung upon his negotiations, she was in a fever of excitement lest he should make some false step, and his opportunity be thrown away.

Week after week had passed by and still the Empire hesitated to declare war, and while they hesitated Madame Klein was bound up in the occasional visits of the man upon whom so much depended. "No!" he said, shaking his head, "I have not come to tell you anything. I have come to the parting of the ways. One way, if I'm strong enough to carry the Emperor with me, there is war; and if it succeeds it will be known as my war, and the Chancellorship is——"

"A matter of a quarter of an hour," she interrupted, merrily.

"Quite so," he assented, gravely, "and then you yourself——"

"Will only be a matter of another five minutes," she again interrupted still merrily.

"But, see here, Juliet!" he exclaimed, "if I stand to win everything, I stand to lose everything too. If, as I suspect, the war will not at first prove popular, and the miserable Opposition gets capital out of my share in it, then if the war is protracted or fails (and, of course, that is just possible), I shall be hounded to death. They would be delighted to see me driven from office. I should be sacrificed"—here his voice, usually so level and passionless, quivered—"and," he went on,

Digitized by Google

"I should lose the reward of years of waiting, and yourself into the bargain," bitterly. "I don't know what to do," he continued lamely. "Come, Juliet, if you meant what you have always said, you yourself stand to win something if I win; don't you think you might stake something if I lose?" eagerly.

"What do you want me to say?" Madame Klein queried sweetly.

"I want you to say that if I make the plunge and don't come up again, that,—that——"

Seeing his eloquence fail him for once, Madame Klein finished the sentence for him by saying "That I'll join you in the deep waters. You are very kind!"

All this in a mocking tone, then suddenly changing it to one thrilling with deep feeling, she proceeded in her rich tones, "No, I will never say that. But I will say this. If this were a mere Party question, in which the fate of some new measure were involved, I think I would even stick to the old terms. If you won, I won—if you lost, you would lose, that was all. But this is our Country's matter,"—and she threw back her head proudly—"I believe in your judgment over it, and you are the strong man. Take the way, Julius, you believe to be the right way for Salmatia, and if you fail,—I—well I'll try and console you, if I can"—blushing.

"You put new life in me!" he exclaimed rising. "But—but you really mean it?" anxiously.

She looked at him with a new light in her eyes, and slightly swayed towards him. He was quick enough to take the hint and drew her to him, as she whispered, "I really mean it. Go and do your duty, Julius. Think of Salmatia," and, darting from his arms, "Think of me!"

As events turned out, the diplomacy of the Count was not driven into the self-assertiveness of a declaration of war. Growing impatient, the enemy itself acted while negotiations were pending, and in a few days the first War Council met. The Opposition felt that Providence had delivered the Count into their hands. They had clear proof that it was his method of working that had stirred up the feelings of the enemy to the extent of daring an outbreak of war. They dubbed it Julius's war, and as Julius's it was called the country through.

"Don't lose heart, dear!" wrote Madame Klein to the Count, "I'm not leaving this city till I've seen this thing through." And the impassive man flushed a deep crimson as he read the affectionate term, and kissed the note passionately; but the "not losing heart" was a struggle, for everything at first seemed against the success of the measure for which he was mainly responsible. Difficulty after difficulty arose in the way of the Salmatian troops. Sickness broke out among the soldiers at the front, and even defeat attended the earliest efforts of the Salmation arms.

It was by no means a healthy state of things for the re-opening of the Salmatian Senate, and on the day it met the Count drove down with hands that nervously tugged at the window straps in his brougham, as it neared the Senate House and sought to dash through the enormous crowd in waiting.

Then broke forth the storm of hisses and of cheers, and listening intently, the Count could scarcely say which predominated, and held his chances to be very low.

In the Senate the scene was renewed, his own party cheering like mad, the Opposition preserving a stony silence as if in contempt. But he was used to this, and sat down in his place with the familiar sarcastic smile curving his features.

It did not take long in debate to make clear that the personal war threatened upon Count Julius by the Opposition papers was to become actual fact. It was against Julius, Julius's diplomacy, Julius's letters, Julius's speeches, that the most insulting remarks were levied, and from his own side rose one of the giants of the House, and indicated his intention to join the Opposition wolves, who bayed in full chorus. But still the Count made no sign, for his time had not yet come; and the next morning the whole country was asking what would Julius say in reply to the attack? Had he a defence?

It seemed perfectly clear to him that his only friends were himself and the little woman who night after night sat in the gallery of the Senate House, and crushed her handkerchief in her impotent anger.

At last the night for his reply came. He entered the Senate amidst "a silence that could be felt."

But the Count strode to his seat without a sign of feeling, except that his face was unusually pale, and another face in the

Digitized by Google

Gallery went white also, as the lips whispered to herself: "I'm afraid we must both go down into deep waters."

She did not know her man.

An hour later he was on his feet and creating consternation amongst his enemies by his confidence in his own judgment, and his bitterness to them.

Of the war he spoke triumphantly, of its future he spoke hopefully, of his share in bringing it about he spoke jubilantly. Then, descending to meet his enemies concerning their personal attack, he disclaimed nothing he had done, or written, or spoken. "I would do it all again," he asserted proudly. He justified his action, and that of those associated with him, as necessary for the prestige of Salmatia and the support of its Imperial policy. He struck the right chord in appealing to their love of country, and stirred the most unwilling to acknowledge, by spontaneous cheering, that he was interpreting the feelings of the majority. Then he sat down. And well he might: he could sit secure.

Next morning a footman brought in a splendid bouquet of orchids for her, in the midst of which reposed a note. It was in the writing of the Count, and simply said:—

"Had I failed last night, you would have gone under with me hand in hand. Will you still keep me waiting till I win the final triumph?"

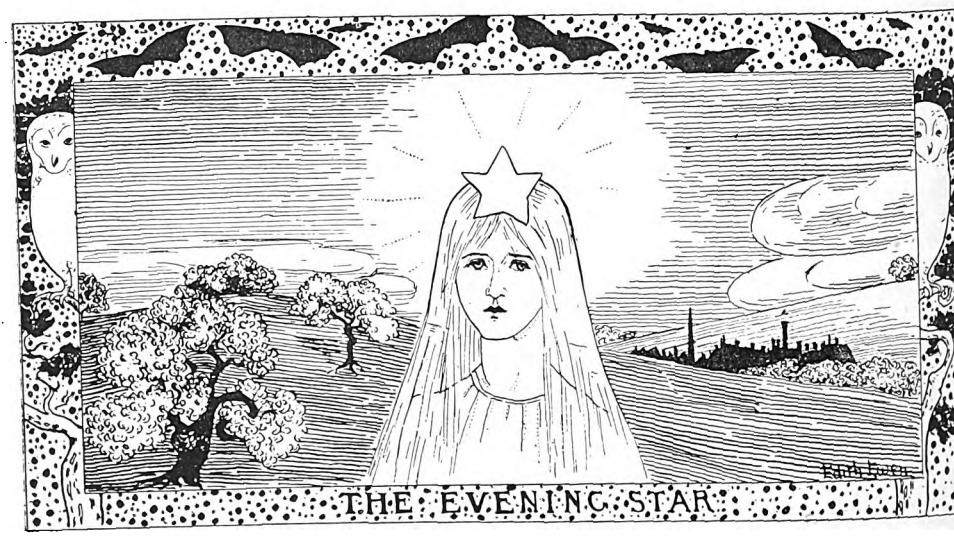
Crossing to a richly inlaid rosewood desk, she sat down and rapidly inscribed her answer:—

"No, the triumph was won last night. Its acknowledgment will not make it greater. To make you Chancellor would be like the old crowning of King David. He was king before; that only consented to the fact. You are first of them all. You have kept the terms. You may claim me when you like."

They were married shortly after, and even as they left the church came the news of a great Salmatian victory.

"I told you it would come," she said. "Wait!" And they did not wait long.

A year later the older men were tired of the work of the war, and, acting under their advice, the Emperor handed the portfolio of Chancellor to the Man of Iron Will, and Madame Klein had her wish.



Digitized by Google

In the Public Eye

Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

NOW that the war in South Africa has been concluded by the honourable peace which has brought such unfeigned thankfulness to every portion of the Empire, the work of the Committee of the South African Graves Fund, of which Miss Tillard is the untiring hon. sec., assumes a special interest and importance. For that Committee, a branch of the Victoria League, has for its object the locating and caring for the graves of our fallen soldiers in South Africa. In all parts of the British Dominions there are those who, severed by poverty and thousands of ocean miles from the spot where their loved ones lie, would give much to have even a photograph of the sacred mound of earth where their thoughts are ever centred, and whose grief would be soothed by the knowledge that loving women were doing what might be done to tend and beautify it. When any such write to Miss Tillard she immediately communicates their wishes to the Guild of Loyal Women in South Africa through whose co-operation the work is carried out.

MISS TILLARD,
Hon. Sec. South African Graves Fund.

Miss Tillard has in her possession nearly a hundred photographs of graves which have been reached and on which stones, iron crosses, or cairns have been erected, and in many instances flowers planted. When the relatives of the fallen are too poor to pay for it this is done absolutely without fee, though, of course, in the great majority of cases the friends prefer to contribute part, if not the whole, of the expense incurred.

Digitized by Google

It would be difficult to say to how many sorrowing hearts comfort has thus been given. Truly a beautiful work, and worthy of the heart-whole devotion which the hon. sec. of the South African Graves Fund gives to it!

Miss Tillard's address is 8, Sunderland-terrace, Westbourne-gardens, London, W.

DR. ANNIE McCALL is doing admirable work for women in the Clapham Maternity Hospital, founded by her, some thirteen years since, in aid of mothers of the poorer classes. In connection with this hospital are the efficient Dispensaries of Battersea and Wandsworth.

Dr. McCall is now strenuously working to secure a good site for a new and enlarged hospital. A freehold house and garden, adjoining the present hospital, has been obtained; but a considerable amount is yet needed to complete the good work contemplated. Married women, and young girls, with a first infant, from Rescue Homes, are all nursed for a small weekly sum.

Amongst 1,180 cases, received in 1901, no deaths occurred; nor was there one septic case in the Hospital. Students are efficiently trained in midwifery and nursing; many become medical missionaries in all parts of the world. Upwards of seven hundred nurses have been sent out. Dr. McCall is a consistent advocate of total abstinence. The proceeds of her temperance lectures are applied to further her splendid work amongst her poorer sisters.

DR. ANNIE McCALL.

The Proprietor of the "Temple Magazine" offers a Prize of £1 for the best complete story not exceeding 2,000 words, and not less than 1,500 words. The prize story will be published in the "Temple Magazine," and illustrated free of charge, and the Author will receive a cheque for £1. The second and third stories in order of merit will be published and illustrated free of charge. The sending in of any stories or articles shall be deemed, on selection for first, second, or third place, to give the Proprietor the right of publication for one issue of the "Temple Magazine," and the Author will receive a set of electros of the illustrations free. The "Story Coupon," cut from the "Temple Magazine," must be attached to MSS. sent in. See Contents Page for Coupon.

Digitized by Google

A GREAT OFFER.

DORE'S LONDON,

Published at £3 3s., for 12s. 6d., Carriage Paid.

Reduced facsimile of page.

60 LONDON: A PILGRIMAGE.

Amid frantic shouting, amid a snow-storm of pockethandkerchiefs and delirious ravings of purple-faced betting men, two lithe, trim, swift boats, dipping one dip and feathering one flame of light—skim along the shining way.

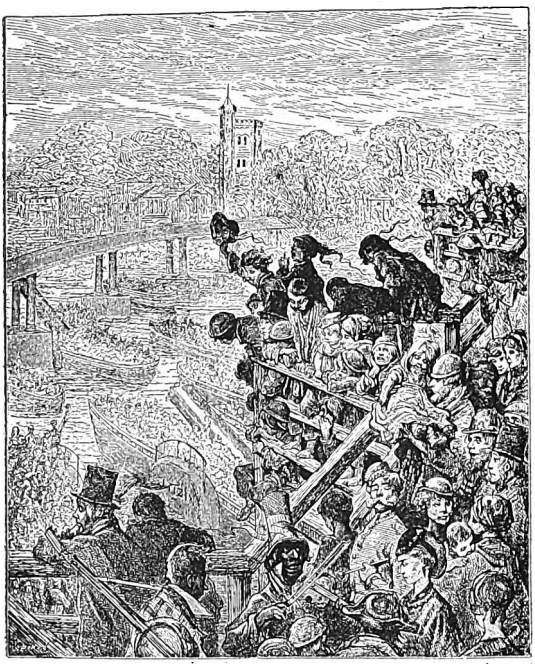
Men and women dance: men who were stern of aspect a moment since, make trumpets of their hands, and bawl their joy, like bulls. The excitement is too much for many—who absolutely turn away, and mechanically echo the general cry. Cambridge—no Oxford! Oxford—no Cambridge! Bravo Oxford! give it 'em Cambridge!

Direct and sharp as sword-fish after prey—THEY PASS!

And then a white ocean of faces bursts upon us. Helter skelter at fullest speed, hidden under their human burden and gay with bunting, the steamers, serried like guardsmen—a moving wall bearing a convulsed multitude—close behind the fighting crews. The roar dies out slowly, and with expiring bursts, like a nearly spent storm; and then rises and rumbles away from us to the winning post.

The first gun a second's pause, and then another gun. A fowler lifts the feathers of some pigeons, and the news of the battle has taken wing. And in another minute, the strings of the bow are loosened. Features relax, and settle back to the everyday expression. The beggars begin to beg: the poor boys to sell their fusees, the calm coster to open his oysters; and all the world to wonder how they will squeeze through the narrow lanes home, by bed-time.

Reduced facsimile of page.



GUSTAVE DORE, the great French Painter, who is so well known by his illustrations of "DANTE'S INFERNO," made a series of sketches of London Life some thirty years ago. This standard work of art, handsomely bound, and printed on fine plate paper, forms an ornament to any drawing-room or library, and is published at 3 guineas. In size it is 12½ ins. by 15½ ins., and it weighs 12 pounds.

Send P.O. for 12s. 6d. to Manager, "Temple Magazine," 6a, Tudor Street, E.C., and this splendid book will be forwarded carriage paid.

Digitized by Google

A LITTLE = = = = = MATCHMAKER.

By BETH BANNESTER, B.A.

"I'M so glad father's coming home at last," said little Percy Ellerton, as he scrambled up into the dog-cart, and took his place beside the groom. "Won't it be stunning, Thomas?"

Thomas assented dubiously. He had a very easy life of it with Percy's grandmother, and was not sure how far his master's return from India might affect his "off" time.

"Margery doesn't seem to think I shall like it so much," pursued Percy, as they drove off. "She says father's sure to give me a stepmother before long. Do you think he will?"

"I shouldn't wonder, Master Percy," returned Thomas, slowly, as he weighed the situation. "There's never any telling."

"And don't you think stepmothers are nice, Thomas?" pursued Percy, looking up into the groom's face.

Thomas nobly resisted an inclination to scratch his head, for the mare was spirited and needed to be kept well in hand.

"Well, Master Percy," he replied at length, "I can't hardly say. Some of 'em's nice and some of 'em ain't."

"I do hope father will give me a nice one," said Percy reflectively. "You don't s'pose he would let me choose, do you?"

"It's not likely, Master Percy," returned Thomas, startled for once into a prompt reply.

"I'm sorry for that," replied the child gravely. "Granny always lets me choose my presents, so I thought p'r'aps father wouldn't mind. Do you s'pose he'll wait till my next birthday to give me a stepmother, Thomas?"

But Thomas was saved the necessity of solving this weighty problem, for they drew up at the station, and the whistle of the incoming train threw all other interests into the shade.

Childish anticipations are so often bitterly disappointed that an onlooker scanning the eager little face on the platform as it watched the opening doors of the train, might have trembled lest the child's castle in the air should prove a house of cards. But Percy's father exceeded his wildest anticipations. To have a father who played with you and taught you games you didn't know before, a father who spun you yarns about Hindoo jugglers and conjurers, and listened to you in return almost as if you were grown up, a father who let you do lots of things that Granny had forbidden as dangerous —this was indeed to live. Percy had considered Granny jolly—at times, he had sometimes applied the gentle adjective to Margery and Thomas; but father—father was jolly in a sense that was not only superlative but unique. The word had acquired a wealth of meaning which it had never contained before.

The interests of the new life were so numerous that it was a full week before Percy thought again of the stepmother, and a fortnight before he broached the subject to his father. An opportunity, however, came under the walnut trees one August afternoon. Robert Ellerton yawned and dropped the magazine he was reading, and, Percy, delighted to break the silence which was beginning to press upon his spirits, began joyously,

"Father, Thomas and Margery say they shouldn't wonder if you gave me a stepmother soon."

Mr. Ellerton's brow knitted.

"You have been a great deal too much with those chattering servants," he began, in a more annoyed tone than Percy had heard from him before. Then, checking himself, fearful lest he should stop the flow of the child's confidences, he laughed, adding,

Digitized by Google

"Well, what have they been stuffing you up with about a stepmother? Tell me all about it."

"Well, Margery talked about it first, and then I asked Thomas, and he said he said he shouldn't wonder either. And I asked him if stepmothers were nice, and he said some were and some weren't, and then I asked if he thought you'd let me choose mine, and he said it wasn't likely."

"Indeed!" Mr. Ellerton's face was a study. "Thomas's opinion is enlightening."

"Would you let me choose, father? I've been thinkin' about it very seriously, and I'm quite sure who I should like."

"Don't say it's Margery," ejaculated Mr. Ellerton with comic gravity. "Spare me that blow!"

"Oh, no!" returned Percy, reassuringly. "It isn't Margery. She wouldn't be suitable at all."

The corners of his father's mouth worked, but his silence encouraged the boy to go on.

"It's a friend of mine, a very partic'lar friend of mine. And I haven't been to see her for a whole fortnight. Before you came, I used to go every day."

"You'd better go and see her at once, and apologise for your disgraceful behaviour," said his father drily.

"I thought perhaps you'd like to come with me and see her yourself," said Percy, insinuatingly.

Robert Ellerton laughed uproariously; then, seeing that his little son's face grew more and more dubious and puzzled, he stooped and pinched his ear.

"Well, come along then, on two conditions—that you don't tell your friend why you brought me, and that you don't make any more confidences on the subject to Margery and Thomas."

Percy was rejoiced to have attained his end under such easy conditions. He marched ahead victoriously, across the meadow-path and under the elm-trees in the lane, his father bringing up the rear with an expression of amused interest on his face. He found his little son an extremely interesting study, and indulged his whims with a view to getting to know more of the boy's real self. He had not the slightest intention of giving him a stepmother. His first trial of matrimony had been a tragic failure as far as his own peace and happiness were concerned. For the sake of the boy, he told himself, he did not regret it now, but he would never venture on that dangerous sea again. He roused himself from a reverie to find that Percy was unfastening the latch of a garden gate, and the next moment a lady rose from a garden seat at a little distance beneath a tree. A table beside her was strewn with books and papers. Robert Ellerton felt rather as if he were caught in a trap. He had expected some buxom dairymaid or quondam cook who allured Percy with goodies. But it was too late to draw back. Percy ran across the grass.

"I told father I used to come and see you every day and I hadn't been since he came home, and he said I'd better come at once and apologise for my disgraceful conduct and so I asked him to come too——"

Percy stopped, out of breath, just as his father's eyes met those of the lady. An electric shock, as instantaneous as it was real, passed between them.

"Stella!" said Robert Ellerton. "I had no idea you were Percy's 'partic'lar friend!'"

She coloured slightly.

"Percy and I are great chums," she answered lightly. "I did not expect to see much of him after your return, but I am glad he has not quite forgotten me."

Her tone had an indefinable standoffishness, and he felt it, and man-like, felt he should like to make her come to terms. He was too much a man of the world to be at a loss for topics, and in spite of her coldness, the conversation did not flag.

"Percy has no business to accept your hospitality like this without returning it," he said as he took his leave. "You must come and see my mother."

"Thank you," she replied icily, "Mrs. Ellerton will excuse me, I know, as everyone else does. I am too busy either to visit or receive. I have that pile of proofs" (she glanced at the table) "to send off before Wednesday."

Although the words might have opened up a fresh avenue of conversation, the tone had a note of finality about it that forbade questioning, and Robert Ellerton, to his own surprise and annoyance, found himself checked by it. There was a distinct expression of pique on his face as he and Percy walked across the meadow home.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile the woman they had left in the garden still sat beneath the tree gazing with set face into the green gloom of the branches. Her heart was full of hot passionate resentment. How dared he? Oh! how dared he approach her so familiarly, and call her by the old sweet name? She crimsoned at the thought that this man had been the centre of her life's inner story; that the loss of him had been her life's tragedy. She had pictured him often, thinking of her tenderly, pityingly, self-reproachfully perhaps, never quite forgetting her, in spite of the fate that had separated them. And now, after all these years, they had met and he had spoken to her with a light assumption of the old easy familiarity—he had called her Stella. Her yearning, regretful soul had lived on his memory—and he did not care! With a sudden revulsion of feeling she almost hated him—she quite hated herself for the self-revelation that she knew was in her novels. However, her nom-de-plume protected her. How glad she was that she had kept the secret. He would never guess. Ah! how stupid she had been. She had once let Percy hear the title of one of her books. No matter, she reassured herself, the child would not remember.

But children sometimes remember more than is expected of them.

Robert Ellerton walked home in a

"I'M SO GLAD FATHER'S COMING HOME AT LAST," HE SAID.

Digitized by Google

reverie, heedless for once of the chatter of the boy beside him. So this queenly woman was really little Stella—Stella, whose girlish figure had grown so dim in his memory. Who would have dreamed that she had developed into this? He was roused at last by the little voice.

"And she's written such a lot of books, father."

"What books?" asked his father suddenly.

"She only told me the name of one of them one day when she showed me some pictures in it. I asked her to read it to me, but she said I shouldn't understand. It was something about a jewel—oh! I know now—'The Jewel in the Ring.'"

So Stella had written "The Jewel in the Ring," Stella was the mysterious Harry Crane, whose personality had baffled the reviewers. He had read "The Jewel in the Ring," of course; everybody had read it. He had even bought it. He went upstairs as soon as they reached home and took it down from the shelves. He remembered the remark he had once heard made by a clever woman—"Harry Crane!" she had said. "Rubbish! A woman wrote it. The writer of that book has suffered in a way a man does not suffer."

Somehow the memory of that remark made him wince. Had Stella suffered, and was it his fault?

SHE COULD NOT WELL REFUSE TO LET ROBERT SEE HER HOME.

He turned over the pages with growing uneasiness. He had an uncomfortable suspicion that he was the original of one of the portraits in the book. Of course, if so, it was unjust; women never did make allowances for a man. He was possessed by a sudden wild longing to explain, to justify himself, to make her see that she had misconstrued him and judged him harshly. The longing grew upon him, but he did not find an excuse to indulge it. He called, but she was not in the garden, and she sent a curt message down that she was too much engaged to receive visitors. Therefore, as he could not see her, he thought about her the more.

* * *

The horses had shied at a motor-car, and were careering madly round the curve. There was a crash as the carriage collided with a stone wall, and next moment a stream of blood was flowing from a little white forehead.

Hours later little Percy Ellerton lay in a darkened room, moaning uneasily.

"He must see this friend he is asking for," said the doctor gravely, "or I won't answer for the consequences to his brain. Can't you get her to come?"

"I don't know," said Robert Ellerton curtly, taking up his hat. "I'll go and do my best."

Digitized by Google

He sent up a message asking to see Stella, and adding that it was a matter of life and death, and this time she came to him. She accompanied him to Percy's bedside and soothed the child till he fell asleep, and then could not well refuse to let Robert accompany her home through the moonlight. But they talked only of surface matters till they reached the gate, and then he pressed her hand warmly.

"You will come again?" he said entreatingly.

"As long as Percy wants me," she answered, "I will come;" but she did not ask Robert in.

They saw each other every day after that, and whether she wished it or not, a subtle comradeship grew up between them. One day she found the child sitting up in an arm-chair, with his father beside him.

"You won't want me any more," she said laughingly. "You must come and see me now."

Percy suddenly pulled his father's face down to his own, and whispered something in his ear.

"May I, father?"

Robert Ellerton nodded gravely.

"Do come again, and stay always," cried the boy eagerly. "Stay and marry father, and then you'll be my stepmother."

She did not flush, but her eyes sought Robert Ellerton's with something very like indignation in them. Much to her own surprise she dropped them again, for in his was a look that she had never seen there before—not even in the days of their boy-and-girl love.

"I second my son's request," was all he said; but, after all, tones, more than words, go to make up the histories of our lives.

THE CHILDREN WHOM JESUS BLEST.

I wonder if ever the children
Who were blest by the Master of old
Forgot He had made them His treasures,
The dear little lambs of His fold.
I wonder if, angry and wilful,
They wandered afar and astray,
The children whose feet had been guided
So safe and so soon in the way.

One would think that the mother at evening,
Soft soothing the silk tangled hair,
And low leaning down to the murmur
Of sweet childish voices in prayer,
Oft bade the small pleaders to listen,
If haply again they might hear
The words of the gentle Redeemer
Borne swift to the reverent ear.

And my heart cannot cherish the fancy
That ever these children went wrong,
And were lost from the peace and the shelter,
Shut out from the feast and the song.
To the days of grey hairs they remembered,
I think, how the hands that were riven
Were laid on their heads when He uttered,
"Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Digitized by Google

A Scientific . . . . Discourse.

FOR

THOUGHTFUL MINDS.

A RECORD OF FACTS,
PRINCIPLES, AND DISCOVERIES.

Free (or unoxidised) Phosphorus in its relation to the Improvement and Preservation of Human Life on Earth.

"THAT our medical men of every school, our greatest chemists, physiologists, philosophers, and men of science generally; as well as the inventors of, and those who deal in and adopt the numberless methods and preparations which are advertised in all directions and in every conceivable manner for the cure of the "Ills that flesh is heir to," suffer almost as greatly, and decay and die as quickly as the least educated in society, is matter of positive fact as well as of regret; and although it may be conceded that much good has been done by every system which has yet been proposed, there is certainly still a deficiency; still humanity suffers; and it is painfully evident that something more is urgently wanted—something more simple, more decided in its action, less of the character of ordinary physic or medicine, and more of the nature of a preserving and protecting aliment. This important desideratum medical science has, so far, failed to supply."

"Let us hope that the preparation now described is the beginning of a series of improvements in the right direction and of victories over the natural world."

These were the words of the late Dr. Samuel Birley, M.D., when introducing to the world, a few years ago, the results of his investigations, which had been the outcome of a lifetime's work and study.

What the medical world of to-day is beginning to recognise, he had many years ago satisfied himself upon: namely, the supreme control which the nervous system exercises, not only over the main functions, but over the most minute and apparently insignificant processes taking place in the body.

Dr. Birley's great rule is, therefore:—"Look after the nervous system; keep it well-nourished, and in perfect working order, and disease will little affect us."

Dr. Birley devoted many years to the discovery of some remedy that would fulfil the above indications. He carefully analysed the brains of persons who had died from various diseases, as well as of those who had been killed by accident whilst in the full vigour of health. He was struck by the deficiency of Phosphorus found in the brain matter of the weak and ailing, compared to what normally existed in the strong and healthy. From this fact the suggestion naturally arose that perhaps the loss of phosphorus had much to do with the weakened nerve force, and that its artificial administration might help to give back what had been lost. Such a thought was no less that prophetic, but simple as it appeared to be in this early stage of the investigation, it was found impossible to carry it out with any satisfactory result, for the following reason:—

Ordinary phosphorus, as understood by the chemist, cannot, by any known method, be made to be PERFECTLY SOLUBLE in the blood. It may be finely powdered and given in pills, etc., or dissolved in oil, alcohol, ether or chloroform, but in all these forms it is precipitated into a fine dust immediately on mixing with the juices of the stomach.

Many of these particles do not pass into the blood at all, but of those that do, they are completely stopped when they arrive at the liver, through which organ everything passes from the stomach before entering the general circulation. Hence Phosphorus administered in this form cannot possibly reach the nervous system, and cannot therefore aid in its restoration.

Knowing these facts, and convinced of the necessity of phosphorus as a Food, rather than a medicine, for the Brain and Nervous System, Dr. Birley experimented in many ways for the purpose of discovering a means of preparing it so that it would be free from these drawbacks.

His aim was to find out a form which would not precipitate in this manner, but remain in perfect solution throughout the system.

In the end he was rewarded by the discovery of a new process of preparation (by distillation) which rendered it, when taken by the mouth, absolutely soluble in the blood, and was perfectly satisfactory in its effects in every way. It could pass through the liver in a fluid state and thus reach the nerve tissues, which alone were in need of it.

No better proof of the value of this new form of phosphorus could be required than the very severe tests to which Dr. Birley put his invention. That it really does pass into the circulation, and enter into the composition of the Brain and Nervous System cannot be better discussed than in the inventor's own words:—

"The question has often been put to us—What proof have you that your PHOSPHORUS, when taken into the stomach, actually reaches and combines with the substance of the brain?

As it is truth only, and not opinion or hypothesis that we care for, our answer must be perfectly candid, and such only as practical investigation permits us to give. Because we cannot, or rather have no opportunity to, analyse the living human brain, before a course of PHOSPHORUS has been entered upon, we

Digitized by Google

admit that the evidence is not direct and positive. We are obliged to depend upon implication and analogy. The following items, however, force the conclusion we have maintained upon us :—

1ST.—PHOSPHORUS is a constant element of the brain and nervous system of all animals.

2ND.—The amount of PHOSPHORUS is different in persons of different mental and physical powers.

3RD.—In the brain and nerve-matter of those who have during life been characterised by great power of mind and body and who have been in the prime of health suddenly killed in battle, or accident, or by other violence, a much larger amount of PHOSPHORUS has been discovered than is ever found is the brain-matter of ordinary persons who have been killed in a similar manner.

4TH.—The brain-matter of idiots contains the least amount of PHOSPHORUS. A little more PHOSPHORUS is found in that of persons not completely imbecile, but physically and mentally weak, languid in action, deficient in pluck and energy, full of apprehension, weak in memory and in application of thought and purpose, who hesitate in their resolves, and shrink from the general bustle of commercial life. The same may be said of persons who are fretful, low-spirited, anxious, fidgety, and odd-tempered, and of the positively ill-tempered and disagreeable.

5TH.—Persons who in early life have enjoyed a fair amount of mental and physical power, but who have suffered many years from great anxiety and sorrow consequent upon family bereavement and other losses and trials, have been found after death to have lost a great portion of the PHOSPHORUS which is common in the brain of similar persons who have not suffered in the same way.

The same may be affirmed of those who, beginning life with a good constitution, have excessively indulged in alcoholic preparations. Alcohol has the property of dissolving and carrying away the PHOSPHORUS of the brain and nervous system. We have personally known and carefully watched the career of many who in the "prime of life" were brilliant, energetic, first-class men of business, full of dash and assurance, carrying all before them, and succeeding in almost every undertaking. We have observed some of these to gradually wane in their mental and physical powers; little by little to have become anxious and apprehensive; matters which once were trifles, unworthy of attention, have seemed to be of great consequence; enterprise and speculation have become less and less; a fear of losing or failing has gradually crept in, until a general tameness and insipidity have been observed. A few years longer, and the once bright, confident, venturesome business man has dwindled to an eccentric, nervous, despondent, and miserable human remnant, incapable of concentrating his powers, vacillating, absent-minded, forgetful, and almost heedless of the world or its pleasures. Deafness, failing sight, impaired susceptibility, necroencephalus (softening of the brain) and general inanition, have gradually terminated in death. In some cases we have been enabled to procure the brain and a portion of the spinal cord, and have found by analysis that the PHOSPHORUS has been greatly deficient and much less than has been found in the brain-matter of persons who had the same vigorous character during early life, but who have died suddenly by violence in the midst of their career, and when all their powers of mind and body were most intense. In several instances different parts of the brain have been found to contain different proportions of PHOSPHORUS.

Striking as are the foregoing examples, and forcible as they are in the way of evidence, they are not in themselves sufficient. We require a synthetical process before we can form a satisfactory conclusion.

We have treated with PHOSPHORUS cases of every class. We have seen the prematurely old, the worn and exhausted, the nervous and miserable of every position in life, gradually restored to a most vigorous and perfectly healthy state. From a lean and cadaverous condition they have become full in flesh, the countenance clear and ruddy, the eyes bright, sight improved, deafness overcome, the hair become abundant, the step and gait again elastic and determined, the spirits high and generous, the temper cheerful, the love of song and harmony returned, the brain again active, perception quick, memory tenacious, and the whole system and character changed from the most pitiable condition to the highest state of existence.

In several instances the stir and excitement of mercantile life have created a longing to return to business. Some have done so, and are now as keen and successful as at any former period.

If then in all cases of mental and physical debility where we have been able to analyse the brain after death, we have found a deficiency of PHOSPHORUS. and if in precisely similar cases during life we have administered PHOSPHORUS, and found such conditions pass away, what other conclusion is it possible to arrive at than that this new form of Phosphorus gradually assimilates with the brain and nervous system, and brings up the depressed and wasted constitution to the normal standard?

The preparation which has repeatedly produced such results as those above described, we have called 'Plain' Syrup of Free Phosphorus, because it is the simple solution formed by distillation, combined with sugar and without the admixture of any other substance or medicament."

Free Phosphorus in combination with other Medicaments.

The Phosphorus prepared as above described permits of our taking advantage of the well-known principle in medical science, that different articles of the materia medica have the property of acting specially on different organs of the body. These various properties are very valuable in cases of special diseased action, and we are able to take advantage of them in using the syrup of phosphorus here described. It will combine with many remedial agents, and thus the power of the phosphorus may be determined to different organs of the body as local conditions may require.

Where the heart is weak, and the whole muscular system flabby and greatly debilitated, in addition to great nervous debility and exhaustion, the best combination is that of protoxide of iron with the "Plain," and which we have named the "Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus."

In the course of many years' private practice Dr. Birley was enabled to considerably modify and perfect a number of combinations of his Phosphorus in addition to the "Ironised" above named. For debility of the muscular and general system in LADIES particularly; when "Below Par," and suffering from poorness of blood and lack of colour, a special preparation called the "Sub-Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus" has been found to be wonderfully successful.

Hence the fifteen standard kinds enumerated in the adjoined list have been formulated and have earned a unique reputation for the complaints named therein.

Digitized by Google

DETAILED LIST.

The result of over Half a Century's Experience. All have been proved in a Large Private Practice before being offered to the public.

PLAIN. SYRUP OF FREE PHOSPHORUS. A Vitalising food for all Brain and Nervous Affections from whatever cause—worry, late hours, overwork, &c.; and for Hysteria, Vitus' Dance, Headache, &c., &c. A sustaining and life-giving element. The basis of all Dr. Birley's Preparations. Of especial value to Professional Men, Clergymen, Solicitors, Barristers, Literary Men, Schoolmasters, and all engaged in mental occupations 4/6

IRONISED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Muscular Debility, Heart Disease, Paralysis, Rupture, Sciatica, Lumbago, Scrofula, Obesity, Dropsy, and General Debility. Of great value also as a restorative after an attack of "influenza" .. 4/6

SUB-IRONISED. Especially prepared for Ladies and Delicate Persons suffering from the above, instead of the "Ironised." And for Bright's Disease, Mumps, Varicose Veins, and when "Below Par" 4/6

MAGNESIAN. SPECIAL REMEDY for Pulmonary and other forms of Consumption 4/6

BRONCHIAL. SPECIAL REMEDY for Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Quinsy, Congestion of the Lungs, Diphtheria, and Throat Affections generally 4/6

CASTRIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Indigestion and Liver Complaints 4/6

ANTI-RHEUMATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for every form of Rheumatism and Gout. (In some cases the Ironised or Sub-Ironised will aid the action of this preparation when taken on alternate days with it) .. 4/6

ANTI-STIPATIO. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Constipation, Flatulence, Piles, Spasms. Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, &c. 4/6

ACIDIFIED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak, Fading, and Falling Off of Hair, and for Actual Baldness (internal use only) 4/6

VIRILITIC. Prepared for men suffering from Nervous Debility and Loss of Vitality 4/6

TOMATINED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak and Partial Loss of Sight, Deafness, Defective Taste or Smell 4/6

ANTI-NEURALGIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Neuralgia, Pleurisy and Erysipelas .. 4/6

CUTANEOUS. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Skin Diseases, Eczema, Psoriasis, &c. 4/6

The 4/6 Bottles contain between 70 and 80 Doses and are sufficient for nearly ONE MONTH'S USE

A SPECIAL OFFER.

We have the fullest confidence that where we can introduce these medicines into a household we are assured of a firm footing, and of recourse to them on all future occasions of illness or indisposition.

This coupon entitles you to a 4/6 Trial Bottle of any one kind of Dr. Birley's Phosphorus Compounds at 2/6; but if forwarded by parcel post, 4d. per bottle extra must be enclosed to cover cost of carriage within the United Kingdom. We guarantee safe delivery. Should a Trial Bottle also be required for a friend or relative, we will extend the offer to them if ordered at the same time.

Orders may be sent with the Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these Trial Bottle Coupons, and if we are not the money will be returned,

For Residents abroad the date will be extended sufficiently to allow of ordering. Postage of 1/4 per bottle is required for abroad.

COUPON.

4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/6

Or by Parcel Post 4d. extra—viz.: 2/10

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Available until Aug. 31st, 1902.

The above Coupon to be cut out and sent with order. These Trial Bottles can be had direct only from the

Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers:

GORDON, MURRAY, & Co., Ltd.,

10, ADAM ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

STRONGLY RECOMMENDED.

Among some hundreds of others we may mention the following Reverend Gentlemen, who have proved the value of the medicine, and from whom we hold some excellent reports:

REV. C. H. SPURGEON, London, S.E.
REV. DR. COCKREM, London Orphan Asylum, Watford.
REV. W. T. CRANFIELD, Stoke.
REV. R. FLETCHER, Hull.
REV. J. JAMES, Abercana id.
REV. J. W. MORRIS, Gly Neath.
REV. C. EARLE, Langford.
REV. F. CLEMENTS, Hanham, Bristol.
REV. GABRIEL MOLLAN, Clonmetham.
REV. E. I. DEVENISH, Teignmouth.
REV. G. COOK, Church Gresley.
REV. G. DALE COPELAND, Pudsey.
REV. A. A. BROOKS, Wigan.
REV. A. E. REALFF, Leicester.
REV. F. JONES, Malton.
REV. W. BARTON, Hull.
REV. G. HOMEYER, Claycross.
REV. J. B. GRATTON, Leominster.
REV. W. FRY, Blandford.
REV. J. D. WOODHALL, Bolton.
REV. R. FRAME, Birkenhead.

THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN AGE" says:—"Doubtless the 'Christian Age' enters many a home where there is some weakly one whose feeble health makes existence a burden, or perhaps it is a disease considered incurable which is wasting away life. Wherever there is such a case, we sincerely wish one of Dr. Birley's Preparations of Phosphorus might have a fair trial. These preparations are the result of scientific studies and experiments extending over many years, and the success which has already attended their use has been almost marvellous. We have seen hundreds of letters (not copies, but the original documents), some from persons well known to us, all testifying to the curative effects of one or other of these preparations. And more than this, we know of cases in which they have been the means of restoring to health when to all appearance recovery was almost impossible."

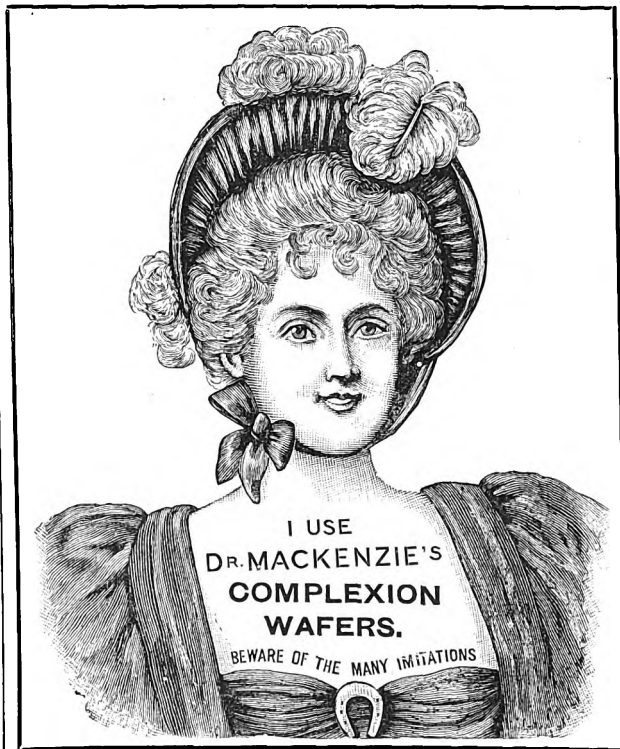
EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."—"Our readers know quite well how careful we are not to recommend anything but what is thoroughly trustworthy, but so many voluntary testimonials of unmistakable genuineness are before us that it is simply impossible to question the efficacy of the Medicines to which we are calling attention; hundreds of letters from all classes of people, including titled nobility, clergymen, physicians, &c., among which we notice several well-known names, all bearing remarkable testimony to the benefits derived from them."

EDITOR OF THE "FAMILY DOCTOR."—"One Thousand Original Letters of Testimony have been submitted to us by the Proprietors of Dr. Birley's Preparations."

Digitized by Google

See Special Offer at foot to all Readers of this Paper.

DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS



GUARANTEED
PERFECTLY HARMLESS

(Medical Certificate accompanies each box.)

THESE Wafers have long been known to possess the "wizard's touch" in producing, preserving, and enhancing beauty of person in male or female, by surely developing a transparency and pellucid clearness of complexion, brilliant eyes, soft and smooth skin, where by Nature the reverse exists.

The great difficulty hitherto has been how to make this beautifying principle safely available, and at the same time avoid what is detrimental and injurious. Dr. Mackenzie's Wafers are prepared expressly as a "Beautifier of the Complexion and Skin," and are guaranteed harmless. In the direction for which they are intended their action and effect is simply magical, the most astonishing transformations in personal appearance being brought about by their steady use. Even the coarsest and most repulsive skin and complexions, marred by freckles and other disfigurements, slowly change into an unrivalled purity and texture, free from any spot or blemish whatever, the pinched features become agreeable, the form, before angular, gradually transforms itself into the perfection of womanly grace and beauty. Used by men, the favourable result is the same. In the Complexion Wafers as prepared by the undersigned all danger is averted, and the remedy, taken in the manner directed on each box, is absolutely innocuous, while the peculiar virtues of the remedy remain unimpaired and intact. Powders, enamels, so called "blood purifiers," &c., &c., are a delusion and a snare. From the use of these Wafers FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, VULGAR REDNESS, ROUGH, YELLOW, or "MUDDY" SKINS, and other facial disfigurements are permanently removed, and a deliciously CLEAR COMPLEXION is assured

Wonderful TESTIMONY to their efficacy:

59, BEAUMONT SQUARE, MILE END, LONDON.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. The others have done me a great deal of good." H. MASON.

31, EVINGTON ROAD, LEICESTER.—"Please send me a box of Wafers. I have derived great benefit from the others I have taken." Yours truly, M. E. WARD.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Dear Sir: I find your Soap so good, I now want you to send me three cakes of it, also a box of Complexion Wafers." BEATRICE SELWYN.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. I am much pleased by the effects produced by the first." BEATRICE SELWYN.

MELBECKS, KIRKBY STEPHEN, WESTMORLAND.—"Kindly send me another box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers. The last has worked wonders." SARAH G. PAGAN.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF THE "TEMPLE MAGAZINE."

T.M.

COUPON

AUG. 1ST, 1902.

A 4/6 TRIAL BOX FOR 2/-

Any reader sending this Coupon and Postal Order or Stamps for Two Shillings will receive immediately a 4/6 Trial Box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers, this great reduction being made to induce our readers to give this wonderful preparation a fair trial, as we know one trial will convince all of their unique merits. This coupon must be sent in within 10 days of this date. Address all orders to

S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., London Bridge.

Digitized by Google

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

CALL OR WRITE. DESIGN No. 601. 8/6 8/6 DESIGN No. 602. CALL OR WRITE.

Design No. 1055, Ladies' Silk Shirt, trimmed narrow tucks. A leading line for 8/6; carriage 3d. COLOURS: Helio, Sky, Pink, and Black.

3/11½ 3/11½

Design No. 877. 3/11½. Moreen Underskirt. Special value for 3/11½; carriage, 3d. COLOURS: Blue, helio, red, pink, and black, Other leading lines at 2/11½ and 4/11. Send for one.

Write for our Summer Sketch Book. Patterns Post Free. Hundreds of Illustrations of the latest Novelties for present Season sent Post Free.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S SHOW ROOMS, At 47, Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C. Are open daily from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Saturdays until 1 o'clock. Ladies are invited to call and inspect their goods.

A SPECIAL LINE OF ALPACA SKIRTS In all Colours. COSTUME SKIRTS, 6/6, 7/11, and 9/11 each. Carriage, 5d.

Design No. 601. 10/6
The fashionable Eton Costume for Spring and Summer wear. Coat trimmed with three rows of cording and two rows of narrow braid and six small fancy buttons, very smart. Produced in all the new shades of the world renowned Specialite Serge or Vicuna Cloth. Price only 10/6, carriage 6d. Skirt only 6/6, carriage 5d. A marvellous Costume for the money—the best value in the Trade. This Costume may be ordered in the new Coronate Cloth, price only 21/-, in all the latest Pastel shades.

DESIGN No. 949. 6/6

VALUE FOR MONEY.

DESIGN No. 934. 8/11

Design No. 602. 14/11.
Stylish Chesterfield Coat & Skirt, lined throughout, made in the world-renowned Specialite Serge or Vicuna Cloth. Colours: Navy, Royal, Fawn, Brown, Green, Oxford, Grey Light or Dark Grey, Purple, Black, etc. Well-made Skirt with graduated flounce. Coat trimmed tailor-stitching. Price only 14/11; carriage, 6d. This costume in any of the lovely shades of the "Coronate" Cloth, only 25/6. In Allen Foster & Co.'s Zibeline Cloth, only 27/6. Patterns post free.

Design No. 949. 6/6.
Fashionable Costume Skirt. Made in Vicuna Cloth or in the world-renowned Specialite Serge, two sterling cloths, unsurpassed for durability and wear. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Fawn, Light and Dark Grey, Royal Blue Grey, Cardinal, Green, Purple, etc. This Skirt has the new graduated flounce, which is lined with good linenette. Price only 6/6; carriage, 5d. extra. All sizes in stock. Money returned if not approved.

Design No. 934. 8/11.
Superior Costume Skirt, with three shaped frills, graduated at back. Each frill is trimmed with braid. There are three additional rows of braid at top of frills. Made in all shades of A. F. & Co.'s Vicuna Cloth or Specialite Serge. A Great Bargain for 8/11; sent carriage paid, 5d. extra. This Skirt can be ordered in the new "Coronate" Cloth, trimmed glace silk in place of braid. Price, 15/11; carriage, 5d.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,

47, GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Years ago

when infant-feeding was not understood, there were some strange superstitions about infant fretfulness and mal-nutrition. If a child had plenty of food, and yet did not thrive, mothers and ignorant nurses believed it either to be bewitched, or that some wicked fairy had changed the true baby for another. To-day it is well understood that, where a child is unhealthy, does not grow, or is constantly fretful, the cause is almost invariably some error in its feeding. To properly develop and remain in health, a child must have food containing a certain number of things in proper proportion. Some of these things must be so treated beforehand as to fit them for the feeble, half-developed digestive power of the child. A child is properly fed on which contains an abundance of the natural essentials to infants' nutrition. It is easily digested and rapidly absorbed.

MELLIN'S FOOD

Sample post free. Mention this Magazine. MELLIN'S FOOD WORKS, PECKHAM, S.E.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS, AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. Thompson & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.
London: Printed for the Proprietors by the National Press Agency, Limited, Whitefriars House, Carmelite Street, E.C., and Published at 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

Vol. 6. SEPTEMBER, 1902. No 12.

Price Sixpence.

Digitized by Google

TO THE DEAF

If you suffer from deafness or head noises, and desire a complete and permanent cure, write at once to Professor G. Keith-Harvey, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C., for pamphlet fully describing an entirely new self-applied method, which he will send you gratis and post free on mentioning "Temple Magazine."

READ THE FOLLOWING WONDERFUL TESTIMONY:

"My hearing is now perfect."

am pleased to say that since using your remedies my hearing is now perfect, and I shall be glad to recommend your marvellous Treatment to anyone suffering from deafness, &c." —Yours truly, A W. WRIGHT, 26, Charles Street, Maidstone.

"My hearing is as perfect as ever it was."

"I am pleased to inform you that since using your 'Aural Battery' my hearing is as perfect as ever it was. The noises in my head have almost entirely disappeared, and I also feel a great deal better in my general health. You are quite welcome to make use of these few words in any way you think fit."—Wishing you every success, Yours faithfully, THOMAS COFFEY. 1, Sudley Road, Aigburth, Liverpool.

"I can now hear anything that is said to me."

"I am very pleased to say that since using your remedies I can hear very much better. I can now hear anything that is said to me, and the noises in the head are also quite gone. I shall always be very pleased to recommend your Treatment to others, as it has done me such a lot of good."—Yours truly, (Miss) ELLEN WEBSTER. 44, Carpenter's Road, Stratford.

"I can now hear perfectly."

"I am very glad to say that after using your remedies I can now hear perfectly, and even if I catch cold it does not affect my hearing. I consider your remedies are excellent, and I shall recommend them at any time."—Yours truly, H. MUTIMER, 151, Otley Rd., Framsden, Suffolk.

"My hearing is completely restored."

"I am very pleased to say that after using your 'Aural Battery' the noises in the head have passed away, and my hearing is also completely restored. You may mention my name in any way you please. —Yours faithfully, FREDERICK BARKER, Etwall, near Derby

Prof. G. KEITH-HARVEY, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 11 10 1902

Digitized by Google

Hovis Food

Trade Mark

for BABIES and INVALIDS (in Two Strengths).

The LANCET says, by the use of these Foods a milk is obtained "presenting the same composition as human milk."

No. 1 is a COMPLETE DIET for Babies up to weaning and No. 2 for after then. No. 2 is also of exceptional value in the sick room and for the aged.

In 1s. 1d. and 1s. 9½d. bottles from Hovis Bakers, Chemists, Grocers and Stores. Further information from HOVIS LTD., Macclesfield.

F. 2-2

Metto:—NOURISH AND FLOURISH.

'FRAME-FOOD'

FOR BABIES FROM EARLIEST INFANCY.

NOURISH AND FLOURISH. This is the motto of 'Frame-Food' babies, whose name is legion. The phosphates and albuminoids extracted from Wheat, which form the special feature of 'Frame-Food,' distinguishing it favourably from all other Infants' Foods, work wonders in the baby's development. 'Frame-Food' is suited to the weakest digestion, and is retained when all other Foods are rejected. TRIED ONCE, KEPT ALWAYS! Thousands of unsolicited Testimonials. Sold in Tins, 16-oz. 1s. FREE TEST.—¼-lb. Sample Tin of 'Frame-Food' or 5-oz. Sample Jar of 'Frame-Food' Jelly, sent free on receipt of 3d. to pay postage; both samples sent for 4d. (Please mention Temple Magazine).

FRAME-FOOD CO., LTD., BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.

OLD FALSE TEETH BOUGHT.

Many ladies and gentlemen have by them old or disused false teeth, which might as well be turned into money. Messrs. R. D. & J. B. Fraser, Ltd., of Princes St., Ipswich (estab. 1833) buy old false teeth. If you send your teeth to them they will remit you by return of post the utmost value; or, if preferred, they will make you the best offer, and hold the teeth over for your reply. If reference necessary, apply to Messrs Bacon & Co., Bankers, Ipswich.

SOLD EVERYWHERE, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s.

Ormbridge's

LUNG TONIC,

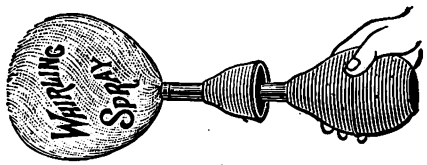
THE WORLD'S CURE

FOR COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, &c. &c.

Every Woman

is interested and should know about the wonderful

Marvel Whirling Spray



Ask your Chemist for it.
If he cannot supply the Marvel accept no other, but send stamp for pamphlet giving full particulars and price, etc. MARVEL CO., Dept. 102, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.

FOR HOME USE AND WHEN TRAVELLING.

Insist on having HARTMANN'S HYGIENIC

ARTMANN'S

(Antiseptic and Absorbent)

Superior to any Sanitary Towel.

TOWELETTES

Obtainable at less than the cost of washing, from all Ladies' Outfitters, Drapers, Stores, and Chemists, in 6d. packets (one doz.); 1/- (6d. per half-doz.); 1/4, and 2/- per doz. A Useful Booklet—"Advice on Accouchement and the Management of Babies," will be sent post free on application. Address—

THE MANAGERESS, HARTMANN'S DEPOT, 26, Thavies Inn, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE THREE GREAT SCOURGES,

ALCOHOL, MORPHINE, COCAINE.

The Hutton-Dixon Vegetable Antidote,

A HIGH-CLASS, UP-TO-DATE, PHYSICAL HOME CURE FOR

ALCOHOL and DRUG ADDICTIONS.

Also of great value in cases of Insomnia, Neurasthenia and Nerve Exhaustion. Can be carried in the Pocket and taken Privately—thus obviating the Publicity, Expense, and loss of time of an Institute treatment.

WARRANTED FREE FROM NARCOTICS.

Patronised by the Nobility and All Classes.

AN IDEAL HOME CURE.

This humane discovery has been publicly endorsed before the Congress of Bishops, and at Father Matthew's Anniversaries, also by Clergymen from their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in nearly every quarter of the Globe. Over Six Thousand Cases have been treated successfully.

In this treatment there are no hypodermic injections, it being a purely vegetable medicine taken by the mouth, can be carried in the pocket, and taken in perfect privacy at home or anywhere. In from one to three days, and often in as many hours, after commencing this treatment the desire or crave will have so completely disappeared that the victim would not give a penny for all the liquor or drugs in the country for his own use. Among the immediate effects of this treatment are calm, restful sleep, steady nerves, clear brain, increased appetite for food and pronounced benefit in every way physically and mentally, with a positive guarantee that there shall be only good after effects and a permanent removal of all appetite for intoxicating liquors or drugs of any kind, all of which is indorsed by scores of physicians, clergymen of every denomination, and men and women in all phases of life in many parts of the world. This is an absolutely harmless home treatment, and an up to date physical cure backed by and vouched for by testimonials unapproached by any other treatment for these habits.

Full particulars and indisputable testimony sent free in a plain sealed envelope. All correspondence strictly confidential.

N.B.—The Testimonials published in my circulars are unique, inasmuch as I print (by kind permission) the full names and addresses of the subscribers thereto, so that the genuineness of the certificates can easily be verified. Glowing letters of recommendation may readily be written and left unsigned, or signed with initials only, but what the public need now-a-days are the hard facts which cannot be denied or controverted, and these I furnish.

Address:—ALEX. H. DIXON, 5 Cannon Place, BRIGHTON, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A WONDERFUL INVENTION . .

for the

LAME.

As Supplied to the War Office for the Wounded from South Africa.

THE O'CONNOR EXTENSION CO.'S PATENT APPLIANCES

Enable those with Shortened Limbs and Weak Ankles to dispense with Unsightly Instruments, to Wear Ordinary Shoes, and to look like other people.

FLAT FOOT.

The New Patent . . . . Arch Support

CAN BE ADAPTED TO HELP ANY CASE OF FLAT FOOT.

A New Book on the Mechanical Treatment of Flat Foot will be sent FREE.

TENDER FEET.

The New . . . . Patent Socks

CAN BE MOULDED TO FIT THE SOLE OF ANY FOOT.

Describe the case, send a pair of old boots or shoes and 5/- A pair of Socks will be sent POST FREE. (United Kingdom).

GOLD MEDAL, LONDON; HIGHEST AWARDS, CHICAGO AND PARIS.

ADDRESS:

The O'Connor Extension Co.,

SURGICAL APPLIANCE MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT,

2, BLOOMSBURY STREET,

LONDON, W.C.

PAMPHLETS FREE on mentioning The Temple Magazine. Please give particulars of the case.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Edited by CHARLES HERBERT.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER, 1902.

			PAGE
I.	Frontispiece
II.	Old Moorish Homes		1015
III.	The White Lady of the Zenana. Illustrated by Fitzgerald.	Serial Story.	1017
IV.	Old Stories Re told	Illustrated	1027
V.	The Training of Teachers	Illustrated	1030
VI.	The Needle's Eye. Illustrated.	New Serial Story... Florence Kingsley	1039
VII.	Hope for the Deaf	Illustrated	1047
VIII.	How She Won Her Husband.	Complete Story.	1052
IX.	The Story of Armenia	Illustrated	1057
X.	Bible Beams		1060
XI.	How the Germans took London. Illustrated.	(IV.) T. W. Offin, junr.	1061
XII.	A World-Famous Preacher		1071
XIII.	Her Choice		1073
XIV.	Love the Conqueror		1077
XV.	Gems		1092
XVI.	In the Public Eye	Illustrated	1093
XVII.	In Payment of Debt		1097
XVIII.	Random Rambles		1101

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. The Editor will be obliged if, before sending any manuscript, a letter is sent him describing the purport of the article or enclosing a precis of the story. They must be addressed to MR. CHARLES HERBERT, "THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE," 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5s. per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to THE MANAGER, 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. MATHER AND CROWTHER, BRIDEWELL PLACE, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

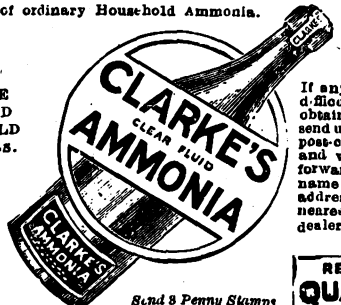
REPAID PINT 6d

HALF PRICE & DOUBLE STRENGTH of ordinary Household Ammonia.

Agents Everywhere.



FOR THE BATH AND HOUSEHOLD PURPOSES.

RETAINS ITS STRENGTH TO THE LAST DROP.

If any difficulty in obtaining, send us a post-card, and we will forward name and address of nearest dealer.

Send 3 Penny Stamps for Large Sample Bottle.

REPAID QUART 10½d

CLARKE'S, 360, OLD KENT ROAD. S.E.

COOLS & REFRESHES THE SKIN.

"Larola" BEETHAM'S Regd

After exposure to the Sun or Wind. Removes and prevents all HEAT, SUNBURN, TAN, IRRITATION, etc., and

KEEPS THE SKIN SOFT, SMOOTH, & WHITE

during the Heat of Summer. Its effect will delight you! Bottles 6d., 1s., 2s. 6d. of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

BEST IN 1894.

THE PALMER TYRE

BEST NOW.

The ONLY HIGH GRADE TYRE

NOW ON THE MARKET.

For Durability, Palmer Tyres stand alone.

FULLY GUARANTEED.

Write for Manual containing 11 Sectional Road Maps and 1 Key Map of the British Isles.

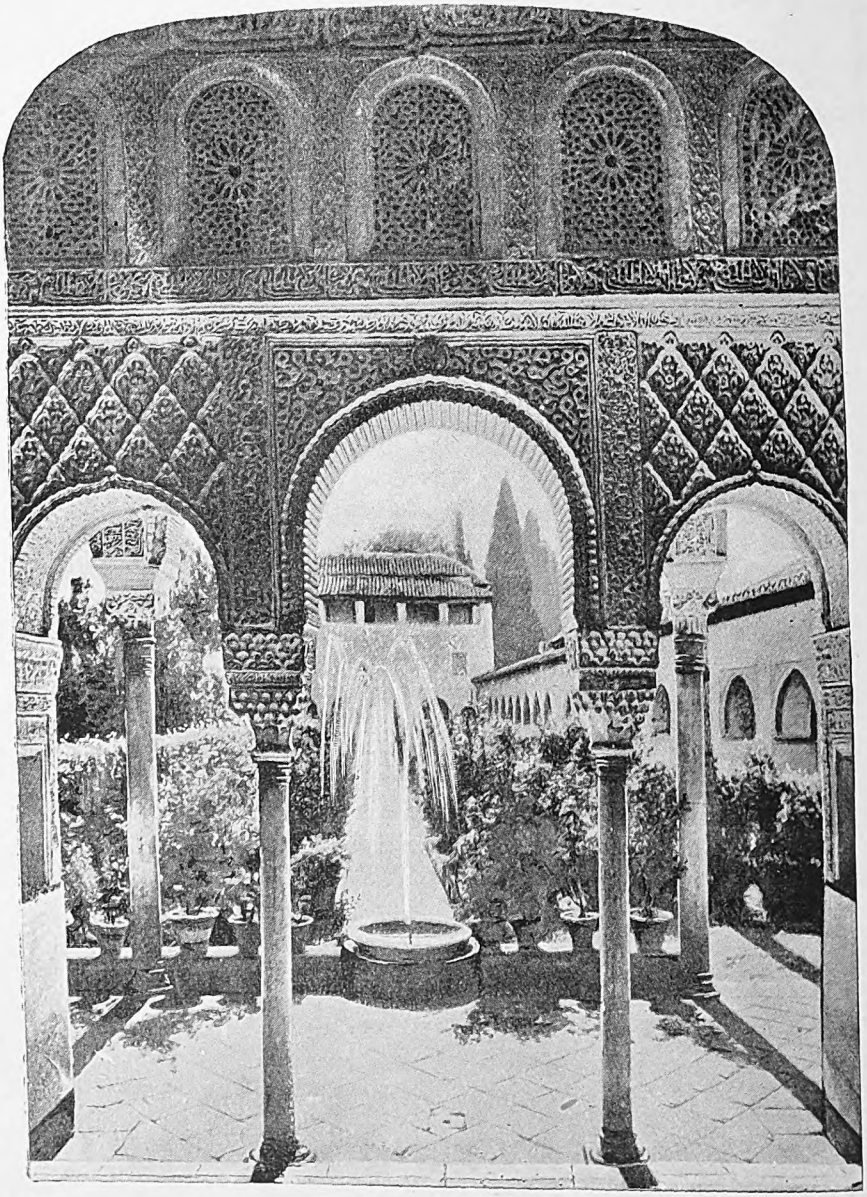
The PALMER TYRE, Ltd.,

Dept. T.M., BIRMINGHAM.

These Tyres are manufactured under license from the North British Rubber Co., Ltd., under Bartlett's Patent.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



THE COURTYARD OF A MOORISH COUNTRY HOUSE, GRANADA.

Digitized by Google

IN OLD MOORISH HOMES.

FOUR centuries have passed away since the Mahomedan power was driven out of Spain by the fall of the Moorish kingdom of Granada, in the famous war conducted with such spirit by Ferdinand and Isabella. In that long and memorable crusade of Christian against Moslem, there were some episodes of terrible barbarity. The fanatical Moorish armies perpetrated excesses which aroused all Christendom, and the Christian princes banded together resolved, at whatever cost, to expel the Moors. This was at last accomplished. Malaga and Granada, the strongholds of the Moorish Empire, were captured, and Boabdil, the last of the alien monarchs of the Crescent to rule in Western Europe, was deprived of his power and possessions, and became a vassal of Spain.

The story of the Moorish period of occupation is now only recalled by the magnificent architectural remains of that period that still exist in many localities in Granada. Nowhere in Europe are there any structures excelling in dignity of conception and extreme delicacy of treatment those found in the Alhambra group. Combining many of the features of Saracenic and Arabian architecture, the Moorish workmen wrought in a style which, though replete with ornament, was yet conspicuously graceful and striking, lacking the heaviness of the Gothic and the Roman, and retaining in a multiplied form something of the beauty of the Greek. In the remains of their mosques, tombs, and palaces, and even in many homes of the wealthier class, this rich elaboration is still visible. Slender, graceful pillars, topped by ornate capitals, support the buildings, rising to delicately-formed arches, heavy with tracery that seems to the observer as fine as the filigree work of a silversmith.

The photograph on the opposite page (the courtyard of a country house at Granada) gives an idea of the general style of such buildings. The house itself surrounds the cool, well-shaded courtyard, rich in foliage, and still further cooled by the spray of fountains. The windows and doorways of their dwellings were made small to shut out the heat. In the older quarter of Granada there are still many buildings that retain much of the ancient Moorish style, but the modern part is commonplace.

Spain was invaded by the Arabs about A.D. 709, at which time what is now the city of Granada was occupied by a strong fortress only. About sixty years later fortifications were built and a town raised, which, from its position and strength, soon became a place of importance. In 1019-1020 it became the capital of the province, and later on the capital of the Mahomedan possessions in Spain. The Arabian dynasties were succeeded by that of the Almoravides, another African race, which, after a short rule, was followed by the Moors, who landed in Spain and overthrew the reigning Almoravide sovereign in 1150.

The Moorish princes vied with each other in splendour and magnificence, and vastly improved the country, opening canals for irrigating purposes, building colleges and mosques, and improving the appearance of their chief cities. Granada, as the chief city of the kingdom, received special attention, but the most beautiful building they erected was known as the Alhambra. This palace was built inside the fortress by Mahomed III. in 1250. Under Moorish rule it was the scene of the luxurious pleasure of the monarchs, and the stage upon which many fearful crimes were enacted. Within its brilliant courts the king fell by the hands of his aspiring vizier, who in his turn was cut down by an equally ambitious rival. The final crime which brought about the stroke which drove the Moors from Spain was the massacre of the Abencerrages. In 1482 the capital, the palace, and the harem became the scene of a feud respecting the succession; one party, known as the Thegris, supporting the son of one wife, and the other, known as the Abencerrages, supporting the son of the other. The quarrel became so intense that Boabdil, the head of the Thegris, fled from Granada, and retired to Guadix, where he was proclaimed king. He thereupon marched to the capital, took possession of it, dethroned his father, and reigned in his stead. Instigated by the Thegris, he resolved to take revenge upon the Abencerrages. He summoned to his presence the chiefs of their principal families on the plea that he was desirous to effect a reconciliation between them and the Thegris. A banquet was prepared, but after the guests had feasted they were taken out one by one to the fountain of the Court of the Lions, and beheaded. This unwarrantable act of cruelty deprived Granada of a great number of its stoutest defenders, for there had been for years past fighting between the Moors and Ferdinand and Isabella, the latter of whom had conquered a large part of the Moorish possessions, but had hitherto been unable to take Granada. Boabdil was now deserted by every honest Moslem, and had to place himself entirely in the hands of the Thegris faction, and was compelled to shut himself up in the Alhambra for protection. Some time after, he made an incursion into the Christian territory, but he was defeated and taken prisoner. He was succeeded by his brother, but the wary Ferdinand now professed to take a great interest in his prisoner, and, espousing his cause, he set him at liberty, and once more roused the flames of civil discord, during which he entered the Moorish dominions at the head of a considerable army. Professing to fight for Boabdil, in the course of four years he took town after town, till Granada only remained, which by this time had once more received Boabdil within its walls. In the month of April, 1491, Ferdinand, accompanied by his consort Isabella, laid siege to Granada, which, after a siege of nearly a year, was taken, and the standard of the Cross waved over the Alhambra.

Digitized by Google

By one of the articles of the capitulation preceding the surrender of Granada, the Moorish population of that capital were to retain possession of their mosques, and to be allowed the free exercise of their religion, with its peculiar rites and ceremonies; they were in no instance to be compelled to forsake the faith of their fathers, and to embrace the Christian religion; and they were, moreover, to be judged by their own laws; yet these conditions were soon disregarded and infringed. The conversion of the Moriscos had been entrusted by Ferdinand to Fray Fernando de Talavera, a prelate of consummate talent and benevolent disposition. The wise and kind measures adopted by this good prelate in furtherance of the object committed to his care, acquired him great authority among the Moors, some of whom listened to his words, and were added to the church; but the progress of proselytism was too slow for the zeal of the Catholic sovereigns, and it was accordingly decided to send Cardinal Ximenez to Granada to hasten the work of conversion. What the mild policy and conciliating measures of Talavera had failed to accomplish, the rigid and unbending temper of the fiery cardinal was not calculated to achieve; for, although we are told that no less than four thousand infidels presented themselves one day for baptism, and that, unable to administer the sacrament to each individually, the cardinal christened them en masse, by aspersion, their conversion could not be very sincere, when they rose soon after in the Alpuxarras, and massacred all the Christians on whom they could lay hands.

In 1570 the Moriscos were again subjected to a compulsory baptism, and handed over to the iron arm of the Inquisition. The few relics of the miserable race which escaped the sword or the faggot were ultimately expelled from the Peninsula during the reign of Philip III., a measure which, by depriving Spain of a numerous and industrious population, inflicted a death-blow on her agriculture and commerce.

Digitized by Google

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Hazel, the heroine of this story, is an English girl, who having married Mahomed Ali, a Mahometan student, while he was in England, insists upon going out to join him, in utter ignorance of what it means to be incarcerated in the seclusion of the Zenana. When she finds it out, she is dominated with one idea —that of escape, and at the end of Chapter II. she has climbed into a tree to reconnoitre the surroundings outside the walls, but is surprised by her husband. After this, although he apparently takes no notice, he pretends to depart on urgent and mysterious journeys, during which time Hazel grows more familiar with the true inwardness of Zenana life, and is more disgusted with it. One of the slave girls, Taj Bee, won by Hazel's kindness, promises to assist her to escape, and her determination to do so is increased by hearing that her father-in-law wishes her husband to bring home Aziz Unissa, the daughter of Sultan Mirza Khan, to be his second wife. While she is musing, devoured with indignation, Taj Bee comes to her and whispers, "I have found a way of escape!" The plan when unfolded by the girl turns out to be a suggestion that as lady visitors come to see the Begum they are in the habit of bringing many strange servants with them, who, when they go away, are preceded by one crying "Gosha! Gosha!" and therefore it will be easy for Hazel, by dressing in servant's garb, provided by the girl, to mix in the servants' waiting-room and leave with them. This they try, but the slave girl herself is hindered and captured, and Hazel, who might have got away, returns for the girl's sake. Afterwards Hazel has impotently to witness the slave girl's terrible punishment, who is blinded by Eastern tortures. Hazel is not discouraged in her determination to escape, but decides next time she ventures to venture alone. Meanwhile she asserts herself in the Zenana, and finds her quick wit and ready sympathies easily win her a first place, both with the Nabob and the Begum. At last, overcome by the persistency of his father, Mahomed Ali takes a second wife, in spite of Hazel's strenuous objections, with the result that Hazel separates herself from him, and he submits. But meanwhile the new wife tries to ingratiate herself with Hazel, and after many attempts succeeds in meeting her in the garden, when there is a terrible scene. Soon after Mahomed Ali has an awful accident, that breaks his back, and Hazel, forgetting herself, endeavours to soothe his dying hours, but is thwarted by the rigid etiquette of the Zenana.

CHAPTER VIII.—(continued).

"It is monstrous!" she said, "all this Zenana ceremony in the midst of a case of life and death! Here are we, his mother and I, breaking our hearts about Ali, and whenever the Doctor comes we must be hustled out of his room, so that no man may see our faces. What does that doctor care about our faces, I should like to know, except, perhaps, to be very sorry for us, if he is a kind man. And is it not better he should tell me in plain English what we ought to do for our poor boy? What is the sense of letting him splutter his Hindustani to that old cow Kursheed, who cannot understand him? For that matter no one could understand him. If you had a heart to care for your son, you would let me go in there and nurse him properly, and hear what the doctor says, and carry out his orders. But, I warn you, next time he comes, I shall insist on seeing him, 'Gosha or no Gosha.' I, at any rate, will give Ali a chance for his life, poor darling."

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

And the old Nabob, listening to her torrent of words, with a deprecating look on his proud face, bethought him of the Begum's prophecy of the time when this foreign Sheitan should make him also run about and obey her orders.

"It shall be as you say, Hazari Begum," he said, putting out his hand with a soothing gesture, as if he would have stroked her shoulder. "Only calm yourself. It is not good for Mahomed Ali that you should make this excitement so near his room, he may hear you."

When he was gone the old Begum took her hand and held it long in her own with a clinging gentleness: "You do your best, my daughter," she said, "but you cannot break the iron rule of the Zenana. Be at peace, Hazari, strive no more against them; since Allah has decreed that our beloved one must die, and nothing we can do would keep him with us. We too shall die some day. From the angel of Death, when he comes, they cannot make us veil our faces. He will not wait without, in the verandah, when they cry: 'Gosha! Gosha!'"

The next day the doctor came to see Mahomed Ali, in the hottest part of the afternoon, when Hazel was sleeping. She had kept awake the whole morning, after a sleepless night, determined to see him in spite of everyone; but when the morning was past, she ceased to expect him, thinking he would not come till the cool of the evening. And, overcome with sleep, she lay down in her clothes on a rug beside the Begum's charpoy.

The doctor could have explained the curious coincidence of that visit. In the morning, very early, a message came to him that his patient was much better, and the Nabob prayed him not to take the trouble to call. In the afternoon a messenger came galloping, with a carriage to fetch him, begging him to come at once, as the patient was much worse. The doctor, having had long experience of the caprices of patients of this class, asked no questions, but came at once, finding Mahomed Ali neither better nor worse than he expected. So simple are the Oriental methods of circumventing the more direct designs of the Western mind.

As the Begum said, vainly Hazel fought against the iron rule of the Zenana. In this time of great anxiety, its narrow restrictions maddened her. She felt like some wild creature caught in a net, that turns this way and that, wrapping the meshes more inextricably round it at every turn.

Mahomed Ali grew worse steadily, as in any case, with every care, he must have done.

One day, when Hazel was sitting alone beside him in the dusk of the darkened chamber, he spoke again as he had done on the first day of his illness, of the deep regret he felt for the great wrong he had done her in marrying her, and bringing her into a life that, to one of her race, was insupportable.

"I am afraid it will be even worse for you when I am not here to help you," he said, "and I am afraid you will be very lonely."

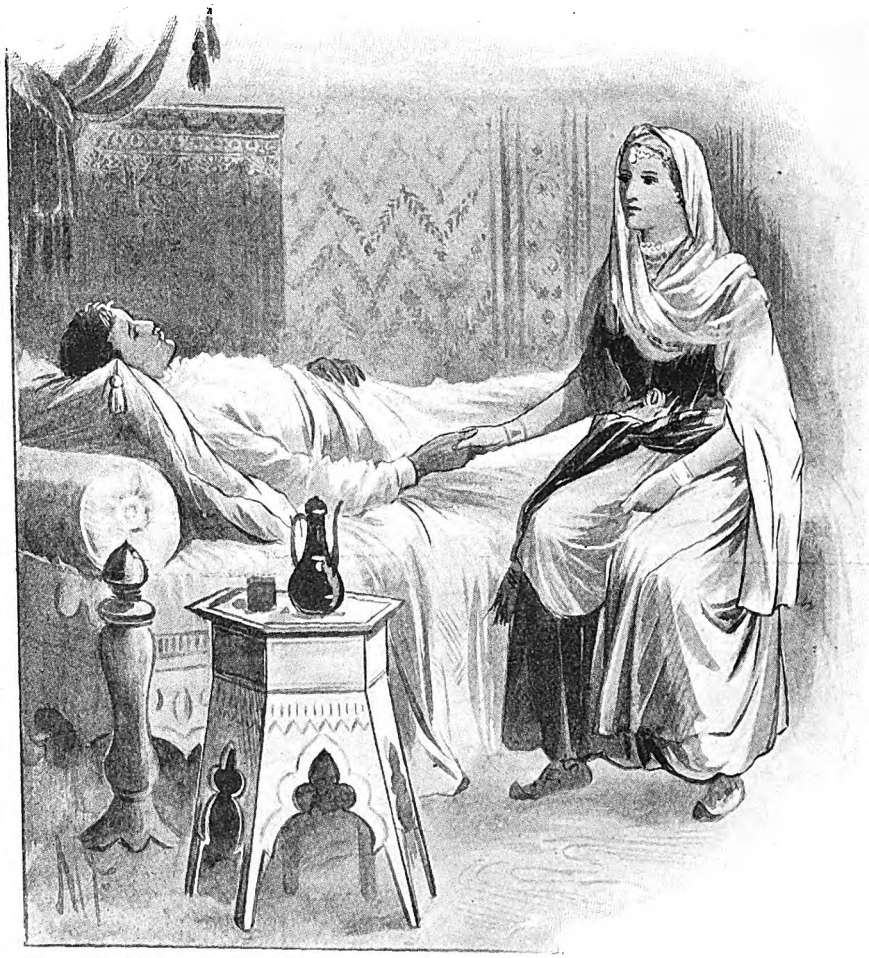
Then Hazel told him of the hopes she had of the little new life that was coming, as the Begum said, to comfort her. And for the sake of the unborn, knowing that Ali himself must surely die, she spoke bravely.

"I cannot bear to think of my child being born and growing up in the Zenana," she said. "It makes me ten times more anxious to get away than I was before. You know yourself how pernicious and enervating the influence is."

"I suppose it is not good," said Mahomed Ali, reluctantly.

"If it is a son they will take him from me when he is little. He will have no father to guide him, you know better than I do what your father and your brothers will make of him. You know what they are, idle and pleasure-loving and useless, steeped in ignorance and superstition. You know that you yourself are an exception, that you are not like the generality of the Mahometan young men. Your father sent you to England, but will he care to make the same sacrifice for the education of a grandson; if indeed his other sons would let him. It would not be well for a son of mine to be born here; and if it is a girl it will be ten thousand times worse. You men, who live outside, have no idea of the vice, of the corruption of soul and imagination of the Zenana.

Digitized by Google



HAZEL AND HER DYING HUSBAND CONVERSING.

You leave it when you are still children, and you forget. You come back to it when you are men, and very much is hidden from you; you do not spend your lives in the midst of its triviality, and its shamelessness. I know what it is, Ali. I have suffered from it; and I must be gone from here."

"How can you go?" he said. feverishly, "I too think it would be better so. I too would have you go back to your own people when I am dead. God knows I would help you in any way I could, but I have not many days to live, I can do nothing to help you. How can I even advise you, when it seems to me impossible that you should be able to get away."

"You yourself, would help me?" she asked, "you are really willing then that I should use any means in my power to leave this house?"

"Yes, you have my full consent. But I think it will be very dangerous, and the chances are all against your succeeding."

"Ali, do you remember when I first asked you to get me some books to read from the library? I did not do so then, with any thought of making them a means of communication with anyone outside; indeed, the idea only came to me from you, when I saw that you hesitated. You must remember too, that I promised you then never to use that means of communication without first asking your permission. My husband, I ask it now."

Digitized by Google

"You have my full permission," he answered. "I had forgotten about the library. That may perhaps make it easier. But, Hazel, you will be very careful? And you will not try to bring any scandal you can help upon my father's house? Don't go publishing abroad to your people all the things you have been saying to me about the Zenanas. And Hazel, let the fate of Taj Bee be forgotten; you can do her no good now by bringing blame upon my father for what he certainly considered an act of justice."

"I will do my best," said Hazel. No one shall ever hear anything from me that will bring discredit on your father's house. I will say only that——" She stopped suddenly. The words were almost on her lips: "My husband is dead, and I want to leave my father-in-law's house." But the words seemed too brutal, with him lying there.

He put out his hand and laid it kindly on hers. "Go on, dear," he said. "What does it matter now? When we know it must be so. You will say that since your husband is dead, you wish to return to your own people, but that you have some difficulty in doing so, because it is not the custom in our families."

"Ali, do you think perhaps your father would let me go, after all?" she asked, trembling with a new hope.

"Never! my dear, never! More especially if he knows what you have told me. Let me warn you solemnly, Hazel. Do not, on any account, let my father know that you are still harbouring thoughts of escape, or that you even wish to leave his roof, with his consent. No matter how kind he may be to you, and I daresay he will be kind, for he both likes and respects you, never confide in him, or let him guess your intention; for if you do he will assuredly frustrate it. My father is a very clever and a very subtle man, and unscrupulous. Your only chance will be in the entire absence of suspicion from his mind. And don't forget what I told you about trusting to the servants. If you can get someone from outside to assist you, I think you may succeed; but never take anyone in the Zenana into your confidence, no matter how devoted you may believe them to be. I pray with all my heart you may succeed, my dearest, and live a happier life, far away from here, than I could ever have made for you."

They were both silent for a long time, and then he spoke again. "I have been trying to think of what I can remember that may be useful to you," he said. "For one thing the garden is not watched now. But do not go there much, for fear of renewing suspicion. You will have to use it at the last moment; at the very moment you leave this house for ever. You have not believed in my love of late, I know, O Pearl of my Heart, but surely you will believe it now, when you see that for your sake, I am ready to consent to your bringing an outsider into the very recesses of my father's zenana."

"Oh, but Ali, surely that will not be necessary!" said Hazel, a little shocked herself at the idea of bringing a stranger into the zenana.

"I am afraid there is no other way," he answered. "When you go, you must have some one with you who can protect you, in case you should be surprised, as may possibly happen, by one of the slaves. One of the men, I mean. They sleep all about the lower part of the house, and a noise might disturb one of them. You must have some one with you who will be prepared to kill any light sleeper who attempts to stop you. For you must clearly understand this, Hazel; if you make another attempt to escape, after I am dead, you do it at the risk of your life; and if you are brought back again, your life will surely be forfeited. Now attend carefully to what I am going to tell you. Underneath your terrace there is a door opening upon a little dark room, a sort of cellar in fact. That door is never locked, the key is lost, I believe, in any case the room is never used and no one would ever think of going into it."

"Oh! I know it!" said Hazel shuddering, "I have heard of that little dark room. Don't say I shall have to go down there, Ali!"

"You have heard a foolish story, no doubt; but not the true one, for I believe there are only three people in the world who know it."

"I have heard the story of the slave Bibi," she whispered.

Mahomed Ali laughed. "An expurgated edition of her story, you mean, you foolish child. I will tell you the true story, as only my father, myself and one other know it. From that little room there is a secret subterranean passage, made nobody knows

Digitized by Google

HAZEL EXPLAINING TO ALI'S SECOND WIFE.

Digitized by Google

when, or for what purpose, but there it is, and the other end opens out on the banks of the Coombe. My father found it out quite by accident, many years ago. He went in there one night with Bibi the slave. I daresay that is what you were told. I believe one of the other slaves saw them go in, and as she did not see them come out again, or rather as my father came out alone, and Bibi was never again seen or heard of in the zenana, she jumped to the conclusion that the girl died there, that my father killed her, to put it quite plainly. She got a good fright for her prying, and that is always a salutary thing for the slaves in the zenana. Now, as it happens, Bibi did not die in that room, but went through the passage, and came out safe and sound on the banks of the Coombe, and is alive to this day. My father had found her presence embarrassing in the zenana, and took her elsewhere. He came back alone. That is the true story, Hazel. Now, when you go away, my dearest, to your happier life beyond the seas, you must go by way of that passage. There will have to be a deliverer of course," he went on with a tone of sad mockery. "He must get over the wall by the side of the garden, close up to the house, where the big tamarind grows, not from the portion of the garden where you and I sat on the top of the wall, one day. Do you remember, Hazel? An active man would be able to manage it easily enough I think, perhaps with a ladder. That would be a more difficult way for you to go, from this side you might be seen, and it would take too long for two people. I should say, let him come in also by way of the passage, which would really be more convenient, but I cannot give you exact directions how to find the other opening on the bank of the Coombe; and it is besides so masked with stones, and overgrown with bushes and creepers that no one would ever be able to distinguish it even with the most minute directions."

All this was not told in one single conversation, as it is set down here; it took long in the telling, amid many interruptions. The lamp of Mahomed Ali's life was burning very low. and many times his strength failed. Hazel had to give him medicine and stimulants, and he slept for a time, only to continue the conversation when he woke. Many times Hazel begged him not to think any more of her and her escape, but to sleep, or at any rate to rest in silence, but he answered always: "I cannot tell how short my time may be; and I cannot rest until I have settled all this matter for you. Let me finish, and then I will rest."

All this time, no one thought of Aziz Unissa; and Aziz Unissa made no sign. Her interest in her husband of a few weeks was small; her fear of offending or annoying Hazel was great. So she stayed in her own apartment, and her women brought her news, and sat round her, talking in hushed voices, telling how Mahomed Ali had not many days to live, and would let no one come in to see him except his father and mother and Hazel, although Aziz Unissa's own distinguished relatives came often to make enquiries about him. "And Hazari Begum is always there, she sits in that room in the dark, and they talk together in her foreign tongue that no one can understand," so said the women.

"It is no wonder he loves her," said Aziz Unissa. But in her heart she was glad that she was not the one who had to sit there, in the dark, watching, while a man died.

One day they told her that Hazel watched no longer. And she, listening behind her own door, heard footsteps once more in the Begum's silent chamber; and the silver voice that she loved, that voice that had never spoken to her but in anger or scorn, saying softly, in tones of sweetest tenderness:

"Yes, mother, dearest, I am here. I will not leave you."

CHAPTER IX.

"Surely now," said Aziz Unissa, "she will be no longer angry with me. She will let us live together now as sisters." There was some vague feeling in her mind that now that Mahomed Ali had been removed, all would be well between her and Hazel. And she ventured once more unasked and unannounced into the first wife's presence.

The Begum's chamber was full of people. Kair Unissa Begum was there, as lazy and, if possible, more beautiful than ever, in the many hued draperies that became her rich dark beauty.

Hazel, pale and weary, sat on a cushion near the old Begum. She hated the noise and loud lamentation and beating of breasts that went on around her. What had any of these women cared for Ali? What did

Digitized by Google

IT PAINED HAZEL TO SEE THE CHILD SITTING THERE AMONGST THOSE EVIL-TONGUED WOMEN.

they care even for the grief of the Begum who had aged many years in these last few days? Kair Unissa had hardly known him, although he was her brother. He had left the zenana before she was born, and had never come there much during her childhood.

With something of a shock, Hazel looked up and saw Aziz Unissa. Until that moment she had completely forgotten her. Well, she, poor girl, had a right to be sorry with the years of a long widowhood before her. She had behaved very well, Hazel thought, in these latter days of anxiety and strain. She had not intruded her presence on anyone. And thinking this Hazel smiled palely at her, and lifted her hand in gracious salutation.

The girl, delighted, came up to her eagerly: "Oh, Hazari Begum," she said, "now we can be friends."

"Tell her to go away," said the Begum, fretfully, "tell her to go and look at Kair Unissa's jewels."

"You hear," said Hazel, "the mother is tired and ill, she cannot talk now. Go and talk to Kair Unissa."

Just then more visitors came into the Zenana; as soon as they caught sight of Hazel and the Begum they began their lamentations and beating of the breasts, and the Begum, hoarse and weary, tried to respond. After the lamentations they went and sat near Kair Unissa Begum, and the old stream of gossip and scandal that Hazel remembered so well, began to flow again through the Zenana. Kair Unissa had brought a child with her, a little girl of ten, Abdullah's youngest sister. It pained Hazel's heart to see the child sitting there among those evil-tongued women.

"Aziz Unissa," she said, "go and fetch that little girl. I want to talk to her. Ask Kair Unissa to let her come over here for a few minutes."

The child came willingly enough to look at the beautiful white Begum, and Hazel drew her down upon her lap.

"Shall I tell you a story about a little girl like yourself?" said Hazel.

The child stared at her with great dark eyes. "I do not care for stories about little girls," she said, "I am not a baby. I like better to hear about how the slave boy got into the Sultan's zenana. Do you know that story, pretty Begum ? It is in Kair Unissa's big book, that they read out of."

Digitized by Google

"It is a stupid story," said Hazel shortly "and not true."

The little girl looked at her with the glitter of evil knowledge in her dark eyes, "I like those stories best," she said.

And Hazel, looking sadly at her, thought "And such a one as this will my own child grow up, here in the zenana."

Aziz Unissa was laughing at her and the child: "What does it matter, Hazari ?' she said, "You know we hear everything that is said in the zenana from the time we are babies."

Hazel looking at that baby face of Mahomed Ali's second wife was filled with an immense pity for her youth and for her evil fate. And for a moment there came to her a wild impulse to save this girl, when she herself escaped.

"Aziz Unissa," she said, "Would you like to come away with me somewhere, away from all the evil talk, and foolish ways of the zenana, where you can learn to be a true woman as God meant you to be ?"

"I would go anywhere with you, my beautiful Pearl. Where are you going ?" said Aziz Unissa, staring at her with round eyes of astonishment.

"She is only going into the garden," said the Begum, interrupting, "She loves better the fresh air of the garden than this scented air, and this noisy talk of the zenana. But I cannot spare her to go yet. Go and talk to Kair Unissa till she is ready."

"Are you mad, my daughter ?" said the Begum under her breath to Hazel.

"I think I was for a moment," said Hazel sadly. "I am so sorry for all the young girls and the little children."

"She is but a stuffed doll of the zenana," said the mother-in-law. "You would destroy both yourself and her."

Hazel could not tell how much the Begum guessed of her own secret intentions, but the subject was too dangerous a one to pursue any farther.

She herself saw the mistake she had made in that impulsive speech of hers to Aziz Unissa, when that young lady came to her later in the garden.

"What did you really mean, Hazari ?" she asked, "when you talked of going away somewhere out of the zenana ? Do tell me, indeed you can trust me."

Hazel saw the eager curiosity in her eyes and knew that her women must have told her long since of those abortive attempts of hers to leave the zenana, which had passed into household traditions to be repeated to every new comer.

"I suppose you do not understand my Hindustani very well," said Hazel, "What could I mean, child, except that we should come out here in the fresh air and the quietness where the visitors never come to disturb us with their noise and their stupid talk."

"Was that indeed all you meant ?" said the other girl, disappointed.

"I don't know what you may have been dreaming of," said Hazel coldly, "perhaps you thought we had wings here, and could fly up into the sky. For myself, I cannot go further than this garden."

"I wish, now that we are friends, you would let me come and live in your apartment," said Aziz Unissa, "it is very dull, you know, in that room next to the Begum Sahib's."

"Who told you to ask that ?" said Hazel quickly, thinking she saw in this the hand of the Nabob.

"No one told me, I thought of it, myself," said the other. "Say, shall it be so, my sister ?"

Hazel put on her suavest manner: "I am very sorry, Aziz Unissa Begum, that it is not possible for me to do as you wish," she said, "In my country it is the custom for a widow to mourn in seclusion. There are many rites we have to perform in secret, which no one else may share."

"It must be very tiresome," said Aziz Unissa, pouting. "But they will not go on for ever. And you know Hazari, when the Nabob's next son Mustapha is married, he will have your room for his zenana, and they will give us that little back room on the other side, for both of us. We have no sons, or we could keep your apartment. We are only two childless widows, they will put us anywhere they like."

"I know nothing about these arrangements," said Hazel, "One room is the same as another to me."

"These rooms on the other side are dark and horrid," said Aziz Unissa, "there is no terrace and garden, and the windows are high up, you cannot look out."

"If I am shut up there, my case is indeed hopeless," Hazel thought despondently. But she tried to hide her dismay. "Will Mustapha Sahib be married soon?" she asked, with an air of indifference.

Digitized by Google

"What do I know? He will perhaps marry soon, because Badsha Sahib, the third son, has no children, they say. He lives in Bombay. The Nabob will want to see a grandson of his house before he dies, therefore I think he will find a wife soon for Mustapha. Have you seen Mustapha?"

"No, how could I see him?" asked Hazel.

"He lives here in the house. I have looked out of the window and seen him. He is like Mahomed Ali. He is tall and stout, stouter than Mahomed. I wish my father had married me to him. But, who could tell that Mahomed Ali would die so soon?"

So she prattled on, the futile babble of the zenana, till Hazel was wearied with her chatter.

And all the time she thought: "If I cannot get away, I shall be put in the same room with her, and have to listen to that gabble all day long. I should go mad, I think." She asked Aziz Unissa, "Shall we be allowed to come into the garden if Mustapha had his zenana upstairs?"

"It will be very tiresome," said the other, "Whenever Mustapha comes to talk to his wife they will cry: 'Gosha! Gosha!' and we shall have to come away, where he cannot see us. It will not be nice for us when Mustapha comes to live in the zenana."

"It will be odious!" said Hazel, but to herself she said, "I shall not be here then."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

OLDI STORIES RE-TOLD.

THE STORY OF A HARD MAN.

By WOLFE STREET.

CHAPTER I.

IT had been a case of single combat, man to man warfare, such as the ancients loved.

Twelve good men of Judah against twelve of Israel, and the rival commanders Abner and Joab watched their champions with grim approval. Sharp were the knives, and sharp the combat, but in the end, seeing that Joab's twelve men overcame, Abner and his followers fled for their lives, yet fleet of foot as they might be young Asahel, Joab's brother, followed hard after them, and, unencumbered by armour, caught Abner up, intent on fight.

"I cannot fight you," cried Abner, "you have no armour; borrow some from my men, then will I fight you in truth."

But Asahel pressed him hard. Regardless for a long time Abner parried his blows, yet at last, seeing the others were gaining upon him, slew him, and fled to safety.

Joab now abandoned the pursuit, and having buried Asahel, returned to Hebron with lips set in grim resolve and heart fixed in steady purpose that some day he would slay Abner, even as Abner had slain Asahel. In vain men pointed out that Abner had avoided it as long as possible, Joab would make no allowances, and from that day doomed Abner to die.

* * * * * *

It was the city of Hebron, and wearied with an expedition, Joab returned with his band to the city at night, and, immediately he arrived, he heard the news that Abner had been to David with offers of service, and King David, glad of his revolt from his former master, had sent him away in peace.

Joab cursed and raved, and, entering the King's presence, upbraided him roughly, while the King, only too dependent upon his mighty general, suffered him. That night swift messengers went after Abner, from Joab, as if they came from King David, asking him to return, and, all unsuspicious of such treachery, Abner came supposing that the King had some fresh instructions to convey. Expectantly, he entered Hebron, but he never went out, for Joab, the implacable, kept his vow, and slew him.

Dependent upon him as David was, he rose to the occasion, and cursed Joab with a bitter curse, reckless of giving him offence.

Standing in his own house, with clouded brow, Joab was found by the messenger of the King and summoned to his presence. With great dignity the King faced him, and upbraided him in righteous anger. "I cannot visit on you your crime," he cried, "but this is my sentence. This man you have killed you shall go into mourning for, rend your clothes, and gird yourself with sackcloth!"

Impatiently, Joab would have refused, but, looking around, he saw never one eye which gazed on him with sympathy, and for the first time in his life he was cowed.

"More than this," cried the King, "you shall follow your victim to his grave!"

Slowly the men of war bore Abner to his last resting place, amidst the thronging multitudes of the city, and the eyes of the crowd fastened upon Joab, who, with bent head and shamed face, walked behind the man he had betrayed to his fate.

Arrived at the grave, the King made a funeral oration over Abner, and, turning with flashing eyes to Joab, he cried, "Died Abner as a fool would die! Not bound were his hands, not fettered were his feet, but as a man falls before wicked men, so did he!" And every bitter word of scorn cut Joab to the quick.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER II.

Years had passed, and by his successes and bravery, Joab had gained great glory, for David and for himself. There was no man in the kingdom higher than Joab. He travelled in state with a retinue of servants, he was given the title of "Lord," and known as "the Prince of the King's army." If ever the curse of the King were going to work at all, it seemed a long time beginning, and Joab, seeing how the King leaned upon him, and the people admired him, could well have forgotten the grim tragedy in which once he had taken part. But there was a wall between the King and himself; these two could never forget, and that wall would have stood for ever had not David broken it down.

One day, as Joab stood in the camp conducting the war against the Ammonites, a messenger reached him bearing a letter from the King. He opened it and read:

"Set Uriah the Hittite in the front of the hottest battle and then retire from him so that he may die."

Joab laughed aloud as he read that letter. "So," he thought to himself, "this is what he has come to. This very righteous man, who accused me before the people of killing Abner, whom I slew in just revenge, now would murder a man against whom he has nothing. It shall be done, my lord! But, henceforth, you cannot eye me as a murderer. I will keep this letter!"

On the morrow a messenger was sent to David, telling him in hypocritical terms of sorrow that Uriah was dead. "If he seem angry," he said to the messenger, "tell him it was an accident!—the fortunes of war!—tell him anything!" But as he went back to his tent he muttered, "Angry! Angry! the hypocrite! Angry! Ah, it is my turn now!" And, aloud he parodied the bitter words of the King about Abner which were burnt in his memory, "Died Uriah as a fool would die! Not bound were thy hands, not fettered were thy feet, but as a man falls before wicked men, so did he! Aha!" cried Joab, "he must lay aside his righteousness now!"

* * * * * *

Two months later the King came himself to conduct the siege, bringing fresh forces, and the two men met.

Joab looked into the King's eyes with one proud glance. It was enough. It said to the King, "I hail thee as one with myself." And the King's eye quailed before that glance. Henceforth his lips were sealed, and his bearing humbled. They were united in the freemasonry of crime.

CHAPTER III.

The glory and wealth of Joab now grew apace. He owned a house in Jerusalem, and a large country residence surrounded by many broad acres of barley fields; and secure in the favour of the people, and in his contempt for the King, he played Prime Minister at home. Even the King's sons did him reverence, and when the King banished Absalom, it was Joab who brought him back. But he was so tardy about it that Absalom in a fit of spleen had his fields of barley fired.

In great wrath Joab came to demand the reason, and coolly enough Absalom explained, "I want to see the King, my father. I sent for you once, I sent for you twice, you did not come. Now, bring us together, or I will do you a mischief!" Joab managed it, but the affair of the barley fields rankled in his mind, and this hard man waited his opportunity, as he had waited for Abner.

And it came.

Absalom rebelled against David, and in the battle that followed, the day was going against the rebels, when suddenly one of Joab's men rushed up exclaiming, "My lord! I saw the young man Absalom caught in the thicket of the trees!"

"You saw him!" growled Joab. "Why didn't you smite him to the ground? You have missed for yourself a great reward."

"If I were to receive a thousand of silver" answered the man, "I could not have done it. I heard the old King charge you, my lord, that none should hurt Absalom."

A moment Joab looked at him with fury. Here at last he found the King he had grown to disbelieve in—a living conscience. Only a moment, then he rushed to find Absalom.

Never a fraction of pity seized him as he saw the young man hanging in torture.

Digitized by Google

No chivalrous spirit like Abner's prompted him to set him free and arm him for equal fight, but he thrust him through with a spear. "That for your insolence!" he exclaimed, as he thrust in one, "that for your pride!" as he thrust in another, "and that for my barley fields!"

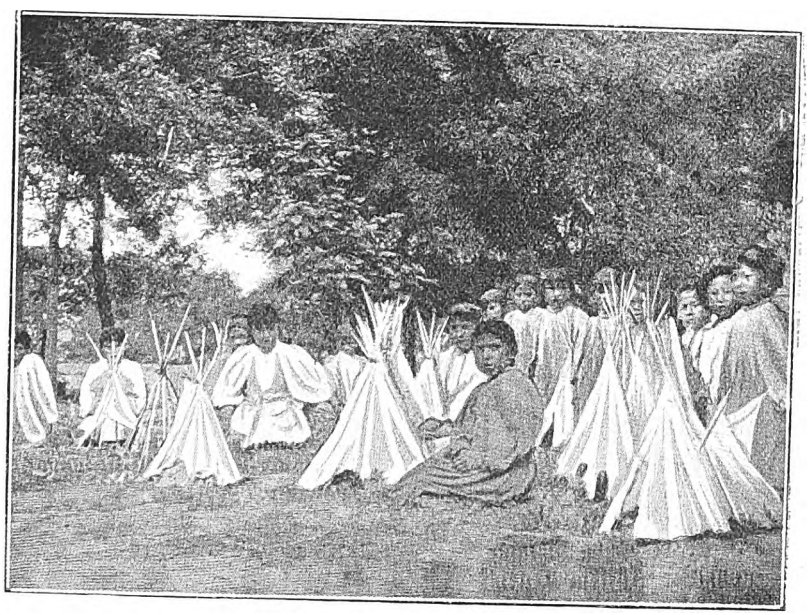
When he heard it the long-suffering King was roused at last, and deposed Joab from his position as Commander-in-Chief, and put his cousin Amasa in his place, but Joab strung to a pitch of madness, slew Amasa, and in defiance of the King, kept his command. And the old King, seeing the struggle futile, gave in, but not for long. He soon abdicated in favour of Solomon his son, and the last words of the King to Solomon were all about Joab. "He slew Abner," he hissed. "He slew Amasa, and you know what he did to me. Let not his hoary head go down to the grave in peace."

* * * * * *

Joab, out of favour, turned conspirator; his restless mind brooking no rule, and in the day when it was discovered he fled for sanctuary to the horns of God's Altar, as though to ask for protection from the very Being whose existence he had ignored.

There they killed him, and as the body of the old man lay before the altar, in every gaping wound through which the life-blood coursed, David's curse came home. He departed without being desired, and in the lists of David's mighty men, you can look in vain for one name, and that name is the name of Joab, perhaps the mightiest of them all. But his vindictiveness effaced his glory, and when men thought of Joab, they remembered not his power, but his crime.

MORAL.—Bearing a grudge hurts the man who bears it more than the man against whom it is borne.



INDIAN SCHOOL—GIRLS AT PLAY, MAKING DOLL TAPERS.

Digitized by Google

THE TRAINING OF TEACHERS.

THERE is a glow of delight in every Board School teacher when he or she feels they are "out of their time," but it is only a step towards the period, when each will be earning enough money to really support themselves, and in the case of the men, possibly support another.

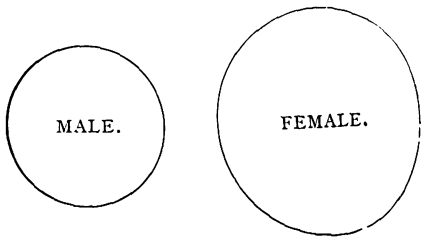
An examination awaits them known as "The King's Scholarship," and for those who pass it, a college training is available. provided they have managed to secure at least a place in the second division. At least one-sixth fail among the male candidates, and amongst the women, nearly a fourth. For them there remains only a place in schools, under an article in the Code, that allows Board managers to employ them, but, they are badly paid, and as a rule only employed in schools, which are not averse to getting their teaching done cheaply.

Now it is one of the unfortunate incidents of our colleges that, besides these failures, who thus forfeit the right to go to College, there are perhaps one hundred and fifty men and a thousand women, who pass the Scholarship examination, yes, and pass it well, but for whom there is the woeful cry,

"No room! No room!"

And it must be said in view of the rapid extension of schools that it is a crying scandal that these men and women, who have sweated their brains to win the coveted prize of college training, should be shut out because there are not enough colleges.

As it is, however, there are 43 colleges existing, 26 for women, and 17 for men, and they make provision for 1,378 men, and 2,193 women, a total of 3,571.



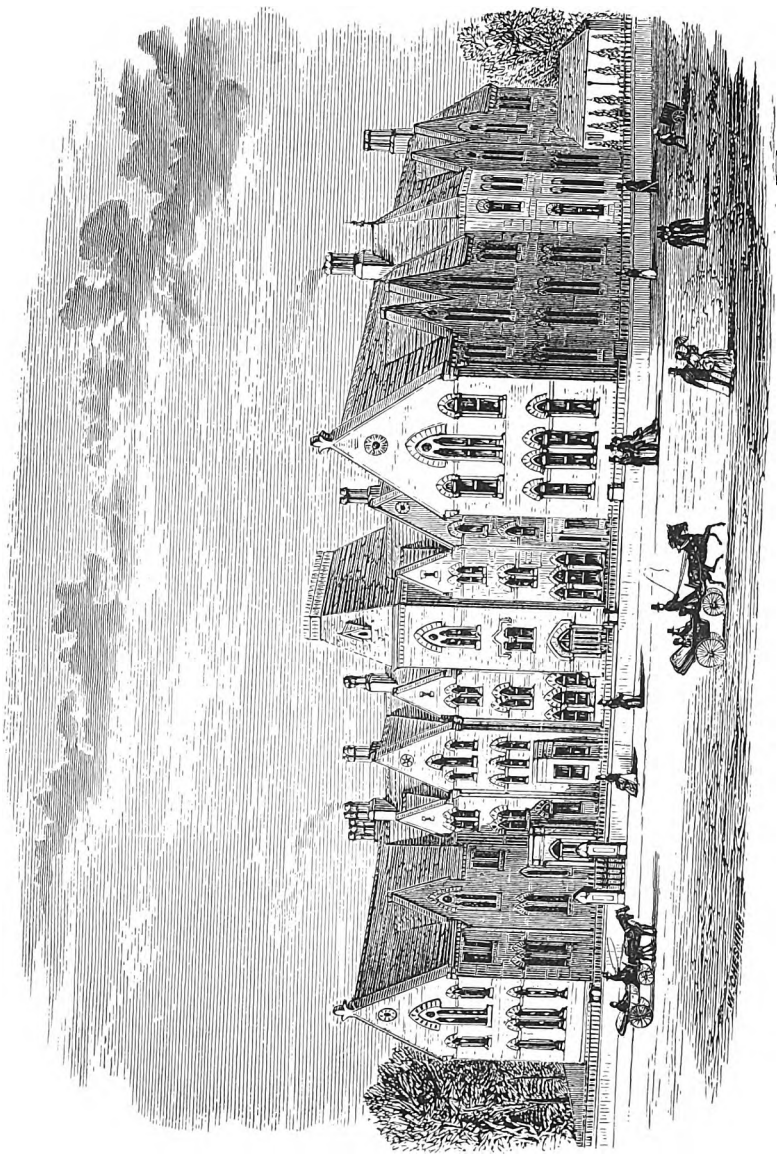
PROPORTION OF TEACHERS IN OUR COLLEGES.

In addition to these there are 14 Day Colleges in which the students are not resident, and they accommodate 950 more, so that altogether 4,521 are being "college trained."

These colleges are situated as follows, and they are printed in the order of their age —

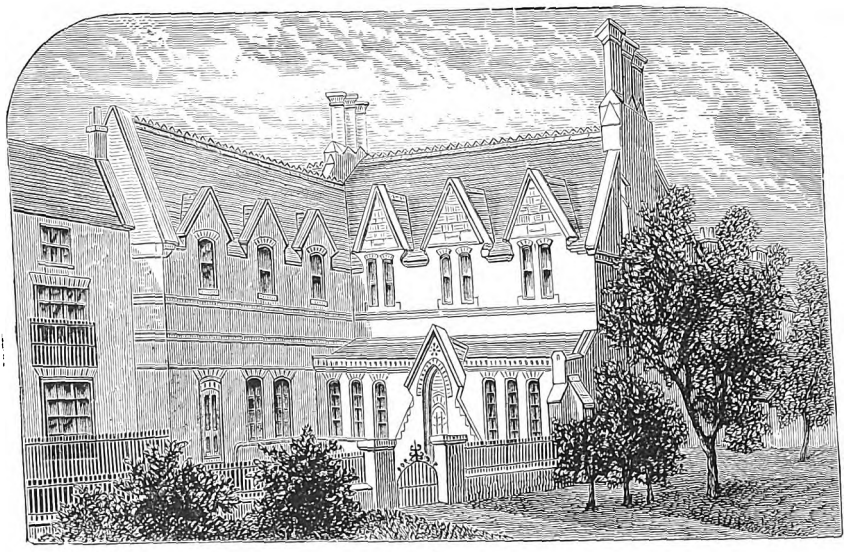
Borough Road, Isleworth	1808
Chelsea, and Whitelands	1811
Gray's Inn Road ("Home and Colonial")	1836
Battersea, Lincoln, Exeter, and Winchester,	1840
Durham (men) and Salisbury	1841
Warrington	1844
Cambridge (Homerton) Rotherhithe	1845
Cheltenham and Saltley	1847
Carmarthen	1848
North Wales (at Carmarten)	1849
Culham	1850
Derby and Westminster	1851
Bishop's Stortford, Brighton, Bristol (Fishponds) and Norwich	1853
Hammersmth	1854
Liverpool	1856
Bangor and Truro	1858
Durham (women)	1859
Ripon	1862
Southlands	1871

Digitized by Google



THE TRAINING COLLEGE, DARLINGTON.

Digitized by Google



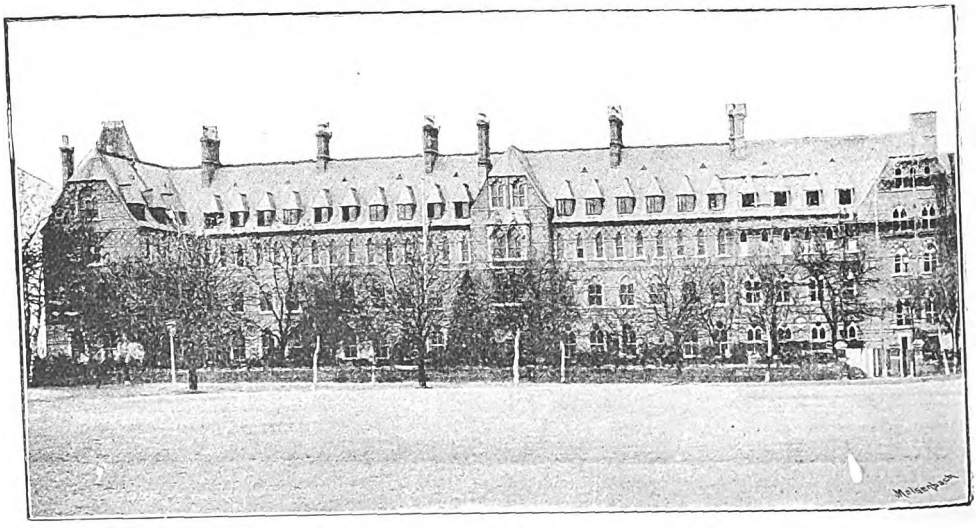
THE TRAINING COLLEGE, SWANSEA.

Darlington and Swansea.....	1872
Chichester and Oxford.....	1873
Wandsworth	1874
Tottenham	1878
Saffron Walden	1884
Edge Hill	1885

The broad distinction between them is between those which, like the Established Church, Roman Catholic, and Wesleyan, study the interests of one denomination and others which are undenominational, yet religious, and still others that are secular, in the sense of not giving religious instruction.

This classification gives the following results :—

I. C. OF E.—Bangor (N. Wales), Battersea, Bishop's Stortford, Brighton, Carmarthen, Chelsea, Cheltenham, (2), Chester, Chichester, Culham, Derby, Durham (2), Exeter, Fishponds (Bristol), Gray's Inn Road, Lincoln, King's (London), Norwich, Oxford, (Diocesan), Peterborough, Ripon, Salisbury, Saltley, Tottenham, Truro,



"BORO' ROAD" COLLEGE, ISLEWORTH.

Digitized by Google

THE TRAINING COLLEGE FOR MISTRESSES, STOCKWELL.

Digitized by Google

Warrington, Whitelands, Winchester, and York. 31 Colleges; 2,527 students.

R. C.—Hammersmith, Liverpool, Wand Wandsworth. 3 Colleges; 272 students.

WES. — Southlands, Westminster. 2 Colleges; 232 students.

II. UNDENOMINATIONAL AND RELIGIOUS —Bangor, Darlington, Edge Hill, Isleworth, Homerton, Saffron Walden, Stockwell, Swansea. 8 Colleges; 851 students.

UNDENOMINATIONAL AND SECULAR.—Aberyswtith, Bangor, Birmingham, Bristol Cambridge, Cardiff, Leeds, Liverpool, (Univ.), Sheffield. 13 Colleges; 909 students.

A word or two about some of the largest of these Colleges :—

Having "passed" the Scholarship Examination, the successful students inundate the Principals of these institutions with letters and telegrams of application for admission, one Principal actually confessing to the receipt of one hundred such telegrams in a day. Having selected one of the forty-three "Residential" Colleges, and obtained admission, the candidate becomes a student in or about September by paying (if a male) £20 to £25, and if a female £12 to £20. This payment covers the whole cost of the two years residence in nearly all the Colleges, no other charge being made for board, lodging, washing, medical attendance, or tuition, while books necessary for study, are supplied at half-price.

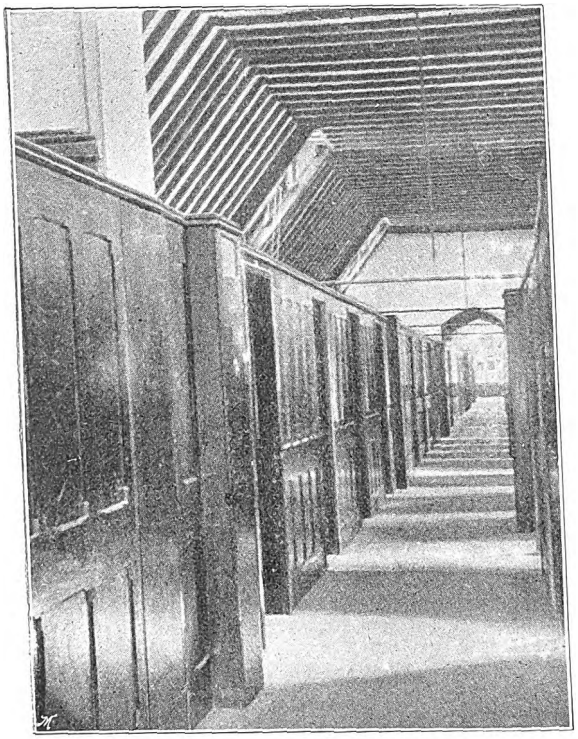
One of the largest colleges for men is that of "Borough Road," at Isleworth, so called because originally the institution was in the Borough Road, Southwark, before the present site was chosen. The grounds, which now surround the College afford ample scope for that high road to ruddy health—physical training, and the result of its constant use in football and cricket, rowing and tennis, fives, swimming and gymnastics shews in three months on the new students, by a marked increase of weight and chest measurements. The lecture halls of the building are most favourably built for the observance of experiments by a very large number of students at the same time, a feature in which, according to one of the Government inspectors, some of the other colleges would do well to imitate it. "What," he asks, "would be thought of an operating theatre at a hospital in which a great number of the medical students found the operations or experiments well nigh invisible?" "Borough Road" is one of the eight religious, but undenominational Colleges, and is one of the six which carry on the admirable work of the British and Foreign School Society, a society which is getting white with age, yet is positively juvenile in its energy. Its operations began with the labours of JOSEPH LANCASTER for its foundation, and the work it has done for the cause of education cannot be over-estimated. The main feature of the Society's work, is the combination of Biblical study, with the recognition of the right of each teacher and student to hold his own religious views, and to practice what they teach. A third of the students in its colleges are Episcopalian, a fifth Congregationalist, about a fifth Methodist, about a seventh Baptist, a fourteenth Prestbyterian, and a twentieth belong to other denominations.

One of the Training Colleges most conspicuous amongst the rest for its striking and picturesque exterior, and its adaptation in its internal arrangements to the work for which it was designed, is Cheltenham College for masters. Each of the students enjoys the privacy of a separate cubicle, an arrangement adopted also in some of the other colleges, and a splendid antidote to the evils of the barrack system. It may not be good for man to be alone, but it is an equal evil that he should not ever be alone.

Charming as Chelteuham "Mens" looks from the front, the effect, when viewed from behind, is even more pleasing, and there are also added to the buildings very fine laboratories, and a practising school, the last being most essential if the students are to be something more than "book-larned" in the science of teaching. Attached to the same college is another for mistresses, known as St. Mary's Hall, which is contained in a building every whit as venerable in appearance as the other. It has a provision for 120 girl students, and the aim of the Lady Superintendent is to render the place as homelike as possible, and to make the hours not spent at the mental drill of lectures, practice, and "prep" eminently recreative. Even that man of learning, the inspector, who is there on occasion to examine into their mental culture, feels constrained to go off at a tangent to express his admiration for their splendid recreation ground.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



MEN'S DORMITORY, CHELTENHAM COLLEGE.

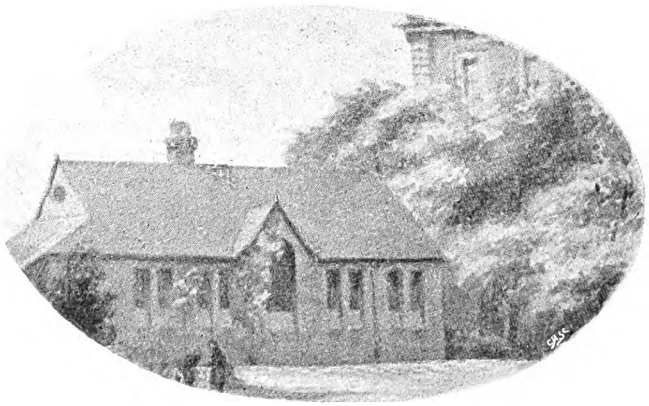
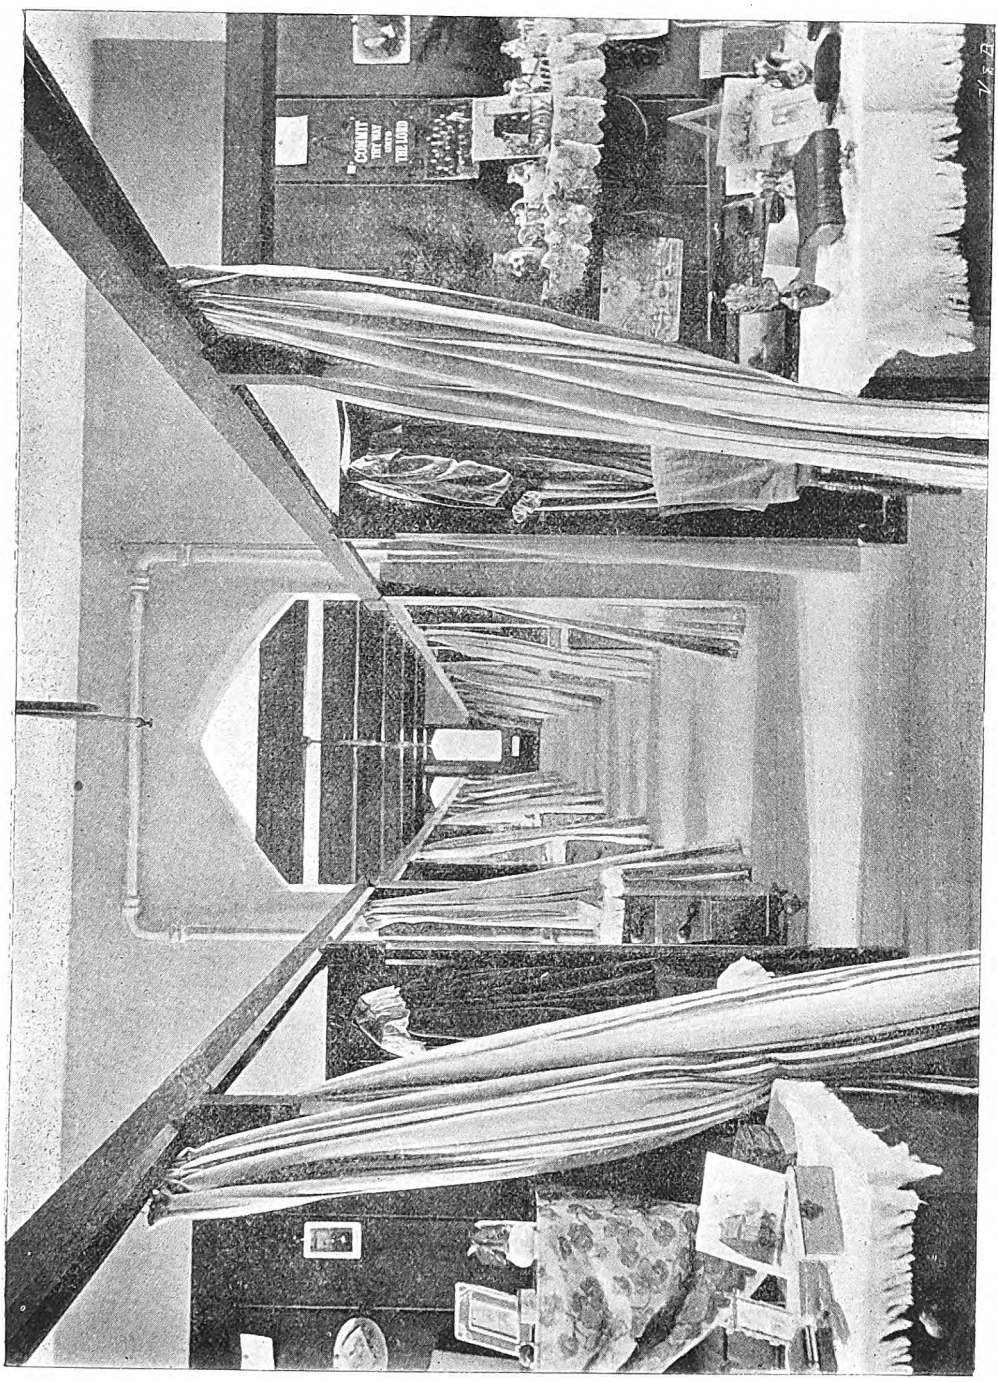
The great change that has come over the restrictions and discipline of our colleges, since the masters and mistresses, who instructed our fathers, were themselves trained, is very marked. Then, rules fettered the students, and the aim of all was discipline. Some Wesleyan-trained students will understand the double entendre of the word when I say that college life then was rigourous. I have seen a picture of the students at work in the old days at Salisbury Diocesan Training College, when students wore caps. Even servants object now, but these meek-school-marms perforce had to submit. This very place is now replete with comfort, and the atmosphere is one of freedom, perhaps with the one exception of the rule, which necessitatcs daily attendance at the Salisbury Cathedral, taking an hour and a half, (as His Majesty's Inspector pointed out in his remonstrance) from that part of the day best suited for work. There is something wonderfully attractive about this college, with the old-time touch clinging to its ancient buildings, one of the most striking features of which is in the picturesque entrance to what is known as "The King's Hostel."

The comfort of the colleges is thoroughly studied, and none who has looked at the



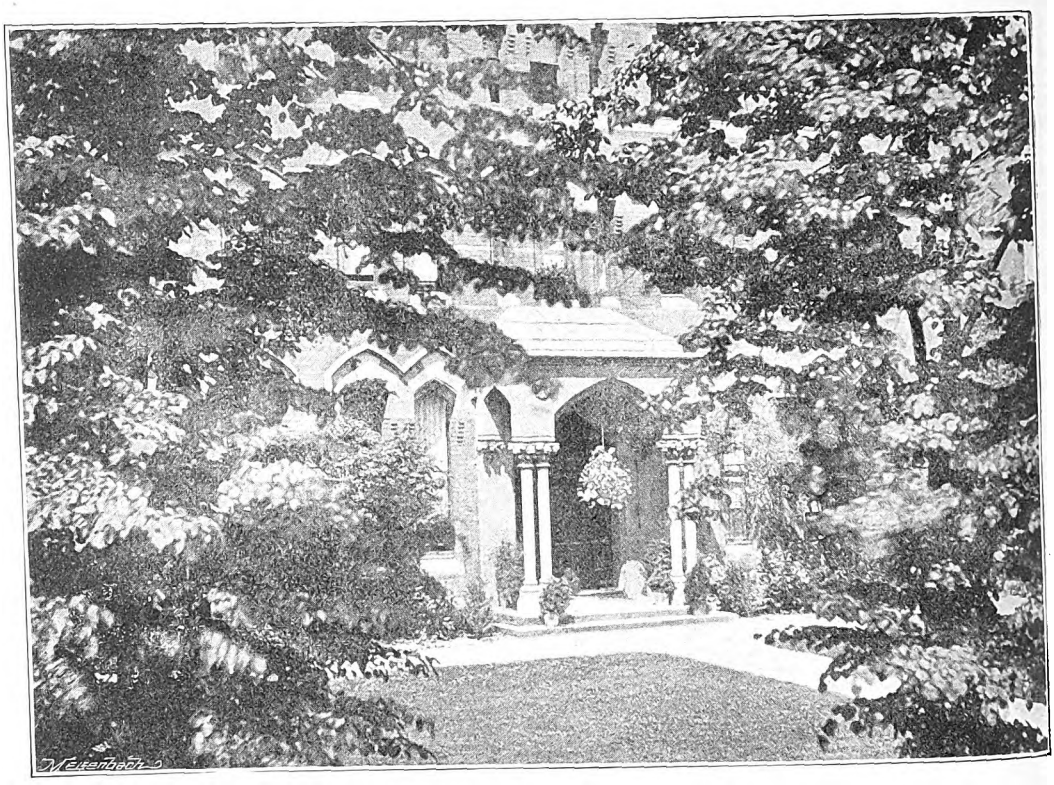
JUNIOR PRACTISING SCHOOL, STOCKWELL.

Digitized by Google



THE DORMITORY, LADIES' TRAINING COLLEGE, CHELTENHAM.

Digitized by Google

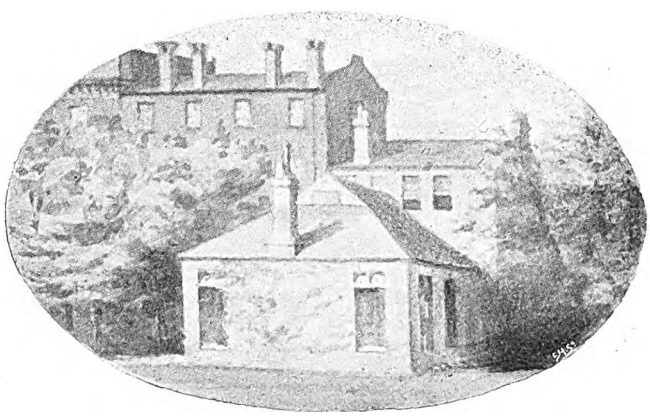


THE PORCH, LADIES' COLLEGE, CHELTENHAM.

appointments of the Common Rooms and Drawing Rooms of Ripon and Wakefield Diocesan Training College, or of Aberystwyth Ladies' College, could wish better surroundings for their daughters during training. Make the best of your time young men and maidens! Two years will soon pass, and though the drill of classes at "Coll" will be over, there is the yearly anxiety of the Inspector's pass, when you go out as assistants; there are Boards to please and your own ideals to reach, and they will succeed best who while at college lay the foundation of character by never playing at working, and never working at play.

It is high time that the Free Churches took up the matter of provision of colleges for their own teachers con amore. The Church of England leads the way in this, and while the Free Churchmen cry aloud against the injustice of their own successful candidates finding nowhere to go, it is a fault easily remedied, and managed on a sufficiently economic basis, every college should have no difficulty in paying its own way.

THE EDITOR.



BACK VIEW OF STOCKWELL COLLEGE.

Digitized by Google

The Needle's Eye

by

FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

The story opens with the discovery of a dead woman, by Farmer Erastus Winch, in his barn. His wife finds a baby there also, and insists, much against his will, on adopting it, as she has never had a child of her own. Before the burial of the woman a stranger appears in the neighbourhood, and out of curiosity asks to see the coffin, and pays the undertaker handsomely to let it be a good one. On the burial of its mother the child is adopted by 'Liz'beth Winch and called 'Manuel, from the Bible-name "Immanuel." The child grows up, and as soon as he is any age worth speaking of the farmer ruthlessly sets the child at work. He is treated in a heartrending way for a long time by the farmer, and idolised by his wife. Immanuel betrays a great desire to find out who is his father, and with child-like simplicity absorbs the idea that God is his Father, and wanders off to find him. In his rambles he meets a little girl named Hilda, who takes him home to her granny, but during a pause in their conversation he runs away again.

❀ ❀ ❀

CHAPTER VIII.

OL' MOSE.

THE infrequent traveller on what was commonly known as "the back hillroad from Turner's Cross Roads" invariably paused to water his team at the trough in front of "Ol' Mose" Armitage's red barn. Here a generous spring, decoyed from its source in the hillside, gushed into the great log hollowed out to receive it; then hurried joyously away in guise of an eager little brook to join its parent stream under the shadow of the bridge.

Opposite the barn, across the narrow track of the road, bordered on either side by dense masses of snowy mayweed, stood a farmhouse, its pinewalls innocent of paint, toned to a dull purplish grey by uncounted storms. Closely drawn curtains defended the front windows of the house from curious eyes, while a tangle of up-pruned lilac bushes, overrun by a vagrant vine of wild clematis, opposed a rampart of greenery to the petulant assaults of the west wind. Below the house the land dropped suddenly away toward the deep valley, which stretched east and west in smiling richness, folded in from the world by the vaporous blue of distant hills.

"A sightly spot, but turible lonesome," was a frequent comment of guests at the hospitable watering trough. If Ol' Mose Armitage shared that opinion, he at least made no effort to enliven his solitude. He was seldom to be seen about his house or barn on those rare occasions when he might have exchanged a word with his fellows. Still more rarely did he visit the village. It was known that he owned his land free from encumbrances, and that he paid his taxes regularly. Twice each year he presented his bronzed face, framed in a tangle of snowy hair and beard, before the window of the village post-office. But once only in the memory of the present postmaster had he received a letter.

Digitized by Google

His manner on this occasion had not differed a wit from its usual slow gentleness. He pocketed the letter without apparent surprise or interest, climbed into his shabby waggon, and drove away. It was then that Mr. Al Parsons, the postmaster and proprietor of the general store in one corner of which he conducted the leisurely business of the Government, perceived the single token of agitation displayed by Ol' Mose. "He's fergot his coffee!" he exclaimed.

Mr. Armitage displayed no undue haste to acquaint himself with the contents of the legal-looking envelope, which he had bestowed in his most inaccessible pocket. He drove briskly until he had reached the confines of the village and had left the last house behind him. Left to himself on the stony road, Ol' Mose plunged his hand into his pocket and drew out the letter. He stared at it long and earnestly, then bestowed it, still unopened, in another and more remote pocket, shaking his head with a pucker of his frosty brows.

"I don't like the feel of it," he remarked, aloud. "Strange how dumb paper becomes saturated with thought like a sponge But if there is only one substance——" Then he drove rapidly along the long slope plunging into a belt of dark woods at its foot, to emerge on another hilly steep, rougher and stonier than the first. At the top of the hill the mare stood still, greeting with a joyous whinny the grizzled collie, who rushed out with tumultuous barking to welcome his master.

It was quite dark by the time Moses Armitage made his way from the barn through the pungent tangle of mayweed to his own gate. The collie ran confidently ahead; then paused with a doubtful growl under the shelter of the porch. The keen eyes of the master had already detected a small, huddled shape, lying prone against the door, He stooped, and laid a large, investigating hand upon it, something soft, and heaving with warm life it was. The quick spurt of a lighted match revealed it—a sleeping child with rosy cheek pillowed upon brown dimpled hands.

It was characteristic of the man that he manifested no surprise at this unexpected sight. A humourous smile played about his bearded lips as he cautiously made his way past the sleeper into the dark room beyond. "Another message from the world," he murmured, as he kindled a light: "you needn't drawn in your head like a box-turtle, you old hermit, you!"

Then he tiptoed back to the door, and with a warning word to the collie who was poking a cold curious nose into the face of the sleeper, he lifted the child and laid him carefully on a cushioned settle. The little bare limbs stretched themselves luxuriously, a sigh of content breathed from the parted lips; then the curly head turned away from the disquieting light, and the small shoulders once more heaved with the long, regular breathing of unbroken slumber.

The child opened his eyes upon white walls flooded with the pink light of morning, shot through with golden gleams, and seemingly taking its rise in a lovely greenish shadow whence it crept in tiny ripples inch by inch toward the ceiling. The small body still trancded in sleep lay motionless, the while unwinking eyes lulled the half-awakened brain with the unimagined splendour.

After a little he began to remember vaguely — a dream perhaps. His lids drooped with the effort to recall the vanished pictures. The sombre room, the black shape heaped with ghostly flowers; the meadow sweet with riotous red clover; the fluling of the love-sick larks, the yellowe-haired child, the small stout figure of the old woman, all trooped confusedly past him. A narrow road filled with hard, round stones, where he bruised his naked feet and wept large tears, next lengthened interminably before him, merging at last with night, with solemn, winking stars, and a cold wind moaning sadly in black tree-tops. Then the familiar outline of a barn—a house, against whose closed door he huddled, and forget the rest.

Betwixt the cold darkness and the pink dawn, stretched the long white bridge of sleep; Immanuel, having traversed that bridge, found himself in a new country. Realising the fact, with a start he sat up and looked about him at the wide expanse of an unknown bed; then growing bolder, he let himself cautiously down to a painted floor, and trotted noiselessly toward an open door. Here he paused to peep out. He beheld a window through which sunshine streamed in an unbroken flood. and just beyond its yellow square a table spread with a white cloth. Upon the table were a number of objects which instantly riveted the explorer's pleased attention; there was a bowl filled with milk, a plate containing several thick slices of brown bread, and a honeycomb in a pink saucer. In the centre of the table a great, handled dish of blue and white held masses of wild roses.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

The child crept nearer to this inviting table by slow degrees, casting bright eyes of enquiry at the panelled cupboard, whose glass doors revealed other curious dishes of blue and white; at the great empty armchair, standing in the full blaze of the sunshine; at the deep leathern couch with its single pillow of vivid scarlet; at the moon-faced clock ticking solemnly in its long carved case; at the rows upon rows of books, which filled the spaces above the mantel, over and beneath the windows and between the doors from floor to ceiling.

Having approached near enough to catch the honest smell of the brown bread mingled with the sweet, creamy odour of new milk, and the subtler fragrance of honey and wild roses, the small adventurer drew a long breath. Then he reached out a cautious forefinger and touched the white cloth. A silver spoon presented its handle in convenient proximity; Immanuel seized it; his eyes sparkled. He was suddenly sure that here was his breakfast spread out before him. He also remembered the object of his journey. As he tranquilly ate the bread and milk he fixed expectant eyes on the open door.

He had finished the last drop of milk in the bowl, when "Ol' Mose" Armitage, who had been watching the scene with keenest satisfaction from the cover afforded by the lilacs, slowly crossed the narrow strip of green grass and stood in the doorway. His tall, broad figure cast a huge shadow across the yellow floor; his ruddy face beamed through the cloudy masses of snow-white hair and beard like another morning sun; his deep eyes full of dancing light questioned the brown eyes lifted to meet them.

Immanuel laid down his spoon, his innocent face shining with satisfaction, but he did not speak.

"Ol' Mose" stepped across the threshold and sat down in the armchair; he held out his hand. Obedient to the tacit command the child came and stood at his knee. He looked up into the penetrating eyes which were bent upon his face and smiled his bewitching smile.

"Where did you come from, my child?"

"I came a long way, my father," answered Immanuel in his sweet, clear voice. As he spoke his little brown hand stole into the man's broad palm.

"But how did you come?"

"I walked—all the way. It was a long, long way. I cried in the dark. But I'm glad now." He evidenced the sincerity of his words by a joyous little trill of laughter.

"Can you tell me what your name is, little one?"

"My name is 'Manuel; don't you remember?"

"'Manuel—Immanuel: which is it?"

"Immanuel," said the boy delightedly. "It's your name, too, mummy says."

"Ah!" said Ol' Mose, interrogatively, "when did your mother tell you that?"

"A long time ago—more'n a year, I guess. But she did tell me," asserted the child.

"Where is your mother, my boy?"

"She's at the fun'ral. I cried; I don't like fun'rals; do you?"

"No."

Immanuel felt himself suddenly lifted in strong arms. He leaned back against the broad breast happily. "I love you," he murmured in the sweetest of childish voices. "I shall stay with you always."

"But how about your mother, little one?—wouldn't you like to see her?" asked the man.

"Is my mother here?" said the child, looking up with sparkling eyes. "Oh! yes, let us find her. She is beautiful; I love her too. But you love me more'n mother does, more'n munny does, more'n anybody else! you found me in the dark, didn't you?"

"I found you asleep—right out here on the porch." Ol' Mose set the child on his feet and led him to the door. "Right here," he repeated. "I brought you in and put you in my bed."

Kind and hospitable as the old man was, his conscience would not allow him to keep the child if he belonged elsewhere. He therefore proceeded to question 'Manuel again, though the boy was quite content with the situation as it stood.

"Can you remember which way you came, child?" asked the old man.

Digitized by Google

anxiously. "Mother will want to see you."

The boy shook his head. "Mother's up in heaven; she sees me all the time," he said softly. "She'll be glad."

"Well, then, father will be looking for his boy; we must let him know you are safe."

"But you did find me—last night," said the child, wonderingly. "I want to stay with you all the time. Mayn't I stay with you all the tme? You won't send me back to him? No, no! I can't go back to him!" He clung close to the kind fingers with a sob, his dark eyes wide with fear. Old Mose lifted the little figure once more in his arms. "If there is any great hue and cry after the boy, somebody will be here in the course of a day or two," he said to himself, "and somebody deserves a good scare for offending one of 'Christ's little ones.'" He sat down once more in his great easy chair, and looked more narrowly at his find. There were half-healed blisters in the small hands, over which he frowned and shook his head. The clean, carefully made garments, with tokens of mother love in every cunning stitch, told another story. "Let them look," he muttered, drawing the boy closer to his broad chest. "We'll give these blisters a chance to disappear." He touched the largest of them gently. "How was it?" he asked.

"Working," answered 'Manuel bravely. "I can work," he added, looking up wistfully into the face which bent down to him. "I can hoe, and weed, and do chores." He sighed deeply.

"Do you like to play with the little boys?"

"I don't know."

"There were boys in the school, eh?"

"I didn't go to school. I can read, though—a little. Will you teach me?"

"Why, yes, of course I will," cried Old Mose, his eyes twinkling, "but we'll play first. Come, there are five kittens out in the barn, and two puppies."

'Manuel wound his arms about the old man's neck. "I'm so glad I found you, father," he said.

The life story of Moses Armitage was not a singular one. Briefly, he was the son of a man who was wont to describe himself as a "plain, practical, hard-headed business man." The particular kind of business in which Moses Armitage senior, displayed his plain, practical, hard-headed qualities was primarily the manufacture and sale of pickles, of which the New England people have always been inordinately fond, and with which they ccontinue to set the teeth of unborn generations on edge, both literally and metaphorically. Late in life this worthy gentleman married a woman who was neither practical nor hard-headed, and who hated pickles. Finding herself grievously unhappy with her loud-spoken burly, red-faced husband, Marion Armitage seized an early opportunity of undoing her mistake by slipping away through the first narrow door which offered escape—it chanced to be pneumonia. She left behind her two sons, little fellows, with round, ruddy faces, scarce a hand's breadth apart in size.

The bereaved father, having passed through that stage of paternal indifference wherein his boys appeared to him very much in the light of a brace of healthy puppies, to be endured, fondled occasionally, but for the most part relegated to hired keepers, discovered in the course of time that the ruddy faces and stout-legged active bodies of his sons represented totally different propositions. The elder son, Moses, who should along with his big body have inherited his father's plain, practical, hard-headed characteristics, was found to have taken after his mother; while Jonas, with his mother's small and less robust physique, quickly developed a keen instinct for money-getting and money saving, which delighted this progenitor.

When Moses Armitage, senior, slapping his broad knee with his broad palm, a comprehensive frown on his broad face, declared, "Jonas is my sort; but Mose is the sort of fellow I haven't any use for"—why, all was said. Later, the chasm widened betwixt the three, leaving Moses Armitage with his second son and the pickle factory on the one side, and the first-born on the other. There had been a stormy scene in the private office before this cataclysm took place, during which the head of the house had raised his voice to such a pitch that the clerks in the outer office grinned at each other over their ledgers.

"College? Bah! Travel? Stuff and nonsense!" replied Moses Armitage, senior, to his elder son, who did not wish to spend his life in their pickle factory.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"You've proved yourself an idle wool-gathering ne'er-do-weel, not worth your salt. Now, here's my last word to you: you'll settle down to business with your brother Jonas here, or you take the half of your mother's money and go. I'll have no more nonsense."

Young Moses took the half of his mother's money and went. But whither, his father and brother, snug behind their big desks in the private office of the pickle factory, neither knew nor cared. In the course of years, marked newspapers, mailed from widely different localities, informed them of the marriage of Moses Armitage to Ruth Carlton, and of the death of Carlton Armitage, their only son, aged six years.

Jonas Armitage sat alone in the private office when he read the last-mentioned item, dressed in black clothes, at which he glanced with a curious expression on his thin, sallow face. "I might return the compliment," he muttered, "only I'm sure the fellow hasn't a sixpence to his name by this time. He'd try to break the will, like as not."

Mr. Jonas Armitage was wrong in certain of his conclusions. A large share of the maternal fortune had indeed found its way through the careless fingers of the wanderer; but in late middle life the primal desire to possess earth, rocks, and trees had taken hold on him. "I will go," he said to the city real estate agent, "to the place where my money will buy the greatest number of acres." And so it was that Moses Armitage brought his wife to the weather beaten little house on the hill-road between Turner's Crossroads and Tacitus Four Corners. They were very poor, for the land yielded little but beauty. After a time, Ruth Armitage shut her tired brown eyes on the misty valley, and was laid to rest beside her six-year-old son in the desolate graveyard behind the Crossroads' church.

Moses Armitage lived on alone in the grey old house, and the silent years brought him resignation with white hairs. And after resignation a kind of tranquil happiness, which grew apace till life's barren landscape turned to gold under calm evening skies. There was happiness in the long winter evenings when the red logs turned to silver ash in the old stone fireplace, and the lamp cast a mellow light on pages beloved as familiar faces. There was happiness in the dark, sweet-smelling pine woods on a spring day, when the sombre isles framed bright pictures of sky and field. There was happiness in the first faint gurgle of bluebirds singing in pink, frosty dawns. There was happiness,—nay, there was ecstasy,—under broad apple boughs loaded with odourous bloom, in the earliest white violet pouring out its soul under vivid blue skies of May.

A stray passer-by once came upon Moses Armitage as he knelt in the grass gazing at a clump of late dandelions, which flaunted all the bravery of spring suns in the face of winter. He went away and told of it in the bar-room of the village tavern, amid the loud empty braying of fool's laughter.

"The old man looked like he was actually a-praying to them weeds,—hee, hee!" declared the astute observer. "He's as crazy as a loon, he is, and ought by rights to be occupying a room at the county asylum. His land is going to waste!"

CHAPTER X.

MOSES AND 'MANUEL.

As the days passed and no anxious father no breathless, wild-eyed mother, appeared to claim the child, Moses Armitage began to hope that this human birdling, which had somehow fluttered away from its nest, might be his. The eternal Kindness had never seemed so imminent, the infinite Love so near and warm, as when he looked into the clear shining depths of the child's eyes. Words spoken long ago by the one Man who was aware of his origin, came to him with a new meaning: "He that receiveth one such little child receiveth Me."

The child had slipped into this solitary life as noiselessly and as cheerfully as a sunbeam which finds its way through shuttered windows. Nothing was changed. Two now sat at the round table, and the divided bread became a feast; two wandered over upland meadows and gathered flowers and berries in fragrant solitudes, while the cruel blisters healed apace in the little hands; two sat in the great chair in the tranquil evenings, till the child slumbered happily on the man's breast.

Moses Armitage was a poet, though he wrote no rhymes; so it did not occur to him, as to a more practical man, to proclaim his new-found treasure. Strange dreams began to weave their misty cobwebs in his brain. This child, who had come to him out of the dark (he thought) and who had called him father, was his own blessedly restored to him by the mercies of Omnipotent Love. This fancy was strengthened by the wonderful likeness which the boy, 'Manuel, bore to his own dead son—a likeness which went deeper than the mere curve of an olive cheek or the trick of a drooped eyelash. It looked out from the serious eyes, sounded in the sweet, penetrating voice, found expression in a thousand attitudes and gestures. This was the dimmed picture of his vanished joy flashed once more into vivid life; his beloved son, come back to him across the empty chasm of time and night, newly named by the angels 'Manuel! As for the child, he believed that he had found in this man his Eternal Father. In his happy eyes the tranquil little house was heaven.

Digitized by Google

Moses Armitage, wrapped in his poet's dream, did not discover this till the two had lived together while the moon grew from its slender crescent to the full. They stood at the verge of the hill, while the great orb swung slowly aloft into mid-heaven.

"Did you make it, father?" asked the child, pointing his finger at the silver disc, "or did it grow?"

"I certainly did not make it," said Moses Armitage, gravely. "Yes, I think it grew."

"But munny told me that you made everything pretty that I liked—everything pretty an'—an' me."

The man shook his head with a troubled look. "What do you think I am, little one?" The question died on his lips. When a mystery is sweet like the heart of a rose, why tear it apart with rude fingers?

"Who am I, child? Why do you love me?"

"I love ycu 'cause you—you arc—my father," faltered 'Manuel.

Moses Armitage lifted the small, trembling figure and held it fast. "We will go in now," he said cheerfully. "I have a story to tell you."

In the depths of the big arm-chair the two set themselves to understand the mystery of God in His world. Moses Armitage told the story that he had promised, slowly, and with thoughtful pauses. The child sat on his knee looking up with troubled face.

"Once upon a time," began the old man, smiling into the wistful brown eyes uplifted to his, "there was a little Child born. He slept all the time at first, and didn't seem to think about anything but His food, just as other babies do. But He grew very fast, and after awhile he began to have thoughts. Do you know what thoughts are?"

The child nodded. "The thing that goes all the time, except when I'm asleep."

(To be continued.)

WHAT THE BISHOPS COST THE UNITED KINGDOM ANNUALLY

Digitized by Google

HOPE FOR THE DEAF.

By HERBERT FYFE.

THAT Frenchmen are by nature gay and careless, and that Paris is the most frivolous city in the world, is a belief that is cherished by many English people. However true this may be, it is quite certain that France can boast many famous men of science, and that the nation as a whole takes a very keen interest in the progress of science, invention, and discovery.

One of the most brilliant of the younger generation of French scientific men at the present day, is M. Dussaud, and it was with great pleasure that I availed myself during a recent visit to Paris, of an invitation to call upon the distinguished savant, and to hear some account of perhaps the most widely useful of his inventions—an apparatus for causing the deaf to hear.

M. Dussaud, who, with his charming wife, lives in the Boulevarde Pereise, Paris, was born on the 14th of April, 1872. Although but 30 years of age, he is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and has invented a loud speaking telephone, a recording telephone, an audiometric amplifier for the deaf, a cinematograph for the blind, a machine by means of which the blind can draw, calculate, and write.

In the present article I propose to confine myself to M. Dussaud's apparatus for enabling the deaf to hear. This I had the pleasure of seeing in operation at 98, Rue de Pechelien. Medical men from all over the world have visited this establishment, and can testify to the absolute genuineness of M. Dussaud's invention, and to the wonderfu results which he has achieved in making the deaf hear.

The case of deaf persons and deaf mutes is much lighter at the commencement of the Tiveshall, than it was at the beginning of the 19th century. Numerous institutions exist in all parts of the world, where sufferers from this terrible malady are received, cared for and educated. Those who are deaf may enjoy converse with others, either of lip-language, or the finger alphabet, and much has been done to enable deaf mutes to hear sounds, and thus arouse their dormant senses.

While numerous systems and inventions have been brought forward which promise, according to their promoters, the restoring of hearing and speech, there existed until quite recently, none which fulfilled the expectations of those who so enthusiastically brought them forward.

Since M. Dussaud has produced his "Amplificateur-Audiométrique" or Audiometric Amplifier, a new era in the treatment of the deaf has dawned.

Specialists have declared it to be the simplest and most effective instrument for the purpose yet invented, and it has already achieved results such as have never yet been attained by any other apparatus or any other method devised for enabling deaf persons to hear sounds, and for teaching deaf mutes to speak.

It has been said that the awakening of hearing is possible with 97 per cent. of deaf-mutes if only the patient will submit.

The reason why this method has not been capable of general application, is that both teacher and pupil become greatly fatigued, owing to the arduous nature of these exercises.

While the deaf-mute is undergoing the treatment (massage, gymnastics, etc.), the instructor is compel ed to shout at the top of his voice in order to accustom the ear little by little to the sound of the human voice.

In cases where acoustical cornets or transepts are used, while the strain on the teacher is less, the strain on the pupil increases.

Digitized by Google

It is necessary that the extremity of the cornet tube be placed right inside the ear, and as a consequence the sound which impinges on the hearing organ is accompanied by a certain amount of breath. This gives rise to an abnormal pressure on the membrane of the tympanum and brings with it a cerebal fatigue, buzzing noises, a sense of heaviness, so that after a time the exercises to the nature become unbearable to those who should derive great benefit from them. All those who have had any experience of the education of deaf-mutes, or the system, will bear witness to the fact that in a short time pupils show a very marked aversion to all kinds of ear-tubes, cornets, etc. Yet, up till now, this has been the only method which could be relied upon to give really satisfactory results.

M. Dussaud's new instrument promises to revolutionise the treatment of the deaf and the deaf and dumb.

I need not remind my readers that in nearly every case the person who is born deaf, or who becomes deaf soon after birth, loses the power of speech, because as it hears nothing, it cannot imitate sounds, and thus the power of speech is lost.

Those who lose their hearing later, having once learnt to speak, to read, and to write, are still capable of speaking, reading, or writing, but unless special care and long training from an early age is employed, the deaf mutes would remain totally ignorant of these vital exercises. Into the systems now in use for the education of deaf-mutes, we do not propose to enter. Our concern here is with the Micro-phonograph.

THE DEAF MUTE HEARD DISTINCTLY THE FIRST TIME THE RECEIVERS WERE PLACED TO HIS EARS.

It was in the year 1896 that M. Dussaud first turned his attention to the problem of finding some means whereof sounds could be appreciated by deaf persons.

This subject had some years previously occupied his attention, but he had laid it aside in the press of other labours; it was the unfortunate condition of a deaf-mute girl which again turned his thoughts to this question. From this time onwards, he applied his efforts to the invention of a mechanism which should increase at will the intensity of sound. The result of his investigations was the invention of the "Micro-Phonograph," or as he now prefers to call it, the "Audio-Metric Amplifier."

Digitized by Google

The idea of utilising the phonograph to restore hearing to the deaf is not new of itself. Professor J. E. McKendrick, to Glasgow, has made experiments, which have met with some success, to see if deaf people could not be made to "feel" music as they could not hear it. A phonograph was employed, and the deaf person had to place his fingers to the cylinder, which had already received the impression of some piece of music.

Professor McKendrick thought it would be possible to educate the deaf to such a pitch that they would enjoy feeling music, and would be able to differentiate between different compositions. Dr. Bell, the inventor of the telephone was convinced that it would be possible to produce an appliance which would be to the ears what spectacles are to the eyes.

Just as glasses magnify images, so he thought, some device might be discovered whereof sounds might be so magnified that they would affect the deafest ear. Deaf persons do not generally hear the sounds emitted by the ordinary phonograph, but M. Dussaud hit on the idea of combining with the phonograph a "micro-phone," which would increase the sound and magnify the vibrations of the human voice.

The microphone is a wonderful instrument invented in the year 1878 by Prof. David E. Hughes, F.R.S. He found that when a piece of carbon was held loosely between two other pieces the whole would be affected by the slightest vibrations conveyed to it.

It was the discovery of the microphone that made the telephone possible.

A telephone transmitter is in reality a microphone, and so delicate is the instrument that a fly walking over the base will disturb the contacts enough to produce sonuds which may be heard miles away.

The Micro-phonograph of M. Dussaud, consists of a phonograph and microphone, electrical cells, receivers, and a regulator.

To such an extent is the sound of the phonograph increased, that it is heard even by those who are unable to hear anything less loud than the sound of a cannon.

Here there is a valuable appliance for the teaching of the deaf and dumb.

By continued exercise they will come to distinguish sounds, and to understand sentences; they will be able to imitate what they hear, and thus the power of speech will be restored to them.

Even if their sense of hearing is too far gone to allow of them receiving it, they will still be able—thanks to the micro-phonograph—to learn to speak.

As will be seen from the phonograph here reproduced, the patient applies to his ear a telephone receiver which is connected up to the instrument. By this means direct mechanical vibration is obtained inside the ear.

The indiarubber tube on an ordinary phonograph, on the contrary, transmits only an aerial wave quite insufficient to act upon an imperfect ear.

M. Dussaud's experiments with his first apparatus were made in the physiological laboratory of the Sorbonne, before a number of physicians, and the results were decidedly encouraging.

The degree to which sounds could be amplified astonished all the experts present. Experiments were made in their presence on several deaf mutes, and these were able to hear, for the very first time the sounds sent through the instrument.

On the next day the eminent D. J. V. Laborde, Director of the Laboratory of Physiology, presented to his colleagues of the Academy of Medicine, an account of his observations on the Micro-phonograph. M. Dussaud continued to carry out improvements to his apparatus, and in this he was aided by many of the most eminent savants of the day.

The Micro-Phonograph, or Audio-Metric Amplifier, is now perfected, and its future success is assured.

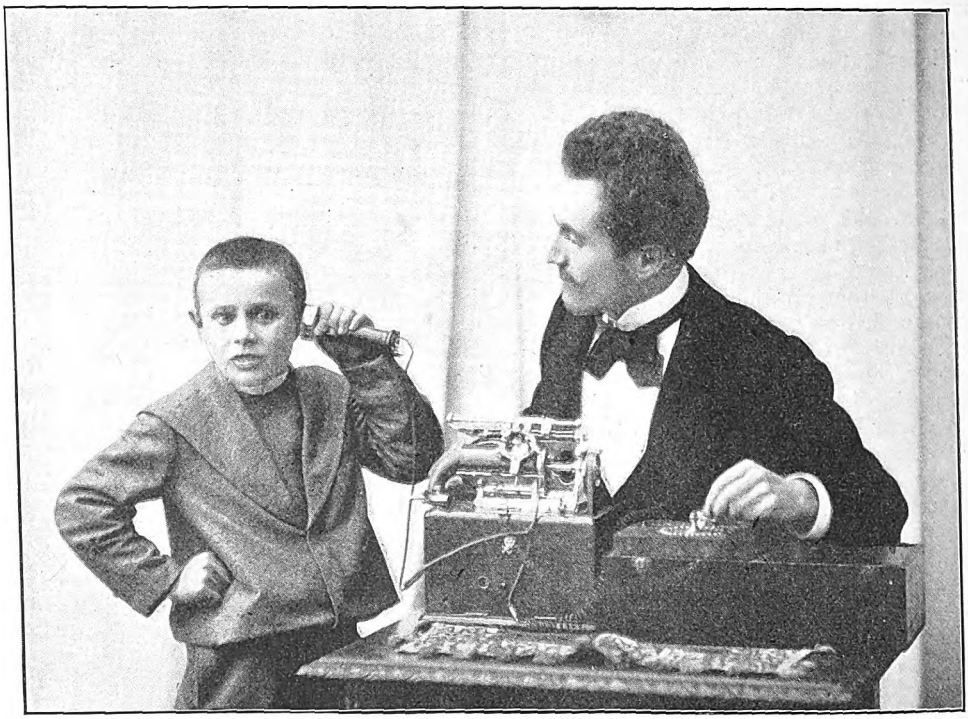
It would be tedious to enumerate all the cases in which deaf persons have been enabled to hear sounds, thanks to M. Dussaud's marvellous apparatus. One or two of the most striking may be mentioned.

A deaf-mute, 40 years old, who had never heard anyone's voice, however much it might have been raised, nor any note musical or otherwise, was distinctly conscious of sound, the first time that the receivers of M. Dussaud's instrument were placed to his ears.

In another case, two photographs show the surprising efficacy of the system.

The first represents a young deaf mute;

Digitized by Google



A JUVENILE DEAF-MUTE.

the apparatus is not working; the boy's countenance expresses his customary sadness.

The second represents the same boy while the Micro-Phonograph was reproducing the "Marseillaise."

Immediately," writes M. Dussaud, "his face relaxed, and he instinctively beat time to the tune. This lad, who was so deaf that a word shouted into his ears with all one's force was quite unheard, no sooner put his ear to the instrument than he showed evidence of gratification, and left it only with regret."

The Micro-Phonograph is being used at the present time in many places in the education of deaf and dumb mutes.

At the National Institution of Deaf Mutes in Paris, a class on the Dussaud system was opened some time ago.

By the use of the Micro-Phonograph the teacher has under his control an untiring automatic speaker, which has been described by the celebrated Doctor Gellé, Professor of Otology at the Salpétriére in Paris, as the instrument par excellence, for acoustic exercises.

For the pupils, too, the advantages are great. No breath accompanies the sound; no tubes are introduced into the ear, and thus none of the troubles consequent upon the use of tubes, etc., are experienced.

In a class of pupils, however large, only one instrument is required, and this may be made either to repeat the sounds at the same time as they are recorded, or else to reproduce the sounds which have been recorded on some previous occasion. The usual method is for the teacher to send simultaneously through all the telephones held by his pupils to their ears, the vowels, the words, or the sentences which he wishes to teach them, writing it at the same time on the blackboard. In this way all the pupils see and hear at the same time.

The system, in fact, combines for the first time, acoustic exercises with ocular demonstrations.

As there will be some pupils who are more deaf than others, each telephone can be suitably adapted to the hearing of the individual by means of easily arranged resistence coils.

The "Micro-Phonograph" says M. Dussaud, "not only commands the functional awakening of the 'perceptive organ' of sounds, up till now, drowsy or silent, but it also seeks to create by repetition, the memory of what is heard, a power which has always hither to been absent in the deaf.

Digitized by Google

By the reconstitution of the function, the organ itself is reconstituted, and thus the physical principle function makes the organ " is realised in practice.

When after a sufficient number of exercises (and in most cases this is never great) the memory of a vowel sound has been firmly fixed on the brain by means of the instrument, the teacher will only need to pronounce it with his voice raised, and the pupil will hear what he is saying.

For example, in the case of a little deaf mute treated by means of the Micro-Phonograph, was he able to recognise the vowel " i " (one of the most difficult) when it was spoken in a loud voice by the teacher.

Once the child has heard the sound it will do its best to imitate what it has heard, and thus speech will become possible.

In the case of a child of three years and a half, after the fourth lesson, it was able clearly to understand when it was being spoken to through the instrument, and could tell when the sounds ceased.

The word " papa "was sent through the instrument, and was repeated many times at different lessons, and in a short time the child was able to repeat the word when his mother pointed at the father, and thus, little by little, the sense of hearing, and of rational speech was restored.

If only the deaf are treated at a sufficiently early age, there is no reason why they should not hear, if their education on the Dussaud system is systematically carried on for several years.

Doctor Gellé—who has been cited above—gives it as his opinion, that no deaf-mute need be considered too hopeless a case for the Dussaud treatment. With patience and perseverance the sense of hearing can be awakened in almost all instances, to a certain extent at any rate, and if only the exercises are carried out on a definite plan, a wonderful change in the condition of the patient will be apparent.

M. E. Drouet, Professor at the National Institution of Deaf Mutes in Paris, has made the following statement, which we are allowed to publish, relating to the use of the Dussaud Micro-Phonograph in the Institution :—

" In the case of those who have not completely lost all sense of hearing (and these form 97 per cent. of all persons afflicted with deafness) it is possible to educate their ears by the production of sounds capable of affecting the diseased organ of hearing. In time, if the treatment be continued, for a sufficient period, they are enabled to hear much better, and not only so, but their speech becomes clearer, and more distinct, and loses that monotonous tone, which those people who are unable to hear possess.

The Dussaud Micro-Phonograph which amplifies sounds to considerable proportions, without rendering them less clear, possesses properties of a very special kind which render it of great value in the awakening of sound among deaf persons and deaf mutes.

" This new method of treatment by acoustical exercises has given the most conclusive results as one can judge trom the following facts :—

" During two whole years I have submitted a young male deaf mute to methodical acoustical exercises on the Dussaud system, and at the end of this time an extraordinary amelioration in his condition was apparent.

" At first the boy was only able to understand certain letters, which were shouted in to the Micro-Phonograph. Gradually he became capable of comprehending the meaning of whole phrases spoken one or two steps away from the apparatus, and at last he actually was enabled to follow the ordinary scholastic teaching in the classes of the lycée !

" Another wonderful case was that of a Russian who received his acoustical education in Germany, and who was in complete ignorance of his mother tongue, owing to his family having neglected to place him under proper treatment while he was in his own country still young.

" The patient in question was a keen student of the drama, but he could only enjoy the play with his eyes, being unable to follow the dialogue. He was persuaded to try the effect of the Micro-Phonograph, and after a six weeks' course of exercise, his hearing was so improved that he could follow the speech of the actors with perfect comfort."

Many other cases could be cited where deaf persons have had their hearing partially, or completely restored, and where deaf mutes have learnt to speak, thanks to the epoch-making invention of M. Dussaud.

Digitized by Google

HOW SHE WON HER HUSBAND'S HEART.

CHAPTER I.

IT was a curious scene which was in progress during the evening of a Sunday in November, in one of the Royal bedchambers of Whitehall. King Charles II. and his Queen, Catharine, were present.

Near them stood the Duke of York and his girlish Italian wife, Beatrice of Modena. But the centre of the group was a young girl of little more than fifteen, by whose side stood a man of about twenty-seven years, slender to a fault, with a lofty brow, a nose curved like the beak of an eagle and with eyes which rivalled those of the eagle in brightness. Though he was but twenty-seven, he looked much older, and the younger girl standing there, every now and then cast a look of positive dislike at him. Against her will she was there to be married to this grave-looking man, who was none other than William Prince of Orange. It was a marriage dictated by the policy of Charles II. and was aimed at securing the friendship of the Prince of Orange for England.

Heartbroken at the fate in store for her, the bride of fifteen did nothing but weep, but, taking her hand, the Merry Monarch, Charles II., presented her to the Bishop of London, and the ceremony was soon over.

On the part of the Prince of Orange, the marriage was a bold bid for a near relationship to the throne of England. For Mary, his young wife, was the daughter of the only brother of the childless King, which brother would, therefore, succeed King Charles. Should this brother James have no children, it followed that Mary would inherit the throne.

Clouds settled upon the bridegroom's brow two days after his marriage, for then there came into the world a little son to James, the father of Mary, who appeared likely to live. In ill-humour at this event, the Prince vented it on his girl-wife, who was always in tears. And her dearly-loved sister, the Princess Ann, being confined to her bed with small-pox, she was cut off from the sympathy and company of the only being she loved.

So, gloomily and sorrowfully, opened the married life of Mary and William.

* * * * * * * *

Three weeks had passed, and the little Princess of Orange came to bid farewell to the Queen.

"Don't cry so, child!" exclaimed her aunt. "You are not the only one who has had to leave her native land. I remember the wrench when I left the sunny land of Portugal to come to Charles."

"Ah, but aunt!" sobbed the girl, "you were coming to England, —I am leaving it. There is nothing before me but the dull Court at the Hague, and if they are all like the Prince of Orange I know I shall be wretched. I wish I were dead!"

"Hush! child!" said the Queen soothingly, "it is the lot of those who are born to Royal positions to be moved about like pawns upon a chess-board. We are not supposed to have hearts." And she sighed, thinking of the infidelities of her own husband, Charles, and his neglect of her. "Go with your husband, Mary, and try to love him. If he does not love you, life will yet be endurable if you care for him."

Amidst a brilliant following who came to take farewell of them, the last good-byes were said, and with a bursting heart the girl bride saw the cliffs of her native land fade out of sight.

William, her husband, stood with folded arms regarding her sternly, with lines of dislike curving his lips as he saw her manifest sorrow. "Tears again!" he muttered impatiently, "she is a perpetual fountain."

And he turned away in great irritation to speak to one of her maids, Elizabeth Villiers.

She answered him, apparently flattered by his notice. Mary, looking up saw it, and with a quick instinct devined that she herself was unattractive in the eyes of her husband. She had seen too much of the licentious Court of her uncle, Charles II., not to know what that would mean. Her heart began to beat in wild tumult. The crowd of courtiers was around her, but she was alone in the crowd. No one understood her sorrow, no one sympathised with the natural shrinking of the timid girl from marriage in itself, let alone the form in which it had come to her, she was shut up to herself—and her thoughts were bitter. She went below to sob out her grief by herself. With hypocritical fervour, Elizabeth Villiers and Annie Villiers soon followed their royal mistress. "Can we assist your Highness?" said Elizabeth.

She turned on them with a petulent stamp of her foot—"I would be alone! Leave me!" and added, with the ingenuousness of fifteen—"Go back to the Prince! he doubtless prefers you!" This with a face white with sudden passion, the outbursting of an outraged heart. They curtseyed and left her. She fell on her knees sobbing bitterly.

"Ah, woe is me! Woe is me! I have lost my country, my home, and my father. I have gained nothing! Great God, help me to bear it; to be a woman and bear it. I am only fifteen! only fifteen!

And, somehow, in the midst of her loneliness came a sense of comfort. It did not spring from without. All was dark there, but within there was a new sense of peace.

The Prince of Orange came down presently, and she met him with a bright smile. He looked at her in amazement. Somewhat awkardly, as if to reassure her, he laid one hand almost caressingly upon her shoulder. He opened his mouth, as though about to speak, but he was a silent, reserved man, not given to expressing his thoughts, and the words died away unuttered. One word of tenderness might then have won the heart of his young wife. That word was unspoken, and he turned and left her.

Digitized by Google

But she had noticed the unusual gesture, and, with a woman's discernment—for her sorrow had made a woman of her—she saw that she might yet win her husband's love. This was the task she set herself. With tightened lips, the result of the determination within, she turned and gazed in the mirror.

"I am not beautiful," she murmured, "but there are worse faces than mine, and the Queen always said I had a good figure. I will win him yet. After all, he is my husband, and I will be a true wife to him. I will notice nothing. No man can be worse to me than my uncle, the King, is to my royal aunt. She bears patiently, and so will I."

But the patience was easier in thought than in practice. Day by day the Prince neglected her, and openly spent his time with her maid, Elizabeth. There were times when she could have screamed with fury, as she caught sight of little endearments passing between Elizabeth and the man who had been given to her "to have, and to hold, till death should them part," but a few days previously. She stifled her feelings, however, and by the time the vessels arrived at the Hague she was learning to bear.

CHAPTER II.

Two years had passed since Mary set foot in Holland. Only two years, yet to her they had seemed like twenty. She was thin and pale through the worry of her life. The voyage out had been but a sample of the daily life ever since. She was ignored, openly slighted, and roughly treated, and the slightest privileges were denied her.

It was the morning of the departure of her only friend, Bishop Ken, who had been appointed Chaplain at the Hague by King Charles II.

Ken was one of those truly sainted men whose stern adherence to principle, in a time when life around them is a seething mass of corruption, makes them stand out as marvellous exceptions to the rest. In his after life he sternly refused King Charles to find a lodging for Nell Gwynne in his episcopal palace, and now, with the same lofty courage, he had befriended this poor brow-beaten Princess of Orange.

"Your Highness!" he told the Prince, "is taking a strange line of conduct with the wife you vowed to love and cherish!"

William scowled, but the intrepid chaplain continued: "Sir, let me tell you, you have broken your vows, your love you have given to the Villiers women, and instead of cherishing, you have tryannised over your wife. There is not one girl in your Highness's dominions who is not happier than your wife!"

"This is plain speaking, sir. You, I think, magnify your office, and forget mine."

"No, your Highness, I do not forget. I remember that you are a man, as well as a monarch, and it is my plain duty to tell you that your behaviour is killing your wife. I remember her at Whitehall, the very life and soul of all her young friends, and now she is like a faded flower."

"What is it she wants, man, more than she has?" sternly asked the Prince.

"She is pining for home, for her father and her friends."

Perhaps it was owing to this that, at the invitation of the Prince of Orange, Mary's father and step-mother visited her. It was only just in time. A low fever had seized her, and she had no desire to live.

Her father's presence however, soon rallied her spirits, and she came back from the borderland, to play a part in her future history against that very father from which she would have recoiled in horror had she been told beforehand. Soon after her recovery her father departed, and Dr. Ken went with him. So at one stroke Mary was deprived of both father and friend.

One of the petty tyrannies of the Prince, had been to refuse Mary a separate chapel for the use of her chaplain. The girl, who had all the high spirit of the Stuarts, took issue against him here, and nothing daunted, gave up her own dining room as a chapel for the use of the Church of England. The sacrifice was all the greater, for she had to eat her meals as a result, in such a dingy room as perhaps she had never seen in England.

William responded by refusing her permission to go abroad from the palace at all, so in a state of virtual imprisonment the poor young Queen chafed and fretted. Dr. Hooper took the place of her friend, Dr. Ken, and in him also Mary found a constant and faithful adviser.

The Prince, however, was determined to break her spirit, so he gave instructions that in every way possible Dr. Hooper's life was to be made thoroughly uncomfortable. To his credit, the chaplain endured it for a long time, but at last, disgusted at William's insulting treatment, he left the place, and Dr. Covel took the position he resigned.

One day William perceived a man crossing the court-yard from the quarters of the Princess, carrying a letter in his hand. He stopped him and demanded the letter.

The man hesitated.

"Your Highness,' he said, "it is to the British Ambassador from Dr. Covel."

"I care not to whom or from whom. The letter, sir!" holding out his hand.

The man gave it him.

William rudely broke the seal, and muttered an oath when he discovered that it was written in a secret cipher.

But the Prince possessed the power to wait. He bided his time till Dr. Covel was in attendance upon his wife, and, entering the doctor's rooms ferreted out the key to the cypher. Thus he discovered the fact that the letter mentioned in detail the wretched condition of Princess Mary, and the infamous influence of the Sisters Villiers over himself.

William was beside himself with rage.

"I will teach these English to interfere. They shall go! Every solitary one shall be packed off this very day!" he exclaimed.

With a countenance like a thunder-cloud, he strode to the Princess's apartments, and, bursting into the room, cried, "So Madam, you and your precious chaplain would inform the British Court that you are a martyr, and I a tyrant. I will have no more of it!" stamping his foot. "Every one of your wretched English shall go this very night Do you hear? every one!"

"I hear," said Mary, sullenly. "But you will not dare."

Digitized by Google

"You shall see!" exclaimed William, and, turning on his heel, he left the room.

That night the court-yard was filled with waggons and soldiers.

They proceeded without ceremony to bundle out of their quarters, Mrs. Langford, the Princess's old nurse, and a clergyman, her husband, Mr. and Mrs. Gibson, the painters, who had been instructing the Princess in painting, Anne Trelawney, her maid, who had grown up with the Princess from the cradle, and Dr. Covel.

There was no help for it, they had to go, and Mary was left a stranger in a strange land, more alone than ever.

Some days after, it was the anniversary of the death of King Charles I. All the English Court had always kept this day as one of mourning and prayer. But early on the morning of that day the Prince of Orange entered his wife's apartments.

"Take off that!" he thundered, pointing to her mourning costume. "Then put on the gayest robe you have."

Against her will she obeyed him.

Weeping, she accompanied him to a public dinner. But never a single dish would she taste.

She remained quite silent during its progress, the Prince eyeing her sternly all the while. He saw that she was conquered, but not subdued. So as soon as dinner was over, and she was retiring, he bade her stay.

"You have to come with me to the theatre this evening," he said, "and see to it that you look your best. Think you I will have you keep a fast in memory of a tyrant whom my co-religionists justly put to death? My subjects would cry shame upon you, and I will not have it."

So step by step he thwarted her at every point. Her chapel was closed, her friends banished, she herself treated as a child, and flouted in public, but the haughty spirit, though tamed, was not yet broken.

Her father, as we have seen, was the heir to the throne, whenever the King should die. But the King had an illegitimate son, the Duke of Monmouth, a great favourite with the people, who cast longing eyes upon the throne. Her father, on account of his leanings to the Roman Catholic religion, was simply hated by the people. So that Monmouth, the favourite, and James, the detested, were each other's natural enemies.

Monmouth came to the Court of the Prince of Orange, and William forced his wife to take steps which she knew would pain her father to the quick. By her husband's command, she skated day by day with him, and danced with him night by night. He brought with him, openly and shamelessly, his mistress, Harriet Wentworth. And Mary was compelled by her husband to receive her publicly.

Up till then she had made a plucky fight against her husband's tyranny. But now her womanhood was outraged, her very affections crushed, and her sense of delicacy trampled upon. The last spark of spirit was quenched, and henceforth she was to William as an obedient slave.

She never understood the cause of his dislike, but it was soon to become plain to her.

CHAPTER III.

The Prince and Princess of Orange were dining at a public festival at the Hague. Suddenly a servant approached from behind Mary's chair of state, and handed her a letter from England. Her face lighted up as she perceived her father's familiar hand-writing. But as she was about to open it, her husband rudely snatched it away and proceeded to read it himself.

It was an affectionate letter from the father to the daughter, announcing that, owing to the death of her uncle Charles II., he was now King James II. Not a solitary syllable in it referred even indirectly to her husband. Proud of the fact that his wife was now heiress-presumptive to the throne of England, for the little one had died, William read it aloud to all present.

Stung with the insult, and grieved at the death of her uncle, who had always been most affectionate to her, the Princess hastily rose and left the table.

William turned to one of the great officers near him and exclaimed:

"There goes a woman, scarcely fit to rule a house who will one day rule a kingdom."

The thought was a bitter one to him, for the great aim of his life was to humble the power of France. As Prince of Orange he had neither men nor means enough to accomplish it. His straitened position was the very thing which gnawed at his heart. If he could have some day mounted the throne of England instead of his wife, he saw that with English money and English soldiers he could crush his enemy. Instead of this, he well knew that English law would make her Queen, and leave him only the position of Prince Consort. It was a bitter pill to him, and the main cause of his brutal treatment to his wife was the desire to break her into complete acquiescence with his wishes before she should be able to rule over him.

Meanwhile, Mary had gone to her own private apartment, and was sitting brooding over the perpectual friction of her life.

"God help me!" she cried. "I have borne at this man's hands both the wrongs of a wife and the wrongs of a woman. I have been patient while he has been ill-tempered. I have given way to him all I could. I thought I was winning him over, and now this surpasses all. Even my own letters opened and publicly read."

Hearing a step she hastily took up a piece of embroidery, and as her lord and master strode in, appeared busy with it.

"Ah!" he said, "that is just what you are fitted for, needlework, playing the spinet, or handling the cards. But as for queening it, if you live long enough to try your hand, you'll make a sorry mess of it."

"My lord!" said the Princess, rising, "my father has just ascended the throne. It is early to speak of my succeeding him. From my heart I pray, 'God save the King!' And should it ever be my lot to be the Queen, which I hope will never happen, there are loyal, chivalrous men in dear old England who will rally round me as they did round Elizabeth. When the time comes, Heaven will send the power!" and she swept from the room.

Astonished at her outburst, the Prince, for the first time in his life, began to admire her.

"Stay!" he said gently. "The times in which we live are uncertain. The English will not put up with a Catholic King. Already I have been approached by would-be revolutionists. Should I have to fight as a Protestant Prince in favour of English liberties, what part would you play?"

She turned towards him startled. Such a thought had never occurred to her.

"I see!" he continued, for he was a skilled reader of countenances. "The thought is strange to you. But from the bottom of my heart, as I read the times, the day will come when you will have to choose between 'daughter' and 'wife!'"

Digitized by Google

"When that day comes, I cannot say what I should do! My father has ever been a tender father; while you,"—and she looked him straight in the face—"you have been a thorn in my side. I would have done anything for you. I loved you, and I love you still; but you have flung back my love as a thing of no importance, and there is no kitchen scullion who does not laugh at my misery. Let me pass!" And with a haughty gesture she left him.

"Not tamed yet!" he muttered. "But she was right. I have given her no cause to side with me I believe I have gone the wrong way to work."

After this scene, the lot of the Princess grew easier. The Prince strove to be more affable to her. The days flew by, and, as the stirring events in England occupied the attention of all men, the Prince of Orange as the champion of Protestant liberties grew in importance, and Mary became in his eyes of greater importance still. Her plucky endurance of his tyranny, as he pondered it, woke up some feeling of respect. Love he had none to give her. All that his icy nature could feel was bestowed upon Elizabeth Villiers. But she gained daily in his esteem.

The Princess noticed it and was more content She strove never to cross him in any way—watched his moods and respected his moody silences, and bit by bit it appeared as if these two, so long estranged, were drawing near to one another.

An opportunity soon arrived for her still further to win his esteem.

James II., annoyed at the laws which in Holland were even more stringent than in England against Catholics, sent an ambassador to the Prince of Orange to intimate that it was his intention to abolish the penal laws against them in England and solicited his sympathy.

"I would rather lose all the revenues, and reversion of the kingdom of Great Britain," replied the Prince, "to which my wife is heiress, before one of those laws shall leave the statute book."

Mary stood by listening. Instantly she saw her chance. This was no case of wounding a father, or usurping his rights. It was a case of religion. Her thoughts flew back to the times of Queen Mary, and with the colour flaming in her cheeks, "Tell my father, Mr. Penn," she cried, "that if ever I have the power I will make the laws against Catholics worse than in Elizabeth's time."

William, in his heart, applauded the firmness with which she spoke, and when Penn had departed, turned to her and said, "Well spoken indeed. I see I shall not be the only champion of Protestantism." Her cheeks burned at his praise, and she turned away shyly. He looked at her magnificent height as she stood there, more than a head taller than himself, and began to feel the stirrings of a stronger feeling of affection for her than before.

"It is too late!" he muttered to himself—"I have been a fool," and hastily left the room. Could he have seen his wife's shining eyes as she looked after him, he would have known it was not too late, even yet. Poor, patient woman, tried as she had been, there was in her a heart ready to forgive, and a longing for a complete reconciliation with the only man she had ever loved.

CHAPTER IV.

King James II. was surrounded on all sides by enemies. His people simply hated him, and there was scarcely a courtier of whom he could be sure. But, blindly obstinate as to the true position of things, he kept pressing the claims of the Catholics upon the country.

Meanwhile, the nobility of the country began to look to the Prince of Orange as the natural head of their opposition. It did not seem so disloyal to conspire with the husband of the Queen who would naturally succeed James.

Immediately he discovered the part his son-in-law was playing, James retaliated by withholding Mary's annual pension of £48,000.

In vain Mary and William remonstrated.

"I need," wrote the King, "to be persuaded that her money will not be used against me before I send it."

Mary was indignant that just as she seemed to be about to win her husband back this fresh cause of enmity should arise, and in her heart were sown those seeds of enmity against her father which were afterwards to bring forth such bitter fruit for him.

"We are to expect a visit from your father's Court," said William. "It is Bishop Burnet, who comes with papers from the King."

Mary looked up with a smile. She had heard of Burnet from the many English refugees who now crowded the Hague to escape her father's tyranny.

He came, a bustling, inquisitive, talkative man. Before he had been there very long, he had completely won the heart of William, by his evident familiarity with the real feelings of all classes in England, and his readiness in imparting it.

Mary, who for a long period had had no ecclesiastical dignitary of the Church of England allowed near her, warmed to him at once.

Bustling about the Court, and using his prying eyes, and ever alert ears to some purpose, he soon found out the strained relations of the Prince and Princess, and the good-humoured meddler undertook to put the matter straight.

He watched for his opportunity, and at last it came.

At the Palace breakfast that morning, the Prince, who had had little sleep, owing to the many worries which were wearing him out, had been even more irritable than usual.

He roughly snubbed his wife, and, in the very midst of the repast, jumped up from the table to depart hunting.

With a cowed look upon her face, Mary retired to the royal apartments, and with free and easy license Burnet followed her.

As he expected, he found her in tears. She was thinking how hard the daily discipline of bearing with the Prince was becoming. With ready tact, Burnet drew her complaints from her. Only too glad to have someone in whom to confide, Mary poured out a long stream of grievances.

"The Prince hates me!" she said, stamping her foot. "When he first married me I believe he disliked me, because of my little brother being born. When he and the other children died I thought matters would have been better. And so they were. We had one open quarrel, and ever since he seemed kinder. But he still keeps the company of that Villiers woman, and whenever he is worried it is always on me he vents it."

"Madam!" said Burnet. "A man like your husband is in a position where temptations from the flattery of women simply surround him. They esteem that the honourable dignity of the ruler lends honour to a dishonourable act. 'The King' as they say, 'can do no wrong.' It is often the lot of unhappy Princesses, like your poor aunt, to share in sufferings like your own on this account, and owing to your own exalted position you cannot take steps to vindicate your wrongs. You can only bear."

Digitized by Google

"I have borne, and that for nine years," sobbed Mary.

"But if I may say it to your Highness," pursued Burnet, "this is not the only cause of the estrangement between you, surely?"

"No," answered Mary. "It is everything that is wrong. Why, I cannot understand. I believe the Prince even suspects me of underhand dealings with my father's Court."

"The suspicion is, of course, baseless?" queried Burnet.

"Baseless? why of course!" exclaimed Mary, startled out of herself at such a thought. "Why, what interest have I to make a common cause against the Prince with my father? My father never sends me my pension now, and I have quarrelled with him."

"But I did not say with your father, I meant was the suspicion baseless with regard to your Highness wishing for any connection with your father's enemies? The Prince might think you have every reason for it."

Mary opened her eyes widely at this suggestion.

"I cannot perceive what right I should have to interfere, or what would be my gain," she observed.

"You are the natural occupant of the throne if your father were deposed or died."

"But the Prince would reign with me. I could not Queen it by myself."

"That is not so under English law!" said the Bishop. "You alone occupy the throne, and your husband would be your subject."

With eager looks and parted lips Mary listened in surprise to this statement. Like many women of her time, she had been imperfectly educated, and as a result knew nothing of the Constitution of England.

"If I mistake not," added Burnet, "it is just this knowledge which frets the spirit of the Prince of Orange. He cannot brook the thought of not governing with you, or, still worse, being inferior to you in power."

"He need not! He need not!" exclaimed the Princess—"If this you say is what you really think you must undeceive my husband for me. He is my husband, and I will never put upon my head a coronet he cannot wear, or fill a throne he cannot share. If ever I come to the throne of England, he shall be outwardly my equal, if law can make it so, and, in reality, my lord. Sooner than lose his confidence, I will lose the crown. So now, go!" clasping her hands in feverish impatience, "and tell him so! I begin to see the light breaking. I have through all these years thought he hated me, when perhaps it was the Queen, not the woman he disliked. Go, I tell you!"

The Bishop skipped off, rubbing his hands in genuine satisfaction, but at the door he paused, and returning said: "Your Royal Highness should take time to consider how you abandon your queenly prerogative. It is a resolution, once announced, which cannot be retracted."

"I need no time to consider," answered Mary. "It is enough; I have an opportunity of winning the regard of the Prince. Tell him what I say, and bring him to me that he may hear it from my own lips."

Off went the Bishop, but William did not return that day from stag-hunting. Next day the Prince met the Princess in the presence of Burnet.

"I have brought the Prince to hear your royal Highness confirm what I have already informed him of," said the Bishop.

Turning to the Prince Mary exclaimed:

"I did not know till yesterday that there was such a difference between the laws of God, and the laws of England. But I promise you now that you shall always bear rule, and, in return, I ask only this, that, as I shall keep the command which enjoins wives to obey their husbands, you will observe that which tells them to love their wives and not to be bitter against them."

Her generous affection completely gained the heart of William. Though many sorrows and cares came between them, there was always absolute confidence and entire friendship from this very day till the day, years after, when death sundered them.

* * * * * * * *

The great stress was put upon her affection soon after, when she had to sink the part of daughter in that of the wife of the Prince. In open rebellion the people rose against her father, who fled the country, and the Prince of Orange, who had landed previously with armed men, had a triumphal progress through England.

He was soon after crowned as joint ruler of the Kingdom of Great Britain, and as their united reign is known as that of William and Mary, not Mary and William, it is clear that she kept her promise to the letter, and as she never interfered with any of William's projects, it is clear also that she kept it in the spirit.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

THE STORY OF ARMENIA.

ARMENIA is a name which has often been upon our lips, and feelings have been powerfully stirred to sympathy, by the recital of the wrongs endured by its suffering people. Yet, to many of ui, Armenia is only a name. Of its historymany people know little, and even of its position many have only a dim idea.

Armenia itself is a small district situated in Asia Minor, its borders touching three States—Turkey, Russia, and Persia, which are antagonistic in religion, in politics, and in every other way. Yet it it is neither Mohammedan like the Turk, nor Greek church like the Russian, nor Parsee or Mohammedan like the Persian. It is alone in its religion, its customs, and its language—alone in the midst of enemies, and to this fact it owes a great deal of its discomfort.

Very little is known of its early history—beyond that it was the seat of the ancient civilisation, which after the Deluge naturally arose and spread around Mount Ararat. It is a wonderful country, with citles occupying the sites of dried-up lakes, lakes covering spots where populous cities stood when the human race was young; towns which for parts of the year are turned into islands by the sea; rocks covered with quaint inscriptions, to which none have found the key as yet; and slabs of stone on which are placed in arrow-headed characters, the boasts of Durino the Mede; columns and obelisks, whose history and purpose are unknown. The centre of this country is Vaw, situated on a lake of bitter salt water. To the east rise snow-capped mountains, and on the north the identical mountain where Noah was said to have rested. Armenia possesses as many famous cities as Greece or Italy, but they are dead cities.

PASSING THE BASE OF MOUNT ARARAT.

Digitized by Google

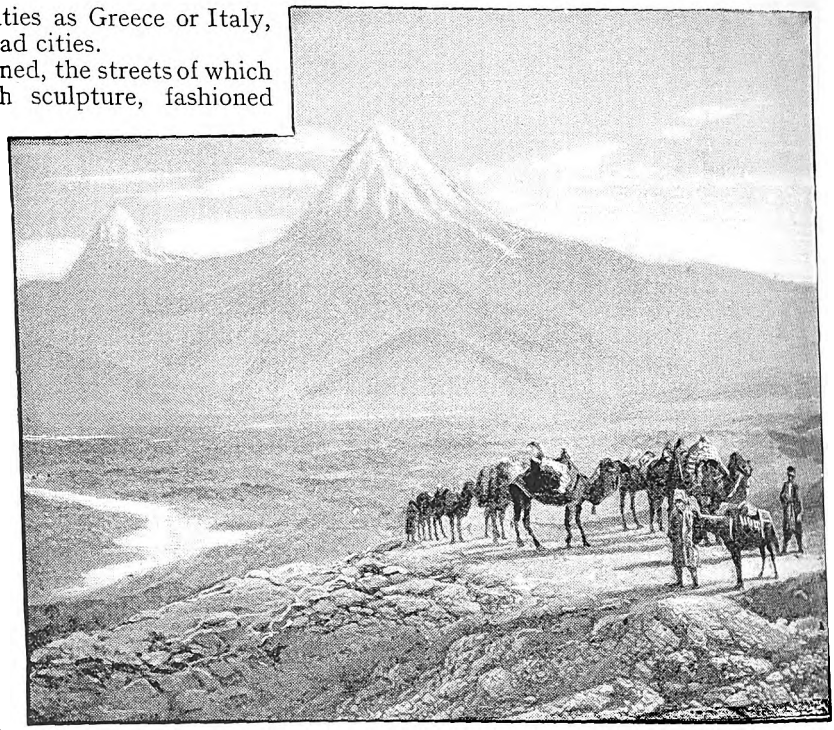
There is Bayaned, the streets of which are paved with sculpture, fashioned when Moses was a boy. There is Ani, a city of colossal ruins; Armavir, formerly the residence of the Armenian kings, Vaghar Sabad, said to have been built 600 years B.C. and where is now found the large monastery of Etchmiadnin, in which the Patriarch of all Armenia resides.



GREAT AND LITTLE MOUNT ARARAT.

So far as we know it, the Armenians a glorious history. They struggled with Darino and afterwards furnished some of the most famous of his warriors, and in the first century B.C. one of their kings, Tigranes, ruled with a rod of iron over Syria and Phoencia.

To-day, their kingdom is parcelled out between Russia, Turkey, and Persia, and the lot of this people is worse than that of a dog. Soon after their adoption of Christianity, which doubtless permeated the country through the indirect effect of Paul's journeys into Asia Minor, they were per ecuted by the Persian king to make them become Parsees. But with one accord they rode and shook Persia to its foundations. In like manner a few years ago, the Russian Government ordered them to change the constitution of their church in its dominions, but they preferred the mines of Siberia. It is not alone at the hands of Turkey that Armenia suffers, but at the hands of Russia also. Russia which can tolerate any vice but the vice of thinking and worshipping freely.

That then is their position. Governed on one hand by Greek Church Russia, on the other by Mohammedan Turkey, and on the other by what is virtually Mohammedan Persia. A Christian church, one of the earliest to be founded, whose first bishop was the sainted Gregory, and which still keeps its form of worship pure as that of the simplest Protestant church amongst ourselves. Romanism has not corrupted them; the image worship of the Greek church has not leavened them, the rise of the Mohammedan power has not stamped out their life. There they are a small people—a living protest against the corruption of one, the idolatry of the other, and the vicious polygamy of the third.

The population of London is fairly representative of the Armenians, who number four millions, with their headquarters in their own state, but spreading abroad through Turkey, Russia, and Persia. They are one of the keenest, most money-making people on earth—flourishing where others would fail, with a spirit as clannish as the Scotch, and as patriotic as the English, with Colonies in India, and throughout Europe, with a Church, civilisation, and literature of their own, possessing some of the finest educational institutions in Asia, and actually making a fifth of the whole population of Constantinople.

Digitized by Google

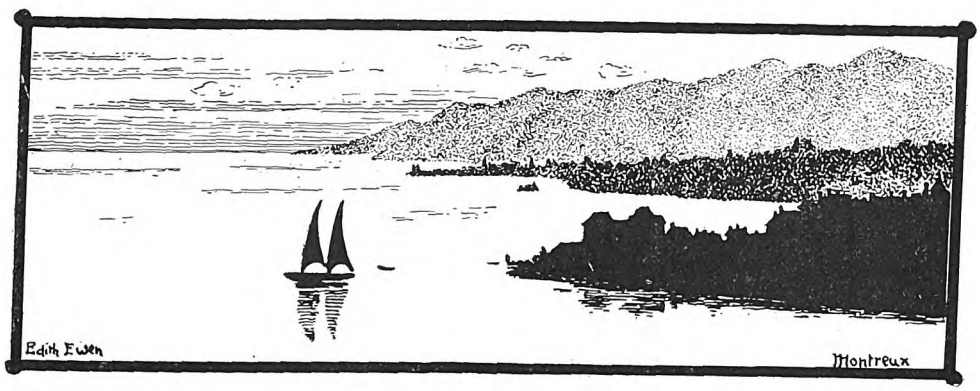
These are the people whose fate now trembles in the balance, and it is our anxiety that the might of God may so be cast on their side that they may yet be free to worship according to their conscience, and to develop according to their genius.

Just a word as to their persecution. A little to the south of Armenia lies the land of Kurdistan, and as the ivy flourishes at the expense of the tree on which it fastens, so these Kurds flourish on the life of the Armenians. The Armenians sow their fields—the Kurds reap them. The Armenians raise cattle—the Kurds drive them off. The Armenians rear families with devoted love, and the Kurds ravish them. There is no tie which is respected, no rights of property which are valued by these ruthless robbers. The peaceful agricultural people are as much at the mercy of these armed bands of Kurds as you would be if a regiment of soldiers marched down upon you, reaped your harvests, drove away your cattle, fired your houses, and outraged your women. Why does not the Turkish Government protect them? The reason is plain: the Kurd is Mohammedan, the Armenian is Christian and the Sultan's sympathies are with his co-religionists. Some years back the Archbishop of Canterbury started the mission amongst the Armenian peasants, and the Patriarch and his simple people expected great things from the protective presence amongst them of the British clergymen. But when they saw their disappointment they said: "How can we listen to such teaching when we have no rest? How can we believe in God when He lets these things happen to us? The Almighty is deaf, and we cease to pray. Can we hear teaching when the wolf is on us night and day? If we let go the cross, then we might be rich and safe. Night by night we ask, shall we see morning, for they get fiercer daily.

"If we let go the cross, we might be rich and safe."—There is the key to the whole position. And it has been the key to the position of Christians the world over. If we let go, we should be let go. It seems to the writer that at such times as the present, which is facing Armenia, we get a clearer idea of what Christianity expects from its followers.



Digitized by Google

BIBLE BEAMS.

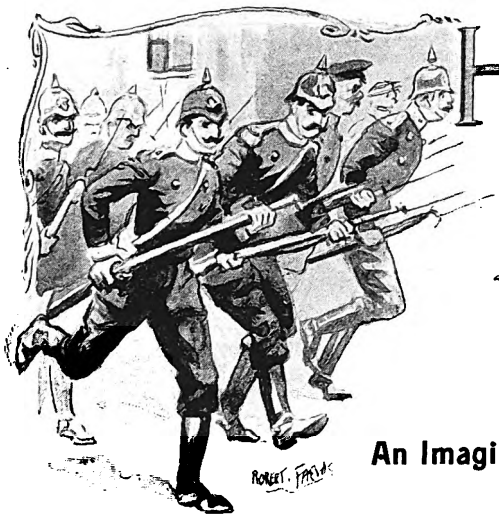
A FAMOUS MANUSCRIPT.

During the early ages of Christianity the Greeks and Romans were in the habit of writing their most precious books in letters of gold and silver on purple-stained vellum, that colour being the distinguishing sign of royalty and greatness. Purple was only worn by princes, and in this manner of distinguishing the Scriptures was shown the high degree of reverence in which they were held. Manuscript entirely composed of leaves of purple vellum are of the greatest rarity, and many are described by palæographers as purple-stained when they are only partially so. The age of a manuscript may sometimes be determined (among its other characteristics) by the fineness and whiteness of the vellum, and sometimes by its purple colour. The Codex Aureus or Golden Gospels is written throughout in gold letters upon vellum, with the exception of the first lines of chapters in the Gospels, and the first lines of the subsidiary articles, which are in red. The paintings of the four Evangelists are extremely interesting, and the title-pages are stained purple. It is described by Sir Edward Maunde Thompson as French, of the time of Charlemagne, and we may add that its position in the Harleian may be compared to that of the Durham Book of the Cottonian Library.

CURIOUS BIBLES.

We have the Breeches Bible, which is indebted for its strange sobriquet to the translation "Adam and Eve made themselves breeches," etc. For this edition, which first appeared in 1560, in quarto form, we are indebted to the English reformers exiled at Geneva. During the reign of Elizabeth, it served as the regular Family Bible, its popularity being mainly due to the Calvanistic comments, which appeared freely on the margin. Then we have an edition, printed in 1717, at the Clarendon Press, known as the Vinegar Bible, because the parable of the Vineyard in the title to St. Luke xx. is printed "Parable of the Vinegar." Matthew's Bible, printed in London, in 1551, was nicknamed the Bug Bible, from Psalm xci. 5, being translated, "So that thou shalt not nede to be afraid for any Bugges by nighte." The original idea of the word—terror—is still to be traced in bugbear, bugaboo. The Wicked Bible was printed in London in 1631, and was so called from the fact that the negation was omitted in certain of the Commandments, the result being that the edition was suppressed, and the printer fined £300 by Archbishop Laud, the money being, it is said, devoted to the purchase of a supply of Greek type for the use of the University of Oxford. The Whig, or Place-maker's Bible, obtained its name from an error occurring in St. Matthew v. 9, where "Blessed are the placemakers" is substituted for "peacemakers." The Treacle Bible has the passage in Jeremiah: "Is there no balm in Gilead?" rendered, "Is there no treacle in Gilead?" And the Douay (R.C.) version has been described as the Rosin Bible, because the same passage has the word rosin instead of treacle. Many years ago there existed in the Stowe library the Book of Gospels, on which the English kings down to Edward IV. took the coronation oath, with a huge brazen crucifix, which the monarchs kissed on its cover. The binding was of ponderous oak boards an inch or so in thickness, fastened by huge leather thongs. The Printers' Bible makes David pathetically complain that printers, in place of princes, have "persecuted him without a cause."

Digitized by Google



How the GERMANS took LONDON

An Imaginative Sketch that might be Realistic.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS EVENTS.

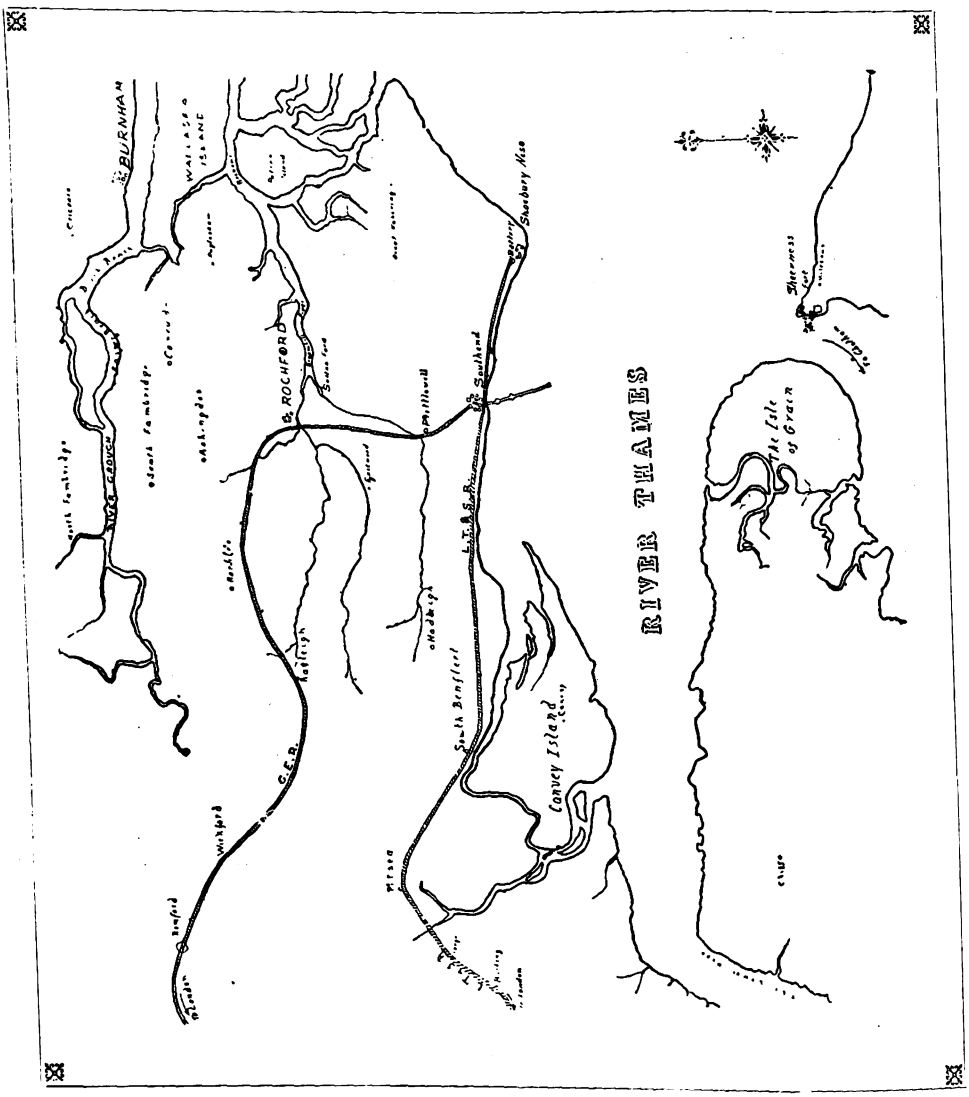
Great Britain is at war with the State of Uliska, and it appears that Germany intends to have some say in the settlement of terms offered by us to Uliska. Yet, in spite of this, no one suspects that an order issued by Germany to German residents in London to return home means anything, but on one Sunday evening, the very Sunday they all leave from Fenchurch Street and other stations, the German Ambassador declares war. England is found to be isolated, her communication with the outside world cut off, her fleets called away by fraudulent use of a stolen cypher book. Operations are then carried on on the Sunday in the district around Burnham and Creeksea Ferry. The telegraph wires are cut, and the fort at Shoebury surprised and captured. Then Southend is reached from Shoebury early in the morning. Meanwhile on the water the commander of the German ironclad, lying off Sheerness, invites the officers in charge of the forts at Sheerness and the naval officers in the ships to a banquet. While there a fire breaks out at the docks, to which the German commander sends a large number of men ostensibly to put out the flames, and after they have gone he tells the remaining guests that war has broken out. He then, by shewing them how much is involved in the matter, in the impending destruction of human lives, and by demonstrating the position of the Germans on land and sea, induces them to sign an armistice for 24 hours, and this was despatched to the forts and batteries ashore, and meanwhile the Germans trained their guns on the river and secured absolute control of the shipping. Tilbury Fort was captured by a ruse, as was also Shoebury, and the line from Southend to Ilford was also seized and patrolled by the army composed of the civilian German clerks, who were supposed to have left London.

Harwich.

READERS who have carefully followed the plan of campaign carried out elsewhere will not be surprised to see practically the same methods adopted here. It will be remembered that some German officers were staying at the G.E.R. Hotel. A German cruiser with a couple of torpedo boats had arrived on the Friday afternoon, and a farewell dinner had been arranged by the officers before referred to, to which the officers from an English guard ship and one or two torpedo boats were invited, the English officers in charge of the forts there, and a few local celebrities, including the Mayor, who had been showing hospitality to their Teutonic visitors.

Unfortunately this dinner was not given on shore, but, as more of a novelty (so they were led to suppose) to their civilian guests the invitations were issued from the German cruiser, to which all the guests made their way on this now very eventful Saturday evening. It is hardly worth while to take up the reader's time by recapitulating a series of events that were practically identical with the programme carried out so successfully at Sheerness. The same set of circumstances lent themselves to the carrying out of this programme, and arriving at the desired end.

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

The wires were of course under control by twelve o'clock, and no warning message could be flashed from London after the formal declaration of war had been handed to the English Minister. The Mayor as chief magistrate and his own civilian friends were sent on shore before morning broke, but not until the necessary "truce document" was extracted from the English officers. In this case they were at a better advantage than their Sheerness friends, because naturally the Mayor and other civilians were opposed to any immediate outbreak of hostilities under their then defenceless circumstances, and they were unanimous in urging a temporary suspension of the contemplated hostilities (possibly this had been foreseen by their astute hosts), so in due course the Mayor and his townsfolk were put on shore to convey the astounding intelligence of the outbreak of war between England and Germany. They were duly supplied with a bundle of the notices now familiar to the reader; and they fully expected to be the first to break the dreadful news. But we can now deal with events that happened in their absence.

It will, of course, be suspected that the usual fire opened the ball. Well, such was the case. A convenient site, and sufficiently adapted for the purpose, had been selected several days beforehand, and the fullest preparations had been made for carrying out the insidious work. About eleven o'clock flames issued from a row of buildings in the "slum" part of the town, and in close proximity to other far more valuable property.

The fire raged fiercely and spread rapidly, as it was meant to do, and soon got out of hand as far as local endeavour was of use, and assistance was solicited from other sources. Naturally, the naval and military were thought of, because of their training and discipline, and it now became evident that properly organised aid was necessary to combat the flames. This, of course, had been duly anticipated and prepared for, and eventually with the expected result.

It may here be stated that permission had been obtained to land a small force of German sailors to assist in maintaining order on the arrival of the Germans from London. It was given out that some 20,000 men were expected to embark from Harwich, and therefore it was natural to suppose that some little disorder might arise, and the crowd get out of hand if assistance was not available. The bait took. No number was specified, so advantage was taken to land some 500 sailors, who were lined up on the quay ready for any eventualities later on. What with the excitement of the fire, and the now shortly expected "first arrivals," no comment was made on the number of men landed, or notice taken of the fact that these men were fully equipped as far as arms were concerned. Most of the residents who were out of doors for the purpose of either watching the fire (now fires) or awaiting the embarkation of the Germans from London, were too busy to notice the stir on the vessels off the quay. Hundreds of boats were being launched. Even had they been noticed, it would have been supposed that they were coming ashore for the "clerks." Some of the larger vessels were apparently shifting their anchorage.

The meaning of this was that the German naval officers were gradually drawing their hired transports—including some of their own steamers—close in shore, at the same time so arranging them that they shielded the German vessels of war from any gun fire from the forts. Boats of all sorts were being quietly lowered, and only the signals decided upon were necessary to fill them with armed men, and rush them ashore. Soon after one this signal was given (we know the result of the deliberations after the dinner), and in the next few minutes scores of boats, launches, and cutters were approaching the quay; and this continued to the end. Dozens of other steamers came in from the sea. These had no doubt been cruising out of sight, and only awaiting the proper signal to come in with their living freights. For the next twelve hours a continued disembarkation took place, quietly and leisurely carried out, as they knew they would be undisturbed, at least by any force of warships that would be aware of what was going on. It was an easy matter to torpedo an unsuspecting vessel if she approached for the purpose of anchoring, and did not yield at once after being told of the outbreak of war.

Digitized by Google

It was not long before some 150,000 men were ashore. (It must here be noted that after the preliminary operations at the mouth of the Thames had resulted so successfully, more off-lying transports had been signalled to approach, and a further body of men put on shore at Southend, so that by mid-day on Sunday some 200,000 men were safely landed in England and were well on their way to London and in full possession of the City.)

The two forts "Redoubt" and "Angel Gate Battery" had been quietly captured by the same ruse adopted at Tilbury, the small number of men now on garrison duty rendering these proceedings ridiculously easy. Landguard Fort was silenced for the time being by the "armistice" arrangement, and they had expected to have very little difficulty in knocking her into further silence on the Monday, if she opened fire, as the German warships with the three captured English vessels were so close at hand that it would only have been a matter of minutes, bearing in mind that the enemy's (German) vessels were perfectly screened by the intervening transports.

Curiosity will no doubt be excited to know how Colchester and Warley were faring all this while. As at Colchester, with its one regiment of regulars, two battalions of militia, and one regiment of Dragoons, and Warley with a garrison of less than 1,000 men—Regulars and Militia all told—if it came to fighting, they were expected to be easily disposed of. However, the enemy were desirous of minimising every risk as much as possible, and so had prepared a carefully laid trap for some of the Colchester men.

About one o'clock a telegram was dispatched to the Commanding Officer at Colchester in the name of the Mayor (of Harwich), which ran as follows :—

"Very serious fire raging in town ; assistance from forts not sufficient ; fear complications when large number of Germans arrive from London. Please send all possible aid ; special train coming for you."

As to the fire, it was easy enough to get confirmation of this by looking in the direction of Harwich. Consequently some thousand men were aroused (this was done quietly, not by bugle, so as not to alarm the town) and marched down to the station. The officers in charge had not considered it necessary to send the men fully accoutred, so they only had their side arms. They were quickly entrained, and started on their way, actually passing en route the first heavy train load of German troops destined to "mask" Colchester. On their arrival at Harwich (bystanders expected the first arrivals from the City, so were considerably astonished at what followed) they bustled out on to the platform to find themselves facing a solid body of armed men. Both platforms were of course occupied to receive the new arrivals and take careful charge of them. Both officers and men could simply stare in utter astonishment. A German officer presently stepped forward, and, speaking in good English, explained that as war had been declared at midnight between Germany and England, this was simply a little ruse de guerre to facilitate an early advance on London. The officers were invited to take up their quarters at the hotel, on parole. The men were then marched off under guard for distribution aboard the German vessels. Later, the whole situation was discussed, and the English officers—dumbfounded at finding the place so fully and strongly occupied—were given the opportunity of returning to Colchester by one of the now frequently departing trains, with the object of telling their comrades—now at that moment entirely surrounded by German troops—how matters stood, advising them as to the utter uselessness of making any resistance, and causing loss of life that would be of no avail, or serious damage to private property that might just as well be avoided under the circumstances. They were further instructed to say that if the remainder of the garrison would undertake to confine themselves to the barracks, no steps would be taken to secure them or make them prisoners of war, and that the townspeople would not be molested in any way, and were at liberty to proceed with their business as usual, with the exception of using the wires or railway for the time being.

Such courteous treatment naturally met with its own reward. The authorities quickly realised the situation on its being pointed out to them that about 1,000 of their men had been quietly trapped in the night. The required undertaking was given by the garrison officials, and so Colchester was comfortably "fixed up," and no one appeared much the worse for the change, except that there was a general sense of chagrin, but everyone had been pretty well dosed with this during the early days of the Uliska campaign. On the other hand, everyone could not but express great admiration for the enemy. Their successful strategy was, beyond question, and more than one made the remark that no wonder we could not beat the Boers.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Warley.

It has been pointed out that there were less than a thousand men in training here (an actual fact), so one of the first trains passed on with the German regulars, after Colchester had been safely bottled up, was stopped at Brentwood, and some 800 men detrained and marched up the hill into Warley, quickly deploying, so as to shut in the barrack buildings. After getting up the officers and giving them the same explanation made to others earlier in the night, they were made prisoners on parole. The men marched out under guard and entrained for Harwich, and now the course was clear for a rapid invasion of London.

Soon after four o'clock trains were passing through in rapid succession, and it was a fact that what with the men sent up from Harwich, Southend, and Tilbury, by midday on Sunday over 100,000 German soldiers of the regular army, with any number of light field guns, Maxims, and other quick firers, were firmly established in the City without—so far as it was known—the loss of a single life to either the invaders or invaded. All the afternoon more arrivals took place, till by night-fall 150,000 men were occupying the heart of London, some thirty odd thousand (soldiers in civilian dress) guarding the lines of communication and another 50,000 in large and small bodies, as the case required, were occupying Shoeburyness, Southend, Tilbury, Harwich, Colchester, Chelmsford, and Brentwood, with some 2,000 guarding the lines of communication at Burnham-on-Crouch, and 500 at Rochford, just to keep in touch with both rivers. In addition, Sheerness was held up; the Thames and Medway were blocked most effectually; while as regards Harwich, it mattered very little what happened there now. The English fleet might sink every German warship, and for the matter of that, they might have done the same off Southend, but the effort would have been too late. Once the German armies were in the heart of London (and the City is the heart of London, and the Empire) they could exact their own terms of peace in a very short time.

The more material damage dealt out to them, the greater would be the toll exacted. We may perhaps go back to the doings of Liverpool Street and Fenchurch Street after midnight on Saturday.

At a proper time the outside crowds were to be informed of the outbreak of war, then rapidly and openly armed, formed into detachments, and marched to seize and hold certain important approaches to the City until the regulars could arrive. In due course the time arrived, and words fail me to describe the scenes that took place. Frantic cheering, loud "Hochs" for the Emperor, a rushing here and a rushing there; the police puzzled, and later on more than a little surprised to see lines of men gradually fronting them on the outskirts of the crowd, each armed with rifle and bayonet. The Germans, seeing how completely nonplussed the police were, were enjoying the fun, chaffing the poor fellows unmercifully, and candidly telling them of the true state of affairs. This, of course, the "Bobbies" only treated as a joke, but by degrees the crowd assumed well-defined ranks of armed men, and our "men in blue" could but look and stare at the transformation scene taking place before their eyes. A terrible feeling of suspicion began to creep upon them, with a sense of their utter helplessness should these men attempt to take any liberties. Their fears were soon to be realised. Presently more frantic cheering arose within the precincts of the station, and soon after (now between three and four a.m.) hoarse cries of command arose, a crash of music, and then appeared a long line of fine martial-looking men, breasting the rising ground into Liverpool Street, amidst a perfect storm of cheering. The German Guards were recognised by their exiled countrymen; and this was the first regiment of foreign soldiers to set foot within the sacred precincts of the City in less than twelve hours after the declaration of war. Swinging to the left, and again to the right, they marched straight for the Mansion House. This was significant. In ten minutes they were deploying past the Mansion House in two columns, one passing up Queen Victoria Street as far as Blackfriars Bridge, where they quickly took up positions facing the embankment and the bridge over the river, placing well to the front some half a dozen Maxims to show their preparedness for eventualities. The other column had passed up Cheapside telling off two companies to face the Post Office buildings at St. Martin's-le-Grand. The others took up their position at Holborn Viaduct, more Maxims being in evidence here. Further troops were now arriving quickly at each station, the Fenchurch Street detachments being told off to look after the riverside and East End approaches, the Tower Bridge, etc., and others from Liverpool Street were now rapidly securing every approach into the City from the north and west The civilians (now in orderly battalions) were surrounding the Bank of England with a double guard. The Mansion House and Royal Exchange were treated in the same way, and soon regiments of German regulars were passing north, south, east, and west in a steady unchecked stream.

Digitized by Google

The City and Police arrangement were, of course, completely broken up on the arrival of the first Regiment of Guards. They had been told to clear off and make themselves as happy and comfortable as possible under the circumstances. They were supplied with an unlimited number of the printed notices prepared for the occasion, and asked to announce that business might be carried on as usual by the ordinary shopkeepers and restaurants, but that all the vehicular traffic would be entirely stopped within the confines of the City until further notice. They were also to announce that passenger traffic on the District Railways would have to cease at all stations on the City side of Charing Cross and King's Cross; empty trains might run between those points to avoid complete stoppage of traffic. Other Railway Companies were warned not to book passengers for the City until further notice. By mid-day on Sunday batteries of field-guns began to arrive, and these were placed in positions at all the most important strategical points. By Monday evening all German troops destined for the occupation of London were in position, and what a position—the Bank of England, with its untold millions of Government and Public Funds entirely in the hands of the enemy; its insignificant guard could be shot down to a man or blown to pieces inside half-an-hour; all other Banks with their millions of coin and securities were equally at the mercy of the German officers, only controlling their men until the time should come when the word to be passed round was to signify a bloodless and brilliant victory with glorious terms of peace, or a fight to the bitter end with fire and sword in the heart of the proudest city in the world, coupled with the sacking of the Mansion House, its glorious traditions tarnished for the first time in a thousand years; the plundering of the banks of millions that alone could be worth the campaign, the looting of shops that would satisfy the greed of twice 200,000 Germans, and the destruction of private property that would ruin millions of English subjects; but the invaders knew full well that they held the winning card.

The terms of peace were not so onerous as to drive a proud, defiant nation, to lose its last man, and spend its last shilling before bending its knee before the conqueror. No, the crafty German Chancellor knew just how far to go. They were playing for high stakes, but the guiding hands knew what the ultimate issue must be if once a certain position was assured to them, and how matters had gone in this direction we have now seen.

The German Military Staff had foreseen that could they but effect a lodgment in the City on Sunday in sufficient force they would be in a position to submit their terms of peace to Lord Salisbury early on Monday, almost before it became generally known that war had been declared. They further anticipated that by Monday afternoon so much pressure would have been brought to bear on the Cabinet by City business men, who would have had time to realise the utter helplessness of the situation, and being practical men, could come to no other conclusion than that it was best to pay out "the man in possession" as quickly as possible, and such proved to be exactly the case.

The Cabinet had been sitting all day long on Sunday, deeply engaged in organising the best means of defence. Means of offence were out of the question until further communication could be fully established with the fleets. Those vessels in home waters were quickly ordered, by means of despatch boats, to rendezvous for defence of home ports. During the evening an intimation was conveyed that the German Commander would be prepared to submit terms of peace in the course of Monday.

Digitized by Google

Mansion House.

Early on Monday morning the German officer, with his aide-de-camp, called upon the Lord Mayor and begged him to take any steps he might consider necessary under the circumstances for the preservation of law and order, as the City police would still be under his entire control.

Naturally, his Lordship expressed his great gratitude for this considerate treatment, but it was not long before he realised the true significance of the position of affairs, and, after conferring with the Aldermen and Common Council, he decided to call a meeting at the Mansion House of all the leading men in the City (it must be noted that all banks were placed under guard and ordered to remain closed), including some directors of the Bank of England, the representatives of the many other banks, insurance offices, leading members of the Stock Exchange and chief business houses in the City. Messengers were immediately sent out to the various offices with an urgent request for the immediate attendance at the Mansion House of all the gentlemen found occupying official capacities in the banks, &c., before referred to.

After a lengthy conference it was determined to form a deputation to proceed that afternoon to interview the members of the Cabinet known to be still sitting. Only one result could be arrived at. It was perfectly evident as the Germans were in full occupation of the City, that it was only a question of making the best possible terms as soon as possible. In due course the deputation arrived at Lord Salisbury's and set forth their views for a speedy settlement of the terms of peace. It seemed that the members of the Cabinet were one and all greatly relieved at having such a representative gathering of City men bent on urging a capitulation, and compliance with any reasonable terms.

Word was therefore soon afterwards sent to the German Commander-in-Chief to the effect that her Majesty's Government were willing to discuss terms of peace. At six o'clock the draft of peace proposals came to hand. It was as follows, viz. :—

From Count Herbert von Krieg, commanding the Imperial German troops in London.

I am directed by His Imperial Majesty the German Emperor to express his great personal regret that the exigencies of diplomacy compelled him to resort to a declaration of war to ensure the fulfilling of a compact entered into by the English Government, and which compact it became evident to him the English nation did not intend should be kept, but having in mind and always at heart the interests of the great German Empire, and future welfare of his subjects, it became of the utmost necessity—having regard to the future development of German Colonies—to secure the continued independence of the State of Uliska.

It was by his express desire that every endeavour was to be made by us to minimise loss of life, and destruction of private property; and, my Lord, I believe you will be the first to admit that we have most carefully observed his Majesty's instructions. I am also commanded to say that his Majesty rejoices to find that the fortune of war has so quickly enabled him to offer terms of peace, and it is his intention that these terms of peace shall be such that even the proud and mighty nation represented, my Lord, by you, shall not hesitate to accept forthwith. The terms are so simple and so reasonable, my Lord, that I trust to hear, ere the dawn of another day, that I may advise my Imperial Master of their acceptance.

Terms of Peace.

1. The entire fulfilment of the Uliska compact, as originally agreed upon between our respective Governments.
2. A money payment of Ten Millions to cover the cost of the campaign.
3. A treaty of peace for twenty-one years.
4. All vessels, viz., ships of war, prizes, &c., now in our hands to be returned.
5. All fortifications now in our possession to be evacuated within the week.
6. All prisoners of war to be released forthwith.
7. The German troops now on English soil to be re-embarked within the week.

My Lord, it is our earnest desire that you and your countrymen will view matters in their proper light. It is far from our intention to create an undying feeling of enmity between the English and German nations. There are many and great reasons why they should continue to live in friendship, with a mutual respect and regard for the talents of each, recognising that both empires must continue to grow and expand, that both must enter into friendly rivalry and competition in the industries of the world. His Imperial Majesty expressly maintains that the last clause must under all circumstances be agreed to, and for the following reasons.

Digitized by Google

No one more fully recognises the enormous wealth and resources of the mighty English Empire, and his Majesty rightly conjectures that the English will now never cease their efforts until the whole nation has armed to the teeth, and made every preparation for future offence or defence, so that, in the interests of the world, peace should be declared for this period of time, by the expiration of which his Majesty feels assured that all unpleasant memories will have faded away, and the rising generations learned to forget and forgive.

I have the honour to remain, &c.,

HERBERT VON KRIEG.

Commander-in-Chief of his Imperial Majesty the German Emperor's Troops in London.

On learning the contents of this despatch the members of the Cabinet were beyond measure surprised, and for the first moment they were incredulous as to the authenticity of the document, but this was clearly beyond dispute, and then the general expressions of relief told how terrible had been the strain. The reaction was great indeed. Murmurs of gratitude arose on all hands. A copy of the terms of peace was ordered to be at once despatched to the Mansion House for exhibition in the City, and a notification that they had been at once accepted, and that the formal treaty would be signed the following day.

In drafting the terms of peace the greatest care had been taken not to give umbrage, or go too far towards humiliating the English. At the same time the Germans did not intend to abate one jot from their demands, although they did not expect the slightest difficulty, because a gentle hint had been given that if the terms of peace were quickly agreed to, the English would at once be able to turn their attention towards checking the movements of France and Russia, who were doubtless at that moment taking steps to benefit by this sudden invasion of England. Thus Germany was in the delightful position of having been first in and safely out again, with a satisfactory Treaty of Peace in her pocket, and feeling sure that by this time both France and Russia would have so far committed themselves that war with England would be bound to follow, but that they in their turn would be caught "napping" and their fleets knocked to pieces by the English when it was expected that they were about to pay particular attention to Germany, so that having secured a Treaty of Peace with England for 21 years, and fairly landed the French and Russians in a hole, they might reasonably expect to emerge at the end of the 21 years with an army sufficient for all defensive purposes, a navy almost on a par with the English, a mercantile marine that was gradually conquering all markets, the empire now fully conscious of its strength, and bent on asserting its position in the world, and the rising generation being trained to the highest pitch of excellence for maintaining the markets so hardly won in the face of all and every competition.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

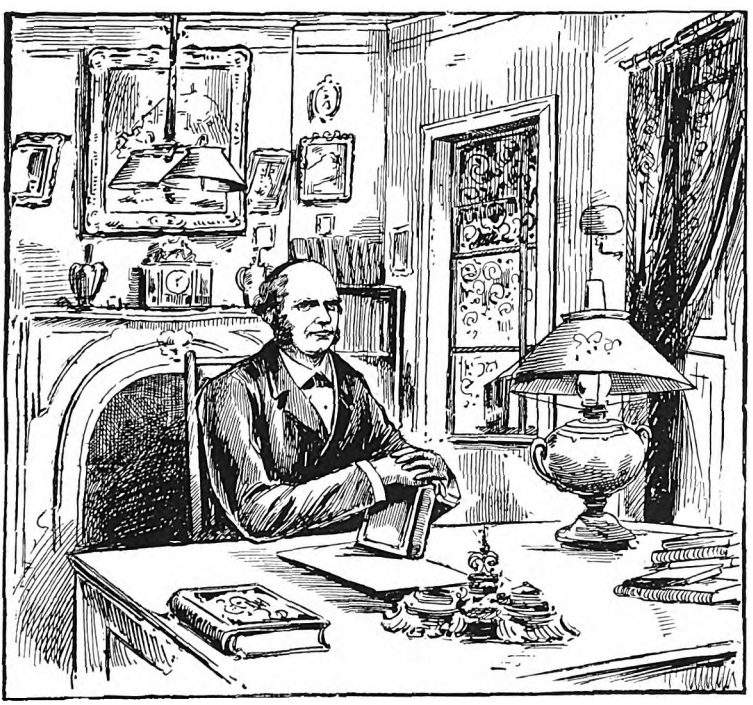
Digitized by Google

A World-Famous Preacher.

By W. PERCY HICKS.

UNDER this title Mr. Percy Hicks has prepared an ably-edited book with an introduction by Rev. Gregory Mantle, which provides the reader, for a shilling, with an extended account of the making and shaping of one of the greatest pulpit orators that land of pulpit eloquence, America, has ever known. His early memories, reminiscences of boyhood, and beginnings as a youth are sketched to us in pleasant, chatty fashion; and then we are introduced to the labours of the minister, and learn a great deal of his methods, his business habits, his love of sensation, his struggles with a church so often literally fired, thus saddling him with the responsibility of building three successive tabernacles. The whole tale reads like a romance, and perhaps his gigantic achievement in raising £70,000 for the starving Russians, stands out pre-eminently from the many tasks he undertook, and his interview with the present Czar is of the greatest human interest.

"I found the present Emperor strong and well" (wrote Dr. Talmage), "and looking not a day older than when I met him eight years ago. He said: 'I was twenty-four when you were here the other time; I am now thirty-two.' The cares of empire have not put one wrinkle on his face, although he has passed since I saw him, from Crown Prince to the throne. He is all animation, perfectly natural and without any assumption of manner. Kindness and good cheer are dominant in his bearing. The Emperor is the imper



DR. TALMAGE IN HIS STUDY.

Digitized by Google

sonation of the principles of the Peace Congress, adopted at his suggestion at the Hague. He does not consider that Congress a failure, but thinks, as most of us do, that the good results of that Convention will yet be felt. He said to me, 'How many important things have happened since we last met. My father, whom you saw on the throne, is gone. My mother has passed through three great sorrows since you were here: the loss of my father, the loss of my brother, and during the last year, the loss of her mother the Queen of Denmark. But she endures all and is well, and wishes to see you, but in her own palace. Since we met, the Spanish-American War has occurred.' He laughed heartily at the fact that in one battle the only loss of life was that of a mule. When I remarked that the American war with Spain had raised a new crop of heroes, he replied, 'Yes.' And then he easily called over the names of some of those who, on sea and on land, distinguished themselves in that conflict. Speaking of the shiploads of breadstuffs sent for the alleviation of the famine in Russia in 1892, he said, 'How kind that was in you Americans to send that help at a time when many of my poor countrymen so sorely needed it. It was a great mercy and we can never forget it.'"

For the many good things in the book, we must refer our readers to its pages.

MRS. TALMAGE.

Digitized by Google

HER CHOICE.

SIR NORMAN HALDANE was listening. There was no doubt about that. But it was with the crouching air of an antagonist anxious rather to destroy his opponent's arguments than to receive them in a spirit of meekness. Perhaps it was only natural, for it was his wife who was speaking.

The subject of discussion was the ever-vexed question of education.

"Yes, that school is all very well," she said (mentioning the name of a well-known Nonconformist establishment), but I want Vivien to get a better tone than she will get there."

"You forget that she must be brought up in our principles as the daughter of a staunch supporter of Dissent," expostulated her husband.

"We can see to that at home," she replied—"or rather you can. But it's my bounden duty to look after her social interests."

Sir Norman groaned. He felt in every way the heavy handicap of his Nonconformity, but, true to his convictions, he had quietly held on his course, and was now in the habit of attending the thoughtful ministry of the Rev. Ernest Brain. Sir Norman himself was renowned amongst his fellow-townsmen as a leader in every forward movement, and regarded as a shining light amongst Dissenters. What more natural than that he should try to guard his girl from being drawn over to the Church?

It was no good arguing, however. The lady generally managed to gain her own way in these matters. So to St. Ethelred's High School at Oxford Vivien went.

Vivien was a girl who combined in herself the thoughtfulness of her father, and the dogged determination of her mother. There was also a vein of poetry in her nature, which at once laid her open to the æsthetic influences of her Oxford surroundings. When she returned for her first vacation the result of the first service she attended at home showed her father only too plainly that the poison (as he considered it) was already beginning to work. She expressed her sense of the barrenness of the service. She had missed the Church prayers, the sweet singing of the highly-trained choristers, and, above all, the grand old edifice in which she had been worshipping for the past few months. In fact, environment proved too strong for her; and at the close of her school and college training Sir Norman bore uncomplainingly, first, with her neglect of the chapel, and last of all with her desertion to the favourite Established Church of the place.

The church which Vivien attended was of the most advanced type. Father Graham, the incumbent, held his large and fashionable clergy with a spell of priestly pretensions and a mesmeric presence. He was simply worshipped by the female element of the church, and being a man of fine intellectual powers, he also drew around him a number of thoughtful men. Many years ago he had determined to yield his whole life to the service of the Church he loved, and, so far, his devotion to her interests had kept him from the formation of any more mundane tie. But this man of iron will met his fate at last at the hands of Vivien Haldane.

He struggled hard, wrestling with the new power which had entered his life, but love would have its way. On one of the afternoon services in connection with the Dedication Festival of his church, Vivien was hindered by an unexpected shower from departing homewards. And in the porch of the church he discovered her, and eagerly offered her a share of his umbrella.

Digitized by Google

Sudden fierce gusts of wind made it almost impossible for him to steady the frail covering, and he invited her to take his arm.

The slight pressure of her hand thrilled him, and before he had power to recall the words, he had exclaimed, tenderly: "I wish we could brave all storms together thus, Vivien!" There, it was out; and he was not the man to draw back now.

"Shall we. Vivien?" he continued, "Tell me, my darling!"

Vivien was startled.

He had never betrayed himself by look or word as yet. She stole a glance at him.

Somehow her mind misgave her as she looked at the stern lines round his lips. "I thought you never intended to marry," she said.

"Yes, and if it were not for my love for you," he replied, bitterly, "I should have kept true to my wish to devote myself entirely to the Church."

"Perhaps you might yet regret it?" she answered, "and I know that would kill me, if you found it out when it was too late. I think, perhaps, you had better wait a little until you are quite sure."

"But do you love me, Vivien? Tell me that."

"I have never thought of you in that way," she said. "You always seemed to me on a different level to other men."

Father Graham sighed. It was very annoying to find the reverence for his priestly position which he had diligently cultivated become his stumbling block now. Nothing would move her, however, so he had perforce to submit.

"Will you not come in?" she asked, as they reached the door.

"Not now, thank you. But if I may, I will come in this evening after service."

Father Graham had often called at Sir Norman Haldane's before, and the Nonconformist was courteousness itself to the high-bred clergyman whenever they had met, and thus far had found him a delightful companion. As for Lady Haldane, she looked upon Father Graham and the rest of the society Vivien gathered about her now as decided acquisitions. Over and over again she congratulated herself on her foresight in sending Vivien to a Church school!

Vivien went up to her room with very mixed feelings. She cast a glance at her face in the glass, and her eyes twinkled roguishly at what she saw. She could not help enjoying the thought that somehow she had been the cause of vanquishing Father Graham's resolution.

On entering the drawing-room she found there a young man in earnest conversation with her father who always greatly interested her. Young Robert Lachlan was an instance of a similar reaction to that which had driven Vivien to the Church, only in his case it had driven him from it. The son of a wealthy manufacturer, he had been intended by his father for Holy Orders, but his sojourn at Cambridge had furnished him with what the good old Puritan writers would have called, "Certain good and substantial reasons against accepting the Thirty-nine Articles." Returning home, he had insisted on entering the business, and much to his father's disgust settled down as a regular attendant of Mr. Brain's ministry, in whose church he had met Sir Norman. He rose with alacrity to meet Vivien, who had quite unconsciously exerted her powers of fascination over him too. His dearest wish in life was to make her his wife. With the lynx-eyes of a lover, he had penetrated Father Graham's secret, and trembled for the result. Many a keen fight had he waged with the priest, who calmly accepted positions which he could not criticise. And Sir Norman sat and smilingly enjoyed it. Long since he had come to see that the only faiths worth holding were those which held us. All else was, perhaps, matter for opinion, but not for conviction. That very evening Robert Lachlan and Father Graham had a tough battle, in which the rationalism of the young man provoked the other beyond endurance. Shaking his forefinger at him, the priest exclaimed:

"I warn you, Mr. Lachlan, you have embarked upon a perilous voyage. Newman was content to accept the authority of the Church as the final appeal of his restless soul, and if you will not do that you will never find peace. You must submit your proud mind."

The young man coloured at the dogmatism of the other. Sir Norman Haldane looked vexed, and even Vivien felt the tone of the remark jar upon her nerves.

"I do not think Mr. Lachlan is proud," she made haste to say. "He only wants to know why; scarcely an unreasonable wish!" laughing lightly.

Digitized by Google

"It is the root of all modern doubt," Father Graham returned, doggedly, and soon after he took his leave.

There was a softness in Vivien's manner to Mr. Lachlan that night which sent him home with a brighter hope than he had felt for long. But in the heart of the priest there was a gloomy foreboding of failure.

"She comes of a bad stock," he muttered to himself; "the poison of rationalism is never worked out of the blood."

* * * * * *

Three months had now gone by, and, carried away by the intensity of his pleadings, Vivien had accepted the priest, and their engagement was public property. In rage and disappointment, young Lachlan accepted a commission to see after some business in America for his father, and departed without saying farewell. The priest was as tender a lover as a girl could wish. His long slumbering affections now found their outlet and rioted in idolatry, and arrangements for their speedy wedding were pushed on, Vivien quietly acquiescing. Meanwhile, the priest determined to make a bold attempt to win even Vivien's father over to the Church.

He laid siege to Lady Haldane first. He played upon her social ambitions, inducing many people to call upon her who took no trouble to hide from her how they pitied her as one of their element. The mood to which these remarks gave rise was soon visited upon her husband. Perhaps her continued peevish representations on this score might have had some effect towards the required result, but in the midst of it all Sir Norman fell sick with an illness which terminated fatally. Father Graham was very much in evidence at the house, and did his utmost to keep the sick man and his pastor away from one another. In this he was seconded by Sir Norman's wife, for Lady Haldane had never loved the minister. But Father Graham was unremitting in his attentions.

Patiently he visited the sufferer as, for several weeks he fought a losing battle with his physical weakness, and in his time of utter prostration was assailed by many a doubt. Again and again Father Graham pressed him to receive the Sacrament at his hands, only to be refused; but on the last day of his life he gave way, too weak to keep up his opposition. Vivien would not have had him worried, but quite sternly the priest bade her remember that the Sacrament which she was in the habit of receiving herself she could not deny to her dying father, and she consented to its administration. As the dying man felt the sacred cup leave his lips, he murmured:

"The Way! the Truth! the Life!" and fell back dead.

"Yes," said the priest, with solemn dignity. "The Sacraments of the Church are indeed the Way, the Truth, and the Life."

Vivien started. She knew her father had not meant that, but in her grief she was silent.

* * * * * *

The Sunday following the funeral Father Graham was in his study, preparing for the evening service. It was a room which was at once characteristic of the man and his beliefs. The light stole from without through richly coloured windows, and fell in varied hues on row after row of artistically bound books. In a curtained recess hung a large crucifix, and the priest was kneeling before it with an agonised expression. "I must do it!" he exclaimed. "I must do it! It will do more good to the Church than many sermons. I will do it! Vivien may not like it, but the Church must be first! First!"

He had heard to his indignation, that at the Congregational Chapel they had had a memorial service that morning which had been crowded by the townspeople, so he had determined to refer to the dead man that night himself, and calculated that he would produce a profound impression. He was not disappointed. It was deeper than he intended. In a hush of wonder the congregation were listening to the story of how even a sturdy Nonconformist relied for aid at last upon the Sacraments of the Church, when there was a sudden rustle as of someone moving, and, to their amazement, the congregation saw the well-known figure of Miss Haldane standing erect in the aisle, and in clear-cut tones, saying: "It is not true. He died trusting to the Saviour, and not to the Sacraments!" and turning she left the church.

All the finer feelings of her sensitive nature were outraged, and the hot, indignant tears fell fast as she hastened home and hurriedly dashed off a note to Father

Digitized by Google

Graham at the vestry, and dispatched it by a servant, cancelling their engagement on the spot.

On receiving this he wasted no time, but made his way at once to her house.

Coldly she advanced to meet him "How could you do it? How could you?" she exclaimed insistently.

"It was for the sake of the Church," he said; "and in a great measure what I said about him was true."

"Was it fair to take the feelings of a weak man as a guide to what he really felt?" she proceeded in calm wrath, her voice quivering in its intensity. "Was it honourable to read a meaning into his last words which he would never have given them? Was it gentlemanly to ignore what we, what I, might feel in the matter? I saw through you at once. All the heart you have to give is given to that abstraction you call 'The Church,' and for the sake of it you would ride roughshod over any human feelings. In your so-called humility you bow your intellect to be fettered, but in your pride of office you exalt your claims over all. Oh, I hate you, I hate you!"

With varying feelings he had listened to this attack. But before she had finished he was once more master of himself. In spite of the pain which was gnawing at his heart; in spite of his hurt pride, the man felt less grief at his loss than the priest felt indignation at the heresy she was talking.

"Hush, child!" he cried, authoritatively. "You do not know what you say! Leave these ecclesiastical matters and come back to things more within your comprehension. Why did you——"

But she interrupted him by holding out her hand, saying: "I have said all I can say. With you I cannot argue, but nothing can alter my decision. Good-bye." He took the outstretched hand coldly; then suddenly his face glowed with a passion of love.

"Good-bye, my own darling!" he cried. "It is better that we should part. We look at things from too opposite a standpoint ever to have agreed, and an unhappy marriage must be hell on earth. I shall always remember you, Vivien, not as you have treated me now, but as the wife I had longed for. Life will hold for me no other earthly tie! I have done your father no wrong, only an honour; but we cannot see this thing alike, so let it be! Think no more about it! It will pass out of my life as I shall pass out of yours. Good bye!"—and reverently he kissed her forehead, and was gone

* * * * * *

Three months had passed, and Robert Lachlan, entering his home on his return from America, found a letter awaiting him from Father Graham, inscribed outside, "To be handed to Mr. Robert Lachlan on his arrival."

"You will not have heard as yet that all is over between Vivien Haldane and myself. There has been some mistake, and we have discovered we were not suited to one another. I fancy that her thoughts might have turned to you if we had discovered this earlier. Forgive the hint."

Robert was thunderstruck; but that he acted on the hint given him was clear, as a year later Vivien might have been seen, with the prettiest of blushes, entering for the first time the charming home he had built for her, his wife of a month old.

Entering their room he laid his hand caressingly on her shoulder, and said gently: "There is one matter must be mentioned between us on this the first day in our own home, darling: I can never have divided interest in my home, and I cannot go to church. How is it to be Vivien?"

A moment she hesitated, then in old-time language replied, "Where thou goest I will go. Thy people shall be my people!"

No one felt very much surprised when sometime after the secession of Father Graham to Rome was announced. He found his rightful home there; but in all his labours amongst the Catholic poor he was a tenderer, more sympathetic man for having had that one softening episode of love for Vivien Haldane.

Digitized by Google

LOVE, THE CONQUEROR

CHAPTER I.

A GOOD SAMARITAN.

Two persons, an old woman and a young one, who were apparently, from their resemblance to each other, mother and daughter, walked into this story, and walked out of it again, without consciousness upon their part. Their road wound down the steep slope of Blue-bell Hill, directly past the Board School which has been erected in that overcrowded district, wherein children have taken the place of those simple wild-flowers for which the neighbourhood was formerly famous.

The younger of the two, after gazing upon the handsome, solid structure of red bricks, said reflectively, "I sometimes fancy that if the Lord Jesus were to visit Nottingham, the schools would be His favourite resorts."

"I suppose, Adelaide, you mean because of His love for the children?" the elder woman made answer. "Perhaps you are right. He would undoubtedly go anywhere in this godless city, if only it were possible for Him to take a little child and set such an one in the midst of us as an object lesson in humility. But I best love to think of Him as coming into the family."

"He does that, anyway; He has come into mine," the younger one said with a catch in her throat, as if a chord of sorrow had been rudely touched so that it jangled.

"Ah, Adelaide, I understand, but my thoughts were not of you. Do not let us forget that neither is our little home the world, nor are our griefs the only blots on a fair sky. I was thinking of those who live, not of the happier ones who have been taken from the evil to come. Look at those schools, and then see the public-house opposite to them. Those two are illustrations of the unwisdom of our rulers, who place teachers and temptation one on either side of our children. Christ would condemn that. Our councillors and legislators ought to safeguard the little ones of the people as they do the younger members of their own families."

"It would be a difficult task," remarked the woman who had been called "Adelaide."

"It is a necessary one," the other responded in a tone of lofty enthusiasm. "The duties of the family are on a broader scale than the duties of the nation. The children of a nation are its dearest, its best, its most inestimable treasures. Not its coal, not its commerce, not its lace, nor its gold, not its armies, not its history, not even its freedom, but its children, constitute its choicest wealth. For its children are its hope; its children are its future; its babies of to-day are the trustees of its prosperity. The children who now are placed between the teachers and the tavern will be the men and women of England in those dark and perplexing days which seem to lie before us, when we shall be mouldering in our own forgotten graves. Its children, they are the wings of its highest aspirations; its children, they are the arrows in its giant hands. And not the children of the well-to-do and the respectable only, but also the poor little children—those waifs and strays of our courts and slums, whom too long we have suffered to grow up breathing, without care or protection, the blighting atmosphere of blasphemy and gin." By this time the women had walked past the school, and, to slightly alter the well-known words of good John Bunyan, they went on their way and were neither seen nor heard more.

Alice Maythorne, the headmistress of Blue-bell Hill girls' school, sat upon a rustic seat beside the school-house door. She was inhaling the delicate scent of sweet-briar, a spray of which had straggled down from the wall behind and touched her hair. Also, unconsciously, as a matter of habit, she was watching the behaviour of her youthful charges. The city, with its warehouses, factories, and the winding silvery Trent, with Colwick Wood in the distance, lay spread out as a lovely panorama before the pensive schoolmistress but she observed none of those things.

The best of books lay open in her lap, and she was reading, "Behold My servant whom I uphold, Mine elect in whom My soul delighteth; I have put My Spirit upon Him: He shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not cry nor lift up, nor cause His voice to be heard in the streets. A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench; He shall bring forth judgment with truth. He shall not fail nor be discouraged till He has set judgment in the earth ; and the isles shall wait for His law "

Digitized by Google

Alice Maythorne needed consolation, for she was feeling the heart-sickness of a newly-caged bird. The girl, country born and bred, sighed for green fields, the scent of clover hay, and the rambling old farm-house in which she had been brought up. Town life was a trial, a wearisomeness of the flesh ; but her duty lay in the noisy city ; and she did it bravely, unflinchingly. Instead of lambs, she had children to care for ; many of whom, it must be acknowledged, were more wolf than lamblike in disposition. A heavier footfall than those of the scholars crunched upon the gravel, and the schoolmistress looked up from her book.

Mr. Anderson, one of the managers of the school, had approached her unnoticed. He was a tall, clean-limbed man, a well-known lace manufacturer, but with a student's pallor of clear-cut face, a slight stoop in the shoulders, a mass of dark brown curls clustering over a broad square forehead, and eyes which looked steadfast and truthful. He wore a bowler hat, which he had a pleasant habit of pushing back so that his hair fell over his brows, after a fashion which women generally consider becoming. George Anderson, however, heeded not what women thought, or said, or did ; for he was trysted to trade, that most exacting of all mistresses, and the spare time at his disposal was devoted to philanthropy.

" Ha ! you are worrying and watching as usual, Miss Maythorne ! " he said pleasantly, laughing at his unintentional alliteration.

" Say, rather, dreaming, and attempting to read at the same time, and not succeeding in doing either satisfactorily, Mr. Anderson," the mistress replied, closing the volume, and rising to give the visitor her undivided attention.

His eyes rested upon the book, and a smile brightened his face. " Soul-food ! more profitable than any mere mental storage ; sweeter than honey, and the honeycomb ; and, for you, most helpful. One may say of God's Word, as David said of Goliath's sword, There is none like that.' But, excuse me, Miss Maythorne, I don't see the Barnes' girls here this morning," he continued, glancing about him as if searching for faces that he knew.

" No, those girls have not attended school all this week," the mistress said, adding, "Here is a note which was brought this morning, requesting me to call round and see them in the afternoon, but that will be difficult, for it is the teachers' monthly meeting."

" You need not trouble, Miss Maythorne. Allow me to visit them as your substitute. The note suggests trouble." The genial school-manager proved as good as his word. Directly he left the school he walked briskly off towards Narrow Marsh, the wretched district in which the Barnes' children lived. Some half-dozen windings up a dirty, dingy staircase led him to the attic of a lodging-house.

An elderly female of respectable appearance, hearing footsteps, approached, showed herself at the door, and in a voice scarcely raised above a whisper, with a significant shake of the head, said, " You are too late, doctor ; it is all over. The poor thing has gone." Both tone and action hinted at the presence of death, and George Anderson perceived that he was mistaken for a medical man. He hastened to undeceive the woman, saying that he had come round from the school on Miss Maythorne's behalf.

" H'm ! If you be one of those gentlemen as what looks after the school attendance, it'll be the two little weans, Sarah and Annie, as who you wants to see. They are downstairs in my room. You see, the poor mites fretted so when their mother died, that I got 'em out of the way. Emily, that is their elder sister, and I are just tidying up the place and making the corpse decent. But come you down along with me, sir."

" You give me painful intelligence. I am sorry to hear that the children's mother is dead. Was it sudden ? " George Anderson spoke lamely; he knew not what to say to the woman.

" Well, yes and no, so to say," the woman answered. She was a kind-hearted body, willing to do a good turn for her neighbours ; but, like too many of her class, an inveterate gossip. The school-manager had unknowingly turned on the tap of her verbosity, and the stream flowed steadily. He could not check it. She meandered on, as does a brook through a water-meadow. " We didn't think her so near her end, though she'd had the influenza, and kept her bed for a week, or it might be two. But this morning she was seized with a faintness, and just turned her face to the wall. When we looked at her, she was gone. 'Twas like snuffing a candle, sir, so it was. Emily had sent for the doctor, and, if only he had come, something might have been done ; but, lawks, sir, the likes of them don't hurry up for the likes of us poor folks !

" If only the poor dear creature, as was really a lady, though she was so poor, could have got up again, even if she hadn't been able to sit at the clipping and scalloping, she would have been a great blessing and comfort to them little maids. You say you know them, sir. Well, they were always so obedient and affectionate to their mother, that it gladdened one's heart to see and hear them. And as for studying, I believe they know the Bible by heart. Many is the time when I've been a trifle upset through John—John is my husband, sir,—coming home the worse for drink—which I wish there wasn't a public-house in the Marsh,—Sarah, that's the elder one, has said to me, 'Jesus says, Mrs. Chatterley "Come unto Me, all ye that are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest." ' I mind them words, and it isn't likely I would forget them; for what with John and my work, I be main tired at times.

" Yes, they be good bairns, and I always tell my little granddaughter,—she is with them now,—that I wish she would take a lesson from them. Then, there is Emily. It is a real pleasure to help that girl, though my heart misgives me about her. She is a good-featured lass, and it is dangerous for a poor girl to be a beauty. Nottingham is a God-forsaken city, and there are plenty, especially among the factory people, who would not hesitate to take advantage of a handsome friendless lassie.

Digitized by Google

"I am of opinion that Mrs. Barnes was afraid for Emily, for since she did that big job of clipping and scalloping for the Wears, which wore her down so dreadfully, I've often heard her talk about the girl, and as if she herself felt that she was going home, and afraid to leave her. You see, the dear heart pined when she came to this hole. That would be about six months ago. She had just then received news of the death of her only son, who died of fever in one of them hospitals. She used to declare he had gone away to seek his fortune. Fortune! it is a parlous word. There's many a one who leaves home to make a few pounds, to support their mothers and sisters with, who pines away and dies. And then, again, there are those who make their pile, as it is called, but they are mostly those who don't need it. That seems to be the way of the world: clouds and storms for the many of us, summer and flowers for a few. Providence is very mysterious in its workings."

The woman at length paused for breath, and George Anderson, availing himself of the opportunity, although they were still standing in an angle of the stairs, interspersed with a double-barrelled question: "Do you know where the Barneses came from, and whether those Wears, whom you mentioned, were friends or relatives?" he asked her.

"I don't rightly know where they came from; for Mrs. Barnes was close about her past life, and it wasn't for me to catechise the bairns," Mrs. Chatterley answered with an assumption of severe virtue "But I have understood that her husband was in some business and failed, as the best of men may do when they have hard luck, before he died, and it seems they knew the Wears in those days. Mr. Wear was an hotel-keeper, a publican I should call him, who made a pot of money out of fools' pence. When he retired, he came to Nottingham, bought a big house in the Park, and invested in shares in a lace factory.

"Tales gather like snowballs, about moneyed folks. Mrs. Barnes heard tell of the Wears' coming, and ventured to call upon them to revive old acquaintanceship and tell them all about her troubles. But I guess they were not very pleased to see her. They did not receive her kindly, but sent her down to the kitchen. However, Mr Wear promised to see what could be done, and the result was that he sent up a bundle of lace work for her to do. The poor woman and Emily sat up clipping and scalloping at that stuff, night and day. When it was finished she took it to the warehouse, where she was told that it was not their business, but a private affair of Mr. Wear's, and that he was away out of town."

Mr. Anderson was aware that such things were done every day in the transaction of business, but the heartlessness of it disgusted him. He warmly exclaimed, "Do I understand you to imply that this man Wear knew how poor these people were, and yet went away without either paying them or arranging that they should be paid?"

"That is about the ticket of it, sir. So Mrs. Barnes was disappointed, and distressed at not getting the money when she had done the work, and trouble brought on the influenza.

"Those people who be so rich, sir, and, as you may say, rolls in money, never seem to take into consideration the hardships of poor folks, but thinks the widder can live happily with nothing in hand, as they themselves can with their fine houses and their cheque-books. But excuse me, sir; here I am a-keeping you in the draught and dirt all this time. However, you will be wishing to hear about the bairns before you see them, the dear little souls! They are the most industrious kiddies I ever heard tell of; why, ever since they moved in here, those two mites have been earning money, besides going to school regular. They have never wanted to go out and play in the kennel like other nippers, where they would see and hear no good, excepting badness. I often tell 'Liza—she is my granddaughter—that I wish she would take a leaf out of those little lassies' book, and not for ever be running off round the corner the minute she is out of school,—I often tell her that more work and less play would be better for her."

"'The city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof'!" George Anderson said softly But a sigh escaped him as he thought of Narrow Marsh, with its foul surroundings, and reflected that the cooped-up children had gained more than they lost by their abstention from amusement. "You say you are ignorant of whether this woman had any relatives?" he said inquiringly.

"Why, no, she had not—no near ones, that is. At least, I have never heard of any; and if she had, she would have lost sight of them, or they of her, in this shanty. People with friends to help them do not come down into Narrow Marsh. It is not when folks get poor, and cannot hold up their heads above water, that they are sought for by their old friends. I know it myself, sir, for I was a good old-fashioned tradesman's daughter, though you might not think so. It was the drink that pushed us downhill. But you ought to see Emily and the children now."

Thankful for the prospect of an escape from the infliction of Mrs. Chatterley's loosely-swung tongue, although he had been too courteous to check her verbosity, George Anderson followed the rough but good-natured woman into her own room, which was both kitchen and sleeping-room where, seated upon a low stool, was a young woman whose singular beauty even gloom and sordid garments could not hide. He divined that she was Emily Barnes. Her face pale and sad, her large dark eyes dry and tearless, her attitude that of one bowed with grief, Emily Barnes moved not upon their entrance, for sorrow absorbed her. The two younger girls were sitting upon the floor on either side of their sister; their faces were hidden in their pinafores, and they were weeping silently—weeping in the play-time of other and happier children. Oh for the presence of the One who could say, "Weep not!" So George Anderson thought, and, considering himself the Saviour's almoner, resolved to do what lay within his power to lighten their burden of grief and care. His words were only few, for, in the presence of death, silence is the sweetest consoler. After a little while he rose to go, and as Emily diffidently offered him her hand at parting, while she thanked him in broken words, he adroitly slipped a coin into it.

Digitized by Google

"No, sir, I cannot take that!" she exclaimed. "Poor as we are, we have never accepted charity. She—my dear mother—would not have permitted it." As the girl said this, her white face flushed, and for the first time that day tears came into her eyes.

"Please accept it for the children's sake," he said. "And—and you are so alone here. I beg to be permitted to arrange for the funeral of your mother. I will request Miss Maythorne, your sister's schoolmistress, to come up and carry out all that is necessary. Some mourning will, of course, be required."

The delicate thoughtfulness appealed straight to Emily Barnes' heart. She comprehended that in her visitor's voice and manner which forbade her to refuse his generous offer. It was long since she had experienced any kindness from men. She could only sob, "How shall I ever repay you, sir?"

"By allowing me to have my own way," he said gently, venturing to place his hand upon her glossy head. And when she objected that they were strangers to him, and inconsequently murmured something which suggested that she would work her fingers to the bone, he said with a half smile, "Hush, my child! you must not talk of work yet; your first business is to get strong. As to your being a stranger, these two," pointing to the children, "are quite old friends of mine. Even if they were not, my Master will not allow me to be the loser."

His master Emily gazed at him with surprise. Surely that noble-looking, well-groomed gentleman was

AN ELDERLY FEMALE APPEARED, AND, SHAKING HER HEAD, SAID, "YOU ARE TOO LATE, DOCTOR; IT IS ALL OVER."

Digitized by Google

not a servant. If he were, appearances belied him Then a wild fancy flashed across her dazed brain. Perhaps he had come from Mr. Wear, and was that cruel man's cashier, or manager.

George Anderson must have noticed her astonishment and guessed its cause, for he said, with a graceful dignity that solemnised the poverty-stricken apartment into a God's house not made with hands, "I mean my Master the Lord Jesus, your Master also, I trust, who said, 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me.'"

CHAPTER II.

IN THE CHAMBER OF DEATH.

Those who are really generous do nothing by halves. That which their hand findeth to do, they do with their might. George Anderson belonged to this class, and having commenced a work of mercy, he resolved to carry it through as a labour of love. Consequently, the following morning found him again in Narrow Marsh, where both the undertaker and Miss Maythorne had been before-hand with him, and faithfully carried out his instructions.

"The corse was streekit, and the mourners' brows
All clouded o'er."

The corpse of the dead woman had been placed in a plain coffin, around which were grouped the three girls who had lost their all in this world. No more would that mother either share their simple pleasures or comfort them in their troubles. They were bereaved, and alone in a hard, careless world. Yet they were not alone, for One was an unseen visitor in that dingy room of a wretched lodging-house, who had said, "Leave thy fatherless children: I will preserve them alive." And where He is, there can be no utter loneliness.

In order to become a real comforter a person must possess profound sympathy. George Anderson felt keenly, and because his emotions were under control, they agitated him the more. The spectacle of that pearl-faced girl bending over the coffin touched him to the quick; he longed to take her in his arms and weep with her, but he conquered the folly. Drawing the youngest child between his knees, he said, "Remember, I shall expect to see you at school again next week, little one; and you must bring your sister with you."

The child looked up into his grave face with wonder in her red-rimmed eyes, and gravely shook her curly head before replying, "I am sorry, sir, but I am not going to school any more, neither is my sister. Yes, I am sorry," with a decided nod, "because I like the girls, and Miss Maythorne—I do like Miss Maythorne, for she is always kind. It would have been nicer to keep on attending your school."

The listener was astonished at this new phase of difficulty. "Why cannot you attend school—my school, as you call it?" he asked at length.

"Why, no, sir. I cannot go to your school, because we are not going to live here any more. We shall have to go away, ever so far!" the mite replied with a little shudder of dismay at the prospect of removal, although she had no cause to love Narrow Marsh.

The school-manager would have applied to the elder sister for an explanation, but he perceived that she was absorbed, and not listening, so he continued talking to the child. "You are not going away, surely? What has put such an idea into your head?"

"I am not afraid of you, sir, but Sarah and I won't have any home here, now that mother is dead." The recollection of her loss, thus recalled, caused the child's tears to flow afresh. The Good Samaritan heart of George Anderson was touched. This poor little feeble waif — a piece of helpless flotsam upon the tide-way of poverty—was early become acquainted with the stony-hearted indifference of the world; and was, in some purblind fashion known only to herself, preparing to encounter it. He repeated her words, "Won't have any home here, now that mother is dead," and asked, "What makes you think so, my child?"

Her answer was an unexpected but natural one. He felt it so. "Why, because sister Emily won't be able to keep house for us. The rent of this room is ever so much. It is more than two shillings a week." Two shillings weekly for rent! To the unsophisticated mind of the child Annie Barnes, two shillings appeared to be an enormous sum of money. She remembered how her mother had scraped and saved penny by penny so that she might be ready for the surly rent-collector when he called, as he did every Monday. It would not be possible for Emily so to contrive and save, to meet a regularly-recurring emergency of that kind, and also provide bread wherewith to fill three mouths. So they must go out somewhere, anywhere, trusting to the mercy and guidance of the God who provides and cares for the sparrows.

"Has your sister said that she will not be able to support you?" he asked, the first suspicion of a frown appearing upon his face.

"No, sir, indeed she has not; Emily has not said anything, But I don't see how she can. She is not like mother!" little Annie answered quickly, resenting the question, which she conceived reflected upon her elder sister, whom she dearly loved.

Mr. Anderson had learned sufficient, and thought it was time for him to give his attention to the elder sister. So, turning towards her, he asked her abruptly, "Have you been trained for any business or profession, Miss Barnes? I ask, because I assume that you have only taken up this lace work recently, and as a temporary expedient, and not with any desire to interfere in your private affairs."

The girl glanced at him while he was speaking, and the faintest possible flush mounted to her brow, but she saw that the question was asked in a kindly spirit, and nerved herself to answer it. "No," she said, "while our father lived, I was away at school, where I acquired the usual accomplishments, at least a smattering of them. You see, it was never expected that we should sink so low as this. I daresay, if it were not for the children, I might obtain a situation as mother's help, if there were only someone to recommend me; but I know of no one, and such places are very difficult to obtain. However, it is of no use to think of that; I have to do my duty towards my young sisters."

Digitized by Google

"My dear child, you must learn to cast your care upon One who careth for you. Remember that thy Maker is thy Helper, and He will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," was the solemnly-uttered reply.

Emily answered him as gravely and seriously. "I have learned that lesson, and believe that in all our afflictions He is afflicted. That thought was mother's comfort, too, but it has been a hard trial."

"I am convinced of it; but God has promised to be with us in six troubles, and in seven He will not forsake us."

Emily went on to say, "You are so kind that I ought to tell you about ourselves. My father was a shipowner at Northwood. For several years all went well with him, and he was considered to be a prosperous man. Then freights fell, and the ships scarcely paid for themselves. Lengthy calms, too, delayed voyages, and expenses were going on all the time. Then, one dreadful winter there were numerous wrecks, among them two of our ships, which were only partially insured. That was the last blow; my father was ruined. He never held his head up afterwards, but just faded away until he died. After his death we removed from one place to another, always drifting and sinking lower, until we came here." She glanced around her with a shudder of shame and loathing.

"I understood that you had a brother."

"Yes, my brother Fred. He was in an accountant's office at Canterbury, but when we removed to Nottingham he threw up his situation and took a clerkship in a hosiery warehouse, so that he might be near us. It was a fatal mistake on his part, poor lad, although generously done."

The girl continued: "The work was only poorly paid, and then the strike came on, and Fred was thrown out of his employment. He would never have left us if it had not been for that. He went to London, where he caught the fever, and died. My mother never looked up afterwards; it broke her heart, for she loved Fred more than any of us." The tears gathered in her eyes.

"It was very sad, but now we must speak of yourself. Consider whether you do not possess some talent which might be turned to a useful purpose."

"No, none, unless it might be music. I believe I am a more than average executionist, and I thoroughly understand the theory and harmony of music. But that is out of the question. My poverty bars the way." It was indeed strange to hear her even mention the divine art of harmony, in Narrow Marsh, where the only musician ever heard was some itinerant organ-grinder.

Mr. Anderson quietly answered, "That is not for us to decide. Now, Miss Barnes, there are one or two matters which require attending to, and, although what I am about to say is of a somewhat painful nature, kindly favour me with your attention for a moment. You will, of course, remain here until after the funeral, which has been arranged for to-morrow; there is no occasion for delay. Your health is of more importance than sentiment, however tender. A cab will be sent here for you and your sisters; if you will permit me, I will also follow the body of your lamented mother."

"You are very generous, sir! We have done nothing to deserve this from you," was the girl's faintly-murmured reply. If only her mother could have heard, and spoken her gratitude! But the coffined dead was mute.

"All the kindness in the world would not compensate you for the loss you have sustained; your bereavement is irreparable, for one only has a mother once. But really it is only right that I should show that trifling mark of respect, for the sake of our little scholars." And George Anderson was sincere. It was because of little Sarah and Annie that he was doing it all. The cream-pearl face of Emily appealed to him, it is true, but only to his sympathy; it neither threw him off his mental balance nor stirred his heart.

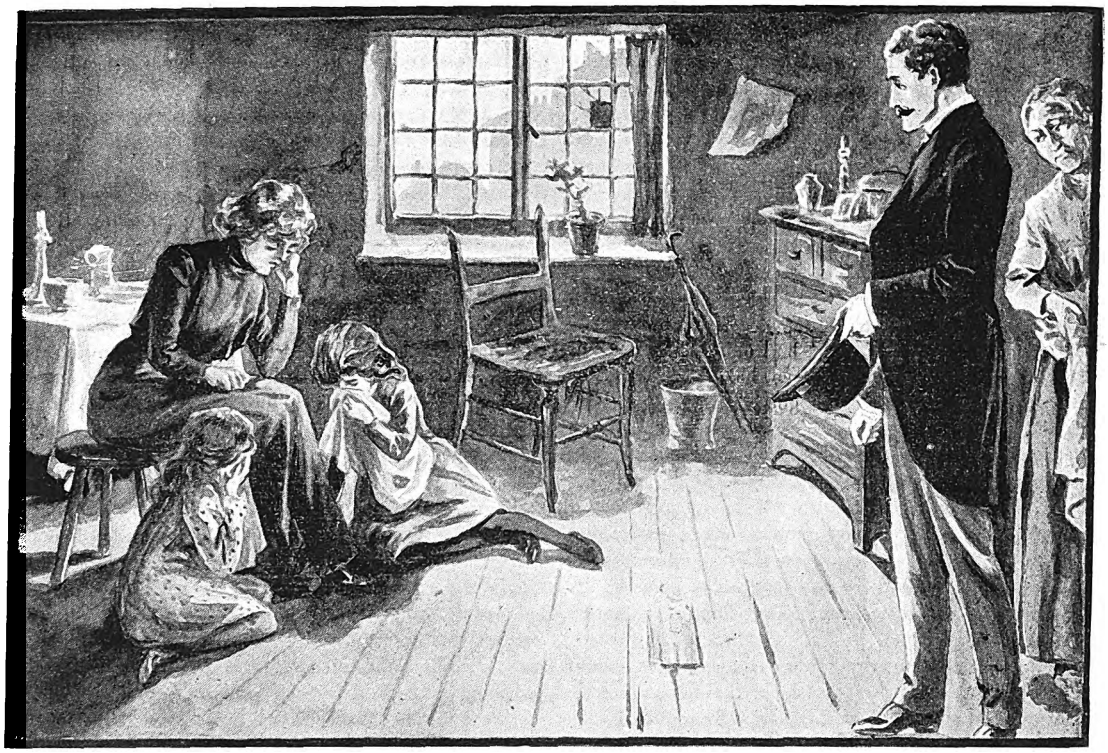
Emily was weeping, the tears streamed down her cheeks. It was Nature's effort to relieve the strain. She wept not for herself, but for the loss that she had sustained—for her mother. Love is loveliest when embalmed in tears. He translated her tears, the noblest language of the eye, and continued, "After to-morrow we must endeavour to find more suitable apartments for you. I presume you will not wish to leave the city if you can obtain some suitable employment." This was his sermonette on Annie's text.

She answered, "I should not, indeed, sir. If we can sometimes visit our mother's grave, it will be a consolation."

"Then, with your permission, we will consider that matter as settled. And now I really must go, and leave you and these children to the care and protection of the ever-gracious Lord, who hath said promisingly, 'I will not leave you orphans. I will come to you.'" He went out, and the chamber of death grew dark again. But Emily Barnes felt in her heart that she was no longer left alone to fight life's battle single-handed. As she looked out after the retreating form of generous George Anderson, she said as if in prayer, "The Lord bless him and keep him. The Lord lift up the light of His countenance upon him, and be gracious unto him, and give him peace." Then she went back into the room, and caressed the two innocent orphans to whom she was henceforth to be as a mother.

The day wore on. Mrs. Chatterley came and went; the children grew hungry, and ate the coarse food which grief prevented Emily from partaking of; and, when night fell, the undertaker looked in to cheer them, as he said—certainly a singular error of judgment on his part—and to fix the exact time for the funeral. And so the day of darkness closed in sombre night. From below there came sounds of ribald revelry, blasphemy, and

Digitized by Google



THE TWO YOUNGER GIRLS WERE SITTING UPON THE FLOOR ON EITHER SIDE OF THEIR SISTER, THEIR FACES HIDDEN IN THEIR PINAFORES, AND THEY WERE WEEPING SILENTLY.

drunken mirth in which was no heart. Within, silence: for the children, troubled sleep; and for Emily, weary, wakeful watchfulness beside the dead.

CHAPTER III.

OUT OF THE SLUMS.

It was summer—the queenly season of the year, with its rich luxuriant verdure and springing flowers; the time when the Almighty Father, with boundless beneficence, scatters His choicest blessings over the thankful earth.

The grave had closed over the mortal remains of the long and sorely tried woman; and the orphans were back again in their dreary room. The world outside abounded in beauty, and the declining sun, rolling down a cloudless sky, shed a halo of loveliness over town and country. But this charming aspect of nature, which was so thoroughly in harmony with everything that was good and pleasant to the eye, and therefore to be desired, fell harshly and discordantly upon the grieved spirits and stricken hearts of the youthful mourners. Narrow Marsh seemed almost a relief to them after the incongruous brightness of the cemetery.

Narrow Marsh, oblivious of all things except its own immediate affairs, was settling down to its nightly round of door-step gossip and tavern-loafing, sniffing the odours of fried fish, hearkening to costermongers' cries and the outbursts of drunken orgies, when it was aroused out of itself by the unexpected appearance of a carriage. Word at once passed from mouth to mouth that the carriage in question belonged "to the swell cove who had so taken up with them Barneses," and malice and envy immediately began to shed their pestiferous poison into the air.

"S'help me, I only wish it had been us. Here are me and my youngsters, wi' nought to eat,—fairly clemmed we are; wivout a brown to buy a drop of beer wiv, an' there isn't a landlord in the blessed Marsh who'll let us go on strap. We may starve now that our Bill's away, and nobody comes along to offer us a 'elping 'and. Some folks was borned wiv a silver spoon i' their mouths, an' some of us wiv a iron one!" a stout, red-faced woman exclaimed complainingly to her neighbours.

"Where is Bill hanging out now, Sophy?" an urchin asked mischievously. He was thoroughly conversant with the history of the grumbler, and with her ways. In those sad haunts of vice and misery, few secrets are hidden from the denizens, yet are mouths, closed tightly as rat-traps if either the law or decency appears.

"What do the like o' yer want to arsk for? You know that the poor fellow's up yonner at Bagthorpe

Digitized by Google

[the county gaol.] It's all of a piece with yer imperance. Skip! or I'll make yer." The savage outburst was greeted with a mocking laugh, for the hag's husband was a notorious bully, and even Narrow Marsh was quieter when he was secure under a warder's key. "See, here they come, the three of them. My, aren't we fine in our new gowns and bonnets? And that's he, close behind 'em; why, he couldn't open that carriage door more careful if they was ladies!"

"Aye," snapped a gaudy, over-dressed young woman, "it's easy to see which way the wind blows. That 'ere gal's what some would call 'andsome, though I don't 'old with them ashy complexions. Give me a bit of colour. If that gent had only got a pair of eyes in his head, he would never ha' looked twice at that whey-faced bit of faded goods, with me so near him."

However, innuendoes and honest championship were alike purposeless. The carriage was rapidly driven away, and both the girl and her benefactor continued in happy ignorance of the comments made upon them by the unwashed denizens of Narrow Marsh. George Anderson took the otherwise friendless orphans to his own hospitable home, Malta Lodge, in the Alexandra Park.

Mrs. Anderson, a grey-haired, comely matron, had been prepared by her son for the arrival of the humble visitors, and met them at the door. George had very largely inherited his generous instincts from his mother, who was at all times ready and eager to second him in any work of charity and mercy. She was one of those exalted Christians who never think more highly of themselves than they ought to think, but confessed that of herself she could do nothing. Whenever she beheld a victim of misery or crime, she would gratefully exclaim, "There, but for the grace of God, goes Elizabeth Anderson."

The motherly woman at once took the children into her arms, and gave Emily an affectionate kiss, as she welcomed them to her house. Then, turning to her son, she said with a winning smile, "They are my charges now, so you must leave them to me." To the orphans, "Poor darlings, you must be hungry; come along, and have something to eat." Not a word did the wise old lady utter respecting their bereavement. This was not thoughtlessness, but sympathy. Mrs. Anderson considered that their wound was too recent a one to be probed, however slightly, and so set herself with kindly geniality to make them feel that they were at home.

The unusual sight of a well-spread table at once won the hearts of Sarah and Annie, who forgot their grief in the satisfaction of their healthy appetites The Lord had spread a table for them in the wilderness, and they simply revelled in the feast. So soon does childhood forget its troubles. But it was different with Emily, who ate little or nothing, but sat quietly looking, wondering, and replying when she was spoken to—no more. The tears stood in her big brown eyes. Yet she was neither sullen nor ungrateful. A glance into her throbbing heart would have revealed the fact that she was overpowered with the reflection that the Lord was good to her. It was a great change from the slum of Narrow Marsh to the comfort and luxury of Malta Lodge. But for the time her mother's grave loomed largely and blackly in the foreground of memory. So they sat, the rich and the poor together, in the presence of the Lord who was the Maker of them all.

But it was not for long. As soon as the meal was concluded, Mrs. Anderson conducted her new friends upstairs to a room on the uppermost floor of the house of refuge—for such it was to them. "This, my dears," she said, "is yours, for so long as you remain with us, which for your own sakes will, I trust, be only for a short time; and this," pointing to a door opposite, "is Susan Jennings' room. Susan is an old and valued servant, who will see that you have whatever is required. I shall put you under her care now, for I have duties which must be attended to."

The room was neatly but plainly furnished. It contained everything necessary for comfort, but not a single superfluous article. It was really a sort of servants' sitting-room, with a cosy bed-chamber opening out of it; but it was as beautiful as a palace to the girls, who had for so long a time been imprisoned in a lodging-house. Emily's first thought and act in these new surroundings was prayer. When she arose from her knees Susan Jennings stood waiting. The confidential servant had a sympathy which was all her own for the rescued waifs. She also had lost a mother when she was little more than a girl, and had been left alone in the world.

The bereaved ones early retired to rest, and arose in the morning to inhale the pure air of the lofty Mapperley hills, and to gaze out over the city before the smoke of factory chimneys obscured its charms. Emily was marvelling whether she should be privileged to see the man who had done so much for them, when the door was opened and he came in, ready dressed to go down to the warehouse. He gave them a cheerful greeting, kissing the two little ones, who showed no fear of him. Addressing Emily, he intimated his intention to visit Narrow Marsh in the course of the day, and suggested that the furniture in the lodgings should be given to Mrs. Chatterley, as some reward for her services. "You will understand," he said emphatically, "that when you make another home, I shall furnish it suitably for you."

The bewildered girl, while agreeing with his suggestion that Mrs. Chatterley should have the furniture, was about to demur to his offer; but when he went on to remark that she could repay him at some future period, when she should be earning an income, her mind was more at ease. So, reverting to the first clause of his proposition, she requested that a small chest, which contained articles which had belonged to her parents and to her brother, should be reserved from the chattels handed over to Mrs. Chatterley. "And, if you please, sir, I should like to have my fuchsia. It will only pine and wither in that horrid house, now that I am not there to water it," little Annie said with pleading childish earnestness.

Digitized by Google

"The fuchsia shall be attended to, pussy!" George Anderson said, with a laugh that was pleasanter to the embryo florist than many flowers. "And now go down to my mother, and sit for a while with her. Then you may take a stroll in the park. You all of you require the fresh air," he said as he hurried off to business, having done a good day's work before it occurred to him that he had even commenced operations. And when he departed, he left lighter hearts behind him. Even to Emily Barnes the world lost some of its greyness.

CHAPTER IV.

IN CLIFTON GROVE.

Several days passed quietly, during which time Emily Barnes and her sisters remained as members of the happy household at Malta Lodge, nothing being said as to their future movements. The children thoroughly enjoyed the change in their circumstances. They were already attending school again, and, in the friendly sympathy of Miss Maythorne, found ample compensation for the confinement and restraint incidental to class work and the compulsory routine of study. Besides, Mr. Anderson frequently visited the school in his capacity as manager, and they saw him, even if he did not speak to them, which he usually did with a marked display of interest. Then there were the daily walks in company with Emily when school was ended, and occasional interviews with Mr. and Mrs. Anderson, not to mention dainties dear to childhood, to which they had been absolute strangers in Narrow Marsh. The interviews with their benefactors were only occasional, for Mrs. Anderson had from the first resolved not to take the orphans out of their place, and so unfit them for the burdens which they must carry. Although the girls were the daughters of a shipowner, as has been seen, they had gone down in the swirl of fortune, and were utterly prospectless. Yet Mrs. Anderson, although she left her guests much to themselves, did not behave towards them as if they were socially her inferiors. In her Bible this passage was marked with thick double lines, "If there be among you a poor man of any of thy brethren within any of thy gates, in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thy heart, nor shut thy hand from thy poor brother. But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shalt not be grieved when thou givest unto him, because that for this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works. . . Thou shalt open thy hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy." That passage of Scripture was broad enough to include orphaned girls. The hands of the generous are like the clouds of heaven, which drop upon the earth fruits, flowers, and herbage, and the mistress of Malta Lodge was a truly generous-hearted woman.

Emily, however, was not only older than her sisters, she was thoughtful beyond her years, and could not endure to drift along in uncertainty, as the younger girls would have been content to do. The sense of propriety and self-respect warned her that sorrow must not much longer be indulged in, but that steps must be taken towards the winning of bread. She was considering how the subject might be broached, when an opportunity for usefulness presented itself through Susan Jennings, who inquired whether she were handy with her needle, and could do plain sewing. She eagerly answered in the affirmative, and when Susan set piles of work before her, she began to feel less of a pauper.

"It must be finished off quickly," Susan said, pointing to the mass of material, "as the mistress is in a hurry to send it out to Mr. William."

"Mr. William?" Emily exclaimed. She had not heard of him, and did not know that any such person existed. In her simplicity she supposed that the Anderson family consisted only of the mother and son to whom she was so greatly indebted.

"Yes, Mr. William," was the ready reply. "He is younger than our Mr. Anderson; they are brothers, you know."

Emily did not know it. But her knowledge or ignorance of the family was no concern of Susan's, who continued, "Mr. William is a fine, well-set-up, free-spoken young gentleman, and is as generous as our Mr. Anderson. It would do you good to see and hear him, though it is not likely you will, for he is away in France, where he represents the firm."

Although Emily listened, she was not inclined to gossip with a servant, although that servant was trustworthy Susan Jennings; but the prospect of employment gladdened her heart. Filled with a hope which a spirit of independence incites, the girl, diverted from gloomy thoughts, entered upon her new duties.

Before the sewing for Mr. William was completed, that gentleman unexpectedly returned home. His home-coming was as sudden and unlooked-for as may have been the visits of proscribed David to his mother at Bethlehem, before the homestead of Jesse was broken up by the orders of half-demented Saul. Emily in her room heard the sounds of confusion, mingled with outbursts of welcome, and the music of a strange voice, and was puzzled to account for them. Presently, when Susan Jennings appeared, she asked the cause of the commotion, and Susan, between laughing and crying, answered, "It is only that Mr. William has come home, taking us all by surprise."

This was sufficient explanation for Emily, who thought of her lost brother, and of the pleasure with which, when he was living, they had welcomed him. She said not a word, but her breast filled almost to bursting. As quickly as might be, she retired with her sisters, not to sleep, but to weep. Consequently, she did not see William Anderson that night, neither did she on the following morning.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Even when the work of sewing was at its busiest, Emily had leisure, for Mrs. Anderson allowed her to do nothing after the tea hour, but insisted that she should walk and take out-door exercise. A favourite resort of the sisters, because it was outside the city and yet not far away in the country, was Clifton Grove, the praises of which have been sung by the gifted poet Kirke White. This is a charmingly-wooded height, sloping sharply down to the Trent, a favourite haunt of nightingales in early summer. Here, secluded by the trees and bosky undergrowth, Emily found pleasure in sitting with her sisters, and thinking of her beloved lost ones, and pondering over the dark, threatening future.

They had gone thither as usual, on the evening which followed upon William Anderson's return from France, and were sitting engrossed in thought, when the splashing of oars startled them from their reverie, and a boat approached the bank. The occupant of this boat was a young gentleman of not more than twenty-three or twenty-four years of age, tall and handsome, his fair complexion slightly bronzed as if by the touch of warmer suns than those of England. Both he and the girls were, to use a local phrase, taken aback—they because they had thought that the sylvan glade was deserted by all living creatures except birds and rabbits, together with hosts of sportive squirrels; he, to discover a vision of such exquisite female loveliness, framed by branches and green leaves.

The oarsman appeared to hesitate whether to push off and beat a hasty retreat, or to land, advance, and apologise for his intrusion; his indecision deepened the flush with which exertion had mantled his cheeks. Emily, on her part, was equally at a loss whether to retire with her sisters, or to concentrate, with simple womanly wile, her attention upon a book which lay open in her lap, but which she had not been reading. The ways of women are mysterious, as are also the stars of heaven. A swift rush of thought, and the confused girl was beginning to rise to her feet, when the stranger suddenly leaped on to the bank, and raising his broad-brimmed straw hat, apologised for his involuntary intrusion, and requested that she would not allow him to have an occasion to reproach himself with having been a cause of disturbance or annoyance to her.

His voice was low and musical, his manner deferential without meanness, and Emily yielded to the charm. "It is of no consequence, sir," she answered quickly, although with a palpitating heart. She had scarcely ventured to glance at the stranger, yet with womanly intuition she concluded that he was handsome, and, less logically, that his face was an index of honour. When she spoke, he again raised his hat, re-entered the boat, and rowed away.

Emily sat for a few minutes silent and contemplative. Then, rising, she took her sisters by the hand and retraced her steps city-wards, returning to Malta Lodge. Not since the death of her brother had Emily realised her exclusion from all interchange of thought and sentiment with others so much as now. One swallow does not make a summer. She had been addressed as a lady, by a gentleman who was quite ignorant of her dependent position and her poverty; had been spoken to as she had not been spoken to since the country had been left for Nottingham, and the bright rift showed the clouds all the darker. Never before, not even in Narrow Marsh, had she experienced with so much bitterness her isolation from respectable life and its social amenities, and her mind dwelt feverishly upon the sweet memories which this chance encounter with the unknown oarsman revived.

The two children had been equally impressed by the unknown navigator of the Trent, although after a different fashion. They would have talked about him all the way home, and all through the long evening, if Emily had not restrained their tongues. When they were in bed the restraint of silence was removed, and Sarah asked Emily whether she did not think that the gentleman was a very handsome man.

"Hush, child! you ought not to ask such silly questions. I—I don't know," was the reply, begun bravely, and only feebly concluded. It was succeeded by a strict schooling of the lips, which had so barefacedly belied the statements of the beating heart.

Presently, Annie timidly asked, "Is that gentleman a good man, or one who would steal little children, if children were all alone?" And the small face blanched white upon the snowy sheet.

"He is a good man! His eyes said as much, and the eyes never lie. You have no need to be afraid, Annie," was the emphatic reply. From which it may be inferred that Emily Barnes had noticed the oarsman more minutely than she had either appeared to do or would have cared to acknowledge.

CHAPTER V.

AN ENGLISH OARSMAN.

It was at the breakfast-table the following morning that little Annie, whose brains and tongue were both of them uncommonly quick, as children's often are, incurred her elder sister's displeasure by inquiring of Susan Jennings, who had taken to the child, as women on the shady side of thirty will frequently do to motherless weans, where Mr. William Anderson was. "Be quiet, Annie, and eat your breakfast; it is very rude of you to ask questions!" Emily exclaimed, her brows meeting in a warning frown.

But Susan only laughed, as she explained to the child that the young master was preparing to go into the city, to the warehouse.

"I want to look at him, to see whether he is like our own Mr. Anderson!" Annie said simply.

Susan pacified the importunate one with a promise that she should see the gentleman in due course, and the children shortly afterwards betook themselves off to school, while Emily went to her work in the sewing-room.

The morning was bright and sunny; the flower-beds that clothed the smoothly-kept green lawn, resembling so many clusters of gems upon a queen's mantle, were fresh and lustrous, glittering with the dew upon them; and the light breeze wafted their pleasant fragrance in through the open windows. The birds sang merrily, the doves hovered over their nest; Nature, so wayward and capricious, was in one of her most charming moods. The brightness continued all through the day, and the Maker of summer graciously infused some small portion of happiness into the heart of the seamstress. Her needle moved swiftly in and out of the cambrics and fine linen, and a placid calm rested upon her fresh young face, as of sobered sunlight upon a mirrored lake. Once she even commenced a few bars of a well-known tune, but checked herself, considering it an act of mockery to sing when her mother was only so short a time dead. "Woe is me for a feckless, thoughtless lassie!" she said reprovingly to herself; and for half-an-hour afterwards the silence was only broken by the light swish of her busy needle.

Digitized by Google

Emily had declared that she would go no more to Clifton Grove, and at the time she meant what she said, but the pleadings of the children overbore her scruples, which, reason as she would, seemed to rest upon no solid foundation. The strange man might never visit the spot again; if he did, they would meet as strangers. But he would not presume to do so—it would be impertinence; and she would not, for such would be folly. These thoughts had occurred to her, as she fought with shadows; the shadows vanished, and the children prevailed. To the speculations of the happy sprites, whether they would see the gentleman in the boat, she quickly replied that it was very unlikely; and she hoped they would not see him, for that their pleasure lay in solitude, and his presence would be a disturbing element in their lot of simple joy. Yet she also wondered, and, to her own shame, her heart sank when she reflected that his appearance had only been the result of a chance visit, and that probably she would never see him again.

If only Emily had known, the oarsman's thoughts were not unlike her own. He also had his fancies and daydreams. That chance meeting had stirred him deeply. He desired to behold that fairy-like form again; to gaze into the startled eyes; to see the changing colour come and go upon her cheeks, and to hear her speak again. He laughed a hundred times at his own folly. He argued with himself that, if it were possible, he would see her again. She would certainly return to that quiet rustic resting-place, and he would be there waiting, so that she would be unable to avoid him without rudeness. So, when the sun began to wester, he tore himself away from business, dismissed the interesting subject of stocks and the money market, donned his flannels—which, so it must be admitted, admirably became his athletic figure—and, entering the boat, pulled with long, swift strokes down towards the Grove.

The rude seat was unoccupied, and the plotting boatman immediately took possession of it. Opening a package of periodicals, he began to read, or made a pretence of doing so.

"Pshaw! I am a fool, and have had my labour for my pains. Well, I deserve it," he was saying ruefully, when the rippling voices of children were borne towards him. He sat still, and waited in patience. They came nearer, and at their approach a consciousness of his folly overcame him, and he was ashamed "I am a boor!" he murmured, and got up, intending to withdraw. His prudent resolution had been formed too late. As he arose and stretched himself, after the manner of a dog that has lain over-long basking in the scorching sun, Emily Barnes appeared before him, and hastily drew back, as if she were offended. "No, young ladies, don't go; there is no need for you to go away. I was just about to launch ship," he said hastily. "You will please to understand," apologetically, "that this spot was always a favourite lounge of mine; and I come here whenever I am at home, which is not often."

"It is of no consequence; we are returning; we only came for the walk!" Emily hesitatingly replied.

"Forgive me, young lady; it is I who must retire," he said with ready courtesy.

"No, no; I will not hear of it. I—I am only a poor girl, and have no business here," she answered, simply because it seemed right to say something.

Her voice, so soft and gentle, yet so clear and bell-like, thrilled him, and it sounded strangely familiar. He had heard it before in the same sylvan glade, but had he not also heard it elsewhere? Ah, he remembered now. It was strange he had not fathomed the mystery earlier. So he said inquiringly, "Have I the honour of addressing Miss Barnes? If so, permit me to introduce myself; and if I am mistaken, please forgive the question."

"I am Emily Barnes," the agitated girl replied, wondering secretly how this gentlemanly stranger could have guessed at her name.

"I was convinced of it. I heard you speaking last night—not here, but at Malta Lodge," he hastened to add,—"and was certain that I recognised the voice again. I am William Anderson. You will no doubt have heard my name from my mother. We meet under unlooked-for circumstances, but I entreat of you to excuse the informality of this introduction, and allow me to offer my respects." So small Annie's desire was gratified. She saw Mr. William, who stood before them.

Emily regarded her benefactor's brother attentively, and then she glanced downward at the children who clung to her skirts. The three girls made a charming picture, the loveliness of which was enhanced by the shading and background of verdure. William Anderson easily persuaded himself that he had never beheld a lovelier one. As Emily stood there she might well have been mistaken for an angel, robed in anticipatory mourning for the flowers that were so soon to die. Her face became white and wan, with a pitifully pleading expression, as she said with trepidation, "If you recognise us, sir, you will be aware that we are poor, homeless creatures, dependent upon the bounty of your house, and, therefore, have no claim to be treated with the consideration you show us. It was wrong of me to intrude upon your privacy, and I have been greatly to blame; but it was done in ignorance, and will not occur again."

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"No, sir, sister Emily is not at all to blame; it was I who wanted to come here. Sister Emily was——," Annie was beginning to say, when Emily took both the girls by their hands and turned to go. She was unable to endure more. In her confusion she would have walked into a thorn-bush, if Mr. William Anderson had not interposed. Laying his hand upon her arm, so firmly that her feeble effort to shake it off proved ludicrously ineffectual, he led her back to the seat. When she sat down, he said with an assumption of firmness which he was far from feeling, "Excuse me; I claim to represent my brother; and I am sure it would be his wish that you should remain. Now I will leave you, and row back to the bridge. It will be first-rate exercise; one gets a little out of practice over in France." So for the second time Emily Barnes drove William Anderson away from his leafy retreat in Clifton Grove.

CHAPTER VI.

"BE IT EVER SO HUMBLE, THERE'S NO PLACE LIKE HOME."

Long did the sorely-tried girl commune with her own heart; earnestly did she pray for direction and guidance in this new and terrible crisis of her life. She was no longer a girl; she was a woman who had eaten of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil; and the newly-born experience terrified her. Yet she was glad in herself; she had seen him whom, for the sake of her own peace, she must never behold again; he had spoken to her, had touched her hand. How the hand burned!—it had never done so when her brother clasped it.

As the girl strove, doing mental battle with herself, painfully seeking for the right path, she observed only one course open for her to pursue. Her judgment was persuaded that it was no longer possible for them to remain as inmates of Malta Lodge. Frequently during that awful struggle would the closely-connected questions, "What shall I do?" "What can I do?" arise, giving birth to vague plans, which were discarded as soon as conceived. Then she tortured herself with an imagination that they had already outstayed their welcome, and that Mr. Anderson, although he was too generous to hint at such a thing, was impatiently waiting for her to make some proposal. She remembered that his invitation had been only for a few days, and these had more than expired. So, after a tedious and painful conflict, the wretched girl came to a settled determination that she would seek an immediate interview with Mr. George Anderson, and arrive at an understanding with him. She was, however, spared that unpleasant task, for the gentleman sought an interview with her.

"Miss Barnes," he commenced, when she answered his summons to the library, and was seated, "I have delayed to speak to you concerning your intentions for the future, as it seemed to be desirable that you should have a complete rest before you undertook any duties But," and he smiled assuringly, "I suppose you are desirous to do something for yourself and your sisters."

Emily inwardly thanked God that the way was thus prepared, and answered, "Sir, I have been desirous to consult with you upon that subject, for it irks me to eat the bread of idleness." She had so completely nerved herself for this interview, that all the bitterness of it was already overpast.

George Anderson half smiled at her impetuosity, while he remarked, "If I recollect rightly, you informed me that you possessed considerable musical talent. Acting upon that information, I have obtained for you an appointment as junior music-teacher at a ladies' school in Laburnam Road, where the mistress, who is a friend of my mother's, will render your duties pleasant and agreeable. Your mornings will be occupied at the school, and I trust you will be able to obtain private pupils, so as to fill up your spare time." Emily began to thank him. How good and gracious God had been, thus to open up a way for her in her perplexity! She was unable to say much, but her great gratitude was expressed in her face. "There is one other matter," George Anderson said, resuming, "I have taken the liberty of thinking that you would prefer to have a home of your own, although my mother would be pleased for you to remain under our roof; so I have ventured to furnish a small house, in which you will find necessary comforts, no more. You will be my tenant, and we will arrange the rent when you see how you stand. No, no thanks; I have only acted as I would be done unto. If you can be ready in the afternoon, my mother will be delighted to take you to your new home."

Uncontrollable emotion prevented the utterance of Emily's grateful assent to the generous proposal: and her eloquent silence was a fuller reward to George Anderson for all that he had done than any uttered thanks would have been.

The departure from Malta Lodge was both pleasant and painful. It was pleasing, in that she was to enter upon the performance of duties which ensured an honourable life of independent respectability; mingled with regret at leaving friends, and, on the part of the children, the leaving of Susan Jennings. The new home, to which Mrs. Anderson drove them in her own carriage, proved to be a snug little cottage—merely a dolls' house in comparison with Malta Lodge, but large enough for their limited requirements. It overlooked the extensive Hunger Hill gardens, from which was wafted the odour of newly-blossomed roses, flowers for which those gardens are deservedly celebrated throughout the Midlands; so they would get a sniff of the country. The two children ran up and down stairs in high glee; they peeped into corners and cupboards, and played at hide-and-seek in the various rooms, all of which, as Mrs. Anderson pointed out to Emily, were plainly but suitably furnished. Nothing that could conduce to their happiness had been forgotten; all was cheerful and homelike.

Digitized by Google

As soon as Mrs. Anderson drove away, and they were left to themselves, Emily took her sisters, as a hen gathereth her chickens, and conducted them into the bedroom—her own, for theirs was adjoining; and kneeling down, with her head bowed over the relic chest, wept out her gratitude in an offering of unselfish tears unto the Lord. So the new home was consecrated. Then they had tea, all by themselves, and to themselves, with Emily presiding as if she were mother at the head of the table. And what a sumptuous tea it was! with rich, fragrant congou, thick, luscious cream, the sweetest of sugar, with bread of the whitest, and delicious conserves that melted in the mouth, all of which had been provided by Mrs. Anderson.

Then the question arose how the evening should be spent, and, happily for Emily, the children had formed different plans. Annie pleaded that they should go to Clifton Grove just once more, but the hour was late. Sarah desired to visit the Castle, and see the museum and the pictures, of which she had heard even the grimy urchins in Narrow Marsh speak with rapture. Sarah possessed an artistic nature, and craved for the beautiful, of which in her lifetime she had seen so little. Her pictures had only been the theatrical bills on hoardings, which she diligently scrutinised on her way to and from school. There are worse schools of art. When the two eager tongues had exhausted themselves in debate, Emily, dissenting from both the disputants, expressed her intention to go to the cemetery to their mother's grave. When they opened the door, a tiny half-starved kitten was sitting on the threshold. On perceiving them, it mewed a woeful little complaint of hunger and wretchedness. It was black, coally black, without a single white hair in its ruffled, harsh fur. Emily, at the sight of the miserable little creature, recalled the saying that "a black cat which comes to a house of its own accord, brings good luck," and then laughed at herself for the folly of putting even partia faith in old wives' fables.

"Oh, here is a pussy! May I have it, Emily, for my very own?" Annie exclaimed, catching the kitten up in her arms, and nearly smothering the animal with kisses. Emily had not the heart to turn the creature away. If it had not been for the generosity of others, they themselves might now have been homeless. She took the kitten into the scullery, and set down a saucer of milk, which it lapped greedily, and having eaten it, contentedly rolled itself up into a ball on the mat, where they left it to sleep.

In the cemetery they found their mother's grave, —not a rough hillock of earth, as were many of those around, but neatly trimmed and cared for. Flowers planted by some kindly hand—they understood by whose orders—were already beginning to grow upon it and they watered them with their tears. For nearly an hour the three stood reverently around the hallowed mound, while Emily talked to the sobered children of the mother who had loved them so devotedly, and who was now an angel with God; of the grave father whom they did not so well remember; and of the beloved brother whose grave none of them had seen. Not until the gloom of night settled down upon the earth did they leave the cemetery, that scene of sacred sadness, where everything suggested the shadow of death, but also the glory of the life that is to come.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Digitized by Google

GEMS.

The Bird With the Broken Wing.

I walked in the woodland meadows,
Where the sweet thrushes sing,
And I found on a bed of mosses,
A bird with a broken wing.
I healed the wound, and each morning
It sang its old sweet strain;
But the bird with a broken pinion
Never soared as high again.

I found a youth, life-broken,
By sin's seductive art,
And touched with Christ-like pity,
I took him to my heart.
He lived with a noble purpose,
And struggled not in vain;
But a soul with a broken pinion,
Never soars as high again.

But the bird with a broken pinion
Kept another from the snare;
And the life that sin had stricken
Raised another from despair.
Each loss has its compensation,
There were healings for each pain;
But a bird with a broken pinion
Never soars as high again.

The Moment.

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of good and evil, on the good and evil side;
Some great cause, God's new Messiah, proffering the bloom or blight,
Parts the goats upon the left hand, and the sheep upon the right,
And the choice goes by for ever 'twixt the darkness and the light.
Hast thou chosen, oh, my people, in which party thou shalt stand,
Ere the doom from its worn sandals shakes the dust against thy land?

In the Moonlight.

See how beneath the moonbeams' smile
Yon little billow heaves its breast,
And foams and sparkles for a while,
And murmuring then subsides to rest.

Thus man, the sport of bliss and care,
Rises on Time's eventful sea,
And, having swelled a moment there,
Thus melts into Eternity.

MOORE.

Come Unto Me.

I sat one day at my window,
And my heart was heavy with care,
For I thought that God had left me,
And there seemed no use in prayer.

Till o'er my troubled spirit
There fell a gentle calm,
And words came to my memory,
Filled with a healing balm.

"Come unto Me, ye weary,
Ye sin-laden ones, come,
And I will bear thee upward
Unto the eternal home."

So, come unto the Saviour,
Lay thy head upon His breast,
Oh, cast thy burden on Him,
And He will give you rest.

NINA.

An Uninvited Guest.

Go not forth to call Dame Sorrow
From the dim fields of To-morrow
Let her roam there all unheeded.
She will come when she is needed;
Then when she draws near thy door,
She will find God there before.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

THE famous Mother Stewart, of Springfield, was well known in the days of her prime as "The Wendell Phillips in Petticoats," and was the immediate cause of the term "Temperance Crusade," which clung to the early stages of the movement of the women for "God and Home and Native Land."

There was one saloon in Springfield just opposite the leading churches, and from the house where Mother Stewart was living she could see the throng of men coming, in defiance of the law. The preacher could stand in his pulpit and see the people passing into the saloon during his sermon, and yet none of the men took hold of the matter to get evidence against the saloon-keeper and make him obey the law. The incident that stirred Mother Stewart up to act for herself was the sight of a man carrying a sweet-looking little baby in his arms with him into the saloon on Sunday morning to get his dram.

"MOTHER STEWART."

"If I had a disguise I would go in there," she exclaimed, and asked her landlady to furnish her with one. She thought a moment, and said, "Yes, I can"; and brought her a large waterproof circular that enveloped her to her feet. She took off her glasses, put back her hair, and donned the outfit. She then appeared as a very respectable old Irishwoman. As she passed out she turned to the lady and her daughter, and said, "Oh! now pray for me as you never prayed before in your lives!"

Mother Stewart says she was not thinking of danger, but felt buoyed up, as if she were treading on air. She passed the third door before reaching the saloon where the drinking was going on. There were young men standing at the counter drinking, and some older men sitting about the place. She desired to make two cases at the same time against the saloon-keeper, one for selling distilled liquors by the glass to be drunk on the premises, under the State law, and the other for selling on Sunday, under the city ordinance. But she was afraid to ask for whisky or brandy lest she might be suspected as a spy. She asked the bar-tender if she could have something to drink. He asked what she wanted. At a venture she asked if he had any sherry wine. He set a bottle and two small glasses on the counter, one having a little water in it. She did not understand what the water meant; still, she picked up the bottle and started to pour out the wine, but as her hand trembled, she requested him to pour it out for her, remarking that she felt rather badly. So he poured it out, and having asked the price she laid it down, and, picking up the glass, walked out.

Digitized by Google

On the Tuesday evening following that Sunday morning Mother Stewart spoke in the church opposite the saloon to an audience that packed it to the doors, and, taking her glass of wine, she exhibited it to the audience and told the story, "How I bought my first glass of liquor."

That was the beginning of the Temperance Crusade in the city of Springfield, which reached large proportions, and did a great amount of good.

❀ ❀ ❀

CHRISTIAN WORKERS IN TEXAS.

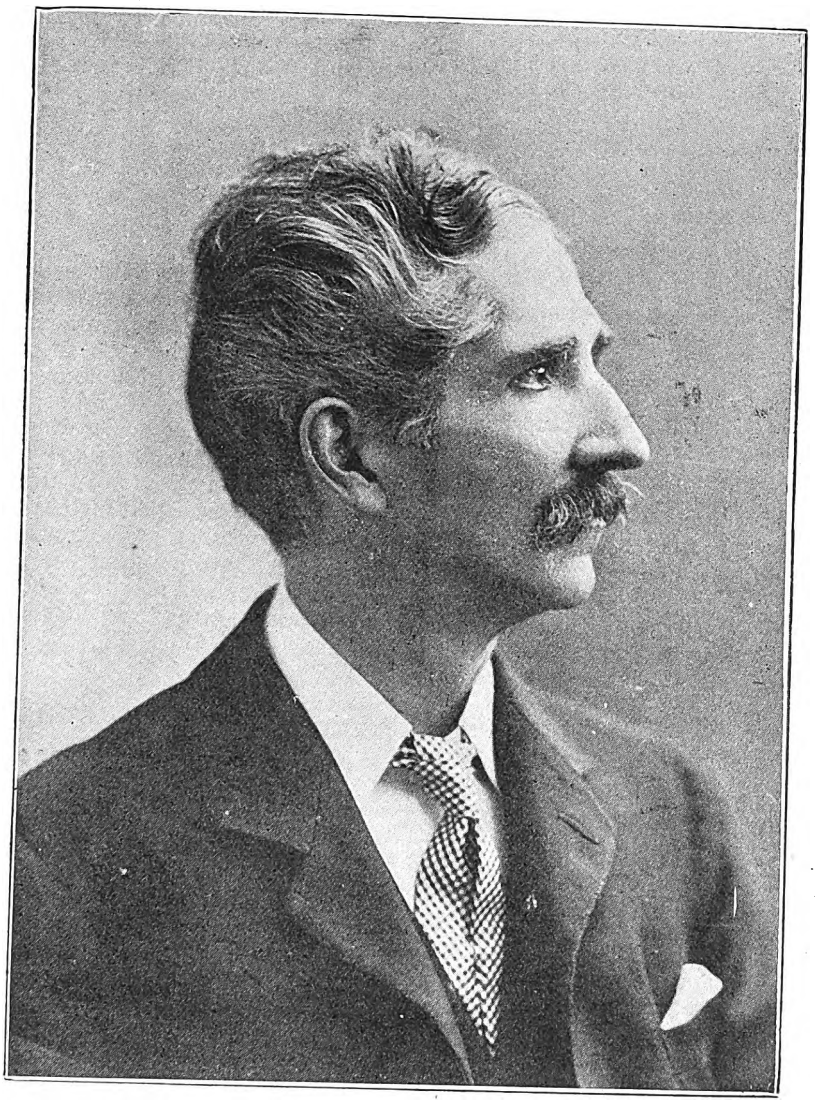
THE group of portraits given here represent some well-known Christian workers in Houston, Texas—Rev. Mr. Bradburn, Mr. Tomey, Mr. McNabb, and Miss Bradburn. They are foremost in good work of all kinds, and especially made themselves distinguished in the district by the way in which they worked to help during the disaster that wrecked Houston, when it was visited by a cyclone two years ago.

❀ ❀ ❀

MR. R. BAYLIS, widely known as the author of many works on Music and the Voice, has developed and perfected a mode of "silent" vocal practice, comparable to the lines of the "Virgil Practice Clavier," a toneless instrument with clicks to gauge and insures good finger action for the pianoforte. Mr. Baylis' discovery enables students to "check" scale musical figures, turns, trills, etc., and all this is found to be of much value in attaining parallel ends vocally to that of the above named instrument for the fingers, and with like convenience in many ways and saving of time. Over and above this is the fact that the exercises do not fail to strengthen and improve the quality of the voice, and are capable of averting fatigue and hoarseness after lengthly speaking or singing, and of developing compass as well as power to a remarkable degree. It has been said by a leading musical contemporary that these original lines of study place Mr. Baylis to the forefront of his profession, and the same authority predicts a career of great usefulness for Mr. Baylis, given the necessary condition upon which all things human depend. Mr. Baylis is the author of "The Often Mis-Used Voice," "Mind and Voice," with which is incorporated "Mind the Voice," "How to be Clearly Understood in Singing," &c.

❀ ❀ ❀

Digitized by Google



MR. BARNARD BAYLIS,

WHOSE METHODS ARE REVOLUTIONIZING VOICE-TRAINING.

Digitized by Google

Faithfully Yours,
Beth Bannester

MISS BETH BANNESTER, B.A., whose name is well-known to the readers of this magazine, as a writer of fiction, and some charming parables that have recently appeared in our pages, is the Lady Principal of the Alexandra College, Westcliffe-on-Sea. Her life-story is an exemplification of what pluck and perseverance can do; for although she was only a girl in the obscure country village of Barling, in Essex, without any educational advantages, she made up her mind to secure her degree, and won it at London University by self-tuition. She is an educational enthusiast, and the girls under her care at Westcliffe-on-Sea have the benefit of a rational, healthy out-of-door existence, and a happy home-life, while the educational advantages of her training are seen in the successes won by her pupils. She is also known as a lecturer of no mean order, and her services have been in frequent demand. This, of course, is no infrequent thing, but in her case it meant many years of hard toiling. Nothing, perhaps, seemed further off from the village girl than that she would be able to realise her ambition, and become both an accredited scholar, a writer, and the proprietor of a large and successful college.

❀ ❀ ❀

THE present editor of this magazine is the Congregational minister of Rochford, Essex, and a writer for many of the religious magazines and newspapers of the day, under the nom-de-plume of "Wolfe Street." He is also the Hon. Sec. of the Cancer Society, and until very recently Secretary of the British Chantauqua, a religious-educational society with a summer school-meeting annually, and now in session at Aberystwith. He is also the author of "Wherefore O God?" and "Marchester Stories."

REV. CHAS. HERBERT, THE EDITOR.

❀ ❀ ❀

Digitized by Google

IN PAYMENT OF DEBT.

ELLA! Ella! where are you?" cried a young girl, dashing into a small sitting-room where her sister was at needlework.

"What a tomboy you are, Mabel!" replied Ella. "Why don't you move more quietly?"

"Oh, never mind my manners, Miss date! Guess my news!"

"I'm not good at guessing. I'll give it up."

"Well, it's all over between you and Frank!"

"Whatever do you mean. Mabel?"

"'Lend me your ears,' as Antony said to the Romans," said the girl dramatically. "I was sitting in the library window-seat with the curtains drawn round me, when papa came in with a gentleman. He was a stranger to me, but papa evidently knew him very well. They were talking so earnestly, and the subject was no other than your own sweet self!"

"Myself!" said Ella. "Whatever could they have to say about me?"

"Oh, only that this man wanted to marry you; and papa actually promised!" —and the mischievous elf hugged herself with glee.

"Mabel—Mabel! you are letting your tongue run away with you! Do you know what you are saying?"

"Perfectly well, my dear. O, Ella!" she went on, seriously, "what will you do? I am so sorry for you. It seems papa owes this man some money and he has nothing to pay with. So the fine gentleman (?) has kindly consented to accept Miss Ella Nugent instead. I heard him mention a town house, diamonds, etc. Allow me to congratulate you on your very brilliant prospects! You'll give me a season in town, won't you?" laughingly.

"But what if I don't consent?" said Ella, her face ablaze with indignation.

"Oh, then we are to be sold up, I believe But, certainly papa doesn't think you will refuse."

"How dare he?" gasped Ella. "How can he, presuming on the fact that he is my father, think he can sell me to pay his debts, as he would sell his land? He would never have done it if our mother had been alive."

Mabel looked at her sister in amazement. "Then what will you do, Ella?" she inquired.

"Not marry that man, at any rate! I will never marry anyone but Frank Hamilton! I have told him so."

When Ella was left alone, she felt for a moment overwhelmed at her father's acting in this way. But she did not give in to her grief for long. "This," she told herself, "is a time for action, not for weeping. First of all she must see Frank Hamilton, the young doctor to whom she had been engaged for the last three months. She would be faithful to him, whatever happened; but she must get his consent to her scheme."

Mr. Nugent had never given his sanction to the engagement. Indeed, whenever it was mentioned he had always managed to laugh it off; but Ella and Frank had never anticipated any opposition from him in the end.

During the day Mr. Nugent told Ella that he had a Mr. Boyne coming to dinner that evening; and he added: "Put on your smartest gown. I want you to look very charming, so that you may do your old father credit."

"Very well, papa," was the quiet reply.

That afternoon Ella received a visit from her lover.

"Oh, Frank!" she exclaimed, when she saw him. "I am so glad to see you!"

"I am delighted to hear it, darling," he replied, as he saluted her in a very lover-like fashion.

"Ah! but wait and hear what I have to say." And she proceeded to tell him all that she had heard that morning.

Frank's face grew dark as he listened, but Ella would not give him a chance to say a word, until she had told him what she wanted to do. Then he said:

Digitized by Google

"Yes, that is all very well; but what part am I to play in this little comedy?"

"That of a looker-on," said Ella, lightly.

wish you would marry me at once," said Frank.

"No dear, I could not do that. You must not wreck all your future by a hasty marriage. We must wait."

"Well, I don't like it," grumbled Frank. "Mind you don't give that fellow any of my privileges."

"Trust me," answered Ella. "It won't be for long."

At dinner that evening Mr. John Boyne was presented to the girls. The sight of him filled Ella with disgust. Everything about him was coarse and vulgar.

"Fancy being the wife of that man!" she said to her sister, when they met later.

"Well, at any rate, he brought some fine specimens of his diamonds to dazzle you with. Did you see his rings?"

After that evening Mr. Boyne became a constant visitor at the Nugents' house, and the girls were always called upon to entertain him with their music and singing.

Mabel stood by her sister faithfully, and never once was Mr. Boyne able to get a word alone with Ella.

"Have you thought what it will mean, Mabel?" said Ella, one day. "We shall have to leave home, you know. You could go to Mrs. Graham, couldn't you?"

"Yes," said Mabel. "I often wonder what makes my godmother so fond of me. She is always asking me to go and live with her. But what will you do, Ella?"

"I shall have to do something. Frank and I can't marry until he gets a practice. I think I shall try to get into a hospital. I have often thought a doctor's wife should be a trained nurse. I shall ask Frank about it. He has a great many friends and some influence, although he has little money."

Mr. Boyne was not gifted with much patience, and he began to get very angry that he could not settle things with Ella.

Certainly the girls were very entertaining but he wished they were not quite so fond of each other. When he married Ella he should take care that the other one should not come to his house much. She even now seemed as though she made fun of him. He would speak to Nugent, and tell him the thing must be settled at once. He must have the girl or the money.

Accordingly, on the occasion of his next visit, he asked Mr. Nugent to make known his wishes to Ella, and he would call the next day for his answer.

That evening, as the sisters were sitting together, the servant brought the message that her master wished to speak to Miss Nugent in the library.

"I will come at once," said Ella, calmly, though she went deathly pale and trembled from head to foot. "Oh, Mab, it has come at last," she said, tuning to her sister. "What shall I do?"

"Courage, Ella," replied Mabel. "Don't faint now. Old John will want a speedy marriage, so you won't have to act long. The farce will soon be over."

"Yes," replied Ella, "I mean to go through." So with a determined shake she pulled herself together and went in search of her father.

She found that gentleman standing before the fire, wearing a very important looking air.

"You wish to speak to me, I think, papa," she said.

"I do, dear," he replied. "There is a little matter I wish settled with you to-night."

"Why, what can it be, papa?" she asked innocently.

"I wish to tell you that you have succeedeed so admirably in charming my friend, Mr. Boyne, that he now does you the honour to ask you to be his wife."

"Papa!" she exclaimed, "how can I? You know I am engaged to Mr. Hamilton!"

"Indeed!" was the reply. "I know nothing of the kind. When did I sanction any engagement? Please to consider all that boy and girl nonsense at an end! As the wife of Mr. Boyne you will be mistress of a first-class establishment, and have everything you could wish for."

"Oh, papa!" she murmured. Poor Frank!"

"Silence, girl!" he roared. "In this house remember my will is law. You are to consider yourself engaged to Mr. John Boyne. He will be here to-morrow to see you himself, and I hope you will receive him in a becoming spirit as your affianced husband. That is all. You may go!"

Digitized by Google

Ella gladly accepted her dismissal, and went. She found Mabel just outside the door, bursting with laughter. Quickly they hurried to their room. Ella soon caught the infection, and the laugh did her good.

"Oh, Ella," began Mabel, "I was obliged to come, too. I thought perhaps you might want same cold water. I had it ready. Do practise that 'becoming spirit.' You know he is coming to-morrow."

\- - -

"Well, Nugent," said Mr. Boyne the next day, "is it all right? Are you to be my father-in-law?"

"Yes," he replied, "my daughter is quite willing. I believe she is in the drawing-room."

"I hope she is alone. She seems uncommonly fond of her sister."

"Certainly, you will see her alone."

The girls sitting in the drawing-room heard him coming.

"See," said Mabel, "I will slip in here."

"Don't leave me long," implored Ella.

Mabel had just time to disappear—she took the precaution to leave the door ajar, and she stood very close to it—when Mr. Boyne entered the room.

"Ah, Miss Nugent! How do you do? It is not often I have the privilege of seeing you alone."

"No," she replied. "You see, Mabel is all I have."

"Very nice, I am sure, but that will be altered now. Mabel will not be all you have. I have been talking to your father Miss Nugent, and he tells me you will do me the honour to become my wife. Is that so?"

"Yes, if you wish it," said Ella.

"Thank you. You have made me a very happy man. I hope it will not be long before you will allow me to place you at the head of my establishment"—pompously.

He bent forward as though he would kiss her, but just at that moment Ella felt the kitten pulling at her dress, and she bent down to pick it up, consequently his lips met nothing more tangible than the air.

This was too much for Mabel behind the door, and unable to control herself longer, she dashed into the room

"O, Ella!" she began, laughingly, "such a thing has happened!" and then stopped short.

"My Boyne, Mabel, said Ella.

"How do you do, Miss Mabel?" said Mr. Boyne. "So you are to be my little sister. Miss Ella has just promised to be my wife."

"You will be a very old brother," was Mabel's outspoken rejoinder. "I should think you must nearly be as old as papa."

Ella bit her lip to keep back a smile, while Mr. Boyne muttered something about being "better able to take care of Ella."

"When we were little girls, Mabel, you used to wish we had a big brother," said Ella, smilingly.

Mr. Boyne soon after took his departure, for Mabel would not leave Ella, and he did not at all enjoy the quizzing air with which she surveyed him; but he left more than ever determined that he would not wait long for his wife.

Soon after Mr. Boyne's proposal, Mabel wrote to her godmother, Mrs. Graham, begging her to visit them, so that they might talk over things, with that lady did very soon, for, never having had a daughter, she had always been very anxious to have Mabel.

The girls speedily won her over to their side. She had been delighted to hear of the engagement between Ella and Frank, for she liked the young doctor, and thought him in every way worthy of the girl. Consequently, she was all the more indignant at Mr. Nugent's conduct. She would have liked to settle the matter by taking Ella to live with her, too, but this Ella would not hear of.

"No—no," she said. "It is enough to saddle you with one girl. You know I have a little money of my own, and Frank knows of a vacancy in a hospital, so that I can hold out until he is ready,"

Mr. Boyne did not seem to make much headway with his wooing. Ella always treated him with stiffness and reserve. If he ever attempted to caress her in any way she drew back instantly, and Mabel was always sure to spring from somewhere. He vowed to himself that he would teach both the little minxes a lesson when he had them in his power, which would be very soon now, for he had arranged with Mr. Nugent that the wedding should take place within six weeks. When he announced this fact to Ella, she demurred, saying she did not think she could be ready.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, hang it!" he replicd. "You need not get anything ready. I do not want a wife all furs and furbelows. I will buy all you need when we are married." To which speech Ella said nothing, but felt, as she told Mabel afterwards, that she would have liked to shake him.

It wanted one week to the wedding. It was to be a very quiet affair.

Mr. Boyne would get a special lisence, and they were to be married in London.

Mabel and Ella went out early in the morning, saying they would be gone all day, as they had shopping and other business in town, but before the evening they were safely housed with Mrs. Graham, where Ella had arranged to stay for a week with her sister. before taking up her duties in the hospital.

The next morning, Mr. Nugent received the following letter from Ella:

"My dear Father,—I am very sorry that for once I cannot bend to your authority. It would be impossible for me to marry a man like Mr. Boyne, and I should have thought that, knowing me as you do, you would have understood this. But you did not give me a chance to say a word. It seems that I was to be sold to pay a debt. How I found this out, does not matter. I am staying with Mrs. Graham for the present. I am still, my dear father,

"Your loving daughter,
"ELLA.

"P.S.—Nothing can alter my decision."

Mr. Nugent was almost beside himeslf with rage and consternation. What should he do now? How could he tell Boyne? Any necessity for instant decision, however, was removed by the receipt of a message from that genlteman, that he had sprained his ankle, but hoped that it would not be severe enough to interfere with their arrangements.

"Thank Heaven for that!" he growled. "Something may yet turn up."

* * * * *

That afternoon Ella was sitting by herself, when the servant brought the message that "Sir Frank Hamilton" was in the drawing-room.

Ella went down quickly and exclaimed, when she could free herself from Frank's embrace:

"Oh, Frank, how can you joke? I don't feel like joking now at all."

"I am not joking, darling. I was never so serious in my life."

"But the servant said 'Sir Frank'?"

"That is my name now. My kinsman, Sir Lionel Hamilton died last week, and it seems I am the next of kin. I had never seen the old gentleman. I believe he was very much afflicted, so it would be silly for me to say I am sorry. Now, sit down darling. I want to make a proposition. Is there any just cause or impediment why this wedding shouldn't take place, only instead of becoming Mrs. Boyne, you will have to be Lady Hamilton?"

"But, Frank, if I marry now, papa will be ruined. His debt will have to be met."

"When we are married we will help your father together," herepl ied. Then, seeing her about to speak, he exclaimed: "Not another word and you love me. I must run away now, but I shall be back to-night."

When he had gone, Mrs. Graham came into the room.

"I know all!" she cried, gaily. "Frank has told me. Let me give you my wedding present," and she put a cheque into the girl's hand, kissing her warmly. "It is for your dear mother's sake," she said, as the girl looked in astonishment at the cheque, which far more than covered her father's debts.

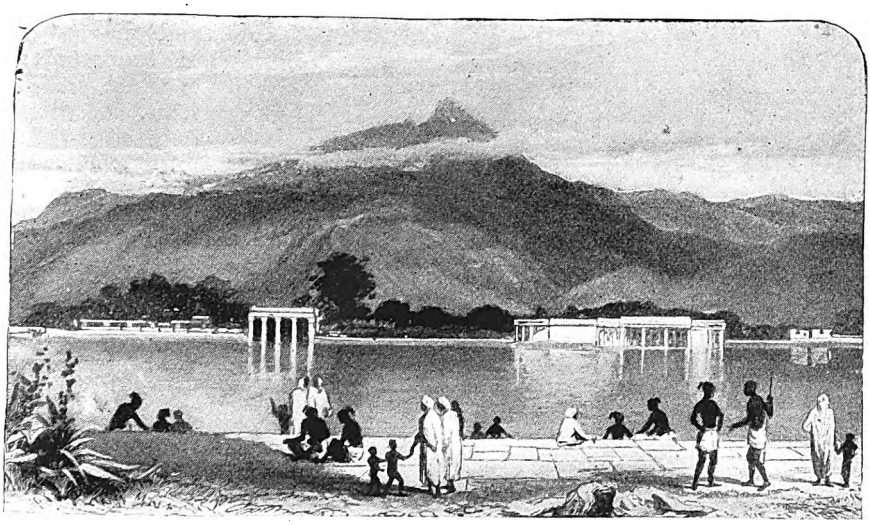
So the wedding came off after all, which was a delightful solution of a troublseome problem to all concerned, except Mr. Boyne, who found no comfort except for the thought that at any rate he had regained his money without the expense of a wife.

MINIE HERBERT.

Digitized by Google

RANDOM RAMBLES.

OUR illustration presents a view of one of the famous "sacred bathing-places," the great tank of Strivilliputter, in the district of Tinnevelly, South India.



SACRED BATHING PLACE, S. INDIA.

This tank has sometimes been called "The Sea of Milk." Granite steps lead down to the water's edge, and in the early morning hundreds of men and women gather to bathe and to worship the sun. The water is stagnant and dirty, though it is esteemed as specially holy. Here the people wash not only themselees, but also their clothes. Even the Brahmins, who regard the touch of a person of low caste as pollution, bathe in the same tank, thongh they have a special sectiou set apart for their use. The cost of building these bathing places is immense, yet the people erect them in many parts of India because they think that, at any cost, provision should be made for the removal of. sin.

Russia's Peasant Homes.

IT would be difficult to find anywhere a more monotonous life than that of the peasantry of Russia. Both in city and country the hours are long; indeed it is a common thing for the workers in towns to begin at earliest daylight and to continue till long after dusk, or until tired nature gives out and rest becomes imperative. One would naturally suppose that to endure such protracted labour the workers would need an abundance of nourishing food; yet the usual fare of the Russian peasant is the simplest imaginable.

Digitized by Google

RUSSIAN PEASANT WOMEN.

There is a national proverb which says that course bread, tea, and cabbage-soup are the three best friends of the nation, and this probably still holds good in very many country districts; yet, in spite of pinching poverty and wretched fare, the people have a hardy look, and are capable of great endurance.

On the banks of the river Neva, near Schlusselberg, are peasant villages, consisting of long lines of wooden cottages, weather-worn and guiltless of paint. The dwellers are agriculturalists mainly although some are engaged in lumbering in the extensive forests. Their wives — whose lot is probably even harder than that of the men—cook at home, and, in the season, work afield as well.

Buddhist Priests.

This is a scene frequently to be met with in Japan, the priests abounding. But the missionary movement is making great strides, though owing to the opposition and suspicion of the official class, it is very difficult to make headway.

BUDDHIST PRIESTS BEGGING IN KIOTO, JAPAN.

Raisin Farm.

On the opposite page we show a raisin farm, and the group of men in the photograph are engaged in drying the fruit, which, after being exposed in the sun for a sufficient time, will be pressed, boxed, and sent to market.

Many of the fruit farms of Southern California are model establishments. There are the great white-walled dwellings, the spacious barn and stables, the neatly set-out orchards or vineries, and the acres on acres of small fruits, all as prettily kept as could be imagined. There is no slovenliness, no land going to waste within the farm boundaries, and no lack of scientific methods to produce the best results.

Digitized by Google

JAPANESE MEMORIAL TEMPLE.

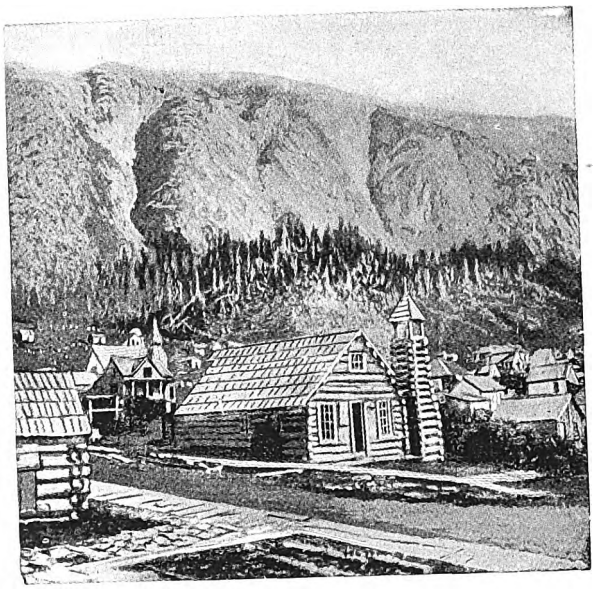
ON A RAISIN FARM, S CALIFORNIA.

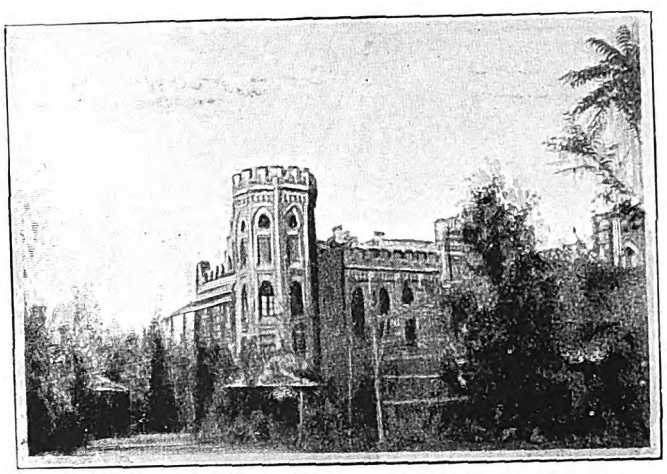
Digitized by Google



A PIONEER CHURCH AT SEAGWAY, ALASKA.

Pioneer Log Church.

We give here a picture of a typical pioneer log church, as built in Alaska. In the Cape Norme district there is a mad rush for gold, and to get there many appalling hardships must be braved, and even the very fringe of civilization left very far behind. Among the miners worship is practically abandoned, and it is very much further south than Cape Norme that the particular church in our photograph is to be seen. The service that is rendered by such a church in keeping alive the spiritual life that otherwise would die in those neglected districts is as valuable as it is difficult.



THE TOWN HALL, TIENTSIN.

Digitized by Google

A Scientific . . . . Discourse.

FOR

THOUGHTFUL MINDS.

A RECORD OF FACTS,
PRINCIPLES, AND DISCOVERIES.

Free (or unoxidised) Phosphorus in its relation to the Improvement and Preservation of Human Life on Earth.

"THAT our medical men of every school, our greatest chemists, physiologists, philosophers, and men of science generally; as well as the inventors of, and those who deal in and adopt the numberless methods and preparations which are advertised in all directions and in every conceivable manner for the cure of the "Ills that flesh is heir to," suffer almost as greatly, and decay and die as quickly as the least educated in society, is matter of positive fact as well as of regret; and although it may be conceded that much good has been done by every system which has yet been proposed, there is certainly still a deficiency; still humanity suffers; and it is painfully evident that something more is urgently wanted—something more simple, more decided in its action, less of the character of ordinary physic or medicine, and more of the nature of a preserving and protecting aliment. This important desideratum medical science has, so far, failed to supply."

"Let us hope that the preparation now described is the beginning of a series of improvements in the right direction and of victories over the natural world."

These were the words of the late Dr. Samuel Birley, M.D., when introducing to the world, a few years ago, the results of his investigations, which had been the outcome of a lifetime's work and study.

What the medical world of to-day is beginning to recognise, he had many years ago satisfied himself upon: namely, the supreme control which the nervous system exercises, not only over the main functions, but over the most minute and apparently insignificant processes taking place in the body.

Dr. Birley's great rule is, therefore:—"Look after the nervous system; keep it well-nourished, and in perfect working order, and disease will little affect us."

Dr. Birley devoted many years to the discovery of some remedy that would fulfil the above indications. He carefully analysed the brains of persons who had died from various diseases, as well as of those who had been killed by accident whilst in the full vigour of health. He was struck by the deficiency of Phosphorus found in the brain matter of the weak and ailing, compared to what normally existed in the strong and healthy. From this fact the suggestion naturally arose that perhaps the loss of phosphorus had much to do with the weakened nerve force, and that its artificial administration might help to give back what had been lost. Such a thought was no less that prophetic, but simple as it appeared to be in this early stage of the investigation, it was found impossible to carry it out with any satisfactory result, for the following reason:—

Ordinary phosphorus, as understood by the chemist, cannot, by any known method, be made to be PERFECTLY SOLUBLE in the blood. It may be finely powdered and given in pills, etc., or dissolved in oil, alcohol, ether or chloroform, but in all these forms it is precipitated into a fine dust immediately on mixing with the juices of the stomach.

Many of these particles do not pass into the blood at all, but of those that do, they are completely stopped when they arrive at the liver, through which organ everything passes from the stomach before entering the general circulation. Hence Phosphorus administered in this form cannot possibly reach the nervous system, and cannot therefore aid in its restoration.

Knowing these facts, and convinced of the necessity of phosphorus as a Food, rather than a medicine, for the Brain and Nervous System, Dr. Birley experimented in many ways for the purpose of discovering a means of preparing it so that it would be free from these drawbacks.

His aim was to find out a form which would not precipitate in this manner, but remain in perfect solution throughout the system.

In the end he was rewarded by the discovery of a new process of preparation (by distillation) which rendered it, when taken by the mouth, absolutely soluble in the blood, and was perfectly satisfactory in its effects in every way. It could pass through the liver in a fluid state and thus reach the nerve tissues, which alone were in need of it.

No better proof of the value of this new form of phosphorus could be required than the very severe tests to which Dr. Birley put his invention. That it really does pass into the circulation, and enter into the composition of the Brain and Nervous System cannot be better discussed than in the inventor's own words:—

"The question has often been put to us—What proof have you that your PHOSPHORUS, when taken into the stomach, actually reaches and combines with the substance of the brain?

As it is truth only, and not opinion or hypothesis that we care for, our answer must be perfectly candid, and such only as practical investigation permits us to give. Because we cannot, or rather have no opportunity to, analyse the living human brain, before a course of PHOSPHORUS has been entered upon, we

Digitized by Google

admit that the evidence is not direct and positive. We are obliged to depend upon implication and analogy. The following items, however, force the conclusion we have maintained upon us :—

1ST.—PHOSPHORUS is a constant element of the brain and nervous system of all animals.

2ND.—The amount of PHOSPHORUS is different in persons of different mental and physical powers.

3RD.—In the brain and nerve-matter of those who have during life been characterised by great powers of mind and body and who have been in the prime of health suddenly killed in battle, or accident, or by other violence, a much larger amount of PHOSPHORUS has been discovered than is ever found is the brain-matter of ordinary persons who have been killed in a similar manner.

4TH.—The brain-matter of idiots contains the least amount of PHOSPHORUS. A little more PHOSPHORUS is found in that of persons not completely imbecile, but physically and mentally weak, languid in action, deficient in pluck and energy, full of apprehension, weak in memory and in application of thought and purpose, who hesitate in their resolves, and shrink from the general bustle of commercial life. The same may be said of persons who are fretful, low-spirited, anxious, fidgety, and odd-tempered, and of the positively ill-tempered and disagreeable.

5TH.—Persons who in early life have enjoyed a fair amount of mental and physical power, but who have suffered many years from great anxiety and sorrow consequent upon family bereavement and other losses and trials, have been found after death to have lost a great portion of the PHOSPHORUS which is common in the brain of similar persons who have not suffered in the same way.

The same may be affirmed of those who, beginning life with a good constitution, have excessively indulged in alcoholic preparations. Alcohol has the property of dissolving and carrying away the PHOSPHORUS of the brain and nervous system. We have personally known and carefully watched the career of many who in the "prime of life" were brilliant, energetic, first-class men of business, full of dash and assurance, carrying all before them, and succeeding in almost every undertaking. We have observed some of these to gradually wane in their mental and physical powers; little by little to have become anxious and apprehensive; matters which once were trifles, unworthy of attention, have seemed to be of great consequence; enterprise and speculation have become less and less; a fear of losing or failing has gradually crept in, until a general tameness and insipidity have been observed. A few years longer, and the once bright, confident, venturesome business man has dwindled to an eccentric, nervous, despondent, and miserable human remnant, incapable of concentrating his powers, vacillating, absent-minded, forgetful, and almost heedless of the world or its pleasures. Deafness, failing sight, impaired susceptibility, necroencephalus (softening of the brain) and general inanition, have gradually terminated in death. In some cases we have been enabled to procure the brain and a portion of the spinal cord, and have found by analysis that the PHOSPHORUS has been greatly deficient and much less than has been found in the brain-matter of persons who had the same vigorous character during early life, but who have died suddenly by violence in the midst of their career, and when all their powers of mind and body were most intense. In several instances different parts of the brain have been found to contain different proportions of PHOSPHORUS.

Striking as are the foregoing examples, and forcible as they are in the way of evidence, they are not in themselves sufficient. We require a synthetical process before we can form a satisfactory conclusion.

We have treated with PHOSPHORUS cases of every class. We have seen the prematurely old, the worn and exhausted, the nervous and miserable of every position in life, gradually restored to a most vigorous and perfectly healthy state. From a lean and cadaverous condition they have become full in flesh, the countenance clear and ruddy, the eyes bright, sight improved, deafness overcome, the hair become abundant, the step and gait again elastic and determined, the spirits high and generous, the temper cheerful, the love of song and harmony returned, the brain again active, perception quick, memory tenacious, and the whole system and character changed from the most pitiable condition to the highest state of existence.

In several instances the stir and excitement of mercantile life have created a longing to return to business. Some have done so, and are now as keen and successful as at any former period.

If then in all cases of mental and physical debility where we have been able to analyse the brain after death, we have found a deficiency of PHOSPHORUS. and if in precisely similar cases during life we have administered PHOSPHORUS, and found such conditions pass away, what other conclusion is it possible to arrive at than that this new form of Phosphorus gradually assimilates with the brain and nervous system, and brings up the depressed and wasted constitution to the normal standard?

The preparation which has repeatedly produced such results as those above described, we have called 'Plain' Syrup of Free Phosphorus, because it is the simple solution formed by distillation, combined with sugar and without the admixture of any other substance or medicament."

Free Phosphorus in combination with other Medicaments.

The Phosphorus prepared as above described permits of our taking advantage of the well-known principle in medical science, that different articles of the materia medica have the property of acting specially on different organs of the body. These various properties are very valuable in cases of special diseased action, and we are able to take advantage of them in using the syrup of phosphorus here described. It will combine with many remedial agents, and thus the power of the phosphorus may be determined to different organs of the body as local conditions may require.

Where the heart is weak, and the whole muscular system flabby and greatly debilitated, in addition to great nervous debility and exhaustion, the best combination is that of protoxide of iron with the "Plain," and which we have named the "Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus."

In the course of many years' private practice Dr. Birley was enabled to considerably modify and perfect a number of combinations of his Phosphorus in addition to the "Ironised" above named. For debility of the muscular and general system in LADIES particularly; when "Below Par," and suffering from poorness of blood and lack of colour, a special preparation called the "Sub-Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus" has been found to be wonderfully successful.

Hence the fifteen standard kinds enumerated in the adjoined list have been formulated and have earned a unique reputation for the complaints named therein.

Digitized by Google

DETAILED LIST.

The result of over Half a Century's Experience. All have been proved in a Large Private Practice before being offered to the public.

PLAIN. SYRUP OF FREE PHOSPHORUS. A Vitalising food for all Brain and Nervous Affections from whatever cause—worry, late hours, overwork, &c.; and for Hysteria, Vitus' Dance, Headache, &c., &c. A sustaining and life-giving element. The basis of all Dr. Birley's Preparations. Of especial value to Professional Men, Clergymen, Solicitors, Barristers, Literary Men, Schoolmasters, and all engaged in mental occupations 4/6

IRONISED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Muscular Debility, Heart Disease, Paralysis, Rupture, Sciatica, Lumbago, Scrofula, Obesity, Dropsy, and General Debility. Of great value also as a restorative after an attack of "influenza" .. 4/6

SUB-IRONISED. Especially prepared for Ladies and Delicate Persons suffering from the above, instead of the "Ironised." And for Bright's Disease, Mumps, Varicose Veins, and when "Below Par" 4/6

MAGNESIAN. SPECIAL REMEDY for Pulmonary and other forms of Consumption 4/6

BRONCHIAL. SPECIAL REMEDY for Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Quinsy, Congestion of the Lungs, Diphtheria, and Throat Affections generally 4/6

GASTRIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Indigestion and Liver Complaints 4/6

ANTI-RHEUMATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for every form of Rheumatism and Gout. (In some cases the Ironised or Sub-Ironised will aid the action of this preparation when taken on alternate days with it) .. 4/6

ANTI-STIPATIO. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Constipation, Flatulence, Piles, Spasms, Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, &c. 4/6

ACIDIFIED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak, Fading, and Falling Off of Hair, and for Actual Baldness (internal use only) 4/6

VIRILITIC. Prepared for men suffering from Nervous Debility and Loss of Vitality 4/6

TOMATINED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak and Partial Loss of Sight, Deafness, Defective Taste or Smell 4/6

ANTI-NEURALGIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Neuralgia, Pleurisy and Erysipelas .. 4/6

CUTANEOUS. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Skin Diseases, Eczema, Psoriasis, &c. 4/6

The 4/6 Bottles contain between 70 and 80 Doses and are sufficient for nearly ONE MONTH'S USE

A SPECIAL OFFER.

We have the fullest confidence that where we can introduce these medicines into a household we are assured of a firm footing, and of recourse to them on all future occasions of illness or indisposition.

This coupon entitles you to a 4/6 Trial Bottle of any one kind of Dr. Birley's Phosphorus Compounds at 2/6; but if forwarded by parcel post, 4d. per bottle extra must be enclosed to cover cost of carriage within the United Kingdom. We guarantee safe delivery. Should a Trial Bottle also be required for a friend or relative, we will extend the offer to them if ordered at the same time.

Orders may be sent with the Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these Trial Bottle Coupons, and if we are not the money will be returned,

For Residents abroad the date will be extended sufficiently to allow of ordering. Postage of 1/4 per bottle is required for abroad.

COUPON.

4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/6

Or by Parcel Post 4d. extra—viz.: 2/10

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Available until Sept. 30th, 1902.

The above Coupon to be cut out and sent with order. These Trial Bottles can be had direct only from the

Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers:

GORDON, MURRAY, & Co., Ltd.,

10, ADAM ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

STRONGLY RECOMMENDED.

Among some hundreds of others we may mention the following Reverend Gentlemen, who have proved the value of the medicine, and from whom we hold some excellent reports:

REV. C. H. SPURGEON, London, S.E.
REV. DR. COCKREM, London Orphan Asylum, Watford.
REV. W. T. CRANFIELD, Stoke.
REV. R. FLETCHER, Hull.
REV. J. JAMES, Abercanaid.
REV. J. W. MORRIS, Gly Neath.
REV. C. EARLE, Langford.
REV. F. CLEMENTS, Hanham, Bristol.
REV. GABRIEL MOLLAN, Clonmetham.
REV. E. I. DEVENISH, Teignmouth.
REV. G. COOK, Church Gresley.
REV. G. DALE COPELAND, Pudsey.
REV. A. A. BROOKS, Wigan.
REV. A. E. REALFF, Leicester.
REV. F. JONES, Malton.
REV. W. BARTON, Hull.
REV. G. HOMEYER, Claycross.
REV. J. B. GRATTON, Leominster.
REV. W. FRY, Blandford.
REV. J. D. WOODHALL, Bolton.
REV. R. FRAME, Birkenhead.

THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN AGE" says:—"Doubtless the 'Christian Age' enters many a home where there is some weakly one whose feeble health makes existence a burden, or perhaps it is a disease considered incurable which is wasting away life. Wherever there is such a case, we sincerely wish one of Dr. Birley's Preparations of Phosphorus might have a fair trial. These preparations are the result of scientific studies and experiments extending over many years, and the success which has already attended their use has been almost marvellous. We have seen hundreds of letters (not copies, but the original documents), some from persons well known to us, all testifying to the curative effects of one or other of these preparations. And more than this, we know of cases in which they have been the means of restoring to health when to all appearance recovery was almost impossible."

EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."—"Our readers know quite well how careful we are not to recommend anything but what is thoroughly trustworthy, but so many voluntary testimonials of unmistakable genuineness are before us that it is simply impossible to question the efficacy of the Medicines to which we are calling attention; hundreds of letters from all classes of people, including titled nobility, clergymen, physicians, &c., among which we notice several well-known names, all bearing remarkable testimony to the benefits derived from them."

EDITOR OF THE "FAMILY DOCTOR."—"One Thousand Original Letters of Testimony have been submitted to us by the Proprietors of Dr. Birley's Preparations."

Digitized by Google

See Special Offer at foot to all Readers of this Paper.

DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS

GUARANTEED
PERFECTLY HARMLESS

(Medical Certificate accompanies each box.)

THESE Wafers have long been known to possess the "wizard's touch" in producing, preserving, and enhancing beauty of person in male or female, by surely developing a transparency and pellucid clearness of complexion, brilliant eyes, soft and smooth skin, where by Nature the reverse exists.

The great difficulty hitherto has been how to make this beautifying principle safely available, and at the same time avoid what is detrimental and injurious. Dr. Mackenzie's Wafers are prepared expressly as a "Beautifier of the Complexion and Skin," and are guaranteed harmless. In the direction for which they are intended their action and effect is simply magical, the most astonishing transformations in personal appearance being brought about by their steady use. Even the coarsest and most repulsive skin and complexions, marred by freckles and other disfigurements, slowly change into an unrivalled purity and texture, free from any spot or blemish whatever, the pinched features become agreeable, the form, before angular, gradually transforms itself into the perfection of womanly grace and beauty. Used by men, the favourable result is the same. In the Complexion Wafers as prepared by the undersigned all danger is averted, and the remedy, taken in the manner directed on each box, is absolutely innocuous, while the peculiar virtues of the remedy remain unimpaired and intact. Powders, enamels, so called "blood purifiers," &c., &c., are a delusion and a snare. From the use of these Wafers FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, VULGAR REDNESS, ROUGH, YELLOW, or "MUDDY" SKINS, and other facial disfigurements are permanently removed, and a deliciously CLEAR COMPLEXION is assured

Wonderful TESTIMONY to their efficacy:

59, BEAUMONT SQUARE, MILE END, LONDON.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. The others have done me a great deal of good."
H. MASON.

31, EVINGTON ROAD, LEICESTER.—"Please send me a box of Wafers. I have derived great benefit from the others I have taken."
Yours truly, M. F. WARD.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Dear Sir; I find your Soap so good, I now want you to send me three cakes of it, also a box of Complexion Wafers."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. I am much pleased by the effects produced by the first."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

MELBECKS, KIRKBY STEPHEN, WESTMORELAND.—"Kindly send me another box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers. The last has worked wonders."
SARAH G. PAGAN.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF THE "TEMPLE MAGAZINE."

T.M.

COUPON

SEPT. 1ST, 1902.

A 4/6 TRIAL BOX FOR 2/-

Any reader sending this Coupon and Postal Order or Stamps for Two Shillings will receive immediately a 4/6 Trial Box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers, this great reduction being made to induce our readers to give this wonderful preparation a fair trial, as we know one trial will convince all of their unique merits. This coupon must be sent in within 10 days of this date. Address all orders to

S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., London Bridge.

Digitized by Google

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

CALL OR WRITE.

Design No. 1262.

Design No. 1262. 10 6.

The Fashionable Three-quarter Sacque Jacket for Autumn and Winter wear, direct at first cost from the "Alfosco" Factories. This marvellous Jacket is produced in several excellent cloths, Black or Grey Vienna and Frieze, also in pretty Grey Tweeds, and in Black, Fawn or Brown Beaver. Write at once for patterns. The Jacket is cut with the full sacque back and trimmed with tailor stitching and pearl buttons, smart cuffs and lapels. Price, 30 inches long, 10/6; 33 inches long, 11/6, 36 inches long, 12/6; 39 inches long, 13/6; or 42 inches long, 14/6; carriage 6d. extra.

This Jacket can be ordered single breasted if preferred. Send bust measurement under arms and length required.

8/6

Design No. 1055, Ladies' Silk Shirt, trimmed narrow tucks. A leading line for 8/6; carriage 3d.
COLOURS: Helio, Sky, Pink, and Black.

3/11½

Design No. 877. 3/11½. Moreen Underskirt. Special value for 3/11½; carriage, 3d.
COLOURS: Blue, helio, red, pink, and black. Other leading lines at 2/11½ and 4/11. Send for one.

Write for new Sketch Book and Catalogue of Bargains containing Hundreds of Illustrations of Latest Novelties for the Autumn and Winter Seasons. Sent with Patterns, Post Free. Call or Write.

8/6

DESIGN No. 602.

CALL OR WRITE.

Design No. 602. 14/11.
Stylish Chesterfield Coat & Skirt, lined throughout, made in the world-renowned Specialite Serge or Vicuna Cloth. Colours: Navy, Royal, Fawn, Brown, Green, Oxford, Grey Light or Dark Grey, Purple, Black, etc. Well-made Skirt with graduated flounce. Coat trimmed tailor-stitching. Price only 14/11; carriage, 6d. This costume in any of the lovely shades of the "Coronate" Cloth, only 25/6. In Allen Foster & Co.'s Zibeline Cloth, only 27/6. Patterns post free.

3/11½

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S SHOW ROOMS, At 47, Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C. Are open daily from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Saturdays until 1 o'clock. Ladies are invited to call and inspect their goods.

A SPECIAL LINE OF ALPACA SKIRTS In all Colours. COSTUME SKIRTS, 6/6, 7/11, and 9/11 each. Carriage, 5d.

VALUE FOR MONEY.

DESIGN No. 934, 8/11

Design No. 949. 6/6.
Fashionable Costume Skirt. Made in Vicuna Cloth or in the world-renowned Specialite Serge, two sterling cloths, unsurpassed for durability and wear. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Fawn, Light and Dark Grey, Royal Blue Grey, Cardinal, Green, Purple, etc. This Skirt has the new graduated flounce, which is lined with good linenette. Price only 6/6; carriage, 5d. extra. All sizes in stock. Money returned if not approved.

Design No. 934. 8/11.
Superior Costume Skirt, with three shaped frills, graduated at back. Each frill is trimmed with braid. There are three additional rows of braid at top of frills. Made in all shades of A. F. & Co.'s Vicuna Cloth or Specialite Serge. A Great Bargain for 8/11; sent carriage paid, 5d. extra. This Skirt can be ordered in the new "Coronate" Cloth, trimmed glace silk in place of braid. Price, 15/11; carriage, 5d.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,

47, GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Sweet and Sustaining.

A sweetmeat that is also nourishing and sustaining is a welcome and valuable novelty. Many persons, whether young or old, find at times that they cannot take nourishment in the forms and shapes in which it is usually offered to them. The difficulty is solved by

MELLIN'S CHOCOLATE.

A new delicious article, containing all the valuable elements of chocolate; and, in addition, rich in nutriment.

Sold Everywhere, in 6d. Packets only.

MELLIN'S FOOD WORKS, PECKHAM, LONDON, S.E.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS, AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand. 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System.—Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. (Removing shortly to 74, Southampton Row) PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO, 40 & 42, Southampton Row, London W.C. (Removing shortly to 74, Southampton Row.)

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. Thompson & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.
London: Printed and Published for the Proprietors at 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

Vol. 6. OCTOBER, 1902. No 13.

Price Sixpence.

Digitized by Google

TO THE DEAF

If you suffer from deafness or head noises, and desire a complete and permanent cure, write at once to Professor G. Keith-Harvey, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C., for pamphlet fully describing an entirely new self-applied method, which he will send you gratis and post free on mentioning "Temple Magazine."

READ THE FOLLOWING WONDERFUL TESTIMONY:

"My hearing is now perfect."

"I am pleased to say that since using your remedies my hearing is now perfect, and I shall be glad to recommend your marvellous Treatment to anyone suffering from deafness, &c."—Yours truly, A. W. WRIGHT, 26, Charles Street, Maidstone.

"My hearing is as perfect as ever it was."

"I am pleased to inform you that since using your 'Aural Battery' my hearing is as perfect as ever it was. The noises in my head have almost entirely disappeared, and I also feel a great deal better in my general health. You are quite welcome to make use of these few words in any way you think fit."—Wishing you every success, Yours faithfully, THOMAS COFFEY, 1, Sudley Road, Aigburth, Liverpool.

"I can now hear anything that is said to me."

"I am very pleased to say that since using your remedies I can hear very much better. I can now hear anything that is said to me, and the noises in the head are also quite gone. I shall always be very pleased to recommend your Treatment to others, as it has done me such a lot of good."—Yours truly, (Miss) ELLEN WEBSTER, 44, Carpenter's Road, Stratford.

"I can now hear perfectly."

"I am very glad to say that after using your remedies I can now hear perfectly, and even if I catch cold it does not affect my hearing. I consider your remedies are excellent, and I shall recommend them at any time."—Yours truly, H. MUTIMER, 151, Otley Rd., Framsden, Suffolk.

"My hearing is completely restored."

"I am very pleased to say that after using your 'Aural Battery' the noises in the head have passed away, and my hearing is also completely restored. You may mention my name in any way you please."—Yours faithfully, FREDERICK BARKER, Etwall, near Derby.

Prof. G. KEITH-HARVEY, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

BOOK EXCHANGE 11 10 1902 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

Hovis Food

Trade Mark

for BABIES and INVALIDS (in Two Strengths).

The LANCET says, "by the addition of them (Hovis Foods) to diluted cow's milk a milk is obtained presenting the same composition as human milk."

No. 1 is a COMPLETE DIET for Babies up to weaning and No. 2 for after then. No. 2 is also of exceptional value in the sick room and for the aged.

In 1s. 1d. and 1s. 9½d. bottles from Hovis Bakers, Chemists, Grocers and Stores. Further information from HOVIS LTD., Macclesfield.

THE KING AT HIS CORONATION TAKES THE FOLLOWING OATH:

Act for Establishing the Coronation Oath, 1688-9, 1 W. & M. c. vi.

Archbishop or Bishop—

"Will you to the utmost of your power maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant Reformed Religion Established by Law? . . . And will you preserve unto the Bishops and Clergy of England and Ireland, and to the Churches there committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain to them or any of them?"

King—

"All this I promise to do."

After this the King, laying his hand upon the Holy Gospel, shall say—

"The things which I have here before promised, I will perform and keep. So help me God."

[The above Act requires that this Oath shall be administered to every King or Queen who shall succeed to the Imperial Crown.]

THE PROTESTANT REFORMATION SOCIETY

ESTAB.] [1827.

Is the Oldest Society of the Kind in the Empire.

Its Principal Objects are—

1. To Maintain the Scriptural Principles of the Reformation.
2. To Evangelize Roman Catholics in England.

Readers of THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE should write for two booklets, entitled—

"A NATION'S DANGER AND A NATION'S DUTY,"
"ENGLAND'S SHIELD,"

which will be sent POST FREE to applicants.

SUBSCRIPTIONS & DONATIONS for the Support and Extension of this Work are urgently needed, and will be thankfully received by

WALTER A. LIMBRICK, Secretary,
62, Berners Street, London, W.

28 YEARS' SUCCESS.

THE

UNIVERSAL REMEDY FOR

Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Influenza, Whooping-Cough, Hoarseness, &c.

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

IMPORTANT NOTICE:

SUBSTITUTION — There are so many imitations of this successful, and therefore popular, remedy that it is of the utmost importance you should use the word "OWBRIDGE" when buying Lung Tonic, and TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

Sold everywhere in bottles at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s 6d., & 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

FOR HOME USE AND WHEN TRAVELLING.

Insist on having HARTMANN'S

ARTMANN'S HYGIENIC

(Antiseptic and Absorbent)

Superior to any Sanitary Towel.

TOWELETTES

Obtainable at less than the cost of washing, from all Ladies' Outfitters, Drapers, Stores, and Chemists, in 6d. packets (one doz.); 1/- (6d. per half-doz.); 1/4, and 2/- per doz. A Useful Booklet, "Advice on Accouchement and the Management of Babies," will be sent post free on application. Address—

THE MANAGERESS, HARTMANN'S DEPOT, 26, Thavies Inn, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

AFRICAN INSTITUTE, COLWYN BAY, NORTH WALES.

The purpose of this Institute is to give evangelical and industrial training to the most promising of the African converts in this country, and to establish similar institutions in Africa, thus sending forth to their own land self-supporting missionaries, to work with their own hands and preach the Gospel in their own tongues. This institution seems to be more in harmony with the feelings and aspirations of the Africans than any other missionary work. The educated natives—including Sir Samuel Lewis, the first African to be knighted by our late Queen—of the English colonies along the West Coast, and also those of South Africa, take the deepest interest in the work. They have formed local committees in various places, thus bringing the African Institute into touch with 3,000 miles of the West Coast, and there is already quite a number in South Africa working for the Institute.

An earnest appeal is made to all Christian friends to support this charitable work.

Objects:

(1) To complete Printing and Tailoring Departments (which will ultimately pay for themselves) for the thorough instruction of Students in these useful Trades.

(2) To assist for a few years industrial native Missionary efforts in the Gold Coast, Yorubaland, New Calabar, Liberia, etc., until they become self-supporting.

(3) To develop the Girls' Institute at Colwyn Bay.

(4) To provide for the scores of applicants who continually seek admission into the Boys' Institute.

(5) To pay for the freehold property including present Institute buildings and land.

(6) To publish 3,000 more copies of a Dualla Hymn Book for the native Christians at Cameroons; 2,000 have already been sent out.

All contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Director, W. HUGHES, African Institute, Colwyn Bay, North Wales.

Every Woman

is interested and should know about the wonderful

Marvel Whirling Spray

Ask your Chemist for it. If he cannot supply the Marvel accept no other, but send stamp for pamphlet giving full particulars and price, etc. MARVEL CO., Dept. 102, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.

PHOSFERINE

The Greatest of all Tonics.

ASHTON & PARSONS, Ltd., LONDON, ENGLAND.

OLD FALSE TEETH BOUGHT.

Many ladies and gentlemen have by them old or disused false teeth, which might as well be turned into money. Messrs. B. D. & J. B. Fraser, Ltd., of Princes St., Ipswich (estab. 1833) buy old false teeth. If you send your teeth to them they will remit you by return of post the utmost value; or, if preferred, they will make you the best offer, and hold the teeth over for your reply. If reference necessary, apply to Messrs Bacon & Co., Bankers, Ipswich.

THE THREE GREAT SCOURGES,

ALCOHOL, MORPHINE, COCAINE.

The Hutton-Dixon Vegetable Antidote,

A HIGH-CLASS, UP-TO-DATE PHYSICAL HOME CURE FOR

ALCOHOL AND DRUG ADDICTIONS.

WARRANTED FREE FROM NARCOTICS.

Patronised by the Nobility and All Classes.

This humane discovery has been publicly endorsed before the Congress of Bishops, and at Father Mathew's Anniversaries, also by Clergymen from their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in nearly every quarter of the Globe. Over Six Thousand Cases have been treated successfully.

In this treatment there are no hypodermic injections, it being a purely vegetable medicine taken by the mouth, can be carried in the pocket, and taken in perfect privacy at home or anywhere. In from one to three days, and often in as many hours, after commencing this treatment, the desire or crave will have so completely disappeared that the victim would not give a penny for all the liquor or drugs in the country for his own use. It is an absolutely harmless home treatment, and an up-to-date physical cure, backed by and vouched for by testimonials unapproached by any other treatment for these habits.

Full particulars and indisputable testimony sent free in a plain sealed envelope.
All correspondence strictly confidential.

Address:—ALEX. H. DIXON, 37, Silverdale, SYDENHAM, LONDON, S.E.

Digitized by Google

KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO

KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

SEE SPECIAL OFFER AT FOOT OF PAGE.

KOKO

FOR THE HAIR

That KOKO is the best preparation for the Hair known is proved by the facts that it is used in every Palace in Europe, and that Royal personages never use a preparation of any kind unless it is recommended by the highest authority.

Photo from Life. The original, with other fine heads of hair, may be seen at 113, Regent Street, London, W.

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

is a tonic, cleansing, invigorating preparation, causes the hair to grow luxuriantly, keeps it soft and pliant, imparts to it the lustre and freshness of youth, eradicates dandruff, prevents hair from falling, is the most cleanly of all hair preparations, and is perfectly harmless.

OLD PEOPLE LIKE IT

for its wonderful power to invigorate decayed hair, and induce an entire new growth when that is possible.

MIDDLE-AGED PEOPLE LIKE IT,

because it prevents them from getting bald, keeps dandruff away, and makes the hair grow thick and strong.

YOUNG LADIES LIKE IT

as a dressing, because it gives the hair a beautiful glossy lustre, ensures a luxuriant growth, and enables them to dress it and keep it in any style that may be desired.

CHILDREN LIKE IT, because it keeps the hair and scalp cool and clean, allays irritation, and keeps the hair in whatever position desired.

THEY ALL LIKE IT,

because it is as pure as crystal, perfectly colourless, contains no poisonous substance, no sugar of lead, sulphur, nitrate of silver, or grease, and does not soil or colour the scalp, face, or the most delicate fabric in clothing, produces a wonderfully pleasant and cooling effect on the head, and no other dressing is needed to give the hair the most beautiful appearance possible. Try it at once, and you will use no other.

IT CONTAINS NO COLOURING MATTER OR DYE.

SPECIAL OFFER to those who have not yet tried KOKO.

A 4/6 Trial Bottle for 1/6.

Any person forwarding this Coupon and P.O. for One Shilling and Sixpence, and 4 stamps to pay postage, packing, &c., will receive immediately for trial, by Parcel Post under cover, prepaid, One Regular 12-oz. Bottle of KOKO for the Hair, the price of which is 4/6, provided it is ordered within ten days from the date of this offer. In no case will more than one bottle be sent for the use of the same person on this Coupon, as we make the offer solely for trial, knowing that it creates a demand when once used; and this large bottle gives it a fair trial. We find it better to thus practically give away one bottle to make a customer than to spend large amounts in advertising. Any person into whose hands this offer comes may avail themselves of it. Address all orders with Coupons to—

The KOKO-MARICOPAS CO., Ltd., 16, Bevis Marks, London.

Orders may be sent with this Coupon after the expiration of date, providing we are then issuing these trial bottle Coupons, and if we are not, the money will be returned. This Coupon will be received at 16, BEVIS MARKS, E.C., or 113, Regent Street, W., and 2/- only will be required when presented personally.

T.M. COUPON Oct. 1/02

This entitles the holder to a 4/6 Bottle on the Conditions stated above.

Koko Maricopas Co Limited

KOKO is sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., at 2/6 and 4/6 per bottle. For the sake of greater profit, you may be asked to buy some other hair preparation instead. In justice to yourself and to us, kindly insist on having KOKO.

KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO

KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO KOKO

Digitized by Google

A WONDERFUL INVENTION . .

for the

LAME.

As Supplied to the War Office for the Wounded from South Africa.

THE O'CONNOR EXTENSION CO.'S PATENT APPLIANCES

Enable those with Shortened Limbs and Weak Ankles to dispense with Unsightly Instruments, to Wear Ordinary Shoes, and to look like other people.

FLAT FOOT.

The New Patent . . Arch Support

CAN BE ADAPTED TO HELP ANY CASE OF FLAT FOOT.

A New book on the Mechanical Treatment of Flat Foot will be sent FREE.

TENDER FEET.

The New . . Patent Socks

CAN BE MOULDED TO FIT THE SOLE OF ANY FOOT.

Describe the case, send a pair of old boots or shoes and 5/- A pair of Socks will be sent POST FREE. (United Kingdom).

GOLD MEDAL, LONDON; HIGHEST AWARDS, CHICAGO AND PARIS.

ADDRESS:

The O'Connor Extension Co.,

SURGICAL APPLIANCE MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT,

2, BLOOMSBURY STREET,

LONDON, W.C.

PAMPHLETS FREE on mentioning The Temple Magazine. Please give particulars of the case.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER, 1902.

			PAGE
I.	Frontispiece
II.	Smuggling Yarns Re-told	Illustrated	1105
III.	Costumes of the Holy Land	Illustrated	1115
IV.	The White Lady of the Zenana. Illustrated by Fitzgerald.	Serial Story.	1119
V.	Outward Bound	Illustration	1130
VI.	Curious Places of Worship	Illustrated	1131
VII.	Love the Conqueror. Illustrated.	C. N. Barham	1135
VIII.	How the Gospel has Civilised the Red Man	Illustrated	1148
IX.	The Needle's Eye. Illustrated.	Florence M. Kingsley	1151
X.	The Most Beautiful Island in the World. Illustrated.	Rev. Ernest Walters	1163
XI.	In The Public Eye	Illustrated	1169
XII.	A Remarkable Dream	Illustrated	1170
XIII.	Amongst the Kurkus. Illustrated.	Rev. Eric Lewis	1176
XIV.	Interview with the Rev. G. Campbell-Morgan	Photo	1184
XV.	Random Rambles		1186
XVI.	Three Little Pitchers. Prize Story.	Illustrated	1190
XVII.	Editorial Announcements		1194

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. The Editor will be obliged if, before sending any manuscript, a letter is sent him describing the purport of the article or enclosing a precis of the story. They must be addressed to THE MANUSCRIPT EDITOR, "THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE," 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to THE MANAGER, 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. MATHER AND CROWTHER, BRIDEWELL PLACE, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s.

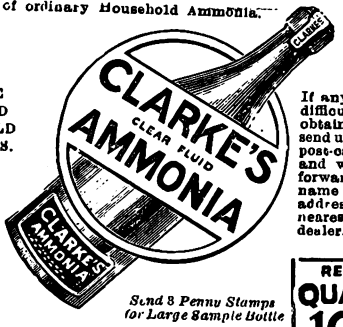
REP'D PINT 6d

HALF PRICE & DOUBLE STRENGTH of ordinary Household Ammonia.

Agents Everywhere.



FOR THE BATH AND HOUSEHOLD PURPOSES.

RETAINS ITS STRENGTH TO THE LAST DROP.

If any difficulty in obtaining, send us a post-card, and we will forward name and address of nearest dealer.

Send 8 Penny Stamps for Large Sample Bottle

REP'D QUART 10½d

CLARKE'S, 360, OLD KENT ROAD. S.E.

Makes the Skin as Soft as Velvet!

"BEETHAM'S Reg'd Larola"

will very soon remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, TAN, IRRITATION, &c., and render THE SKIN delicately SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE. Try a 6d. bottle. Its effect will delight you! Bottles 6d., 1/-, 2/6, of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

BEST IN 1894.

THE PALMER TYRE

BEST NOW.

The ONLY HIGH GRADE TYRE

NOW ON THE MARKET.

For Durability, Palmer Tyres stand alone.

FULLY GUARANTEED.

Write for Manual containing 11 Sectional Road Maps and 1 Key Map of the British Isles.

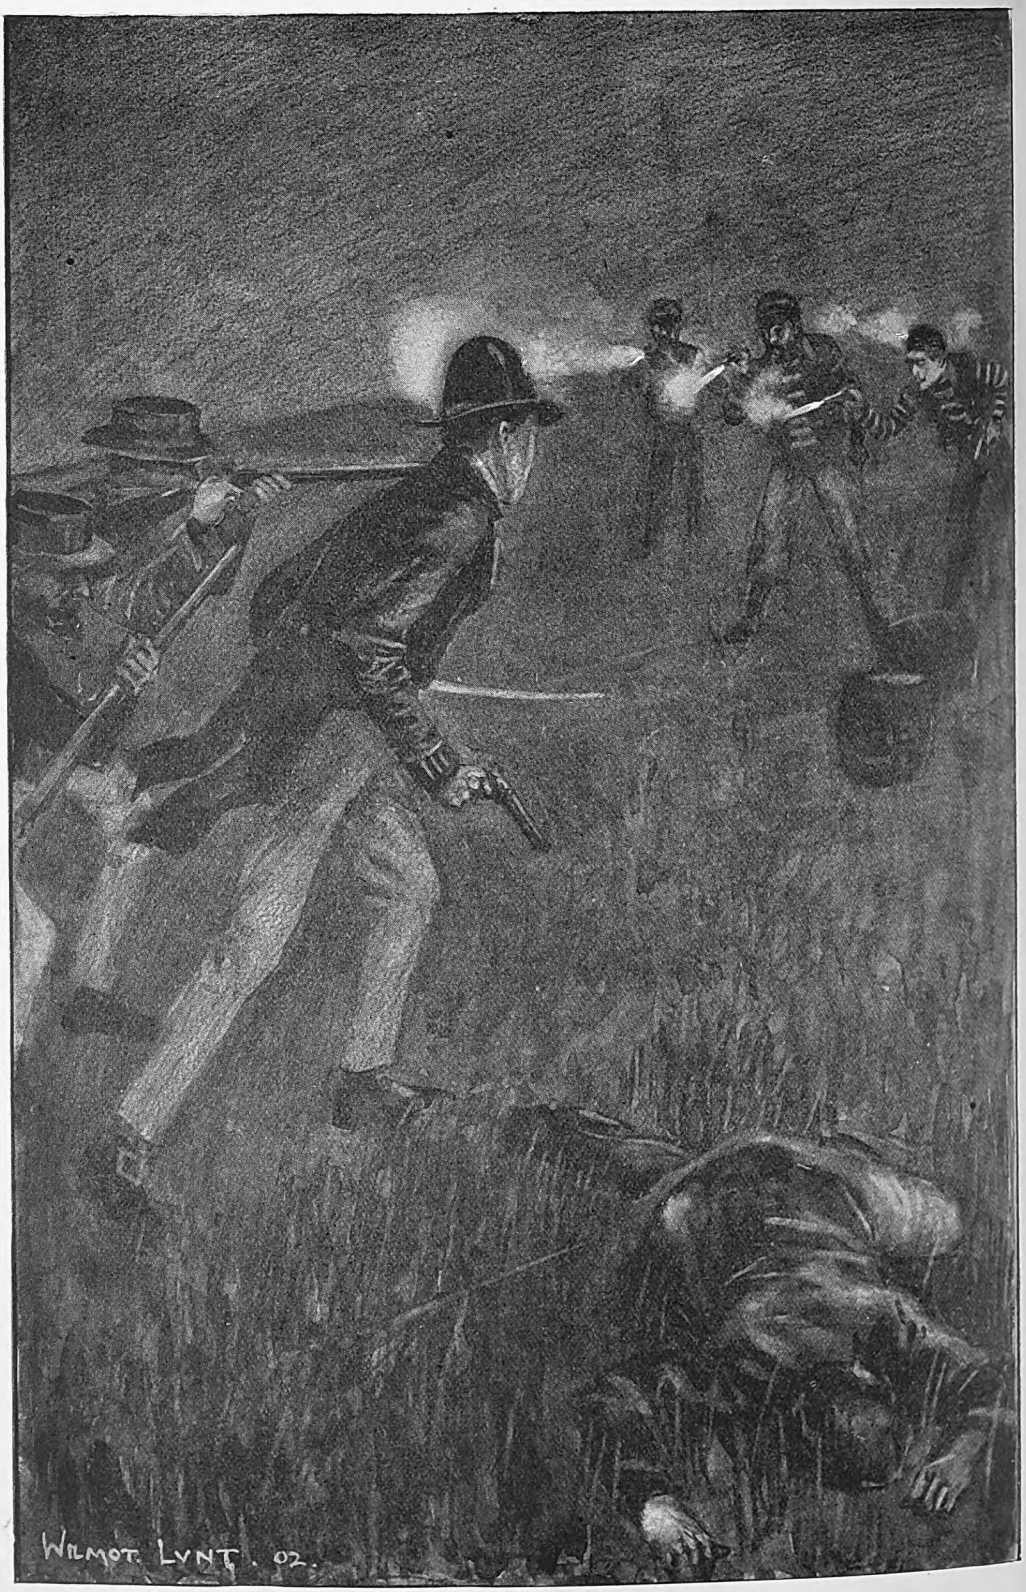
The PALMER TYRE, Ltd.,

Dept. T.M., BIRMINGHAM.

These Tyres are manufactured under license from the North British Rubber Co., Ltd., under Bartlett's Patent.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



"THEY FIRED A PISTOL VOLLEY."

Digitized by Google

These Stories, which are from the Journal of Lieutenant Warneford, R.N., are no mere fancy pictures of the high-souled, dashing smuggler, but comprise some of the exciting adventures of a preventive officer in the wild days of the early part of the present century, when smuggling was carried on with a boldness and daring now almost incredible.

THE BLUE-EYED MAID.

A COMPLETE STORY.

BEFORE proceeding with the narrative in the Revenue Service, it will be necessary for me to give a brief account of my earlier history.

I was born at Itchen, a village distant about a mile and a half from Southampton, where my father, Arthur Warneford, a retired Lieutenant of the Royal Navy, had settled many years—my sister Jane and myself being the only members of his numerous family who had survived their childhood. At the warrior-age of sixteen I was despatched to fight my country's battles—Sir Joseph Yorke having, at my father's request, kindly obtained a midshipman's warrant for me; and not very long after joining my ship I found myself, to my great astonishment, doubling the French line at the Nile—an exploit which I have since read of with far more satisfaction than I remember to have experienced during its performance.

Four years passed before I had an opportunity of re-visiting home; and it was with a beating as well as a joyful heart, and light, elastic step, that I set off to walk the distance from Gosport to Itchen. Jane welcomed me home with tears of love and happiness; but before long certain circumstances occurred which induced my worthy but peremptory father to cut my leave of absence suddenly and unmercifully short.

The inhabitants of my native place were for the most part Dibles or Diapers, and among the former was a certain Ellen Dible, the daughter of a fisherman somewhat more prosperous than many of his fellows. This young lady was a slim, active, blue-eyed, bright-haired gipsy, about three years younger than myself, but somewhat tall and womanly for her age, of a light, charming figure, and rather genteel manners. She was, it may be supposed, the belle of the place, and very numerous were her rustic admirers. But they all vanished in a twinkling, awe-struck by my uniform, and especially by the dangling dirk, which I occasionally handled in a very alarming manner; and I, sentimental moon-calf that I was, fell deeply and earnestly in love with the village beauty! It must have been her personal graces alone—her conversation it could not have been—which thus entranced me; for she seldom spoke, and then in reply only, and in monosyllables. But she listened divinely; and as we strolled in the evening through the fields and woods between Itchen and Netley Abbey, gazed with enchanting eloquence in my face as I poured forth the popular love and nonsense poetry of the time.

Digitized by Google

But one fine September evening my silly day-dreams were rudely dispelled. We were sitting in the churchyard at the summit of Pear-Tree Green, where, it used commonly to be said, Gray had composed his famous "Elegy." It was just the hour of "parting day." The sun-tipped spires of the Southampton churches faded gradually into indistinctness, and the earlier stars looked forth. The curfew, mellowed by distance into music, came to us upon the light air which gently stirred fair Ellen's glossy ringlets, as she, with her bonnet in her hand—for our walk had tired her—looked with her dove-innocent, transparent eyes in mine while I repeated Gray's melodious lines. The Elegy was just concluded, and I was rapturising even more vehemently than was my wont, when, whack! I received a blow on my shoulder, which sent us both off the rail on which we were sitting. I turned fiercely round, only to encounter the angry, sardonic countenance of my father.

"I'll have no more of this nonsense, Bob!" he gruffly exclaimed. "Be off home with you, and to-morrow I'll see you safe on board your ship, depend upon it. As for this pretty minx," he continued, addressing Ellen, who so trembled with confusion and dismay that she could scarcely tie her bonnet strings, "I should think she would be better employed in mending her father's shirts, or darning her brother's stockings, than in gossiping her time away with a brainless young lubber like you."

LIEUTENANT WARNEFORD, R.N.,
COMMANDING THE REVENUE CUTTER "ROSE."

Digitized by Google

Though greatly incensed, I knew present resistance was useless; and, after contriving to exchange a mute gesture with Ellen of eternal love, constancy, and despair, we took our several ways homewards. Before twelve o'clock the next day I was posting to Gosport, accompanied by my father, but not till after I had obtained, through the agency of my soft-hearted sister, a farewell interview with Ellen, when we of course made fervent vows of mutual fidelity—affirmed and consecrated, at Ellen's suggestion, by the mystical ceremony of breaking a crooked sixpence in halves, a half to be worn by each of us about our necks.

This boyish fancy faded slowly and lingeringly away with the busy and tumultuous years which passed over my head, till the peace of 1815 cast me an almost useless sea-waif upon the land, to take root and vegetate there as I best might upon a Lieutenant's half-pay. My father had died about two years before, and the hundred a-year he left us was scarcely more than sufficient for the support of my sister. I had never heard directly from Ellen Dible, although during the first months of separation I had written to her many times, the reason of which was partially explained by a few lines in one of Jane's letters, announcing Ellen Dible's marriage—it seemed under some kind of moral compulsion—to a person of her own grade, and their removal from Itchen. This happened about six months after my last interview with her. I made no further inquiries; and Jane, thinking the subject might be a painful one, it happened that, by a kind of tacit understanding, it was never afterwards alluded to between us.

The utter weariness of an idle shore-life was beginning to get well nigh insupportable, when through the good offices of my old friend, Sir Joseph Yorke, I received an appointment to the command of the Rose, revenue cutter, my duties being to maintain a careful watch, in the interest of His Majesty's customs, over the shores of the Southampton river, the Solent, the Wight, and other contiguous portions of the seaboard of Hants and Dorset.

Little of interest occurred during the first three or four weeks of my novel command, except that, by the sharpened vigilance of our lookout, certain circumstances came to light, strongly indicating that a certain Barnaby Diaper, the owner of a cutter-rigged fishing-vessel of rather large burthen, living near Hamble Creek, was extensively engaged in the then profitable practice of "running moonshine," demurely and industriously as, when ashore, he appeared to be everlastingly mending his nets, or cobbling the bottom of the smack's boat. He was a hale, wiry fellow, this Barnaby—Old Barnaby, as he was familiarly called, surnames in those localities being seldom used—with a wooden stolidity of countenance which utterly defied scrutiny, if it did not silence suspicion. His son, who was a partner in the cutter, lived at Weston, a beautifully-situated hamlet between Itchen and Netley.

A vigilant watch was consequently kept upon the movements of the Barnabys, father, son, and grandson, by which family trio the suspicious Blue-eyed Maid was, with occasional assistance, manned and worked. Very rarely, indeed, was the smack observed to be engaged in his ostensible occupation. She would suddenly disappear, and as suddenly return, and always, we soon came to notice, on the nights when the Rose happened to be absent from the Southampton waters.

We had missed her for upwards of a week, when information reached us that a large lugger, we had chased without success a few nights previously, would attempt to run a cargo at a spot not far from Lymington, soon after midnight. I accordingly, as soon as darkness had fallen, ran down, and—within signal distance of the shore-men with whom I had communicated—stood off and on till dawn in vain expectation of the promised prize. I strongly suspected that we had been humbugged; and on rounding Calshot Castle on our return, I had no doubt of it; for there, sure enough, was the Blue-eyed Maid riding lightly at anchor off Hamble Creek, and, from her slight draught of water, it was quite evident that her cargo, whatever it might have consisted of, had been landed, or otherwise disposed of. They had been smart with their work; for the summer night and our absence had lasted only a few hours. I boarded her, and found Old Barnaby, whom I knew by sight, and his two descendants, whom I had not before seen, busily engaged in swabbing the cutter's deck, and getting matters generally into order and shipshape. The son a good deal resembled the old man, except that his features wore a much more intelligent and good-humoured expression; and the boy was an active, bold-eyed, curly-haired youngster, whose countenance, but for a provoking sauciness of expression, apparently habitual to him, would have been quite handsome. I thought I had seen his face somewhere before, and he, I noticed, suddenly stopped from his work on hearing my name, and looked at me with a smiling but earnest curiosity. The morning's work had, I saw, been thoroughly performed; and being in no humour for a profitless game of cross-questions and crooked answers, and after exchanging one or two colloquial courtesies, in which I had by no means the advantage, I returned to the Rose, more than ever satisfied that this interesting family required, and would probably repay, the closest watchfulness and care.

Digitized by Google

On the evening of the same day the Blue-eyed Maid again vanished. A fortnight slipped by, and she had not reappeared; when the Rose, having slightly grazed her bottom in going over the shifting shingle at the north-west of the Wight, went into Portsmouth to be examined. Some of her copper was found to be stripped off; there were other trifling damages; and two or three days would elapse before she could be got ready for service. The interval I spent at Southampton, and on the second night, after paying a visit to the theatre, tempted by a glorious moonlit night which had succeeded a dark and squally evening, I strolled towards the platform battery.

The tide was at the full, and a faint breeze slightly rippled the magnificent expanse of water which glanced and sparkled in the bright moon and starlight of a cloudless autumn sky. But my attention was not long absorbed by the beauty of the scene, peerless as I deemed it; for, unless my eyes strangely deceived me, the Blue-eyed Maid had returned, and quietly anchored off Weston. She appeared to have just brought up; for the mainsail, three new patches in which chiefly enabled me to recognise her, was still flapping in the wind, and it appeared to me—though from the distance and the shadow of the dark background of woods in which she lay, it was difficult to speak with certainty—that she was deeply laden. There was not a moment to be lost. Fortunately, just in the nick of time, a boat with two watermen approached the platform steps. I tendered them a guinea to put me on board the smack off Weston—an offer which they eagerly accepted; and I was soon speeding over the waters to her. My uniform must have apprised the Barnabys of the nature of the visit about to be paid to them; for when we were within about a quarter of a mile of their vessel, two figures, which I easily recognised as Old Barnaby and his grandson, jumped into a boat that had been loading alongside, and rowed desperately for the shore, but a point considerably farther up the river, towards Itchen. There appeared to be no one left on board the Blue-eyed Maid, and the shore-confederates of the smugglers did not show themselves, conjecturing doubtless, as I had calculated they would, upon my having plenty of help within signal call. I therefore determined to capture the boat first, and return with her to the cutter. The watermen, excited by the chase, pulled with a will, and in about ten minutes we ran alongside the Barnabys' boat, jumped in, and found her loaded to the gunwale with brandy kegs.

"Fairly caught at last, old fellow!" I exclaimed, exultingly, in reply to the maledictions he showered on us. "And now pull the boat's head round, and make for the Blue-eyed Maid, or I'll run you through the body."

"Pull her round yourself," he sullenly rejoined, as he rose from the thrawt, and unshipped his oar. "It's bad enough to be robbed of one's hard 'arnings 'athout helping the thieves to do it!"

His refusal was of no consequence; the watermen's light skiff was made fast astern, and in a few moments we were pulling steadily towards the still motionless cutter. Old Barnaby was fumbling among the tubs in search, as he growled out, of his pea-jacket; his hopeful grandson was seated at the stern, whistling the then popular air of the "Woodpecker" with great energy and perfect coolness; and I was standing with my back towards them in the bow of the boat, when the stroke-oarsman suddenly exclaimed, "What are you at with the boat's painter, you young devil's cub?" He was answered by a mocking laugh from the boy, who shouted "Now, grandfer, now!"

Digitized by Google

Old Barnaby sprang into the boat which the lad had brought close up to the stern, pushing her off as he did so with all his strength; and then the boy, holding in his hand the painter he had detached from the ring to which it had been fastened, immediately jumped over the side. In another instant he was hauled out of the water by Barnaby, and—before we had recovered from the surprise which the suddenness and completeness of the trick we had been played excited in us—both were seated and pulling lustily, and with exulting shouts, round in the direction of the Blue-eyed Maid. We were, however, very speedily in vigorous chase; and as the wind, though favourable and evidently rising, was still light, we had little doubt of success, especially as some precious minutes must be lost to the smuggler in getting under weigh, neither jib nor stay foresail being as yet set. The watermen bent fiercely to their oars; and heavily-laden as the boat was, we were beginning to slip freely through the water, when an exclamation from one of the men announced another and more perilous trick the Barnabys had played us.

Old Barnaby, in pretending to fumble about for his jacket, had contrived to unship a large plug expressly contrived for the purpose of sinking the boat whenever the exigencies of their vocation might render such an operation advisable; and the water was coming in like a sluice. There was no help for it, and the boat's head was immediately turned towards the shore. Another vociferous shout rang in our ears as the full success of their scheme was observed by the Barnabys, replied to of course by the furious, but impotent execrations of the watermen. The boat sank rapidly; and we were still about a hundred yards from the shore, when we found ourselves splashing about in the water, which, fortunately, was not more than up to the arm-pits of the shortest of us, but so full of strong and tangled seaweed, that swimming was out of the question; and we had to wade slowly and painfully through it, a step on a spot of more than usually soft mud plumping us down every now and then over head and ears. After reaching the shore and shaking ourselves, we found leisure to look in the direction of the Blue-eyed Maid, and had the exquisite pleasure of seeing her stood down the river, impelled by the fast freshening breeze, and towing the watermen's boat securely at her stern.

There were no means of pursuit; and after indulging in sundry energetic vocables hardly worth repeating, we retreated in savage discomforture towards Weston, plentifully sprinkling the grass and gravel as we slowly passed along. There, we knocked up the landlord of a public-house, and, turning in as soon as possible, happily exchanged our dripping attire for warm blankets and clean sheets, beneath the soothing influence of which I, for one, was soon fast asleep.

Day had hardly dawned when we were all three up, and overhauling the mud and weeds—the tide was quite gone out—for the captured boat and tubs. They had vanished entirely; the fairies about Weston had spirited them away while we slept, leaving no vestige whatever of the spoil, to which we had naturally looked as some trifling compensation for the night's mishap, and the loss of the watermen's boat, to say nothing of the sousing we had got. It was a miserable business certainly, and my promise to provide my helpmates with another boat, should their own not be recovered, soothed but very slightly their sadly-ruffled tempers. But lamentations were useless, and after the lugubrious expression of a dismal hope for better luck next time, we separated.

This pleasant incident did not in the least abate my anxiety to get once more within hailing distance of the Barnabys; but for a long time my efforts were entirely fruitless, and I had begun to think that the Blue-eyed Maid had been permanently transferred to another and less-vigilantly watched station, when a slight inkling of intelligence dispelled that fear. My plan was soon formed. I caused it to be carelessly given out on shore that the Rose had sprung her bowsprit in the gale a day or two before, and was going the next afternoon into Portsmouth to get another. In pursuance of this intention, the Rose soon after noon slipped her moorings, and sailed for that port; remained quietly there till about nine o'clock in the evening, and then came out under close-reefed storm canvas, for it was blowing great guns from the northward, and steered for the Southampton river.

The night was as black as pitch; and but for the continuous and vivid flashes of lightning, no object more than a hundred yards distant from the vessel could have been discerned. We ran up abeam of Hythe without perceiving the object of our search, then tacked, stood across to the other side, and then retraced our course. We were within a short distance of the Hamble River, when a prolonged flash threw a ghastly light upon the raging waters, and plainly revealed the Blue-eyed Maid lying-to under the lee of the north shore, and, it may be, about half-a-mile ahead of us. Unfortunately, she saw us at the same moment, and as soon as way could be got upon her she luffed sharply up, and a minute afterwards was flying through the water in the hope of yet escaping her unexpected enemy. By edging away to leeward I contrived to cut her off effectually from running into the Channel by the Needles passage; but, nothing daunted, she held boldly on without attempting to reduce an inch of canvas, although, from the press she carried, she was fairly buried in the sea. Right in the course she was steering, the Donegal, a huge eighty-gun ship, was riding at anchor off Spithead. Old Barnaby, who, I could discern by his streaming white hairs, was at the helm, in his anxiety to keep as well in as possible, determined to pass as closely as he prudently could under the stern of the line-of-battle ship. Unfortunately just as the little cutter was in the act of doing so, a furious blast of wind tore away her jib as if it had been cobweb; and, pressed by her large mainsail, the slight vessel flew up into the wind, meeting the Donegal as the huge ship drove back from a strain which had brought her halfway to her anchors. The crash was decisive, and caused the instant disappearance of the unfortunate smuggler. The cry

Digitized by Google

OLD BARNABY, SKIPPER OF THE "BLUE-EYED MAID."

Digitized by Google

of the drowning men, if they had time to utter one, was lost amid the raging of the tempest; and although we threw overboard every loose spar we could lay hands on, it was with scarcely the slightest hope that such aid could avail them in the wild sea. I tacked as speedily as possible, and repassed the spot; but the white foam of the waves, as they leaped and dashed about the leviathan bulk of the Donegal, was all that could be perceived, eagerly as we peered over the surface of the angry waters. The Rose then stood on, and in little more than an hour afterwards was safely anchored off Hythe.

The boy Barnaby, I was glad to hear a day or two afterwards, had not accompanied his father and grandfather in their last trip, and had consequently escaped the fate which had so suddenly overtaken them, and for which it appeared that the smuggling community held me morally accountable. This was to be expected; but I had too often and too lately been familiar with death at sea in every shape, by the rage of man as well as that of the elements, to be more than slightly and temporarily affected by such an incident; so that all remembrance of it would probably have soon passed away but for an occurrence which took place about a month subsequently.

One of the officers of the shore force received information that two large luggers laden with brandy and tobacco from Guernsey were expected on the following night on some point of the coast between Hamble and Weston; and that, as the cargoes were very valuable, a desperate resistance to the coastguard, in the event of detection, had been organised. Our plan was soon arranged. The Rose was sent away with barely enough men to handle her, and with the remainder of the crew, I, as soon as night fell, took up a position a little above Netley Abbey. Two other detachments of the coast-guard were posted along the shore, at intervals of about a mile, all, of course, connected by signal-men not more than a hundred yards apart. There was a faint starlight, but the moon would not rise till near midnight; and from this circumstance, as well as the state of the tides, we could pretty well calculate when to expect our friends—should they come at all. It was not long before we were quite satisfied, from the stealthy movements of a number of persons about the spot, that the information we had received was correct. Just after eleven o'clock a low, peculiar whistle, taken up from distance to distance, was heard; and by placing our ears to the ground, the quick jerk of oars in the rowlocks was quite apparent. After about five minutes of eager restlessness, I gave the impatiently-expected order. We al emerged from our places of concealment. and with cautious but rapid steps advanced upon the, by this time, busy smugglers.

The two luggers were beached upon the soft sand or mud, and between forty and fifty men were each receiving two three-gallon kegs, with which they sped off to the carts in waiting at a little distance. There were also about twenty fellows ranged as a guard, all armed as efficiently as ourselves. I gave the word; but before we could close with the astonished desperadoes, they fired a pistol volley, by which one seaman, John Batley, a fine athletic young man, was killed, and two others seriously wounded. This done, the scoundrels fled in all directions, hotly pursued, of course. I was getting near one of them, when a lad, who was running by his side, suddenly turned, and raising a pistol, discharged it at my head. It fortunately missed its mark, though the whistle of the bullet was unpleasantly close. I closed with and caught the young rascal, who struggled desperately, and to my extreme surprise, I had almost written dismay, discovered that he was young Barnaby! It was not a time for words, and hastily consigning the boy to the custody of the nearest seaman, with a brief order to take care of him, I resumed the pursuit. A bootless one it proved. Favoured by their numbers, and their perfect acquaintance with the hedge-and-ditch neighbourhood, the contrabandists all contrived to escape. The carts also got off, and our only captures were the boy, the luggers, which there had been no time to get off, and their cargoes, with the exception of the few kegs that had reached the carts.

The hunt after the dispersed smugglers was continued by the different parties who came in subsequently to our brush with them, so that after the two wounded seamen had been carried off on litters, and a sufficient guard left in the captured boats, only two men remained with me. The body of poor Batley was deposited for the present in one of the luggers; and then the two sailors and myself moved forward to Itchen with the prisoner, where I intended to place him in custody for the night.

Digitized by Google

The face of the lad was deadly pale, and I noticed that he had been painfully affected by the sight of the corpse. But when I addressed him, his expressive features assumed a scornful, defiant look. First ordering the two men to drop astern out of hearing, I said: "You will be hanged for your share in this night's work, young man, depend upon it."

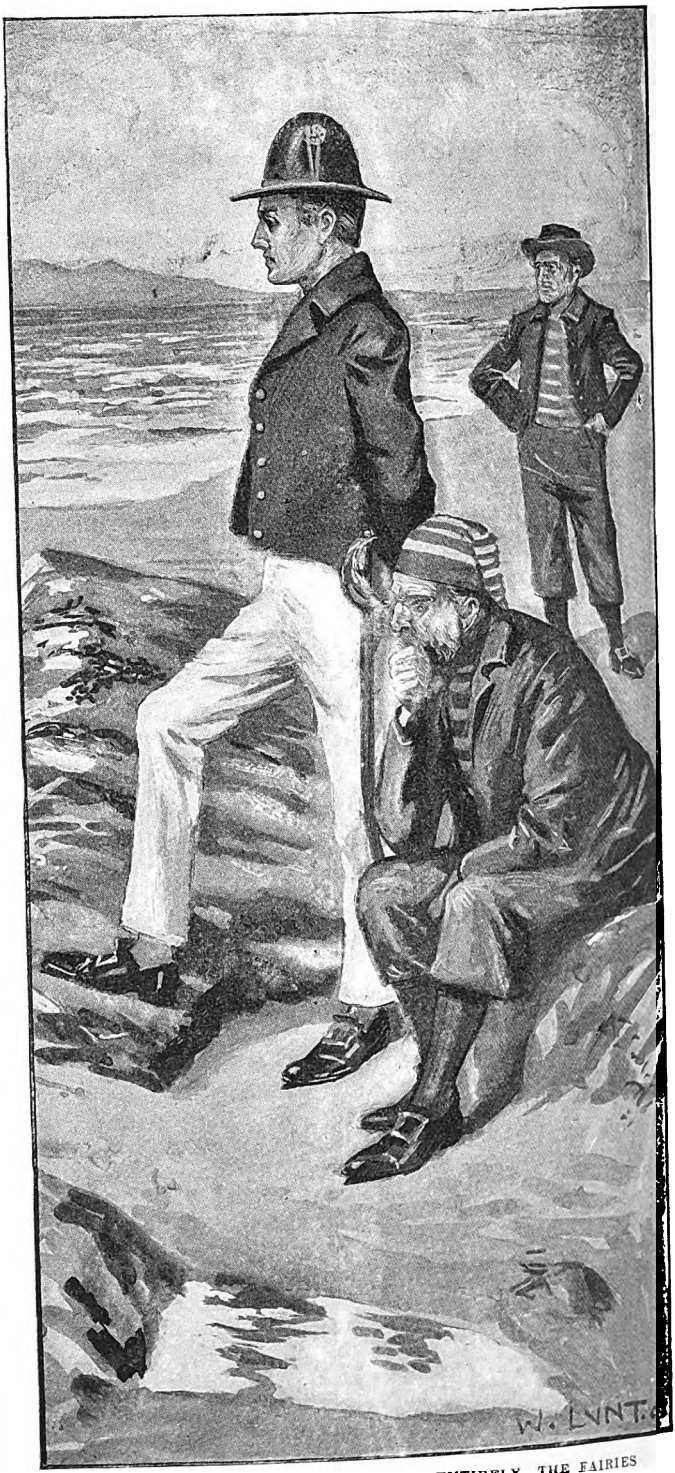
"Hanged!" he exclaimed in a quick, nervous tone; "hanged! You say that to frighten me! It was not I who shot the man! You know that; or perhaps," he added, with a kind of hysterical cry, "perhaps you want to kill me as you did father."

"I have no more inclination, my poor boy," I answered, "to injure you than I had to harm your father. Why, indeed, should I have borne him any ill-will?"

"Why should you? Oh, I know very well!"

"You know more than I do then; but enough of this folly, I wish, I hardly know why, to save you. It was not you, I am quite aware, that fired the fatal shot, but that makes no difference as to your legal guilt. But I think if you would put us on the track of your associates, you might yourself escape."

The lad's fine eyes



THE BOAT AND TUBS HAD VANISHED ENTIRELY, THE FAIRIES HAD SPIRITED THEM AWAY.

Digitized by Google

perfectly lightened with scorn and indignation. "Turn informer!" he exclaimed. "Betray them that loved and trusted me! Never—if they could hang me a thousand times over!"

I made no answer, and nothing more was said till we had reached and were passing the Abbey ruins. The boy then abruptly stopped, and with quivering voice, whilst his eyes filled with tears said, "I should like to see my mother."

"See your mother! There can be no particular objection to that; but she lives further on at Weston, does she not?"

"No, we have sold off, and moved to Aunt Diaper's at Netley, up yonder. In a day or two we should have started for Hull, where my uncle lives, and I was to have been 'prenticed to the captain of a Greenlander. But now," he continued with an irrepressible outburst of grief and terror, "Jack Ketch will, you say, be my master, and I shall be only 'prenticed to the gallows."

"Why, if this be so, did your mother permit you to join the lawless desperadoes to whom you owe your present unhappy and degraded position?"

"Mother did not know of it; she thinks I am gone to Southampton to inquire about the day the vessel sails for Hull. Mother will die if I am hanged!" exclaimed the lad with a renewed burst of passionate grief; "and surely you will not kill her?"

"It is not very likely I should wish to do so, considering that I have never seen her"

"Oh yes—yes, you have!" he sharply rejoined. "Then perhaps you do not know? Untie or cut these cords," he added, approaching close to me and speaking in a low, quick whisper; "give me a chance: mother's girl's name was Ellen Dible!"

Had the lad's fettered arm been free, and he had suddenly dealt me a blow with a knife or dagger, the stroke could not have been more sharp or terrible than these words conveyed.

"God of mercy!" I exclaimed, as the momently-arrested blood again shot through my heart with reactive violence, "can this be true?"

"Yes, yes—true, quite true!" continued the boy, with the same earnest look, and low, hurried speech. "I saw, when your waistcoat flew open in the struggle just now, what was at the end of the black ribbon. You will give me a chance for mother's sake, won't you?"

A storm of grief, regret, remorse, was sweeping through my brain, and I could not for a while make any answer, though the lad's burning eyes continued with fevered anxiety upon my face.

At last I said, gasped rather: "I cannot release you—it is impossible; but all that can be done—all that can—can legally be done, shall be"—. The boy's countenance fell, and he was again deadly pale. "You shall see your mother," I added. "Tell Johnson where to seek her; he is acquainted with Netley." This was done, and the man walked briskly off upon his errand.

"Come this way," I said, after a few minutes' reflection, and directing my steps towards the old ruined fort by the shore, built, I suppose, for the abbey's defence against pirates. There was but one flight of steps to the summit, and no mode of egress save by the entrance from whence they led. "I will relieve you of those cords while your mother is with you. Go up to the top of the fort. You will be unobserved, and we can watch here against any foolish attempt at escape."

Ten minutes had not elapsed when the mother appeared, accompanied by Johnson and sobbing convulsively. Roberts hailed her, and after a brief explanation, she ascended the steps with tottering but hasty feet to embrace her son. A quarter of an hour, she had been told, would be allowed for the interview.

The allotted time had passed, and I was getting impatient, when a cry from the summit of the fort or tower, as if for help to someone at a distance, roused and startled us. As we stepped out of the gateway, and looked upwards to ascertain the meaning of the sudden cry, the lad dashed out and sped off with surprising speed. One of the men instantly snatched a pistol from his waistbelt, but at a gesture from me put it back. "He cannot escape," I said. "Follow me, but use no unnecessary violence." Finding that we gained rapidly upon him, the lad darted through a low, narrow gateway, into the interior of the abbey ruins, trusting, I imagined, to baffle us in the darkness and intricacy of the place. I just caught sight of him as he disappeared up a long flight of crumbling, winding steps, from which he issued through a narrow aperture upon a lofty wall, some five or six feet wide, and overgrown with grass and weeds. I followed in terrible anxiety, for I feared that in his desperation he would spring off and destroy himself. I shouted loudly to him for God's sake to stop. He did so within a few feet of the end of the wall. I ran quickly towards him, and as I neared him he threw away his hat, and revealed the face of—Ellen Dible!

Digitized by Google

I stopped, bewildered, dizzy, paralysed. Doubtless the mellowing radiance of the night softened or concealed the ravages which time must have imprinted on her features; for, as I gazed upon the spirit-beauty of her excited, beseeching countenance, the old time came back upon me with a power and intensity which an hour before I could not have believed possible. The men hailed repeatedly from below, but I was too bewildered, too excited, to answer. Their shouts, with the young mother's supplicating sobs—she seemed scarcely older than when I parted from her—sounded in my ears like the far-off cries and murmurs of a bewildering chaotic dream. She must have gathered hope and confidence from the emotion I doubtless exhibited; for, as soon as the confusion and ringing in my brain had partially subsided, I could hear her say: "You will save my boy—my only son; for my sake you will save him?"

Another shout from the men below demanded if I had got the prisoner. "Ay, Ay," I mechanically replied, and they immediately hastened to join us.

"Which way—which way is he gone?" I asked, as the seamen approached.

She instinctively caught my meaning: "By the shore to Weston," she hurriedly answered; he will find a boat there."

The men came up: "The chase has led us astray," I said: "look there."

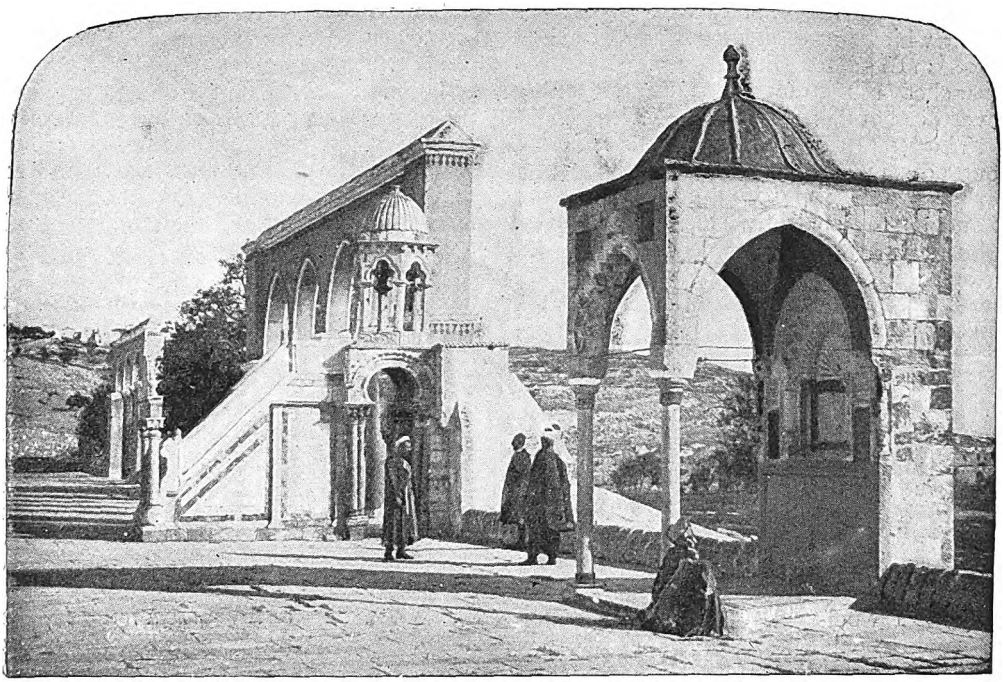
"His mother, by jingo!" cried Johnson. "They must have changed clothes!"

"Yes; the boy's off—to—to Hamble, I have no doubt. You both follow in that direction. "I'll pursue by the Weston and Itchen road."

The men started off to obey this order, and as they did so, I heard her broken murmur of "Bless you, Robert— bless you!" I turned away, faint, reeling with excitement, muttered a hasty farewell, and with disordered steps and throbbing pulse hurried homewards.

The mother I never saw again. The son, at whose escape from justice I thus weakly, it may be criminally, connived, I met a few years ago in London. He is the captain of a first-class ship in the Australian trade, and a smarter sailor I think I never beheld.

Digitized by Google



"THE PULPIT OF OMAR," JERUSALEM.

Costumes of the Holy Land.

DRESS or costume in the East is the badge or mark which infallibly indicates the social status of the wearer and the class to which he belongs. There are three different classes in Syria, with as many characteristic costumes. There are, first, the Belladeen or city people, the Fellaheen or country people, and the Bedouins, or sons of the desert.

The dress of a Bedouin, the same as that in which the Rev. N. C. Tams is represented in one of our pictures, is picturesque in the extreme. He wears a silk stripe robe, a cloth coat, and a kaaffeyah or turban, from which falls a square of cloth or silk upon his shoulders. He also wears a pair of red morocco boots, which, however, are not shown. His wife by his side is dressed in the ordinary costume of the middle-class women of Jerusalem. Very different would be the dress of a wife of a rich young man. The garments of such a one are fine and beautiful to behold. Over a dress or petticoat of pink silk she wears a fine cloth jacket, embroidered in gold thread, and a leathern girdle thickly massed with gold

IBRAHIM PASHA,
GOVERNOR OF JERUSALEM.

Digitized by Google

embroideries. Upon her head is worn a moon-tire, consisting of a piece of silver shaped as the moon, and placed over a fez, from which hangs a long fringe of silken cord and golden threads, to which are attached numerous silver pieces, falling over her hand.

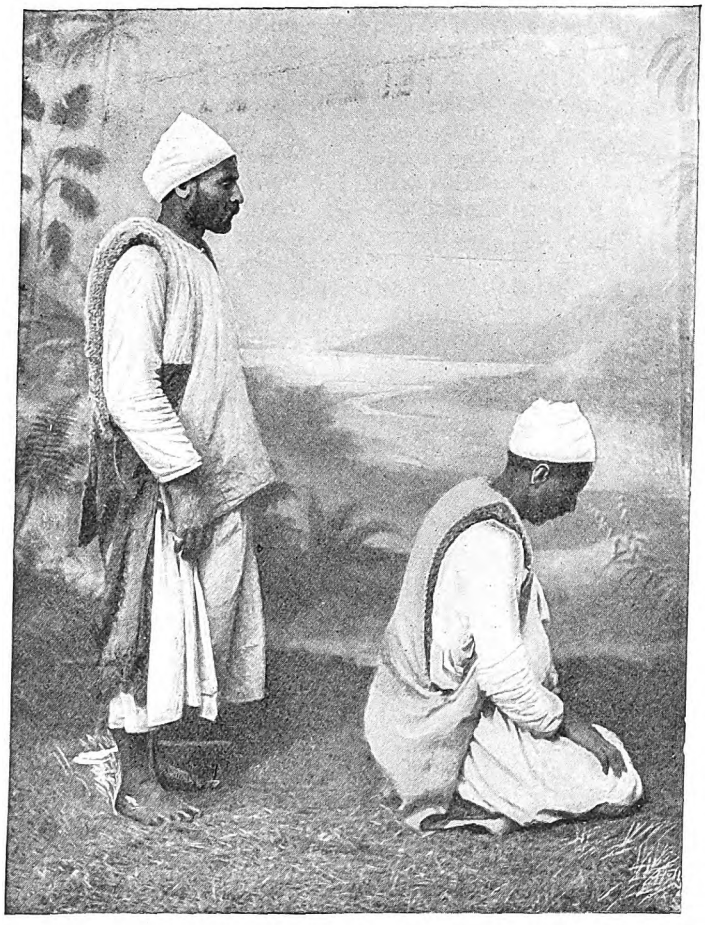
The festal dress of a village lady is rich and gorgeous, and consists of a jobehareer or silken robe, heavily embroidered by hand down the front, sides, and sleeves. She also wears a tasseled girdle of fine striped silk called mahzam. Over all this is worn a rich takseerah or jacket of red and brilliantly coloured silk. The Bethlehemite wears a saffah, or crown, composed of woollen cloth, gold pieces and blue beads. Over the festive saffah is thrown a ghatta or veil of different colours — sometimes white, and sometimes royal blue or purple. Attached to either ear, and falling under her chin, is a silver chain, having a large Turkish dollar as the centre-piece. The chain is thickly strewn with blue beads, supposed to defend her from the "Evil Eye," a superstition still current in the East.

REV. N. C. TAMS, OF ARIMATHEA, AND FAMILY.

An impressive figure is a Greek priest, especially as he stands robed for Divine service in the Greek churches. His dress is too elaborate, and mystical, and symbolical to attempt a description here. His robes, as well as their meanings, are very beautiful and suggestive. The square shield at his side is made of silver cloth, in the middle of which is a large raised cross. This shield is known as the saif or sword, and gives the priest authority or power to confess sins in the Greek Church. Attached to the shield or saif is a long silk cord in which are woven prayers. He wears from his neck a cloth on which are woven six crosses. This is called butrascheen, and indicates the priest's responsibility for the people's spiritual guidance and welfare. A girdle of white and silver cloth is worn to symbolise the love which "engirdles the people to his heart," and for whom he stands. The last and finishing robe is the great ephod of violet velvet, gold and silver threads, and rich embroideries.

A distinctive feature of a Bedouin woman's costume is the covering for the eyes. From three to four hundred old coins fall from the burko around the woman's face. She wears a blue cotton robe, bracelets, and a silver chain. A young citizen of Jerusalem looks very smart in his fez or tarboosh, and full orange trousers, several yards wide, and embroidered jacket, drawn in at his waist with a girdle. A lady attired to receive visitors in her home wears a silken conbaz, a pink silk satla or over-dress, with a linen girdle threaded with silver. A mandeal covers the hair, over which is thrown a tarha (veil or scarf) of thin silk gauze, ivory-white in colour. The out-door dress of a city lady is called an izzar. The izzar is of chocolate and gold coloured silk, and is used to envelop the woman of Jerusalem as she walks about. She also wears the mandeal, as the eyes, face, and hands of a majority of the women of Palestine must not be seen as they leave the privacy of their dwelling for the street. One of our pictures represents the costume of Mohammedan women fully veiled.

Digitized by Google



ORIENTIALS AT THEIR DEVOTIONS.

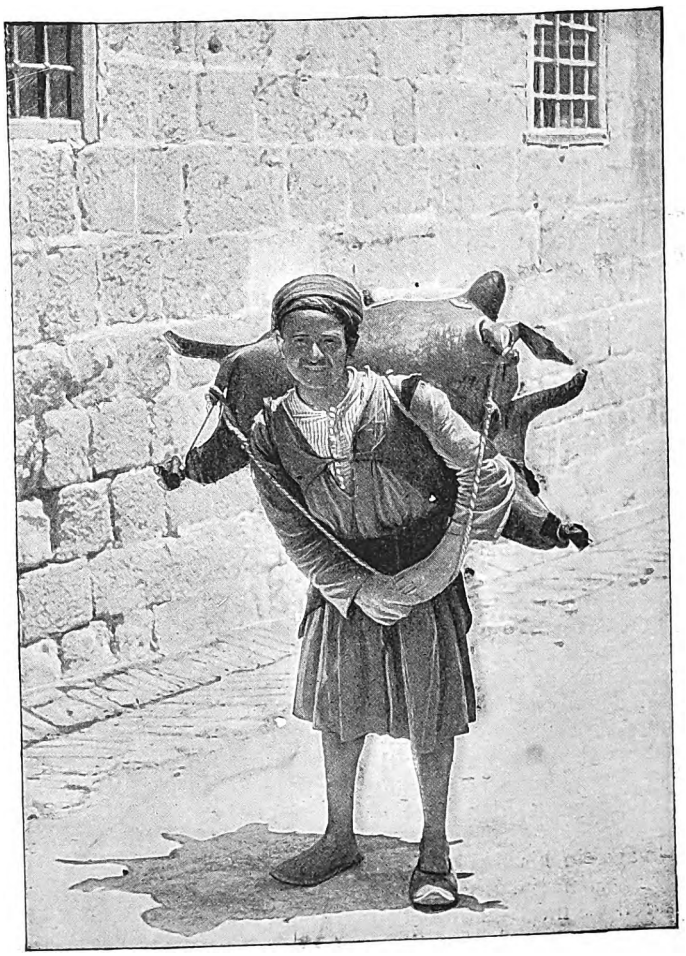
Rev. Dr. Talmage, in his "History of Palestine," says: "On the way across the plain of Sharon we meet many veiled women. It is not respectable for them to be unveiled, and it is a veil that is so hung as to make them hideous. A man may not even see the face of his wife until after betrothal or engagement of marriage. Hence the awful mistakes, and the unhappy homes, for God has made the face an index of character, and honesty or dishonesty usually is demonstrated in the features. I do not see what God made a fair face for if it were not to be looked at. But here come the crowds of disfigured women down the road on their way to Joppa, bundles of sticks for firewood on their heads. They started at three in the morning. Whipped and beaten will some of them be if their bundle of sticks is too small. All that is required for divorcement is for a man to say to his wife, 'Be off; I don't want you any more.' Woman is a slave in all lands except those in which the Gospel of Christ makes her a queen. And yet in Christian countries there are women posing as sceptics, and men with families deriding the only religion that makes honourable the wife, mother, daughter and sister."

The ra-ee or shepherd.

Digitized by Google

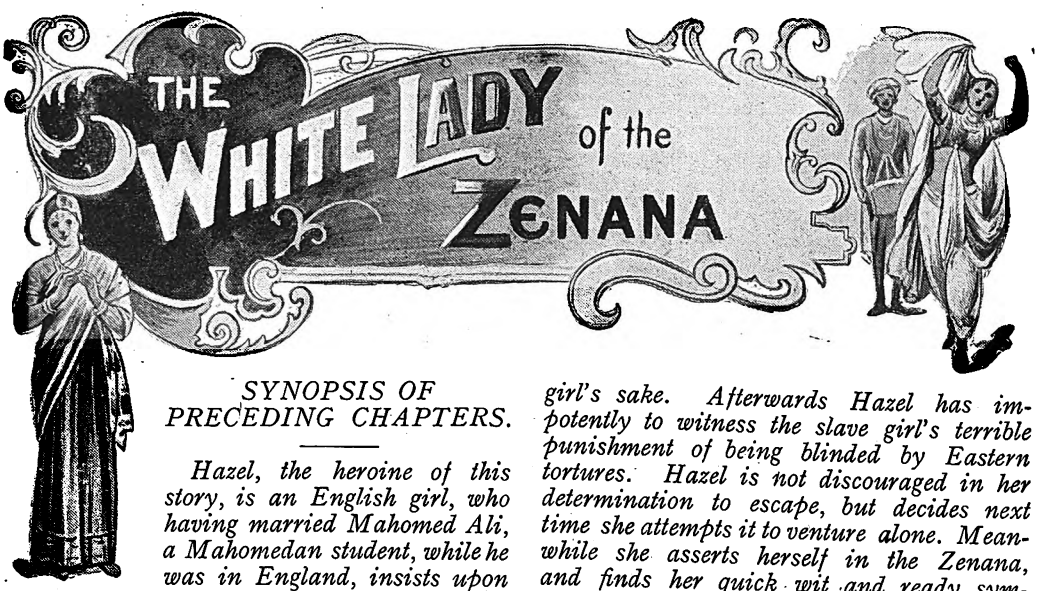
of the East dresses in a farweh or coat of sheep-skin, a leathern girdle encircles his waist, just as he might have appeared on the starry plains of Bethlehem when Christ lay cradled, a Divine Babe, in the manger and the stall. He carries a leathern bag for provisions, such as was worn in the time of John the Baptist, and a club or naboot for defence. He also carries a reed flute or zumaira, which likens him to the shepherd of David's Psalms, or to David himself, "singing to his flocks."

The country children are garbed just as the little ones probably were when Jesus went up and down the country paths of Palestine. The coat worn by some boys is like the "coat of many colours" worn by Joseph, while he bears upon his forehead what the Scriptures call "an ornament of the head." The girls wear garment of silk and linen, and girdles similar to, but simpler than, their mother's. A unique feature of a girl's head-dress is a triangle from which hangs, in imitation, the ten pieces of silver spoken of in the Bible.



ARAB WATER CARRIER.

Digitized by Google



SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Hazel, the heroine of this story, is an English girl, who having married Mahomed Ali, a Mahomedan student, while he was in England, insists upon going out to join him, in utter ignorance of what it means to be incarcerated in the seclusion of the Zenana. When she finds it out, she is dominated with one idea —that of escape, and at the end of Chapter II. she has climbed into a tree to reconnoitre the surroundings outside the walls, but is surprised by her husband. After this, although he apparently takes no notice, he pretends to depart on urgent and mysterious journeys, during which time Hazel grows more familiar with the true inwardness of Zenana life, and is more disgusted with it. One of the slave girls, Taj Bee, won by Hazel's kindness, promises to assist her to escape, and her determination to do so is increased by hearing that her father-in-law wishes her husband to bring home Aziz Unissa, the daughter of Sultan Mirza Khan, to be his second wife. While she is musing, devoured with indignation, Taj Bee comes to her and whispers, "I have found a way of escape!" The plan when unfolded by the girl turns out to be a suggestion that as lady visitors come to see the Begum they are in the habit of bringing many strange servants with them, who, when they go away, are preceded by one crying "Gosha! Gosha!" and therefore it will be easy for Hazel, by dressing in servant's garb, provided by the girl, to mix in the servants' waiting-room and leave with them. This they try, but the slave girl herself is hindered and captured, and Hazel, who might have got away, returns for the girl's sake. Afterwards Hazel has impotently to witness the slave girl's terrible punishment of being blinded by Eastern tortures. Hazel is not discouraged in her determination to escape, but decides next time she attempts it to venture alone. Meanwhile she asserts herself in the Zenana, and finds her quick wit and ready sympathies easily win her a first place, both with the Nabob and the Begum. At last, overcome by the persistency of his father, Mahomed Ali takes a second wife, in spite of Hazel's strenuous objections, with the result that Hazel separates herself from him, and he submits. But meanwhile the new wife tries to ingratiate herself with Hazel, and after many attempts succeeds in meeting her in the garden, when there is an exciting scene. Soon after Mahomed Ali has an awful accident, that breaks his back, and Hazel, forgetting herself, endeavours to soothe his dying hours, but is thwarted by the rigid etiquette of the Zenana. Before Hazel's husband dies, he discloses to her a method of escape from the zenana by means of a secret subterranean passage leading from the garden to the banks of the River Coombe. One day, shortly afterwards, Hazel hints at going away, but immediately regrets her impulsive remark. Aziz Unissa is anxious to share Hazel's zenana, now their husband is dead, but the latter refuses, fearing she would interfere with her plans of escape.

CHAPTER X.

HAZEL sat alone on her terrace in deep and serious thought. It was not many days after the death of Mahomed Ali, but already there were changes in the Zenana. Aziz Unissa, disgusted with the dullness of her life in the little ante-room off the Begum's apartment, had gone in a fit of petulance to pay a visit to her own family. And already there were threatening rumours of a projected marriage for Mustapha Sahib, which would condemn Hazel to a stricter captivity, and render her ultimate escape well-nigh hopeless.

Digitized by Google

It behoved her now to lose no time in carrying out her plans, while Aziz Unissa was absent, with all her curious, prying women, who had nothing better to do than to watch all Hazel's movements and report on them for the amusement of their mistress, whose interest in everything that Hazel said and did and wore was unflagging.

All suspicion, as far as Hazel was concerned, had long ceased to trouble the mind of the Nabob; and she profited by this to obtain a larger measure of privacy for herself than she had ever had since she came to the zenana. She explained to her women, as she had done to Aziz Unissa, that it was the custom of the English for a widow to mourn in solitude, and that until her mourning was ended, she would not require their attendance in her room, neither were they any longer to sleep there. She desired them to bring her meals at certain stated intervals, and at all other times to refrain from intruding on her, unless they were summoned. Every day she sat or walked for a time in the garden, but when she did so she always called her women to bear her company.

The slave appointed to do that duty carried her books backwards and forwards to and from the library, in the old College Hall, as he had been accustomed to do during Mahomed Ali's lifetime. But there was no one now to turn over their pages, and see that nothing more was written on them than concerned the stories there related.

To-day Hazel sat thoughtfully composing the appeal she hoped would reach some kind soul fn the outer world, and move them to come to her assistance.

HAZEL SAT THOUGHTFULLY COMPOSING THE APPEAL.

On the fly-leaf at the beginning of the book, she wrote in pencil, in clear and plain handwriting, the carefully thought-out words of her letter:

"I entreat whoever sees this book to read and consider these words; they are absolutely true. I, who write, am an English woman, who married a Mahomedan gentleman in England. Since I came to this country, I have lived shut up in the zenana of his father's house. I have made several attempts to escape, the life here being insupportable for any white woman, but I have always been unsuccessful, and my attempts discovered. My husband is now dead; my position here is worse than ever. I desire most earnestly to return to my own country, but they will not let me go; I am here literally in prison. I implore you who read this to take pity on me, and help me to escape, or at least to give me some answer to this petition. I do not give my name and address; it would be useless, for no letter would ever be allowed to reach me; and any attempt to see me would only bring me into the most serious danger. O, reader, if you have mercy, write an answer to this on the fly-leaf of one of the books of this library, as I have done here. I shall send every second day for one of the twelve volumes of 'Hallam's Middle Ages.' To-day is the 2nd of September, on the 4th I shall send for the first volume. Write in one of these, and I shall get your answer.

Digitized by Google

"A DESPAIRING ENGLISHWOMAN."

In several places, on the margins of the pages, she wrote: "Pray read the note on the fly-leaf of this book."

This letter she copied into the three or four volumes of popular works of fiction of the day, which she had with her, works she thought most likely to be read by the English ladies in the place.

"Surely, surely," she said, "someone must see this, and someone will send an answer." Then she called one of her servants and gave her the books to send to the library.

For two days she thought of nothing, day or night, but the answer she was sure to find in the first volume of "Hallam's Middle Ages."

Two days later, when it lay on the table before her, she dared not open it. "I will go and see the Begum first," she said to herself, with some vague, unformulated idea of propitiating the powers that be, by a kindly duty fulfilled.

The Begum hardly ever now came out of her dreams to notice what went on in the world around her; but she always smiled and raised her hand in welcome when Hazel came to sit beside her charpoy. "She is killing herself very fast, poor soul," thought Hazel, looking at the shrunken emaciated form, "but I don't know that anyone could wish to stop her. If I thought it would matter much to her, I think I would put off my going."

When she opened the book, a little later, sitting alone in her own room, there was not a mark on the clear fly-leaf. With feverish haste she turned the pages, looking for some word or sign, but there was none. Her fair head drooped upon the book, and she wept tears of the keenest disappointment.

Day by day, as the books came with no message for her on their blank pages, her heart grew sick with hope deferred. Every second day, when the books were changed, she wrote in some new volume that appeal for help, from which she hoped so much, adding sometimes: "For God's sake, hear me!" But the answer never came.

The long September days dragged heavily past. October came, and Hazel, sitting on her terrace, watched the carriages drive past again down the distant road behind the paddy fields. The ladies were returning from the Hills. The season was beginning again in hospitable, gay Madras.

One day, by mistake, they sent her from the library a book she had already had; she turned to the fly-leaf idly, to look for her poor little letter. All the careful writing had been entirely erased by a conscientious native clerk, who could not read English, and who hated to see his books defaced.

"Can my father-in-law have done this?" Hazel asked, with a sudden cold fear clutching her heart.

She sent for some of the other books; on them all, the clerk's indiarubber had done its destroying work. On one of the inner pages, which had escaped his notice, below the sentence: "Pray read the note on the fly-leaf of this book," some wag had written: "The note on the fly-leaf appears to have flown away."

Then somebody had seen the book, at least that was some comfort; and Hazel was encouraged to try another method.

She abandoned the treacherous fly-leaf, and writing her letter in ink on a separate sheet of thick paper, she gummed it into the middle of the book. If that officious wiseacre of a clerk should see it he would perhaps take it for an integral part of the volume, a fac-simile of handwriting, or some such valuable document.

She set herself again to wait; and went on with her diligent study of "Hallam's Middle Ages."

Now in a pretty bungalow down by the beach, Captain Reginald Fletcher lived with his sister and her husband.

Digitized by Google

"Look here, Redge," said the sister one day, "there is such a funny letter stuck in this book, 'A Double Thread.'"

"You should never read other people's letters, it isn't honourable," said Redge.

I have lived shut up in the zenana of his father's house. I have made several attempts to escape, the life here being insupportable for any white woman, but I have always been unsuccessful, and my attempts discovered. My husband is now dead; my position here is worse than

HAZEL, SITTING ON HER TERRACE, WATCHED THE CARRIAGES DRIVE PAST AGAIN.

Eva began to read aloud: "I entreat whoever sees this book to read and consider these words; they are absolutely true. I, who write, am an Englishwoman who married a Mahomedan gentleman in England. Since I came to this country ever. I desire most earnestly to return to my own country, but they will not let me go. I am here literally in prison. I implore you who read this to take pity on me, and help me to escape, or at least to give me some answer to this petition.

Digitized by Google

I do not give my name and address; it would be useless, for no letter would ever be allowed to reach me; and any attempt to see me would only bring me into the most serious danger. O, reader, if you have mercy, write an answer to this and fasten it into the book as I have done. I shall send every second day for one of the volumes of 'Alison's History of Europe.' To-day is the 6th of October; on the 8th I shall send for volume six, on the 10th for the seventh volume, and so on through them all. Write in one of these, and I shall get your answer.

"A DESPAIRING ENGLISHWOMAN."

"Now, what do you make of that?"

"A hoax most likely," said Redge. "Hand over the book and let me see."

She watched him lighting a fresh cigar; after dinner, presently, she said, a little timidly, "I think, Redge, even if it is a hoax, I should like to write an answer.

"Do as you like," he answered, "but I am ready to bet you anything you like the 'poor thing' is some racketty young fellow in a chummery who thinks it would be a great joke to get some tender-hearted young woman like Eva Dunstan to come with ropes and ladders, and dark lanterns, and what not, at midnight, to rescue him from a relentless father-in-law. That father-in-law is a happy touch, Eva. Much finer than the traditional old step-mother, or barbarous uncle."

"We should soon know if it was a chummery," said Eva practically. "We know all the houses where there are young men chumming together; and whoever it is will have to give their address sometime or other. I shall send for Alison's 'History of Europe' the first thing in the morning. To-day is the 8th. I see from what she says that the day after to-morrow she will be sending for the seventh volume. Well, it shall be ready for her.

"Seven volumes of Alison's 'History of Europe' are calculated to depress anyone," said the brother callously. "That is if she really began at the first volume. What in the world induced her to pick out a ponderous affair like that."

"I suppose she thought there were a good many volumes."

"There are," said Redge.

"And that they wouldn't be likely to be out. I don't think many people read them.'

"Not very many," said Redge.

"I shall ask all the girls at the club to-morrow evening whether they have seen this," said Eva.

"If you will be guided by me, my good girl, which I have no doubt you will not," said the Captain, "you will say nothing whatever to anyone about it. Admitting that the case is really as it is set forth there, if a lot of you women get chattering about it all over the place, before the servants, ten to one it will get to the ears of the old Bluebeard father-in-law, and then your young woman may look out for beans."

"You are right, my dear boy. I didn't think of that. I shall not say one word to anyone, except, of course, to George." George was her husband.

"George won't let you stir in the matter, you may be sure of that. You know what a funk all these civilians are always in of any shindy with the native community. Why, breaking a zenana would be one of the seven deadly sins to old George."

"Then you think I had better not mention it to him?" asked Eva doubtfully.

"Heaven forbid that I, a bachelor, should counsel secrecy between a husband and wife," said the Captain, "but you know George as well as I do, better I dare say."

"Well, do stop talking for a minute, while I think of what I shall say in my letter to-morrow."

The Captain went out and walked up and down the drive, while his sister thought out her answer for Alison in the morning.

"I have seen your letter," she wrote, "and I will do anything I can to help you. Write further particulars; and tell me what to do, in this same volume of Alison. I will answer in the next. Don't write in any more books, as it is better no one else should know what you are doing, and tear up this.—EVA."

In the morning Eva and her brother went up together to the library; and, while the Captain engaged the librarian in conversation, Eva looked over the new books and tore out quite a number of leaves with Hazel's letter written upon them. Then she carried off the seventh volume of Alison's 'History of Europe.'

And so it came to pass that Hazel, sitting sadly on the terrace, almost despairing of help, opened that seventh volume, and at last found her answer. She had been through all the volumes of "Hallam's Middle Ages," and she was afraid the librarian would notice, and think it trange if she began again at the beginning, so she had turned to the other, which was a longer work.

Digitized by Google

"God bless her, whoever she is!" she cried impulsively, reading those friendly words of Eva's.

A few days later there was another etter, which Eva read to her brother.

"I thank and bless my unknown friend, Eva. My name is Hazel; my husband was Mahomed Shere Ali Kahn, the eldest son of the Nabob of Tulipatam. I do not know the name of the road where his house is, but at the back it looks out over a waste place and paddy fields, and beyond the fields there is a road with an avenue of tulip trees. There is a high wall all round the garden at the back, and a ditch on the other side of the wall. It is possible you may know the house, as there was a marriage festival here some months ago, and many English people came to it. My room is at the back of the house, looking on to a terrace. Every night I will put three lamps in a row, a red, a white, and a blue one, on the balustrade of the terrace, which I think could be seen from the road beyond the paddy fields. When you have seen the lights will you drive slowly along that road, in the early morning, and wave a white handkerchief; I will wave mine in answer, and you will know that you have found the right house. If, indeed, you are willing to help me, I will tell you my plan, which was partly made for me by my dead husband. There is some danger in it, and he thought I should have some man to help me, in case we were discovered before we got quite away. Perhaps you have some man belonging to you who will be kind and merciful, and charitable enough to help me. If you have not, I know not indeed what I shall do. There is a way out of here, but I dare not take it alone, and I cannot ask another woman to brave it with me. I have to wear the dress of the native women, and I have never been outside this house. I do not know my way about this place, and I should not know where to go, even if I got out safely by myself. They would find me, and bring me back here."

"GREAT SCOTT!" SAID THE CAPTAIN, VEHEMENTLY, WHEN EVA HAD FINISHED READING HAZEL'S LETTER.

Digitized by Google

"Great Scott!" said the Captain vehemently, when Eva had finished. "Fancy my forgetting that! Of course, I remember now. There was a girl on board the steamer I came out in, Mrs. Alley they called her. I believe her name was Hazel. I remember thinking it was a pretty name, and suited her. 'Witch Hazel' some of them used to call her; an awfully pretty, jolly girl she was too. Some of the fellows said her husband was a Mahomedan. To think of her, all this time, shut up in one of their wretched zenanas! I wasn't coming on here at once, you know, and upon my word, when I went up country I forgot all about her. Well, it is a beastly shame! Look here, Eva, you just write at once and say you have a brother who knows her, and who'll have her out of that zenana or know the reason why."

"Don't do anything rash, dear," said Eva.

"Do you think I was born yesterday, my good girl? I haven't lived I don't know how many years in this interesting country without learning that you have to walk very warily indeed among snakes. A great man like that Nabob, too! There would be a precious shindy if anyone knew I was thinking of meddling with His High Mightiness' zenana. You had better not say anything about this business to George, Eva. Joking apart, it is rather a serious thing to attempt a rescue out of a Mahomedan nobleman's zenana. Of course, her being English, and her husband dead, and all that, makes a difference. And I have no doubt the old father-in-law will hold his tongue about it, when once we have got her safely away. I know the old fellow's shanty well enough. Do you remember that big house we went to a few months ago, when there was a great tomash for one of the daughters' wedding?"

"I remember," said Eva. "I saw the bride, and a most extraordinarily beautiful girl she was."

"Well, that's the house. To think that that unfortunate girl Witch Hazel must have been in the house all the time we were there! They must have kept her pretty close for none of you women to have seen her, eh, Eva? You went up to the old Turk's harem, didn't you?"

"Yes; they must have kept her hidden away somewhere, poor girl," said Eva. "There were crowds of women there, but of course, we didn't go into all the rooms. There won't really be any danger in your going there, will there, Redge? Because I can't have you going and getting into trouble, you know."

"Oh, I shall be all right. You see, this lady does not really belong to the 'native community.' I grant you, if I went roaming into some fellow's zenana to look after a lady love for myself, it might be a bit risky; but this is quite a different matter. Fellow-countrywoman, and all that, you know. As it is, I shall just take a stroll along a certain road this evening after dinner, and I think I know just where I shall see those red, white and blue lights. And you had better be ready to drive out with me early to-morrow morning in the pony cart, and bring a good big handkerchief along."

That night at nine o'clock, Hazel sat behind her red, white and blue lights, her heart beating high with hope that on the distant road friendly eyes would see and understand her signal.

In the morning, before the dawn, she was at her watch-tower looking for an answering signal.

Very early, before the other carriages began to drive along the road, a high pony cart came very slowly past. Tied to the whip, which the driver found occasion to flourish a good deal, was a large white handkerchief which waved merrily. With gratitude unspeakable, Hazel waved hers in return; assured now that her deliverance was nigh, her long captivity near its end.

That morning, too, came the message the Captain had sent her. "My brother, who says he met you on board the steamer coming out, asks me to say he is ready to help you in any plan you may suggest, and if you have no plan, he can very soon make one. He thinks he knows the house, but by the time you get this you will have seen our signal. He says, keep up your spirits and trust to him."

Digitized by Google

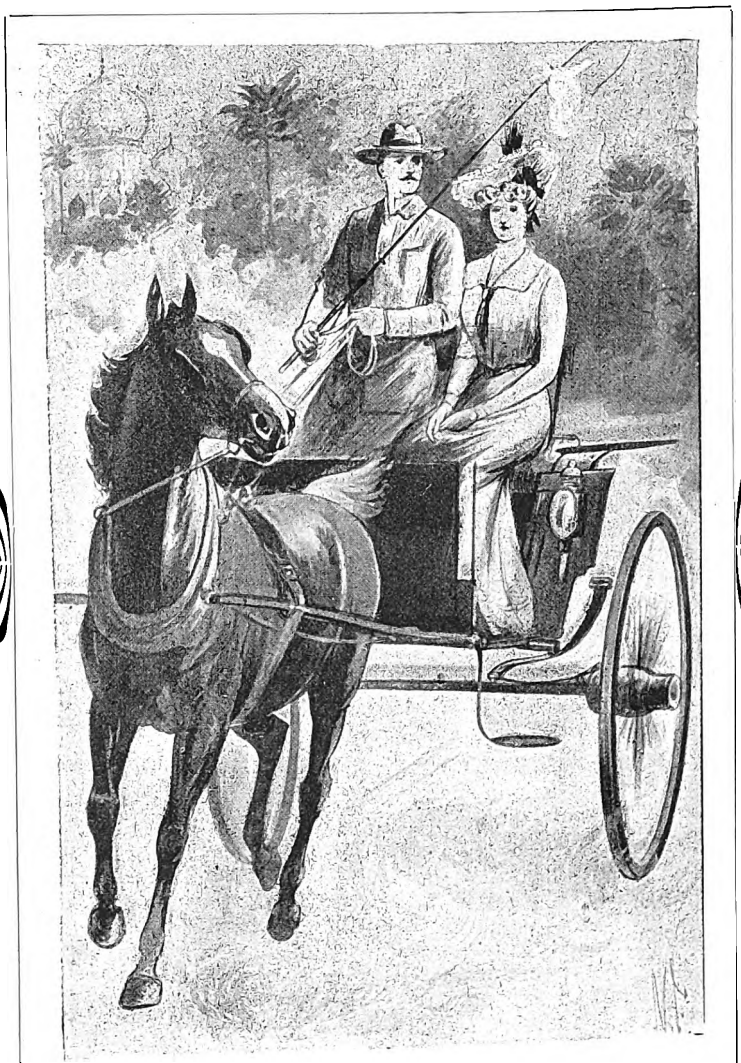
Two days later Eva sat reading Alison's "History of Europe" in the verandah.

"I should think you would know an awful lot of history, by the time you get through with that," said the Captain quizzically, as he came out with his brother-in-law.

"Yes," said George, settling himself in his long armchair, "I never knew Eva try to improve her mind before. I'm afraid she must be going to have some illness."

"She has had a touch of the sun, I think," said her brother. "I know nothing else that would make a woman want to addle her brains with history, when she hasn't got her living to get. You'll see, George, she will be running all over the place trying to bite us all, presently."

"There are some very interesting things in Alison," said Eva severely.



TIED TO THE WHIP WAS A WHITE HANDKERCHIEF WAVING MERRILY.

Her brother came and looked over her shoulder, reading with her:

"I have no words to express my gratitude to your noble brother. This is my plan: The zenana garden, which is at the back of the house, below my terrace, is surrounded by a high wall. He must get over this wall on the right hand side, as you face the house, at the corner nearest the house, where there is a big tamarind tree. I cannot tell you what is on the other side of the wall, but I think he will want a ladder. He must come at night, when there is moonlight. If he follows the wall of the house he will come to a little outside staircase which leads on to the terrace, where I shall be waiting for him. As I cannot tell what hour, or even what night, he will come, it is better I should not wait in the garden. He must choose his own time, when it is most convenient to him, and when he thinks it safest to enter the garden. Then I will lead him to an underground passage that goes from the garden out on to the banks of the Coombe. When we get there, will he bring me to you, my friend ? "

Digitized by Google

" Well, it seems very dull stuff," said the Captain with a yawn, turning to his own long armchair.

Having finished his cigar, George went away to his office. He was a civilian, whose affairs have no bearing on this story.

" So it is all settled, Redge ! " said Eva, excitedly. " Do you think you will be able to manage to get over that wall ? "

" With time and patience, and a ladder, perhaps," said the Captain, lazily.

" Doesn't it seem rather strange to you, that, with that passage just close at hand, Hazel should never have thought of running away by herself ? " said Eva.

" Oh, women hate underground passages in the dark, by themselves," said he. " And there may have been other reasons. You see the husband advised her not to try it by herself. And I think she said in her first letter that she had tried to escape several times, and they had always caught her."

" Poor Hazel ! " said Eva.

" I say, Eva, I wish you would come along with me, and have a look at the front of the old Turk's bungalow. Hazel's idea of my climbing that wall does not recommend itself to me. I am not at all sure I could get up by a rope, and a ladder, of course, is out of the question, unless the Johnny next door leaves one handy on his side of the wall."

" Do you mean to go now, at once, Redge ? "

" Yes, now. At this time of day every Mahomedan who respects himself will be taking his siesta. I don't believe the night is the best time, begging Hazel's pardon. It is always better to see what you are about. And I should like to have a look at the front of the fortress."

As they drove along together, having dispensed with a groom, he explained his idea. " I shall get out at the gate," he said, " and walk straight up to the house. If I see anyone about I shall ask if the Power Mem Sahib is at home, as you have come to call. Colonel Power lives somewhere down that road, I know. If no one appears, I shall simply go straight up on to the roof. There is always an outside staircase to these houses, and as, from Hazel's description, it does not appear to be at the back, it must be somewhere in front, or on one side. When I get out, you wait in the road ; if you see me speaking to anyone, wait till I come out and join you. If you see me mounting to the roof, drive off, and don't look behind you."

" What on earth will you do on the roof ? " she asked, frightened at the boldness of his plan, " you could never bring Hazel away at this hour of the day."

" I don't know exactly what I shall do until I get there," he answered coolly. " I have brought a good stout cord to let myself down on to Hazel's terrace ; it is round my waist at this moment, ruining the fit of my second best coat."

" Oh, dear, do be careful," she urged.

" You may expect me to walk in, with Hazel, any time to-night," he said cheerfully. " Now, don't be a goose, Eva, there is nothing for you to get into a panic about. It will be all right, you'll see, and as easy as eating your dinner."

All the front of the Nabob's house seemed sunk in profound slumber, as they drove up to it. The venetians were all closed, no living creature was in sight. Over all brooded the profound hush of the burning Eastern day.

" The old Turk and all his satraps are snoring away inside there at this very moment, like the seven sleepers of Ephesus," said the Captain, and he jumped down lightly out of the cart. " Now, don't forget, Eva, if I go up, you are to drive on at once."

He walked in a brisk, business-like manner up the drive, as one who had every right to be there, and went up the steps into the wide verandah. All the doors were closed, no one came out to speak to him or to ask him what he wanted. He stood waiting a moment; there was no staircase in sight. Presently he walked round to the side of the house, as though seeking some servant to admit him. There, at the side, was the staircase leading straight up to the flat roof. With one swift glance round on the deserted compound and sleeping house, he ran nimbly up the steep, stone steps to the roof; before he reached it, he heard the wheels of the pony cart as Eva drove away. Stooping behind the balustrade, he saw a servant come lazily out from the other side of the house, putting on his turban as he came. He stood looking stupidly after the vanishing pony-cart for a moment, and then went back to resume his interrupted siesta.

Digitized by Google

The Captain, on the roof, drew a long breath: "That was a near shave," he said. He crept softly along the side of the roof to the back. There, peeping between the columns of the balustrade he could look down, unobserved, into the garden beneath.

In a deep, green nook of coolest shade, he saw a fair lady sitting, clad in the graceful dress of a native lady, a dress of purest white, with wide borderings of pale violet embroidery, and light loose draperies that waved and fluttered like the wings of some soft white bird, as she rocked herself to and fro. Behind her, a woman stood fanning her, as she sat reading; another had brought her cool drinks and fruits upon a silver tray; a little further off, three or four more lay sleeping. Their bright dresses made a pretty group of colour and life in the deep green of the garden.

"And that, I suppose," said the Captain, "is Hazel."

———

CHAPTER XI.

Hazel leaned on her balcony in the moonlight. The moon had risen early, and was now declining to her setting, throwing long, mysterious shadows in the silent garden. The delicate odours of a thousand flowers came up to her sweetly; a thousand gentle sounds of timid-moving creatures of the night were in her ears; and in her soul was the peace of a great hope near its fulfilment. All the old impotent anger, the chafing and struggling and bitterness had died out of her heart. Her very pose, as she leaned idly there, was full of the restful patience of one who waits willingly.

"He cannot come to-night," she said, breathing the words down softly to her friends the trees in the garden. "He cannot come to-night. But some night he will surely come, and I shall go away with him to the happier life in my own land, across the seas."

And one, leaning on the roof above, heated and wearied, and sick with a long vigil in the pitiless sun, heard her.

"Hazel," he whispered softly. "Hazel, I am here."

She looked about her, bewildered.

"Look up," he said; "I am here on the roof."

And she, looking up, beheld the deliverer as one who had descended out of Heaven to help her.

"Are you alone?" he asked; "Can I come down?"

"Yes, I am alone," she answered, "but there is no way to come down."

But his cord was prepared; already he had fastened it to the balustrade, and made the knots and loops that should steady his feet in the descent. He dropped it over now noiselessly, and silently he slipped down it to Hazel on the terrace.

She stood waiting to receive him without embarrassment; a happy smile upon her lovely face, her slender hands stretched out to him in gladdest welcome.

He took the slender hands in his, a little moved by her gladness, a little touched to a sentiment he scorned, by the ethereal beauty of her golden head, rising like some bright star from the floating clouds of the white veil that lay about her neck.

"I am Eva's brother, you know," he said awkwardly.

"Yes I know," she answered, and looking at him more closely, she knew him, but his name she had forgotten. "I remember you," she said, "you were on the steamer. You were always kind to me, even there."

"And you have lived in this house, ever since?" he said, looking round him curiously.

"I have never left it, since my husband brought me to this house," she answered. "except once for a few hours; but I will tell you that afterwards."

She did not ask him how he came upon the roof; and he said nothing of his vigil, or his fast, though he had meant to ask her for food before they braved the dangers of the secret passage.

Digitized by Google

"Are you ready to come now?" he asked. "Are they all quiet in the house, or must we wait till later?"

"It is too early yet," she said, "my women will come presently to bring me food. When I have sent them away again, we will wait for a little while till the house sleeps, and then we can go."

"Don't send the food away!" he said hastily, "I am very hungry, and thirsty too. I have been up there nearly all day, ever since early in the afternoon."

"Oh, I am so sorry," she said, "but my women will be here directly. Will you go up again for a very little while, for they will set the table out here? When I have sent them away I will call you. What shall I call you?"

"Call me Reginald," he said.

He climbed back by his cord, and drew it up after him, and sat down to wait yet a little longer. Presently he heard the servants come chattering, and running backwards and forwards on the terrace, and he heard Hazel saying: "Put it on the table and leave it. I am not hungry yet. When I am ready I will eat it, but you need not stay, you can go."

In a little while all was quiet, and he heard her silvery voice calling: "Reginald, Reginald!"

She set the food before him, waiting on him with most willing service.

"You must not wait on me, dear," he said, "it is my place to serve you." He said the little tender word, unthinkingly, and it seemed so simply natural that neither noticed it.

"Let me," she said, "I love to wait on you."

When he had finished, he led her down into the garden.

"I saw you sitting here to-day," he said, leading her across the lawn into the deep shadows. "You looked very cool and peaceful."

"It is a lovely, lovely place," she said, sighing softly in her great content. She had always loved the garden, but it had not seemed to her so altogether lovely in the days when she was always seeking a means of escape from it.

They sat down together on the grass. "Are you sorry to leave it after all, dear child?" he asked.

"No, I am very, very glad," she answered, "they would not allow you to stay here, you know."

"You seemed very unhappy from your letters," he said, "and you were always so bright and happy on board the steamer. Were you disappointed with your life here? Was it different from what you expected?"

She told him of her home-coming with Mahomed Ali, and how from that day she had never been allowed to cross the threshold of that prison-house; she told how they had taken away her clothes, and made her dress like the native women.

"But the dress becomes you, infinitely, dear," he said, "you could not look more lovely or graceful in anything than you look now in these clinging, floating things."

"I am glad you like them," she said, smiling at him with her sweet eyes. She went on to tell him how she had tried to escape, and how she had been prevented. She told him, too, shuddering, how Taj Bee died, who had tried to help her. And this story showed him, as nothing had done yet, that he was engaged in a really serious undertaking, and not a pretty masquerade in a moonlit, scented garden.

"Don't you think we ought to be going soon, dear?" he said.

"Yes, it is time," she answered. "But I am so afraid of that dark passage."

"You must not be afraid of anything, with me, dear child," he said, laying his hand softly on her. "Do you think I cannot protect you?"

(To be concluded in our next.)

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

CURIOUS PLACES OF WORSHIP.

By LESLIE GILLIAMS.

AMERICA has some strange and interesting places of worship. Religious services are held in an old election booth, a lighthouse, a stable, a flour and seed store, and in an old historical house which, way back in 1777, belonged to one of the most aristocratic families in the United States.

To this group of queer places where the Americans worship should be added a little church out in the western part of the United States. It is the edifice known as St. Peter's, located in Tacoma, Washington, and this church has the distinction of possessing the oldest as well as the strangest bell tower in the country.

The church is built beside a venerable fir-tree; the top of this tree was sawn off some time ago, at a distance of forty-eight feet from the ground, and the trunk which was left standing forms a unique tower from which an old bell calls the worshippers to service.

The tower is fully three hundred years old. Bishop Morris, of Oregon and Washington territory, at the time the top of the tree was cut off, counted the rings and found they numbered three hundred. The notches showed that three centuries of winter storms and summer sunshine had passed over the old monarch's head before it was claimed by the ministry and honoured by being made guardian of the bell, which was sent all the way from Philadelphia to Tacoma in 1874.

St. Peter's has an interesting history; it stands an appropriate memorial of the success achieved by perseverance, hopefulness and indomitable faith.

Back in the early seventies the Episcopalians of what was then known as Old Tacoma or Old Town, to distinguish it from the city of Tacoma proper, worshipped in a private residence. They were a little band of hard-working people, but they were religious enthusiasts, and they deeply felt the need of an edifice to consecrate to the Lord, where they could worship every Sunday and hold daily services.

This handful of people started a fund, and soon interested the Right Reverend Benjamin Wistar Morris, D.D., Bishop of Oregon and Washington, in their work.

Through his solicitations, a wealthy citizen of Washington donated a plot of ground large enough to erect a good-sized church upon.

With this encouragement the building fund grew rapidly, and in August of 1873, two years after the inception of the plan, work was commenced, on what was to be called St. Peter's P.E. Church, which proved to be the pride of the little congregation which gathered there every Sunday to worship.

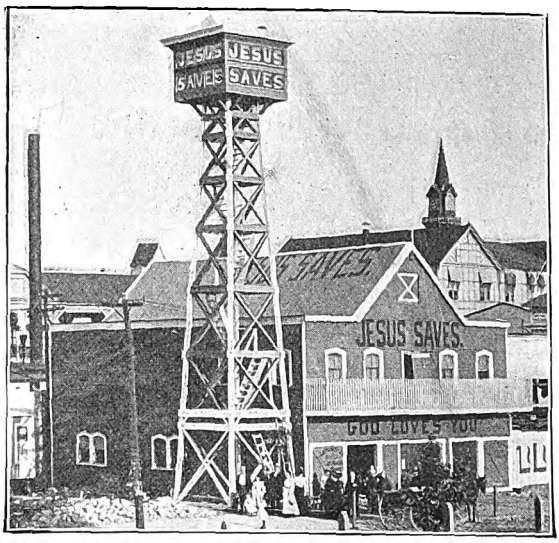
It was not more than six months before the church debt was paid off, and the faithful few started a fund for a reading desk, a pulpit, and other improvements.

They had no bell, and it seemed an unwarranted piece of extravagance to buy one—still the little flock felt that it was a great lack not to be able to send forth merry wedding peals, solemn funeral notes, and reverent calls to service. When an offer came from the children of St. Peter's Church of Philadelphia to send the St. Peter's Church of Tacoma a bell, the pastor and people felt that their cup of happiness was brimming full.

Rev. Chas. R. Bonnell, a missionary, took charge of the church, and it was he who had the inspiration of using the old fir-tree which stood close to the chapel as a bell tower.

The bell arrived in Tacoma on October 12th, 1874, and on the 17th of that month it was placed in its unique resting place. It is now completely covered with English

Digitized by Google



CONEY ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE AND CHURCH.

ivy, which gives it a wonderfully unique appearance. It is an object of great interest to tourists.

There is another feature about the whole thing which is very interesting—the ivy has crept through crevices into the church itself, thus forming a beaut'ful, natural and ever-green decoration. A ladder, extending from the peak of the roof to the tower, is used to reach the bell-rope, which can be gotten at at from that opening in the roof.

The church and tower stand on a hill, overlooking the beautiful waters of Puget Sound, in fact it is only a very short distance from there to the shore.

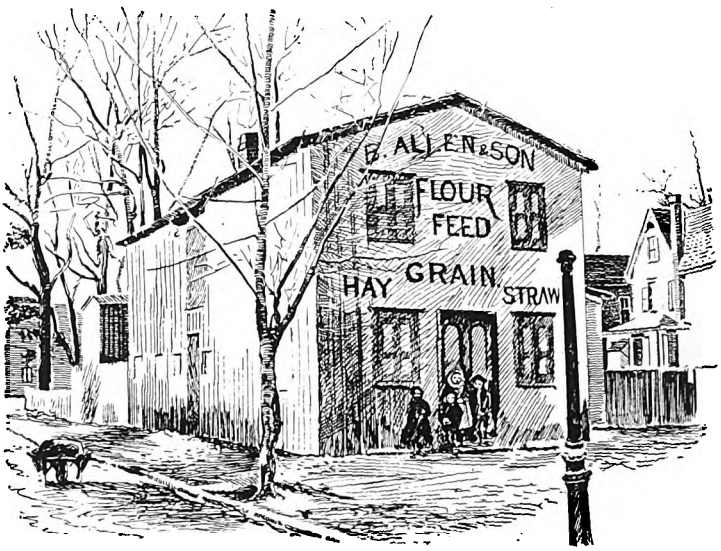
There is a town in New York State, or rather off the coast of New York State, generally thought of as a summer resort, and known by the name of Coney Island, which, in consequence of the life of gaiety common to the place, for years seemed decidedly set apart from everything religious.

For many years Coney Island was without a church, and great surprise was felt by all New Yorkers when recently it was announced that the Island was to have a religious edifice.

Not knowing just how well the new departure would be received, however, it was not thought advisable to construct a building to be used exclusively as a house of God. Consequently, the religious leaders consulted the fishermen of the place, and it was decided to erect a combined lighthouse and church.

Now, high above the Bacchanalian revels of Coney Island there arises this strange structure. It is not a Government building, nor does it belong to the city. It is the property of the reformers who determined to place a church in Coney Island.

The opening wedge has been driven, the church has successfully survived its first invasion into the wicked purlieus of Coney, and the time may yet come when the erstwhile evil island will become the preferred headquarters of the devout pleasure-seekers when they take their summer vacation. The church is attractive.



ONCE A FLOUR AND SEED STORE, NOW A CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

Digitized by Google

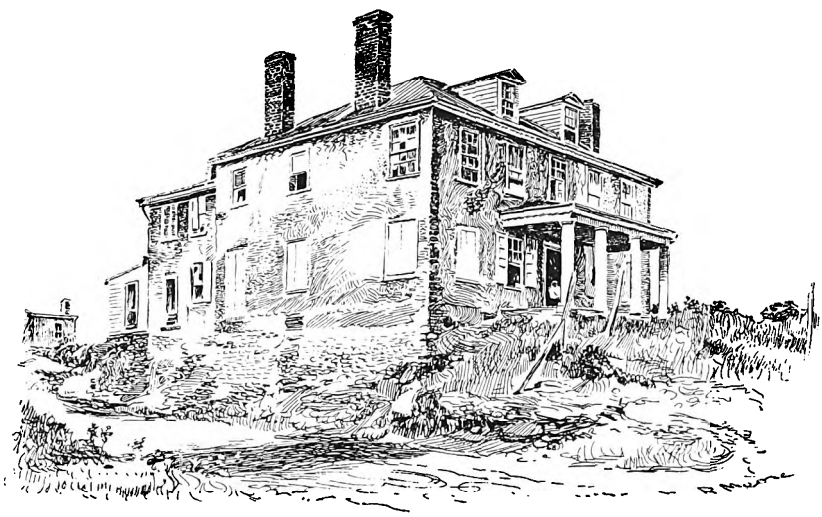
From all quarters of the island the steeple is discernible, and those two or three miles out at sea can read its inscription.

Upon its topmost boards shines during the day, in white letters, the text, "Jesus Saves," and at night the fierce white light of the arc shines through the transparent titles that spell "Jesus Saves." The light, an enormous electric affair, can be seen not only throughout the Island, but for miles beyond. It is eighty-five feet above the ground, and it turns slowly around the compass. It revolves from north to east, then to south and west, and finally back to north again. It has only been in position a short time, and was started without any prior warning. Consequently, when the glaring texts were first flashed out on the sky, many drunken revellers, staggering up and down Surf Avenue, were frightened almost into a condition of sobriety. Even yet the novelty of having a place of worship on the Island has not yet died out, and many of the older residents come daily to the quaint lighthouse church and curiously examine it. It is a genuine sensation to visitors, and since its opening, it has been consequently crowded with a strange assortment of all classes and conditions of people, the typical motley throng of a popular summer resort.

The church is located on Sea Beach Walk, in the very centre of the Island, near the Sea Beach Pavilion, where the trolley-cars stop. The lighthouse is less than 200 feet from the water's edge, and the electrician says that the message can be read two miles out at sea.

Probably the strangest of all the remarkable features of this unique church is the fact that no collections are taken, and no one is solicited to contribute to its support. It is maintained exclusively by voluntary donations, and has been so well managed that, despite the liberal expenditure in furnishing help to unfortunates, there is still in the treasury a balance to the good.

The church also differs from all other known places of sacred worship in the frequency of its services. Prayer meetings are held every day, afternoon and evening and on Sunday are maintained continuously until midnight, people coming and going as they like.



THE BALL-ROOM OF THIS HISTORICAL MANSION, IN THE UNITED STATES, IS NOW USED AS A CHURCH,

After years of neglect and abandonment, the famous old Roberts' Mansion of Philadelphia, a house around which are clustered memories of events connected with the earliest history of the United States, has again been reopened and rechristened. It is known to the coloured brethren who reside in the flourishing settlement, composed almost exclusively of coloured people, which has grown up around the old mansion, by the exceedingly imposing title of the "Sommerville Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church."

The picturesque and attractive old

Digitized by Google

Colonial ball-room of the dwelling has been turned into a church. At one end of the room a platform has been erected for use as an altar, upon which has been built an imposing reading desk with an altar-cloth and other necessary church furnishings.

It is doubtful if the stately old mansion was more beloved and cherished by its wealthy owners in times long past than it is now. since it has taken upon itself the rights and ceremonies of a sacred edifice by the lowly worshippers who gather beneath its roof every Sunday morning.

Strangers in Philadelphia, passing an old election booth in the city on Sunday mornings, are amazed to hear music issuing from the place; old familiar hymns ring out rich and clear, and if the visitor goes near enough he will hear the solemn tones of the minister leading the congregation in prayer.

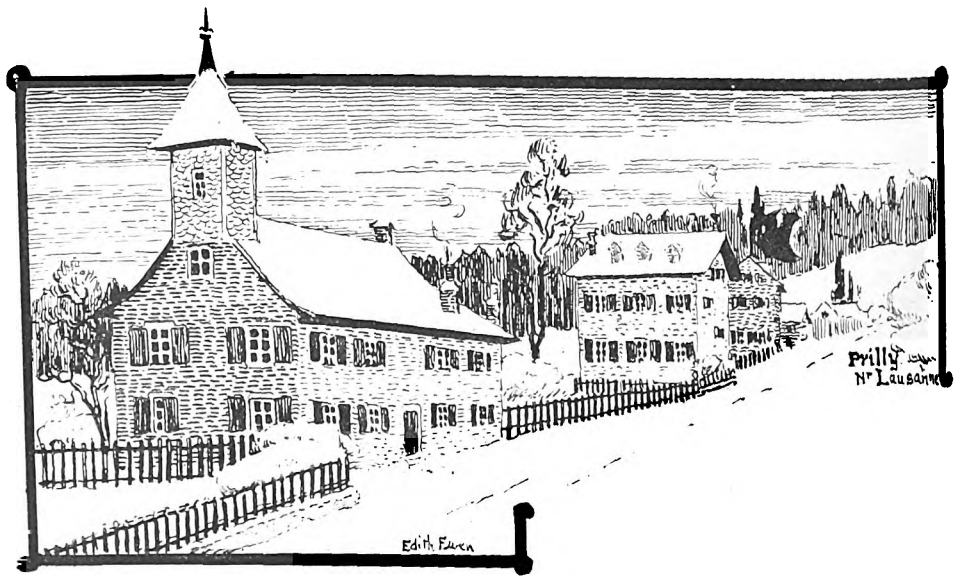
This old booth, after being discarded by the city, was presented, on request, to a Protestant Episcopal Church of Philadelphia, of which the congregation is a branch. The interior is a marvel of compactness and ingenuity. It seats exactly thirty-six people, eighteen on each side of the aisle.

Another strange house of worship is located in Gloucester, New Jersey. The denomination is Congregational, and the members worship in what was once a flour and seed store. This congregation is a notable example of this tendency to hold religious services in queer places. In the two years of its existence, this church has changed its meeting-place four times, the last move having just been made.

The congregation first held its meetings in an old building which was used as a gambling house during the palmy days of the Gloucester race track. When this place of worship was destroyed by fire, a saloon-keeper near by kindly offered a side room in his place to the pastor, who accepted the offer and conducted the church services in this saloon for three months.

Now the president of the Helping Hand Congregational Church has leased an old flour and seed store. The advertising signs still remain upon the building, giving it a bizarre appearance for a church.

The members of the New Covenant Baptist Church of Philadelphia worship in a stable, or rather, what was once a stable. The exterior of the building has been very little altered, the big double doors still remain, and the people of the vicinity have not yet become accustomed to seeing a stream of men and women issue from the doors, from which horses used to be led.



Digitized by Google

LOVE, THE CONQUEROR

By C. N. BARHAM.

SECOND PART.

. . . SYNOPSIS. . . .

Alice Maythorne, the headmistress of the Blue Bell Hill Girls' School, is resting during the children's play-hour, and is visited by Mr. Anderson, the manager of the school. Miss Maythorne tells him of two children of the name of Barnes who are away, and he promises to visit them for her. When he calls on the children he learns that their mother has just died. He makes acquaintance with Emily, their elder sister. After the funeral, which Mr. Anderson pays for, the orphans are taken to Malta Lodge, the home of his mother, where they stay for a time. While resting at Clifton Grove, by the Trent, one day, Emily makes acquaintance with Mr. Anderson's younger brother, William. Later on, Mr. Anderson finds Emily Barnes the post of teacher of music at a school, and also furnishes a little cottage for Emily and her sisters. Mrs. Anderson invites the Barnes' to a garden party, where they meet some relatives.

CHAPTER VII.

THE GARDEN-PARTY.

THE quiet, clever young music-teacher, in a soft black dress which never rustled, and with a voice that was never raised above its proper pitch, quickly gained the respect of the lady principal of the school in Laburnam Road and the love of her scholars. Nor did her success end there. Through the recommendation and interest of her zealous patrons, and her own talents, which she had not overrated, she was enabled to obtain several private pupils. Thus, when the holidays commenced, Emily Barnes found herself comparatively independent.

The cottage was an abode of bliss, for it was home. Perhaps the stray black cat had really brought good fortune. Sarah and Annie, who had regained their health and spirits, were as happy as birds on a summer's day.

During the holidays Mrs. Anderson gave a garden-party, and the Barneses were invited to it. This party was a grand affair, worthy of the mother of a provincial merchant prince. Upon the lawn, bright toilettes flashed and shimmered, paling the hues of the flowers, while a continued ripple of light laughter, mingled with the chatter of ladies' voices, put bird music to the blush. Emily Barnes was standing beside Mrs. Anderson, who was in a sense chaperoning her, when she heard an exclamation, "Here are the Wears!" She trembled, and would have retired, for that name recalled some of the most painful memories of her life, but Mrs. Anderson gave her an encouraging glance.

Mrs. Wear leaned upon the arm of her husband, a stout, florid, pompous man, who walked with a strut which he mistook for dignity. They were closely followed by a well-dressed, fashionably blase young man of five-and-twenty, their son, Reuben, who led his sister Laura, a girl of twenty, and by Miss Blanche, who was sweet seventeen, and boasted openly of her age. Mrs. Wear at once recognised Emily, and was rendered almost speechless at beholding her in that brilliant company.

However, Mrs. Wear took but little notice of Emily, for which the young lady was grateful; but presently, when Mr. William came forward, and led Emily off to look at the flowers in the new greenhouse, she positively glared after them with envy and hatred in her heart. She had secretly designed for Mr. William Anderson to fall a victim to Laura's scanty charms and plethoric purse. It was preposterous, shameful, positively indecent, she fumed—inwardly, of course—that that beggarly brat of a bankrupt, Edward Barnes, should have the impudence to throw herself in that gentleman's way!

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Wear lived two lives: one in public, and the other, which was more vinegary, in private. Just at the present she was in public, and therefore was upon her best behaviour. The envious glance was as brief as the passing of a fleecy cloud over the sun, and she was instantly all smiles and honeyed words. Many ladies who have a marriageable daughter upon their hands are reckless. Mrs. Wear was prudent, and unscrupulous.

The grounds were large, and there was no overflow of visitors into the greenhouse, where Mr. William Anderson pointed out his favourite plants, and chatted on about floriculture in his usual cheery, genial manner. Emily imagined the house as deserted except by themselves, and in her modesty was beginning to wish that someone would appear, when she heard Mr. Anderson saying, "This is the lotus tree, a plant which suggests rest, happiness, and all that kind of thing, you know --pleasures which seldom fall to the lot of us hard-worked mortals."

"Oh, yes, I quite understand," a lady replied—Emily recognised the voice as Miss Maythorne's,—"but I prefer the wild ling, and the scented wood-bine, to any of these plants so rich and rare. But, then, I am a simple country-woman who has her livelihood to earn, and make no pretensions to taste."

Emily was unhappy. It was one thing for William Anderson to take generous notice of her, to display the little attentions which every gentleman is always ready to give to a lady; it was another for her to play the part of an eavesdropper, which she was unintentionally doing. She experienced a relief when her sisters came running up, but their first words aroused in her a desire to shake them. Both exclaimed together, "Ah! we have found you at last, Mr. William! It was too bad of you to run away with our sister, Emily; we have been searching everywhere for her. Emily, Mrs. Anderson sent us to look for you."

William Anderson frowned; then he smiled, and said, "My brother seems more highly favoured than I do, Miss Barnes. I must take you to my mother. Well, she is the best of mothers, and I will not complain, although she might have dispensed with your attendance for a little time longer. It is very pleasant in here; nice even than the river." The speech was pointed and meaningful; he intended it to be so. Emily did not comprehend its full significance, she was too guileless and pure; but there was a something in it which caused her cheeks to burn, and she felt thankful their tete-a-tete was disturbed. Mrs. Anderson monopolised Emily's services for the remainder of the afternoon, and the poor girl did not know whether to be more thankful or sorry therefor. Yet she was rejoiced in heart for having been summoned from the conservatory.

Mrs. Wear had been cautious and careful, keeping as far as it was possible for her to do from Emily Barnes, and pointedly refraining from speaking about her to the hostess, who, she was shrewd enough to discern, had taken the objectionable young person up as a protege. It was not until the ex-hotel-keeper's wife, or, as she would have styled herself, lady, was again seated in her own carriage that she felt she might safely relax prudence. It is probable that she would not have done so even then, if her son, Reuben, had not forced her hand by inquiring, "Who was that very pretty girl in black, mater?"

The young man was unfortunate in his selection of terms. "I saw no such person, and am quite at a loss to understand whom you can mean!" Laura said with a sneer, answering for her mother.

"Then you must have been blind, sister mine. Let me assure you that I distinctly saw her, and manœuvred for an introduction, but old Mother Anderson was one too many for me. It looks as if she were designing the beauty for one of her sons!" was the blase gentleman's refined reply.

"You are not only incomprehensible, Reuben, but you are also horridly vulgar. I declare——," Laura was beginning to say, when her mother tartly snapped, "Be quiet, Laura: your brother must mean that odious Barnes girl!"

"Barnes! Never heard of her, but what's in a name! Her face is her fortune!" and the amorous Reuben complacently twisted his flaxen moustache.

"You may not have met the girl before, my dear boy, for she never was in our set; we were always a cut above her people. She is a daughter of old Edward Barnes, the bankrupt Northwood shipowner." The over-dressed woman reverted to her lowly-born type in this angry speech. It was true, however, that the Barneses had not been in the Wears' set; for they were abstainers, and the Wear fortune had been built up in an hotel.

"Anyway, she's an uncommonly attractive-looking piece of goods. It would be interesting to learn how she came down this way." Reuben was importunate in his quest for information.

"She is passable, but she has neither Laura's figure nor Blanche's face!" the fond mother answered, looking admiringly at her two daughters, who were both cross and peevish.

"You haven't told a fellow how she came here," Reuben exclaimed, returning to the attack.

"Oh, I suppose the family was ashamed of the disgrace. Anyway, they came and hid themselves away in the slums, where your father found them and helped them; but paupers are an ungrateful tribe. I believe the girl teaches music, or something of the kind. It is to her credit that she has the grace to do something for a living; though it appears she sponges upon those Andersons, who, as everybody says, are easily imposed upon. But that is only what might be expected from such a mushroom family. Old Anderson, the grandfather, was only a common twist hand, who worked for a weekly wage." Mrs. Wear was justified in her scorn; for her own grandfather had certainly not been a twist hand, but a drayman.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"Whatever the old buffer was, they have managed to make their pile. I say, you girls might do worse than set your caps at those two stuck-up young fools, the old girl's sons. They have the cash, if they haven't manners." The height of fashionable manhood, according to Reuben Wear's limited standard of manners, was to play billiards at The Griffin, and to frequent the grand-stand at Colwick Park in the racing season.

"For shame, my son! As if the dear girls would be guilty of even thinking of such unmaidenly folly! I am thankful that your father's money renders it unnecessary for them to set their caps at anybody!" Mrs. Wear said sharply.

The youth accepted the maternal reproof with a prolonged whistle, and his mother, wrapping herself in silence, gazed gloomily out of the window. Nothing more was said until the staring red-brick building which they called home was reached.

CHAPTER VIII.

FALSE FRIENDS.

Within a week the Wear family, Mr. Wear only excepted, called again at Malta Lodge. Of course, the carriage was ordered, and they drove. The Wears were not a walking family, and a carriage was of no use in the coach-house. Reuben showed himself unusually amiable during the drive, even denying himself the solace of a cigar. He was cherishing a purpose of his own.

As they ascended the steps, he casually remarked, "I suppose it would be good business to inquire after that Barnes girl, mater? You see her people were old acquaintances of ours, and we are not stuck-up."

The suggestion was as gall and wormwood to the purse-proud, vulgar woman, but she seldom thwarted her darling son, and, not suspecting that he had any ulterior motive, she decided that there could be no harm in making the inquiry. "And, mater," Reuben added more boldly, "don't forget that it is a long time since I saw any of the family. So, if we should happen to meet them here, especially that bewitching little girl in black, give me an introduction, if you please. That girl is a perfect sylph."

A queer little smile, which resolved itself into a sneer, flitted across Laura's face. Laura was plain-featured, that could not be denied, but she was not by any means a fool. She read her shallow-pated brother as if he had been an open book. "Sylph! You must be rather far gone, Reuben; your association with barmaids has vitiated your taste. To a woman's eye the girl was a perfect frump!" she said sarcastically.

Reuben flushed up to his eye-brows; he was about to make an angry reply, but thought better of it, and laughed uneasily. Fortunately for their own peace of mind, the Wears were accustomed to give but small heed to Laura's caustic speeches. She was a chartered libertine of acerbity, and a past-mistress in the art of saying unpleasant things in a shrewish manner.

The fates, those vagrant sprites that so make or mar life, were apparently disposed to favour the plans of Reuben Wear, for Emily Barnes was at Malta Lodge.

The meeting between Mrs. Anderson and her visitors was not a cordial one, but it was conventionally polite. Reuben was not slow to display symptoms of impatience, and his mother, perceiving this, remembered her promise to him. Assuming her most gracious manner, she asked, "And how is Miss Barnes, dear Mrs. Anderson? I was so surprised and delighted to meet her at your garden-party. You know, we knew her slightly, very slightly, some years ago." And this was the woman who had turned her back upon the distressed widow and orphans, leaving them either to live or die, as best they might!

The mine was sprung under Mrs. Anderson's feet, and she was unprepared. It had all happened so unexpectedly. "Why, Emily is here in the house now: how fortunate——," she began to say, and paused. She could have bitten her lips with vexation for having literally given the poor girl away.

The admission had been made, and was immediately fastened upon. "Oh, then, please do allow us to see her. It will be so nice! I am sure the dear girl will be pleased to meet us for the sake of old times. Dear girl, you remember how often we have talked of her!" Mrs. Wear exclaimed with too much effusiveness for sincerity.

Mrs. Anderson, regretting her error, could not refuse, so she sent for Emily, who, however, returned a message respectfully declining an interview.

But the Wears, having entered upon a woman-hunt, were not easily rebuffed. "Do insist that the dear creature shall come in, Mrs. Anderson. She is only nervous: girls in her position are always gauche and distraite," Mrs. Wear urged, and Reuben, plucking at his moustache, seconded his mother's plea. So Mrs. Anderson, considering that an ill deed done were better quickly done, herself sought the recalcitrant one.

"I cannot do so; indeed I cannot. If you understood all, you would not ask me to meet those people," Emily cried, with tears in her eyes.

"I do understand, and sympathise with you, my child; but it will be wise for you to meet them, especially as they desire it. These people have a certain amount of influence, and you must not make enemies unnecessarily, if you wish to succeed."

Emily was by nature amiable and yielding, where principle was not involved, and upon reflection saw the propriety of acquiescing with her patroness's reasonable request; so, drying her eyes, she arose, and timidly accompanied that lady down and into the drawing-room, where, when they were alone, the Wears had been indulging in sundry spiteful remarks. But when Emily entered, they were at once all smiles and falsity.

Digitized by Google

The triumph of feminine diplomacy was in the highest degree gratifying to the self-satisfied Reuben, who, to do him justice, had controlled his tongue under the temptation of the women's bitter speeches. He immediately secured the coveted introduction through his crafty mother, who imprinted a Judas kiss upon the girl's pale cheek; while Laura and Blanche, dispensing with oscular salutations, so rising superior to hypocrisy, each proffered a fish-like hand, which Emily slightly touched. This was Reuben's day, his opportunity, and, with a prudence which few persons would have suspected him to possess, he boldly exerted himself to be agreeable to the elder lady, so that, through her, he might arouse the interest of the younger one.

The entrance of William Anderson changed the conversation, directing it into other channels, and soon afternoon tea was brought in. "I would rather have a wine, if it is agreeable!" Reuben remarked sotto voce to William, as the two young men stood at the window.

"I regret to be unable to offer it. I thought you were aware that we all belong to the cold-water army!" was William's reply, made in the same low tone.

"Milksop!" the hopeful youth growled audibly; but his companion appeared not to hear him, or, if he did so, treated the ejaculation with contempt.

As Mrs. Wear complacently sipped her tea, she watched William Anderson with eager interest; the intensity of her gaze, however, being broken by frequent glances at her two daughters, her desire being that they should appear at their best to eclipse that forward minx from the slums, but it was often directed back again to William Anderson, who was happily unconscious that he was the object of her observation, and the intended victim of her match-making designs.

Mr. Anderson was absent, but that was rather an advantage than a misfortune in the eyes of the scheming woman, for he was not regarded as a marrying man. With his brother William it was different; he was young, and young men are supposed to be susceptible to feminine charms. If only Laura were wise enough to play her cards discreetly, she might win him, and the fond mother believed that her daughter held the winning card. For, although the Andersons were reputed wealthy, Laura was an heiress, and a rich bride was not to be despised, for hard cash is always a useful commodity in colossal businesses. Mrs. Wear quietly drank tea, and schemed while she watched, saying within herself, "Reuben shall invite this young man to our house; then we will ask him to dine with us, and Laura, dear girl, shall wear my diamonds."

When the crafty, unscrupulous woman arose to go, followed by her undutiful brood, it was with the prospective melody of wedding bells, more tuneful than her own had been, ringing in her ears. Mrs. Wear was a wise woman, but the wisdom of this world is foolishness when it is pitted against the designs of Providence.

CHAPTER IX.

PLANS THAT FAILED.

Mrs. Wear was not a woman who allowed the grass to grow under her feet when she had an object in view. With the instinctive craft and pertinacity of a weasel, when she had marked her prey she hunted it to the death. She had marked William Anderson down, and was resolved that by hook or by crook he should be induced to propose to her daughter Laura. There was only that odious girl Emily Barnes, a by-product of Narrow Marsh, who stood in the way, threatening the miscarriage of her cherished project. Mrs. Wear entertained a shrewd suspicion that the music-teacher's pretty face had attracted the gentleman's attention, and that she would prove to be a formidable rival to her own plainer-featured child. Judging others by her own questionable standard, she believed that Emily, who had nothing to lose, and so much to gain, would throw herself in his way, and leave no stone unturned to win so desirable a prize in the matrimonial market.

Poor Emily! how bitterly she was misjudged. Such a thought was far from her mind. If it had occurred to her, she would have put it away with self-contempt and loathing, as an act of treachery to her generous benefactors. She would have hidden herself to struggle with the monstrous ingratitude until she conquered it, and have gone no more to Malta Lodge. To state that William Anderson was unattractive in her eyes, or that she was indifferent to his manly bearing, would be untruthful. She respected and looked up to him from an almost immeasurable distance. His chivalrous bearing towards his mother, together with his unwearying courtesy to herself, impressed her favourably; she would have been more or less than a woman if they had not done so, for women invariably admire and esteem men who treat their sex with deference. But it never once occurred to her pure and simple mind that he regarded her other than merely sympathetically. She thought no more highly of herself than she ought to think, but was as innocent of forming cunning plans for her own advantage as a little child; as humble as when she had toiled with the scissors for a piece of bread in the lodging-house; and had no thoughts of marrying, or of being sought in marriage.

It was not long before cards of invitation to a grand dinner-party were issued by Mrs. Wear, and the projected brilliancy of the gathering was such that it created quite a sensation in local fashionable circles. The ex-hotel-keeper's wife had so dexterously spread her net that a couple of Members of Parliament, together with bankers, and other small celebrities, were caught in its meshes. It was also broadly hinted that the Andersons had accepted, and Mr. William Anderson's name was so constantly mentioned that some surmised he was the admirer, if not the accepted lover, of either Laura or Blanche. The gossip that followed was not discouraged by the family, nor was it displeasing to Laura, who persuaded herself that the irresponsible chatter must have originated from some declaration of regard covertly.

Digitized by Google

made by the young merchant, and that he had a penchant for her.

The rumour reached Emily's ears, to her dismay. William Anderson was about to marry Laura Wear! The sentence rang in her dazed brain. Well, it was only natural, for she was rich. He was too noble to marry for money, but he would marry where money was. She hoped he would be happy in his love.

And then she timidly, yet with a Christian's boldness, closely scrutinised her every word and action from the day that he and she first met in Clifton Grove, to discover whether she had been so unmaidenly as to betray her weakness—the fostering of a sweet sentiment unbecoming to her dependent position. But no; sit in judgment upon herself as she would, she could not condemn herself of the guilt of over-forward behaviour.

The question to be answered was, What should she do? She would see him no more; she would not go again to Malta Lodge! But reflection came to her aid. Such conduct would be unjust towards Mrs. Anderson, who had uniformly treated her with consideration and implicitly trusted her. And, also, if she were to absent herself, she must explain the reason. That was quite impossible. In the end she tampered with her conscience, resolving that she would for the future only see William Anderson in his mother's presence.

And if only Emily, thus tossed upon the seas of doubt and fear, had known the truth, she was uppermost in the thoughts of the young man who was being made the apple of discord, as at that very time he was penning a polite note to Mrs. Wear, respectfully declining her invitation, upon the irrefutable plea that urgent business called him to London. What the business was he did not explain; it may have been invented, certainly it was convenient.

So the vulgar rich woman's carefully-planned dinner-party came on, and went off, with all the splendour, glitter, and display of its promise and performance. If either she or her daughters were disappointed in consequence of the absence of any of the invited guests, they did not wear their hearts upon their sleeves for daws to pick at, but bore the pain with Spartan heroism.

Laura was taken down to dinner by a prosy borough Member of Parliament, and the unsophisticated Blanche, entrusted to the care of a Major in the "Robin Hood Fire and Fall-backs," improved her opportunity by retailing the latest scandals to her polite but startled partner. William Anderson's name was not even mentioned. He was away in town, and therefore was not exposed to the wiles of the charmer; the pompous, verbose M.P. suffered in his stead. If Laura Wear had not gained, neither did she lose by his enforced absence, which she imagined he deplored as much as she did. Yet, if the self-complacent man-hunters had been aware, they would have been humiliated. William Anderson's business afforded him a legitimate excuse for declining the invitation to a gathering for which he had no taste. His mother, too, always straightforward, approved. She had no desire for a Wear as a daughter-in-law. Laura was already half washed out, and gave no promise of wearing well.

And Emily? She lived her daily life quietly, occupying herself with teaching, attending to the duties of the home, and training the children; so working out her salvation by the development of character. Notwithstanding her trust in God, and her confidence that He would cause all things to work for her good, her heart was heavy with sadness; yet no trace of grief showed itself upon her face, which remained calm and peaceful in its expression, although a trifle paler than it was wont to be.

Upon the day following the Wears' disappointing triumph, as Emily, who had returned from the school, was taking off her hat and cloak, Susan Jennings ran into the cottage, and exclaimed, breathlessly, "Oh, Miss Barnes, I am so glad to find you in, for Mrs. Anderson wished you to come round at once. She is so anxious, and I have run all the way."

Susan was generally a welcome visitor, but now a great fear took possession of the girl's heart. Her conscience was stirred, and fluttered like a sitting bird disturbed. Bang! with the report of a cannon, the question was fired at her from her heart's citadel by the inward monitor: What could she be wanted for? Surely her guilty secret had not been discovered! And how strangely the mills of God ground the corn of human intentions, and His hammers demolished their resolutions! Here was her determination broken down at a blow. Mrs. Anderson had sent for her; that lady's request could not be refused; she must go and dree her weird. So, with a trembling dread of unknown consequences she prepared to accompany Susan.

Mrs. Anderson was sitting tranquil and composed, awaiting Emily's arrival. At the sight of that sweet, smiling face, all Emily's terror fled. And when the good old lady, with all the tenderness of a mother, drew down her head, and, smoothing the glossy locks of hair, kissed her on both cheeks, she forgot all except former kindnesses. Even the too-sensitive conscience forbore to upbraid her at that moment. So true in the light of a tried experience is it that perfect love casteth out fear, for it is fear that torments.

Mrs. Anderson, holding up her right hand, and showing a bandaged wrist, said with a gentle smile, "You wonder why I sent for you in such a hurry, but you won't regret coming to the assistance of a cripple."

"Oh, madam, I am so sorry! How did it happen?" was the excited, sympathetic inquiry. Suffering never appealed in vain to Emily of the tender heart.

"It is nothing," was the reply. "Only a slight sprain caused by my foolish attempt to save a falling flower-pot, which was broken after all. But I have a letter to write before post time, and, unfortunately, am unable to hold my pen." The girl, pleased to be of service, immediately volunteered to act as amanuensis. "I was sure you would do so, my child, or I would not have sent for you. We will commence at once. The letter is to my son William."

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Mrs. Anderson, I cannot write the letter!" Emily wailed, recoiling from the davenport at which she was about to seat herself. The gulf had opened at her feet, and she felt that she was lost—hopelessly lost!

"Why not, child? why are you unable to write this letter?" Mrs. Anderson asked, a shade of annoyance flitting across her face.

"Because—because it is to a gentleman!" was the foolish reply. What other reason could the bewildered girl assign?

"Nonsense! The letter is to my son; and it is mine, not yours. If your discretion could not be trusted, you would not be requested to do me the favour. Let us get the letter written at once. Emily, I insist!"

Mrs. Anderson was evidently in earnest, and Emily could not refuse compliance with her request without betraying the secret of which she was so thoroughly ashamed. She sat down at the davenport, and with a trembling hand wrote from dictation, and when her clerical work was finished, sealed the letter. So, contrary to her inclination, the sorely-tried girl wrote to William Anderson, consoling herself with the unsatisfactory reflection that he was not acquainted with her handwriting.

When Emily reached home she mechanically opened her volume of George Herbert's poems and read;

"O, who will give me tears? Come, all ye springs,
Dwell in my head and eyes; come, clouds and rain;
My grief hath need of all these watery things
That Nature hath produced."

Leaning her weary head upon her hands, she sighed, "I can neither read nor sew, for I am walking in thick darkness. My Bible tells me to believe that God is still working for my best happiness, and that He has good reasons for permitting these trials. I pray to believe it; I try to drive out of my mind all hard thoughts of my Father in heaven; I say to myself that He is Love, but it does not comfort me as it ought to do. I cannot submit meekly, and trust in the dark. And then, to add to my anguish the fear creeps in that perhaps, after all, I am not a child of God, my faith having failed in the day of trial. Sometimes I cry out from the depths of my soul, 'Forsake me not, O my God.' If His love were quite extinguished in my heart, should I be so distressed? The sword pierces, and I bleed; my life withers!"

CHAPTER X.

THE SCHOOL-MISTRESS.

There has now to be recorded an important incident which led up to a change in the affairs of the family at Malta Lodge. Mr. Anderson had so long been a school-manager, and had taken such an interest in elementary education, that the oversight of the schools in his district had practically been left to him. And under his care the schools flourished. The teachers, always encouraged, worked thoroughly, and the scholars, well controlled, and ruled by love, responded so readily that the "Excellent" grant had been annually earned. The Government Inspector had been heard to declare that his inspections and examinations were more of a pleasure than a task to him.

All this was suddenly altered. Mr. Wear was appointed a school-manager, and he almost at once commenced a crusade against the old and tried methods which had worked so satisfactorily. He handled a new broom, and swept very clean. He systematically harassed and worried the teachers, endeavoured to to introduce new rules, and encouraged complaints by parents, which, as all who know anything about elementary schools are aware, a certain class of people are only too ready to make. The result of such meddlesome interference was that several teachers resigned, while those who held on to their posts were tried almost beyond endurance.

Upon no school did the harsh hand of the innovator fall more heavily than upon the one at Blue Bell Hill, where the best results had hitherto always been obtained. It appeared as if Mr. Wear entertained a feeling of personal spite against the mistress, Miss Maythorne. That lady bore all patiently as long as she could, and then the inevitable break-down occurred. A last straw broke the camel's back.

The crisis came on a Friday morning, when Mr. Anderson was present. He had gone through the school, examined the log-book, and expressed his satisfaction with all that he saw and heard. He made as if about to leave, and was drawing on his gloves, when Miss Maythorne quietly, but with a perceptible quaver in her voice, inquired whether he really were satisfied.

"Yes, certainly. I do not think you have ever known me to find fault, and there has never been any occasion to do so. You are quite a model teacher!" was his encouraging reply.

"I thank you," was the reply. "You are always appreciative and kind. I wish as much could be said of some of the other gentlemen. But I desire to consult you upon an important matter, if you will spare me a few minutes in my own room."

"Gladly. The more willingly because your request only anticipates one which I was about to make."

The school-mistress led the way to her own apartment, which was largely devoted to blackboards, maps, and a cupboard for school requisites, and, her courage failing her, stood waiting for the manager to speak.

Mr. Anderson was essentially a practical man. He went straight to the point which the mistress herself had raised. "Do I understand that some of my colleagues have been annoying you?" he asked, adding, "Go on doing your duty, and take no notice."

The tears gathered in Miss Maythorne's eyes as she remarked, "I cannot endure continual fault-finding any longer. It is all owing to Mr Wear; the school has not been the same since he became a manager. He was here only yesterday, and declared that the school is disgracefully conducted, that he is constantly receiving complaints from parents, that the lobbies are untidy and—and that the log-book is not correctly kept."

Digitized by Google

"The latter charge is a very serious one," the manager said in a low, grave tone.

"It is, and an utterly untrue one."

"I am convinced of that, Miss Maythorne."

"Mr. Wear has expressed his intention to bring all these matters before the Board; and—and I am tired of all these complaints for which there is no foundation. It is my wish to resign."

A singular light gleamed in the listener's eyes as Miss Maythorne thus announced her decision, but he only remarked, "I am decidedly of the opinion that such will be your wisest course. It will end the difficulty."

The teacher showed her astonishment by the sudden pallor that overspread her countenance. Probably this was not what she had expected him to say. There are times when people only express a determination so that they may be persuaded out of it. She said sadly, "It seems to be my only remedy. There is no other way open. So I thought I would mention it to you, and ask if you will obtain for me a recommendation from the Board, for I shall require one in order to obtain another appointment."

"A recommendation! No, really you must not ask me to obtain that for you. It is the last thing I should care to do," he said while he fidgeted with his gloves. The remark fell upon her ears as the knell of hope. And she had always put her trust and confidence in this man, who had expressed unstinted approval of the way in which she had performed her duty! The blunt refusal stung her to the quick. The blood rushed torrentially from her heart and from her head, leaving her sick and faint, and, with a strange singing noise in her ears, she staggered, and nearly fell—would have fallen if he had not caught her in his strong arms.

"No, Miss Maythorne," he said, and there was a wealth of tenderness in his tone. "I cannot do so, for the reason that I do not wish you to take another appointment. You must relinquish this tedious, humdrum calling." She heard him, but made no answer. "Will you?" he asked her.

Still not understanding, she said, "There is nothing else that I am fitted for. You know the saying, 'Once a teacher, always a teacher.'"

"Yes, Miss Maythorne—Alice—there is. Listen! I want you; oh, so much! Alice, hear me! Do not say no. I have loved you so long; have you never guessed it?"

She sank backward into a chair. "I was quite mistaken. I fancied she cared for me, and now I have frightened her!" he exclaimed, and was about to summon assistance, when she rallied, and gazed upon him with wondering eyes. He saw, and caught her to his breast. "My Alice, my own sweet darling! Say that you really care for me a little bit!" he cried pleadingly between hope and fear.

"I have always cared for you," she sobbed in a whisper.

"Then, darling, promise that you will be my wife."

"If you really desire it. But, oh, do not mistake. I am poor, lowly born. Yet, if I lost your love now, I think I should die."

"Dearest Alice, we Andersons are self-made, and attach no importance to birth. For the rest, you are rich. Rich, my love, in beauty, in grace, and in goodness of character!" he exclaimed rapturously, as he kissed her upon the eyes, cheeks, and lips a hundred times. The strong self-reliant man became almost a boy in the ardour of his love. But in truth no mere boy can love with the intensity of a strong man's passion.

Alice Maythorne, overborne by vehemence, abandoned herself to the pleasure of being so caressed, but not for long. Reflection came to her assistance. She began to ask, "But your mother, Mr. Anderson?—what will she say to me?".

She was wise enough to comprehend that mothers like to exercise an influence over their sons' choice of wives.

"My mother already appreciates you for your work's sake. She will learn to love you for my sake, and for your own!" he said encouragingly.

"George!" she shyly whispered.

"Alice, my own little sweetheart!"

Again their lips met, while two hearts beat as one.

And all this time the under-teachers and the scholars were wondering what detained the headmistress. When Miss Maythorne returned to the desk, they all observed that she was unusually silent and thoughtful. She was so happy. The world had become bright again. Her heart had met its complement, had swung to its anchorage. The petty tyrant Wear, clothed in a little brief authority, had no longer the power to trouble her, for God had given to her weary life an answer of peace. Love was conqueror.

As for the arbitary ex-hotel-keeper, he was shortly to learn that his fangs were drawn. Mr. Anderson was on his way to his own counting-house, when he ran against no less a person than Mr. Wear, who blurted out, "Ah, Anderson, I am on my way to Blue-bell Hill."

"I have only now come from there, where I learn, to my regret, that you have expressed dissatisfaction with the teaching, and the arrangements generally," was the stiff reply. George Anderson was not a man to beat about the bush, he said plainly what he meant.

"Ah, yes, that is so. The fact is the school has got a little loose; the screws need tightening. The youngsters are out of hand, and the mistress requires overhauling."

"You need not interfere any further, sir; the lady is about to resign her appointment."

"Lady! Women are all ladies now-a-days. But resign,—whew!"

"I said 'lady.' Miss Maythorne has done me the honour to consent to become my wife. Our roads lie differently, I think, Mr. Wear. Permit me to wish you good day" And Mr. Anderson left the astonished man.

"His wife! By St. Boniface, that's a new move!

Digitized by Google

What will the missus and the gals say? Well, they will make the most of it," Mr. Wear exclaimed ruefully wishing he had been more guarded in his speech and actions.

CHAPTER XI.

A DRUNKEN RUFFIAN.

As a stone, when rolling down a hill, constantly gathers speed, so events connected with this story hastened towards a denouement. All things come to the man who waits. William Anderson had waited patiently, admiring Emily Barnes from a distance, his love growing by what it feasted upon, but finding no opportunity to declare his attachment. Her prudence verged upon timidity, and he could never see her alone. He had called several times at the cottage, but she was always either out or in the company of her sisters, and he went away as he came, baffled and disappointed. But his chance came at length, and as is usually the case, unexpectedly.

It was the evening of the third and closing day of Colwick Park races. The city was thronged with the wastrels of the northern and midland counties, and the public-houses were crowded to overflowing with loafers and racecourse hangers-on. Drunken women as well as drunken men reeled through the streets, and the police were doubled. Respectable people, disgusted with the carnival of vice, kept themselves within doors, or, if they were compelled to be abroad, transacted their business as expeditiously as they could, and then hastened homeward.

Emily, when her day's work was ended, drew the children to her side to give them their customary evening Scripture lesson, a duty which was never neglected, however great her fatigue. The subject chosen was Divine Protection, and she read with them from the too-little-studied prophecy of Zephaniah, a book full of the honey of comforting words for burdened souls. "They shall feed and lie down, and none shall make them afraid. . . The Lord hath taken away thy judgments, He hath cast out thine enemy; the King of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee; thou shalt not see evil any more. . . . The Lord thy God in the midst of thee is mighty: He will save, He will rejoice over thee with joy; He will rest in His love; He will joy over thee with singing. . . . I will undo all that afflict thee, and I will save her that halteth, and gather her that was driven out; and I will get them praise and fame in every land where they have been put to shame."

"That is very similar to the text we had to learn for teacher last Sunday. Let me think—this was it: 'The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and His ears are open unto their prayers. Who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?'" little Annie said with twinkling eyes, pleased that she remembered her lesson.

"God has been good to us, dear ones; He has brought us up out of the valley of humiliation. When we were brought low, He helped us. If God had not raised up kind and generous friends for us when our dear mother was taken away, we might still have been in Narrow Marsh, or, worse, we might have been separated." Emily spoke tearfully, as she proceeded to give the Scripture a practical application to their altered circumstances. When the lesson was ended she gave the children their supper, and, ignorant that the whole city was in an uproar, went out for a ten minutes' stroll that she might think by herself. There is a part of the Woodborough Road, just where it rises abruptly towards the village of Mapperley, that is flanked by a long blank wall. There are large, imposing-looking villas behind this wall, but they stand far back from the road, which thereabouts is dark and lonely after nightfall.

Emily went up this stretch of road, meeting no one. All was quiet; the stars shone overhead, and a few gas-lamps barely rendered the darkness visible. It was the time and place for silent reverie, and suited the girl's meditative mood. Her heart was full of thanksgiving, for after a period of stress and storm the lines had fallen unto her in pleasant places. So, mentally reviewing the past, and absorbed in gratitude for present mercies, she walked onward further than she had intended to go, and was only recalled to herself by seeing the lights of the village in the distance. With a vague sensation of alarm, but anticipating no evil, she turned to retrace her steps, but had only gone a few yards when she was startled by the sound of hurrying, unsteady footsteps behind her. Emily might have run if she had dared; failing that, she quickened her pace, but, rapid walker though she was, the pursuer steadily gained, and before she was aware, was beside her.

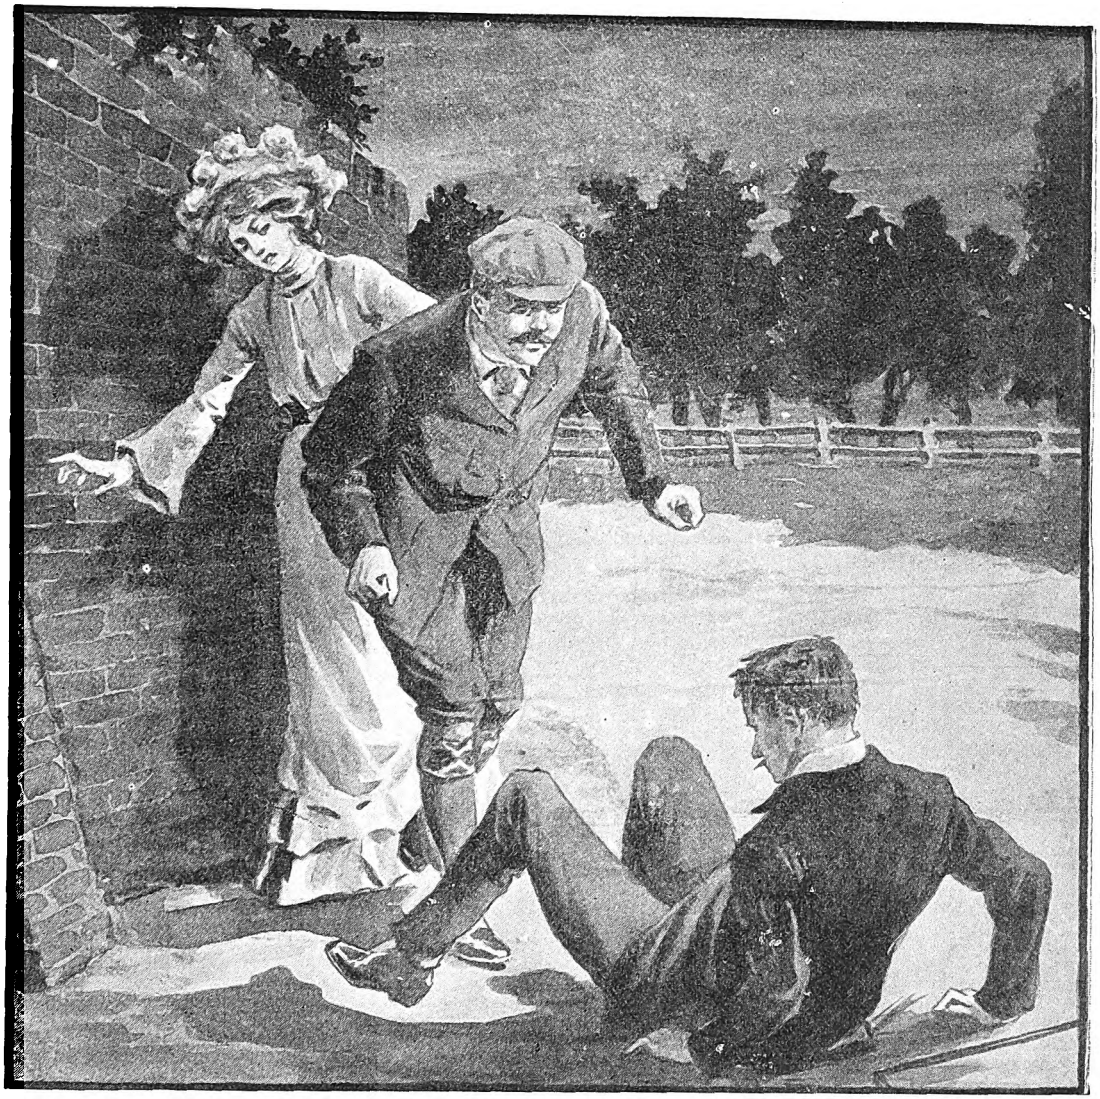
A fierce, excited face, lit up with wild, burning eyes, peered into hers; the smell of strong drink and stale tobacco assailed her nostrils, and with a sense of overmastering terror she recognised in the man Reuben Wear. With tipsy effrontery, he attempted to put his arms around her waist, but she indignantly pushed him away with so much force that he reeled, recovering himself with difficulty. "Ha, my little sylph of the slums!" the intoxicated ruffian hiccoughed, "I had an idea it was you. You are abroad late, my dear; shame for such a fine girl to be out alone. Allow me to see you home. Don't be shy; I am quite a ladies' man."

"How dare you insult me, sir? Stand aside, if you please, and permit me to pass!" Emily exclaimed with simple dignity. She was resolved not to show the terror she felt.

"Not I, my little wild bird I have been waiting for an opportunity to lime you, but those dragons the Andersons are generally on the watch. The present chance is too good a one to be neglected."

Without deigning to reply to this rhapsody, she walked on, hoping to escape, but he was quickly again in front of her, barring the path, and she was compelled to stand.

Digitized by Google



A POWERFUL HAND GRASPED HIS COLLAR, HE WAS SWUNG OFF HIS FEET AND HURLED INTO THE GUTTER.

"See here, Emily Barnes," he said with tipsy gravity, "you are not either blind or a fool. I am open to offer you a position which hundreds of girls in Nottingham would jump at. Now, just show your good sense, and be amiable; these tantrums don't suit your pretty face. Here am, I Reuben Wear, ready to offer you everything you can crave for, and you haven't even the grace to say 'Thank you'! Be wise, my dear, and don't throw away the gifts which the gods provide. I have plenty of cash, and we can go away to somewhere where we are not known, and enjoy life together."

"For shame, sir! and you call yourself a gentleman! I am astonished that you dare to mention either love or marriage to me, Mr. Wear. I loathe you, and all of your name. I would sooner marry the poorest man of honour who asked me to be his wife than you. You disgrace yourself and me by this impertinent proposal. That is my answer. Now let me pass!" she panted. Woman-like, much as she hated the well-dressed scoundrel, she despised herself more for having listened to a proposal which was an insult.

"Not so fast, my bonnie termagant," he hissed in her ear. "Who hinted anything about marriage? No, I am not so far gone as that. But as a friend. A cosy house in some country village, fine clothes, and——" The fellow proceeded no farther: with a desperate effort Emily thrust him aside, and started wildly to run homeward, with his cruel, blasting words ringing in her aching brain. The unprincipled villain was not to be so easily baulked of his intended victim. He caught up with her again, threw his arms around her palpitating form, and, laughing maliciously, exclaimed, "I have got you all alone here, my pretty maid, and intend to have a kiss." She felt his hot, foul, reeking breath on her cheek, and raised a frenzied cry for help up to her mother's God; for there seemed to be none other that would aid her in the dire extremity.

Digitized by Google

And even while she cried, someone out of the darkness exclaimed, "You unmanly dog, leave that lady alone!" Reuben Wear had neither time to loose his hold of Emily nor to look up. A man's powerful hand grasped his coat collar, he was swung off his unsteady feet and hurled backward into the gutter, which was muddy with rain that had fallen during the day.

"Miss Barnes, have no fear; it is I!" a well-remembered voice said, and the tall, athletic figure of William Anderson towered up between her and her persecutor.

"Thank God, sir, you came. It was awful!" she gasped. That was all. She was utterly unstrung.

Reuben Wear, who had scrambled to his feet, stood gazing upon them with a lowering brow. He was sober enough now, for the fall had shaken some sense into him. "How dare you interfere with my sport? The girl was willing!" he growled sullenly.

"Begone, you vile hound, or I will——" There was no need for William Anderson to complete the sentence, for Reuben Wear had shambled off, volubly swearing vengeance as he went. So the gentleman turned his whole attention to Emily, and, they being alone, he inquired what the outrage meant.

"I—I do not know. The beautiful evening tempted me out for a walk, and he—Mr. Wear—had just come up. I do not think he was sober," Emily replied. Not for worlds would she have mentioned his villainous proposal. She felt safe now, with this good man beside her, and began to wonder whether she might not have been too hard upon Reuben Wear. He had said that he loved her, or she fancied he said so, and to a man in love much should be forgiven. But then he had made an infamous suggestion. She shuddered as his heartless words recurred to her memory.

"You will allow me to accompany you home. It is not safe for you to be out alone. The town is full of strangers, and our own lambs are wolfish," he said with a masterful air, and she was unable to say him nay. What he said to her in that brief journey may be readily inferred from the words she falteringly uttered when they stood in the shadow of her own little porch.

"Mr. William, you do not understand what it is to be poor. I owe everything on earth to the generosity of your family. God sent your brother to us in our hour of greatest need, and I cannot, I will not, permit you to take any step towards me that would cause them pain. Forget all that you have said to me, and—I will endeavour not to remember it. Please to let me go indoors now. I am very tired."

"Of course, Miss Barnes. I am grateful to you for having listened to me so patiently, for it is more than I deserved. But forgive me for saying I am not daunted by a first refusal. We part as friends, I trust."

"Yes,—as friends!" she huskily exclaimed, and vanished.

William Anderson stood long in front of the cottage which sheltered the girl whom he honestly loved, and the expression upon his face was not that of a hopeless lover. "The Lord Almighty bless her, for she is one of a thousand! I will have a talk with my mother," he murmured. Then, reverently raising his hat, as an act of homage, apparently to the house, but really to Emily, he turned away.

Emily had gone upstairs, and after a struggle for composure, she walked to the window. The moon was shining; she could see over the gardens; on the housetops it was bright, and in the open street, but the houses cast great shadows. Presently something moved in the shadow of the opposite house, and she saw the figure of a man leaning and looking up at her window. Love has keen sight, and she recognised William Anderson. She crept closer to the casement, and whispered softly, "William, William!" There was no answer, and when the man wearied of watching he walked away. "Thank God, he has gone—he has gone quite out of my life! I am glad, for it is best!' So she said to herself, and then, with a singular inconsistency, she sat down and burst into passionate weeping.

CHAPTER XII.

'BE UNTO ME AS A DAUGHTER."

William Anderson, adhering to his manly resolution, held a long and serious interview with his mother that same night. His future happiness was at stake, and he concealed nothing. The mother from whom her sons have no secrets is to be envied. Before his mother had left him, for bed, his eyes were dim with tears. She parted his sunny hair with her hands, as she used to do when as a child he knelt by her side. She kissed the broad, open brow, free from the shadow of deceit, and said gently, "My bonnie boy, God will guide you aright. Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness. If thou acknowledgest Him in all thy ways, He will direct thy paths." Mrs. Anderson knew that her son's love was no sudden infatuation, but affection deeply rooted in his strong true heart; and that where his love was fixed, his heart was centred. All through the next morning she was unusually grave and thoughtful. In the afternoon she visited Emily Barnes.

Emily was alone in her cosy little sitting-room when the visitor entered. Her well-thumbed Bible lay open upon the table before her. She had been reading, "Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel, My way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God? Hast thou not known? Hast thou not heard that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary ? There is no searching of His understanding." That Scripture was her strong rock and house of defence. She would wait upon the Lord. Yet such waiting is often wearisome.

Digitized by Google

As Mrs. Anderson entered the room, Emily rose to welcome her with that respectful deference which so beautifully suits the young, and which no well-brought-up person is even ashamed to show to an elder or superior. "You are alone, my dear. That is fortunate, for I have come to have a serious talk with you. There is something upon my mind, and I cannot rest until it is settled. So I have come to have it out, you see"

Emily was surprised at this unaccustomed greeting, but had no suspicion of the lady's real errand. It did not occur to her that William had made a confidante of his mother. She composed herself to listen. "My dear child," Mrs. Anderson said, placing her hands on the young girl's shoulders and looking her squarely in the face, "I have come to talk to you about my son William."

The girl's face flushed crimson, and then changed to a deathly pallor. She was no longer pearl-complexioned, but white, haggard, corpse-hued. She stood silent, transfixed. Her lips moved not, but in her soul she prayed, "O God, give me Thy strength. Judge me according to the integrity that is in me." Then broken words came, and she stammered, "Oh, madam, indeed I have not abused your confidence. If you know all, you are aware that I am not to blame. I am so sorry, but there has been nothing wrong. Forgive me for having been a cause of so much pain to you ; but I did not mean it ; I—I will go right away, and hide myself." Pallor may indicate either innocence or guilt, but there was a ring of conscious rectitude in that faltering utterance that went straight to the motherly lady's heart.

"My child," she said soothingly, "you are not to blame. It is my foolish boy who is at fault."

Emily could not hear the man who had offered her his heart and hand censured in his absence, even by his own mother. With a courage which she was far from feeling, she replied, "Madam, your son has committed no fault. He is true, upright, and an honourable gentleman—a noble man, and a son whom a mother should be justly proud of."

"That means that you are in love with him." There was a curious inflection in Mrs. Anderson's voice.

The distracted girl, thus cornered, could only answer, "Madam, whatever my feelings may be,—and feelings are beyond our control,—your son will never fathom them. I have too much respect both for myself and him. I have already assured you that it is my intention to leave Nottingham."

"Do you love my son so much that you could accept him as a husband, if there were no objections ?" The question admitted of no equivocal reply. Before Emily was aware of what she said, she faltered, "Ye—es."

"My dear, William loves you; he told me so last night. I have learned to look upon you as a daughter, be to me a daughter indeed. When my son asks you again, as he will do, answer him faithfully, and if you can make him happy, you will make an old woman happy also. A prudent wife is from the Lord. You have been a God-sent gift to me ; be the same to my boy. It is his mother who pleads for him."

And Emily humbly answered, "I will."

"Now kiss me, child, for I foresee that I must claim my share before that foolish lad monopolises them all," Mrs. Anderson said between tears and smiles.

"You are so good, Mrs. Anderson, that I cannot thank you enough. My cup is running over with blessings."

"Then do not attempt to thank me. Let us talk of something else." They made a pretence of conversation, but it was only a pretence, and they had relapsed into silence, when there came a disturbing aristocratic knock at the door. "A visitor !" Emily exclaimed, rising to answer the summons. She was vexed at the interruption to her perfect happiness.

"It is William, I expect. He was to call for me," Mrs. Anderson said calmly. It was he. As he entered, his mother said, "I am going out to look at your flowers, Emily. I daresay this boy will find something to chatter about. He is not taciturn, I assure you."

So the two were left alone. It was a trial for both of them. Emily turned to the fire, which apparently required her attention, and William Anderson regarded her anxiously. For the first time in his life he felt afraid, and it was a pretty girl who overawed him. But yet he was the first to speak.

"Miss Barnes—Emily—may I repeat what I said to you yesterday ?" he asked, with a pathetic plea in his voice, and a yearning gaze in his eyes.

"If you wish to. If you have not altered your mind," she replied almost whisperingly.

"My precious one !" he exclaimed joyously, straining her to his manly breast. "'Many women have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all.' May I——" It was a foolish question. Even as he put it he kissed her, and she timidly, blushing prettily the while, returned the loving salute.

"When you silly children have finished billing and cooing, I am ready to go home," Mrs. Anderson said, looking in at the door. "And, William, bring Emily up to tea. Mind you do not forget !" And, with a genial laugh at her own simple wit, the motherly woman withdrew, rejoicing that she had been the means of making two young people happy.

The lovers tarried behind a little longer. They were so happy in each other, for they had the blessing of God that maketh rich, and that addeth no sorrow thereto. Then William Anderson drew the gentle girl's arm within his own, and led her out into the sunlight, as "To some enchanted land of rest,

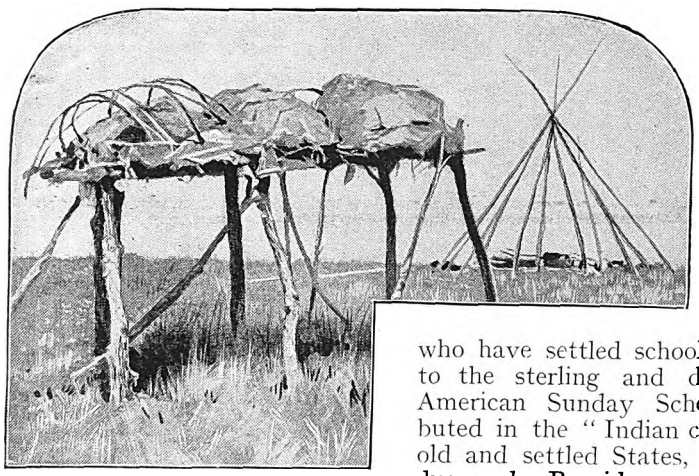
Some youth-renewing morn."

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



INDIAN PRAIRIE GRAVE.

and South-west, the red men are fairly under the beneficent sway of a Christian civilisation. To such noble workers as Sheldon Jackson, the founder of many schools and mission chapels among the Indians from Alaska to New Mexico; to the brave missionaries of the various Christian denominations who have settled schools in many localities, and to the sterling and devoted workers of the American Sunday School Union, widely distributed in the "Indian country," as well as in the old and settled States, these results are mainly due, under Providence. Nor should the splendid work of the Carlisle Indian School and the Hampton Institute be overlooked, for these institutions

TWO CHIEFS OF THE MESCULARIA APACHES.

Digitized by Google

A UTE MOTHER AND PAPOOSE.

have trained and educated many hundreds of red men and women, and sent them out as living examples and teachers among their dusky kindred. For twenty-five years this transforming process has been steadily progressing at Hampton, and both there and at Carlisle the impetus afforded to Indian progress has made a very marked change in the prospects of the Indian race. Not only are many Indian youths of both sexes emancipated from the ignorance and slavish traditions of their ancestors, but a very large proportion have become sound Christians. Life in an Indian village has its picturesque side, but it has also many discomforts, even to the Indians themselves. Such villages, now becoming rarer every year, are giving place to the comfortable frame structures that are now to be found in many parts of the Indian country, affording abundant evidence of the steady progress of the race in civilisation.

A SHOSHONE SQUAW AND CHILD.

Digitized by Google

The Needle's Eye

by

Florence M. Kingsley.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

The story opens with the discovery of a dead woman, by Farmer Erastus Winch, in his barn. His wife finds a baby there also, and insists, much against his will, on adopting it, as she has never had a child of her own. Before the burial of the woman a stranger appears in the neighbourhood, and out of curiosity asks to see the coffin, and pays the undertaker handsomely to let it be a good one. On the burial of its mother the child is adopted by 'Liz'beth Winch and called 'Manuel, from the Bible-name "Immanuel." The child grows up, and as soon as he is any age worth speaking of the farmer ruthlessly sets the child at work. He is treated in a heartrending way for a long time by the farmer, and idolised by his wife. Immanuel betrays a great desire to find out who is his father, and with child-like simplicity absorbs the idea that God is his Father, and wanders off to find him. In his rambles he meets a little girl named Hilda, who takes him home to her granny, but during a pause in their conversation he runs away again. Arriving at the homestead of "Ol' Mose" Armitage, 'Manuel thinks he has at last found his "Father," and is taken in and cared for by "Ol' Mose," a man who has lived alone for many years.

CHAPTER X.—(Continued).

"Yes," said Moses Armitage, as he related to 'Manuel the story of Jesus, "This Child's thoughts were busy and constant, like a little fountain of pure sparkling water; and that is the most wonderful thing about this Boy, His thoughts were always beautiful and pleasant and true. As He went on thinking they grew more and more delightful. When He was quite a little child He understood clearly that the great God who made all things was His Father."

"He was just like me, wasn't He?" cried 'Manuel delightedly.

"Yes," said the old man smiling back into the sparkling face, "He was your Brother."

With rapt attention, Immanuel listened to the old sweet story, told in the old man's tender accents, which showed how deeply it had penetrated his own nature. How many have told that story to the children, each dwelling on the traits of character which most impressed the narrator, and each finding in it beauty and grace! Mr. Armitage saw that his little auditor was interested, and he went on to present the picture in richer colours:

"This Boy I am telling you of," he said, "was always thinking about His Father, and as He grew older, the people who knew Him wondered to see how much He knew about His Father's character. He used to talk as if He could hear His Father speaking with Him, and He could tell them things they had never understood before. As the Boy grew into a strong young man, He went about among the people and taught them something that was quite new to them."

"What was that?" the child asked.

"Well, you see, they had their own idea of God. They thought that after He had made the world and everything in it, that He went to live somewhere away off in the sky, and He sat in a high place watching people, and that when they did wrong He became very angry with them. At those times it was necessary to do something to please Him, and make Him kind again. They got the idea that He liked to see suffering, and in some places they would actually kill a child to please Him. This young Man told them that this was all wrong. He said God was their Father, and He loved them, and was very near to them all the time, and not a long way off. He was not pleased by having animals and children killed, but only wanted the people to be good, and was ready to forgive them if, after being naughty, they were sorry. Do you understand?"

Digitized by Google

Immanuel nodded, his large eyes shining like stars.

"This made a great change, and everyone wondered. Some of the poor and good people were very pleased to hear it, but the great men who had been teaching the old notion of God were angry, and they said, 'This young Man does not know. He is only a carpenter's son. How can He tell?' But the poor people loved Him more, and when they found that He could cure them when they were sick, and give them food if they were hungry, and that He loved little children, they began to follow this strong, beautiful, pleasant-spoken young Man around the country to hear what He had to say, and to see the very wonderful things which He did. Then those persons who supposed themselves to be so very wise and learned, began to be jealous and hate Him. They said, 'If this Man keeps on talking, nobody will pay any attention to us'; which was quite true, for they were very stupid indeed, as you will see when I show you some of the books they studied and wrote."

"What did they do?"

"The stupidest and cruelest thing they could think of, my child: they took this beautiful, gentle, loving Man, who was trying to make the world into heaven, and killed Him. That is, they tried to; they could only kill His body, you see, because the God in Him could not be killed."

"Didn't anyone love Him?"

"Yes, all the children loved Him, and a few of the grown-up people, who hadn't forgotten their child-thoughts altogether. Some of them wrote down a few of the things He said and did, soon after He left the earth. I will read to you out of their book some day. But there is another way besides reading books to know what He knew. Can you think what it is?"

The child looked down at his folded hand in silence for a moment; then he said slowly, "If I should have the God think in me, I should know, shouldn't I?"

"Yes, my boy, you would, and there isn't any better way. One time Jesus explained this very simply to His friends. 'The spirit of your Father in you,' He said, 'will teach you?'"

"But I thought you were my father; what are you?"

"I am your father, so far as God is in me. When I love you, I am truly a part of Him, just as a single letter on the page of this book is a part of the whole book. We are meant to read it all, my child; but we must begin with the letters."

The boy threw his arms about the old man's neck. "I am glad!" he cried, then was silent for so long a time that the other wondered. "I have a book," he said at last; "it tells about my Father; munny keeps it in the spare room, under the bolster of the bed. I should like to see munny, she loves me, too."

Moses Armitage drew the child a little closer. "Tell me about munny," he said; "when did she go away?"

"She didn't go away!" cried Immanuel in a tone of surprise. "She comed to the fun'ral with me. I cried, 'cause I didn't like fun'rals, an' munny told me to go out doors an' not to come back. Only some of the people can cry at fun'rals. I was a naughty boy to cry, munny said so. I should like to see munny," he added, in a subdued voice. "She loves me."

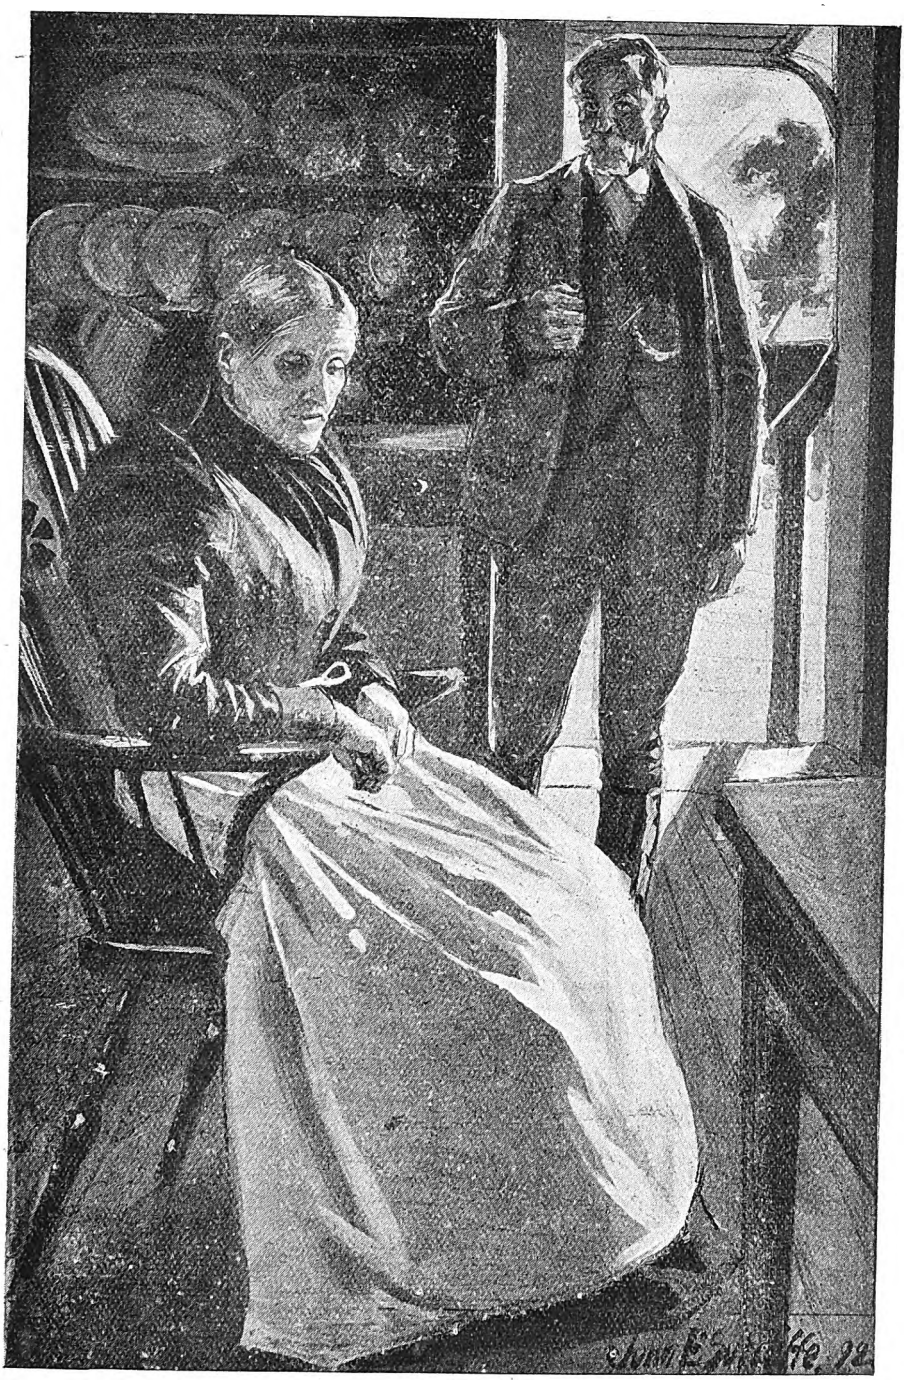
"But you told me mother was in heaven, my child."

"Not 'Liz'beth; 'Liz'beth has to make butter, an' feed the chickens; she hasn't got no time to fool away. My other mother—the beautiful lady—I only see her sometimes when I'm most asleep."

Moses Armitage sat for a long time in his great chair that night, holding the sleeping child. Again he scanned the still face feature by feature. "Have I forgotten?" he said aloud; "or have my eyes grown dim of late, so that I see what was, but is not."

Tenderly he laid the child in his bed and fell to searching among his papers,

Digitized by Google



'I SAY, 'LIZ'BETH . . . . WE'LL GO 'AN LOOK FER THE BOY."

Digitized by Google

presently bringing to light a tin-type, taken years before in a travelling car which had stopped at the hospitable spring by the barn. It was a picture of his own boy, Carlton, dead thirty years; but it might have served as a portrait of the child who slept. There was the same delicate oval face, shaded with short clustering curls, the same eager, dark eyes, the same bewitching smile. "No, I was not mistaken," murmured the man, shaking his white head with a troubled smile; "the boy is Carlton himself." As he thrust the picture away with a trembling hand, a legal-looking envelope fell from the disordered mass of papers, and lay, superscription up, on the lid of his desk. The seal was unbroken, and as Moses Armitage regarded it wonderingly, it occurred to him that it was curiously linked with the finding of the boy.

It was a short letter, type-written on a large sheet of bluish paper. He read it three times. Then he dropped heavily into his chair and wiped the moisture from his forehead. "So they are all dead!" he said aloud, "—all dead, and the money that bewitched them and benumbed them is left!"

CHAPTER XI

'LIZ'BETH.

By the time the hired "kerridge" nad left Erastus Winch at his own door, on the day of the funeral, he had formulated certain plans for his future course, which appeared to him very original and wise. "I'll let her know what's what, fust thing I do," he muttered, as he ascended the kitchen stoop with low, threatening tread. "Arter that, why, I'll tan that 'ar young-un's hide so't he won't never forgit who's boss here!"

He laid hold upon the latch with truculent fingers. "I'll show her 'at I ain't to be monkeyed with!" he growled; then his jaw dropped. "What in thunder? Humph! the critter ain't home yit. Hangin' round to gossip, I'll bet! I tol' her she wa'n't to go up to the cemetery. She'd ought to ha' been here long ago."

When, after an hour or more spent in aimless wandering about the silent house, in the course of which he lavished his entire vocabulary of drastic phrases upon the empty air, the quick beat of hoofs and the rattle of light wheels announced the return of Elizabeth, he merely grunted.

"Oh, 'Rastus!" faltered the woman, with a quick, fearful glance into the scowling face; "do tell if he's come home!"

"Who's come home? What ye talkin' 'bout? An' say what in creation d'ye mean by stayin' away like this? Here I've been a-hangin' 'round waitin' for ye sence four o'clock! No supper—nothin'! An' you with the key in yer pocket. Han' it out now, and git in the house, an' ten' to yer bizness lively! You kin bet you'll stay at home arter this!"

"I—I couldn't help it, 'Rastus. Oh, I'm mos' crazy! I let 'Manuel go out in the yard, an' when I come to look fer him after you was all gone to the cemetery, I couldn't fin' him nowheres! An' he ain't come home—I see he ain't! What shall I do? it's most dark a'ready!"

"You kin come in the house an' git supper an' stop yer gab, or by thunder I'll—I'll hit ye." Erastus Winch had never touched his wife save with the lash of his tongue; but now his face grew purple with suppressed rage; his great hands clenched themselves. "I've heerd 'bout yer low-down, sneakin' tricks," he yelled; "a-coaxin' Liph Dundor to stick his nose into my bizness. I wonder ye ain't 'shamed to look me in the face. When ye do fin' the brat you kin lay to one thing, Mis' Winch, he'll get his sneaking little hide tanned in a way he won't fergit, ner you neither."

Elizabeth climbed slowly down over the wagon wheel. She reeled slightly as she passed into the kitchen. "O God, I hope you've took him," she moaned, as her trembling hands fumbled aimlessly with her bonnet strings. "He'd be better off—better off."

She made no further mention of the lost child that day, nor the next. Then visions of his little figure wandering in dark stretches of woods, or lying white and cold in some neglected field urged her out and away. Day after day she thrust her duties from her with frantic hands to search and call, "'Manuel, 'Manuel! Oh, 'Manuel, where be you?"

Erastus Winch, having emptied the windy chambers of his wrath upon her bowed head, and discovering to his dismay that she cared not a whit for his bitterest fulminations, actually shook her one morning till the teeth chattered in her head. "I b'lieve you're a-goin' plumb crazy," he cried. "You look like it, by thunder

Digitized by Google

Elizabeth stared at him with glassy eyes. "I want Manuel," was all she said.

Winch cast a glowering look about the disordered kitchen. "By thunder!" he repeated, "what in——" Then he stopped short, the thought crossing his mind of what his loss would be if 'Liz'beth really did go crazy. "Say, 'Liz'beth," he burst out, "ef you'll quit this stupid foolin', I'm blamed ef I won't let ye take the team an' look fer the young'un. Say, I'll go with ye. He's probably in some farm house up on the hill. Little rat, I wish I had him here this minit, I'd——"

The woman burst into frantic sobbing. "I hope he's dead," she wailed. "He'd be better dead." The dry sobs ceased as they had begun. "I hope he's dead," she repeated in the lifeless tone of settled anguish. Her worn fingers picked nervously at her apron strings. "I've tol' his mother 'at I hope she'll fin' him. I seen her las' night in the barn over by the hay-mow, but he wa'n't with her."

The man's hair bristled. "I—I say, 'Liz'beth," he began after a long silence, 'we—we'll go an' look fer the boy. Yes, you an' me, we'll both go. It's time to cut the oats, an' I ain't got a minit to fool away; but—but—. Why, you know, 'Liz'beth, we can't go on this way—eh?" He sidled a little nearer to the gray, impassive figure. "I—I. Mebbe I was a leetle ha'sh with the boy. I say, 'Liz'beth, I'll let you run him arter this, any way you want. I won't whip him no more, I swar I won't, ef you—ef you—"

There was no reply. The still face looked as if carved from granite. "I'm a-goin' out to hitch up the critters now," he went on, raising his voice. "You git on yer bunnit an' be ready when I come 'round—won't ye, 'Liz'beth?"

He turned and strode heavily out toward the barn, his rugged face working strangely. "What in all creation 'ud I do," he muttered, "ef 'Liz'beth—'Liz'beth—'Liz'beth—." His dim eyes fell upon a straggling bush of cinnamon rose, dusty and forlorn in the hot August weather, and visions long forgotten lifted above the seething surface of his thought. He beheld Elizabeth, a bride of twenty, roses blooming in her round cheeks and nodding above her hat-brim. He saw himself proud and awkward in his wedding clothes, stooping to gather a bunch of half-opened buds. "You're nigh as pink an' purty as the posies," he had said, and kissed the sweet curve of her smiling lips. How long—how long ago it was! "I guess I've been kind of ha'sh with 'Liz'beth," he groaned, his eyes still riveted on the withered thing at his feet. "But it was all that pesky young one; ef it hadn't ha' been fer him, we'd been all right."

To his immense relief Elizabeth stood on the stoop, bonneted and shawled, as he drove up. "I think I'm mighty good to ye, 'Liz'beth," he began in a complaining tone, his every-day self reasserting itself with sudden strength. "By rights I'd ought to be a-harvestin', an' you know it's well's I do. I tol' ye when you would keep that boy 'at you'd be sorry for it. I knew you would, well 'nough. You'd ought to ha' done as I said."

The two were driving briskly along the dusty road at this point in Mr. Winch's agreeable monologue. "Now, this 'ere's a fool job ef I ever heerd o' one," he continued, his gorge rising at sight of the ten-acre lot brimming over with ripened grain, "a stupid fool job, an' when it's done you'll remember, Mis' Winch, 'at you've 'greed to brace up an' quit yer nonsense. Ef we fin' the boy, well an' good; we'll fetch him home an' you kin send him to deestric' school, or anythin' you please; I wash my han's of him f'om now on. Ef we don't fin' him, I'll not'fy the overseer of the poor an' let him take the job in han'; but he don't come no more to my house, you bet. D' ye understan'?"

Elizabeth made no answer. She sat gripping the iron rail of the waggon-seat with both hands, as if to restrain herself from some desperate act. Her feverish eyes searched the tangled growths by the road-side.

Erastus Winch conducted his search for the lost child with his accustomed energy and thoroughness. He stopped every team on the road, and drew up at every farm-gate with the stereotyped inquiry: "You ain't seen anythin' of a stray boy 'round here hev you? 'Bout six years ol', big of his age, black hair an' eyes."

"His hair's brown, 'Rastus—kind of red-brown," whispered Elizabeth timidly, on one occasion.

"Shet up, will ye!" snapped the man, as he started up his horses with a stinging cut. "I'm runnin' this shebang!" He had grown increasingly morose as the day wore and his tardy investigations promised to end in failure. "Ef it wa'n't fer your blamed foolishness," he burst out, "we c'd quit an' go home. I've an awful good min' to turn smack 'round this minit! He's run away; 't ain't our fault. I don't see why you can't let him stay where he is!"

Digitized by Google

They had struck into the back hill-road to Turner's Crossroads an hour since, and the miles were lengthening slowly behind the jolting waggon; the noon sun beat fiercely on the sweating, toiling horses. Winch cast a look of veiled anxiety at the gray face beside him. "Say, ain't you had 'bout 'nough of this, 'Liz'beth?" he demanded roughly. "You kin bet I have, an' I don't know where we're goin' to git a bite to eat!"

The woman burst into a smothered scream. "Let me out! Oh, 'Rastus, let me out—I see somethin'!" An instant later she was sobbing over a little, sodden hat of straw, bound with a piteous blue ribbon, faded and discoloured. "It's his hat, 'Rastus—his Sunday hat! Oh, 'Manuel—'Manuel!"

"Why, consarn it all, woman! don't stop to take on!" cried Winch excitedly. "We're on the right track now! He can't be fur off! Come on, I say!"

"He's in the woods yonder," faltered Elizabeth, hugging the hat to her breast. "I'm awful 'fraid he's in the woods. I want to look fer him there."

"Come, dry up now and git in the wagon! He'd follow the road like a calf. Si Scott's place is jest 'round the bend; I'm goin' to inquire there."

A stout woman, mounted on a ladder, was picking berries in the deep, shaded door-yard of the next farm-house; a blonde child played with a kitten near the gate. "Seen a stray boy 'round here, sis; black eyes an' a little bigger 'n you be?" began Winch.

The child pushed the yellow hair out of her eyes. "He runned away," she said, pouting. "I cried."

Elizabeth was on the ground in an instant; she caught the child by the arm. "Was he here—when? Tell me quick!"

A stout, sun-bonneted figure moved slowly toward them across the grass. "A little boy?" she echoed, in response to Elizabeth's reiterated question. "Why, yes, there was a little boy—'bout two weeks ago, wa'n't it, Hildy? But come in, won't you, an' see mother; mother, she'll know."

The bright old lady looked fully able to justify her daughter's confidence in her wisdom as one "who would know what to do" in any given circumstances. She welcomed Erastus and Elizabeth warmly, feeling now that she would have the solution of a problem that had troubled her She reproached herself for letting that bright little boy go away by himself, and yet it was so clearly not her fault. He had slipped away so quickly and noiselessly. But the kind soul did blame herself, and she was anxious to disarm the annoyance of this couple, who might be disposed to blame her.

"Yes, yes; but do sit down and have a bit of dinner with us," she said hospitably. "I declare I've felt worried about that child. He slipped out like a shadow whilst me and Emmeline was busy with this naughty girl here. I says to father, 'You ought to hitch up the horse in the waggon and look for him.' But he would have it that his folks wasn't far away. So after a spell it kind of slipped my mind. And so you've found his hat? Well, well! I took notice that he didn't have no hat on, nor shoes and stockings neither."

"He had them on when he started," said Elizabeth, into whose ashen face a trace of colour had crept. "But he liked to go barefoot, 'Manuel did."

"He probably took them off," chirruped the old lady cheerfully. "I wouldn't worry a mite about him, if I was you."

"Wouldn't you worry if it was her?" asked Elizabeth, pointing to Hilda, who sat nursing her kitten on the doorstep.

"I suppose I would if it was Hildy," admitted Mrs. Scott. "She's such a little fidget. She's been with us since her ma died," she continued, lowering her voice confidentially. "Her pa's my oldest son by my first husband. He sets great store by Hildy. I tell him he'll spoil her if he don't look out."

Elizabeth had arisen, and was standing rigidly erect. "I guess we'd better be going," she said.

"Why, Mrs. Winch, you don't mean it. They've just took the horses out, and dinner'll be on the table in no time."

"I guess I'll be going, anyhow," repeated Elizabeth doggedly. "'Rastus

Digitized by Google

ELIZABETH STOPPED SHORT AT THE NARROW ROAD.

Digitized by Google

can stay to dinner; I'll go on, I couldn't eat till I find out. Maybe he's at the next house; and maybe he's lost."

The last words were spoken over her shoulder with a piteous smile. She was already half-way to the road. "You'll tell 'Rastus that I'm going," she said, as she laid her hand upon the gate. "I couldn't wait no how." She walked stiffly without turning her head, till a group of giant hickories hid the house, with the dismayed face of her hostess in the open door; then she gathered up her scanty skirts in both hands and broke into an awkward run.

She stopped where she saw standing back from the road an unpainted house, stained with weather, quiet and sad in the afternoon sunshine in the midst of its unpruned lilacs and syringas. Elizabeth stopped short in the narrow road fringed with the dusty white and gold of mayweed. Her breath came in great gasps; her bonnet hung grotesquely about her neck: wisps of grey hair straggled across her face. Presently she crept nearer. "If he was to see me this way, it would scare him," she muttered, and lifted her tremulous hands in a feeble attempt at readjustment. No one answered her timid knock at the front door. "I guess maybe she would be washing up the dinner dishes around back," she said to herself, as she stepped uncertainly on to the narrow worn path. "There's been folks living here, anyhow," she assured herself; "I can see a milk pail; and there's bees." Repeated knockings brought no response. Whoever had lived there had evidently gone away, but had left things behind as if coming back. An uncurtained window next tempted the anxious eyes.

Half-an-hour later, when Erastus Winch drew up with a loud "Whoa, there!" to his tired horses, he heard the sound of loud sobbing mingled with frantic knocking on a closed door.

"'Liz'beth! I say, 'Liz'beth!" he shouted. "What is the matter with you? There ain't nobody living here now; I hurried after you to tell you as soon as I had eaten my dinner!" He caught the frenzied figure by the shoulder. "Say, 'Liz'beth, listen to me, will you? Si Scott told me. An old man named Moses Armitage used to live here; but he sold out his stock to Si last week and went off."

"Look, 'Rastus! look in there!" moaned Elizabeth; "it's his little shirt a-hanging on a chair; don't you see it?"

"I don't see no shirt. Listen to reason, can't you: the old fellow has lived here alone for the last twenty years; I guess Si's folks know. Come, now, we've got to get home; it's nigh milking time, and we a good ten mile from the cows. We'll try it again some day, maybe."

Elizabeth clung obstinately to the latch. "I ain't a-going," she wailed. "I'm going to stay here till he gets back. I want 'Manuel!"

Winch muttered something under his breath; then almost tenderly he lifted the frail figure in his arms into the waggon "You're a-going home," he said.

This woman's intense love for the child resembles in a minor degree Christ's great love for us, causing Him to leave His home in heaven to suffer and die on the cross to redeem us from sin.

* * * * * *

A Lawyer's Story.

Mr. Caleb Smalley, of the law firm of Trent and Smalley, looked up from the document which he was inspecting with a deepening of his habitual frown. "I believe I said to you, Short, that I wished to be left uninterrupted to-day during the morning hours," he said, tightening his lips into a thousand austere puckers.

"Yes, sir; I had not forgotten," said the clerk, with anxious humility. "But Mr. Hicks, sir, thought you would wish to see——" He finished his sentence neatly by laying a visiting card on the desk before his employer. Mr. Smalley glanced at the card. Then he arose and straightened his spare figure. "Mr. Hicks was—ah—right," he said tentatively. "You may show the gentleman in at once."

The lawyer advanced to meet his visitor with interest, which deepened into an unpleasant feeling of surprise as his eyes rested upon the huge, picturesque figure, clad in rusty black, whose presence seemed to fill the small room to overflowing. "Mr. Moses Armitage, I believe?" he said sharply, referring with automatic precision to the visiting card. "I have not before had the pleasure of your acquaintance, sir; though my father—now retired—will remember you."

Moses Armitage sat down, looking ruddier and more imposing than his wont

Digitized by Google

by virtue of contrast with the grey tints of his surroundings, which included the meagre figure of the solicitor. He made no haste to speak, but sat looking about with a troubled expression in his clear blue eyes. Mr. Smalley frowned judicially, and accosted his visitor a second time, with a touch of incisive keenness in his smooth tones. "We have not had an opportunity of informing you of the exact circumstances connected with your brother's death," he said. "We had hoped that your interest in the estate as possible—indeed, I may say as probable—heir might lead you to communicate with us promptly."

"I have no interest in the estate," said Moses Armitage, with deliberation. "I am not here as an heir, either possible or probable. I will not inherit my father's money under any circumstances."

Mr. Smalley fell to studying his visitor with his head very much on one side and his eyes half closed. "That's a very singular notion of yours, Mr. Armitage," he observed at length, with some amusement evident in his voice; "in view of the fact that the property is an exceedingly handsome one. However——"—"I have come," said the other, fixing his eyes with much earnestness upon the lawyer, "to find out if I have any kith or kin left alive."

"That," said Mr. Smalley, expanding his narrow chest, "is exactly what we cannot tell you. It is, in short, the point in question. You, I take it, have had very little communication with your family for some years?"

"I have heard nothing from them for more than forty years."

"Ah, I thought as much," exclaimed Mr. Smalley, with apparent satisfaction. "What was the last word you had from your father?"

Moses Armitage started forward in his chair; his eyes blazed. "I had the last word from my father in this very room," he said in a low, choked voice. "I was a boy of scarce twenty; I loved my father and my brother. They were all I had in the world. Your father sat where you are sitting now. He handed me an envelope; it contained a cheque—half my mother's money—and a letter. But, no, I will not tell you the words of that letter; they are best buried with the dead. Tell me what you know about the family, and be quick about it; the air of this place stifles me!" He leaned back and wiped his forehead with a trembling hand.

Mr. Smalley regarded him attentively. "Thank you," he said civilly; "some identification was necessary, you know." He then proceeded to adjust the fingertips of one hand against those of the other with the extremest nicety and precision, eyeing them with an attentive frown, as if they were so many legal instruments—which indeed, they were.

"When your esteemed father deceased, some fifteen years ago," he began, punctuating his clauses with a silent opening and closing of his two forefingers, "he left the property unreservedly to his second son, Jonas, and his heirs. Mr. Jonas Armitage was at that time the head of quite a flourishing family: to be exact, there was a young wife, two sons, and a daughter. It is with the subsequent history of this daughter that we must now concern ourselves, since death early removed the sons. Miss Armitage, at the age of twenty, became entangled in a love affair with a young man of neither means nor position. He was, in short, a clerk connected with the correspondence department of the concern. Mr. Armitage forbade his daughter to communicate with this person, whose name I will now mention, since it has become unfortunately linked with the Armitage estate. His name was Manuel Rossi."

Moses Armitage leaned forward in his chair. "Manuel Rossi," he repeated. "And they were married?"

"I am sorry to be obliged to tell you that Miss Margaret Armitage, with the sad perversity of her age and sex, married this—ah—person," acquiesced the lawyer, raising his eyebrows and pursing up his lips. "In view of the fact that Mr. Armitage had expressly forbidden further communication between the two, you will not be surprised to learn that he sent word—through ourselves—to Mrs. Rossi, on the morning of her marriage, to the effect that he considered the relations which had previously existed between them as completely nullified by the act. In a word, he disinherited the young woman."

"Cruel!"

"Ah, it may possibly seem so to you. For myself, I hold that obedience is the foundation of law. Disobedience merits punishment—or, as Holy Writ puts it more forcibly, 'The wages of sin is death.'"

Digitized by Google

Mr. Smalley seemed so excessively pleased by his line of thought that at this juncture he readjusted his finger-tips one by one with smiling deliberation. "My story from this point is a perfectly logical illustration of the fact," he went on. "The foolish young people disappeared forthwith, young Rossi having received his discharge and a month's wages—the late Mr. Armitage was a just man, if somewhat rigid and unbending. A month's wages, I believe I said; well, from that day the unfortunate Mrs. Rossi was never again seen by any of her former acquaintances. She had made her bed, as the old saying has it, and presumably she died upon it. It is known that she endeavoured, at least on one occasion, to effect a reconciliation with her father. This deduction is derived from a communication bearing her signature, which we found among other papers of my late esteemed client.

"But, before I proceed further, let me explain what has no doubt been a matter of surprise to you—I refer to the fact that Mr. Armitage left no will. Quite naturally he had destroyed the original instrument which conveyed all the property to his daughter. Having done this, he found himself somewhat at a loss; by the terms of his father's will he was precluded from giving play to his—ah—very natural inclinations, which might have prompted him in favour of the next heir in succession. I refer to yourself, sir; I trust you will pardon the reference to the rather unpleasant relations which existed at the time mentioned."

"There was a letter, you said," Moses Armitage interrupted the lawyer Smalley, with some impatience. "Let me see the letter."

"All in good time, my dear sir; I am, in fact, coming to that directly. I was about to say that in justice to the very admirable qualities of my late client, I ought to inform you that just previous to his unlooked for demise he actually did make a will, but I took exception to certain clauses in it which he insisted on inserting. That made him hesitate; then he died without signing that will or making any other."

"Poor Jonas, I can understand his perplexity," said Mr. Armitage. "Well, what becomes of the money?"

"You, of course, are heir to the whole, unless the daughter of my esteemed client had a child, which is the question to settle. If she left a child, he or she would inherit; otherwise it falls to you as heir-at-law."

"Well," said Mr. Armitage, "that question may wait. Now let me see the letter that poor girl wrote to her hard-hearted father."

Mr. Smalley arose and tiptoed across the room. "The communication to which I have referred, bearing the signature of Margaret Armitage Rossi, is of very little value," he said, fixing his singular client with eyes of frosty disapproval; "but I preserved it as a matter of precaution. Here it is."

It was a short letter, written feebly, and blurred as if with the tears of the writer. It told in a few short, pathetic sentences of the death of the young husband and of the dire need of the desolate wife. "I am in great straits," ran the piteous appeal; "I have no money. Let me come home, dear father. For the love of my mother, do not close your heart against me!"

Moses Armitage's keen eyes were blurred as he lifted them to the face of the lawyer. "Well?" he said briefly.

"We have no reason to suppose that the communication was answered," said Mr. Smalley, regarding his finger-tips with narrowed lids. "My late client was not an emotional man."

"But why not search for her in the place from which this was written?" cried Moses, starting to his feet. "I will go at once."

"The letter is dated some seven years back, you will observe," said the lawyer, dryly. "I beg to inform you further, that upon the discovery of this piece of evidence we at once dispatched a trustworthy agent to the address mentioned. You may interview this person now."

In response to his summons, a lean, stoop-shouldered man entered the room. "Hicks," said Mr. Smalley, sharply, "you may tell this gentleman of your visit to B——."

"I found the tenement where the woman known as Mrs. Rossi had stopped," said Mr. Hicks. "I learned there, from a woman known as Bridget Kelly, that Mrs. Rossi, with a man said to be her husband, had lived in the house for three months. During that time the man, known as Manuel Rossi, died and was buried. Mrs. Rossi, after exhausting the means at her command, left the house."

Digitized by Google

"Is that all?" cried Moses Armitage. "Why did you not make further enquiries?"

"I did," said the man, "and there was nothing more to be learned."

"You are now in possession of the facts, Mr. Armitage," said the lawyer, dismissing the witness with a practised wave of the hand. "I have only to add that we advertised in all the leading newspapers for the woman or proof of her death, with no result. I will also state that it was by the merest accident that we learned your own address; we wrote you, but received no reply, and had almost given up hearing from you, so long a time had elapsed since notifying you of the event,"

"I forgot to read the letter," said Moses Armitage, in a matter-of-fact tone. "There were other matters——." He stopped short and turned toward the door. "I shall search for her," he said decisively.

"Very good," acquiesced Mr. Smalley. "Very proper indeed. Of course, we hope that Mrs. Rossi's whereabouts may very speedily be discovered, or some clear evidence of her death, if she is dead. If there is anything we can do to assist you in the search, you will, of course, call upon us. An advance of some hundreds—say —would be——"—"I have not asked for money, sir," said the other, with unnecessary warmth, and shut the door behind him.

The boy 'Manuel was waiting in the lawyer's outer office, his short legs dangling uncomfortably from the high stool to which one of the clerks had lifted him. He greeted Mr. Armitage with sparkling eyes and a joyous sigh of relief.

"Are you tired, my child?" asked the old man, tenderly; "I was a long time in there—yes, a long weary time—and what a story!" He was speaking to himself now, unconsciously quickening his steps till the child at his side was forced into a run to keep up with the irregular strides.

"Where are we going now, my father?" said the boy, breathlessly, looking up into the ruddy face, where pain and anger struggled for the mastery.

Moses Armitage looked down at the questioner, and his eyes brightened. "Why, here I am running your little legs off, boy! Why didn't you pull me up, as I do Nelly when she has eaten too many oats? I'll tell you where we are going. We are going on a boat for a fine ride, but first we shall see what they can give us to eat in this pretty shop. I see some cakes in the window, which look as if they were made for a boy like you."

An hour later they were climbing a rickety staircase whereon endless processions of slatternly women, ragged children, and slouching men passed up and down. Loud, discordant voices filled the intervals between slamming doors. It was an abode of sin and misery, where Christ was unknown and unloved, where evil reigned instead of good.

"This isn't a nice house," said Manuel; "why do we come here?"

Moses Armitage regarded him with thoughtful eyes. "You see, there are children who stay here all the time," he said; "but you and I will go away very soon."

"It was Mrs. Bridget Kelly, she that had stopped nine years on the top floor, that could tell the gentleman what he wished to know, if anyone could"—so said a big woman with half-a-dozen children clinging to her ragged skirts. And up five flights of the dirty stairs, through dark, ill-smelling passages, they went, escorted by an ever-increasing swarm of pallid, eager-eyed children.

"It's the second door to your right, sir; the one with the hole in it," volunteered a small girl, who carried a big baby. "'Twas Mike Kelly what kicked it through when he was drunk last week."

"And you can be quiet, Kitty McGuire," cried a shrill voice from the door in question. "What are you doing on my landing? Get out, or I'll take the poker to you!" The speaker turned to her visitors with a broad smile of welcome. "You can walk in, sir," she said, apologetically; "they ain't no manners—the kids in this house."

When Moses Armitage had made known his errand, Mrs. Kelly heaved a reminiscent sigh. "Oh! yes," she said, "I mind it all as if it were yesterday. She and her man—a mere slip of a boy he was and sick-looking—she come to me and she says, 'We have not any furniture,' she says. 'and only a little money,'—she showed me what she had, poor dear!—'and could we board with you,' she says, 'till I gets a letter I'm expecting?' I had took boarders off and on, for I've always lived respectable, and in them days

Digitized by Google

I had three rooms. So I took them. Her man couldn't get no work, try as he would: and after awhile she told me as how they would get their own victuals. But never a bit she cooked, though I offered the loan of my stove."

Mrs. Kelly paused to wipe her eyes with her apron. "I told this same to a bit of a spalpeen as was here three weeks gone," she said. "And for what do they want the poor thing? She was a lady, if ever I see one, and sure and I ought to know, for before my marriage to Mike Kelly I lived out with many a lady."

"I am Mrs. Rossi's uncle," said Moses Armitage.

"Oh, her uncle? Then you'll happen be the one she went to see after her man died. He was took sudden with fever and only lived five days. Poor young thing!—and she that delicate herself. We all done what we could to help her, and he was buried by the city; it could not be helped. The day of the funeral I says to her, 'What are you going to do when your own time comes, Mrs. Rossi?' I says. She hadn't paid me no money for the room in ten days, but I would not bring it up to her then. 'I don't know,' she says, and wrung her bits of white hands. 'If my letter would only come!' she says. 'Why don't I get my letter?' 'Well,' I says, 'Billy would give it to you in a minute if there was one,' I says. Billy McGuire, he was the postman, and an elegant, respectable man; I've knowed his wife these ten years. 'If there was one,' I says, 'Billy would surely give it to you, and so I guess there ain't none. That same day she slipped out, and when she comes in she had some money in her hand. I took notice that her wedding ring was gone. 'I'll pay you for the room now,' she says, 'then I'm going.' The next morning when I got up she was gone, and that was the last I saw of her."

"Did you ask her where she was going when she spoke of leaving the day before?" asked Moses Armitage, anxiously.

"I did that!" said Mrs. Kelly, nodding her head emphatically; "but it was not me that would let on to the man that was here before, for, to tell you the straight truth, I didn't like the look of him. But you being her uncle is different. I says to her, 'Where are you going, Mrs. Rossi, dear?'" I says; for as sure as I sit in this chair I was that sorry for the woman I meant to keep her till after her trouble. 'Don't go,' I says, 'till you're better.' 'I'm going to my uncle,' she says; 'I know he'll take me in. I know where he lives, too, for I heard father say.' 'In that case I says, 'you're a-doing sensible.' I was meaning to ask her more particular before she went; but, as I told you, she was gone come morning. I've never forgot the poor thing"

The woman's eyes had wandered often during the recital to the face of the child, who leaned shyly against the great shoulder of his guardian. "I suppose," she continued, again wiping her eyes, "that this is her baby; six—ain't he? And a fine, big boy of his age! I'd have knowed it without your telling, for he's the living image of her. I seen it when I first laid eyes on him! What's your name, little fellow?"

"My name's 'Manuel," answered the child, shyly.

"Of course it is, after his pa! Many's the time I heard her calling him that same!"

"But my good woman," said Moses Armitage, "I never saw my niece. I do not know that I am the uncle she referred to. She did not come to me."

"She never come to you?" echoed the woman shrilly. "And ain't this her baby, then?"

"No," said Moses Armitage. Then he sprang to his feet so suddenly as to upset the rickety chair upon which he had been sitting. A strange thought had flashed across his brain. He thrust a piece of money into the woman's hand. "I shall not forget your kindness to her,' said he. Taking the child in his arms, he made his way down the unsteady staircases in a fashion which called faces to doors and windows.

(To be continued).

Digitized by Google

The Most Beautiful Island . . . . . in the World.

By the Rev. G. ERNEST WALTERS,

Formerly Colonial Chaplain of Seychelles.

HOW many readers know anything about the Seychelles? Many a time have I mentioned these islands, to be only met with the question, "Where are they?" Their comparative smallness, and isolated position makes them almost terra incognita. Yet they form by no means an unimportant part of our British Empire, and have been described as one of King Edward's brightest gems.

The Seychelles are almost in the middle of the Indian Ocean, and about 600 miles North-east of Madagascar. They consist of some thirty islands. Mahé, which is seventeen miles broad by seven long, is the largest. They are supposed to have been discovered by the early Portugese navigators, and were first colonised by the French in 1792. In 1794 they were captured from the French by a British man-of-war. It is an interesting fact that as the English captain had no one to leave in charge, he appointed the French Governor pro. tem. to administer the islands for King George. It was indeed some years before an English Administrator arrived.

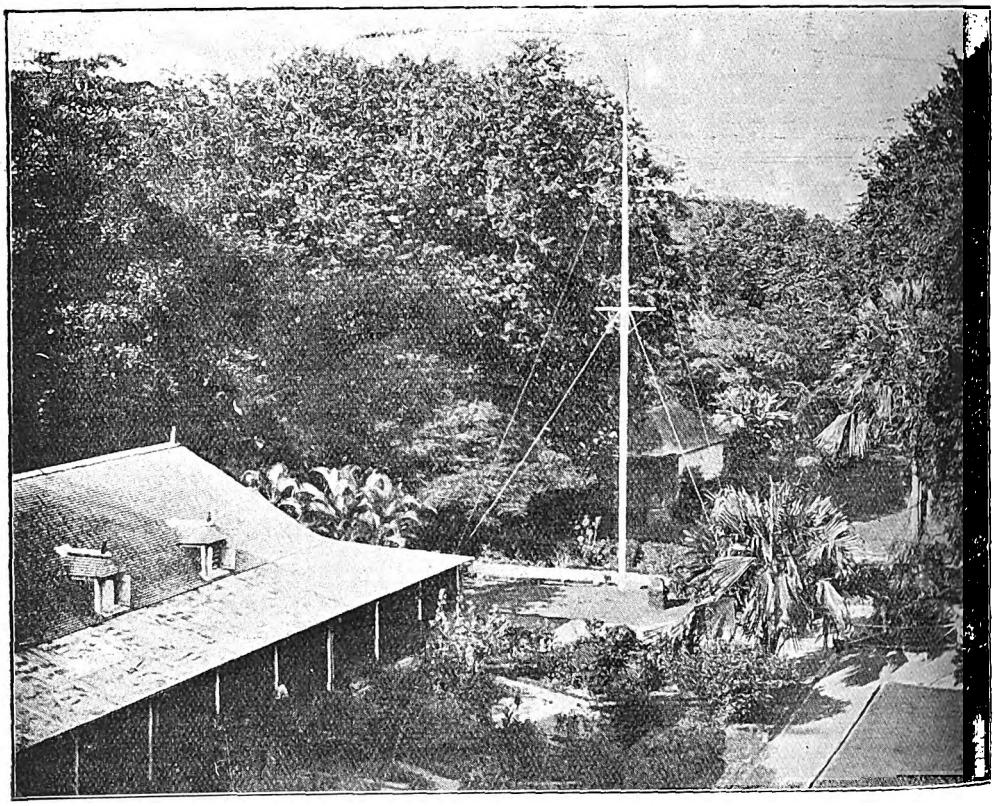
VICTORIA.

Digitized by Google



GOVERNMENT HOUSE, VICTORIA.

I have described these islands as the most beautiful in the world, and this is no exaggeration. Sailors, and others, who have been to all parts, testify that they have seen nothing to exceed their loveliness. As the Seychelles are almost on the equator, it is a perennial summer. The fruitful soil is constantly covered with luxuriant groves of cocoa-nut, bread fruit, banana, orange, and other fruit trees; and the foliage is ever green. The hills, clothed in the richest colours, rise to a height of some 3,000 feet, and slope down to the water's edge. The beach is of purest white sand, and fringed with palm trees. Walls of coral surround the islands, and inside the reef, the sea is calm and still.

General Gordon, the hero of Khartoum, visited the islands in 1881, and was very much struck with their beauty. He told an English resident that when he had earned his pension, he would like to settle down there. Many of the present inhabitants have a vivid recollection of him. What struck them most was his sincere piety, and the great interest he took in the Mission work. Some readers will remember that Gordon had a theory that the Seychelles formed the site of the

Digitized by Google

VANILLA GROWING.

Garden of Eden. He also believed the forbidden fruit to be the cocoa de mer, or double cocoa-nut, which is peculiar to the island.

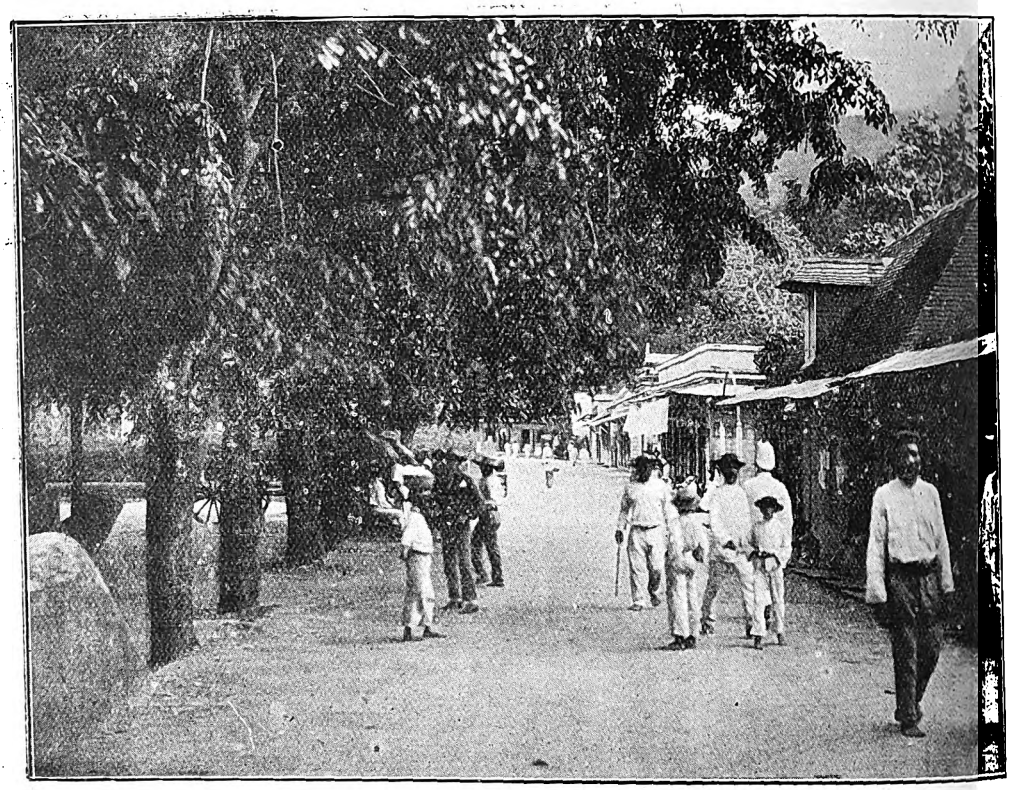
The population in 1895 was 17,625. This is made up chiefly of Creoles and Africans. There are also a number of Indian and Chinese. The English are represented by a few Government officials, merchants and planters. Some of the old Africans are liberated slaves, and were rescued by British men-of-war from slave ships, which formerly traded in the Indian Ocean.

The chief and really only town is Victoria, which has a population of some 5,000. Here is Government House, the Residence of the Administrator, and also the Courts of Justice, Prison, and Post Office.

The natives, so called, i.e., the Africans and Creoles are almost all Roman Catholics. There are only some 2,000 Protestants. There is a Roman Catholic Bishop and Cathedral at Victoria. The Priests are of the Carmelite Order; and very picturesque they look in their large straw hats, loose brown habits and sandals. On certain Festivals processions take place through the streets. These are much appreciated by the natives, who are particularly fond of any kind of show or display.

The Church of England is represented by a Colonial Chaplain, who has charge of St. Paul's Church, Victoria, a French clergyman who resides at the other end of Mahé, and a clergyman, a native of the West Indies, who has charge of a Mission at Prastin—a large island of the group about 25 miles from Mahé, with a population of some 1,200. The latter is a most interesting personality. In early years he was a sailor, and his ship was wrecked near the Seychelles. The crew took to the boats, and safely landed on the islands. The future clergyman then became an officer in the Police Force. Subsequently, he worked in the Protestant

Digitized by Google



STREET IN VICTORIA.

Mission as a Catechist, and was eventually admitted to Holy Orders. He now, under the Divine blessing, does quite a remarkable evangelistic work among the natives of Prastin. He also ministers to the poor lepers, who are confined on a small adjacent island.

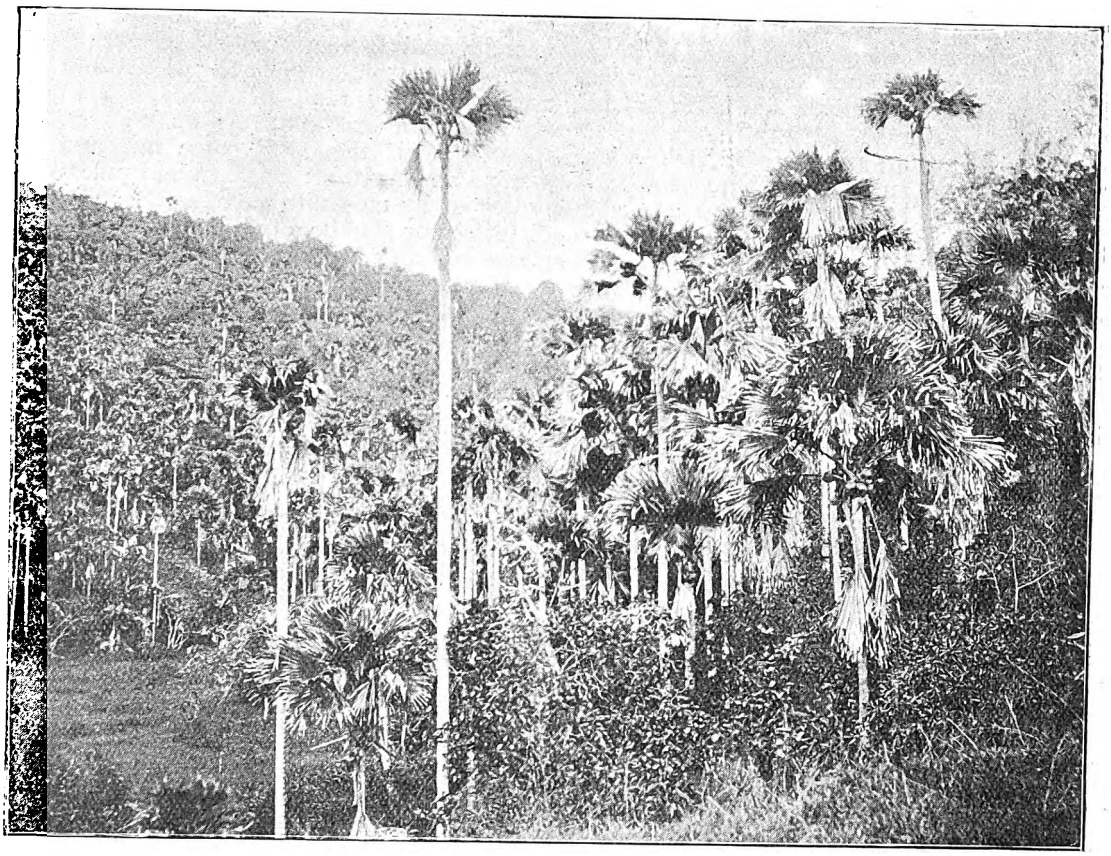
The chaplain at Victoria holds services in English and French. The latter are for the benefit of the natives who speak the French patois. They are most devoted to their church, and will walk miles to attend the services. Many may be seen on Sunday coming into the town in the morning early, carrying their Prayer-books, and perhaps, umbrellas, nicely balanced on their heads. And they will remain all day for the three services.

Some of the native religious customs are interesting. Whenever a Protestant is thought to be dying, not only the minister is invariably called, but also the friends and relatives, who sing hymns around the sick bed. When death ensues a number of candles are purchased for the illumination of the death chamber, and as many as possible of those in attendance remain till the morning. The interment, as in all tropical countries, has to take place the next day. At the graveside, not only the minister, but all the mourners, throw earth on the coffin at the words, "earth to earth."

The native weddings are somewhat striking. The happy bridegroom arrays himself, probably for the first time, in a grand black tail coat and felt hat, generally hired for the occasion. The bride is usually magnificent in a dress of pure white, with a very long train, also generally hired. Together they thus solemnly proceed through the streets, followed by an admiring crowd.

There are several Protestant day schools where the native children receive a rudimentary education, and are instructed in the Christian faith. The teachers also are careful to impress on them the fact that they are members of the great British

Digitized by Google



A PLANTATION IN VICTORIA.

Empire, and should honour their flag and king. One of the very first English compositions they learn is, "God Save the King." Visitors have been quite touched to hear in those far-off dominions of King Edward these little coloured children sing in their own quaint fashion the National Anthem.

The patois, to which reference has been made, is a very corrupt form of French, mixed with some African words. An Englishman, who had just arrived in Victoria, was sitting on his verandah, when some Creole visitors were announced. He addressed them in his best French, thinking they would understand him; but imagine his astonishment when they answered, "We do not understand English!" Indeed, the patois has very little resemblance to ordinary French.

As will be imagined, the islands on account of their isolated position are very much cut off from the world. There is a mail only once a month, and in the writer's time this was very uncertain. Once we were some seven weeks without letters. The arrival of the mail is always the cause of much excitement. On the day it is expected, a man is stationed on a hill to watch, and when the ship is in view he hoists a flag. There is fortunately a cable to Zanzibar, and daily a few of Reuter's telegrams are received, which give the chief items of news. These are printed and posted in the streets for general information. During the recent war, these telegrams were awaited with fevered interest, especially by the small English colony.

The monotony of the Seychelles is slightly relieved by visits from "men-of-war" of all nationalities, which call chiefly for coal. The writer has seen at different times, English, French, German, Austrian, Italian and Dutch ships in the harbour. Much excitement was caused.

Digitized by Google

in 1899 when the Dutch man-of-war "Friesland" called en route for Delagoa Bay. It was thought at the time that perhaps this vessel would take ex-President Kruger to Europe.

The islands are used like St. Helena, as a place of banishment. Prempeh, formerly King of Ashanti, is now an exile at Mahé. He has been receiving instruction in the Christian faith, and was, a few months ago, a regular attendant at the English Church.

Unlike England, with its two or three climates a week, the climate of Seychelles is always very much the same. The temperature all the year round is from 80 to 90 degrees Fahrenheit. This is tempered by gentle sea breezes. The days and nights are almost the same in length. It is always dark about six p.m. and light at six a.m.

There are no wild animals in the ordinary sense of the word. Insects, in the form of centipedes, scorpions and mosquitoes abound, and there is quite a plague of rats. The latter swarm everywhere, and are remarkably tame in comparison to their English brethren. As one sits on the verandah they will come out and gambol at your feet; and at night unless protected by mosquito curtains they will disturb your slumbers by making a playground of your bed. In several islands of the group, large tortoises are to be found.

The products of the islands are chiefly cocoa-nut oil, coffee, tortoise shell, and vanilla. The latter is an important industry. More than one Englishman has made a small fortune by it.

Seychelles is now under the able administration of His Honour E. B. Sweet-Escott, C.M.G., who is untiring in his efforts to promote the welfare of the community. The islands were never so flourishing as they are at the present time.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

THE REV. A. B. SIMPSON is the founder of The Christian Alliance. Fifteen years ago it was a one-man movement, represented by himself, then a Presbyterian pastor residing in Louisville, Kentucky, U.S.A.

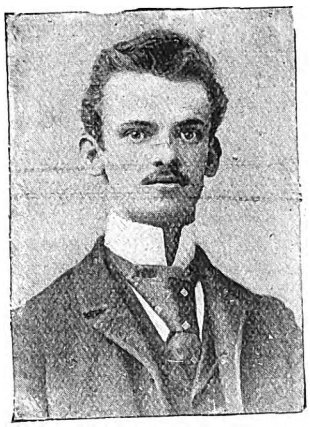
A though his ministry in that western city was fairly successful, Mr. Simpson felt that he had a distinct call to reach the masses—those countless multitudes who were outside of the churches, and who had no affiliation with any of the existing denominations. How best to do this troubled him greatly. Soon after he accepted for a time the pastorate of the Thirteenth Street Presbyterian Church in New York; but even there, although he had larger opportunities, he still felt the irksome trammels of conventionalism, which made it impossible to give the full free measure of service he wished to render. He finally decided on a severance of all denominational relations, that he might be free to take up a work upon undenominational lines. His position at this juncture is thus described by one who knew him well:—

REV. A. B. SIMPSON,
FOUNDER OF THE CHRISTIAN ALLIANCE.

"The work was commenced in a small hall, on the corner of Eighth Avenue and Thirteenth Street, New York, where Mr. Simpson fully explained his plans. It was to be an undenominational work, to reach the people, neither antagonising nor competing with any other church, but under no ecclesiastical control. Any of the Lord's people who were moved to join in such a work would be welcome as volunteers. No one joining would be asked for a subscription. The pastor had determined to rely upon the Lord to send supplies for the needs of the work, and his own temporal support. It was to be throughout a work of faith, and so it has continued to this day. After a few months the little hall became too small to hold the crowds who attended the services. The Academy of Music, and subsequently, Steinway Hall and other large buildings, were hired for Sunday evenings, and large numbers were gathered there, and many conversions took place. A small church was organised on an evangelical basis, and a church home was started."

From that time forth the work progressed with rapidity. Larger buildings were secured, and congregations multiplied. The Gospel Tabernacle on Eighth Avenue and Forty-fourth Street became a centre of aggressive evangelism. A Christian Alliance was formed with a widespread membership. A missionary institute was established, which has been the means of training a brave army of consecrated young men and women for home and foreign fields. There are now over 350 Alliance missionaries labouring in India, China, Japan, South America, the West Indies, Africa, and Palestine. An orphanage was opened, and various other branches of Christian work were begun. Conventions are now held every year in different parts of the Union for the accommodation of distant members of the Alliance. The Alliance is not an ecclesiastical body or denomination, but is simply a society uniting in fellowship Christians who are connected with various churches in many cities. These groups each hold a weekly meeting in some convenient place for the mutual help of the members by communion and prayer.

Digitized by Google



J. GORDON H. S. SIMPSON, ESQ., SECRETARY OF THE ALLIANCE.

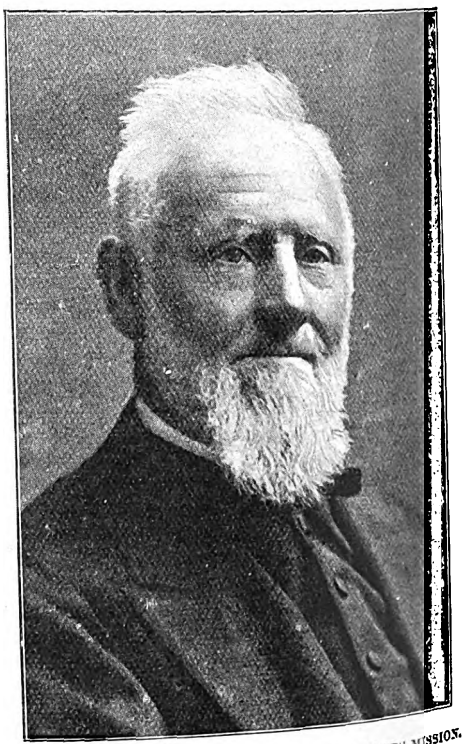
The test of Fellowship is their holding the doctrines of the four-fold Gospel. These are: Christ as Saviour, Christ as Sanctifier, Christ as Healer, and Christ as Coming Lord. Within the past year the Christian Alliance and International Missionary Alliance have been merged into the Christian and Missionary Alliance, of which Rev. Dr. Simpson is superintendent. He is assisted by a full board of workers of wide experience. His son, J. Gordon H. S. Simpson, secretary of the Alliance, has had entire charge of the construction of the institutional buildings and the development of the new Settlement. Rev. Stephen Merritt, whose work as preacher and philanthropist is well known, was the spiritual Columbus who "discovered" South Mountain, and first brought it before the Alliance as a fitting location for the new Settlement.

THE REV. STEPHEN MERRITT.



REV. J. J. KENDON, FOUNDER OF HOP-PICKERS MISSION.

Digitized by Google

THIRTY-THREE years ago now the Hop Pickers' Mission was commenced with one missionary; today it employs twenty missionaries, dispersed over an area fifty miles in compass.

The founder, hon. director and treasurer is Rev. J. G. Kendon, pastor of the Baptist Church, Goudhurst, founded by him in 1862.

The original work of the Mission includes visiting the hop gardens, and the camps; the distribution of tens of thousands of tracts and small books; and the conducting of open-air services, amounting to hundreds in the course of the season. The results in conversions have been very encouraging, and vast improvements have been made for the comfort of the pickers, and in the manners and behaviour of the thousands who yearly flock into the district.

Last year two new departments were added: The Hop Pickers' Shelter and Medical Hall, where a duly qualified doctor attends daily, and a trained nurse takes charge of the patients under the doctor's superintendence.

The other department is a Bible Van, in which two missionaries traverse the surrounding villages, selling books and holding services in the summer months. Much good has been accomplished by God's blessing.

The chief centre of the Mission is Curtisden Green, Goudhurst, where Mr. Kendon resides. Letters should be sent to Bethany House as above. All the expenses are met by voluntary contributions.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER needs no introduction to our readers. He is one of our leading Empire builders, and a few of such men to render service in our Colonies would be the cement that would so effectually bind together the interests of the "Mother" country and her "Children," that another fifty years would see the great Anglo-Saxon Empire a fully consummated fact.

Digitized by Google

A REMARKABLE DREAM.

A TRUE STORY.

DEAR Mrs. M——! How I loved her, and how she loved me! From the first time we met I felt drawn to her. We were both what is called "hard to get on with," and neither of us made friends easily, yet on that autumn day, seven years ago, when I called with a friend at her house, I felt that she was a kindred spirit. At the time, I was a girl of twenty, and she an old lady of nearly seventy—Spring and Autumn—yet, from that moment we were the greatest friends. This, however, is not the story. Five years had passed, and Mrs. M—— resolved to buy a house for her children, who, needless to say, were middle-aged. The house she built was a large double-fronted detached house, with a nice garden, the rooms of which were beautifully decorated, and all her friends congratulated her on the exceptional bargain she had made. For my part, I did not agree with them. The house struck me as uncanny from the moment I entered it first; I could not describe the reasons for my dislike, but I can only say that I could not have lived there. My poor friend, who was staying with relations close by, moved in on the completion of the repairs, and took up her abode in the room she had chosen overlooking the garden. The next day, I received a telegram stating that she had met with an accident, and asking me to go and see her. I went over at once, and was told that she had fallen down and injured her spine. When I went up to her room I was horrified to see the change in her in so short a time. She looked ten years older, and was evidently suffering considerable bodily pain.

"My dear Mrs. M——, I am so sorry to hear of your accident, and to find you like this. How did it happen?"

"My dear, it was no accident; it was the work of an unseen hand. I got out of bed early in the morning to see the time, as I had had a restless night, when I felt someone behind me, and the moment after someone caught my arm and pushed me violently down; I screamed for help, and then knew no more. When I was pushed down I was standing by my bed, but when my children found me I was close to the window, four or five yards off. They lifted me into the bed, and sent for the doctor, who states that my spine is injured, and that I shall never walk again."

After saying this she began to cry, and, putting her arms round my neck, she sobbed bitterly.

During the next six months I saw a good deal of her, but each time I came away feeling that my poor friend's case was indeed a hopeless one. A nurse had been engaged, who slept in her room every night, and she was not left unattended night or day.

Unfortunately, the nurse was taken ill, and had to leave suddenly, and my friend would not let anyone sit up with her during the night previous to the coming of the next nurse.

In the middle of the night the house was aroused by piercing shrieks proceeding from my friend's room. They rushed in, and found her gesticulating wildly with her arms, and evidently in a state of great terror, but she was speechless, and never spoke again. When I saw her she con-

Digitized by Google

SHE SHRANK BACK WITH BOTH HANDS EXTENDED TOWARDS ME.

Digitized by Google

"WHEN I CALLED WITH A FRIEND AT HER HOUSE."

veyed to me by signs that the same thing had happened again, and that she would never see me again. This was conveyed to me by my saying what I thought she meant, and by her nodding when I said the right thing, or shaking her head when I said the wrong. I took an affectionate farewell, as I felt powerfully that she was right, and that we should never meet again on earth.

A week later she passed away.

Four months elapsed, yet I had not recovered from the shock of my friend's accident and death, and one night I had a remarkable dream, which from its vividness, is worth relating.

It seemed to me that I was weak, and s nking out of myself, and then that I was supported by a presence through the air until I came to myself in a large shadowy place. There was no feeling of fear, only the dazed feeling one has when recovering from a faint, and I began to wonder where I was, and why, when my friend appeared before me, and began to speak. I wanted to rush forward and caress her, when she shrank back with both hands extended towards me, entreating me not to come any nearer, or touch her. If I did I should never be allowed to return to earth again, but we could talk, she said.

What impressed me most was that when I had known her on earth she was nearly bent double with age, and apparently little higher than four feet, yet here she was a tall, upright figure, of commanding appearance, but with an expression of unutterable sadness, which made me ask her the question, "Are you not happier here, my dear Mrs. M——? Do you not find this an inexpressible relief from the pain and suffering, the loss of use of your spine and physical powers, all of which you now seem to have regained ?"

Digitized by Google

"No," she replied, "I was far happier on earth, and there my life was more endurable, even with the suffering and pain, than it is here. Here, the awful monotony of existence is terrible and overwhelming. You do not know what I would not give to be back on earth !"

"Are there no others here that you can speak to ?" I asked.

"No," she replied, "We can only walk and pass each other; it is impossible to speak or touch."

"But this cannot be for ever," I exclaimed.

She replied, "I can only tell you this, that we must stop here till 100 years has elapsed for the time of our birth on earth and then, that there will be a change. What that change will be we are not told."

She then told me that it was very merciful of God to allow her to see me again, and that I was to take very great care of my health, as she could see that I was sometimes hovering near her, which could only mean that I was in danger of losing hold on life. She entreated me again to be careful as it would be dreadful for a young person like myself, of only twenty-five years of age to die, and have to exist in that awful monotony for more than seventy years. I asked her whether she now knew the explanation of her mysterious accident, and she said "Yes." It was all clear, but that no good could result from her telling me. Feeling that I was leaving her, I again put out my hand to say good-bye, which she nearly grasped, but shrank back, saying, "Do not stay; go now, while you can, and vanish from my sight!"

I, too, had a feeling that if I stayed much longer I should lose all power to return to earth, and I suddenly woke up to find myself bathed in a cold perspiration, with a feeling of intense faintness. For several days after I did not feel myself, and the memory of my dream haunts me yet.

[The foregoing narrative is published as contributed, and we do not hold ourselves responsible for the curious theory involved in it. We, however, fully believe that it is a true incident related as it actually occurred. —EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE."]

A FINE OLD GATEWAY.

Digitized by Google

AMONGST THE KURKUS.

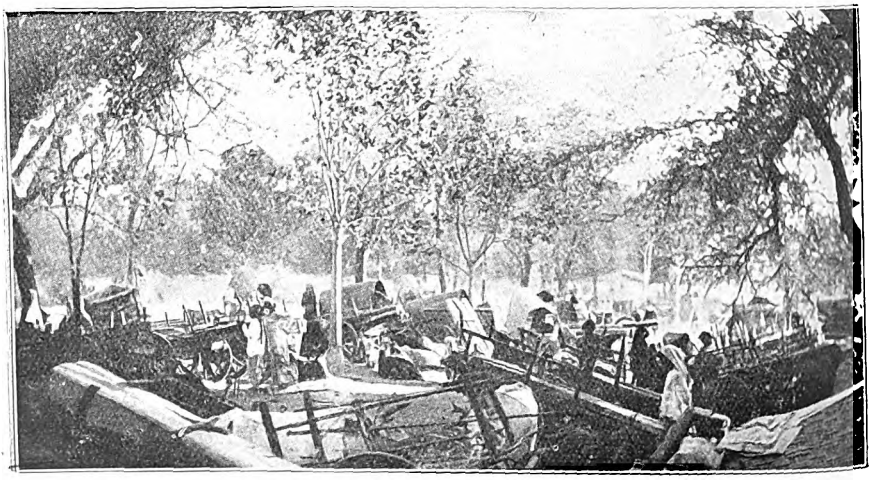
How the Kurku Mission Helped to Fight Famine.

By the Rev. ERIC LEWIS.

LONG will the terrible Famine of 1900 be remembered throughout India, and in the annals of its missionary history, as at once the most widespread, and the most severe, during the reign of our late beloved Queen, or indeed, from the commencement of British rule in India, if not throughout its entire history!

The great Berar plain is usually fertile and well watered, the home of thriving farmers, whose chief crops are cotton and jowari (or great millet), the grain which forms the staple food of the humbler folk. The farmer was beginning to recover from the famine of 1896-1897, when this more awful visitation fell upon him. So early and so completely did the rains of July to September, 1899, fail, that he quickly found himself short of fodder for his cattle, and the jowari instead of growing six or eight feet high, scarcely reached two feet, and dried up so completely, that it was almost useless even for fodder. Add to this that the cotton yield was practically nil over the vast busy plains of Berar, and the reader may form some slight conception of the situation, which the people and Government had to face in the autumn of 1899. Wells already shortening, no more rain to be expected save a few passing showers, until the coming June, and prices of all food stuffs rising, till before long they more than doubled the normal rate.

The Kurku in his hills, was, if possible, worse off still. At the best of times, his crops are scanty, and his fields ill-cultivated; and his chronic condition is that



KURKUS IN THE TIMBER BAZAAR, ELLICHPUR

Digitized by Google

HOW A "KAMBAL" IS WORN.

of living from hand to mouth. His main support is derived from the teak-wood which he fells in his native jungles, and which his sturdy little hill oxen haul down in two-wheeled carts to the weekly bazaar, in the plains, and in return for which he obtains his food and a few necessaries.

Famine damaged, if it did not destroy, his market for timber, and at the same time the earning power of his few pence was reduced by half! Always shy to leave his village for Government relief work, it was often difficult for the forest officials, though most sympathetic and untiring in their efforts, to persuade him to leave his village for such work as they could give until he and his were already advancing towards starvation.

And his hills, usually dreaded by the people of the plain, were now invaded

WEAVING BLANKETS.

Digitized by Google

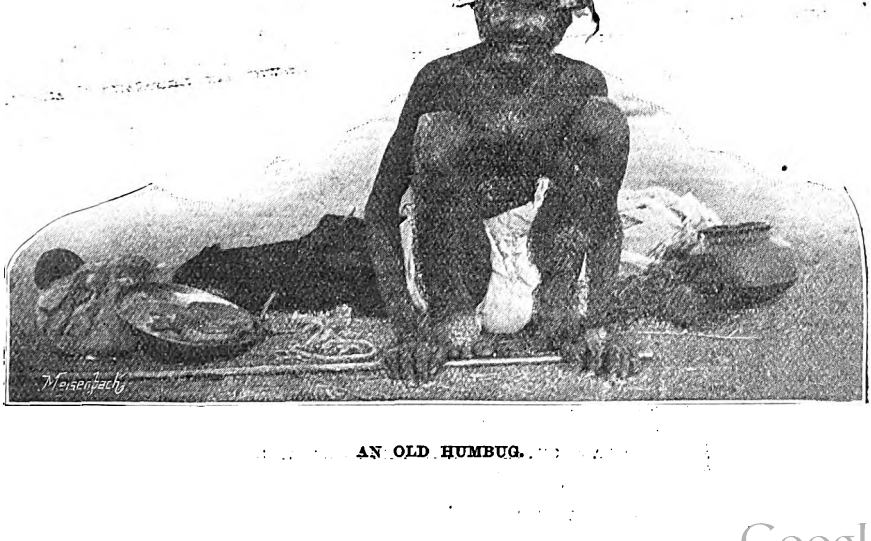
Digitized by Google

AN HONEST WORKER.

Official and native alike were astonished to see the rapidity with which the buildings went up in the rains, an un-heard of time for commencing such operations! The results may be seen in the beautiful photos kindly taken for us by Mr. T. Bailey, Secretary of the Leper Mission in India.

All this building, with the necessary tile and brick-making, afforded a splendid relief work for the many who were glad to find employment near their homes, giving occupation to several hundreds at once.

The site has received the new and appropriate name of Khudawandpur, or "the Lord's village." The total cost amounted to Rs21,757, (£1,450), of which Rs3,000 (£200) was spent upon unskilled famine labour. The number of famine relief workers employed by the Mission at Ellichpur, (including Kothara and Khudawandpur), reached a daily average of 664, during the four months when the famine was at its worst, i.e., May to August, 1900; the highest daily average for one week being 830, in July. To obtain the total relieved daily, we must add



AN OLD HUMBUG.

Digitized by Google

GRASS CARRIERS PASSING MR. JACKSON.

to these an average of perhaps 50 children, and those unfit for work who received food, bringing the total to nearly 900. It is cause for thankfulness to think what large numbers of those who thus received bodily help, also regularly heard the Word of God day by day, and to know that good seed was thus sown.

The industrial work of the Orphanage has, we rejoice to say, been most successful, and promises well for the future.

Begun in a small way in the Mission compound not long after the '97 famine, it has grown steadily but surely, while valuable experience was being gained for the future. At first, all the skilled work was done by native carpenters, the boys learning under them; and beginning by

GRASS CUTTERS CAMP NEAR GHATANG.

Digitized by Google

sawing, rough planing, and other simple work, they advanced gradually to tasks requiring more skill as they showed proficiency. In this way the carpentering has been almost self-supporting from the beginning, until now there are several of our boys who can themselves turn out fine work, indeed the Mission quite fails to keep pace with the orders received, and the work is really remarkable for its variety and execution. The boys have commenced carriage, painting and varnishing, and making the upholstery for seats and cushions! Handsome secretaire tables, hanging wardrobes, and chests of drawers have been made by the teachers with the help of the boys, all of teak, which has a beautiful grain and colour, besides teakwood tables, chairs, book-cases, door and window frames, &c., &c. It says much for the work that it is being well supported by the officials, whom none but good workmanship will satisfy. Weare even sanguine enough to believe that a good sale could be found in England for our work. A highly polished teakwood writing table or hanging cupboard costs in Ellichpur, £4 to £5; we believe the total cost of delivering such in London would not exceed £2 to £3; and we have never yet seen any article of the kind in solid wood, obtainable at home, for anything like this price! Most of the teakwood comes from the Kurku hills; a good deal also of Rangoon teak has been bought in Bombay. A considerable sum has also been spent on English tools, as it has been thought wiser that the boys should learn to do better work than is possible with the rough and clumsy native tools.

GRASS CARRIERS RESTING UNDER A GREAT BANYAN TREE. THE HUGE BUNDLES ARE HEAD LOADS.

Besides carpentry and carriage building, a forge has been built, and since the advent of Thomas, a native Christian blacksmith, in 1901, blacksmithing and fitting have been begun. Lime kilns also are turning out lime, and the native contractors were quick to discover that Mission lime was not adulterated with ashes!

For boys who prefer a more sedentary task, there is tailoring, taught by a native, who with his pupils may be seen sitting cross-legged on the verandah, and busily turning out Government orders for uniforms of forest subordinate officials, coats for our own boys, &c., &c.

The above results of our Industrial work, already obtained since its small beginnings in 1897, reflect the greatest credit on Mr. Jackson, Mr. Yoss, and Mr. Roberts, who has been in charge almost from its commencement, and all who have had a hand in it.

Now we must glance at Morsi, the other Mission station in the plains. Here, for some years, Mr. and Mrs, Windsor have been patiently evangelising among a well-to-do farmer population, with a sprinkling of fairly educated Mohammedans in the town itself.

Digitized by Google

Early in the famine Mr. and Mrs. Windsor were transferred to Ghatang, and here Mr. Bagshawe, the Conservator of Forests, built for the Windsors a temporary bungalow, with the necessary outhouses for storing grain, etc., while across the road, at a little distance, quickly sprang up the rude buildings of the Poor-House, accommodating from 300 to 500 persons. The "Poor-House" is indeed a refuge for the destitute in famine; here they find at least food and shelter when their little all is gone, and no prospect of earning a livelihood remains except to betake themselves to a relief work, which they are often (Kurkus especially) very loth to do. The Government, however, rightly refuses to pauperise the people; and able-bodied applicants at the Poor House are therefore quickly drafted off to the nearest relief work—probably road making. Alas! however, too many were very far from able bodied; in all stages of destitution and emaciation they arrived daily,—men, women, and children,—sometimes too far gone to be revived by good and regular food. and at one time there were no less than 800 inmates.

The water difficulty proved a very serious one at Ghatang: the water needed for all purposes had to be carted a distance. A few springs were happily found by digging in the gravelly bed of the water-course, long since dry, and to our surprise and deep thankfulness the water just lasted until the welcome rains returned, though several villages besides the Poor House and the great Koilari Grass Camp, that grew up as if by magic around the lower springs, were entirely dependent on this supply. What wonder that under such conditions cholera, always ready to follow on the heels of famine, broke out at the Poor House. In the mercy of God, the type was not a very serious one, and the people were not decimated as they often are. Faithfully and bravely Mr. Windsor and his wife tended and nursed the patients aided by visits from the Ellichpur doctor accompanied by his wife. But the long strain of work and anxiety told upon the health of both, as indeed it did upon many of our other Missionaries, and when at last with a good Monsoon a future harvest was assured, and famine work began to slacken in the autumn of 1900, both fell seriously ill, Mr. Windsor especially being for a time in a most critical condition with typhoid, and on recovery they returned home to England.

The grasswork before mentioned was a peculiarly striking feature of the famine. The hill jungles, after the rains, are always covered with an undergrowth of tall grass, which is generally cut for thatch or fodder in November, and the remainder burnt. Grass cutting for transport to the plains became a vast business. The poor of the plains migrated by thousands to the hills to engage in this work, and so sprang up the mushroom city of the Koilari Grass Camp before described, whither the grass cutters brought their immense loads, there to be bought up by the farmers, and transported by bullock cart or pack saddle to the plains.

The Government threw open to the grass-cutters all the reserve jungles, with the result that thousands thus found employment from October to the very end of May, the grass of course getting drier and drier as the heat increased, till very little nourishment could have remained in it, and the tired workers had to go further and further away from their camp in search of grass.

Immense grass relief works were also organised by the Central Provinces Government in Betul, two of the centres for collection being at Khamla and Bhaisdehi, where literally acres of ground were covered with enormous grass stacks, which shortly before the rains, were opened for sale at a low price, and disappeared as if by magic in a few days, so enormous was the demand for fodder in the plains. This form of Government relief had the great advantage over road work of keeping the people in their own vilages.

At Ellichpur, the Mission, despite all its varied labours of other kinds, was able to help Mr. Bagshawe in his endeavour to save large numbers of cattle, and restore them to a condition fit for ploughing in the rains—a most important work, for if the ryot loses his bullocks, his means of cultivation, and with it his prospects of subsistence for the coming year, are gone! So in addition to huge cattle camps, formed in the hills, Mr. Bagshawe asked Mr. Roberts to buy cattle and feed them at Kothara; and in the Mission compound enormous stacks of grass were piled, this alone occupying the time of 30 men. Of the endless stream coming from the hills, about 100 cartloads and 60 pack loads were at one time being bought daily, costing from Rs250 to Rs300. The first stack measured 50ft. by 27ft. by 16ft. high, and another contained 10,000 lbs. weight of grass.

Digitized by Google

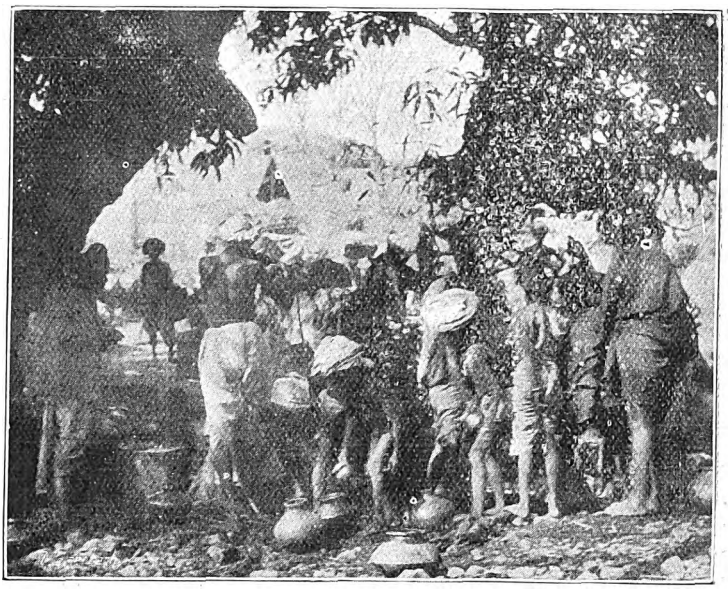
The three photos on another page represent some of the famine cases dealt with at Bhaisdehi.



RUSH FOR WATER. CROWD ROUND WATERHOLE.

One Photo represents that saddest of all sights, a famine baby. Poor little one! Its mother, too heartless and careless to take the trouble to bring it regularly to us for the milk provided for these little ones, and being unable to nurse it herself, was not burdened with it long—a typical case, we fear, of the callousness too often produced by famine.

Another is that of an old Gond who, to support himself and his equally aged wife, who was too weak to walk the three miles from their village to our kitchen, would almost daily bring on his head such a huge bundle of firewood as that which he stands beside in the picture, his aged limbs staggering under the burden. And when his wife fell sick, and I gave him a rupee to enable him to get her some better food, his gratitude was most touching to see. They seemed a real Darby and Joan!

A third represents yet a very different type. He turned up one evening in very fair condition, and when asked why he had come so late when the free meal was quite over, he said he couldn't eat either kedgeree or chapatti, "they go round and round in my mouth and won't go down! Sahib, I want fish, and meat, and sweets!" I went to see what could be done for him, and returning found him snugly ensconced in one of our servant's houses, rejoicing in some rice pudding and sultanas which our cook had given him!

To summarise the general results of the relief work of the Mission during the late famine, a few figures may be helpful. The number of donations given in 1900 was 10,171, and the amounts received for all departments of the work in that year was over £11,153 of which between £7,000 and £8,000 was for famine alone, apart from orphan and leper funds. These donations came to the Mission from all parts of the world, including some from soldiers guarding Boer prisoners in St. Helena. The maintenance of orphans and lepers in 1900 cost £1,099 and £590 respectively. On general famine relief works and gratuitous relief at the various stations from November 1899 to December 31st, 1900, (the period covered by the famine accounts), the total was Rs41,889, or, at 15Rs to £1, £2,972, of which the lion's share viz., Rs13,385, fell to Khamla (Bithron), chiefly for the building of the dam and excavation of the river bed, a work eminently successful in its results, as visible in photo reproduced. Other items of special interest are Rs4,861 for weaving, Rs5,553 for side grain and grass, and Rs7,798 for bullocks and their keep.

Digitized by Google

INTERVIEW WITH THE . . . . . REV. G. CAMPBELL-MORGAN.

A recent writer in The Sunday Magazine ventured to suggest the formation of an "Ever-open" Church, in which some greatly gifted preachers might, day after day, have the opportunity of speaking to the crowds, whom the writer of that article ventured to predict, would be glad of the opportunity of hearing.

The force of that prediction has been certainly strengthened by the way hundreds of people have gathered to listen to the mid-day addresses of the Rev. G. Campbell-Morgan at Westminster Chapel, in the south-west of London. It speaks volumes for what could be done, if there were more of such meetings tried.

REV. J. CAMPBELL-MORGAN.

It was only a simple service — a few hymns, a reading of Scripture, selected to tell on the morning subject, a short prayer, and then an earnest plain-spoken address, but it held the people there spell-bound, though there were no surroundings to make it helpful. In fact, the vast chapel with its empty galleries, produced a very depressing effect, until the quiet earnestness of the preacher began to tell. He was speaking on the conditions of "Prevailing Prayer," and practically laid them down as consisting "in the response of the life to the important facts that make prayer possible." During his "talk," he mentioned that the text, which, more than any other in the New Testament had given him a revelation of what Jesus came to do, was "Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom." And he made our response to the claim that those words ought to have upon our life, the key to the conditions of prevailing prayer. That claim was to rest in the shepherding care of Jesus, to take up the obedient position of children to the Father, and to submit to the rule of the King. There was a decided Protestant animus in his address, to which his hearers heartily responded, and among the good things he said worth remembering, was the statement that the sacerdotal revival occurred at the same time as the rationalising of our pulpits. Men had become too cultured to shock their hearers and themselves by the use of the word "blood."

The Future of Westminster Chapel.

Chatting with Mr. Morgan afterwards, he expressed his opinion that Westminster Chapel most decidedly ought to have a future. It was central, it was easily reached, and thoroughly convenient to work on a large scale. But he did not believe there was anything in the idea that it might succeed as a Mission Centre after the pattern of St. James's Hall. "No!" he said emphatically. "Get a preacher here. I believe if you had a man like Jowett of Birmingham he would succeed in attracting a large crowd."

Digitized by Google

Contrast Between English and American Religious Life.

He refused to enter into the precise differences between church-life in the United States, and here. He admitted there were contrasts and great contrasts too, and was quite prepared to voice his conviction that the religious life in America, was not so reverent in form, or so devotional in spirit, as in England. "There is something" he said, "far deeper in our religious worship here, than yonder. It is more on the surface there, has more 'go' in it, certainly, but there is a depth in the religious feeling in England, which is not counterbalanced by the smartness of its setting in the New World."

Religion and Business.

In view of the crusade that is starting over here to bring religion more into touch with every-day business-life and commercial practices, he spontaneously expressed the consciousness that a similar crusade might be carried on in America, where commercial integrity certainly needed the power of religion to purify it, more, he believed, than it did here, though he smiled, as the writer assured him that it was bad enough here, men keeping their religion and their business in separate water-tight compartments.

His Return to England.

Nothing seemed more unlikely. His work was so clearly and definitely marked out in America, in connection with Northfield, and in many other ways, and it was a Christian man's duty to "pasture" where the Shepherding (of which he had spoken in his sermon) led him. No, it certainly was not a holiday that he was taking over here—not even a change of work, for he was simply full of engagements and still they came. Rumour having reached the writer that Mr. Campbell Morgan is issuing a book, a question elicited the fact that it would be on the lines of an appeal to "Twentieth Century Christians," based upon his addresses on some of the Epistles—"A message greatly needed," he added, and his face grew impassioned, as he spoke of Christian men and women living unresponsive to the note of sorrow round them, which only Christian men and women, with ears that God had opened could possibly hear and sympathise with.

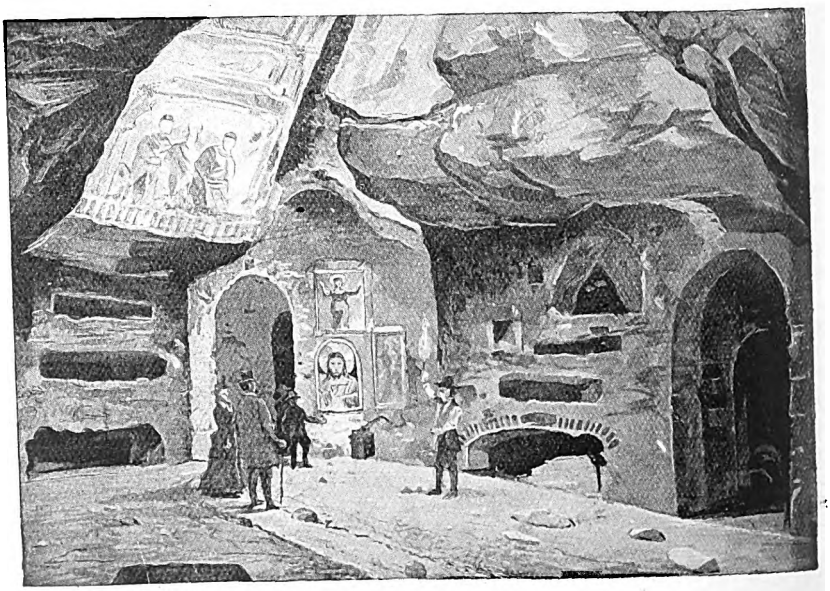
Seeing the slightly wearied air with which Mr. Morgan sat back in his chair, and remembering the enormous expenditure of nerve-energy involved in giving three such eager, live addresses a day, as that to which he had just listened, the writer departed with a firm impression of an honest, kindly, earnest personality that will not easily be effaced.

C. H.

Digitized by Google

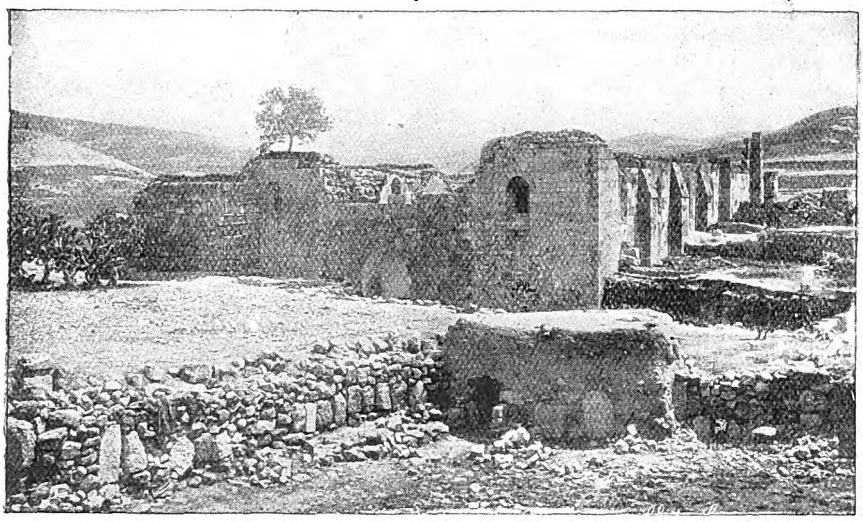
RANDOM RAMBLES.

ONE of the most extraordinary sets of human works found on the earth are the Catacombs at Rome. They are vast galleries excavated underground, sometimes as many as five being one under the other, and were used for the burial of the dead. There is much mystery about them, but it is generally supposed that they were commenced near the beginning of the Christian era, and from their great extent their enlargement must have continued through several centuries. There are about sixty of them, and it is estimated that the aggregate length of the passages is about 400 miles. The average height of these passages is about eight feet, and on either side are apertures containing or once containing, the dead. Those tombs which have not been disturbed have their entrances closed with marble or tiled slabs, frequently bearing inscriptions, by which we find that both pagans and early Christians were buried there. The Christian inscriptions are often very pathetic, showing the belief of the survivors in the great doctrine of the Christian faith, at an age before the Papacy existed.



THE CATACOMBS OF ROME.

Digitized by Google



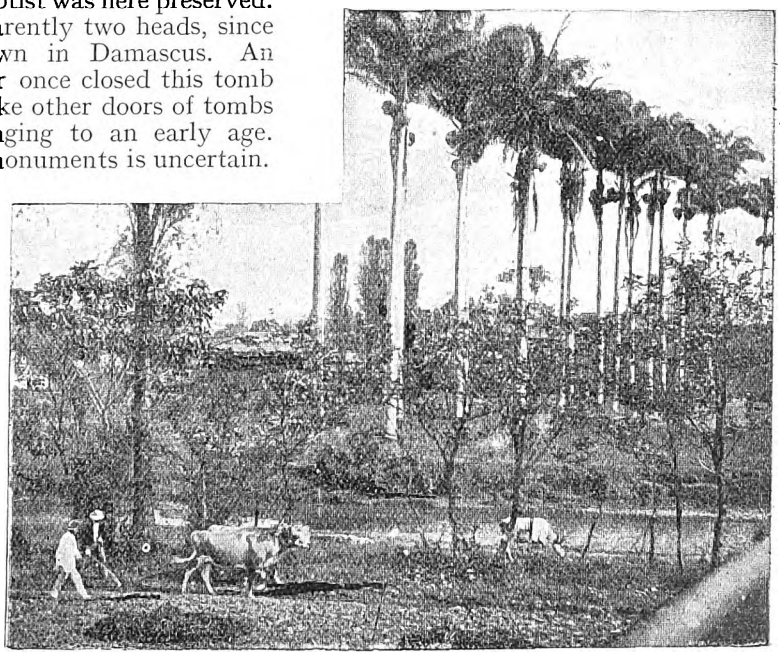
THE CITY OF SAMARIA.

SAMARIA was the capital of the kingdom of Israel, and, as such, is frequently mentioned in the Old Testament. It is now a heap of ruins. Major C. R. Condor, in speaking of it, says: "On one side are the ruins of the great Crusading Church of St. John (of which we give a picture on this page), in the crypt of which was shown his tomb. It was believed in the Middle Ages that the head of the Baptist was here preserved. St. John had apparently two heads, since another was shown in Damascus. An ancient stone door once closed this tomb carved in panels like other doors of tombs in Palestine belonging to an early age. The date of these monuments is uncertain.

❀ ❀

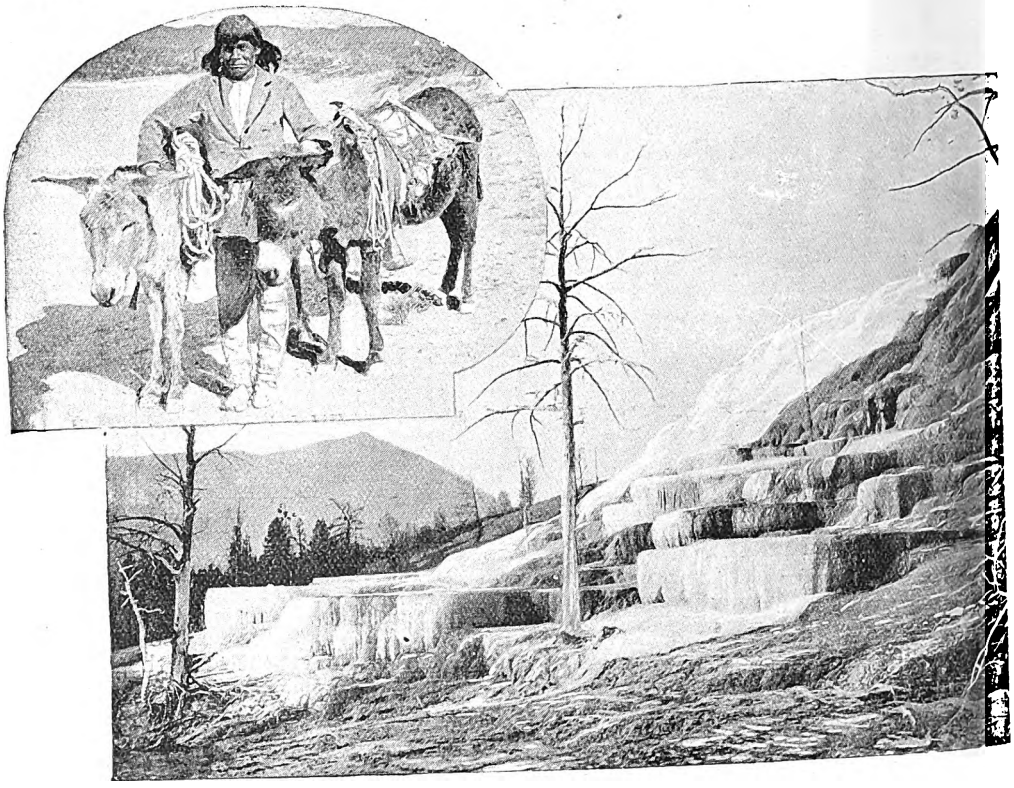
BAHAMAS.

OUR picture on this page —copied by per mssion from American sources —gives a very good idea of the luxuriant vegetation of the Bahama Islands. These islands belong to England, and are situated in the Atlantic, just at the entrance of the Gulf of Mexico, and consequently near the south-east corner of the United States. There are about twenty inhabited islands containing an area of about three thousand square miles, and a population in 1891 of 36,699; beside which there are about 3,000 islets and rocks which are uninhabited. The chief island is New Providence, on which is the capital, Nassau, a large and handsome city, and a winter health resort of Americans and West



SCENE IN BAHAMAS.

Digitized by Google



SCENE IN THE YELLOWSTONE PARK, U.S.A.

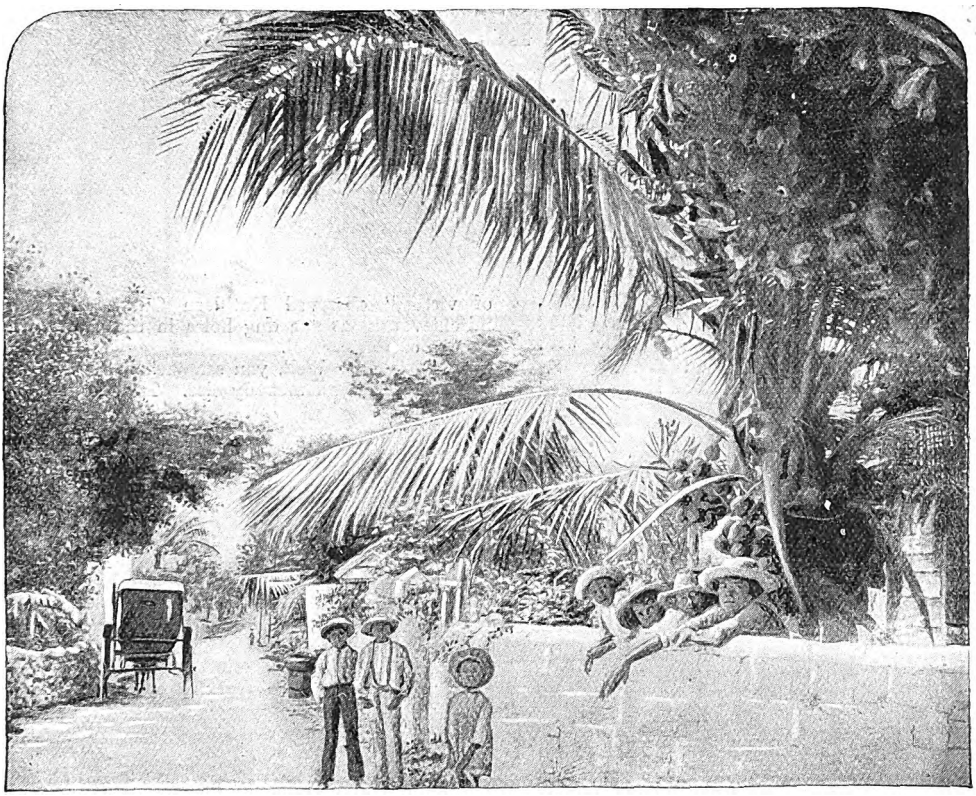
Indians. It is believed that it was one of these islands that was first sighted by Columbus when he discovered the New World. The islands were originally settled by Englishmen, but were surprised by the Spaniards in 1781, who restored them to the English at the peace of Versailles. The chief industry is sponge-gathering. The fruit trade is also very important. Pine-apples, bananas, cocoa-nuts, tomatoes, oranges, and other fruits abound.

❀ ❀ ❀

Wonders of The Yellowstone.

"WHEN the wonders of Yellowstone Park are better known," said a United States man, "our people will not be so eager to go abroad to see grandly picturesque scenery. From Sitka to New Mexico, our whole western possessions are a succession of natural wonders and magnificent surprises. To the north the glaciers and the higher mountain peaks are worth a year's travel to see. But the greatest of all sights is the Yellowstone, whose canyon is, I think, the most awe-inspiring and uplifting scene of natural grandeur on earth." Such an enthusiastic observation might be regarded as exaggerated were it not fairly borne out by all who have ever visited Yellowstone Park. That great public Reservation, once part of the State of Wyoming, belongs to the American Government and is protected and cared for by the nation. One of the finest and most attractive scenes in the Park is the Mammoth Hot Springs (shown in the picture). These springs, as Dr. Field has recently described them, are the overflow of mineral substances that have been dissolved in the boiling cauldron under the earth, and forced upwards through the fissures of the rocks over which these wartes falling seem to glisten with all the colours of the rainbow. The crystalisation of the mineral waters thus ejected through long ages has formed natural terraces of great beauty.

Digitized by Google



SCENE IN VENEZUELA.

THE Central and South American Republics are noted for their frequent revolutions, and Venezuela is now having its turn. This country is the most northerly Confederation of South America. It is situated on the equator, has an area of 566,159 square miles, and a population of about two and a half millions. Its capital is Caracas, which has a population of over 80,000. A long outstanding dispute respecting the boundaries with British Guiana was settled last year by arbitration in favour of this country. In 1449 the Spaniards landed in Venezuela, and observing some huts built upon piles in an Indian village named Cora, in order to raise them above the stagnant waters that covered the plain, they named the place Venezuela, or Little Venice. They took possession, and according to their custom, acted with the greatest cruelty to the inhabitants. The descendants of these Spanish settlers revolted from the parent country in 1814, but Spain did not recognise its independence till 1845.

Digitized by Google

THREE LITTLE PITCHERS.

By L. E. ISON.

. . THE PRIZE STORY. . .

"THIS is certainly the reward of virtue, Kathleen. I come down like a good brother to spend a Sunday at the sea-side with Florence and her chicks, and find you."

"I'm afraid Mrs. Wynne won't call it the reward of virtue," observed Kathleen Guest, dimpling mischievously as she dug holes in the sand with her red cotton parasol.

"My sister? Well, you see she's set her heart on my marrying somebody else. That impossible

KATHLEEN FELT IT WAS RATHER DOUBTFUL.

Digitized by Google

rich girl I told you about, with large feet and a small sense of humour. That's why I want to emulate Brer Fox, and 'lie low' till the last moment. Then I will confess. But my sister Florence is capable of making herself unpleasant when she fails

She was not allowed to continue, being stopped in a forcible, but not unkind manner.

"George, do be careful," she implored, when she was able to speak once more. "If the children were to see you—"

THEY SAUNTERED INTO THE RAMBLING WILDERNESS OF A GARDEN.

to get her own way, and I don't want to argue all the time I'm here. It's exhausting in June!"

"But don't you think Mrs. Wynne is perhaps right? I am a governess, and haven't a penny of my own; this other girl is a good——"

"There would be an end of our secret," concluded George Fleming, cheerfully. "Bless the innocent creatures; they are far too busy making sand-castles with moats round them to heed such unimportant things as lovers. Really, I never liked my nephew and nieces so well. I thought children were always tiresome, interfering brats on such occasions as the present; whereas, I couldn't see half so much of you were it not for the excuse they offer. Florence says they adore "Uncle George' and she thinks it quite admirable of me to wish to be with them so much!"

Digitized by Google

"And you bribe them with chocolate and sixpences to keep a safe distance," added Kathleen, with dancing eyes.

"Upon which the sweet innocents retreat, chuckling with joy. Though when occasionally they have overheard a word of our conversation, it has made absolutely no impression; they are delightfully simple!"

"Arthur is generally considered rather precocious," remarked Kathleen Guest, uneasily. "But they are really too absorbed in play to notice anything. Lucy is getting very wet; I must run and tell them not to paddle any longer, now. It's nearly time they put on their shoes and stockings."

She hurried down the shining sands after her small charges, and George Fleming watched her proudly She was a radiantly pretty girl of three-and-twenty. Even the cheap serge skirt and home-made blouse could not disguise the graceful lines of her slender figure.

It was almost two years since their first meeting in a Swiss hotel. She was staying there with her father, and the two young people had fallen in love during a hopelessly wet fortnight in which they were together nearly every hour of day-light. He had been on the point of proposing, when he was telegraphed for to the bed-side of his dearest friend who was dying. Unfortunately, he had failed to secure Miss Guest's address, and when a few days later he wrote to Switzerland, she and her father had left the hotel, and all trace of them had disappeared.

Vainly had George Fleming sought for the girl he so passionately loved. Hers was not a common surname, and at first he was sanguine of success, but during the last six months hope had well-nigh forsaken him. But he had never swerved in faithfulness to her memory, and now his constancy was rewarded. The day before our story begins he had come down for the week-end to Sandmouth, and strolling on the beach with his sister's trio of children, was the lady of his heart.

The question he had so long been burning to ask was soon satisfactorily answered. She, on her side, confessed to many a heart-ache on his account. In other ways, too, she had suffered. The two years, in worldly matters prosperous for him, had robbed her of money and leisure, and she had been obliged to try and earn her own living. She had only obtained her present engagement a month before, and though her pupils had often chattered of "Uncle George" she had never dreamed he was the Mr. Fleming she had long ago learned to love at Interlaken.

Little did Mrs. Wynne think how completely she was defeating her cherished plans for her favourite brother, when she urged that good-natured individual to spend Sunday with her and her family. It was partly the thought of talking to him about the duty of settling down that had impelled her persuasive letters of invitation, for she had already selected his prospective bride.

Then on the very morning of his arrival she had developed a severe cold in the head, which confined her to the house, to her intense annoyance. Some neighbouring golf-links, her brother kindly assured her, would serve him for amusement and exercise, but that was before his great discovery. He had sallied forth with balls and clubs, and they had lain idle from that joyful moment. With a man-like horror of scenes, he had determined, since fate so far favoured him, to keep his sister in ignorance of his engagement to her governess till the hour of his departure.

"If she is nasty," he said decisively to Kathleen, "you must pack up your boxes and go home at once. But I know Florence pretty well, and fancy she will take things sensibly, after she has cried a little and protested, and made a storm in a tea-cup."

Saturday and Sunday passed like a glorious dream to the lovers, and Black Monday came all too soon. Concealment weighed heavily upon Kathleen's frank young nature, and she almost cried.

Mrs. Wynne spoke kindly to her.

"It makes me feel such a hypocrite, George," she said as they walked on the sands together for the last time that afternoon, "but you will tell her before you go?"

"The last train to town leaves at 7.40," returned Mr. Fleming, gloomily. "I must say good-bye to you before then. I dislike that thought far more than breaking the news to Flo; never mind, we shan't be parted very long, dearest."

"I do hope she will take it well," pursued Kathleen, as they turned back.

"How shall you tell her?"

"Easily enough," smiled her betrothed. "Wait till after tea." But though he answered so lightly George Fleming shrank from the task before him. He was not cast in very heroic mould, though he had plenty of good, every-day virtues, that made him a delightful person to live with—which cannot always be said of heroes!

"Miss Guest is bringing the children on splendidly," observed Mrs. Wynne pleasantly, as they sat in the pretty little drawing-room an hour later. "Don't you think they have improved, George?"

"I do, indeed; I never saw three youngsters more transformed," her brother replied with alacrity. "Florence, your cold is so much better, don't you think a turn in the garden would do you good?" Confusion would seem easier in the open-air, he reflected.

Mrs. Wynne assented, wrapping a light shawl carefully round her shoulders, and together they sauntered into the rambling wilderness of a garden that lay behind the house. A murmur of childish voices came from a sheltered corner.

"Let us see what they are playing at," whispered Mrs. Wynne, who honestly adored her offspring. "Come softly, George; they will stop if they see us most likely, and they can be so amusing!"

How amusing they were going to be she little guessed. Cautiously the brother and sister made their way through a forest of tall raspberry canes till they came to a spot where they could see and not be seen. They then witnessed the following little comedy.

Archie (aged 8): "I'm going to be Uncle George."

May (aged 7): "You're always Uncle George. 'Tisn't fair always to take the best part; let me do it this time."

Archie: "Oh, May, how can a girl do it properly? No; you be Miss Grant. Hang your head and look silly. Can't you go red?"

May: "Oh, bother! Well, where's that bit of geranium? I'll rub that on my cheeks; what's Lucy to do?"

Lucy (aged 5): "Yes; what's Yucy to do?"

Archie: "You and the dolls can be us three children; you be me, Lucy. Now, let's begin!" (Going away and returning rapidly with an astonishing swagger, all his own). "Miss Grant—Kathleen, may I call you so? This is indeed a surprise—a glad one!"

Digitized by Google

PLAYING AT WOOING.

May (with lowered head and flaming geranium cheeks): "Mr. Fleming, I am the children's governess."

Archie (with fine scorn): "And do you think I care for that? Kathleen, let me——"

May (looking warningly at Lucy and the dolls): "'Mr. Fleming--little Pitchers!'" (in an encouraging aside) "Now, Lucy!"

Archie (with a remarkable air of patronage): "Are you fond of goodies, dear old boy? Here's sixpence for you and your sisters to spend at the tuck-shop to-morrow. Only now, I want you to run away and pick me up some shells from behind that big rock, yonder."

Lucy (disregarding the proffered button that does duty for sixpence): "Dive me that bit of choc'late sticking out of your pottie, Archie!"

Archie: "Lucy, that's not in your part; you ought to say: "Thank you, Uncle George, and run away!"

Lucy (in a practical tone): "So I will when I've dot the choc'late!"

Archie (handing the sweet-meat hastily to his small sister): "Take it, you little pig. (Changing his voice): "Don't hurry back, Archie, my boy; play nicely with your little sisters. Miss Guest and I will wait for you here." (Aside): "Now, May, you can kiss me if you like, only not too hard, remember."

May: "Archie, you're forgetting. Uncle George always begins. You must take my arm first,—so!"

But Mrs. Wynne did not pause to await any further developments of the drama, played with such spirit by her promising children. She had listened to them at first with petrified wonder, till slowly the dread truth had dawned upon her. Wildly she clutched her brother's arm.

"George," she murmured, "George, can I believe my ears? Tell me they have invented all this!"

Mr. Fleming stroked his moustache in guilty confusion. Finally his eyes brimmed over with laughter

"Hang the little beggars!" he muttered. "Still, they've saved me the trouble of breaking the ice Florence, don't look so tragic, and I'll tell you the whole story."

It was soon told, but George Fleming put so much honest, manly feeling into it, that his sister could not help admiring him, and to his relief forbore to dwell much on her own disappointment. Besides, she reflected, with wise philosophy, it would make not the slightest difference since George was so determined. So she only shed a few tears on his shoulder, was duly patted and caressed, and finally gave him a rather damp kiss of congratulation.

It was all over very quietly, and so absorbed were the three little Wynnes in their "study from life," that they did not perceive the presence of their elders, till this satisfactory stage of affairs was reached. Then, with one accord they turned and smiled. May was the first to speak, "Why there is Uncle George," she cried, running to him, "Say Uncle, now didn't we do it well?"

Digitized by Google

RESULT OF STORY COMPETITION.

PRIZE STORY—"Three Little Pitchers," MISS L. E. ISON,
Sunnyside.
Ashby-de-la-Zouch.

2ND.—"The Women and the Teacups,"
MRS. FRANK BUSH,
17, Warwick Street,
Rugby.

3RD.—"The Roses of Death,"
E. VINCENT WAREING,
Ryton Villa,
Highfield Road,
Saltley,
Birmingham.

The Proprietor of the "TEMPLE MAGAZINE" offers a Prize of £1 for the best complete story not exceeding 2,000 words, and not less than 1,500 words. The prize story will be published in the "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," and illustrated free of charge, and the Author will receive a cheque for £1. The second and third stories in order of merit will be published and illustrated free of charge. The sending in of any stories or articles shall be deemed, on selection for first, second, or third place, to give the Proprietor the right of publication for one issue of the "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," and the Author will receive a set of electros of the illustrations free. The "Story Coupon," cut from the "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," must be attached to MSS. sent in.

Story Competition Coupon.

Available for MSS. sent in up to October 23rd, 1902.

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

The "Temple Magazine" will be glad to publish any short original articles embodying any new or striking ideas in Politics, Science, Mechanics, Medicine, Political Economy, or indeed any subject in which the people would be generally interested. In any case the article should not be longer than 2,000 words in length. If drawings or photographs are sent on they will be used with the letterpress.
Address:—Manuscript Editor, "Temple Magazine," 6, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A Scientific . . . . Discourse.

FOR

THOUGHTFUL MINDS.

A RECORD OF FACTS,
PRINCIPLES, AND DISCOVERIES.

Free (or unoxidised) Phosphorus in its relation to the Improvement and Preservation of Human Life on Earth.

"THAT our medical men of every school, our greatest chemists, physiologists, philosophers, and men of science generally; as well as the inventors of, and those who deal in and adopt the numberless methods and preparations which are advertised in all directions and in every conceivable manner for the cure of the "Ills that flesh is heir to," suffer almost as greatly, and decay and die as quickly as the least educated in society, is matter of positive fact as well as of regret; and although it may be conceded that much good has been done by every system which has yet been proposed, there is certainly still a deficiency; still humanity suffers; and it is painfully evident that something more is urgently wanted—something more simple, more decided in its action, less of the character of ordinary physic or medicine, and more of the nature of a preserving and protecting aliment. This important desideratum medical science has, so far, failed to supply."

"Let us hope that the preparation now described is the beginning of a series of improvements in the right direction and of victories over the natural world."

These were the words of the late Dr. Samuel Birley, M.D., when introducing to the world, a few years ago, the results of his investigations, which had been the outcome of a lifetime's work and study.

What the medical world of to-day is beginning to recognise, he had many years ago satisfied himself upon: namely, the supreme control which the nervous system exercises, not only over the main functions, but over the most minute and apparently insignificant processes taking place in the body.

Dr. Birley's great rule is, therefore:—"Look after the nervous system; keep it well-nourished, and in perfect working order, and disease will little affect us."

Dr. Birley devoted many years to the discovery of some remedy that would fulfil the above indications. He carefully analysed the brains of persons who had died from various diseases, as well as of those who had been killed by accident whilst in the full vigour of health. He was struck by the deficiency of Phosphorus found in the brain matter of the weak and ailing, compared to what normally existed in the strong and healthy. From this fact the suggestion naturally arose that perhaps the loss of phosphorus had much to do with the weakened nerve force, and that its artificial administration might help to give back what had been lost. Such a thought was no less that prophetic, but simple as it appeared to be in this early stage of the investigation, it was found impossible to carry it out with any satisfactory result, for the following reason:—

Ordinary phosphorus, as understood by the chemist, cannot, by any known method, be made to be PERFECTLY SOLUBLE in the blood. It may be finely powdered and given in pills, etc., or dissolved in oil, alcohol, ether or chloroform, but in all these forms it is precipitated into a fine dust immediately on mixing with the juices of the stomach.

Many of these particles do not pass into the blood at all, but of those that do, they are completely stopped when they arrive at the liver, through which organ everything passes from the stomach before entering the general circulation. Hence Phosphorus administered in this form cannot possibly reach the nervous system, and cannot therefore aid in its restoration.

Knowing these facts, and convinced of the necessity of phosphorus as a Food, rather than a medicine, for the Brain and Nervous System, Dr. Birley experimented in many ways for the purpose of discovering a means of preparing it so that it would be free from these drawbacks.

His aim was to find out a form which would not precipitate in this manner, but remain in perfect solution throughout the system.

In the end he was rewarded by the discovery of a new process of preparation (by distillation) which rendered it, when taken by the mouth, absolutely soluble in the blood, and was perfectly satisfactory in its effects in every way. It could pass through the liver in a fluid state and thus reach the nerve tissues, which alone were in need of it.

No better proof of the value of this new form of phosphorus could be required than the very severe tests to which Dr. Birley put his invention. That it really does pass into the circulation, and enter into the composition of the Brain and Nervous System cannot be better discussed than in the inventor's own words:—

"The question has often been put to us—What proof have you that your PHOSPHORUS, when taken into the stomach, actually reaches and combines with the substance of the brain?

As it is truth only, and not opinion or hypothesis that we care for, our answer must be perfectly candid, and such only as practical investigation permits us to give. Because we cannot, or rather have no opportunity to, analyse the living human brain, before a course of PHOSPHORUS has been entered upon, we

Digitized by Google

admit that the evidence is not direct and positive. We are obliged to depend upon implication and analogy. The following items, however, force the conclusion we have maintained upon us :—

1ST.—PHOSPHORUS is a constant element of the brain and nervous system of all animals.

2ND.—The amount of PHOSPHORUS is different in persons of different mental and physical powers.

3RD.—In the brain and nerve-matter of those who have during life been characterised by great powers of mind and body and who have been in the prime of health suddenly killed in battle, or accident, or by other violence, a much larger amount of PHOSPHORUS has been discovered than is ever found is the brain-matter of ordinary persons who have been killed in a similar manner.

4TH.—The brain-matter of idiots contains the least amount of PHOSPHORUS. A little more PHOSPHORUS is found in that of persons not completely imbecile, but physically and mentally weak, languid in action, deficient in pluck and energy, full of apprehension, weak in memory and in application of thought and purpose, who hesitate in their resolves, and shrink from the general bustle of commercial life. The same may be said of persons who are fretful, low-spirited, anxious, fidgety, and odd-tempered, and of the positively ill-tempered and disagreeable.

5TH.—Persons who in early life have enjoyed a fair amount of mental and physical power, but who have suffered many years from great anxiety and sorrow consequent upon family bereavement and other losses and trials, have been found after death to have lost a great portion of the PHOSPHORUS which is common in the brain of similar persons who have not suffered in the same way.

The same may be affirmed of those who, beginning life with a good constitution, have excessively indulged in alcoholic preparations. Alcohol has the property of dissolving and carrying away the PHOSPHORUS of the brain and nervous system. We have personally known and carefully watched the career of many who in the "prime of life" were brilliant, energetic, first-class men of business, full of dash and assurance, carrying all before them, and succeeding in almost every undertaking. We have observed some of these to gradually wane in their mental and physical powers; little by little to have become anxious and apprehensive; matters which once were trifles, unworthy of attention, have seemed to be of great consequence; enterprise and speculation have become less and less; a fear of losing or failing has gradually crept in, until a general tameness and insipidity have been observed. A few years longer, and the once bright, confident, venturesome business man has dwindled to an eccentric, nervous, despondent, and miserable human remnant, incapable of concentrating his powers, vacillating, absent-minded, forgetful, and almost heedless of the world or its pleasures. Deafness, failing sight, impaired susceptibility, necrencephalus (softening of the brain) and general inanition, have gradually terminated in death. In some cases we have been enabled to procure the brain and a portion of the spinal cord, and have found by analysis that the PHOSPHORUS has been greatly deficient and much less than has been found in the brain-matter of persons who had the same vigorous character during early life, but who have died suddenly by violence in the midst of their career, and when all their powers of mind and body were most intense. In several instances different parts of the brain have been found to contain different proportions of PHOSPHORUS.

Striking as are the foregoing examples, and forcible as they are in the way of evidence, they are not in themselves sufficient. We require a synthetical process before we can form a satisfactory conclusion.

We have treated with PHOSPHORUS cases of every class. We have seen the prematurely old, the worn and exhausted, the nervous and miserable of every position in life, gradually restored to a most vigorous and perfectly healthy state. From a lean and cadaverous condition they have become full in flesh, the countenance clear and ruddy, the eyes bright, sight improved, deafness overcome, the hair become abundant, the step and gait again elastic and determined, the spirits high and generous, the temper cheerful, the love of song and harmony returned, the brain again active, perception quick, memory tenacious, and the whole system and character changed from the most pitiable condition to the highest state of existence.

In several instances the stir and excitement of mercantile life have created a longing to return to business. Some have done so, and are now as keen and successful as at any former period.

If then in all cases of mental and physical debility where we have been able to analyse the brain after death, we have found a deficiency of PHOSPHORUS, and if in precisely similar cases during life we have administered PHOSPHORUS, and found such conditions pass away, what other conclusion is it possible to arrive at than that this new form of Phosphorus gradually assimilates with the brain and nervous system, and brings up the depressed and wasted constitution to the normal standard?

The preparation which has repeatedly produced such results as those above described, we have called 'Plain' Syrup of Free Phosphorus, because it is the simple solution formed by distillation, combined with sugar and without the admixture of any other substance or medicament."

Free Phosphorus in combination with other Medicaments.

The Phosphorus prepared as above described permits of our taking advantage of the well-known principle in medical science, that different articles of the materia medica have the property of acting specially on different organs of the body. These various properties are very valuable in cases of special diseased action, and we are able to take advantage of them in using the syrup of phosphorus here described. It will combine with many remedial agents, and thus the power of the phosphorus may be determined to different organs of the body as local conditions may require.

Where the heart is weak, and the whole muscular system flabby and greatly debilitated, in addition to great nervous debility and exhaustion, the best combination is that of protoxide of iron with the "Plain," and which we have named the "Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus."

In the course of many years' private practice Dr. Birley was enabled to considerably modify and perfect a number of combinations of his Phosphorus in addition to the "Ironised" above named. For debility of the muscular and general system in LADIES particularly; when "Below Par," and suffering from poorness of blood and lack of colour, a special preparation called the "Sub-Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus" has been found to be wonderfully successful.

Hence the fifteen standard kinds enumerated in the adjoined list have been formulated and have earned a unique reputation for the complaints named therein.

Digitized by Google

DETAILED LIST.

The result of over Half a Century's Experience. All have been proved in a Large Private Practice before being offered to the public.

PLAIN. SYRUP OF FREE PHOSPHORUS. A Vitalising food for all Brain and Nervous Affections from whatever cause—worry, late hours, overwork, &c.; and for Hysteria, Vitus' Dance, Headache, &c., &c. A sustaining and life-giving element. The basis of all Dr. Birley's Preparations. Of especial value to Professional Men, Clergymen, Solicitors, Barristers, Literary Men, Schoolmasters, and all engaged in mental occupations 4/6

IRONISED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Muscular Debility, Heart Disease, Paralysis, Rupture, Sciatica, Lumbago, Scrofula, Obesity, Dropsy, and General Debility. Of great value also as a restorative after an attack of "influenza" .. 4/6

SUB-IRONISED. Especially prepared for Ladies and Delicate Persons suffering from the above, instead of the "Ironised." And for Bright's Disease, Mumps, Varicose Veins, and when "Below Par" 4/6

MAGNESIAN. SPECIAL REMEDY for Pulmonary and other forms of Consumption 4/6

BRONCHIAL. SPECIAL REMEDY for Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Quinsy, Congestion of the Lungs, Diphtheria, and Throat Affections generally 4/6

CASTRIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Indigestion and Liver Complaints 4/6

ANTI-RHEUMATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for every form of Rheumatism and Gout. (In some cases the Ironised or Sub-Ironised will aid the action of this preparation when taken on alternate days with it) .. 4/6

ANTI-STIPATIO. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Constipation, Flatulence, Piles, Spasms Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, &c. 4/6

AGIDIFIED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak, Fading, and Falling Off of Hair, and for Actual Baldness (internal use only) 4/6

VIRILITIC. Prepared for men suffering from Nervous Debility and Loss of Vitality 4/6

TOMATINED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak and Partial Loss of Sight, Deafness, Defective Taste or Smell 4/6

ANTI-NEURALGIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Neuralgia, Pleurisy and Erysipelas .. 4/6

CUTANEOUS. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Skin Diseases, Eczema, Psoriasis, &c. 4/6

The 4/6 Bottles contain between 70 and 80 Doses and are sufficient for nearly ONE MONTH'S USE

A SPECIAL OFFER.

We have the fullest confidence that where we can introduce these medicines into a household we are assured of a firm footing, and of recourse to them on all future occasions of illness or indisposition.

This coupon entitles you to a 4/6 Trial Bottle of any one kind of Dr. Birley's Phosphorus Compounds at 2 6; but if forwarded by parcel post, 4d. per bottle extra must be enclosed to cover cost of carriage within the United Kingdom. We guarantee safe delivery. Should a Trial Bottle also be required for a friend or relative, we will extend the offer to them if ordered at the same time.

Orders may be sent with the Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these Trial Bottle Coupons, and if we are not the money will be returned.

For Residents abroad the date will be extended sufficiently to allow of ordering. Postage of 1/4 per bottle is required for abroad.

COUPON.

4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/6

Or by Parcel Post 4d. extra—viz.: 2/10

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Available until Oct. 30th, 1902.

The above Coupon to be cut out and sent with order. These Trial Bottles can be had direct only from the

Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers:

GORDON, MURRAY, & Co., Ltd.,

10, ADAM ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

STRONGLY RECOMMENDED.

Among some hundreds of others we may mention the following Reverend Gentlemen, who have proved the value of the medicine, and from whom we hold some excellent reports:

REV. C. H. SPURGEON, London, S.E.
REV. DR. COCKREM, London Orphan Asylum, Watford.
REV. W. T. CRANFIELD, Stoke.
REV. R. FLETCHER, Hull.
REV. J. JAMES, Abercana id.
REV. J. W. MORRIS, Gly Neath.
REV. C. EARLE, Langford.
REV. F. CLEMENTS, Hanham, Bristol.
REV. GABRIEL MOLLAN, Clonmetham.
REV. E. I. DEVENISH, Teignmouth.
REV. G. COOK, Church Gresley.
REV. G. DALE COPELAND, Pudsey.
REV. A. A. BROOKS, Wigan.
REV. A. E. REALFF, Leicester.
REV. F. JONES, Malton.
REV. W. BARTON, Hull.
REV. G. HOMEYER, Claycross.
REV. J. B. GRATTON, Leominster.
REV. W. FRY, Blandford.
REV. J. D. WOODHALL, Bolton.
REV. R. FRAME, Birkenhead.

THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN AGE" says:—"Doubtless the 'Christian Age' enters many a home where there is some weakly one whose feeble health makes existence a burden, or perhaps it is a disease considered incurable which is wasting away life. Wherever there is such a case, we sincerely wish one of Dr. Birley's Preparations of Phosphorus might have a fair trial. These preparations are the result of scientific studies and experiments extending over many years, and the success which has already attended their use has been almost marvellous. We have seen hundreds of letters (not copies, but the original documents), some from persons well known to us, all testifying to the curative effects of one or other of these preparations. And more than this, we know of cases in which they have been the means of restoring to health when to all appearance recovery was almost impossible."

EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."—"Our readers know quite well how careful we are not to recommend anything but what is thoroughly trustworthy, but so many voluntary testimonials of unmistakable genuineness are before us that it is simply impossible to question the efficacy of the Medicines to which we are calling attention; hundreds of letters from all classes of people, including titled nobility, clergymen, physicians, &c., among which we notice several well-known names, all bearing remarkable testimony to the benefits derived from them."

EDITOR OF THE "FAMILY DOCTOR."—"One Thousand Original Letters of Testimony have been submitted to us by the Proprietors of Dr. Birley's Preparations."

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

See Special Offer at foot to all Readers of this Paper.

DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS

GUARANTEED
PERFECTLY HARMLESS

(Medical Certificate accompanies each box.)

THESE Wafers have long been known to possess the "wizard's touch" in producing, preserving, and enhancing beauty of person in male or female, by surely developing a transparency and pellucid clearness of complexion, brilliant eyes, soft and smooth skin, where by Nature the reverse exists.

The great difficulty hitherto has been how to make this beautifying principle safely available, and at the same time avoid what is detrimental and injurious. Dr. Mackenzie's Wafers are prepared expressly as a "Beautifier of the Complexion and Skin," and are guaranteed harmless. In the direction for which they are intended their action and effect is simply magical, the most astonishing transformations in personal appearance being brought about by their steady use. Even the coarsest and most repulsive skin and complexions, marred by freckles and other disfigurements, slowly change into an unrivalled purity and texture, free from any spot or blemish whatever, the pinched features become agreeable, the form, before angular, gradually transforms itself into the perfection of womanly grace and beauty. Used by men, the favourable result is the same. In the Complexion Wafers as prepared by the undersigned all danger is averted, and the remedy, taken in the manner directed on each box, is absolutely innocuous, while the peculiar virtues of the remedy remain unimpaired and intact. Powders, enamels, so called "blood purifiers," &c., &c., are a delusion and a snare. From the use of these Wafers FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, VULGAR REDNESS, ROUGH, YELLOW, or "MUDDY" SKINS, and other facial disfigurements are permanently removed, and a deliciously CLEAR COMPLEXION is assured

Wonderful TESTIMONY to their efficacy:

59, BEAUMONT SQUARE, MILE END, LONDON.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. The others have done me a great deal of good."
H. MASON.

31, EVINGTON ROAD, LEICHSTER.—"Please send me a box of Wafers. I have derived great benefit from the others I have taken."
Yours truly, M. E. WARD.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Dear Sir: I find your Soap so good, I now want you to send me three cakes of it, also a box of Complexion Wafers."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. I am much pleased by the effects produced by the first."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

MELBECKS, KIRKBY STEPHEN, WESTMORELAND.—"Kindly send me another box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers. The last has worked wonders."
SARAH G. PAGAN.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF THE "TEMPLE MAGAZINE."

T.M.

COUPON

OCT. 1ST, 1902.

A 4/6 TRIAL BOX FOR 2/-

Any reader sending this Coupon and Postal Order or Stamps for Two Shillings will receive immediately a 4/6 Trial Box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers, this great reduction being made to induce our readers to give this wonderful preparation a fair trial, as we know one trial will convince all of their unique merits. This coupon must be sent in within 10 days of this date. Address all orders to

S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., London Bridge.

Digitized by Google

Fretful Babies.

Scores upon scores of young mothers are distressed and perplexed at the reason of a child's fretfulness. It is ever restless and wakeful. It seems only to be appeased when food is being given. The mother then thinks it is craving for food, and gives it in abundance; yet the fretfulness does not abate, and the child remains flabby, pallid, feeble, and puny, where it should be rosy, firm, and growing. The secret is here. It is craving for food, but food of the proper sort. A child wants food containing a certain number of life-sustaining things; and if any one of those things is absent, the child suffers. When proper food is given, a child is rarely restless, because it feels satisfied. Digestion is easy and natural, nutriment is rapidly absorbed, every part of the body is soothed, and healthy development takes place.

MELLIN'S FOOD

contains the proper proportion of everything necessary to infantile health and development.

Sample Bottle Post Free to all applicants mentioning this magazine.

MELLIN'S FOOD WORKS, PECKHAM, LONDON, S.E.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System.—Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. (Removing shortly to 74, Southampton Row.) PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 & 42, Southampton Row, London W.C. (Removing shortly to 74, Southampton Row.)

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. Thompson & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, London: Printed and Published for the Proprietors at 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Temple Magazine

MONTHLY

6d

the Inner Temple.

6d. November 1903 No. 14.

TO THE DEAF

If you suffer from deafness or head noises, and desire a complete and permanent cure, write at once to Professor G. Keith-Harvey, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C., for pamphlet fully describing an entirely new self-applied method, which he will send you gratis and post free on mentioning "Temple Magazine."

READ THE FOLLOWING WONDERFUL TESTIMONY:

"My hearing is now perfect."

"I am pleased to say that since using your remedies my hearing is now perfect, and I shall be glad to recommend your marvellous Treatment to anyone suffering from deafness, &c."—Yours truly, A. W. WRIGHT, 26, Charles Street, Maidstone.

"My hearing is as perfect as ever it was."

"I am pleased to inform you that since using your 'Aural Battery' my hearing is as perfect as ever it was. The noises in my head have almost entirely disappeared, and I also feel a great deal better in my general health. You are quite welcome to make use of these few words in any way you think fit."—Wishing you every success, Yours faithfully, THOMAS COFFEY, 1, Sudley Road, Aigburth, Liverpool.

"I can now hear anything that is said to me."

"I am very pleased to say that since using your remedies I can hear very much better. I can now hear anything that is said to me, and the noises in the head are also quite gone! I shall always be very pleased to recommend your Treatment to others, as it has done me such a lot of good."—Yours truly, (Miss) ELLEN WEBSTER, 44, Carpenter's Road, Stratford.

"I can now hear perfectly."

"I am very glad to say that after using your remedies I can now hear perfectly, and even if I catch cold it does not affect my hearing. I consider your remedies are excellent, and I shall recommend the next any time.—Yours truly, H. MUTIMER, 151, Otley Rd., Framsden, Suffolk.

"My hearing is completely restored."

"I am very pleased to say that after using your 'Aural Battery' the noises in the head have passed away, and my hearing is also completely restored. You may mention my name in any way you please."—Yours faithfully, FREDERICK BARKER, Etwall, near Derby

Prof. G. KEITH-HARVEY, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

BODLEIAN 10-11-1902 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

Hovis Food

Trade Mark

Keeps Babies well, happy and strong.

HOVIS FOOD for Babies and Invalids is in Two Strengths. No. 1 is a Complete Diet for Babies up to 8 months. No. 2 is for older Babies and for Invalids and the aged. The LANCET says, "by the addition of them (Hovis Foods) to diluted cows' milk a milk is obtained presenting the same composition as human milk."

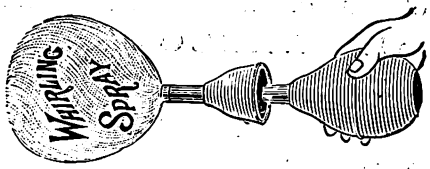
In 1s. 1d. and 1s. 9½d. bottles from Hovis Bakers, Chemists, Grocers and Stores. Further information from Hovis Ltd., Macclesfield.

F. 3-4

Every Woman

is interested and should know about the wonderful

Marvel Whirling Spray



Ask your Chemist for it.
If he cannot supply the Marvel accept no other, but send stamp for pamphlet giving full particulars and price, etc. MARVEL CO.,
Dept. 102, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.

HARTMANN'S

HYGIENIC

TOWELETTES

Indispensable for Ladies Travelling and for Home use. Antiseptic and Absorbent.

6d., 1s., 1s. 4d., and 2s. per dozen.

Obtained at less than the cost of washing from all Drapers and Chemists.

Superior to any Sanitary Towels.

HARTMANN'S DEPOT, 26, Thavies Inn, London, E.C.

28
YEARS' SUCCESS.
THE
UNIVERSAL REMEDY FOR
Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Influenza, Whooping-Cough, Hoarseness, &c.

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

IMPORTANT NOTICE:

SUBSTITUTION. — There are so many imitations of this successful, and therefore popular, remedy that it is of the utmost importance you should use the word "OWBRIDGE" when buying Lung Tonic, and TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

Sold everywhere in bottles at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., & 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

AFRICAN INSTITUTE, COLWYN BAY, NORTH WALES.

The purpose of this Institute is to give evangelical and industrial training to the most promising of the African converts in this country, and to establish similar institutions in Africa, thus sending forth to their own land self-supporting missionaries, to work with their own hands and preach the Gospel in their own tongues. This institution seems to be more in harmony with the feelings and aspirations of the Africans than any other missionary work. The educated natives—including Sir Samuel Lewis, the first African to be knighted by our late Queen—of the English colonies along the West Coast, and also those of South Africa, take the deepest interest in the work. They have formed local committees in various places, thus bringing the African Institute into touch with 3,000 miles of the West Coast, and there is already quite a number in South Africa working for the Institute.

An earnest appeal is made to all Christian friends to support this charitable work.

Objects

(1) To complete Printing and Tailoring Departments (which will ultimately pay for themselves) for the thorough instruction of Students in these useful Trades.

(2) To assist for a few years industrial native Missionary efforts in the Gold Coast, Yorubaland, New Calabar, Liberia, etc., until they become self-supporting.

(3) To develop the Girls' Institute at Colwyn Bay.

(4) To provide for the scores of applicants who continually seek admission into the Boys' Institute.

(5) To pay for the freehold property including present Institute buildings and land.

(6) To publish 3,000 more copies of a Dualla Hymn Book for the native Christians at Cameroons; 2,000 have already been sent out.

All contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Director, W. HUGHES, African Institute, Colwyn Bay, North Wales

Digitized by Google

THE THREE GREAT SCOURGES,

ALCOHOL, MORPHINE, COCAINE.

The Hutton-Dixon Vegetable Antidote,

A HIGH-CLASS, UP-TO-DATE, PHYSICAL HOME CURE FOR

ALCOMOL and DRUG ADDICTIONS.

Also of great value in cases of Insomnia, Neurasthenia and Nerve Exhaustion. Can be carried in the Pocket and taken Privately—thus obviating the Publicity, Expense, and loss of time of an Institute treatment.

WARRANTED FREE FROM NARCOTICS.

Patronised by the Nobility and All Classes.

AN IDEAL HOME CURE.

This humane discovery has been publicly endorsed before the Congress of Bishops, and at Father Matthew's Anniversaries, also by Clergymen from their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in nearly every quarter of the Globe. Over Six Thousand Cases have been treated successfully.

In this treatment there are no hypodermic injections, it being a purely vegetable medicine taken by the mouth, can be carried in the pocket, and taken in perfect privacy at home or anywhere. In from one to three days, and often in as many hours, after commencing this treatment the desire or crave will have so completely disappeared that the victim would not give a penny for all the liquor or drugs in the country for his own use. Among the immediate effects of this treatment are calm, restful sleep, steady nerves, clear brain, increased appetite for food and pronounced benefit in every way physically and mentally, with a positive guarantee that there shall be only good after effects and a permanent removal of all appetite for intoxicating liquors or drugs of any kind, all of which is indorsed by scores of physicians, clergymen of every denomination, and men and women in all phases of life in many parts of the world. This is an absolutely harmless home treatment, and an up to date physical cure backed by and vouched for by testimonials unapproached by any other treatment for these habits.

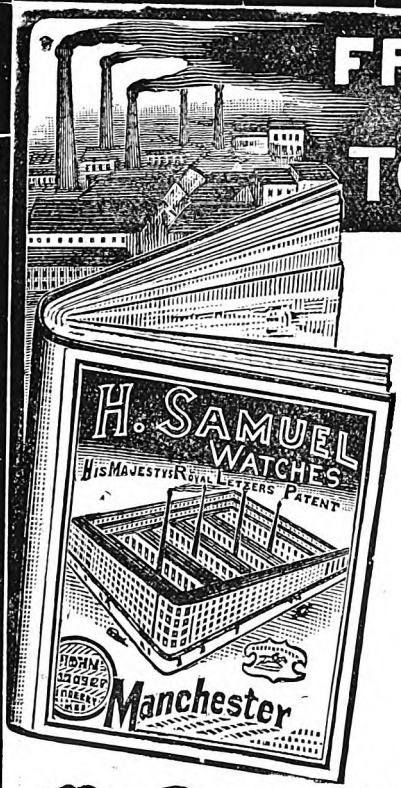
Full particulars and indisputable testimony sent free in a plain sealed envelope. All correspondence strictly confidential.

N.B.—The Testimonials published in my circulars are unique, inasmuch as I print (by kind permission) the full names and addresses of the subscribers thereto, so that the genuineness of the certificates can easily be verified. Glowing letters of recommendation may readily be written and left unsigned, or signed with initials only, but what the public need now-a-days are the hard facts which cannot be denied or controverted, and these I furnish.

Address :—ALEX. H. DIXON, 37 Silverdale, SYDENHAM, LONDON, S.E.

Digitized by Google

FROM THE WORKSHOP TO THE WORLD



SEND A POSTCARD NOW FOR

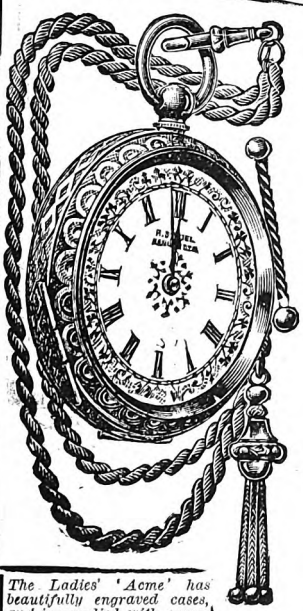
H. SAMUEL'S

GREAT FREE BARGAIN ALBUM

The most perfect money-saver ever produced. Literally brings the factory to your own door. Incredible advantages to the shrewd buyer. You do your shopping at your own fireside, obtain goods of the highest possible value and quality, fresh from the workshop, and

POCKET MIDDLE PROFITS YOURSELF

This magnificent volume contains over 200 pages, illustrated by over 3,000 engravings of astonishing bargains.



Ladies' Gold Watches, 21/-; Gent's Silver Watches, from 8/6; Real Gold Gem Rings, set with real stones, 3/6; Handsome Polished Wood Clocks, 7/6; Strong Alarm Clocks, 1/6; Gold Brooches, 2/9; Silver Brooches, 1/-; Cutlery, Plate, Silverware, and all Household Requirements. This splendid book, which will save you pounds, is sent you

FREE BY RETURN MAIL!

H. SAMUEL

SENDS HIS WORLD-FAMOUS

'ACME' LEVER

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN

on receipt of P. O.

5/- ONLY.

Wear it free for a week.
If satisfied, remit balance, 20/-

The Ladies' 'Acme' has beautifully engraved cases, and is supplied with cream or tinted dial, as preferred.

Solid Silver Cases, fine ¾-plate movement, jewelled, dust-and-damp-proof cap, and the latest patented improvements. Written warranty for 7 years. Price 25/-. Full amount returned, if you are dissatisfied.

A SILVER ALBERT FREE!

To all sending full amount, 25/-, with order. Write now for Free Guide.

H. SAMUEL [Dept. 64], MARKET STREET, MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

A WONDERFUL INVENTION . .

for the

LAME.

As Supplied to the War Office for the Wounded from South Africa.

THE O'CONNOR EXTENSION CO.'S PATENT APPLIANCES

Enable those with Shortened Limbs and Weak Ankles to dispense with Unsightly Instruments, to Wear Ordinary Shoes, and to look like other people.

FLAT FOOT.

The New Patent . . Arch Support

CAN BE ADAPTED TO HELP ANY CASE OF FLAT FOOT.

A New Book on the Mechanical Treatment of Flat Foot will be sent FREE.

TENDER FEET.

The New . . Patent Socks

CAN BE MOULDED TO FIT THE SOLE OF ANY FOOT.

Describe the case, send a pair of old boots or shoes and 5/- A pair of Socks will be sent POST FREE. (United Kingdom).

GOLD MEDAL, LONDON; HIGHEST AWARDS, CHICAGO AND PARIS.

ADDRESS:

The O'Connor Extension Co.,

SURGICAL APPLIANCE MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT,

2, BLOOMSBURY STREET,

LONDON, W.C.

PAMPHLETS FREE on mentioning The Temple Magazine. Please give particulars of the case.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR NOVEMBER, 1902.

		PAGE
I.	Frontispiece
II.	Smuggling Yarns Re-told
III.	The End of Newgate Illustrated	1195
IV.	The Hyena's Feast Illustrated	1206
V.	White Lady of Zenana. Illustration	1211
	Illustrated by Fitzgerald. Serial Tale (Conclusion)	1212
VI.	A Visit to the Parisian Zoo
VII.	The Eruption of Mont Pelee. Illustrated	1220
	Illustrated. Ellery S. Scott	1225
VIII.	The King's Trustees. Complete Prize Story. C.M.P.	1235
	Illustrated.
IX.	A Similitude. Poetry. J.C.	1239
X.	Verestchagin in the Philippines Isabel McDougall	1240
XI.	A Perilous Predicament Travice Reay	1245
	Illustrated.
XII.	American Bread Making H. S. Archer	1250
	Illustrated.
XIII.	The Needle's Eye Serial Story by Florence Kingsley.	1257
	Chapter xi. Continued.
XIV.	Management of the British and Foreign Bible Society	1273
XV.	In the Public Eye	1277
XVI.	Roses of Death. Complete Story. Illustrated	1283

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. The Editor will be obliged if, before sending any manuscript, a letter is sent him describing the purport of the article or enclosing a precis of the story. They must be addressed to THE MANUSCRIPT EDITOR, "THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE," 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to THE MANAGER, 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. MATHER AND CROWTHER BRIDEWELL PLACE, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s.

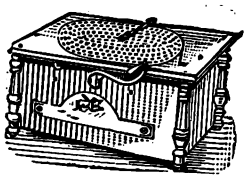
HAND ORGANS FROM 20/-



Three sizes, Ebony and Gold Case. Full organ tone, with six metal tunes. Plays Songs, Hymns, Dance Music. Sent on receipt of P.O. 4s. Can be paid 4s. monthly. Write for terms, prices, and list of tunes.—ATLAS CO., 182x, High Street, Camden Town; 63, Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14, High Road, Kilburn, London.

To Asthma Sufferers

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough by the use of Potter's Asthma Cure. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send postcard to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E. for Free Sample. Kindly mention this paper.

Makes the Skin as Soft as Velvet!

BEETHAM'S "Larola" Regd.

will very soon remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, TAN, IRRITATION, &c., and render THE SKIN delicately SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE. Try a 6d. bottle. Its effect will delight you! Bottles 6d., 1/-, 2/6, of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

BEST IN 1894.

THE PALMER TYRE

BEST NOW.

The ONLY HIGH GRADE TYRE

NOW ON THE MARKET.

For Durability, Palmer Tyres stand alone.

FULLY GUARANTEED.

Write for Manual containing 11 Sectional Road Maps and 1 Key Map of the British Isles.

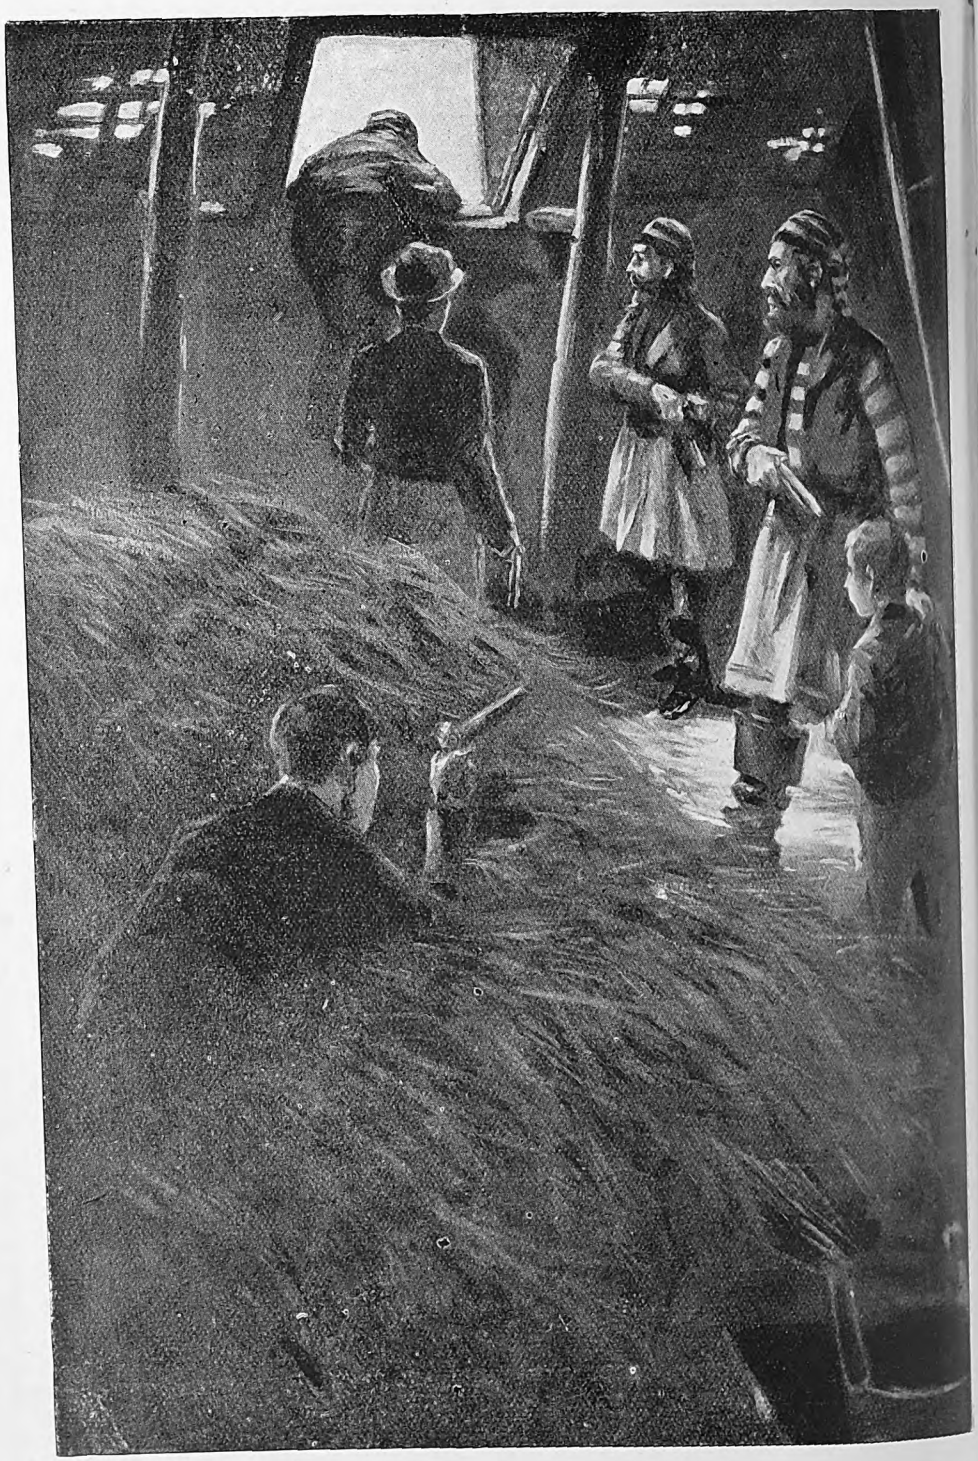
The PALMER TYRE, Ltd.,

Dept. T.M., BIRMINGHAM.

These Tyres are manufactured under license from the North British Rubber Co., Ltd., under Bartlett's Patent.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



"I TOOK DELIBERATE AIM AT THE RUFFIAN'S HEAD."

Digitized by Google

These Stories, which are from the Journal of Lieutenant Warneford, R.N., are no mere fancy pictures of the high-souled, dashing smuggler, but comprise some of the exciting adventures of a preventive officer in the wild days of the early part of the past century, when smuggling was carried on with a boldness and daring now almost incredible.

THE SMUGGLER'S HOSTAGE.

IN a sharp brush with a gang of smugglers near Netley Abbey, we succeeded in capturing two fine luggers and a valuable cargo. In the melée, however, one of my poor fellows was killed outright, and another so seriously wounded, that he subsequently sank under the operation which his injuries necessitated. Unfortunately, in the darkness and confusion, all the smugglers succeeded in making good their escape; though from the blood tracks, discovered on the beach the morning after the affray, it was plain several of the rascals had been seriously wounded from the random shots of the seamen. The most energetic measures were, it may be supposed, at once adopted to bring the guilty parties to justice.

The Government immediately offered a large reward to any one—excepting, of course, those who had actually fired the fatal shots—who would give information leading to the conviction of the offenders, and an active enquiry was at once set on foot, and vigorously carried on throughout the neighbourhood. The result was the apprehension of a number of persons to whom suspicion pointed. It was, however, very doubtful that we had secured any of the chief culprits, for there was little or no evidence that the men in prison were concerned in the affair save as temporary helpers; and it was greatly feared that the deaths of the two seamen would remain unavenged.

Once during the preliminary investigation I thought we had a chance of letting daylight in upon the confused and foggy business. I was called out of the justice-room at Hamble, where the depositions were being taken before several of the country magistrates, to see a woman who said she had an important communication to make to me in private. This woman I recognised as the wife of one of the prisoners, Richard White by name. But for one or two self-betraying words dropped in the flurry caused by his sudden apprehension, there was really nothing against him, except that he had been seen in close discourse with two of the other prisoners on the evening the unfortunate collision took place. His wife, I found, had been terribly scared by a remark of one of the magistrates, and the instant we were alone, she asked me with a hysterical whimper, if I really thought they would hang Richard.

Digitized by Google

"There cannot be two opinions about it," I promptly replied, desirous of deepening the impression made upon her. "In fact, morally speaking, I look upon him as half-hanged already!"

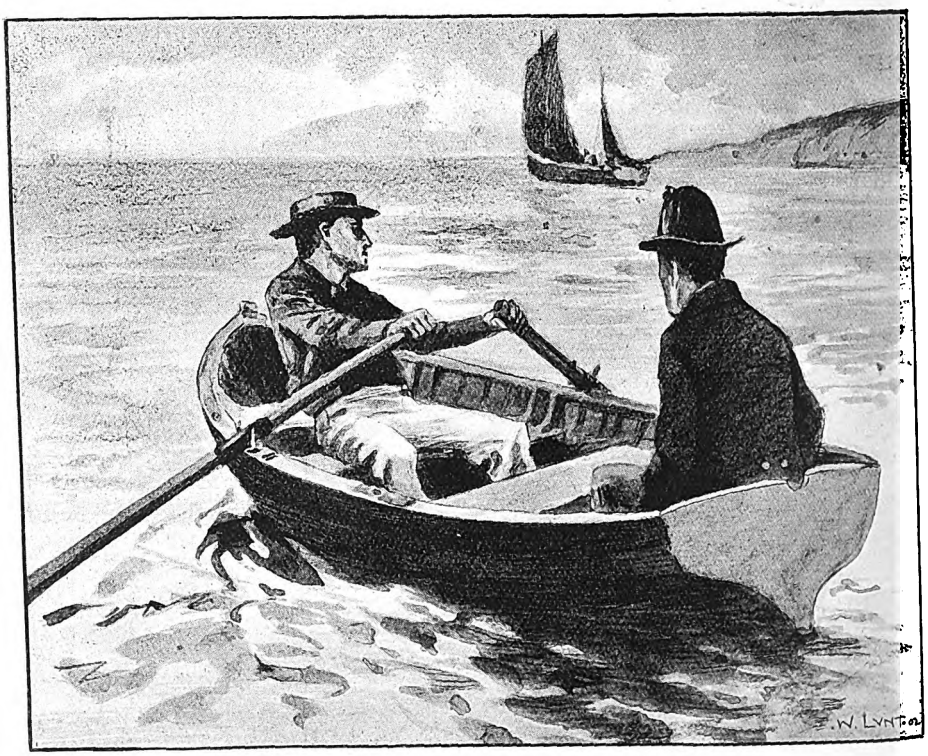
"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" sobbed the woman. "What, for mercy's sake, is to be done? Suppose," she added, hesitatingly—"suppose Richard to be willing, would he, do you think, be allowed to turn King's evidence?"

"He knows, then, who the rascals in chief are, where they are to be found, and——"

"I did not say that," she hastily interrupted. "I did not say that; I only meant supposing—suppose Richard——"

"Oh, never mind supposing! Don't think to bamboozle me with 'supposes!'" I sharply rejoined. "Persuade your husband to make a clean breast of it while there is yet time—if indeed, it be not already too late," I added, as the door of the justice-room opened, and the prisoners handcuffed and strongly guarded, came out—"for both he and his companions are, I suppose, fully committed for trial."

The wife screamed violently at the sight of her manacled husband, and endeavoured to embrace him, but was roughly pushed back by the constables. The examination



THERE COULD BE NO DOUBT ABOUT THE BUSINESS IN HAND.

I found, had been adjourned till the next day.

Mrs. White again approached me as, after a few minutes' conference with the magistrates, I was leaving the place.

"Are you sure, sir, if Richard could point out where the men who shot Batley and Norton are to be found, he would get clear?"

"There cannot be a doubt about it, and pocket the reward into the bargain."

"No—no. God forbid! We'll have no blood money!" she added, with a shuddering whisper; "not if it was the Indies of Gold! We'll sell all and leave this part of the country." Without further preface I conducted her to the solicitor for the prosecution, and it was arranged that she should have an interview wth her husband early on the following morning, previous to the final examination of the prisoners.

Digitized by Google

I was early in attendance at the temporary court-house the next day, where I found Mrs. White sitting alone in a small waiting-room, in a fevered state, yet dumb with anxiety and fear. It was already whispered that her husband was to be admitted evidence for the Crown; and when he was brought up, a yell of execration burst forth which completely unnerved him, and I greatly feared that the necessary disclosures would not be made. As he was passing the door of the waiting-room where his wife sat cowering with shame and terror, he stepped eagerly towards her, and seizing her almost fiercely by the hands, exclaimed in a shaking voice, "I cannot do it, Martha! I can't, and I wun't." The poor woman burst into tears, and with a choking voice, as she clung round his neck, urged him, though falteringly, to save his own life—hers—and that of their child. The pleadings of the wife and mother were again successful; and he was immediately conducted before the magistrates. The chairman briefly assured him that if he could be the means of bringing the men who actually slew the two seamen to justice, the King's pardon would be extended to him.

White trembled very much while thus addressed, and his changing countenance plainly showed how violent were the conflicting impulses by which he was alternately swayed and dominated. At last he spoke, but the first faint, husky words were interrupted by the vehement yet indistinct cry of a woman; and then his wife burst into the room, wildly exclaiming, "No, no, Richard—don't—not a word, for God's sake—not a word!" Before anyone could interfere, the apparently frantic woman threw her arms round her husband and whispered something, with rapid and smothered accents, into his ear—which it was immediately plain would deprive us of our witness—and flew out of the room with the same wild hurry. The suddenness of the thing took everybody completely by surprise, and excused the fault of the constables in permitting her to approach the prisoner. After the lapse of a few moments, White was again asked if he had any statement to make: "Only," he doggedly answered, "what I've said afore—that I am innocent of the sailors being shot, and mortal sorry for it too!" Nothing further could be got out of him, and finally he was committed with the other prisoners, to take their trials at the Hampshire Assize on the charge of wilful murder.

One afternoon, some weeks later, accompanied by one of the cutter's crew in a small hired boat, I had been amusing myself on the Southampton water wildfowl shooting. About half-past three it suddenly came on to snow furiously, and just to keep myself from freezing, I took an oar. We had reached off Cracknor Hard, when I caught sight of a large boat, whose character and present occupation could not be mistaken. She was about to "creep up," as it is called, a number of tubs, sank there under adverse circumstances perhaps, in order to their being fished up and secured at the first favourable opportunity. There could be no doubt with respect to the business in hand, as I could distinctly see two men, about two hundred yards apart on the shore, waving their arms to shape the boat's course to the exact spot where the tubs had been deposited.

There were but five men in the boat, all probably unarmed, whilst we had a loaded duck-gun, and a pair of double-barrelled pistols, which the frequent exigencies of the service had taught me never to be without. I accordingly determined to make one amongst them—two, rather, if the man with me, who had only about a couple of months previously entered on board the Rose, should prove worth anything, as I of course supposed he would.

Our two oars were at once unshipped; and, first ordering the man to take the gun and lie close in the bow of the boat, I seated myself at the stern, and sculled quietly stern on towards the smuggler. The atmosphere was so thick with the driving snow and fast falling darkness, that I nothing doubted of closing unobserved with the busy and pre-occupied smuggler, when that rascal Rawlings jumped suddenly to his feet, exclaiming in a loud voice, "They have mizzled, sir; let me pull," and then seizing an oar, without waiting for a reply, he made a circle with it through the air, and let it fall heavily into the rowlock. Sure enough they saw us plainly enough now, and were off in a crack, at a speed which rendered pursuit both hopeless and absurd. Rawlings, unable to face me, kept his eyes fixed in the direction of the smuggler; and upon reflection I was rather glad he did so, as my first impulsive movement, with the half-formed intention of throwing him overboard, had thereby, I thought, escaped his notice. A few moments restored my habitual self-restraint, and I said as calmly as I could, "They are off indeed, and it is quite useless striving to overtake them, so pull as quickly as you can to the near steps of Southampton quay." He did so, and I presently bethought me of discharging the gun, since there was no longer the chance of a shot either at ducks or smugglers. It happened, I could not conceive how, that the mouth of the barrel had become choked with snow, and it consequently burst, scattering the fragments in all directions. I was unhurt, but Rawlings uttered a sharp cry of pain, dropped the oars, and clapped his hands to his forehead. A jagged piece of iron had struck him there, and the wound, though I could not see it was a serious one, bled profusely. He either was, or pretended to be in great pain, and I determined on landing at the Hard, and getting the hurt looked to. A Marchwood practitioner having examined the wound and stanched the hemorrhage, pronounced the injury unimportant. This opinion the man did not coincide with. He still appeared to suffer greatly, and I agreed that he should sleep at a public-house there for that night at all events, and, if not restored, the next also. This arrangement effected, I walked to Hythe, and there took a boat for the Rose.

Digitized by Google

I had arranged to dine the next day, and spend the evening with my sister and a few friends at Pear-Tree Green. Upon my arrival I found important news awaiting me. Mrs. White had been there in a state of great agitation, to request that I would cross over to Hythe as soon as it was dusk, where, on landing, I should be met by a girl in a red shawl, who would conduct me to her. It was necessary, she left word, that I should be alone, and not in uniform, but well armed; and that it would be advisable a strong party of the cutter's men should be ordered to lie within hail off the Hythe landing-place. Fortunately, the boat which had brought me to Itchen had not yet proceeded on its return, and I immediately sent for the coxwain, Tom Sawley, a man in whom I had entire confidence, and gave him directions in accordance with Mrs. White's suggestions. I then swallowed a hasty dinner, changed my dress, crossed over the ferry, and it being quite dark when I reached Southampton Quay, at once embarked in a wherry for Hythe. A girl, in a red shawl was, I found, waiting on the Hard, and the instant I had landed, she walked smartly away. I followed, and she led on in the direction of Fawley. We had left the village about half-a-mile behind us, when the girl gradually checked her rapid pace, till I had come up within speaking distance. She then, still continuing her walk, and without looking round, said: "That whitewashed cottage yonder on the right, Captain Warneford, is the place where Mrs. White expects you. Take no notice of me, and walk in without knocking. There may be people watching us now." I walked on as the girl directed, lifted the latch, and there, sure enough, stood Mrs. White alone, as pale as a spectre, and shaking with nervous agitation.

"Now, then, Mrs. White," I said, after a brief recognition, "bear a hand, if you please, with whatever communication you intend to favour me with. I trust also," I added, "that you will keep this time a steady, straightforward course. You know what I mean."

"I do; and presently I will tell you why I acted so strangely. I have now to inform you that the men who are believed to have killed Batley and Norton are within two miles of this spot. They are four—though one, Tom Etheridge, need care little now for earthly kings or justices. He is dying, if not already dead. They were all wounded by pistol-shots. Three have been for some time recovered, and to-morrow night they quit the Forest, I think, for the Welsh coast, if you permit them to do so."

"If it depend on me, my good woman,

Digitized by Google

you may be sure that Winchester, not Wales, will be their destination."

"One of the cutter's men, Sam Rawlings, is a confederate of the smugglers."

"By Jupiter, I have thought so!" I interrupted. "The impudent rascal! But never mind, go ahead."

"The boat which he risked a good deal yesterday, he says, to prevent falling into your hands, is that in which they propose to take their departure, Rawlings with them, who is determined not to trust himself again on the deck of the Rose."

"He is right; but go on—who are the others?"

"The chief of them is Daniel Squibb; you must have heard of him."

"Frequently, and always as a hardened, reckless ruffian with whom the trade of smuggling is but an occasional, and compared with others he indulges in, a respectable occupation."

"SAVE ME, LIEUTENANT WARNEFORD," CRIED THE FRANTIC WOMAN, AS SHE FELL ON HER KNEES AND TRIED TO GRASP MINE.

Digitized by Google

"That," said the woman, in a low voice and with a perceptible shudder, "is, I believe, quite true. The others, besides Etheridge, are Harry Withers and William Stokes. You must also know them by name at least."

"I do. And now what is to hinder us from summoning the men, who no doubt by this time are off the Hard, and securing the fellows—but two miles distant you say—at once?"

"That cannot be," promptly rejoined the woman, in a peremptory tone. "That cannot be, Lieutenant Warneford. You must meet these desperate men alone!"

"Alone! You must have lost your senses to propose such a thing!"

"It would be no wonder if I had," she replied; "and I have no doubt that I shall do so if you fail me. I cannot think you will; you are known to be a daring man, and in a close hand-to-hand struggle must, I should think, from sheer personal strength, as well as frequent practice, be more than a match for any ruffian, however powerful. I will explain," continued the agitated woman, "as briefly as I can. You must recollect my little boy—you have frequently seen him at Miss Warneford's?"

"Ay, a little rosy-cheeked fellow, four or five years of age."

"Yes!" ejaculated the mother with a spasmodic cry of grief, "He, the light, and joy, and hope of my life, has been taken from me—"

"Dead!"

"No, no; but worse—far worse I fear. You remember the morning my husband was to have told the magistrates where the men whose names I have mentioned might be found?"

"To be sure I do, and the fool's trick you caused him to play us and himself."

"It was no fault of mine. The rumour that Richard intended to turn King's evidence was—how, I know not—in everybody's mouth hours before he had promised me to do so. A minute after my husband entered the justice-room with you, a man came to me and whispered that my child had been secured as a hostage, and was at that moment in Squibb's power, who had sworn to kill him should the hiding-place of the ruffians be discovered through my husband's or any other person's information. The villain would, I know, keep his dreadful word were he certain of being hacked in pieces the next moment for doing so. I hastened home in a state almost of frenzy to find the terrible statement true. The child had been wiled away, and he is still in Daniel Squibb's power; and should they be attacked, the first victim would, I well know, be my child. I have since ministered to their necessities like a slave, in the hope that when they left the place my boy would be restored. Yesterday I was told by Squibb himself that he should, for fear of accidents, take the child away with them; and if he does," exclaimed the unfortunate creature with a wild bitterness of grief, "I shall never see him more—never, except perhaps at the hulks, or the gallows, for which he would be fitly trained. Save me, Lieutenant Warneford," cried the frantic woman, as she fell on her knees and strove to grasp mine—"save me from that living death, and my boy from the horrible fate which must else overtake him."

This was certainly a delightful predicament to find one's self suddenly placed in, and I must say that I was as much puzzled and confounded, as excited and distressed. Still, the woman's agony affected me, and I said, as I raised her up: "If you can show me, Mrs. White, that there is a fair chance of success, I will see what can be done. What is it you propose?"

"This!" she answered with great readiness. "The girl you saw will go for the men. The instant they arrive, you, I, and they will set out together. The sailors must stop at a spot within about three-quarters of a mile of Squibb's and his companions' hiding-place. You and I will go on. I shall enter the place with a message from Rawlings, whom I saw about three hours ago. They are without any lights at nights; and I can secretly introduce you into the building, and place you in concealment close to Squibb and the child. I will return for the men. We will approach as silently and as swiftly as possible, and when near, you will hear this." She whistled a bar of a popular tune. "It is their private signal-whistle, and will not alarm them. When the rush takes place, Squibb will endeavour to seize and slay the child; but a brave and powerful man like you will surely be able to shield the boy, even against all three of the ruffians, during the very short time that will elapse before they are completely overpowered."

Digitized by Google

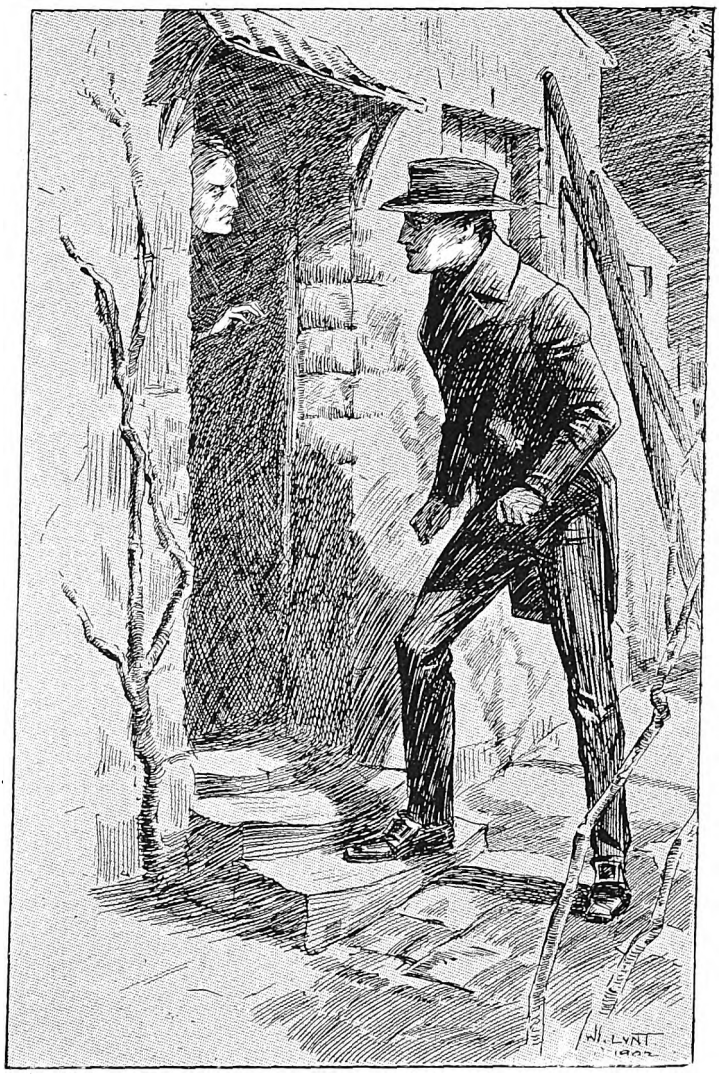
"Upon my word, Mrs. White," I said, "you have sketched out a very pretty play, which I have no doubt would go off to the entire satisfaction of everybody except the person you propose honouring with the principal part. Why not let the seamen approach in the first instance, within call of the fellows' hiding-hole? That would greatly diminish the risk,"

"That would never do," she said; "they would certainly be discovered, and the child would be at once massacred out of revenge." In short, she had such a multiplicity of replies to all I could urge against the scheme, and was so vehement in her entreaties, that I at last agreed to try the venture.



AT LAST THE DOOR OPENED, AND MRS. WHITE APPEARED, PALE AND TREMBLING.

"You give me your word of honour as a gentleman," said Mrs. White, "that, after I have shown you where to find Squibb and his comrades, you will not attack them in any other mode than that upon which we have agreed?" I gave the required pledge; the girl in the red shawl, furnished with the necessary credentials, started off to summon the men; and the instant they arrived we made silently, in a zig-zag direction, towards Fawley, keeping ourselves as much as possible within the shade of the Forest trees. After about twenty minutes' march the men were halted, and Mrs. White and I proceeded alone.

She stopped as we were about to emerge into a more open part of the Forest. "Look there!" she whispered: "you see the farm-building in the direction of the light beyond?" I nodded assent. "It is there the men you seek are sheltered. Now," she continued, "attend carefully to what I say. There is a man always looking out from the upper loft. You see the hedge on the right; crawl along the further side of it, and make for the gable-end of the building. There is a small door there which I will gently open. A few feet within there is a ladder leading to the place where the men lie, but you will be concealed from them by a number of trusses of hay and straw; the seamen must rush in at the large gate of which I have got a duplicate key."

Digitized by Google

Having thus spoken, Mrs. White moved swiftly off, leaving me, I must confess, in no very enviable state of mind. Her scheme, ugly enough at first view, did anything but improve upon more intimate acquaintance, and I had half a mind not to proceed further with it. There were, it seemed, four sturdy ruffians, including the look-out—now for the first time heard of—to contend with; and should I be discovered before the arrival of the seamen, the result could scarcely be problematical. Nevertheless, sustained by the professional contempt of danger in which I had been reared, the knowledge that I possessed skill with the pistol, and the recollection of many, perhaps greater, perils successfully overcome, I ventured on, and in about ten minutes found myself close by the door at the gable end. So far all was well. I could hear a confused murmur of voices within, but nothing distinctly. At last the door gently opened, and Mrs. White appeared at the aperture. She was, I saw, ghastly pale, and trembling with terror now the moment of trial had come, bravely as she before talked of the business. Her finger was on her lip, and she motioned me to go in. I did so as softly as if I had been treading on eggs. The door closed behind me, and it was black as the inside of a tar-barrel.

In a few moments my eyes became accustomed to the darkness, and perceiving the ladder—a weak, slight affair—I placed my right foot softly upon one of the lower rungs, which the instant my weight was fairly upon it, snapped short in the middle with a loud crack. "What's that?" cried one of the fellows in a fierce voice, apparently a few inches only overhead. "It's me," promptly replied Mrs. White, who was standing just without the door, listening in terrified silence. "Do you want me?" "Not I," returned the surly savage, "only mind you don't forget—for I don't like your looks, as I told you—that upon the first alarm I'll blow this young un's head off as sure as my name is Daniel Squibb. I say," he again called out after a few moments' silence, "what time did you say Sam Rawlings would be here?"

"About ten o'clock, he said," answered Mrs. White. A grunt of satisfaction was the only reply. The door again closed, and I, with better fortune than before, noiselessly ascended the crazy ladder. A small corner of the floor, I found on reaching it, was partitioned off from the rest, as Mrs. White had stated, by trusses of hay and straw, behind which I crawled, and after a while contrived to get a view of the amiable party to whom I found myself in such dangerous proximity. The moon shone brilliantly in upon them, and I could see their features distinctly. They were all dressed and armed with pistols stuck in their waistbelts. The great brawny figure of Daniel Squibb was stretched upon a heap of straw, covered by some dirty blanketing, and by his side lay a young child—fast asleep, I thought, judging by the natural ease and grace of his reclining posture. Two others, Stokes and Withers, were sitting half up in similar beds, and farther on lay a fourth. It required but one look at the white, rigid, pinched features, and open blindly-staring eyes, to recognise it as the recently-deceased, untended corpse of Etheridge, whom I had often seen. Excepting frequent pulls at the black bottles, one of which stood by the side of each of the living men, there was nothing done or said for some time. At last, Squibb, happening to look in the direction of the dead body, said with a half-shudder: "Throw a blanket over the face, Harry; it ain't pleasant to look upon 'specially just now."

"It's a good thing, though," resumed Squibb, after another suck at the brandy bottle—"it's a good thing he's gone. We can be off now without any fear of leaving him to peach upon us. But for that we might have mizzled two or three weeks ago."

"Ah, matey," replied Withers, "that's true, but I misdoubt Mother White."

"So do I; but this young fellow here will keep her within bounds. She don't seem to have any notion that we are off to-night."

"I don't think," said Withers; and the trio relapsed into silence, broken only by the glug-glug of the liquor they swallowed, as it glided out of the necks of the bottles down their seasoned throats.

Mrs. White expected to return with the men in about half-an hour; but that time had long past, and still they came not. I was becoming feverishly impatient, when the signal-whistle was heard, instantly replied to by the look-out in the loft above.

Digitized by Google

"Who can this be," said Squibb. "It's not time for Rawlings, yet, according to Mrs. White."

The three fellows rose and listened anxiously, and I observed Squibb take a pistol from his belt and cock it.

The look-out man now made his appearance. "It's only Rawlings," he said.

"All right!" echoed Squibb, evidently greatly relieved, and returning the pistol to its place.

Presently I heard footsteps approaching, by the way I had entered. The only thing now to be done was to sell my life as dearly as I could, and I collected myself in the dark corner for that purpose. The newcomer stepped briskly up, and without pausing to look round, made his way over the hay and straw to his friends.

"You are early, Sam," remarked Squibb. "White's wife said you would not be here till ten o'clock."

"I wasn't going to tell her exactly when I was coming or we were going."

"All right!" interjected Squibb with an approving nod.

"Dick Hessel's boat will be off Luttrell's Folly at twelve o'clock to-night precisely," added Mr. Rawlings.

"That's capital, Sam!" replied the chief of the gang. "And you I suppose mean to shove off with us?"

"That I do indeed. The skipper smells a rat and I shall be brought up with a round turn when least expected or desired if I don't make myself scarce, now I have an opportunity."

"I should like to catch that Mr. Warneford," said Squibb, with a bitter, rasping

DANIEL SQUIBB.

Digitized by Google

venomous accent, and his blood-shot eyes, inflamed with drink, sparkled with deadly ferocity—"I should like to catch that fellow within a couple or so of yards of this little barker"—and he again drew forth and flourished a long pistol—"some fine night with nobody but ourselves within sight or hearing, and if I didn't drill a neat hole through his canister, it would be a pity, that's all!" The other fellows savagely coincided in Squibb's pleasant aspiration.

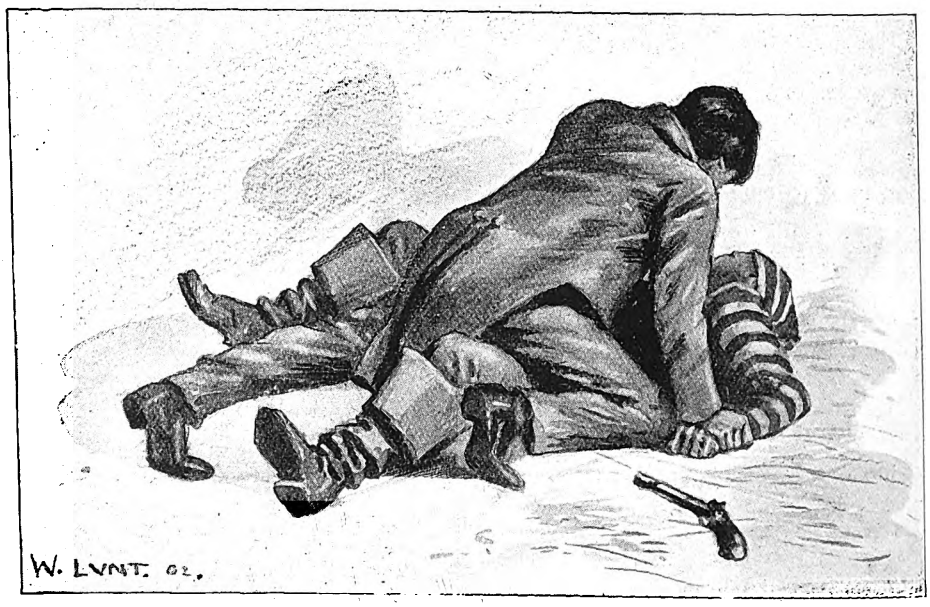
"It was a bold stroke, entering on board the Rose," continued Rawlings; "but it's getting much too risky now, as that—Hullo! who's that, I wonder?"

It was a repetition of the signal-whistle, and, judging by the tremulous weakness with which it was given, I guessed by whom. The five fellows—for the look-out had not returned to his perch—became rigid and breathless with eager attention. The whistling was repeated. "That's Martha White," said Squibb: "what mischief can bring her here again?" He then grasped the little boy, who had been for some time awake, with fierce violence by the hair. "Dare to whimper," he said in low, deadly tones, "or breathe louder than usual—only dare!"

"Lend me a back," said one of the fellows, "that I may look out at the window."

"Hark," cried Squibb. "There is someone unlocking the front gate. Who should that be? Look over the stairs, Stokes!—quick! quick! By all the devils, if it be, as I suspect, I will blow this imp's brains out whatever be the consequences—quick!" and the ruthless savage held the muzzle of the pistol within six inches of the head of the boy, who seemed dumb with terror.

I hesitated a moment how to act. To show myself, and rush upon the scoundrel, would in all probability precipitate the child's fate, Squibb now being at a distance of four or five yards from me. Adopting another expedient, in full reliance upon my oft-tried skill and coolness, I took deliberate aim at the ruffian's head, steadying my arm upon a hay-truss, and waiting only to be sure as to who the newcomers were.



DRINK ENFEEBLED, I PINNED HIM TO THE FLOOR.

"Who is it?" again fiercely demanded Squibb, "Speak, will you?"

"Betrayed!" shouted Stokes. "The Rose men are upon us!"

As the last syllable left the man's lips I fired. The report was followed by a frightful yell from Squibb. The bullet had struck his right jaw and broken it. He whirled round with the sudden agony, and the pistol in his hand dropped harmlessly on the floor. The next moment all was uproar, confusion, and dismay—the loud shouts of the sailors, the frenzied screams of the woman, and the maledictions of the smugglers, who, after a vain show of resistance, essayed to escape by the way I had entered, mingling in deafening uproar and confusion. They were all secured except Rawlings, who contrived to escape; and very lucky for him that he did so, or unquestionably the reward for his share in the business would have been an hour's dangle at the yard-arm. The instant I showed myself, Squibb, though frightfully mangled, and for some moments stunned with pain, snatched another pistol from his belt, covered me, fired and missed. I immediately grappled with him. He was a burly, powerfully-framed man, but he was so enfeebled by drink, his recent illness, and present wound, that I pinned him to the floor almost without an effort; and as soon as the bustle was over he was properly secured, and carried off, foaming and blaspheming with rage. Mrs. White hugged her child, so fortunately rescued, with convulsive passion, while incoherently pouring forth joy and thanksgiving to Heaven and blessings on me.

Digitized by Google

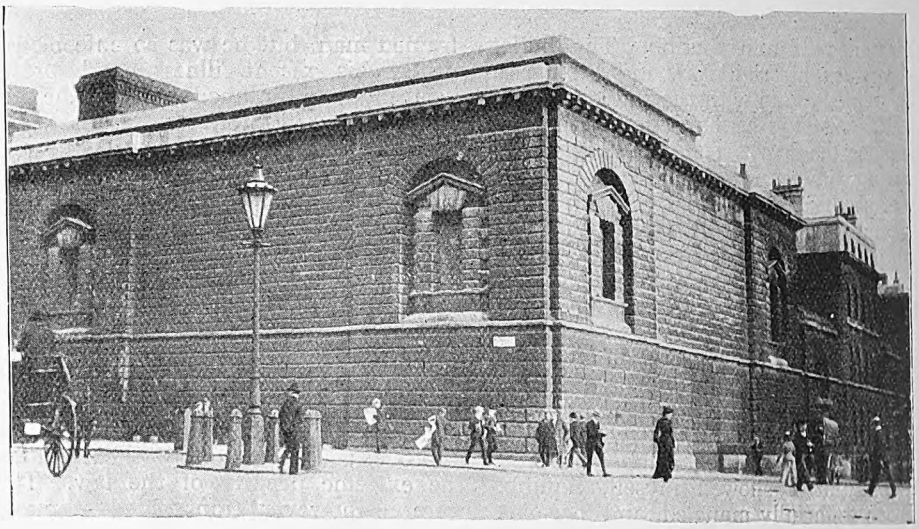
* * * * * *

In due course the prisoners were tried and found guilty of the capital charge, Richard White being admitted as an approver; but neither of them suffered the extreme penalty of the law. They were all, however, transported—three for life, and the others for varying terms. White and his family removed, I believe, to London. They never claimed the reward.

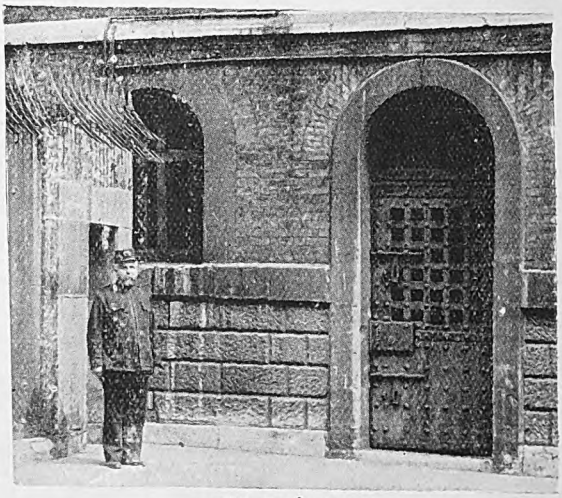
Digitized by Google



A GENERAL VIEW OF THE EXTERIOR OF NEWGATE.

THE END OF NEWGATE.

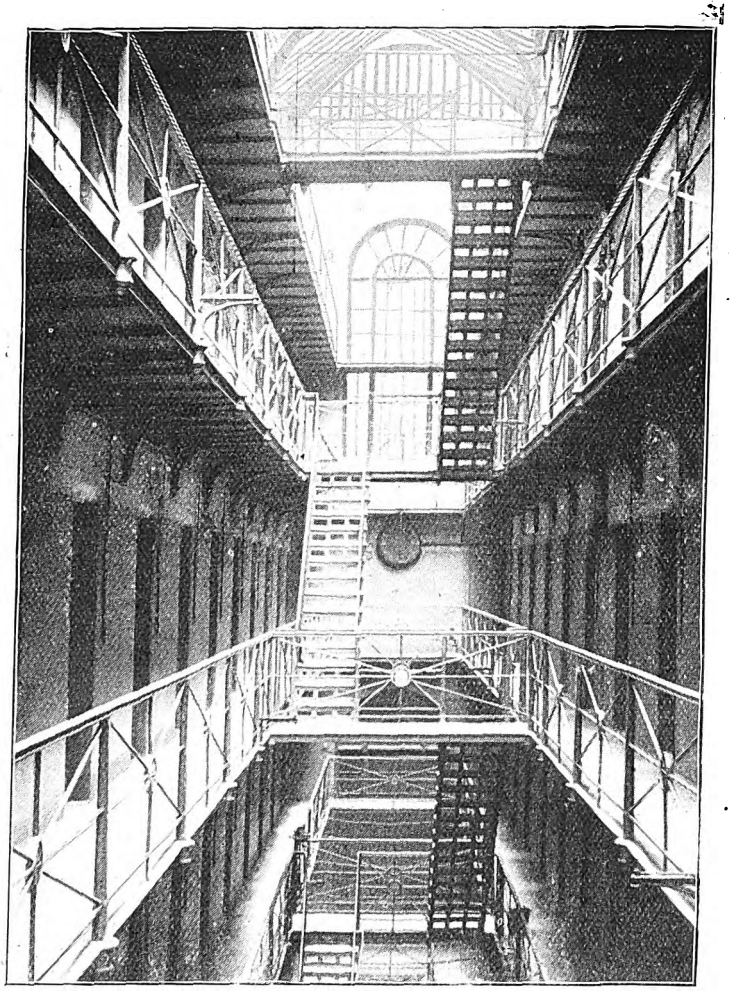
THE disappearance of Newgate as a prison is the removal of another landmark of the past. London is seeing many such changes lately. The site on which Newgate stands has a ways been used for a prison from very early times, but the building itself has seen many changes. It was last rebuilt in 1780, after it had been burnt and considerably damaged by the Gordon rioters. Since then only its interior and its administration have undergone any alteration. It has moved with the times, and life in Newgate at the beginning of the last century was considerably different from what it was at its close. A prisoner who liked dirt, insanitary surroundings, a free and easy time, plenty of associates and very little surveillance, would have found the Newgate of 1800 to his taste. There was no attempt at classification then. Young and old, tried and untried, criminals and debtors were all locked up together to amuse themselves as they pleased. Until nearly 1818 they cooked their own food. Solitary confinement appears to have been optional, but at times



MRS. FRY'S DOOR.
It was here that she lived for a considerable time whilst she was engaged in trying to elevate the women prisoners.

Digitized by Google

the prison was terribly overcrowded. In 1808, when there were from 100 to 130 women prisoners, the breadth allowed to each in the sleeping room, was only 18 inches. The female prisoners, as is always the case, were a more demoralized set than the men. Their ward was one continual scene of uproar and confusion. Mrs. Fry, who commenced her efforts to improve them about the year 1817, said that the women's chief occupations were swearing, gaming, fighting, singing, dancing, drinking, and dressing in men's clothes. Some were destitute of clothes and unfit to be seen. To escape from prison appears then to have been an easier matter than now, due probably to a more lax system of surveillance, and drunken keepers, who were, perhaps, often open to bribery. The most notable escape from Newgate was that of the notorious Jack Sheppard, in 1724. His first escape was comparatively easy. He and a man called "Blueskin," were found guilty of stealing cloth and condemned to be hung. Sheppard was small and slim, and after breaking a spike out of the hatch, it was an easy matter, with the assistance of two women visitors, to squeeze himself through. He was soon re-taken, but it was thought a lot of, and people of all ranks went there to see and admire him. This time he was handcuffed and loaded with irons, and chained to a staple in the floor. He found it was possible to work his hands out of the handcuffs, and with a nail he loosened the staple from the floor. Then he tied his fetters up as high as he could with his garters, and after working a bar out of the chimney, got out on to the roof. From here he got down into an unused room, forced the lock off the door, and found himself in the passage leading to the chapel. To draw the bolt of this door he had to make a hole in the wall. Three other doors had to be forced and then he found himself on the leads. Having no means of getting down, there was nothing for it but to return to his cell and tear up his blanket into strips for a rope. It was a quiet afternoon, when the keepers were altogether somewhere in a drunken doze, and he did it successfully. He lowered himself on to the roof of an adjoining house and stole down the stairs unobserved. He hid in the vicinity, and



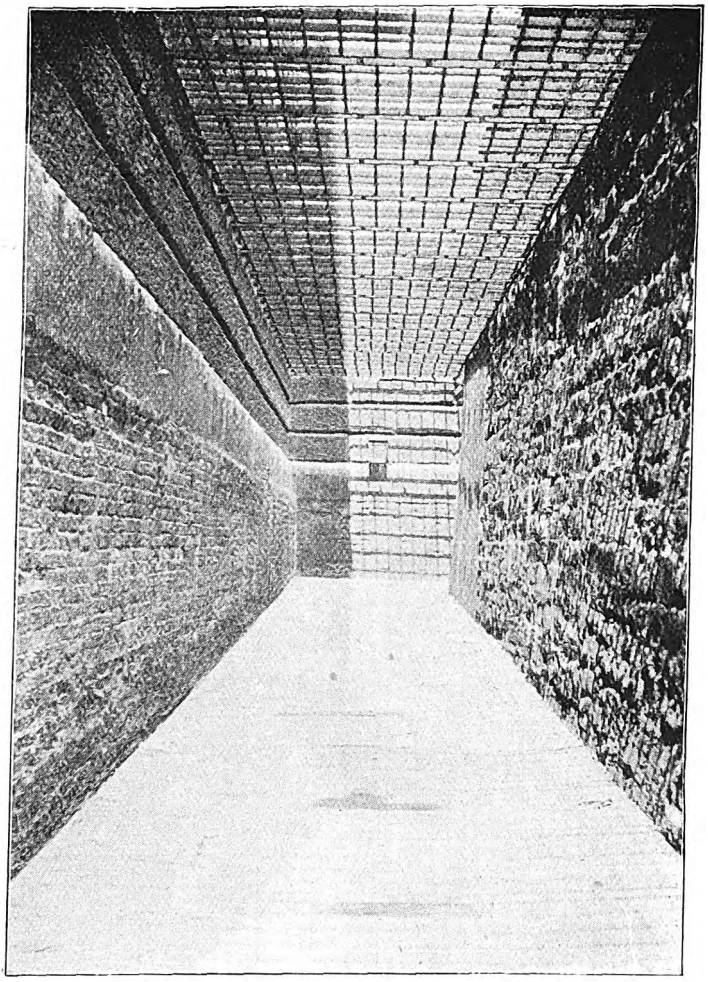
A GENERAL VIEW OF THE CELL ARRANGEMENT.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

After the execution the hangman sold the rope at a shilling an inch.

The outer street is perhaps more interesting to an imaginative mind than the interior of the gaol, for here it was, in the open space of the Old Bailey, that from 1783 to 1868 public executions took place. Here it was that crowds no less savage than the prisoners themselves, assembled to witness the executions, and so great was the crush that on some occasions a few of the onlookers perished from suffocation, and there were always a considerable number injured. On one memorable occasion, indeed, no less than 28 were killed, and nearly 70 injured. Several women were trampled to death before the prisoners appeared. This was in 1807, and though the people became less rough as the century advanced, for we cannot imagine such a thing happening now in a London crowd, still the interest in such sights seemed, if anything, to become more morbid and intense, right up till 1868, at which date public executions were abolished. No doubt the reason for this partly was that it was not so common an occurrence. The offences for which the death penalty was inflicted had been gradually reduced to murder, only, and people who would lightly commit murder were not so plentiful as in more barbarous times. During the 38 years of Henry the Eighth's reign, as many as 72,000 were said to have been executed in England.



THE PRISON BURIAL GROUND.

It is merely a passage, paved with ordinary flagstones and covered overhead with iron grating. Beneath the stones many notorious murderers lie buried, with no indication except their initials roughly cut in the wall above the spot.

At an execution in 1864, people were as ready to pay high prices for seats and windows as they are now to pay for Coronation seats. Even the roofs were crowded, and the lamp-posts. People began to assemble the evening before, and they slept in the streets. Those who kept awake spent the night in gambling and drinking.

Prisoners were occasionally hung at the scene of their crime. Sometimes their bodies were burnt after the hanging. This latter practice ceased in 1786. The last to suffer it was a woman. She was hung from a low scaffold and as soon as life was extinct, faggots were piled around and completely over her head, and, lighted in this way, her body was consumed.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Hazel, the heroine of this story, is an English girl, who having married Mahomed Ali, a Mahomedan student, while he was in England, insists upon going out to join him, in utter ignorance of what it means to be incarcerated in the seclusion of the Zenana. When she finds it out, she is dominated with one idea—that of escape, and at the end of Chapter II. she has climbed into a tree to reconnoitre the surroundings outside the walls, but is surprised by her husband. After this, although he apparently takes no notice, he pretends to depart on urgent and mysterious journeys, during which time Hazel grows more familiar with the true inwardness of Zenana life, and is more disgusted with it. One of the slave girls, Taj Bee, won by Hazel's kindness, promises to assist her to escape, and her determination to do so is increased by hearing that her father-in-law wishes her husband to bring home Aziz Unissa, the daughter of Sultan Mirza Khan, to be his second wife. While she is musing, devoured with indignation, Taj Bee comes to her and whispers, "I have found a way of escape!" The plan when unfolded by the girl turns out to be a suggestion that as lady visitors come to see the Begum they are in the habit of bringing many strange servants with them, who, when they go away, are preceded by one crying "Gosha! Gosha!" and therefore it will be easy for Hazel, by dressing in servant's garb, provided by the girl, to mix in the servants' waiting-room and leave with them. This they try, but the slave girl herself is hindered and captured, and Hazel, who might have got away, returns for the girl's sake. Afterwards Hazel has impotently to witness the slave girl's terrible punishment of being blinded by Eastern tortures. Hazel is not discouraged in her determination to escape, but decides next time she attempts it to venture alone. Meanwhile she asserts herself in the Zenana, and finds her quick wit and ready sympathies easily win her a first place, both with the Nabob and the Begum. At last, overcome by the persistency of his father, Mahomed Ali takes a second wife, in spite of Hazel's strenuous objections, with the result that Hazel separates herself from him, and he submits. But meanwhile the new wife tries to ingratiate herself with Hazel, and after many attempts succeeds in meeting her in the garden, when there is an exciting scene. Soon after Mahomed Ali has an awful accident, that breaks his back, and Hazel, forgetting herself, endeavours to soothe his dying hours, but is thwarted by the rigid etiquette of the Zenana. Before Hazel's husband dies, he discloses to her a method of escape from the zenana by means of a secret subterranean passage leading from the garden to the banks of the River Coombe. One day, shortly afterwards, Hazel hints at going away, but immediately regrets her impulsive remark. Aziz Unissa is anxious to share Hazel's zenana, now their husband is dead, but the latter refuses, fearing she would interfere with her plans of escape. During the ensuing weeks Hazel undergoes some anxious times, having striven to communicate through her library books, and remarks on the fly leaf, with the outer world. At last it is noticed by an outsider, who chivalrously answers through his sister that he will help her, and plans a way of escape. He appears in the Zenana grounds, and turns out to be a military man, who had accompanied her on the voyage out.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XI.—(continued.)

"I know you are very brave," she said, "but I heard a horrid story once about that place, and I am afraid." Then, to gain time, perhaps, she told him about the slave Bibi.

She felt his hand tighten on hers. "Do not scream or move, Hazel," he whispered, interrupting her, "but there is someone in the garden."

Her hand grew cold and twitched in his, but she made no sound. Straight before them, a tall figure moved along by the wall in the moonlight, to the little door under the terrace; the door seemed to fall open before it, and the figure melted into the darkness beyond.

"Don't be frightened, dearest," he whispered, "I will take care of you. But what on earth is the meaning of that figure?"

"It is the Nabob," she whispered.

"Well, he couldn't possibly see us here in the shadows, even if he had looked this way. How, in the name of all that is mysterious, did he get in here?"

"There is a door from the house, in the wall there, to the left. I suppose he has a key, but I have never seen him here before. O, Reginald! Why? Why has he gone into that dreadful place? Do you think they can have missed me, and he has gone there to look for me?"

"But you locked the door of your own

"DON'T TREMBLE SO," HE SAID.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"TAKE HEART, DEAR CHILD, IT IS ONLY A FEW HOURS."

this house of bondage. It will be dark in the passage, you know. What are we to do for lights? Shall I go up again and get candles from my room? I did not think of them when we came down. You see I did not really expect you quite so soon; you took me by surprise."

"I have a light," he answered, "it sounds rather melodramatic, I am afraid, but the fact is, I have a dark lantern. As you told us we should have to go through an underground passage, I thought I had better come prepared."

"You have thought of everything," she answered him with grateful admiration. "Whether we get away in safety to-night or not, as long as I live I shall thank and bless you for coming to my help. Now, Reginald, let us go.'

Hand in hand, they glided noiselessly by the edge of the shadows until, near the wall of the terrace, they had to come out into the moonlight. Reginald pushed the little low door heavily, and it swung noiselessly inwards. He drew her in quickly and closed the door. Then he took out his lantern and turned the light upon the little room.

They stood upon a wide ledge, from which a flight of eight or ten broken, ruinous steps, led down into the room itself. The room was windowless, low-roofed, and very mouldy with damp and disuse. The four white-washed stone walls rose blank before them, streaked with green and hung thickly with cobwebs.

"I see no other opening," he said doubtfully, looking round the walls.

"Let us go down the steps, at any rate," she said. Her courage had come back. She saw no rats, and the room looked just like any ordinary go-down for storing wood.

They went down into the room, and there, beside the steps, in the wall that supported the ledge, they saw the door.

"I knew there must be an opening," she said, "Ali was so certain about the passage."

This second door opened easily enough, and they found themselves in the old subterranean passage, dug out of the earth, how many centuries ago! For which purpose no man now remembered.

Digitized by Google

"I have always heard there were underground passages on this side of the river, going down to the Coombe," he said, looking about him with interest. The passage was wide enough for two to walk abreast, and high enough for a tall man to stand without stooping. The floor was very rough and uneven, and here and there earth and stones had fallen from the sides, and the vaulted roof; loosened by long action of the damp in successive raining seasons. The passage sloped downwards for some distance, and then became level; it wound and turned in many angled tortuous windings, but there were no branching ways to confuse them. Hand in hand they followed its windings, helping each other over the rough places. It was long, but it did not seem long to these fugitives.

"I think we must be getting near the end," he said, and he began to walk more slowly, as one who lingers in a pleasant glade, and is loth to leave it.

They turned a corner, and stood still, paralysed.

"Trapped!" said Reginald, and he swore under his breath.

"Oh, what is it?" whispered Hazel.

In front of them a mound of earth and stones, and formless debris completely blocked the way, filling it from side to side, from roof to floor.

"The passage has fallen in," he said.

"I am sure Ali did not know of this," she said impulsively, jealous for the dead man's honour.

"Most likely not, poor chap," he said, "I daresay it has happened quite recently; that was why the Nabob came back in such a hurry, I wish he had warned us. I am afraid we shall have to go back ourselves."

"Go back!" she repeated, her great eyes dilated with fear, and her cheek paled.

"Wait here a moment while I have a look closer," he said, "but I am afraid we shall never be able to get through this."

He went forward, closing the lantern, so that any ray of moonlight might show through, if there was any opening to the upper air; but the black darkness revealed no ray of light.

Hazel leaned against the wall in a blackness of mind that was as black as the darkness before her eyes.

He turned on the light of the lantern and came back: "We must get back as quickly as we can," he said, "Don't give in, Hazel. I will take you out some other way." The added difficulties seemed to brace his spirit. He looked very alert and wide-awake as he came striding back to her. "We have no time to lose now," he said, "give me your hand, and see how fast we can run over the ground." They had loitered along so pleasantly in their coming, sure of the opening at the other end, into light and freedom.

Back along the passage they went in breathless haste. It was well that Hazel had thought to fasten her slippers firmly on her slender feet before they started.

At the entrance door they met with another check. Hazel pushed it, but it did not move.

"He has locked it on the outside," she moaned, and let herself fall despairingly in a heap upon the floor.

"Nonsense!" the Captain exclaimed, brightly, "the door opens inwards you know, and there is no handle on this side."

But the young soldier was a man of resource. He took out his pocket-knife, and opened the corkscrew that lurked in the handle. Very quickly and deftly he screwed it into the wood of the door, and when it was fast, drew the door gently towards him without opposition.

When they stepped out into the garden, the moonlight had faded. All the world was grey with the dim promise of the dawn.

"We shall have to go by way of the roof," he said, "I wish we had done that at once. If only it is not too late now!"

They ran swiftly up the stairs to the terrace, where the Captain's rope still hung, the mute witness they had left to tell of Hazel's escape.

"Thank goodness, no one has seen this," he said, "I will go up first. You must put your foot in this loop, and hold on to this knot with your hands, and I will pull you up. You will not be afraid, dear?"

"Oh, no! no! Make haste before any one is stirring," she answered.

He climbed up the few feet to the roof, and drew her very carefully after him. They ran noiselessly across the flat terrace to the front, and there, crouching behind the balustrade, looked through its tiny columns.

"I see no one there," he said, "I think we may venture. Come along, Hazel, we must run down the stairs, and out at the gate. Keep close to me."

Digitized by Google

"No! no! Look again," she said, holding him down. "He is there talking to the gardener. See! there at those bushes by the gate. O, Reginald, what shall we do! What shall we do!"

"We shall have to wait, I suppose. It is too late now. I daresay I could slip past, but they might collar you, and, at any rate, we don't want a shindy. Come back to the other side, and I will tell you. You must go back to your rooms. I am very sorry for it, but it really can't be helped. In the afternoon, when it gets hot, the old boy will be sleeping like a top; I know he was when I came up yesterday. Then you must come up here again, and I will take you down by the way I came myself. Take heart, dear child, it is only for a few hours, and you will know that I am up here waiting too."

"You will die up here in the heat all day without shelter," she said, "oh, go away, and leave me to my fate! I bring misfortune on every one who tries to help me."

"Listen! As soon as your women are asleep down there, and you are alone, come out and stand on the terrace. I shall see you, and I will let you down the cord."

He let her down on to the terrace, and she went back into her rooms. Oh! would she never, never be free of it! Must she live and die in this hopeless captivity?

SHE SAT WATCHING IN THE VERANDA.

CHAPTER XII. AND LAST.

In the bungalow down by the beach, as the night drew on, Eva Dunstan also waited; at first with an amused expectancy, picturing to herself the fugitives making their way through the secret passage. As the night wore on, the amusement changed into perplexity, and then into anxiety. "I suppose they go to bed very late in those native houses," she thought, "How dreadfully tired poor Redge will be of sitting all day on that hot roof, without anything to eat." She strolled down to the gate to look along the road, and see if she could make out any figures in the moonlight. But still they did not come; she went to bed at last and spent the night in unspeakable anxiety and fear.

Digitized by Google

As soon as it was light, in the morning, she took the pony cart and drove along the road that Hazel had watched so often from her terrace. As she went slowly past, a white fluttering on the terrace and another on the roof, for one moment answered her signal.

"That poor boy is up there still," she said, "he must be half dead. I wonder what on earth can have stopped them; it seems so ridiculous for two people not to be able to walk out of an ordinary house like that when they choose. If they do not come to-night I shall certainly tell George, and make him go to the house." For the present her mind was set at rest. They must both be free, and so far undiscovered, since both had answered her signal.

After tiffin she sat idly in the verandah, counting the hours till it would be possible to begin expecting them again, when she saw a carriage turn in at the gate.

"Stupid people coming to call at this hour," she said crossly, and withdrew precipitately into the drawing-room, out of sight. "Say I am not at home," she whispered to the servant as he went through to the verandah to receive the visitors.

The next moment there were hurried footsteps across the verandah, and Reginald walked into the drawing-room.

"Here we are, Eva," he said.

Behind him in the doorway stood a tall and graceful figure, with floating white, violet-embroidered draperies and golden head uncovered.

Looking in her lovely face, and remembering how much she had suffered, Eva took the stranger in her arms impulsively, and kissed her.

"Dear Hazel! How glad I am!"

"How can I ever thank you—you and him," murmured Hazel.

"Give us something to drink, Eva, for goodness sake," said he prosaically. "We have been two mortal hours on that blessed roof, waiting for the coast to clear."

"He has been much—much more than two hours," said Hazel. "I wonder he did not die up there, in the sun."

"Now tell me all about it," Eva said, as soon as they were all seated comfortably upstairs in the morning room, where no intruders could find them.

"It was easy and simple enough at the last," said the Captain.

"But I want to hear how it was you did not come last night. I was dreadfully afraid something had happened to you."

"You shall hear that afterwards," he said, "well, as I tell you, we sat up on that roof for two hours. That old Bluebeard, the father-in-law, you understand, seemed to be having some sort of a levée. Hazel thinks it was something to do with one of his sons getting married. At any rate there were people coming and going who ought by rights to have been quietly asleep in their own diggings, and each time we were just going to start, out came the old Nabob again, flourishing about all over the drive. I don't believe that man ever sleeps, for we saw him ourselves wandering in the garden after midnight. However, at last he went in to his siesta, and we just slipped down the stairs and sloped. The easiest thing in the world. Luckily we found an empty carriage mooning along the road, Hewetson's carriage it was, and the coachman knew me, for I don't believe Hazel would ever have managed to walk as far as this. Those ridiculous slippers of hers are all in tatters already."

"I must go home by the next steamer," said Hazel, "I have some money for my passage." and she related how the Nabob had bribed her to leave him and the Begum in peace what time the gardening mania was upon her.

"Yes, I suppose you had better go," said Eva reluctantly. "You would never really feel safe here, I am afraid, or else I should love to have you stay with me."

The Captain said nothing.

When Hazel's flight was discovered, the Nabob was beside himself with fury, against himself, as well as against Hazel, and every man and woman in the house who had failed to prevent her going. Every nook and corner of house and garden was searched for her, and men were sent to spy about in all the neighbouring houses and compounds. The pretty little bungalow on the beach was a long way off. There was a terrible uproar in the zenana, the slaves were beaten and otherwise punished, and every one of them went in fear of her life.

But when the Nabob said to his wife: "Your foreign Sheitan has run away into the open streets like a mad woman to bring shame and reproach upon our house," the Begum only answered: "It is well. Allah has at last remembered my beloved daughter Hazari."

Digitized by Google

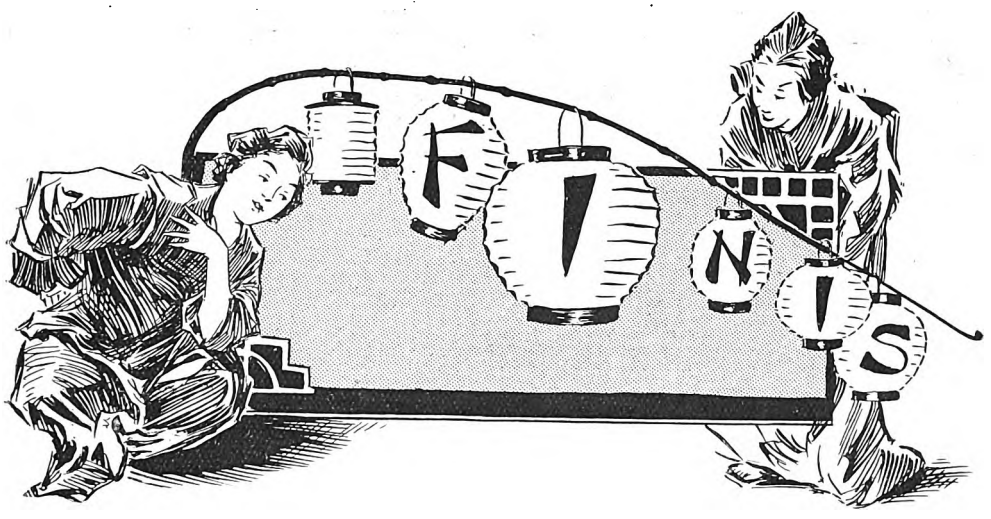
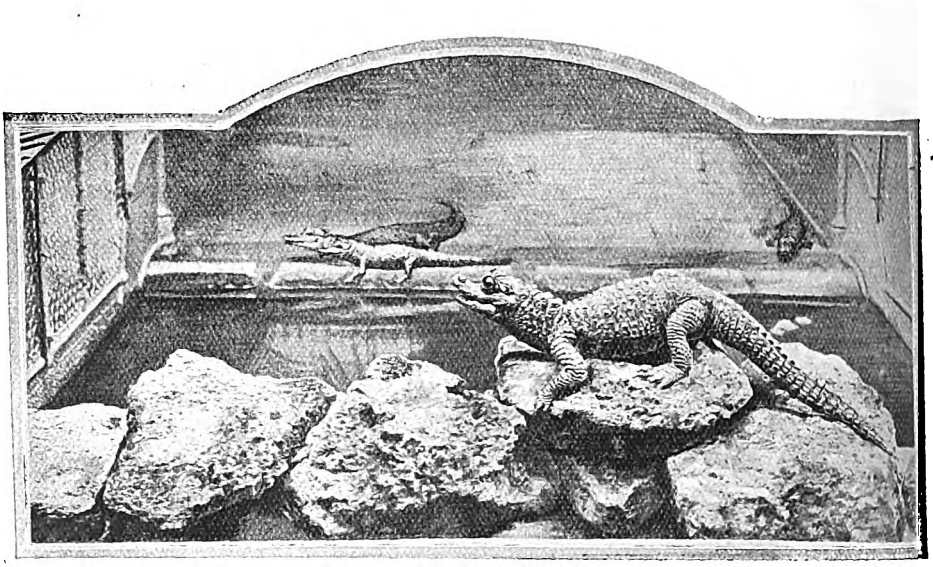
Hazel did not go home in the next steamer. The anxiety and fatigue, and exposure to the sun on those two last days brought on an illness, not very serious indeed, and not very long, but enough to make her unfit for travelling, and when she recovered from it, there were other reasons for deferring her departure.

It was indeed not till two years later that Hazel found herself on the deck of a steamer homeward bound. And the other passengers who spoke to her called her, not Mrs. Ali, but Mrs. Fletcher. And this time her husband was with her.



Digitized by Google



CAIMANS FROM AMERICA,

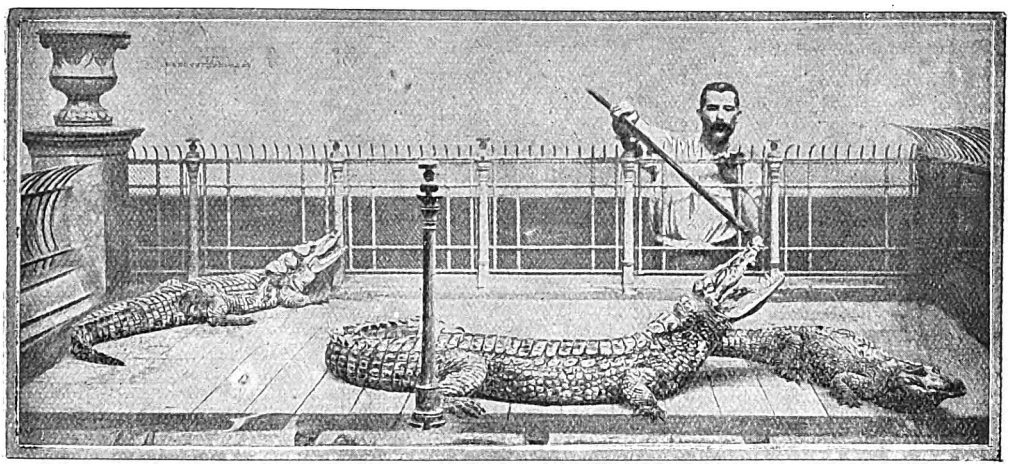
A Visit to the Parisian "Zoo,"

AT THE JARDIN DES PLANTES, PARIS.

THE menagerie is certainly the most popular part of this museum of Natural History, and a Frenchman visiting Paris never misses a ramble in the "Jardin des Plantes." Every Parisian knows the Bear Gardens, the Monkey Palace, the Aviaries. All school children are admitted free of charge for the sake of instruction in Natural History.

The third and fourth of our illustrations shows the daily toilet of "Marguerite," one of the five young African elephants. This cleanly elephant simply revels in the matutinal ablutions. The keepers well know the predilection of elephants for plenty of water, and the animals save them the trouble of moving during the bathing operations, for of their own accord the elephants will turn round and round, lie down, sit down, or roll over so that the water may play all over their bodies. Not content with this, they repeatedly fill their trunks with water for the purpose of cleaning their mouth and teeth. The most interesting of these animals is "Saib," an African with a very bad character, but some indulgence must be shown him, as he has broken his tusks against the barriers of his court, and it was necessary to pull out the stumps that remained; besides this, the poor animal is a perfect martyr to toothache, so no wonder he is restless! Standing grimly in his den, he shoves out his long trunk for continual begging. The people feeding him tell him to be good, and he will at once raise his forefeet on to a bar in his court, lift his head and double his trunk back over his head, thus revealing his open mouth, and patiently wait to be fed with the small buns which on-lookers are waiting to throw into his mouth. There are in the gardens regular hawkers of these buns for this purpose. The governing authorities of the "Jardin des Plantes" find this sport to be a well paying one, and encourage it, with the result that a great quantity of food is thus given to the elephants, and the other animals' food is regulated according to the quantity of buns given by the public.

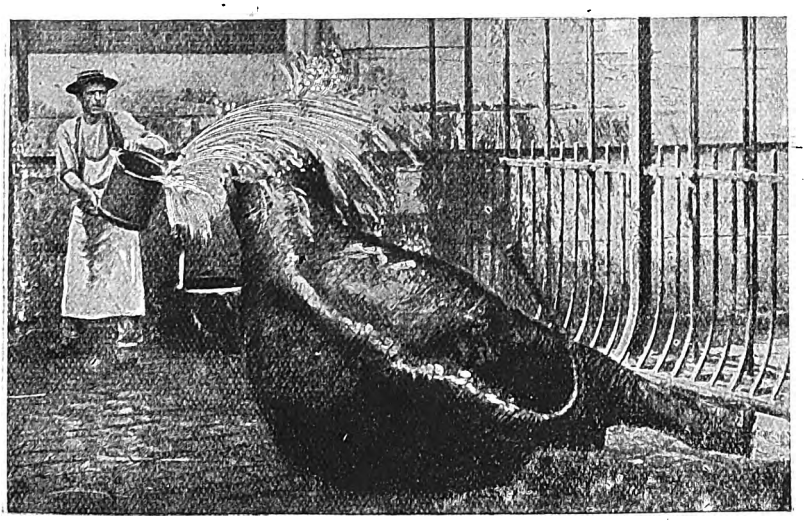
Digitized by Google



LAZY CROCODILES.

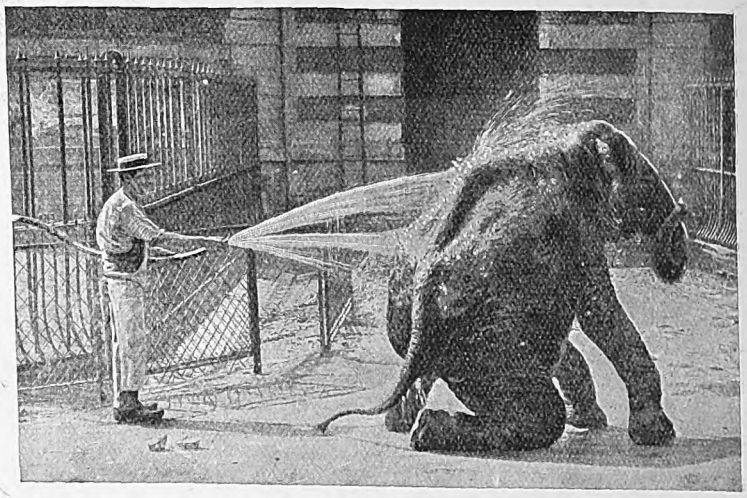
Often it happens that an elephant, especially "Saib" returns to his box without requiring any further food. In winter, however, when visitors are few, this giving of buns falls completely away, and during the cold weather a daily meal for "Saib" consists of about four trusses of hay and sixteen pounds of bread, carrots, etc., etc. "Saib" never leaves the gardens, and lives by himself in his court-yard, whereas the other four elephants take a constitutional every morning before the gardens are opened to the public.

The Monkey's palace is always a popular attraction. Here may be seen all sorts and conditions of these interesting but mischievous creatures, of whom the greatest care has to be taken to prevent sickness amongst them. One of our pictures shows a keeper with his special pet, a young chimpanzee, who, every morning has his coat carefully combed and brushed. This animal has been very content and happy during the three years it has been in the "Palace." He is very intelligent, and the keeper is educating him with much success, as is plainly observed in his habits and manners. The monkeys have a special kitchen for themselves, and they are principally fed on boiled potatoes, besides carrots, bread, and also chocolate. Close to the "Monkeys' Palace" are



MARGUERITE'S TOILET, "THE TUB."

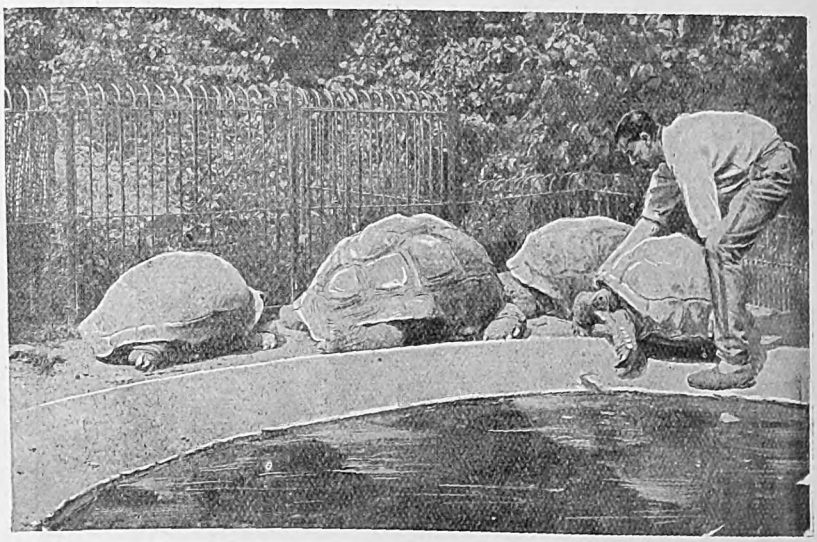
Digitized by Google



MARGUERITE'S TOILET, THE SHOWER-BATH.

the different aviaries. The one for the birds of prey seem to attract most attention, especially at feeding time. Their food consists of meat very finely chopped and it is curious to see how, when the time for feeding comes round, the birds get restless and often commence a frantic and grotesque dance, the eagle only remains quiet, and hardly deigns at first to glance at the meat that is brought to him. The aviary for the tropical birds is a magnificent building, in which there are large trees, so that the birds are practically in freedom and can fly about and rest as they like. In several places of this part of the grounds there are ponds with running water.

Not far from the aviaries are the basins for the large water animals, each of which requires from twelve to sixteen pounds of fresh fish a day. A specially constructed cart brings this supply every morning, and the animals know so well the noise made by this cart passing their abode, that they utter loud cries when they hear or see it come, and these cries serve again as signals



GIANT TORTOISES.

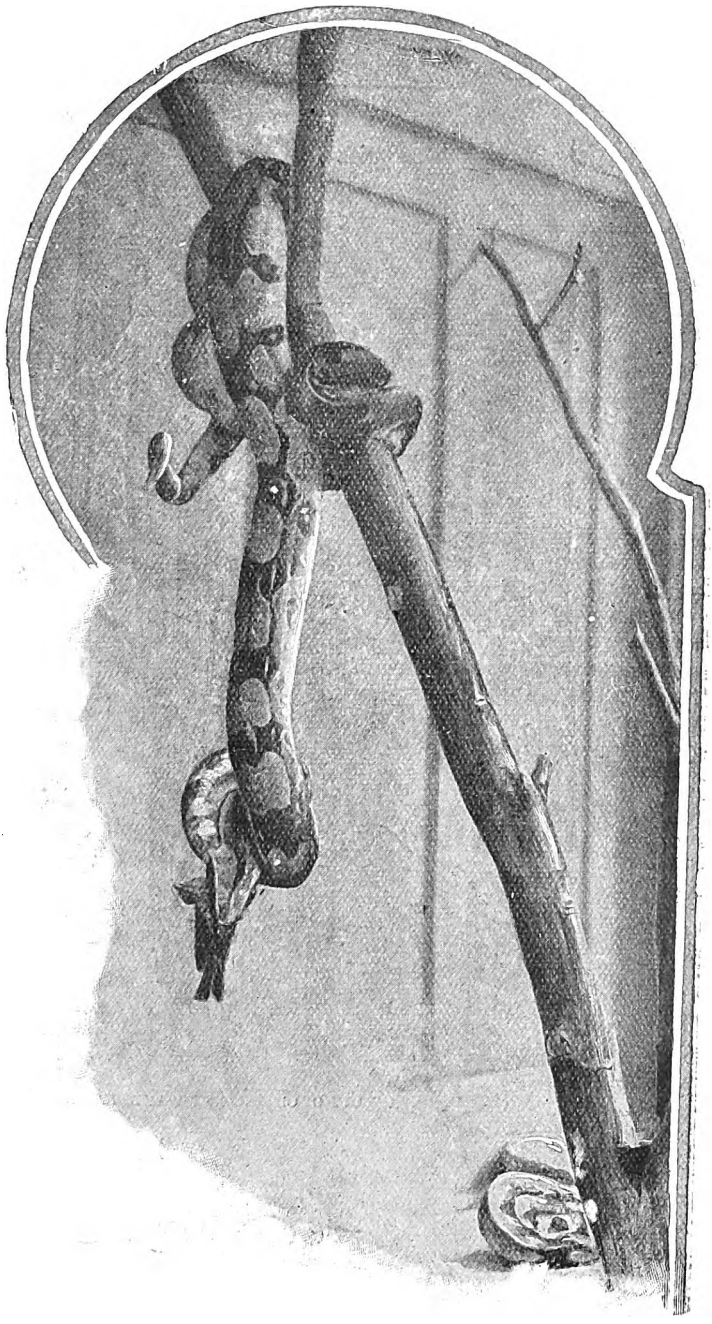
Digitized by Google

to the public, who then hasten to watch the distribution of herrings and other fish.

The collection of wild animals originated in 1818, and numbers twenty-one cages. Each animal has a separate lair, at the entrance of which they take their exercise. The meat comes daily from the market, and is cut up in a special chamber behind the cages. The daily portion of the lion comes to some twelve pounds a day. The bears only eat boiled meat. The cleaning of the cages is very easy, except in those inhabited by the bears, as often these animals refuse to budge from them, and it has happened that the white bear refused for six months to go into his lair which rendered the clearing out of his cage impossible, and it was strewn with a heterogeneous collection of umbrellas, bottles, old trousers, old boots, pipes, and many other things with which the animal played. "Martin, the white bear, which has the notoriety of having killed two men, often climbs the tree placed in the centre of his yard.

The buying of animals for the Paris "Zoo" is very expensive. The price of an elephant is about £200 to £300. A zebra costs £100, an American tapir £80, and a hippopotamus some £500.

The reptiles form a special branch of the collection, and are under separate supervision. They occupy one building and two small gardens. The crocodiles come from Egypt, and must remain indoors the whole year round, as they cannot stand this climate. On the other hand, the Caimans, a kind of crocodile from America, may be seen in the open. As regards the serpents, the python which looks so formidable, is not venomous.



A SERPENT'S BREAKFAST.

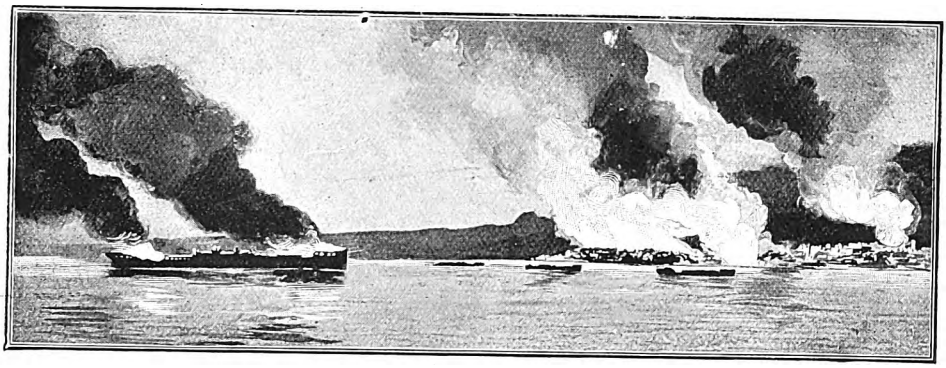
Digitized by Google

It is fed once a fortnight and this always attracts a crowd of people. It is a repellant spectacle and one in which the innocent little rabbit plays the role of victim.

The Zoo authorities exercise great care of the animals in their charge, and also see that they do not die from want of exercise. The French Government has several times helped the Zoo financially, and sent specimens to enlarge the collection, its desire being that Natural History shall be taught in the "Jardin des Plantes" to all children in the Paris schools.

A YOUNG CHIMPANZEE AND ITS KEEPER.

Digitized by Google



THE BURNING OF ST. PIERRE. STEAMSHIP "RORAIMA" AT THE LEFT.

THE ERUPTION OF MONT PELÉE.

Dictated to George R. McIntyre by ELLERY S. SCOTT, Chief Officer Lost Steamship "Roraima."

I AM a plain sailor and it is not easy for me to tell of those awful hours on the deck of the "Roraima" in St. Pierre harbor when death and destruction were all about me. That scene is like a nightmare to me now. At times it rises before me in all its vividness—at others I wonder if it was not all a horrible dream. Well do I know that it was not a dream, for though leagues of water now separate me from St. Pierre, before me ever is the face of my eldest boy, whose life was snuffed out, as were the lives

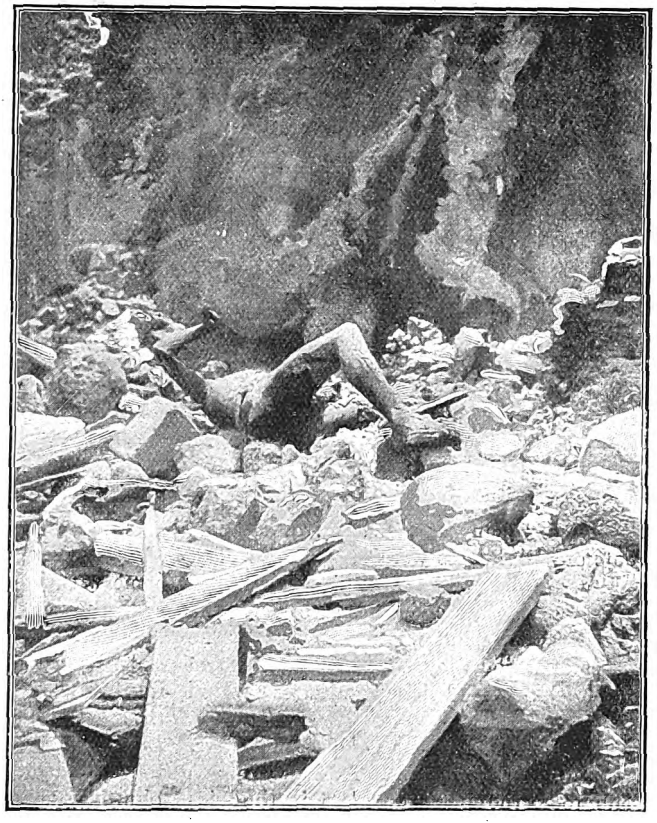
THE FIRST CORPSE. FOUND BY THE ENGLISH RESCUE PARTY ARRIVING FROM BARBADOES.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

It was a fruitful land, a land that seemed made for a dreaming people—and a dreaming people inhabited it.

St. Pierre was at the base of the mountains that loomed up back of it, peak on peak. Mont Pelée was away to the northwest, the highest of them all, but, like all the others, it had vegetation growing almost to the very mouth of its seemingly extinct crater, a crater that had resolved itself into a lake. The waters of it were clear as crystal; but I have heard that the taste was bitter, as if these waters had been steeped in herbs. On Pelée's side were brooks and rivulets of sweet water, and picnic parties often ascended almost to the very crater's edge before spreading their lunches on cloths laid on the smooth greensward.



SUFFOCATED WHILE FLEEING THE CITY.

It was a vision of fairyland to see the sun rise in Martinique. It has no dawn as we understand it, and no twilight such as we have in the north. The sun rises very abruptly. The blue of the sky always seemed deeper to me at Martinique than anywhere else, it was such an intense blue. As the sun lifted above the horizon, you could see all things tinted with lilac. Then yellow and violet waves seemed to be running together and intermingling in the air. The sea lost its green color. It became orange in the morning. At night, as the sun sank it would look almost blood-red.

St. Pierre was a queer old city. Its buildings were ancient. Many of them were relics, I have been told, of the seventeenth century. It was always interesting to me, when business would allow, to take a short walk through this quaint old city. During my various visits, before that last fearsome one, I had managed to walk pretty nearly all over the place. Once I slept in the city, in a queer, low-ceiled room with one of those curious old dormer-windows. The bed was a heavy mahogany affair, with ponderous posts. Pictures in heavy frames adorned the walls.

The houses in St. Pierre were all of stone; the narrow streets were flagged in heavy stone blocks. It was the style, I suppose, in those ancient cities of three hundred years ago. And yet St. Pierre could as easily have had wide streets. There was room enough on which to build a city even on this ledge at the foot of the mountain-range, along the shores of the bay where ancient St. Pierre stood.

I do not believe there was an entirely level street in the whole city, nor one that was absolutely straight. They all turned and twisted about, around curves, and up-and downhill. Sometimes, to continue your walk along a street it was necessary to ascend or descend stairways or else a steep incline. Wooden awnings covered with zinc shaded many of the shop fronts. The roofs of the houses were steep and full of gables.

Digitized by Google

RUINS OF GOVERNMENT HOUSE AND THE PRISON.

Yellow was the color used to paint the houses, where paint was used at all. The stones of which they were built had grown gray with age, and lichen and moss covered the crevices.

Over some of the many gabled buildings, running vines climbed. Iron or wooden slats took the place of glass in the windows. All of them, too, were supplied with heavy wooden shutters that could be closed, making the interiors dark.

The people of St. Pierre were like the people all over the island—slow, dreamy, content. On the entire island before the eruption there were probably one hundred and fifty thousand of negro blood, from a dense black to a creamy white. The rest of the population included probably fifteen thousand Asiatics, and possibly the same number of pure whites. The whites, as a class, were the poor people of the island. The blacks had much of the trade. Of course, I refer, not to the foreign financial institutions that had been established in St. Pierre, such as the Banque Transatlantique and others, but to the native-born whites.

The negroes, like those of the Southern States of America, were a music-loving people. I have often listened with delight to their songs. Some of the half-breeds were fine, stalwart-looking, intelligent men. The women, some of whom were nearly white, were often entitled to be called beautiful.

They were a very superstitious people. The natives regarded Pelée as a saint. They were firm in the belief that he would never visit them with fire again.

The overwhelming of St. Pierre did not come without warning. The people knew that the volcano threatened, as early as May 3d. Then the first belch of smoke came from its crater. Even before, a warning had come of impending eruption, for the people of Le Prêcheur, a village built at the very base of the western slope of Pelée, had for some time been smelling sulphurous gases in the air, the forerunner of the great outburst that was even then making ready to shoot forth from beneath the rocky crust of the volcano. Pelée had indulged in a long sleep. It had not been active in more than half a century, except for the ominous rumbling some twenty-five years ago.

A TYPICAL SCENE OF DESOLATION. GIGANTIC TREES UPROOTED AND THROWN ABOUT.

Digitized by Google

VIEW ALONGSHORE TO THE NORTH—IN THE FOREGROUND THE WRECK OF THE GREAT LIGHTHOUSE.

But this warning of May 3d was more than a mere rumbling. It was an outburst of fire and smoke. Great clouds of smoke began to pour from the crater on the afternoon of May 3d. Apparently the lake in the once extinct crater had been licked up by the heat. The smoke gave place to flame that shot hundreds of feet into the air at midnight of that day.

Then came shocks as of earthquakes. The earth trembled. The flashes of fire from the great crater kept up all that night. In the morning St. Pierre was covered with a shower of hot ashes to a depth of two inches or more. Mont Pelée's top was hidden by smoke. It had not been easy to see the top even on a clear day, because of the clouds that hovered over it even when the sky in all other parts was apparently cloudless. But on May 4th, the day when the ashes fell, smoke hid Pelée's crater from sight. At night the flames came again, and on the 5th the eruption became still more threatening.

Then a stream of lava, a mile wide, ran to the sea, a distance of four miles, in three minutes; and on its way slew hundreds of people. The great Guérin factories were wiped out. The employees were slain; their homes were licked up in a twinkling.

It would seem as if this should have stirred the entire city of St. Pierre to a panic of fear. Many persons, since my return to New York, have asked me why the people were so dormant, so indifferent to their impending fate. To understand this, one must know the dreamy character of the people of St. Pierre. Pelée was no stranger to them. Remember, too, that they regarded it as their patron saint.

Besides, it would have been difficult for the entire population of this gay little city to escape, even if the people had so willed. Whither would they have fled? There were not ships enough to take them all away.

Travel by land would have been hazardous over the mountain-lands to the southward. It is possible that they could have accomplished it. Americans or Englishmen, in a like case, would perhaps have tried it. But a native of Martinique attempt such feats? Hardly.

Some of the people did flee. The report

Digitized by Google

BEYOND RECOGNITION.

that all remained in the city up to the last is not true. Sailboats and small yachts took some away. Others went on ships in the harbor. Most of the latter, doubtless, perished when the final outburst came.

The financial institutions of St. Pierre were the first to take the alarm. The entire contents of the vaults of the Colonial Bank and other banking-houses were transferred to the French cruiser "Suchet." But the bank officials, many of them, remained in St. Pierre, as did the rank and file of the people. They cowered in their homes, so a survivor told me in Fort de France, when I, as one of the mere handful saved, reached there on the French cruiser.

Perhaps one reason, a strong one, why the people remained so inactive might be found in the fact that Pelée gave evidence of subsiding on May 7th. The rumblings grew less and the fall of ashes was not so great, though the smoke was still pouring from the crater in great volume.

Now I come to that last scene in the destruction of St. Pierre, the morning of May 8th. The "Roraima" steamed into the harbor of St. Pierre soon after six o'clock that morning. The air was clear, the sky a deep blue. There were no clouds. We had been struck by a light shower of ashes that morning before reaching port, but no ashes were falling in the harbor. Our vessel dropped anchor about seven hundred yards offshore. We were opposite the lighthouse. This was at the northern end of the bay, and nearer to Pelée than we should have been at the southern extremity.

The volcano, of course, engaged the attention of all on board. Smoke was pouring upward from the crater, and it was impossible to see the summit, for the wreathing smoke concealed it. We felt some uneasiness, and said so when the agents came on board.

But they laughed at us. They said we should have been in St. Pierre three days before, and they regaled us with a description of the eruption that plowed to the sea over the Guérin factories. They asked, however, if we could not go on to St. Lucia and discharge cargo there, as sixty first-class passengers wanted to leave St. Pierre.

RUINS OF THE HOTEL GRAN, THE FASHIONABLE RESORT WHOSE BREAKFAST-ROOM WAS CROWDED AT 7.50 A.M., MAY 8TH.

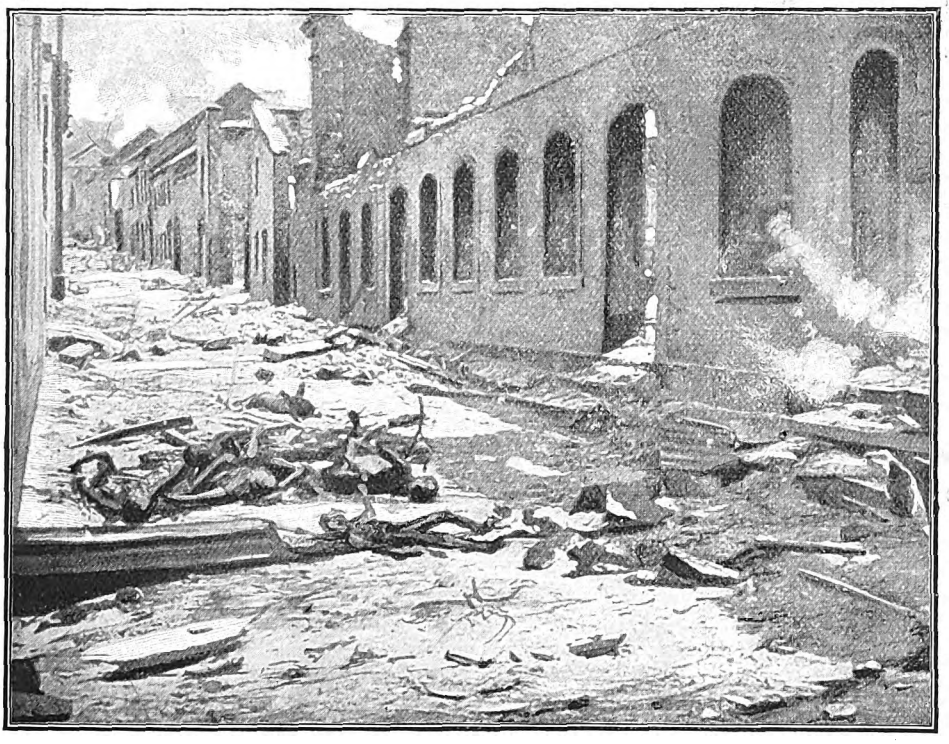
Digitized by Google

They were among the prudent ones who desired to leave the city behind until all danger was past.

Captain Muggah was willing to do this, if possible—not so much because he feared Pelée, as because it was Ascension Day, and a feast-day in St. Pierre. It would be impossible, therefore, to discharge any of our cargo until the next day. The Captain asked me to look over the cargo and see if that intended for St. Lucia could be removed without disturbing much of the consignment for St. Pierre. You see how small a matter sometimes decides one's fate. I found that to get at the St. Lucia consignment, it would be necessary to move a lot intended for St. Pierre, as it rested on top of St. Lucia goods. Captain Muggah, in some disgust, decided to remain in St. Pierre until the next day, although it meant a day of idleness.

It took me until nearly eight o'clock to overhaul the cargo. We breakfasted at eight, and I lounged over to the rail to take another look at the city before going to breakfast. Some of the passengers were on deck. We had perhaps sixteen on the ship. Most of them, however, were below preparing for breakfast.

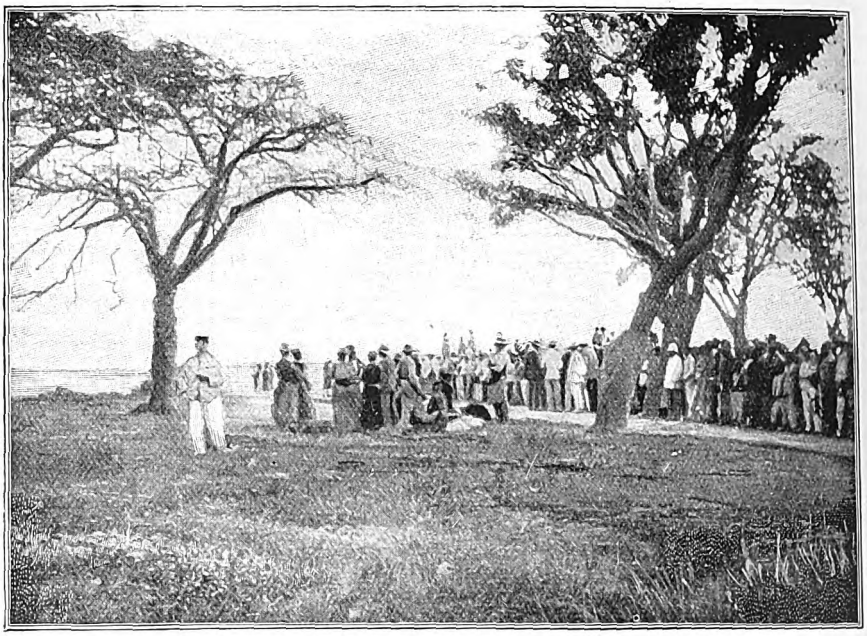
Through the glass I could see people hurrying along the narrow streets to the various churches. Ashes could still be seen on the roofs, but much of the downfall had been swept from the streets, so far as I could observe. The people were in their finest attire. And they dressed in gay colors in St. Pierre. It was always interesting to me to see these people in their holiday dress. The head-dresses of the women were especially brilliant.



SIXTÉEN CHARRED BODIES FOUND ON A STREET CORNER.

In idle interest, I turned my glass toward Mont Pelée. It was at that very moment that the whole top of the mountain seemed blown into the air. The sound that followed was deafening. A great mass of flames, seemingly a mile in diameter, with twisting giant wreaths of smoke, rolled thousands of feet into the air, and then overbalanced and came rolling down the seamed and cracked sides of the mountain.

Digitized by Google



REFUGEES FROM LE PRÊCHEUR LANDING AT FORT DE FRANCE.

Foot-hills were overflowed by the onrushing mass. It was not mere flame and smoke. It was molten lava, giant blocks of stone and a hail of smaller stones, with a mass of scalding mud intermingled.

For one brief moment I saw the city of St. Pierre before me. Then it was blotted out by the overwhelming flood. There was no time for the people to flee. They had not even time to pray. I heard Captain Muggah say: "Heave up the anchor. All hands get ready." Then I turned, to see a great wave rushing toward us from the sea. It reached us before a move could be made to heave anchor. The "Roddam's" anchor-chain could be unshackled. Ours could not. With us it was a question of raising the anchor. There was no time to do that.

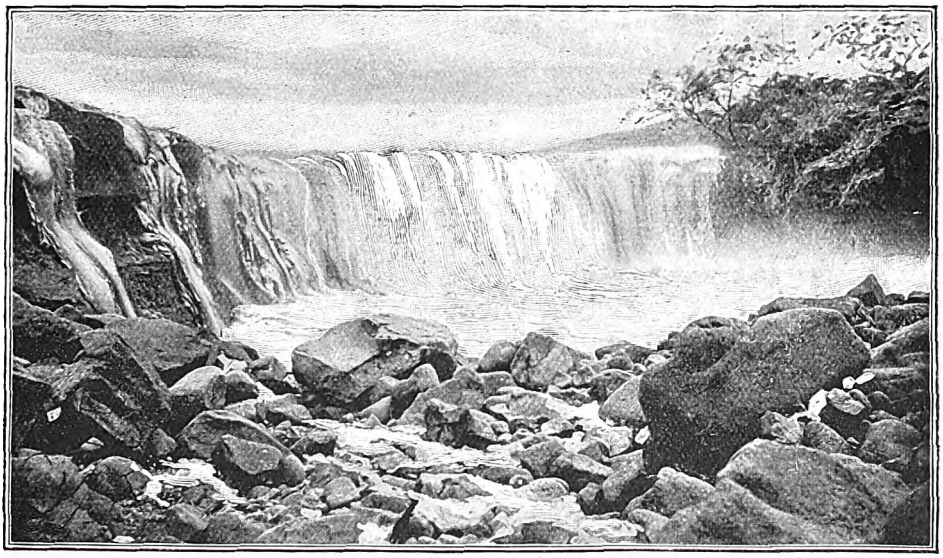
I had called to Carpenter Benson to start the windlass, but before he could move, the "Roraima" rolled almost on her port beam-ends, and then as suddenly went to starboard. The funnel, masts and boats went by the board in an instant. The decks were swept clean. The hatches were staved in. The next instant a hail of fire and red-hot stones was upon the ship. Then came the scalding mud. The saloon was ablaze. The ship seemed doomed. Men were struck down all around me by flaming masses of lava. From bright sunlight the air became dense as midnight. The smoke that rolled down from the crater's mouth had blotted the sun from our vision.

To find Captain Muggah was my first effort. I stumbled through the ship looking for him. Finally I found him on the lower bridge-deck in shirt and trousers, his hair singed from his scalp, his whiskers and mustache burned off, a pitiable sight. He was suffering great agony. And yet in that supreme moment he did not forget his duty.

"Save the women and children," he said. "Oh, Scott, the poor women and children!" We tried to cut away a lifeboat, the Captain weakly aiding in spite of his hurts, but it had wedged in the chocks and could not be moved. Third-mate Thomas Thompson tried to help us.

I cannot go over in detail all that occurred during the six fearful hours spent on the "Roraima" after the eruption of Pelée. Captain Muggah was swept away, or in agony jumped overboard, I know not which. He disappeared. I could find my son nowhere on the ship. It was difficult to get about, for the decks were slippery with the hot mud that plastered them and the ship was ablaze in three places. We fought the fire desperately. Assistant-purser Thompson, Carpenter Benson, Second-engineer Evans and Fourth-engineer Morris helped. The passengers who were still alive were huddled forward. We tried to build a raft. Two laborers from St. Kitts, who were on board, helped in this. It is doubtful if we should have survived if we had committed ourselves to it, for the flames were dancing over the waters, fed by thousands of gallons of rum from the distilleries alongshore. The casks had burst and the blazing fluid floated on the surface. Pelée was still pouring its deluge of lava, rocks and ashes over the city. We could not see St. Pierre. At times we could not see one hundred feet away from the ship. At other times the pall lifted so that we could see the whole city ablaze.

Digitized by Google



MOLTEN LAVA FORMING A POOL.

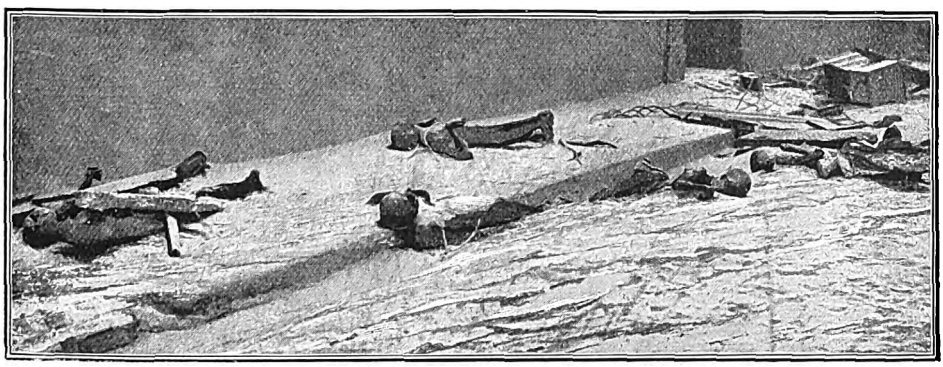
We saw the "Roddam" go plunging by us at the start. We hoped for succor from her. It was vain. The pall of smoke lifted after three o'clock in the afternoon. Then we saw the French cruiser "Suchet" making for the harbor. They sent a boat that took some of the women and children.

Another boat and a launch took the others. I was the last to leave. On board the "Suchet" we received all kindness. We were rapidly taken from the harbor. The "Roraima" was ablaze fore and aft.



STRICKEN DEAD IN THE STREET.

Digitized by Google

VIEW ALONG SOUTHERN SHORE. BODIES HIDDEN UNDER DÉBRIS OF FENCES, TREES, TELEGRAPH POLES, BRICKS AND DUST.

The volcano was still belching. It seemed like the end of the world.

The word that Fort de France is threatened has so often been cabled to New York lately, that I have been asked if Pelée could also overwhelm that city. I can answer that only by saying that Fort de France is twelve miles south of Pelée, and between them there are many mountain-peaks, with deep cañons running east and west. These cañons are enormous, and to reach Fort de France the lava from Pelée would have to fill and overflow the cañons. Such an event would mean an eruption of a magnitude that the mind refuses to grasp.

In my opinion, however, the entire island of Martinique is in danger. I believe that the whole island is underlaid with volcanoes and other craters are likely to form and belch forth in any part of it at any time.

I believe it to be impossible to say what caused the eruption. Theories are always advanced at times like this, but the fact remains that the world knows very little of its volcanoes, until after they have erupted. Even then the information we get—acquired at so high a price—is of what they have done, not of the machinery that did it.

It was a new crater, midway between the sea and Mont Pelée, that destroyed St. Pierre, although both the old and the new crater were in action. Around the new crater are hundreds of fissures and vents—miniature volcanoes—all active.

It is difficult to realize that a city like St. Pierre can be swept from the earth so suddenly. Unless one returns to the subject again and again, the mind hardly takes in the full significance of the results of such a disaster. It is hard to picture in the mind's eye a city deserted by every living thing except, perhaps, rats, its streets and houses crushed out of shape, with dead bodies strewn everywhere. Aside from the loss of life, the property loss is enormous. One wonders at the appalling task before the government of the island, and the life and property insurance companies. One thing may be said to the credit of the United States: the government and the people of this country, in the relief movement immediately started for the Martinique sufferers, were the first of all to see their duty and to do it.

Digitized by Google

"A TRUST HOUSE! I AM NOT FIT FOR IT."

THE KING'S TRUSTEES.

PRIZE STORY.

ONCE upon a time, in a certain town in a certain land, two women lived in two houses, side by side; their names were Mrs. Love and Mrs. Selflove. The king of the country was the wisest of all kings, and he loved his people dearly. His people never saw him, however, for he had the strange power of walking among them, seeing and hearing all they did, but quite unseen by them. Nothing that happened in that town was unknown to the king. Though the people did not see their king they had many long letters from him, full of loving good advice, and histories of things that had happened in the town. These letters were bound together into books, and given to the people by his stewards. Some took great care of these books because the binding was beautiful, some threw them away, some soon forgot all about them, but others read them often, and carefully, and learned so many things of useful happiness in their pages that you could always tell the readers of the book by the quiet, steadfast happiness of their faces.

Mrs. Love was one of the readers, and she used to tell her children about them too, for there were some tales among the letters that children never tired of hearing over and over again.

Digitized by Google

One morning, when Mrs. Selflove was very busy polishing her tea-pot, for she kept her house like a new pin (and always dusted the king's book every day, though she said she had not time to read it), while polishing her tea-pot one of the king's stewards came to her door, and his shadow, falling on her work, made her look up, and smiling and curtseying, she said, "Oh, pray come in, sir, and take a seat; for, though my house is small, everything is of the best, and never a speck of dirt on anything; pray take a seat, sir."

"Thank you, Mrs. Selflove," said the steward, "I have not time to stop now, but I have a message for you from the king. The two great Trust Houses are vacant, and you and your husband are to have charge of one. Here,"—unrolling a long scroll of parchment—"is the title-deed. All is to be held in trust by you for the king, and you are to take possession at once."

"Well, I never! A Trust House for us! Now I shall be a lady, and folks will see what comes of hard work, and keeping things as they should be. I daresay the king has been in many times, all unbeknown by me, and seen me working early and late; and he knows who can be trusted. There'll be no fear but my Trust House will be well taken care of, though I say it as shouldn't."

With a half sad smile the steward turned from her door, saying, "Martha, Martha! careful and troubled over many things, be careful to choose that good part which shall not be taken from you."

"Martha! how—how, did he come to call me Martha, which was my mother's name?" Well, I've got a good thing, now, and good care I'll take that it shan't be taken from me. There that will do for you," putting the tea-pot on the shelf, "I must on with my best things, and up to look at my new house; all furnished grandly as it is, I've been told. Won't the neighbours envy me that's all!" And soon, all dressed in her best, Mrs. Selflove was marching up the town, head in air, and smiling proudly to herself.

The steward meanwhile had gone to Mrs. Love's cottage, next door, but though he knocked three times no one answered. At last he pushed open the door, and looked in. A glance round the room shewed that it was the home of a large family, so many cups upon the dresser; such a large kettle hanging over the fire, and the breakfast things upon the table, plainly shewed that eight or nine people had but lately had a meal. In one corner of the room lay a doll; in another a hoop; and other signs of children were not wanting. The steward stepped inside, and picking up the King's Book, which lay on a side table, sat down and began to turn over the leaves. What a worn old Book it was! Evidently in daily use, and full of little treasures; a flower here, a card there, and many bits or ribbon for markers. The Book seemed to open of itself at one place, and the steward's eyes were attracted to a few words lined under with red ink. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the leaft of these little ones, ye have done it unto Me." But here Mrs. Love came in at the back door, and he shut the Book, and stood up to wish her good-morning, and to tell her that she was to have charge of one of the two Trust Houses. Mrs. Love stood speechless a moment. "Oh, sir!" she said at last, "a Trust House! I am not fit for it; I am only a working woman." "Don't be afraid," said the steward, smiling, "the king knows exactly what you are, and you cannot refuse this trust, you know."

"No, sir," she said, "that is true; and as it is the King's wish, I will do my best, and perhaps, sir, you will help us with advice, for neither my husband or I, know much about the management of a big place."

"I will help you if I can, you may be sure," said the steward, "and now here are your title-deeds, and I wish you good morning." Left to herself, Mrs, Love stood with the roll of parchment in her hand, looking round her cottage, and slowly a tear ran down her cheek; this aroused her. "Well, I must not make a trouble of the King's goodness," she said, carefully laying the roll on the little table beside the King's Book. "When the children, and father come home, what a tale there will be to tell them! To think that to-night we must sleep in the Trust House! Little did we think last night would be our last here! Old Tompkins and his wife shall come and live here, and leave that damp little place they are in.

Digitized by Google

they will be stronger here, and I shall leave them all our things—except the Letters. I think I must just run up and have a look at our new home," and in her old sun-bonnet, just as she was, off she set on her errand, and being light, and quick of steps, soon overtook Mrs. Selflove, who walked in more majestic style. "Good morning, Mrs. Selflove," said she. "Oh, good morning," replied Mrs. Selflove, in her most dignified voice, "I'm just on my way to take possession of some property we have come into. You won't see much more of us, I can tell you; we are rich now, quite gentle-folk!" "Oh, I'm so glad," said Mrs. Love, "and congratulate you warmly, and I hope you will be very happy, indeed I do, but I must hurry on and get back to see about dinner, so good-bye." and half running in her haste, she was soon out of sight. Mrs. Selflove shaking her head, muttered: "Now, there's a person I've little patience with, never half keeps her house tidy; always running out to wash for some sick person, or taking food to another. Look after your own home is my motto, and as to her children, the way she lets them leave their silly toys about, and the noise of laughing and running in and out that goes on in that house! I wouldn't put up with it. My children aren't spoilt with toys, and when they come in from school, its off with their boots on the mat, and sit in the chairs quiet; no running in and out, messing the clean floor, or tittering toys and things about the place."

Mrs. Love soon arrived at her new home. A large and beautiful house on the brow of a hill, looking due west towards the king's palace, which lay far away in that direction, and sometimes when the sun was setting, people thought you could see a gleam from the golden walls of the palace, but it was far, far away, with many a long mile of wood, and lake, and hill, between, so nobody could be sure—except the children, they were quite sure sometimes, for children have long sight you know, and often see what grown-up people cannot. Looking into the street on one side of the house was a large dining-room; on the sideboard were many, many cups and saucers, and plates, and the long table was covered with a snowy-white cloth. Evidently, from the scents in the air cakes were baking in the kitchen; but Mrs. Love saw no servants as she wandered through the house. One beautiful room was meant for her without a doubt, for her name was written over the door, and in the wardrobe were beautiful clothes, all just her size. So choosing out some of the plainest, and dressing herself in them she went down to see the kitchen and the servants, and bidding the maids make the beds, and have tea ready at four o'clock, off she set home again, calling on her way to tell Mrs. Tompkins of her good fortune, and to offer the poor old people her comfortable cottage. Not much time was spent on cooking, or heating dinner that day; all were too excited, and anxious to see the new grand house, and very soon, the sound of children's feet and voices filled the Trust House with music, as every nook and corner was explored. Four o'clock brought tea-time, and a hungry, laughing party flocked into the dining-room where tea was laid. Such a tea-table! Long enough to seat fifty children instead of eight, and places set for fully that number, and cakes enough and to spare, and tea and milk and everything in plenty! What a funny mistake the servants had made; but the king they said had bid them set the table so. A shout from the street, in shrill treble voices drew the eyes of Mr. and Mrs. Love from the table. All along the windows were rows of children's faces, pinched, pale, hungry faces, gazing with such great eyes on that tea-table. Husband and wife looked at each other; Now they understood the king's order to the servants, and opening the nearest window Mrs. Love called all the children in, such a crowd! Some so weak and feeble, all so hungry. What a surprise this invitation was to them. How quiet they were at first, but soon they began to grow merry. Cakes and bread and butter disappeared, only to be replaced by more by the watchful servants. With pockets full, and glad faces, the poor children trooped away at last, happy in knowing they were to come again. Soon it was bed-time for the Love children, and Mr. and Mrs. Love began carefully to look over their Trust. They found quantities of warm clothes, far more than their own children needed. "I think," said Mr. Love "the king's wishes are clear. We have here more of everything than we need and it is meant for us to give to those who have too little. Servants will do your house-work, dear wife, so that you will have time to visit poor families, and help them to make their homes happier. "And the children can help to do that as well," shouted the two oldest Love children, who had crept unnoticed into the room, and had heard the last part of their father's remark, "Toys and things, and parties we can give the children."

Digitized by Google

And so lived the Love family in their Trust House. Teaching love, and learning love, and all as happy and busy as the day was long, till one by one the king sent for them to come to his palace, and once more the Trust House was empty.

But what of Mrs. Selflove all this time? Oh, she had a hard time of it! She dressed very grandly, and gave grand dinner parties to lords and ladies who lived near; they came and ate at her feasts and danced at her balls, but laughed at her behind her back, as a vulgar old thing. She would have nothing to do with the friends of her humbler days, and so she ended in having no friends at all. When she had her first feast, poor hungry children came peeping in at the dining room windows, but instead of giving them food her husband took a stick, and beat them all away, and the street was filled with sounds of crying, which quite spoilt the music of the band that had been hired to play. Next day he had the lower panes made so that no one could see through, and one of the men servants was bidden to stand in the street at meal times and prevent idle people standing about near the house. The piles of clothes—too many for the Selflove children to use—were eaten by moths, despite all the mother's care of them, the food they could not eat went bad and was wasted. Neither she, nor her husband, nor the children were well. They had too much rich food, and no work to do. Day by day they all grew more selfish

"WHO WALKED IN MORE MAJESTIC STYLE."

Digitized by Google

and discontented, and life seemed full of worry and trouble.

One day came a message from the king bidding one of the children come to him, but the boy was afraid; he knew nothing of the king's goodness, for the book of letters had been left in the old cottage, and the children knew none of the beautiful stories. "There had not been time," Mrs. Selflove said, "to be telling tales to children." In their trouble about the boy going, they sent for the steward, but he could not keep the boy back as the king wanted him. The day of parting, when it came, was a sad one, and many tears were shed, but the boy said he was not now afraid, and he begged them to read the king's letters every day, and to try to do what he bid them. So the book of letters was read and re-read, though often Mrs. Se flove's eyes were too full of tears to see the words aright. Gradually—at first in memory of the boy who had been called to the king—kind deeds began to be done in that Trust House too. Food no longer was allowed to go bad; clothes did not lie unused upon shelves, to be eaten by moths, for Mrs. Selflove thinking of her boy, clothed and fed other people's children, and found that this was the happiest work she had ever done. One day the steward came, and found her telling the tales in the king's letters to a crowd of little children who had just been having tea round her long table, and when the stories were finished, and the children ran home, the steward said good-bye too, but at the door he turned and said, "Now that you have chosen the good part, do you not know why once I called you Martha?"

G.M.B.

A SIMILITUDE.

A blooming rose was plucked to-day,
Designed a lady's hair to dress,
Which yesterday another did;
But now, all crushed, is thrown aside,
A fate which waits this one, alas!

Ah, me! it's life was all too brief:
Alive to-day, to-morrow dead;
A beauteous thing of yesterday;
Like a gem in a spray it lay,
Though withered now, is fragrant yet.

And so a flower is type of man:
His life, like it, is but a day,
Who yesterday in healthful bloom,
And now to-day within the tomb,
May leave a fragrant memory. —J.C.

Digitized by Google

VERESTCHAGIN IN THE PHILIPPINES.

By Isabel McDougall.

A MAN who makes a specialty of painting military pictures must needs follow the far-flung battle-line from one extremity of this quarrelsome globe to another. Thus Vasili Verestchagin was in his youth with the expedition which broke into wondrous Samarcand, the ancient treasure-city of Tamerlane; in his manhood he was wounded on a Russian torpedo-boat; a year ago he found himself with the American army near Manila. He has always been a student of "the game of kings," and, being prevented from watching it in South Africa, he turned to those distant islands of the sea.

"I'M HIT, SIR."

"What is going on there probably appears to you a small war, after the great campaigns you have seen."

"You may call it a small war if you like, but it is none the less a fierce one. War is war everywhere. It is to-day what it was yesterday—what it will be to-morrow. Always the same," says this Tolstoyan denouncer of bloodshed.

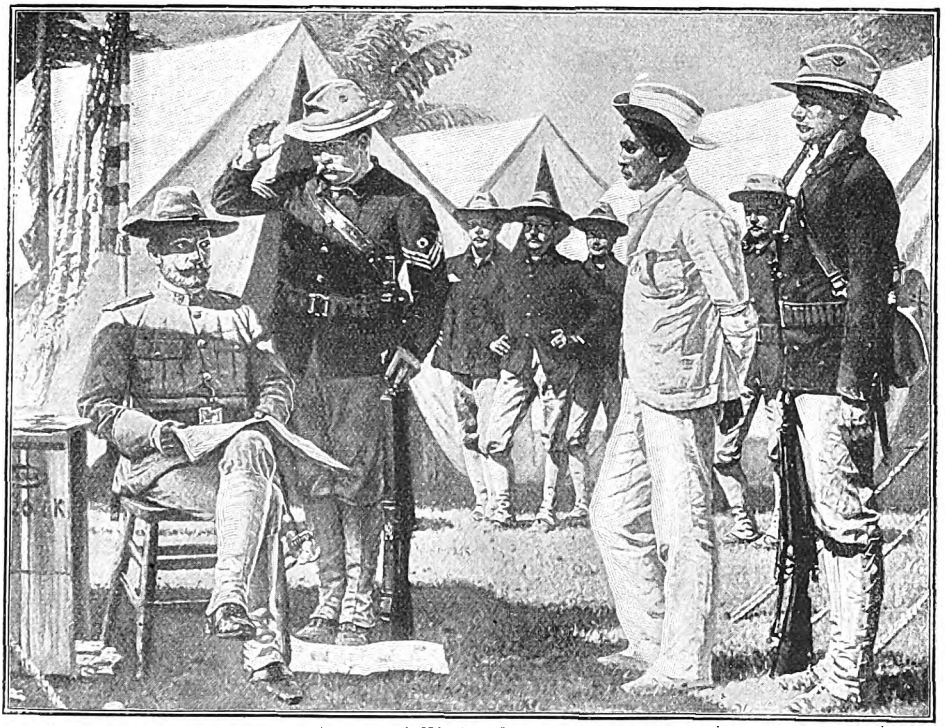
Yet he has painted no sensational scenes in the Philippines, which may disappoint some morbid expectations. In a way America has fared better at his hands than other nations.

It is said that the French did not enjoy his portrayal of Napoleon's retreat from Moscow, along a drifted highway strewn with dead and dying men. Neither did our transatlantic cousins find his representation of Sepoys blown from British cannon palatable—that long line of white-robed natives bound to the muzzles of the great guns under the sunny Indian sky, and the squads of disciplined gunners calmly awaiting the order to shatter each helpless human frame into bleeding fragments. It has been more than whispered that Russia frowned upon his picture of a wholesale hanging of Nihilists—two corpses already dangling; many more high gallows-trees awaiting their ghastly fruit; a strong military force drawn up in hollow square about them under gray wintry heavens from which "feathered rain falls softly down."

And when to these last two he added a realistic picture of the Crucifixion and grouped the three scenes of execution together, with the implication that they were equally abhorrent, then indeed there was deep displeasure in both church and state.

The worst that he has shown in the Philippines has been the inevitable suffering, bloodshed and endurance. His only painful pictures are the set which he entitles "The Interrupted Letter: A Poem in

Digitized by Google



A NATIVE SPY.

Paint." This begins with a cavalryman saluting as, with blood pouring down his face, he answers his officer. "You're hit, Sergeant?" "Yes, sir." Next comes "In the Hospital," where he is borne in on a stretcher. Then in "Dear Mother" he lies bandaged on his narrow iron cot, dictating a letter to a nurse who sits beside him in her neat cap and cleanly uniform. There follows "The Letter Is Interrupted," where the wounded man has fallen back on his pillow and the nurse is anxiously feeling his pulse. In "The Letter Lies Unfinished" you see the paper forgotten on the floor at the foot of the bed where the writer lies stark, and you know that it never will be finished.

These distressing pictures are certainly not objects of sensuous beauty, if that is what works of art should be. There are merely the white iron bed, the bare, whitewashed wall, with the mosquito-netting drawn back against it, for setting to the livid sufferer and the calm, serious young woman in her light cotton gown. A professional nurse who saw it in Chicago, however, could not praise it enough for its faithful depiction of a hospital scene.

Why indeed should it not be faithful? It not only was painted from actual fact in a Manila hospital, but had been, so to speak, actually experienced by the painter. When he saw the American soldier endeavoring to send a dying message home, like a flash his mind went back to his own unforgettable feelings as years before he lay in hospital on the banks of the Danube with what was believed to be a mortal wound and in his turn painfully dictated his last wishes to his attendant.

Two of his Philippine pictures point to a drumhead court-martial. One shows the interior of a small dark hut where cavalry officers of the vanguard are interrogating a deserter to discover whether he is a spy. There is an air of caution and secrecy about it. A single candle on a rough deal table faintly illumines four intent bronzed faces and throws exaggerated shadows on the wall behind. The other scene is out of doors, with palms, white tents and groups of soldiers for the background. Here a spy clad in light uniform, with arms bound, is brought before the officer in command, who sits in front of his tent.

Digitized by Google

FAR FROM HOME.

Other works are simple, straightforward battle-pictures. One represents General MacArthur and his staff watching the progress of the battle of Caloocan from the top of the queer, blocklike tombs near the church of La Loma.

From this entrenched cemetery, occupied by Colonel Frost and his regiment, the entire fight was plainly visible, and it was probably the most picturesque during the whole insurrection. Strong entrenchments had been constructed over the railroad bed just north of Caloocan, where some artillery was used by the insurgents. The Third United States Artillery, commanded by Major (now General) Kobbe, was seen to move as if in extended order drill, never losing the regularity of its formation or the control of its fire. An eye-witness mentions seeing the meeting of General Kobbe and General (then Major) Bell, who chatted for several minutes under heavy fire, when one of them drew out a cigar, lighted it and smoked with perfect composure.

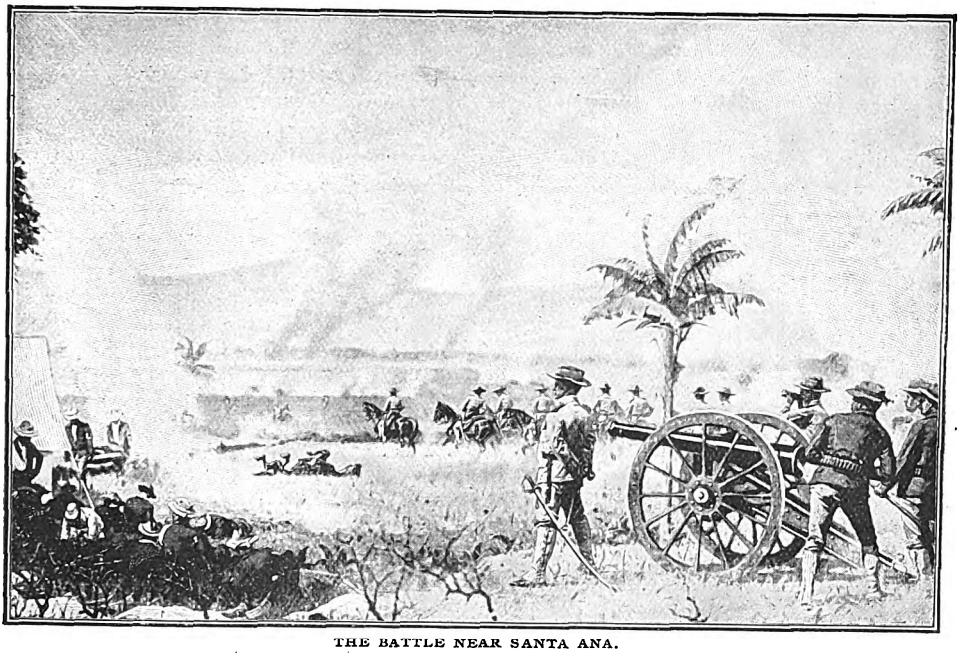
Another battle witnessed and painted by Verestchagin was that of Santa Ana near Manila, in which General Charles King, well known for his novels of army life, was in immediate command of the line in front of Santa Ana. The fight began at daybreak and was stubbornly contested for several hours. In one trench, about fifty yards long, thirty-five dead Filipinos were found. While their entire casualties were never accurately known, from the number that were buried next day it appeared that approximately three hundred were killed and twice as many wounded. Of the Americans, fourteen were killed and about sixty wounded. Whatever may be the Filipino's capabilities for civilization and self-government, there seems no doubt of his courage and fighting power.

The picture of Zapote Bridge shows the mountain artillery, which was worked at the very close range of thirty-five or forty yards, the men at the guns kneeling or lying down. "The thin blue mist off there," Verestchagin explains, "is from what is called smokeless powder. Yes, it is perceptible when much firing is going on, although, of course, not to the same degree as the thick white smoke from the old-fashioned ammunition."

"War," said Sherman, "is hell." And Verestchagin reaffirms the terse utterance with all the power of his brush. While in Chicago, he occupied the pulpit of All Souls' Church and preached a sermon on peace. He is a dramatic speaker, though slightly hampered by his foreign accent, but as the pastor afterward said to him, "Your paintings are your most eloquent plea for peace." These are almost the words of the German Emperor, who said to him in Berlin, "Your pictures are the best preventive of war."

He has had many such tributes. The Emperor Alexander of Russia declared of his painting of the battle of Plevna: "It is all so. That is the way it really looked." General Skobeleff, the dashing cavalry leader, on seeing the picture of his troops after the victory at Scheinovo, embraced the artist in his headlong enthusiasm. When the veracity of Verestchagin's showing of the terrible Balkan roads, strewn with mutilated and frozen men, was questioned, Frank D. Millet, American artist and war-correspondent, came forward and testified that he too had beheld that grisly scene. When his representation of a priest blessing the slain on the battle-field was doubted, witnesses endorsed its truth.

Digitized by Google



THE BATTLE NEAR SANTA ANA.

THE FIGHT AT THE ZAPOTE BRIDGE.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A Perilous Predicament.

By TRAVACE REAY.

THE appearance of the house did not justify my gloomy expectations. It formed a sweet oasis in the industrial desert, for in its grounds was nothing of that desolate decay which marked the surrounding country. They had told me in Sherwell village, that the mansion sheltered the one man who was personally responsible for the black stagnation of the mining industry on Sherwell Moor. Sherwell Hall stood in the midst of Sherwell Moor, and Sherwell Moor was in the midst of the great Northern coalfield.

Yet, Sherwell Moor, though not marked thus on the Ordnance map, formed a distinct change in the geographical features of the district—a ring of desolated solitude within a circle of bustling residents.

The village was nigh deserted, while rows of humble cottages such as miners inhabit, were crumbling away in reproachful disuse; the solitary inn, last survivor of its kind, presented in the unsullied sanding of its stone floors, a silent testimony, if such were needed, of departed custom.

The heapsteads on the Moor, were standing gaunt and weather-worn; the buildings roofless, the waggon-ways grass-grown while, dotted here and there on the country-side, were pieces of machinery rusting away in useless silence.

The banks of slag, and mining refuse, which in thriving localities mark the landscape in huge black and grey patches, as though the earth were suffering from vast scrofulous sores, were here by Dame Nature, being healed with a steady, creeping growth of green verdure.

But not so the house, as I have already said—the lawn well-kept; the borders trimmed; the shrubberies pruned; and the flower-beds gay with the varied colours of bright, and soft-hued bloom. The buildings were in the best of repair, the park orderly, and the boundary walls unbroken.

Still, the man who owned that house and grounds was also owner of the adjacent land, together with the mineral royalties, that rumour said were of incalculable value, which yet, through some unmeaning perversity of disposition he had willed should lie unhandled. I had hoped, during my brief pilgrimage to have had a chance glimpse of this eccentric mortal, who, rather than compromise with his employés in a wage dispute, had been contented to see his men depart in sullen independence.

"I bid you good-day, sir, do you seek for anyone?"

I started in surprise, for the speaker, a grizzle-visaged old gentleman, whose grey eyes shone strangely, and whose shoulders stooped, stood suddenly before me.

With some confusion, I evasively replied: "No, sir, thank you; I was merely admiring your garden from this vantage of the public road."

"Oh! aye; howay inside an' aa'l show ye roond." (The peculiarly-mannered old gentleman had at once adopted that extraordinary mode of conversation which he used throughout our short acquaintance. That mode being the alternating speech of educated English, and the euphonious dialect of the local miners.)

Responding to the invitation, I passed through the entrance gates. My host proved courteous and obliging, extending to me a cordial welcome characteristic of the North Country.

"You evidently take great pride in your grounds, sir," I ventured, as a beginning.

"Yes, young man," he replied, "my garden is my world. What is the strife and turmoil of the great outer world to me? Nothing, nothing. Had owld Adam been a botanist, he would never have fallen. No, sir; because he would have known what he stood to lose." And as he moved on I followed him to the rear of the hall where stood long lines of conservatories. Up to that moment, in the tour through the gardens, I had met no other living being than the owner. However, just as we rounded the gable-end of the dwelling, I heard the soft pit-patting of light feet crossing the courtyard. Looking in the direction from whence the sounds came, I was surprised to see the slight figure of a girl passing toward the house. She was quite young, had a sprightly carriage, and profile showing looks of uncommon prettiness. She turned when she heard footsteps, and half paused in her walk to look at us. A look of wonderment crossed her face as her eyes met mine. Of course I took it for one of rural curiosity, but in all due deference, I must own to a certain pride in my powers of attraction and bowed gracefully. Immediately to my further surprise, she turned on her heels and walked quickly indoors, without any acknowledgment of my gallantry, and as she disappeared I was enabled to note the heightened colour in her cheek, and at once became aware of my rudeness. To add to my chagrin, my conductor observed my behaviour. He was looking suspiciously at me with his keen grey eyes.

Digitized by Google

"Do you know my niece, young man?" he asked.

This was crushing. I sought refuge in dissimulation. "Oh! ah! I—er, that is to say, I rather thought the face to be familiar, but—" He broke in upon my excuses. "I've been expecting you. I knew you would come, sooner or later." He spoke strangely as he strode off to his hot-houses. I followed contritely silent.

He had many botanical curios to show me under those glass-roofs, and dwelt with loving minuteness upon the merits of their peculiar structures. I listened throughout with respectful attention, but I profited little by his discourse. My thoughts were dissipated by the memory of that feminine vision. He had been dilating upon the component parts of a special soil that he had used with remarkable success in his plant culture. At the conclusion, he said gleefully, "Now come with me to my laboratory, where I dissect and analyse all that grows in my grounds. Ay, that's another grand study, is chemistry."

He then led me into one of the outbuildings, which had evidently been formerly used as the home of a manservant, though now, the first room was fitted with benches and shelves, whereon were row after row of bottles and jars, ranged regularly like battalions ready for battle. We passed quickly through into another apartment, his experimenting chamber. This, was a much smaller room, the solitary window being built up, was in total darkness. A strange odour pervaded the place, as though noxious drugs were being evaporated. He had lighted a miner's safety-lamp. "The best kind to use when you are dealing with gases," he said. "Yes, young man, that is another of my enquiries. I am examining the causes and effect of fire-damp. There is a huge quantity stored up in those cylinders there." So he rambled on from one subject to another. At last he turned to me, saying, "Bide here a minute, there's something I want to fetch that will serve to illustrate what I have just been recounting."

He left me, and as he went I heard a sharp, clicking sound as though in passing he had touched one of the great steel cylinders. On the threshold he turned his face toward me again. Heavens! what a terrible shock I received. The look of benevolent kindliness had gone from his countenance, and was replaced by one of demoniacal ferocity. The real reason for the devastation of Sherwell flashed upon me in an instant—it's owner was a madman! Those lustrous grey eyes now glared banefully. "Ye canna deceive me, ye hypocrite," he hissed. "Ye've come to steal ma jewel, and must suffer for your folly."

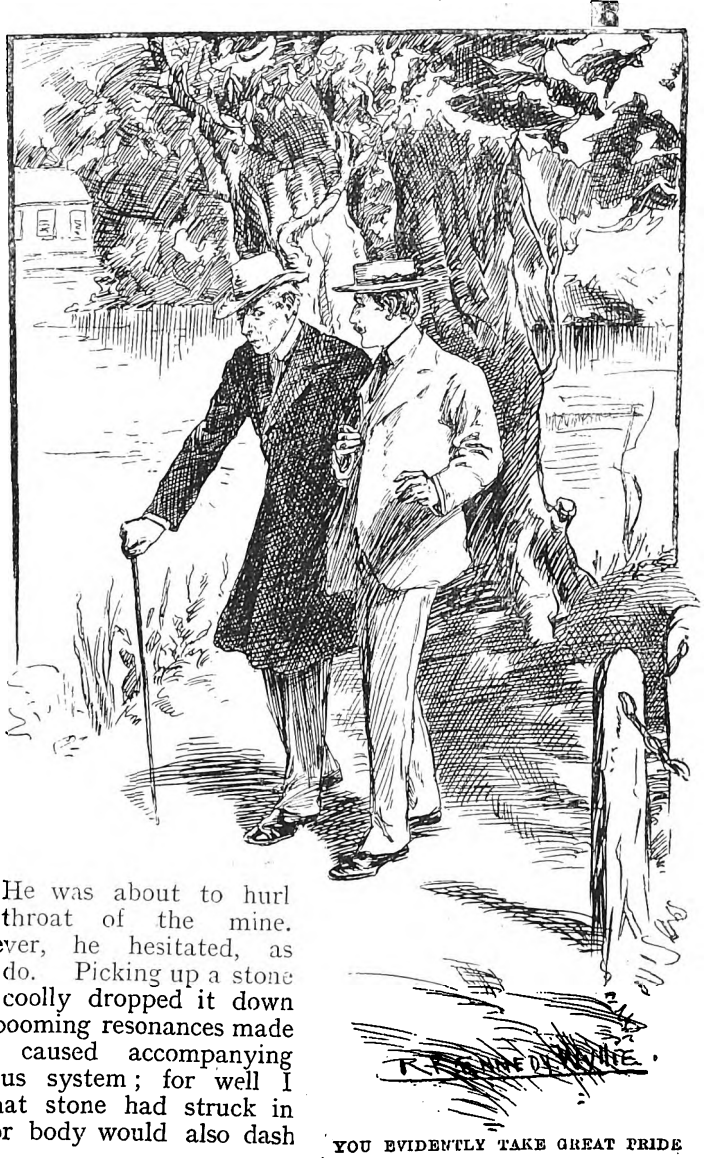
Before I could reach the door, he had slammed and bolted it on the outside. I sprang forward, and beat frantically upon the panels. The chill, cold dread of untimely death froze up my blood. A weird, mocking laugh came from the outer room, followed by a death-like stillness. Immediately afterward, something stung my nostrils, and began catching at my throat, like red-hot talons making sure hold before giving a choking grip. To add to my misery the lamp began flickering, then suddenly died out. In the darkness, the terrible truth became apparent.

Digitized by Google

The homicidal maniac intended suffocating me with his fire-damp.

CHAPTER II.

The first objects which met my sight when my eyes opened, were the star-studded heavens; so, from morning I must have lain unconscious. The time then, could not have been a minute earlier than midnight. A cramped, unnatural feeling possessed my limbs; I found myself bound hand and foot. I tried to shout and found my mouth was gagged. Suddenly from behind came the sound of soft shuffling footsteps, accompanied by the sibilant respirations of a human being labouring under excitement. I felt myself lifted up, and immediately the metallic rumble of a wheel followed—I was being carried away upon a barrow! Weak from the effects of the gas, my submission was passive. From the grounds we passed out on to the moor. We must have travelled fully a mile before the barrow was set down. Stretching my head, I discerned our whereabouts, and my horror was increased by the knowledge, for we were among the buildings and machinery of one of the many pit shafts that abounded on Sherwell Moor. The madman unceremoniously hauled me out of the barrow, and began dragging me under the skeleton-like framing of the heapstead. I realised his intentions. He was about to hurl me down the gaping throat of the mine. Upon the brink, however, he hesitated, as though uncertain what to do. Picking up a stone from the ground, he coolly dropped it down the black chasm. The booming resonances made by the falling missile caused accompanying vibrations in my nervous system; for well I knew, that every spot that stone had struck in its swift descent, my poor body would also dash against in turn, and of how many of these terrible collisions I should be conscious of, before the breath was hurled from my body, I did not dare to think. Again he seized me, this time to drag me up the ladder to a platform above, where hanging over the mouth of the yawning tunnel, was the cage left just as it was when the last human beings ascended from the mine. Certainly, I had not submitted to this handling without some show of resistance. My struggles however, were devoid of any further result than to hamper his movements, and



YOU EVIDENTLY TAKE GREAT PRIDE IN YOUR GROUNDS, SIR.

Digitized by Google

to require him to exert to the utmost that superhuman strength given to the insane. He had my form drawn right to the edge of the platform. Never shall I know what caused the sudden change of impulse in his crazed soul. Nevertheless, it was the cage into which he put me instead of slipping me over the brink; he trailed me inside the vehicle, and left me lying helpless in the muddy draggle into which the morning's rain had transformed the thick layer of dirt and coal-dust on the cage floor. There, my would-be assassin left me for the last time. I heard him descend, one by one, the steps of the ladder from the platform to the ground. Then silence reigned for several minutes, being broken at last by the rap-rapping of a hammer upon a metal substance. Suddenly, with horrid screechings, and weird groanings, as it wore off the corrosions accumulated during its enforced hibernation, the machinery began to move. At first, slowly, then with gathering speed the cage plunged down the shaft. Then, with awe-inspiring suddenness came the thought, was the mine flooded? It must be; all disused workings were filled by the natural percolation of the rainfall. I was to be drowned like a rat in a trap. At last came the plunge; with a velocity which caused my form to rebound upwards the cage descended upon its watery bed. To my brief joy the flood was not high enough to inundate the compartment wherein I lay; brief joy, I say, because the duration was simply momentary, for in the reaction from the strain my senses fled.

CHAPTER III.

Again I recovered; cool water was being applied to my temples, my head was lifted, and a silvery voice was bidding me drink. I thought that my first experience of Paradise was come. Timidly, I raised my eyes to the face which bowed near mine. It was heavenly, no angel could have seemed more radiantly beautiful than that countenance,—the features of the girl I had seen at Sherwell Hall. Impulsively, I threw my arms around her neck, and kissed her passionately on the lips, and not until the act was done, was I aware that my limbs had been freed. I felt no shame, no, for I was mad. "Where am I? Have they saved me? Who are you?" I asked wildly (so she told me afterwards). Soothingly she answered: "You are in the workings of the Sovereign Seam mine. You are not saved yet; nor can you be unless you remain calm. I am the niece of the man who is responsible for your presence here." She then bade me swallow more of the brandy, and to eat a few of the biscuits she had brought. When I had done her bidding she bid me follow her. As though born to the art, with never a falter, she picked her way through the maze of workings. Once, I remember she halted, and tapping the lustrous wall of coal, said: "Note this; there is fortune here. This is only one point in a coal seam unrivalled for excellence throughout the county. Had the derangement not taken place in my poor uncle's reason, they would have been mining this treasure to-day." We walked on again. At another spot she stopped to say cheeringly: "See, there is the drift mouth in front."

My heart leaped with joy for in the distance I espied a circular patch of light. Shortly we passed out into the crisp air of dawn. When I had recovered my self-control, she explained my adventure as follows: "My uncle has become passionately fond of me, and it is constantly preying upon his mind that I have a lover, who, some day will come to take me from his keeping Nothing I can do, or say, disarms this suspicion. This will explain my rudeness at the house." Without heeding the remark she continued: "Lately his expressions of enmity against this phantom lover of mine, have assumed a most vindictive turn. Though I had never witnessed your departure, I was relieved to think that you had proceeded unharmed upon your journey. Some occult power it must have been that drew me from my bed, at dead of night, to the window, where I was just in time to witness my uncle wheeling a burden out of the garden gate. In a terrible state of trepidation, I followed as hastily as possible, and found from his remarks (he was talking to himself aloud) that you were still alive. However, I was not non-plussed, for, during my stay here, he has often amused himself by teaching me mining engineering, and was consequently familiar with the Sovereign Seam workings. Perhaps he had forgotten the drift, but I remembered, and—" We had been walking during this conversation and had reached the cross-paths. As we shook hands, she asked plaintively: "For my sake! oh! please never return."

Digitized by Google

I felt as I gazed at her pleading face, that never had I seen features so bewitchingly beautiful, so brave—in spite of myself

"HE WAS NOT DEAD; BUT DEATH WAS NEAR."

I was impelled to say, "What leave you here with that madman, excuse me saying the truth; but I cannot, no; I must not I—" She interrupted my protest by suddenly clutching my arm. "What! what is that?"

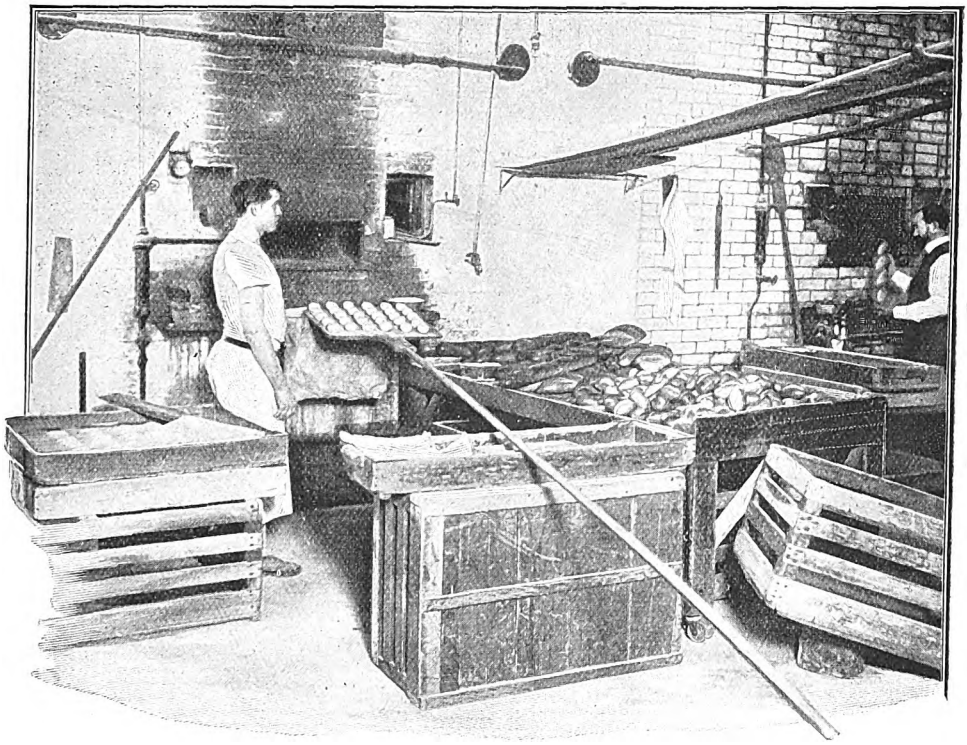
I followed the direction of her trembling finger. A cold shiver passed down my back, when I saw what had arrested her attention. There along the path, between the heapstead and the Hall, stood the barrow in which I had been trundled the night before, and beside it, half crouching, half lying, was the body of a man. We ran to the spot together. It was her uncle. He was not dead; but death was near. The excitement had proved too much for that poor crazy brain,

Little now remains to be told. Twelve months after her uncle's death, which occurred the next day, we were married, and soon after the collieries were re-started, my wife having asked me to assume the management of them. We are now wealthy, but much of her wealth my wife spends in improving her workpeople's lot.

[THE END.

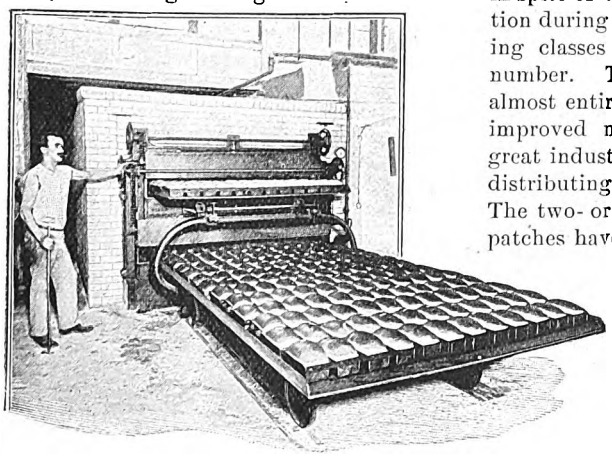
Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



BAKING BUNS AND SMALL LOAVES.

view of abstract ethics; but show them that they are being forced to pay too great a proportion of their earnings for bread or that an influx of cheap labor will make food scarce and reduce their ability to buy, and the problem is brought home to them at once. This practical element ultimately becomes the deciding factor, for it affects every one to a great degree.



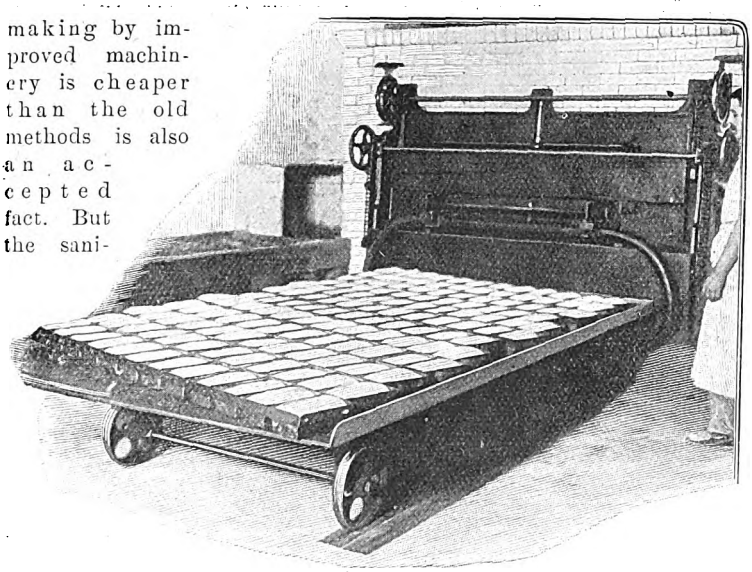
WHEELING OUT TWO HUNDRED LOAVES.

Of all the food-products, the most universal has always been some form of bread, and one of the most interesting phases of the industrial growth of the United States is its assumption of the leadership of the world as a bread-producing country.

This has not been effected through great increase in the agricultural classes. Indeed, in spite of the enormous growth in population during the past twenty years, the farming classes have not materially gained in number. The result has been accomplished almost entirely through the introduction of improved methods in every step in the great industry, from planting the grain to distributing the loaves to the consumer. The two- or three-acre hand-plowed wheat-patches have given place to immense tracts, many of which harvest as much as one hundred and fifty thousand bushels of wheat in a season. I have in mind a wheat-farm in Oklahoma among whose tracts is one almost three miles square, solidly planted in wheat and making by improved machinery is cheaper than the old methods is also an accepted fact. But the sanitary side of the question, though usually less considered, is nevertheless an important one. Even where bread is made in a clean kitchen by hand, a certain amount of dust and foreign matter is sure to get thoroughly mixed with the dough, while the labor of kneading the bread induces perspiration, which also becomes a part of the finished product. But in the basement bakery of the large cities, which is now happily giving place rapidly to model establishments run by machinery, the danger of disease from unsanitary surroundings and contagion from the underpaid workmen from the slums becomes an important factor.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



READY FOR THE OVEN.

These sanitary considerations are being made more and more subjects of serious thought, though such reforms, curiously enough, extend as a rule to only one class of industry at a time. Lately there has been a reaction against the sweatshop system of making clothing, largely through the well-conceived efforts of the labor unions to give publicity to its evil effects. As in all such cases, the immediate result has been to improve the condition of the laborers themselves by employing them in better-ventilated rooms at fairer wages and under closer scrutiny of the public officials, but the lessened danger from disease which might be contracted by the purchaser of the garments in question is also an important matter.

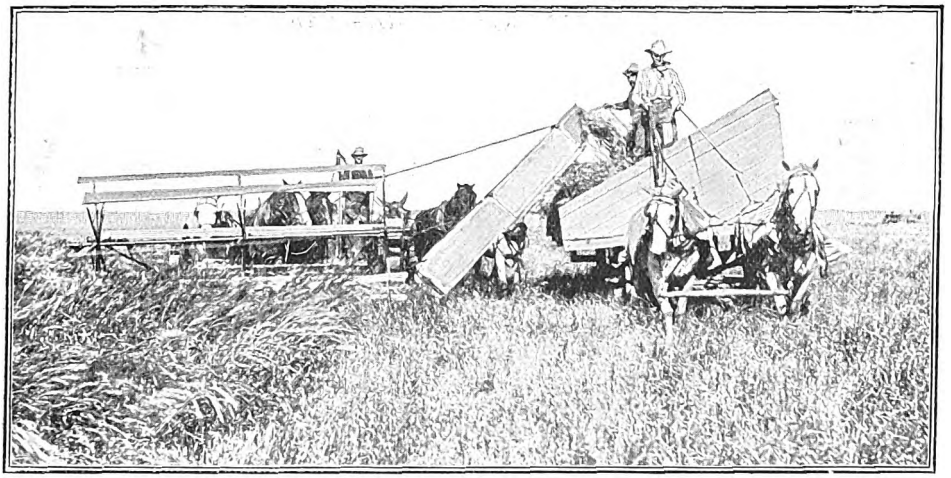
In the baking business improved machinery seems to have done much toward accomplishing a result along the same lines.

In the little cellar bakeries which one still finds under dingy shops or crowded lodging-houses, the worker's hours are dependent mainly on the will of his employer, and where sales are large, labor drags on well into the night.

THE STOREROOM.

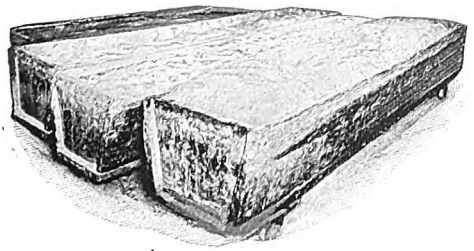
Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



PART OF A PROCESSION OF REAPERS.

flour is passed on by a system of automatic conveyers to bins on an upper floor. Under the bins, dough-mixing machines—great iron vessels containing a double spiral dasher, or mixer—are situated. Into each one of these mixers are put sixty gallons of water and milk already mixed, eight hundred and forty pounds of flour, fifteen pounds of salt and the necessary amount of yeast. The power drives the paddles, and these machines accomplish their task not only more thoroughly than human hands but much more rapidly. Two men working incessantly for almost an hour would find it difficult to equal the work done by one of the machines in twenty minutes. When the dough is thoroughly mixed, the power is shut off and the mixing-trough turned over. Its contents are cut from the mixers and collected in long troughs on wheels. The "sponge," as the dough in this condition is technically called, is then rolled to a room of the temperature of about eighty to ninety degrees, where it is allowed to ferment, or "raise," for two hours and a half. After fermenting, the dough is dropped through chutes into a molding- and oven-room, where it is made into loaves of about forty different shapes and sizes. Oddly enough, no adequate machines have ever been invented to take the place of the hands for the purpose of shaping the loaves accurately, and there is room for a practical labor-saving invention of this kind.



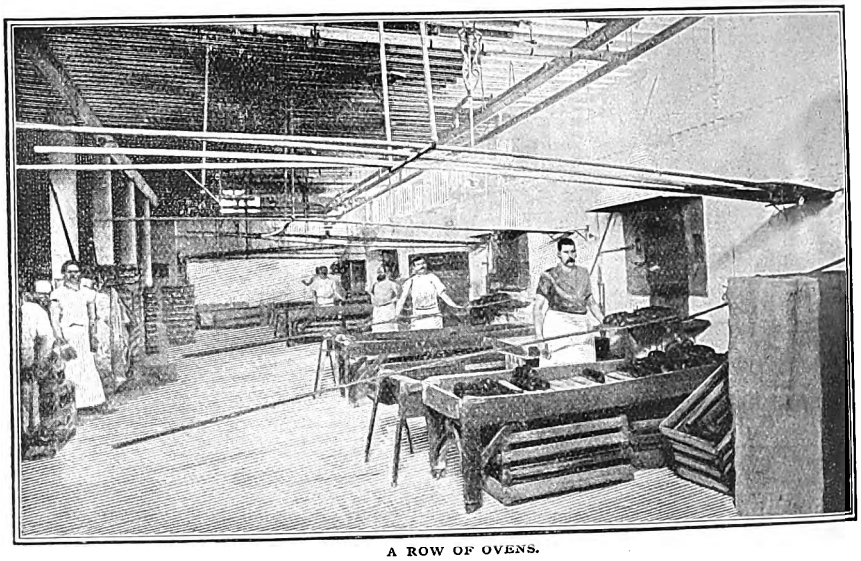
WHILE THE YEAST IS FERMENTING.

The rye-bread dough passes down by one way, the wheat-bread dough by another. The rye-bread dough is carried to a table in the mixing-room, cut into pieces of a certain weight, dropped into a machine called a "break," and then passed down into the molding- and baking-room by way of a chute to be molded and baked. The "break" consists merely of a pair of rollers placed side by side, and serves the purpose of squeezing the air out of the dough.

The wheat-bread dough, on the other hand, is subjected to no squeezing, but is conveyed directly by a chute to a table, to be cut up and distributed among the men who are to work it into its proper shape. After having been molded into loaves, the dough is allowed to rise in a steam-box for one-half of an hour.

Once shaped and weighed, the loaves are wheeled on iron trays into the many ovens which are built in a long row into the wall of the baking-room. During the process of baking, which lasts from one-half to three-quarters of an hour according to the size of the loaf, the loaves are carefully watched. The interiors of the ovens are so lighted by gas as to make close observation at all times possible. Where special kinds of bread, or small buns or loaves, are to be made, a long-handled shovel takes the place of the iron tray and the time of baking is much shorter.

Digitized by Google



A ROW OF OVENS.

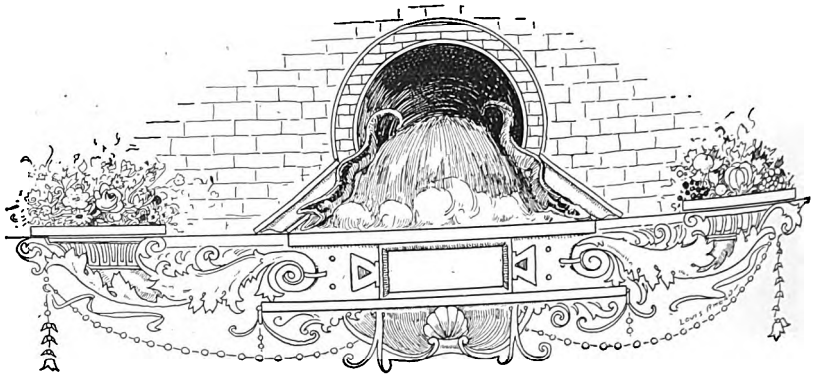
After being baked, the loaves are collected from the various ovens, separated according to size and shape, and sent to the shipping-room, from which they are to be distributed to the retail stores, whose orders are sometimes filled at several different times each day in order to keep the supply always fresh. At many a country store bread which has been kept from four days to a week is still considered "fresh bread" and sold as such, but it is the custom of most of the large bakeries of the cities to sell at a reduced rate as "stale bread" whatever loaves are left over at the close of each day's sales. Long rows of children, some only five or six years old, wait at the side-doors of the shops to avail themselves of the cheaper prices. In these cases the bakeries aim only to recover the actual cost of the loaf, but a recent development of many bakeries goes a step farther. A free list is no unusual thing with a circulating library, but one is a little surprised to find that some public hospitals in New York and other cities are supplied by bakeries, to the extent of a thousand loaves a day, without charge.

Many of the largest modern bakeries average about forty-three thousand loaves of bread and fifteen thousand rolls a day, while some few exceed this, and new machinery is constantly adding to their capacity.



Digitized by Google

The Needle's Eye

by

FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

The story opens with the discovery of a dead woman, by Farmer Erastus Winch, in his barn. His wife finds a baby there also, and insists, much against his will, on adopting it, as she has never had a child of her own. Before the burial of the woman a stranger appears in the neighbourhood, and out of curiosity asks to see the coffin, and pays the undertaker handsomely to let it be a good one. On the burial of its mother the child is adopted by 'Liz'beth Winch and called 'Manuel, from the Bible-name "Immanuel." The child grows up, and as soon as he is any age worth speaking of the farmer ruthlessly sets the child at work. He is treated in a heartrending way for a long time by the farmer, and idolised by his wife. Immanuel betrays a great desire to find out who is his father, and with child-like simplicity absorbs the idea that God is his Father, and wanders off to find Him. In his rambles he meets a little girl named Hilda, who takes him home to her granny, but during a pause in their conversation he runs away again. Arriving at the homestead of "Ol' Mose" Armitage, 'Manuel thinks he has at last found his "Father," and is taken in and cared for by "Ol' Mose," a man who has lived alone for many years. During the stay of 'Manuel, Old Moses fancies he discovers a trace that leads him to believe that 'Manuel is heir to considerable wealth, and he is bringing him back, bent on an errand of investigation, when the last chapter closes.

CHAPTER XI.—(continued.)

IT had rained in the valley for more than a week. The heavy mid-summer vegetation drooped earthward, rank and dark. Grain mildewed in the sodden fields; in closets and cellars livid fungus started out on the dark walls; sharp, penetrating odours of damp and mould crept from closed parlours and "spare" bedrooms. Under the dense masses of drifting vapours people sickened here and there.

"It is an unusually unhealthy season," declared Mr. Eliphalet Dundor, and he became proportionately cheerful, while the discouraged farmers grumbled, and their overworked wives took to their beds with neuralgia, lumbago, and what not, according to their varied constitutions and predilections. The village doctor, wiser than he knew, went about administering his favourite nostrums impartially.

Mr. Dundor and Dr. Wirt, labouring thus amicably in their several callings for the weal of the community, paused in the muddy road one wet morning for a social interchange of news. Dr. Wirt opined sagely that if the weather did not clear, he would shortly have the bulk of the community on his hands for treatment. Mr. Dundor inquired, with pro essional propriety, if any o: the cases were likely to prove atal; and expressed profound regret when informed that Mrs. Winch was not likely to live.

Digitized by Google

with his whip-handle. "I suppose it was losing that boy. Queer thing, wasn't it?"

"Mighty queer," agreed the doctor, gathering up his reins. "Physic don't touch the case. Good day, sir."

"Hold on a minute, doctor," cried the undertaker excitedly. "Say, ain't that the boy now in the waggon a-coming along? I didn't know the man, though."

The doctor leaned out of his buggy, and

"I WILL BE PERFECTLY FRANK WITH YOU."

"It ain't altogether the dampness that has affected her," quoth the doctor with a frown. "Neuralgia I can cure; and a weak stomach I can strengthen; but when it comes to a patient fretting herself to death—why, it ain't in my books."—

"'Course it ain't," acquiesced Mr. Dundor complacently, as he leaned forward to dislodge an over-greedy horsefly stared over the top of his spectacles at the approaching vehicle. Then, as he turned out to make room in the narrow road, he cried, "How do, Mr. Armitage? Hold on a minute, will you, and tell me how you came by that boy. I need him for one of my patients to-day more than pills."

Moses Armitage pulled up sharply.

"Do you know him,?" he asked.

Digitized by Google

"Why, yes, I know him," said the doctor dryly. "He belongs to a family named Winch over on the river-road. You'd better take him home, I guess. His mother ain't likely to live through the day."

Moses Armitage's ruddy face became blanched to a curious dusky pallor. "He was lost," he said briefly. "He came to my house."

"I guess the child is a kind of a tramp, same as his mother," put in Mr. Dundor with a wink. "She took to the road when she'd been better off at home, and died in Winch's barn. Ain't you never heard the story, stranger? Most of the folks in these parts knew about it at the time."

Moses Armitage glanced at the child. His face was pinched with fear; his eyes brimmed over.

"I want to see munny," he whispered.

"To get to the Winch's," volunteered the doctor, "you want to turn around and go back about a quarter of a mile; take your first left, then follow the river-road for about a mile-and-a-half. The boy will know the place."

A rasping scrape of wheels, a spatter of mud and the quick plunge of hoofs acknowledged these kindly directions.

"Why didn't you tell me your name, my boy?" asked Moses Armitage, looking down at the little figure at his side. "I would have taken you home long ago, if I had known."

The child nestled closer to the broad shoulder. "I wanted you," he said tremulously. There was a long silence, filled with the monotonous slush, slush of the mare's feet in the liquid mud.

"Munny lives there," said the boy at last, in a subdued voice. He ran eagerly to the gate when the man lifted him down then stopped and turned with a scared face. "I see him," he whispered; "he's in the porch. Won't you come?"

"I'm coming, boy, when I have hitched Nelly," said Moses Armitage. His face wore a curious expression as he sharply glanced at the slouching figure clad in blue jeans, which leaned against the house under the shelter of the narrow porch. Moses Armitage accosted this passive figure with stereotyped greetings. "I have just learned," he added, "that this child who wandered to my door some weeks ago belongs to you."

A wicked light leaped up in the dull eyes. "Then you heard what ain't so," was the response in a savage gutteral.

"Isn't your name Winch, sir?" asked Moses Armitage. "I met a couple of men near the village who directed me to this house; they told me——"

"Oh, yes, I presume so," sneered the other. "My name's Winch; but I don't lay no claim to that boy. My wife, 'Lizbeth, she is a-dying in there," he continued, his voice breaking in a husky quaver. "My wife—Liz'beth—and all along of that beggar brat! You can take him away!"

"That is what I wish to do; but your wife—she is ill, you say. You will allow the child to see her, of course. I am not aware of the circumstances, but——"—Neither of the men had paid much heed to the child, who, during this short parley had crept nearer and nearer to the door. "I want munny!" he cried shrilly, and on a sudden flung the door wide open and darted in.

A great broken cry answered the words, and Moses Armitage, who had unhesitatingly followed, beheld a piteous sight. The cold grey light of the weeping day fell full upon the greyer face of a woman who clasped the child in close embrace.

"Oh, Manuel—Manuel!" she murmured. "Manuel—Manuel—Manuel!"

"I've come back, Munny!" cried the child, joyously. "I was looking for my father, and I found him!"

The woman had fallen back exhausted upon her pillow; but she fixed her glazing eyes upon the man who stood with bared head at her bed-side. "Yes—yes!" she said eagerly, as if answering some question. "I know him! I knowed him in a minute! I'm mighty glad! The book—he'd ought to——"

A stout woman in a sun-bonnet bustled in from the kitchen. "I wouldn't have gone even for a minute if I'd suspicioned she'd go off into another of her spells! Here, Mrs. Winch, take this." She slipped her arm under the sick woman's pillow, and held a teaspoon to the blue lips.

The grey head moved feebly from side to side. "Manuel," gasped the faint voice, "give him—the—book!"

The stout woman presently faced about and straightened herself with an air of professional authority. "I guess you'd better all go out now," she said crisply.

Digitized by Google

"'Taint any more than I expected all along; but I'm real sorry the minister wasn't here."

Erastus Winch started forward; his haggard eyes asked the question which his tongue refused to utter.

"Yes, she's gone," said the woman, raising her apron to her face. "Slipped away just like a shadow, to a better land, I trust." She glanced curiously at Moses Armitage. "I suppose, maybe, you are a relation," she began uncertainly. "If you could notify the—— Land of love! if it ain't that boy! I declare you ought to be ashamed of yourself! But this ain't no time to speak. I guess you'd better take him away afore he——" The last words were uttered in a sibilant whisper, which seemed to penetrate the ears of the man who leaned against the wall staring unwinkingly at the quiet face on the pillow. "She's dead—'Liz'beth is—dead! 'Liz-'beth's dead!" He uttered these words in a dull monotone. Then he straightened his limp shoulders with a jerk. "Give me the boy," he said thickly; "he has done it! 'Twas him she was calling for, and he never come till it was too late." His terrible eyes seemed to devour the shrinking little figure; his great hands reached for it, where it cowered beside the dead woman.

Moses Armitage seized the boy in his arms. "Stop!" he cried. "You are crazed with grief, man! You don't know what you are saying." He turned and strode out of the house, the child struggling violently in his embrace. "I want munny," wailed the little voice; "I want to see my munny!"

The great Mr. Smalley himself responded in person to the urgent telegram sent by Moses Armitage on the day following Elizabeth's death. He complimented Mr. Armitage on his discoveries, but shook his head over certain deductions which he had unhesitatingly drawn therefrom. "The evidence certainly points to the desired conclusion," he said. "This Bible, now, which you tell me was found on the premises of the man Winch, undoubtedly contains the autograph of Manuel Rossi, with the probable date of his birth. This is very strong documentary evidence, but we must establish the fact that it was found on the person of the deceased. This I will endeavour to do in my interview with the man Winch."

The man Winch, when cross-examined by the lawyer on the day of his wife's funeral, proved to be an unsatisfactory witness. "I found a dead woman and a live young boy in my haymow seven years ago come January," he said. "Now you know as much about it as I do."

"Did you find this—ah—book, on or near the deceased?" asked Mr. Smalley, producing the russet-bound Bible with dramatic suddenness.

Winch fixed his frowning eyes on the book. "I told you what I found," he said, shortly.

"Very good, but did any other person, say your wife, find this book on or near the deceased?"

"Who told you to come here and talk to me about my wife?" demanded Winch, lowering his shaggy head. "You can go; that's what you can do! I ain't got no more to say."

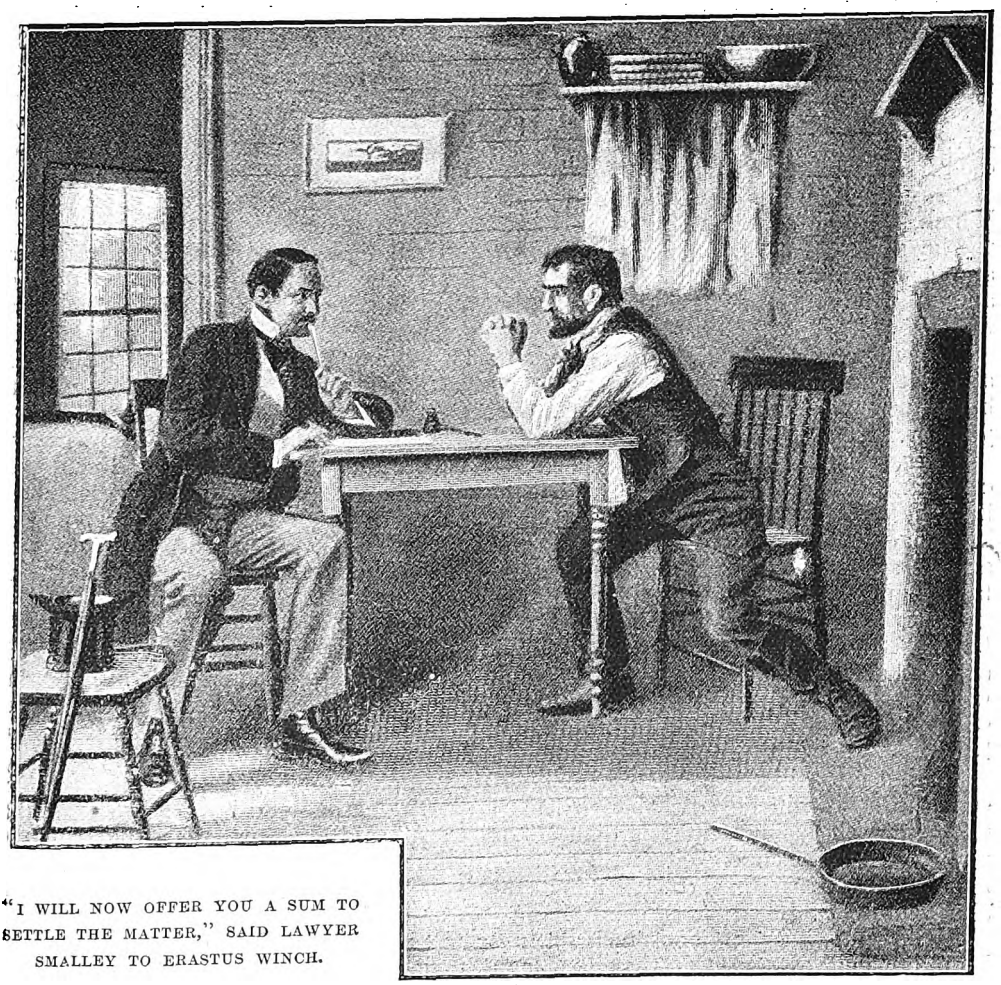
Mr. Smalley narrowed his lids cunningly. "My good man," he said, with an agreeable smile, "I will be perfectly frank with you, and tell you that, if we succeed in establishing the claims of this child, there will be considerable—yes, I may say so—a very considerable property coming to him. Now you maintained this—ah—young person at your own expense for some six years or more, did you not?"

"I didn't do nothing for him," began Winch; "'Liz'beth, she was always a-fussing. I didn't care a straw for——" He stopped short, his eyes fastened upon the lawyer with a look which the late Elizabeth would have recognised. "Why, yes," he said, with a rasping cough; "I did. so to say, support the boy for a matter of nigh on to seven year. He certainly was no expense to the town."

"In that case, if we prove the boy's identity," pursued Mr. Smalley, still smiling blandly, "reimbursement would undoubtedly be made. In fact——" he paused, and produced his pocket-book, which he opened with extreme nicety of movement. "Mr. Armitage requested me to give you at once a small token of his appreciation of your—ah—kind paternal care of the child. Mr. Armitage, you understand, wishes in any case to adopt the child legally."

"Well, I don't know about that," said Winch, his hand closing upon the bank note which the other tendered. "Being as the boy was born on my premises, and seeing that I took care of him at considerable expense for nigh on to seven year, I guess I'll hold on to him myself, if there's any property in the case. I can look after him as I have done."

Digitized by Google



"I WILL NOW OFFER YOU A SUM TO SETTLE THE MATTER," SAID LAWYER SMALLEY TO ERASTUS WINCH.

"Quite natural, I'm sure, that you should wish to do so," said Mr. Smalley, genially, "but you must understand, my dear sir, that it will be necessary to establish the identity of the child before his claim on the—ah—competence in question will be valid. Now this book—this—ah—Bible which I have shown you—cuts a very considerable figure in the evidence. It contains a name and date which would go far toward settling the matter, if we can establish the fact that it was taken from the body of the woman. Do you understand?"

Winch reached out for the book, which he opened and surveyed with frowning eyes. "I didn't see no book out in the barn," he said at last. "And if 'Liz'beth found it, she didn't say nothing. I've seen her though, come to think, of a Sunday afternoon on the back steps, a-reading to the boy out of a book like this. I didn't take no notice. Where did you get it?"

"The woman who cared for your wife, and who laid her out after death, found it under Mrs. Winch's pillow," replied Mr. Smalley succinctly. "Remembering the singular last words which your wife uttered, she conceived it her duty to give the book to the child. She did this, and quite naturally it found its way into my hands."

"I'll have the law on Mirandy Sproul for that," growled Winch. "She can't collect no pay for services after that.

Digitized by Google

What did the woman mean by taking property out of my house?"

"We shall—ahem—consider it a very fortunate circumstance if by means of it we establish the child's identity," said Mr. Smalley. "The question is, "How did Mrs. Winch come by the book?"

"It's as plain as a pike-staff," said Winch, with a contemptuous glance at the lawyer. "I never had no such book, and she didn't; that I know. And—and—she did say something about a book the last thing."

"Then you are prepared to make an affidavit that this book was not in your house prior to finding the deceased on your premises?"

"Yes, I be. I'll take my Bible oath on to it. But say, I want the boy fetched back here to my house right off. Here I have had the whole expense of his keep, and he ain't never been no use to me so far. I guess he can earn his board all right from now on, if there ain't nobody to interfere." The man swallowed hard and glanced around the disordered kitchen, where he had chosen to receive his visitor, with a curious mingling of emotions on his hard face.

"Oh, as to that," said Mr. Smalley, smoothly, "it will be advisable to leave the boy with his present guardian. To put it plainly, the child is either the grand-nephew of Mr. Armitage, or he is nameless and penniless. In either case Mr. Armitage will reimburse you handsomely for his keep, but only on condition that he is left in undisturbed possession of the child's person. Of course, I understand that it will be doubly painful for you to part with the boy in your—ah—present bereaved condition. I can assure you that due allowance will be made for all the facts."

"Well, I should think it would be worth as much as fifty dollars extra—the parting with him, I mean," said Winch, slowly rubbing his hands together. "And what is more—there's something else. Say, this whole thing has cut into me in a mighty expensive way. Any of the neighbours will tell you that my wife—'Liz'beth——" He stopped short, the words seeming actually to choke him. He went on with a visible effort: "Well, to put it straight to you, the boy run away. My wife, 'Liz'beth, she wasn't never the same after that. We looked for the boy. I went myself, and took my team when I ought to have been harvesting. I may say I lost on to fifty dollars right there, for it took to raining the very next day, and the whole crop mildewed. There's a matter of a hundred dollars you see. And then, my wife, when we come home, was all broken up; and she took to her bed. She—she never got up; and here I be deprived of her services, and funeral expenses to pay. It kinder seems to me as though I could collect damages to a considerable figure. I've been thinking of suing the man. What business has he a-keeping the boy, I'd like to know?"

"I should not advise a law-suit, my dear sir," said Mr. Smalley, dryly. "In point of fact, you have no case whatever. But as I have already assured you, every possible allowance will be made. I will—ah—just note down the items you have mentioned." He produced a fountain pen and a memorandum book from his pocket.

"Parting with child, fifty dollars I believe you said?"

"Better make it an even hundred," said Winch, with glistening eyes; "that boy's valuable property; he'd be worth ——Say, I have a right to his services till he's of age, the way I figure it; I'd ought by rights——"—"It is altogether improbable that you have any rights whatever," said Mr. Smalley; "but I will say a hundred dollars for the first item. Then you mentioned something else; grain, was it?"

"Hold on, there's another thing; five dollars for use of team and services of self a-looking for him," said Winch; "and that's dirt cheap too. I wouldn't put in another day like it for—— You might as well put in dinner for two, and feed. Call it seven dollars in all."

"Very good, and——"

"Seventy-five dollars for my oats. And that ain't enough, neither. Oats has gone up to fifty cents. If you want to be common honest, you will call it a hundred."

Mr. Smalley's pen wrote busily.

"Funeral expenses and doctor's bills will foot up pretty steep," said Winch, pulling at his tuft of grey whiskers. "I should think——"

"Five hundred dollars, say?" suggested the lawyer.

"Well, I guess that will cover it," growled the other, his eyes bulging. "Say!" he burst out, "you ain't making a fool of me, are you? I ain't the kind to be played with, I can let you know; no, sir-ee, not by a jugful! I'll have the law on you if you try that—in my bereaved condition."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Smalley looked up in some astonishment. "My dear sir," with awful dignity, "you forget yourself! But of course, that is only natural under the circumstances. The other items, the loss of your—ah—late wife's services, I believe you put it? And compensation for the child's maintenance for seven years, you may safely leave to Mr. Armitage's generosity."

"No, you don't neither; we'll settle now, and you can fork over the cash," cried Winch, bringing down his huge fist on the table with a sounding crash. "It would be like that Armitage fellow to make his sneaks without giving me a cent."

Mr. Smalley raised his eyebrows with an inscrutable smile. "Very well," he said dryly. "We will finish the matter now. And you will then sign a paper releasing Mr. Armitage and Manuel Rossi, his heirs and assigns, from any further claim. I may say, indeed, that you have no legal rights in the matter whatever, but it is Mr. Armitage's express wish that you shall be treated with—ah—due consideration and fairness."

"He'd better," growled Winch, expectorating fiercely; "money ain't a-going to pay for some things that I have lost along of this boy. It comes down to a little question of how much a man's wife is worth to him, don't it?"

"You must bear in mind the fact that Mr. Armitage did not abduct the child," said Mr. Smalley, coolly. "In point of fact——" The lawyer hesitated for a moment, then he proceeded to lay certain well-known facts concerning Erastus Winch's life and character before that individual in a manner which caused great drops of sweat to start on his narrow forehead.

"Who told you all that?" demanded the farmer. "Say, who said I was like that?"

"That is neither here nor there," said Mr. Smalley, pleasantly; "but you cannot disprove what I have said. I will now offer you a sum to settle the matter. You can accept or not, as you like; but you will remember that, beyond a moderate amount for the child's maintenance, you have no claim whatever."

Something like twenty minutes later, the lawyer left the house with a satisfied expression on his lean face. On that same day he held a conversation of exceeding interest with Mr. Eliphalet Dundor. That worthy individual was pretty equally divided between a fatuous pride over the circumstance of being closeted with the mysterious stranger, upon whose movements the undivided attention of the village was concentrated, and certain long-buried qualms of conscience which had of late showed an unpleasant vitality. After half-an-hour of rigid cross-exam nation, conducted in Mr. Smalley's most skilful manner, Mr. Dundor suddenly volunteered the information that a strange gentleman had called to view the dead woman the evening before her burial. The words were scarcely out of his mouth before he mentally blamed himself for having uttered them. He had a curious sense of being held like a sponge in a relentless grasp, and of exuding facts under the pressure. He moistened the dry lips and resolved to tell as little as possible. The undertaker's mention of the mysterious man who paid for the tramp's funeral, caused Mr. Smalley to prick up his ears.

"Describe this person carefully, if you please," said Mr. Smalley, narrowing his lips to a mere slit. "Was he, for example, a tall man, and young? say about five-and-twenty?"

"No, sir," said Mr. Dundor, glibly; "he was short—quite short; no taller than yourself, sir. Of a spare habit, smooth face, black eyes, and a hooked nose. He was, I should say, fifty years of age if he was a day. Yes, sir; I remember him very well."

"Did this person betray any mark of interest in the deceased?" demanded Mr. Smalley, leaning forward and concentrating his penetrating eyes full upon Mr. Dundor's perturbed countenance. That individual wiped his damp forehead with a large, black-bordered handkerchief. "Well,—er—he——"—"Think carefully," snapped Mr. Smalley, "and give us all the facts."

"Well, yes," stammered the other, "I —I may say that he did. I was engaged in setting up a-a casket for the burial. The remains was, you understand, to be buried by the town; in the usual manner, you understand. Nothing stylish nor elegant about a pauper's coffin, and mighty little profit to the trade. Why, I have conducted the county funerals in this district for——"

Digitized by Google

"Never mind that," interrupted the lawyer, frowning. "This person said what—just what, if you please?"

"Well, I don't know as I can recall the exact words," said Mr. Dundor, rolling

"VERY GOOD," SAID MR. SMALLEY, EXAMINING THE HANDKERCHIEF, "I WILL RETAIN THIS BIT OF EVIDENCE."

up his eyes to the ceiling with a candid air; "the gentleman gave me to understand that he was willing to defray the funeral expenses, if I would keep the matter private. I couldn't see no real objection to what he proposed, so I consented, and he paid me right down for a first-class article. I had a line of extra fine sample goods ready set up, as it happened, so I—I——"

"You buried the woman, and kept the matter quiet, as the gentleman desired," said Lawyer Smalley, quickly, to Dundor, the undertaker, in his cross-examination concerning the mysterious stranger who had ordered a superior coffin for the dead woman found in Winch's barn. "Very good; very good indeed. Now," he paused, and again fixed the undertaker with his ferret eyes, "did the gentleman give you or leave behind him any trace of his identity? His card, say, or——"—"I had almost forgotten the circumstance," whispered Mr. Dundor, "but I recall now that the gentleman dropped his handkerchief. He pulled it out along with——"

"Was there a name on it?"

"Yes, sir, I believe there was. I——"

"Have you the article in question in your possession?"

Mr. Dundor heaved a long sigh of relief. "I see what you're trying to get at," he said, recovering something of his air of professional authority. "As coroner of this district and undertaker, I have found that a close mouth often makes a fat pocket—eh?"

"You'll lose nothing by this," said the lawyer, tersely. "Produce the article, if you please."

Mr. Dundor tip-toed across the room, where he rummaged a long time among piles of rustling papers in his desk. "I'm a close man," he murmured, as he peered at the lawyer over the upraised lid, "close and cautious when it comes to dealings with the bereaved." He shut the desk, locked it with deliberation, and displayed a small packet.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Smalley tore it open with some impatience, and glanced at the name embroidered in one corner of the square of white cambric. "Very good," he said non-committally. "I will, if you please, retain this bit of—ah—evidence."

Somewhat later in the day, Mr. Smalley summed up the interesting data he had secured for the benefit of Moses Armitage. "Of course, the evidence is purely circumstantial," he concluded; "and were you disposed to press your claims against those of the child, I have no doubt you would win your suit. But I may say that personally I have no doubt regarding the identity of the child. This handkerchief now, bearing the name of Joseph Armitage, would seem to point to the fact that my late lamented client, actuated by a very commendable paternal interest in the deceased, visited this place and provided for the disposition of the remains in a manner suited to his station in life. Very charitable, it seems to me, considering the relations which had existed between—"

"Disgusting!" roared Moses Armitage, his ruddy face growing ruddier with honest wrath. "He had murdered her!"

Mr. Smalley glanced disapprovingly at the burly figure of his client. "You are, of course, entitled to your own opinion on that point," he said suavely. "Now, if you choose to acknowledge this child as your brother's grandchild, it will be necessary to take the usual legal steps in the matter, after which you will assume your duties as his guardian. I trust you will be guided by—er—prudence in the training of this young person. He will one day hold great power in his hands. In point of fact, we may say that money is the chief power in the world to-day; a proper understanding of this, and—er—"

By Moses Armitage, who had experienced the disastrous effects of the undue value placed on money, the lawyer's words were unheeded. He thought of how much unhappiness it had caused in his own family. He knew that love, based on the teaching of Jesus Christ, was the one thing of supreme importance in the world. The lawyer left his sentence trailing in mid-air, he was not in the habit of wasting his valuable advice on unheeding ears.

The next day the idlers at the village station witnessed the departure of three persons on the morning train. They were Old Moses Armitage, from the back hill road, the mysterious Mr. Caleb Smalley, and a small boy with a white, scared face and big brown eyes. The train had scarcely pulled out from the station, when a ramshackle vehicle drew up.

"How do you do, Mr. Winch," drawled the station-master, from his easy position on a pile of boxes. "You seem to be in considerable of a hurry this morning. You weren't calculating to take the train, was you?" He pointed his thumb over his shoulder in the direction of the vanishing trail of smoke, then burst into a discordant "haw-haw!" at the sight of the discomfited look which crept over the man's face.

"Did they get off?" demanded Winch.

"Depends on who you are talking about," responded the man in authority, genially. "Mr. Armitage left us this morning, likewise the gentleman that has been stopping with our hospitable friend Sniders, and the boy. It wasn't them you was wanting to see, was it?"—for the other was biting his nails and scowling. "I heard you got paid handsome for your well-known kindness to the boy. What luck some folks do have!"

"It ain't all I'm going to have, not by a long shot!" snapped Winch. "'Tain't a patch on what I'd ought to have got. I was intending to hold the boy for a spell till they come to their senses and give me my rights. And now they've gone!"

"They got the dead wood on you this time, sure," chuckled the station-master. "We shan't see them back in these parts for a spell, neither. You're tolerable cute and knowing, Rastus, but you can't saw wood alongside that little pollywog of a lawyer!"

The gentlemen of leisure assembled on the platform burst into appreciative guffaws. In the midst of their merriment, Erastus Winch turned sharply around and drove toward his desolate home. Greed and grief fought together in his empty soul; one instant he wondered dully how he should live without Elizabeth; the next he regretted poignantly that he had not grasped more from the Fortunatus purse so lately held out to him.

"I'll get even with that boy yet—for—for losing her," he muttered, bringing down his lash with savage emphasis on the lean back of his horse. "I'll get even with the little skunk, if I have to wait for fifty years to do it."

Digitized by Google

* * * * * *

THE OPINIONS OF "A CRANK."

In a confidential conversation with his partner, Mr. Smalley exploited his opinion of the firm's new client. It was by no means a flattering one. "Armitage is an out-and-out crank," he concluded forcibly, "unbalanced, full of foolish sentiment; in short, impracticable and altogether unfitted for the suitable guidance of the heir."

The immediate cause of Mr. Smalley's irritation was a conversation just concluded in his private office, where Mr. Armitage had listened with commendable patience to a long homily on the responsibilities of his position, as delivered by the sapient lawyer. "Let the boy understand his power from an early age," said Mr. Smalley; "instruct him in the rise and fall of stocks and securities; teach him caution and conservatism; educate him liberally—of course, a first-class private school to begin with; finish him abroad, perhaps. In short, make of him an all-round man of the world. You can count on us, sir, for advice and assistance in all questions pertaining to these matters.'

"It is my wish," said Moses Armitage, tranquilly, "that the child shall know nothing of the money till he reaches his majority."

"What!" exclaimed the lawyer. "You don't mean to cut the boy off from the anticipation of his good fortune, I trust. That would be a great mistake, my dear sir. The idea of possession is very educative, very educative indeed, sir. Why, I could show you examples of that right in this city, young boys who are being trained for great positions of trust; they understand their powers, and, so to speak, obtain a grasp upon them which is more desirable than I can well explain to you."

"That is just what I wish," said the other slowly. "I wish the lad to grasp the idea of his power—to help others. But he must first learn the world's need, and find the love for humanity in himself."

Mr. Smalley shook his head and pursed up his lips. "That is all very well in its place," he said. "Most people can get rid of money easily enough. To wisely conserve it, to increase it, is the difficult thing, which I trust——"—

"I shall teach him to get rid of it as quickly as possible," said Moses Armitage, with heat. "That money is the price of blood, of honour, of life!" With that he rose abruptly and terminated the conversation.

Could Messrs. Trent and Smalley have seen the guardian of the Armitage millions buried in the study of a certain ancient inspired Book, in search of light on his future course, they would doubtless have been further affronted by the spectacle.

"There once lived a Being," said Moses Armitage to himself, "who knew so well the value of life, that all power, both in heaven and on earth, was committed to His hands." He resolved to conform his training of the child as nearly as possible to that which was given to that consummation of the centuries, Jesus, the Christ. With this idea in mind, he studied his New Testament with a serious attention, greater, if possible, than that which he had before bestowed upon it.

He derived from this study certain ideas which seemed to him applicable to the case in hand. The boy Jesus lived for the most part in the country. He was environed by human love and the beauties of natural scenery. He was obedient, subject to human authority. He was never idle, but laboured in the tranquil Oriental fashion, so that neither hurry nor worry entered into His unfolding life. He had time to think; and He thought deeply, even in His earliest years, about Divine things. He early learned to know God, whom to know is Life Eternal. His divinity permeated His mortal frame, and from out of the abundance of that life He was able to minister to suffering humanity in strange and unlooked-for ways. And when death overcame Him, "it was not possible that He should be holden of it."

The ideal which slowly took shape and substance to itself in the mind of this singular old man was, in brief, this: The child who had thus come to him out of the dark must learn through every channel of thought and sense to realise Life Eternal. He must learn to see in the most degraded one for whom Christ has died—wandering, perhaps, ignorant of his heritage, the object of His love. He must understand, further, that Power belongs to God, whether it be the energy of accumulated wealth or the simple motion of one's arm—all is an indivisable part of the God-force that rolls the stars along and shapes the destiny of nations. He must learn that to move in harmony with the Divine Will is the highest ideal and the way of true progress.

Digitized by Google

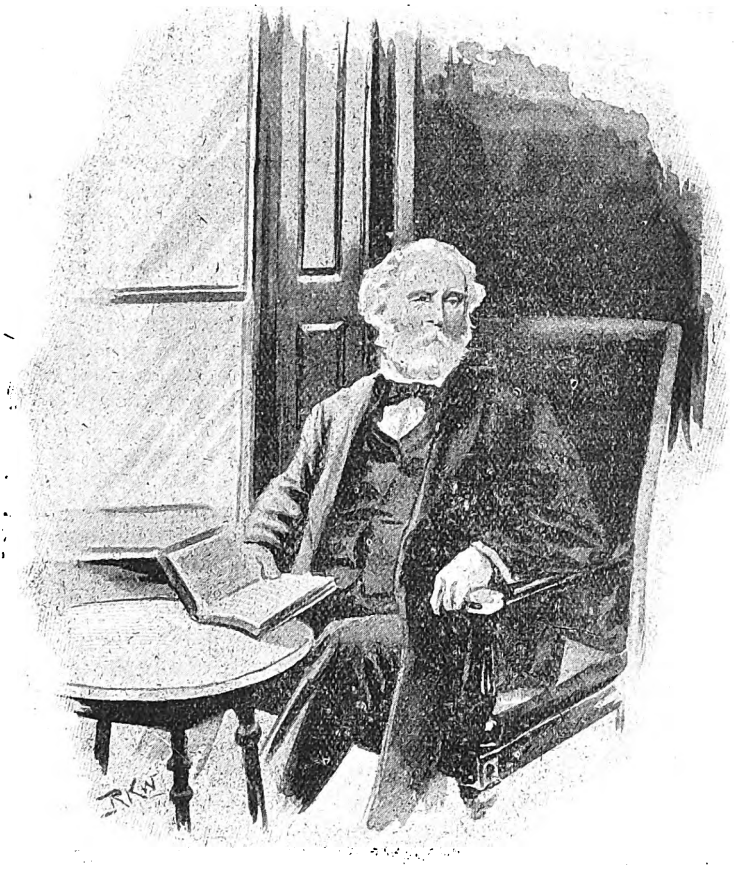
Such a man, reflected Moses Armitage, might be safely entrusted with the wealth which his ancestors had wrung from their fellows. Such a man would know how to honestly and wisely restore what had been dishonestly acquired.

All of this and more clustered about the story of the Nazarene. The man and the child studied it together, and with it many things more, in the quiet country and in the throbbing heart of great cities; in places made terrible by man's hatred and injustice, or illumined with the eternal qualities of love and self-giving. As the boy grew older, history, science, politics, all were examined—studied in the light of that luminous life. And because Moses Armitage knew from bitter experience that idealism is in itself weak and futile, and that the most useless of human beings is the man who, in a world of uses, dreams of high accomplishments, yet fails to accomplish, he early taught the child to put nto instant practice every truth which he learned, for thus, and only thus, does truth become an inalienable possession.

That the boy might become a citizen of the world, they travelled and lived in many countries, yet it was oftenest to a lovely village in New England that the two returned. Here, in a modest cottage, furnished with the simplest comforts, the two passed many a stormy winter or peaceful summer. In this rural society Moses Armitage passed for a naturalist of some means, whose life was chiefly given to an eccentric but harmless pursuit of birds and beetles. He was commonly spoken of as "a real nice old gentleman," and his frequent absences were set down as natural for such a queer person.



THE GUARDIAN OF THE ARMITAGE MILLIONS, BURIED IN THE STUDY OF A CERTAIN ANCIENT INSPIRED BOOK, IN SEARCH OF LIGHT ON HIS FUTURE COURSE.

During the seasons of sojourn in the New England hamlet, Manuel attended the village school, and associated freely with the village children in all their work and play. He learned to swim, to skate and coast, to build a snow-fort, and lead a spirited attack on a rival fortress. He was a favourite with everyone, because of his beauty and the gay sweetness of his nature. During these joyous years all the unnatural sadness which had fallen upon him like a blight from Erastus Winch's sour nature vanished. He was a happy, light-hearted child, growing healthily like a young tree into his appointed stature. The old man watched over him with a yearning love which grew with the years. One daily custom of the two must be mentioned, since out of it grew unmeasured results. It was simple enough. Moses Armitage inaugurated it thus the very day the child was given over to him formally.

Digitized by Google

"Manuel," he said, to him, "you are really my boy now."

"I am glad," answered the child, and his face glowed like a flower.

"But you must not forget your Father. You are His child; you will always be. In order that you may make the best of your living, you must every day take a lesson from the Father, just as His beloved Son did of whom I told you. He will delight to teach you if you will but listen. Presently you will take lessons in French, German, and Latin from teachers who know these languages. But no one can give you lessons in the art of being what you are meant to be except your Father. I made some terrible mistakes, my boy, before I found this out. I want you to be happier than I have been. There is only one way. Do you understand?"

The child nodded his head, his great eyes fixed on the face of his uncle with a smile.

"It really does not matter whether you understand me perfectly or not," he said. "I am not able to teach you as He will. Just as you listen to me now, my lad, and try to understand, so you must listen every day to your Father in the prayerful study of His Word after you have dressed, and God will teach you just how to live during the day that is before you. Do not think your own thoughts; only listen. If you remember to do this faithfully every day of your life, you will always be in the right place and know how to do the right thing. And you will not fall into the tangle of foolish thoughts that makes the world seem wretched to those who don't learn from their Father."

This was no new idea, and Moses Armitage was aware of it. He found it universally observed, with more or less understanding of its meaning, during his travels in Oriental countries, and knowing the great tenacity of the Eastern idea, he conceived that the custom was not unknown in the days of Jesus, and that to those hours of communion with the Father might be traced in great measure the unfolding of that wonderful life, which is summed up in the simple words, "And the Child grew in grace, and in favour with God and man." So, he argued, did He listen among the hills of Palestine during those years of solitude, before He emerged into the light of sacred history. And so, in his own degree, may a child in any age grow in favour with God and man.

One sparkling afternoon in late October found the two—the old man, still hale and vigorous, and the child, now grown into a handsome lad of twelve—walking slowly down a wide avenue in America's chief city. Palaces lined the street on either side; gorgeously apparelled women with haughty faces lolled on the soft cushions of the rapidly driven carriages. There was opulence of life, of colour, of motion, of magnificence everywhere visible. It was reflected in the boy's sensitive face as in a mirror. "I should like to live in one of these beautiful houses," he said eagerly; "I should like always to see this—to be in it!"

"Well, suppose we try it," said Moses Armitage, regarding him keenly. "Suppose we see if this is the best we can do at living." He paused as he spoke before a small but splendid mansion. "Curiously enough," he went on, "it happens that we may make our experiment in this house if we wish. The people who own it have gone to Europe; they will let it."

Nightfall of the ollowing day saw them established in their new home. Manuel was frankly delighted. The drawing-room, glowing with soft colour and filled with objects of art, seemed a vision of fairyland to the wide, brown eyes of the country-bred lad. So did the library, with its rows of books in costly bindings, its rich carpets, its bronzes and paintings, and its wide fireplace, where many coloured flames danced up the chimney in the cool evenings. There were well-trained servants in the house, and life moved on noiselessly after the well-oiled fashion of a perfect machine.

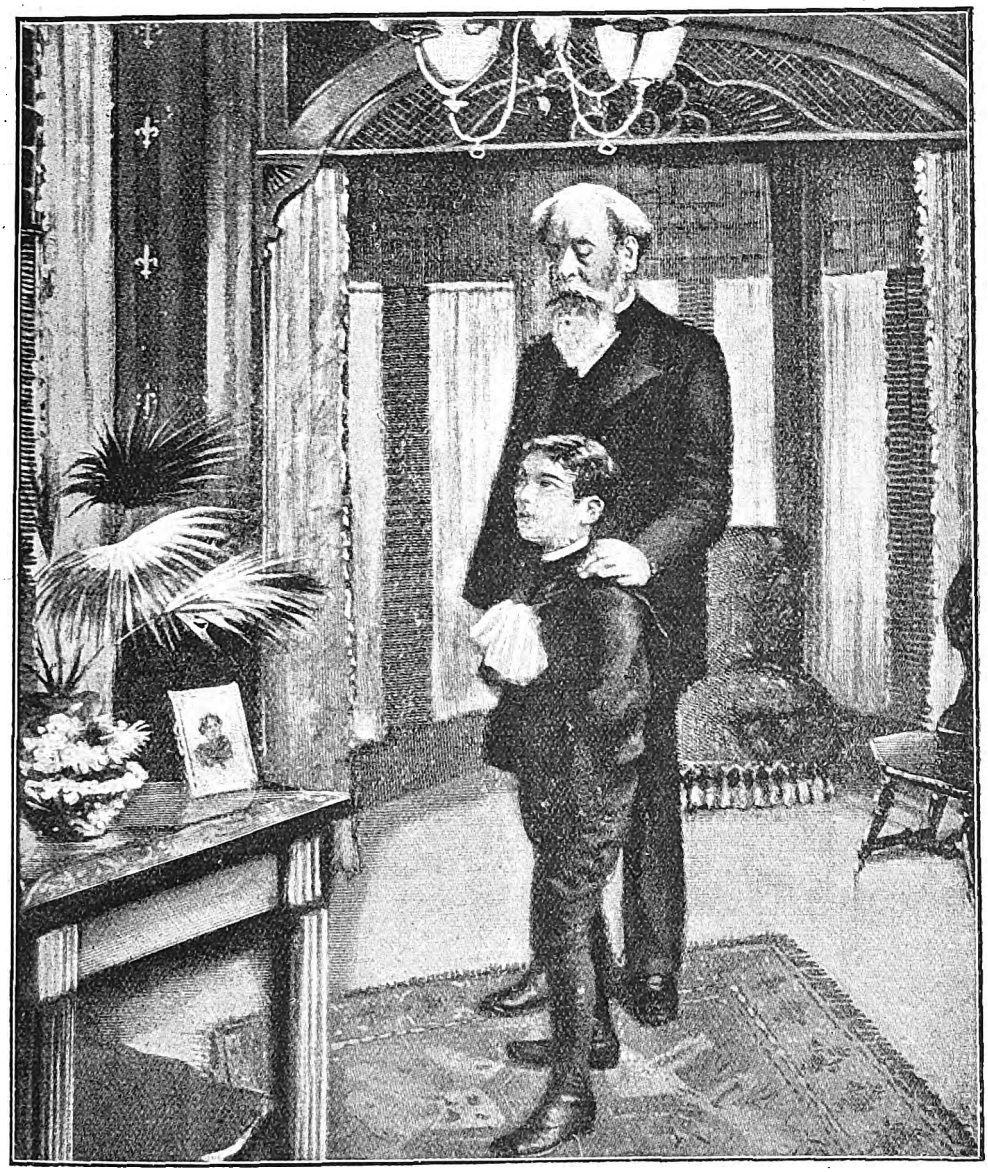
"I like it," announced Manuel, conclusively, at the end of the second day.

Digitized by Google

The solemn-faced footman had withdrawn, and the two sat alone together over their dessert. "Why have we not lived here before?"

Now the question of money had never been so much as named between these two. The child had accepted his life day by day with unquestioning faith and simplicity. "Why have we not lived in such a house before?" he repeated, his eyes roving curiously over the rich cut glass, silver and napery, and pausing at last on his uncle's serious face.

"We are spending a great quantity of money on ourselves," observed his guardian



THE DRAWING-ROOM, FILLED WITH OBJECTS OF ART, SEEMED A VISION OF FAIRYLAND TO THE WIDE, BROWN EYES OF THE COUNTRY-BRED LAD.

"Money?" repeated the lad questioningly. "Yes, I suppose we are; but if we have it——" He stopped short, and again riveted his bright eyes on the watchful face opposite him. "I do not know,"

Digitized by Google

he burst out after a short period of reflection. "I never thought much about money. Perhaps we ought not to live here; it was I who wished it."

"We have money to spend this winter, you and I," said Moses Armitage gravely. "And you shall decide how we are to spend it. We can afford to live in this house and—yes, we can buy many things besides, if you wish."

"I am glad," cried the boy. "I do wish to live here, and there are so many beautiful things in the shops—pictures and books and curious toys. I cannot think of everything at once, there is so much." He drew his active figure to its full height—he had sprung from his chair and was walking excitedly up and down the long room. "We are very rich, are we not?" he demanded, after a pause. "Jenkins, the man who waits on me in the morning, says that we are."

His guardian frowned. Then his face cleared, and a curious smile crept into his blue eyes.

"Well?" he said, interrogatively.

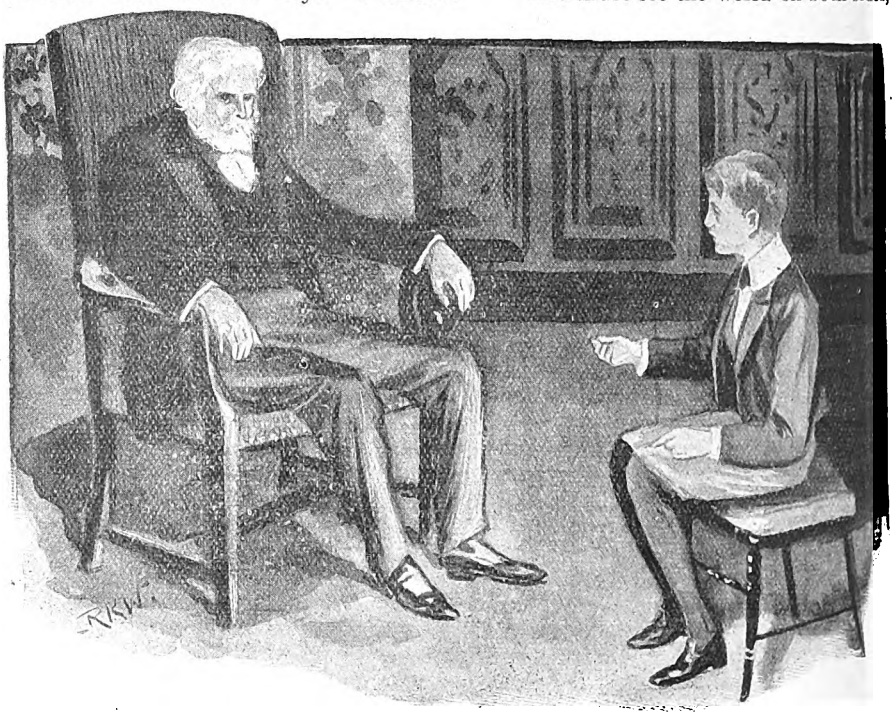
"I like to be rich," said the boy, positively. "I like to live in this house. I shall buy everything that I want. To-morrow I shall go to the shop that we saw yesterday—where the pretty old Florentine things are. I want that queer carved bell for my room, and——"

"To-morrow you will begin to go to school."

"Yes, I suppose so," assented the boy, a little dashed by the suggestion. "But why couldn't you teach me this winter, uncle?"

The old man raised his shaggy brows.

"You must see the world on both sides, my lad, if you want to be a man," he said, smiling.



MANUEL SPREAD THE SHEET OUT ON HIS KNEE, SHOWING ALL THEIR EXPENSES.

On the following day Moses Armitage himself accompanied his ward to the school he had chosen. The manner of their procedure on that day and on every succeeding day was this: the well-appointed brougham carried the two to the corner of a street some miles from the palace in which they lived. Here they dismissed the carriage, and proceeded on foot through several dirty streets, which at that hour swarmed with poorly-clad children.

Digitized by Google

"There are schools much nearer home than this," observed Manuel, when they paused at length before the huge, dingy building, which seemed an objective point for the diverging streams of children.

"Yes," assented his guardian briefly.

"Why must I come to this school if we are rich?"

"I did not say that we were rich, did I? Jenkins said so."

"But—"

"Do you trust me child?"

"Yes, uncle."

When Moses Armitage that afternoon returned in his carriage to the spot near the Common Day School where he had arranged to meet Manuel to take him home, he perceived that he was pale and drooping.

"Well, my lad," he began cheerily, as the two walked away together, "how goes the new school?"

"I liked my teacher," said the boy, with a long breath, "but———"

"You liked your teacher—good! Now where does the 'but' come in?"

Manuel drew closer to his side as a group of ragged, shouting children pushed rudely past them.

"They—they are hungry, some of them," he whispered. "The boy who sat next to me had no breakfast; I gave him my lunch."

"What! all of it?"

"I had breakfasted," said Manuel, hanging his head.

They then drove away from the grimy unpleasant neighbourhood. The boy sat silent and thoughtful, his eyes busying themselves with the tall buildings. At dinner he ate hungrily at first, then leaned back in his chair, eyeing the table with its wax lights and flowers.

"What do they do with all that is left?" he demanded, regardless of the man who waited behind his chair.

His guardian lifted his frosty brows and shook his head. "I couldn't tell you, my boy," he said easily; "suppose you ask the housekeeper."

"There is more here than we need," the boy went on. "It would do for other boys' breakfasts—ever so many of them. I suppose there were others who were hungry."

"Of whom are you talking, my child?" asked Moses Armitage.

Manuel stared at him with grieved astonishment. "If you had seen them, you would not forget," he said. "I am thinking about some poor boys in the school I attended to-day."

When they were seated beside the wide hearth in the library he began again. "If we are rich," he said, "if I may choose how we are to spend some money—you said that I might—I know what I wish to do most of all."

"What! already?" laughed his guardian. "A new bicycle—eh? or a pony?"

The boy shook his head. "Not now—some time, perhaps. I was thinking of the boys in school—yes, and the girls too; they look so different from the boys and girls I knew before. They are so thin; and they look so tired and old."

"Of course," agreed Moses Armitage, stroking his beard; "they are city products."

"But I've seen them quite rosy and happy on this street," said the boy, thoughtfully. "The baby in the next house has pink cheeks, and the boy is plump and pretty. I think it is being poor—too poor to have comfortable clothes or enough to eat." He stopped short and stared into the fire.

"What do you propose to do about it, my lad?" inquired his guardian, lightly. "I said that we were spending considerable money on our two selves," continued Moses Armitage; "that is quite true. But so are many others. It is our own; we have a right to spend it as we will."

"If I may choose," said Manuel, in a low voice," "I will buy lunches for the children who have had no breakfast."

So, it was announced in the Mulberry Street School on the following day that a friend of the school had provided hot soup and bread ad libitum for those who needed such refreshment. Manuel continued to come and go between the school in Mulberry Street and their house on the avenue. As the weeks wore away he became more and more silent and thoughtful. One evening he appeared before his guardian with a folded paper in his hand. "You said I might ask the housekeeper what was done with all that is taken away from our table," he began rapidly. "Mrs. Camp is very kind and polite; I learned many things. I put them down on this paper, for I wished to remember." He spread the sheet on his knee, showing all their expenses of table—expenses of servants' hall—salaries—wages!

Digitized by Google

"What is all this to you, my lad?"

"Mrs. Camp was making up her books for the month; she let me copy some of the figures. It seems so much—for just you and me, uncle!"

"But," said the uncle, "you like living in this house—you like being rich, my lad."

"I—I should like it if the other boys could live in houses like it; if they could be rich too. But——"

Moses Armitage laughed; a curious, husky laugh. "Would you like to go with me to-morrow and see how some of these school mates of yours live?" he asked.

"Yes, I should like it. I want to see."

And so it came about that these two—the child, who held the power of wealth in his small, unconscious hands, and the old man, his guardian—went down into the region of the fair city's poverty and darkness. In company with a stolid sergeant of police they toiled up foul, rickety stairs, in darkness, haunted by evil, unnameable odours exhaling from fetid sinks and damp, rotting timbers. They saw innumerable children, all palid, all dirty, all starved, in mind and body. They saw women with terrible faces, hard, despairing, death-like. They saw men, sweating over their ill-paid work in stifling dens, or idling in narrow, filthy courts. Misery everywhere, and horrors all the more horrible because the human beings hopelessly immersed in them seemed not to realise their sufferings. Sounds of laughter and singing hung on the foul air of a den, where a hag-like woman served out some hideous decoction from the keg on which she squatted; the laughter was even more terrible than the unsmiling faces of the children.

(To be continued.)

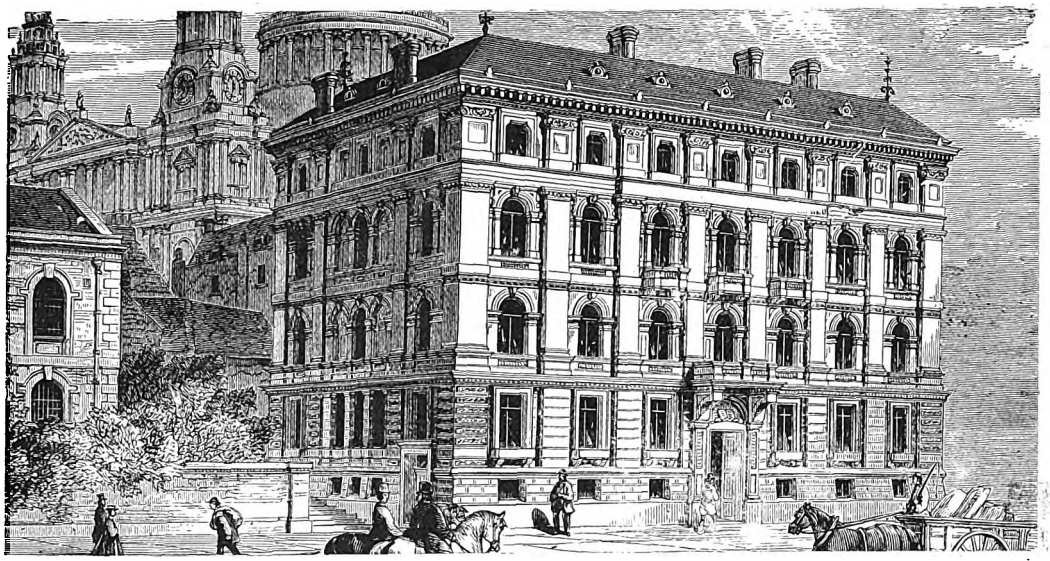
The "Temple Magazine" will be glad to publish any short original articles embodying any new or striking ideas in Politics, Science, Mechanics, Medicine, Political Economy, or indeed any subject in which the people would be generally interested. In any case the article should not be longer than 2,000 words in length. If drawings or photographs are sent on they will be used with the letterpress.

Address:—Manuscript Editor, "Temple Magazine," 6, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google



British and Foreign Bible Society's Headquarters, Queen Victoria Street, London.

MANAGEMENT OF THE BRITISH and FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY IN FIVE COUNTRIES OF WESTERN EUROPE CRITICISED.

£15,000 SPENT TO SELL £3,000 OF SCRIPTURES.

LORD ROSEBERY in a recent speech insisted on the indispensable importance of EFFICIENCY in the administration of the British Government, and we may with equal emphasis urge the necessity of more efficiency in the management of the British and Foreign Bible Society's agencies in France, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and Italy.

The annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society, which is just published, states on page 4, and appendix pages 11 and 35, that their total receipts from subscriptions, donations, legacies, dividends on funded property, and collections from meetings and congregations within 1901 amounted to £143,597, out of which £31,977 was given in grants of Scriptures or money or reductions in price, or discounts to Missions, and Institutions, etc., leaving £111,620. Just about this sum, viz., £111,731, was spent over translating, revising, and printing and binding Scriptures.

The receipts from the sales of these Scriptures at their depots, throughout the whole world, were £91,700, most of which seems to have been spent upon the rents of these depots, clerks, agents, and various other expenses, but especially upon 745 colporteurs, who at an average salary of £50 each, cost altogether £37,250.

Some items, over which the £91,700 were partly spent (as stated on pages 159 to 181 of the appendix to the Report), are £8,055 for District Secretaries and their travelling expenses to hold meetings, address congregations, and collect subscriptions in Britain; £5,019 for Annual and Monthly Reports, etc., for Auxiliary Societies, to spread information of the Society's work among subscribers; Taxes for the Society's headquarters, £1,329; salaries and other expenses of the Publishing Department, £3,407; secretaries and superintendents' salaries, £2,887; freight charges and packing cases, £3,326.

The depots and colporteurs, etc., in Russia cost the Society £15,223, in order to sell £22,091 of Scriptures, and in Austria cost £8,893 in order to sell £4,114; and in China cost £9,448 to sell £1,004 of Scriptures, and in Morocco cost £1,588 to sell £68 of Scriptures, and in Egypt cost £6,002 to sell £1,153, and in Turkey cost £5,729 to sell £1,154 of Scriptures, and in North and South Malaysia and Philippines £7,062 in order to sell £652 of Scriptures; and in India £9,078 to sell 577,035 small and large Scriptures; and in Germany £4,666 to sell £13,908 of Scriptures.

Digitized by Google

Confining our attention in the following remarks to the Bible Society's expenditure and work in

FIVE COUNTRIES OF WESTERN EUROPE,

we find that the Report which gives the subjoined figures at the head of the different Sections on each country shows that during 1901 the Society expended over the rents of depots or shops and offices, salaries of employees and colporteurs, etc. (over and above receipts), £4,921 in France, £1,196 in Belgium, £3,095 in Spain, £1,776 in Portugal, and £4,186 in Italy, totalling £15,174 spent in those five countries over office expenses and salaries of employees. The printing and paper, and the cost of the Scriptures, is included in these expenses; but the receipts from the sales are deducted, so that the cost and receipts often almost correspond.

The total money value of the various Scriptures sold by the British and Foreign Bible Society in those five countries during 1901 is stated to be only £3,428: viz., £1,124 worth of Scriptures in France, £304 in Belgium, £717 in Spain, £208 in Portugal, £1,075 in Italy.

This £3,428 is, however, reduced to £3,000 by subsequent figures given in the Report, showing that one-sixth of all the copies sold were not sold by the colporteurs or depots, which cost the £15,174, but were simply sold wholesale to European Protestant Societies in large quantities, apparently direct from the printers in London or Europe, and are not counted by the Society as depot sales, although they naturally include them in the gross amount of receipts.

The actual quantity of the £3,000 worth of Scriptures sold in 1901 by the Society's French, Belgian, Spanish, Portuguese, and Italian depots and colporteurs is given in the Report as being 16,019 Bibles, 46,174 Testaments, and 163,428 halfpenny separate Gospels or Acts—a total altogether of 225,621 separate Scriptures, large and small, circulated amongst a combined population of 102 million people. At this rate it would take 452 years before each of the 102 millions of people would get a separate Scripture, large or small, because 102,000,000 is 452 times 225,621; or, in other words, only one out of 452 persons in those five countries obtained a copy or a portion of the Scriptures in 1901, as the result of the expenditure of the £15,174; and it must be remembered that, generally speaking, the people in these Catholic countries have no Bibles or portions of the Bible, except as supplied by this and two or three other lesser Bible Societies.

Thus, the expense of circulating, by sales, £3,000 of Scriptures in five European countries, with a total population of 102 million people, was £15,174, or more than four times the value of the Scriptures sold; in other words, out of every five shillings given for these five countries by the public to the B. and F. Bible Society four shillings is spent by the Society over its offices and the employees' salaries before the remaining shilling really goes for the object for which the whole five shillings was given—viz., the supplying of Scriptures for those who have them not.

But in truth the public who give the £143,597 annually, probably subscribe it on the understanding that the Scriptures are to be given freely to multitudes of those who have them not. If they were told, as they ought to be, that all that will be done, is to open shops and employ colporteurs to sell the Scriptures, they would not give anything like that sum.

And certainly they would not give it if they knew the real fact, that it furnishes salaries to officials of the Bible Society, who, all over the world, are earnestly exhorting people not to give away the Scriptures, lest it should injure their colporteurs' sales, which after all, are so comparatively small, and are much more in country districts than in large towns.

The free distribution of samples or specimens is universally believed to promote the sale of commodities. Thus Messrs Rowntree had a little packet of their chocolate given to everyone entering a London omnibus on a certain day, to promote the sale of that comestible

A fact related by the Rev. S. H. Anderson, a Protestant pastor, illustrates this principle. The owner of a street stall in Paris was reading a Gospel given him by a Protestant. He was asked by a gentleman, who often passed his stall, "How can you waste your time in reading such a book?" He replied, "I find the book very interesting. Take it and read it yourself." The gentleman did so, and after a few days said, "I had no idea the book was so sensible and instructive; I have now quite a different opinion of it." That gentleman would never have bought a book which he despised, but he read it when given to him, and his prejudice vanished. Similarly the distribution of separate Gospels tends to promote, and not injure the Bible Society's sales of Testaments and Bibles.

Digitized by Google

There is a distinct avowal on page 70 of the Bible Society's Report for Italy: "As a rule our Society does not favour indiscriminate gratis distribution. Such distribution does more harm than good." The prediction that in the last days perilous times shall come, is indeed being verified when a Bible Society declares, in direct opposition to the Bible itself, that the gratuitous distribution of Christ's history and words 'does more harm than good"!!!!

Again, on page 72, the Report on the Italian work, written presumably by Signor Meille, the agent for Italy, and sanctioned by the Committee, says:

Several English friends have purchased Italian Testaments and Scripture portions to give away, but WE DISCOURAGE SUCH DISTRIBUTIONS"!!!

We simply stand aghast at these Bible Society officials discouraging English visitors (some of whom are subscribers to the very fund which pays the salaries of these officials), from purchasing Italian Gospels to give away in the hotel where they are staying, and in the streets through which they walk. Few things can be more reprehensible than dissuading anyone from giving a Gospel to a man who has not got it.

Christ's command is, "Preach the Gospel to every creature." How can this be better done than by the gift of one of the very Gospels themselves?

Sir Walter Scott, in his last illness, was asked what Book he wished to be read to him. He replied: "There is only one Book: read to me from the Bible." Yet, when English visitors want to give a portion of this Book to priest-ridden, benighted Italians, who perhaps never before saw it in their homes, the Bible Society officials say in effect: "Don't give it; it will do more harm than good!"

This is the most extraordinary phenomenon and amazing anomaly that has ever occurred in the history of religious Societies, and is enough to make those who founded the Bible Society 100 years ago, turn in their graves. Their object was to get the Holy Scriptures placed in every house, whether by gift or sale. They realised that souls are every day passing into eternity, and the Word of Life must be put in their hands without delay. But now, their successors utter very different sentiments, and are constantly repeating the parrot cry, "The Bible Society objects to, and disapproves of, the free distribution of Scripture portions. It injures their sales." Would the public give annually £143,597 to the Bible Society, if they realised that the Society discourages the gratuitous circulation of God's Word, regarding which Chillingworth has well said, "The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, is the religion of Protestants"?

A gentleman residing in Italy wanted to buy some thousands of Italian Gospels for numbers of Italian soldiers who were embarking for a foreign land, where many of them lost their lives, but knowing the opposition shown to the free distribution of the Scriptures, went to a friend and said, "Go to the depot and buy these books; you can truthfully say that you will only sell them, and not give them away. Then bring them to me, and I will buy them from you." So thus the Gospels were got and given to the soldiers.

On another occasion their agent in Italy wrote to an English visitor to Italy, who had bought some thousands of Italian Gospels, and was giving them away, and said that henceforth the price to him would be raised considerably above £2 per 1,000, and even the extra price must be paid for those already bought and paid for, because the Society disapproved of his distribution! The Englishman subsequently got an Italian printer to supply him better printed Italian Gospels, containing 20 excellent pictures (which render the Book much more attractive to foreigners), for twenty-seven shillings a thousand, so that he had no longer to apply to the Bible Society's agent.

A visitor to Brussels a few years ago

Digitized by Google

called at the British and Foreign Bible Society's depot to purchase a few thousand Gospels in French. Mr. Fitzgerald enquired why he wanted so many. He replied that he had ascertained that most of the half-million inhabitants of Brussels had not a Bible or even a copy of a Gospel, and he wished to distribute some. Mr. Fitzgerald upon this replied, "Our Society disapproves of the gratuitous distribution of the Scriptures, and I refuse to sell you any"! The visitor subsequently got from time to time 200,000 beautifully illustrated French Gospels at 25s. per 1000 (far superior to those of the B. and F. Bible Society at £2 per 1000) from the "Scripture Gift Mission," at 15, Charing Cross, London, which, with an annual income of only £3,000, circulated half a million Testaments and separate Gospels in Britain and Europe in 1901.

A Suggested Remedy.

A partial remedy for the inadequate number of Gospels circulated by the Bible Society in France, Spain, Portugal, Italy and Belgium would be to do what the Society used to do in Italy some years ago, when their annual circulation of Scripture portions there is said to have been larger than 61,000, as at present. They then not only sold Gospels by colporteurs, but also carried out a system of judicious distribution. They did the same thing at Paris in 1900, at the Great Exhibition, by giving away 400,000 Gospels by means of a colporteur specially appointed to that work.

The same plan should be followed every year in France, Italy, Spain, Belgium, etc., by a special colporteur giving to many houses or different families in numerous towns a single Gospel. One colporteur would average a distribution from house to house (in towns) of one thousand copies each day at the least; and many more if they gave to country excursionists entering towns on special occasions. This would rather promote than injure the sales of Testaments and Bibles by other colporteurs and at depots.

A distributing colporteur could thus judiciously give away 300,000 Gospels on 300 week-days in different towns in France in a single year. The cost and carriage of these at thirty shillings per 1,000 would be £450, and the distributor's expenses and travelling, £150. This expenditure of £600 would raise the total annual circulation of Gospels in France from 66,000, which it is now, to 366,000, and the £600 could be provided out of the £4,438 now annually expended by the Bible Society in France by reducing their 43 colporteurs to 35; for as a colporteur costs £75 annually, the eight salaries thus saved would amount to £600. The sales of Scriptures that would be lost by the dismissal of eight colporteurs would be, according to their average sales stated in the Report, only 320 Bibles, 3,000 Testaments, and 7,300 Gospels, but by this plan 300,000 additional Gospels would be circulated. The same plan of distribution should be carried out in Spain, Portugal, Italy and Belgium.

This is no untried, impracticable plan, for it has been acted on for the last fifteen years by the Christian Herald (of Tudor Street, London), which has had more than a million Gospels distributed by a Mr. Jaye in Spain, France, Italy, Belgium, etc. Its Editor also spends many Sundays every year in distributing Gospels to passers-by in crowded thoroughfares in some 20 Continental towns which can be travelled to on Saturdays, and thus giving away three or four thousand each Sunday, distributes more than 100,000 annually at an expense of only £300 for the books and the travelling.

During this autumn in 1902, Mr. Jaye is giving away from house to house in various Italian towns 65,000 Italian Gospels, printed by Signor Jalla, 51, Via Dei Serragli, Florence, at 27s. per thousand. Their total cost and his expenses are under £150. Yet it has cost the Bible Society £4,186 during 1901 to circulate in Italy only 63,875 Gospels in addition to 6,265 Bibles and 12,299 Testaments.

Now this £4,186, being 27 times £150, should have sufficed to print and circulate 27 times 65,000, that is to say, a million and three-quarters (1,750,000) of Gospels among the thirty-two million inhabitants of Italy, if it had been expended in the system of distribution above mentioned, at the rate of £150 for the distribution of 65,000 Gospels.

Would not the £4,186 have done much more for the Italians by circulating 1,750,000 Scripture portions such as Gospels among them, than by only circulating (as stated in the Report) 63,875 Gospels, 12,299 Testaments and 6,265 Bibles? Where there is merely a little sum available for thirty-two million of people, it is fairer and more equitable to furnish small portions of the Bible to a million-and-a-quarter people than large portions to 82,000. But, at any rate, it would be only fair to spend part of the £4,186 in gratuitous distribution of separate Gospels.

Digitized by Google

And here we may ask, "Is it fair and just to the subscribers to the Bible Society and to France and Italy, with a combined population of 72 million civilized and intelligent people, that only £9,107 should be spent annually by the Society out of £143,597 of subscripiions over our near neighbours France and Italy, with whom we have extensive commercial and social communication within a few hours' journey, and nearly an equal sum of £8,650 over Malaysia and Morocco, most of the inhabitants of which are practically uncivilized heathen, unable to read, and largely devoid of intelligence, with the result that might be expected: that these Malays and Moors (few of whom can read) have only bought altogether £720 of Scriptures in return for the £8,650 spent by the Society over them, while France and Italy have bought altogether £2,199 of Scriptures, which shows a higher degree of appreciation of religious literature?"

Surely £1,000 might with great advantage be taken from the £8,650 spent over Malays and Moors and be devoted to defray a gratuitous distribution of Gospels in French and Italian towns as suggested in our foregoing remarks, where nearly all the people can read.

It cannot be too vividly realised that a Bible or Testament is scarcely to be found in one house out of a thousand in France, Italy or Spain, and that the services in their Catholic churches are in the Latin language, and practically unintelligible to the vast majority of the congregations. Hence there is urgent need of an abundant distribution of Gospels among them, especially as they are received with avidity and eagerly read, and not regarded with indifference on the ground of being given away (as is the case in China), because the French and Italians are accustomed to have quantities of handbills, programmes, and advertising pamphlets distributed in their streets and from house to house which they attentively read as useful information. Frequently outside the Madeleine Church in Paris on Sunday hundreds of pamphlets containing the Epistle and Gospel (in French) for the day are given away by an advertiser who prints alongside a description of various commodities offered for sale, and the worshippers accept it as a matter of course.

Another thought suggested by the fact that £8,650 is spent over 37 million Malays and seven million Moors, is this—"Is this a fair apportionment of public subscriptions for the whole world, while at the same time the Bible Society only grants a similar sum, £9,078 to all its auxiliary societies in India, a colonial dependency of Britain, containing 581 million people, i.e., fourteen times as many as the Moors and Malays?"

A great responsibility rests upon the Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society to look into these matters, and to insist upon the contributions of the public, of which they are trustees, being expended so as to effect a much wider circulation of the Scriptures than is at present the case, and to refuse to be biased by red-tape officials whose inveterate opposition to the gratuitous distribution of the Scriptures is notorious.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

MR. PIERPONT MORGAN, the American millionaire and railway magnate, has been very much "in the public eye" during the last few weeks owing to his organising the great Atlantic steamship combine, and the part he took in connection with the great mining strike in America. Mr. Morgan celebrated his fifty-fifth birthday last April. He inherited an immense property from his father, a banker; but his Yankee cuteness has caused him to largely increase this wealth. His methods are well illustrated by the course of action he pursued during a former big strike in the anthracite coal regions, when the late President McKinley was appealing to the miners for support. Mr. Morgan had also large interests threatened by the strike, but they were financial, not political. So when Mr. Morgan was appealed to on behalf of Mr. McKinley to end the deadlock, that alert man called a meeting of the leading coal-owners, propounded a scheme of settlement to them, which they accepted, and then, whilst they were considering details, Mr. Morgan's agents bought up all the "Coaler" shares upon which they could lay their hands. When the news of the settlement was flashed across the Continent, and "Coalers" went up accordingly, Mr. Pierpont Morgan had netted a few million dollars as the result of his keen commercial methods.

MR. PIERPONT MORGAN.

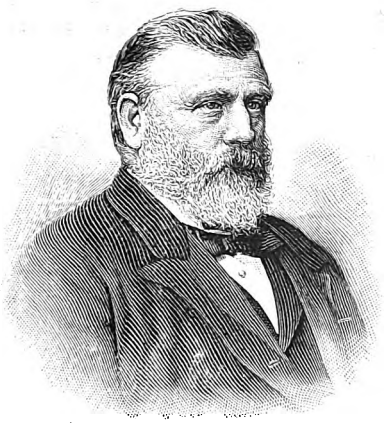
MR. JOHN KENSIT, the anti-Ritualist lecturer and Protestant, who was seriously wounded by a chisel hurled at his forehead, near Birkenhead Ferry, on September 25th, died in the Liverpool Hospital on October 8th. The funeral at Hampstead, North London, on October 11th, was of a most imposing nature, and at the graveside, his son, Mr.

THE LATE MR. JOHN KENSIT.

Digitized by Google

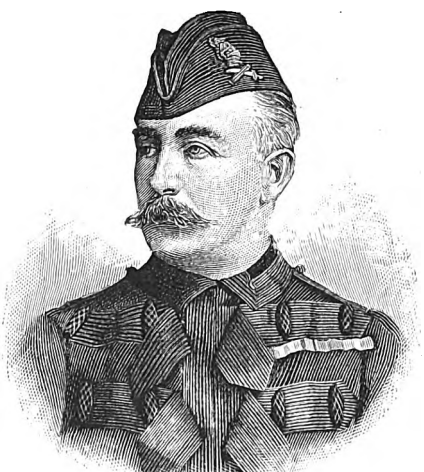


THE RIGHT HON. RICHARD SEDDON.

J. A. Kensit, was nominated successor in the Protestant Crusade.

Mr. John Kensit was born in London in 1853, and was educated at St. Botolph's (Bishopsgate) School. At the age of fifteen he was a member of the Ritualistic choir of St. Lawrence Jewry, near the Guildhall. He soon became impressed with the want of spirituality about such worship. He attended a course of lectures in the Albion Hall, under the presidency of the late Rev. Joseph Pratt—also a course under the late Dr. Maguire, then vicar of Clerkenwell—and was firmly convinced of the errors of Ritualistic doctrines. These lectures inspired him with a great desire to let others know the power of a risen Saviour, and, being always of an active nature, he soon set to work, starting a week-night open-air meeting in the Hackney Road. His clear, ringing voice attracted hundreds of listeners, and this effort, although only conducted by a lad of seventeen, as he then was, received the blessing of God. While carrying on these meetings he was led to attend a Primitive Methodist training class for local preachers. Here he gained much practical knowledge and spiritual blessing under the Rev. J. Odell. He still felt a desire to keep to the Church of England, and therefore attached himself to St. John the Baptist, Hoxton. Later on, he opened a shop in Paternoster Row, E.C., for the sale of Protestant and other wholesome periodicals. In 1898, he began his crusade against Ritualism by his famous protest in St. Cuthbert's, Kensington. Since then he has organised a band of Wickliffe preachers who, supported by voluntary contributions, preach and lecture in all parts of the country.

THE RIGHT HON. RICHARD SEDDON, Prime Minister of New Zealand, has reigned supreme at Wellington, the capital of that colony, for ten years. For the last three years, through his pronounced advocacy of the late war, and of constantly-proclaimed Imperialism, his name has become a household word in Britain. He has lately, in company with his wife and daughters, been visiting this country as a Coronation guest of the Government. Born in Lancashire in 1845, "Dick" Seddon, at eighteen, left England for Australia. In 1869 he migrated to New Zealand. There, as a mechanical engineer and a miner, he found scope for that hard work which is necessary to his existence. After some experience as an innkeeper, in 1879 he entered Parliament as a miners' representative. He became the right-hand man of the Premier, Mr. Ballance, and on his death, in 1893, was chosen for the Premiership as being the man who could be relied upon above all others to carry on the Government on the lines of his predecessor. From that day to this, he has held that post, and is now a leader with little or no opposition. Recently, he was presented with the freedom of St. Helens, his native borough. Here he paid a visit to the Primitive Methodist



THE EARL OF MINTO.

Digitized by Google

THE EARL OF HOPETOUN.

Sunday School in which his late revered mother was a scholar, and addressed the Men's Bible Class at the parish church, in which he said that the principle of "Fear God, honour the King" was essential to the well-being of the Empire.

WHEN the EARL OF MINTO was appointed in 1898 to succeed the Earl of Aberdeen as Governor-General of Canada, it was generally acknowledged that the choice was a most popular one, he being an old Canadian, and later events have confirmed that opinion. Sir Gilbert John Elliot Murray-Kynynmound, fourth Earl of Minto, was born in 1845, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He served four years in the Scots Guards; afterwards he was attached to the Turkish Army in the Russo-Turkish War, and took part in the Afghan War of 1879, and in the Egyptian Campaign of 1882, when he was wounded. From 1883 to 1886 he was Military Secretary to Lord Lansdowne, then Governor-General of Canada, during which time he acted as Chief of the Staff during the "Louis Riel" Rebellion of 1885. For many years he commanded the Border Mounted Rifles, and in 1888 was made Brigadier-General commanding the South of Scotland Infantry Volunteer Brigade. The Earl of Minto has not taken much part in politics. He contested, as Viscount Melgund, the Hexham Division of Northumberland in 1886, in the Liberal Unionist interest, but was defeated. He married, in 1883, Mary Caroline, daughter of General the Hon. Charles Grey, and sister to the present Earl Grey. His knowledge of Canada acquired during his three years' residence in the Dominion, sixteen years ago, has stood him in good stead, and made him an admirable Governor-General.

THE EARL OF HOPETOUN, who has resigned the Governor-Generalship of the Commonwealth of Australia, was appointed Governor of Victoria, Australia, in 1889, the office by which he made his reputation at home and gained his popularity with the Australians, and where he is said to have spent upon the hospitalities of his position twice the amount of his official salary. On the termination of his term of Governorship he returned to England and became Paymaster-General, and in 1898 was appointed Lord Chamberlain. His appointment as the first Governor-General of the Australian Commonwealth gave general satisfaction. In 1886 Lord Hopetoun married Miss Hersey de Moleyns, the third daughter of Lord Ventry. Lady Hopetoun was much liked in Australia during her residence there, and her return was hailed with pleasure. Two of her brothers are sugar-planters in Queensland.

LORD RANFURLY, G.C.M.G.

LORD RANFURLY, G.C.M.G., has been Governor and Commander-in-Chief of New Zealand since 1897. He is a descendant of William Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, and was born on

Digitized by Google

August 14th, 1856. In 1880 he married Constance, daughter of the seventh Viscount Charlemont. From 1895 to 1897 he was Lord-in-Waiting to Queen Victoria. He owns about 11,000 acres of land and other properties in the Irrigation Colonies of Victoria.

MR. W. A. COOTE.

MR. W. A. COOTE is an Irishman, aged 60, who served his time in the printing trade, taking a great interest in trade movements, and attending several Trade Union Congresses as representative of the London Society of Compositors. Afterwards, he was moved to interest himself in the Municipal roadmen and carmen of London, and succeeded in forming them into a strong organisation of about 7,000 in number. By means of that organisation their condition was, (so far as their hours of labour and the rate of wages were concerned), very largely improved. After that Mr. Coote did very serviceable work connected with the Vestries of London, and succeeded in forming them into an Association which was composed of the clerks and higher officers of the Vestries of London, an organisation which still exists.

He has been connectted with the National Vigilance Association since its inception in 1885, when he was made its Secretary. He was interested in various social questions, but of late years has not been so much to the front in these matters, as his time has been so fully occupied in the work of the National Vigilance Association. This Association has formed national committees in various countries, which exercise a watch-dog policy over the terrible conditions that would result, and do, from an unchecked immigration of women from foreign countries. A great deal of the work, importantly serviceable as it is, has to be done in subterrancan fashion for obvious reasons, and the fierce light of publicity can never win this Society the recognition it deserves, since it deals with matters that cannot well be discussed. But, suffice it to say, that the Emperor and Empress of Germany, and the Czarina of Russia, have manifested great interest in their work at the recent White Slaves' Congress.

GIPSY SMITH, the Evangelist, who is one of the most successful mission preachers living, was born in a tent pitched on the Wanstead part of Epping Forest, on March 31, 1860. His career is a romance of absorbing interest, and we are not surprised that his autobiography has gone through seven editions. Up to the time he was converted he had only received seven weeks' schooling, in which he learnt his letters and words of one syllable. Rodney was the fourth of six children—a wild-spirited, mischievous lad, with boundless ingenuity for getting into and out of scrapes—and lived fourteen years in tents, wandering to and fro with his parents over the face of the country. "I grew up," he says, "as wild as the birds, frolicsome as the lambs, and as difficult to catch as the rabbits."

Digitized by Google

GIPSY SMITH.

His mother was converted on her death-bed in 1865, and this led to his father's change of heart and life, together with that of two uncles. These three men for some time went from place to place preaching the Gospel. Towards the end of 1876, Rodney himself "experienced the joy and liberty of full salvation," and immediately began to improve his knowledge, although it was hard work then to read his Bible. On Whit-Monday, 1877, he first spoke in public at a meeting conducted by General Booth. He joined the Salvation Army, and was one of their most successful officers, until dismissed for accepting a gold watch from well-wishers at Hanley. Since that time his career has been a continuous climb to fame, and both in England and America he is looked upon as one of the most popular of living evangelists.

"JACK COOKE," the Boy Preacher, or to give him his proper name Claude Hanbury Cooke, has lately been holding great evangelistic meetings at Glasgow and Belfast, which have been as successful as those he held in London a few months back. This remarkable youth, who is only in his seventeenth year, is the youngest but one of eight children. During "Jack's" early boyhood the family spent some time in Ireland, and then settled at Moss-side, Manchester, where, about the year 1896, his father became a Christian, and began to hold prayer-meetings and study the Scriptures with the members of his family. "Up to 1897," his father once said, "there was nothing in 'Jack's' character or life to point to any extraordinary abilities that he possessed different from those of other boys of his own age; but, in the spring of 1897, I had been anxious for a considerable time to get more light on many points connected with the Scriptures, and every afternoon at three o'clock I made it a matter of duty to pray that God would open my eyes. One afternoon when I had finished my devotions, and got up from my knees, I perceived that 'Jack' had fallen back in his chair in a helpless way, which I knew was not natural. I thought he was ill, and ran to his assistance. I carried him to the couch, and, after laying him down, I hurriedly called his mother, who at once gave it as her opinion that 'Jack' was in a trance. I then spoke to him, and asked him if he could tell us what was the matter with him. After some time, 'Jack' said, 'Father, this thing is of God.' I said, '"Jack," are you in some kind of a trance?' He replied, 'It is not a trance, but the Spirit of God in action.' I asked him a number of questions, and I found that a mighty power had come upon the lad, even the wisdom of the Holy Spirit." From that time the boy became a fascinating orator and has been instrumental in leading hundreds to profess conversion to Christ.

JACK COOKE, THE BOY PREACHER.

Digitized by Google

"I HANDED THE ROSE TO HIM. IT WAS A RATHER LARGE CREAMY BUD."

ROSES · OF · DEATH.

By E. VINCENT WAREING.

THE narrative, which I am about to relate, came to my ears several years ago when I was still quite a young practitioner. It was told me in strict confidence by the late Dr. Jordan Bartlett, the famous physician of the Midland Metropolis, with whom, as his assistant, I spent the early years of my medical career.

As everyone will remember, Dr. Bartlett was one of the shining lights of the medical faculty, and on bacteriology he was universally considered the most reliable authority. Why he came to take up that study, with such an all-absorbing interest, very few seemed to know; as a matter of fact, I believe I am the only person to whom he confided the actual reason of devoting so much of his valuable time to that one particular study.

I have always treated what he told me as a professional secret; but now (leaving our calling the poorer by his death) he has joined the great majority. Therefore, there can be no harm, or breach of etiquette, in my throwing a little light on the past of the man of such great attainments.

He was a bachelor, but not by any means a misogynist. Why he remained unmarried, he never would disclose, and the probabilities are we never should have known, but for the circumstances I am about to relate. His practice was large and lucrative, and he had many wealthy patients on his books. But money-making was not at all in his line, for he freely bestowed his wealth upon charities for the benefit of the poor, suffering incurables. No one ever sought his help in vain, and if ever his patients were too poor to pay

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"UTTERING A SCREAM, SHE AT ONCE THREW THEM INTO THE FIRE."

levity in a doctor. Come, let me look at the flower you seem so proud of."

I handed it to him. It was a rather large creamy coloured bud.

"Ah!" sighed the doctor, "I thought I was right. This takes me back to the time when I had to play the role of detective; which is now many years ago."

Looking up he asked:

"Do you know the name of this rose?"

I admitted my ignorance.

"Well," he said, "properly it is called a Gloire-de-Dijon, but I have another name for it—one perhaps you have never heard before."

"Indeed?"

"Yes: I call it the 'Rose of Death!'"

"The Rose of Death,'" I reiterated, "a most ill-fitting name for so beautiful a flower."

"Do you think so? Then listen, and I'll tell you how I came to give it such a weird designation. This will also explain how it is I'm a confirmed bachelor, and the reason of my being devoted so much to the study of bacteriology."

He sat for a moment vacantly gazing into the fire, then unconsciously heaved a sigh.

"It's about thirty years ago," he began, "but although viewed now down the long vista of the past, it seems to my mind's eye as bright and clear as ever. I am no romancer, and I'm afraid I shall not tell my story in what authors eall the proper sequence, but still I'll tell you just as I remember it."

"People think I am insensible to a woman's love, but in that they err, for once I was engaged to be married to the sweetest and purest girl I ever met.

"I was nearly thirty years of age when I finished my course of training in an Edinburgh college. Here it was that I not only learned the art of medicine, but also love; and, mark you, my lad, this was no calf love of an insipid youth, but the strong overwhelming passion of a fully matured man. The object of my affections was Agnes, the daughter of one of the university's professors. She was my junior by nearly ten years, but love overcomes greater obstacles than age, and we were not long in coming to perfect mutual understanding. After that I waited on the Professor and acquainted him with the case.

Digitized by Google

"For a moment he was non-plussed and shewed signs of being somewhat obdurate; I flatter myself, however, that he was not insensible to the fact that I should make a most desirable son-in-law. The result of a great deal of argument was that he relented, saying:

"'But Agnes is too young; and you have no position.'

"This I expected.

"'Granted, Professor,' I responded, 'but you will admit that I have brains—and that I know how to use them?'

"The professor was secretly proud of me as a student, for at the last examination, my paper, as his subject, received special comment, and thus reflected great credit upon him as well as myself.

"I soon eased the gentleman's mind by informing him that we were in no desperate hurry; we were both prepared to wait, for then both his objections would be met. At length he consented to an informal engagement, which was not to become public until I had won my M.D. At that time I had just qualified as a Bachelor of Surgery and Medicine, and my financial position would not permit my remaining longer in the University. I had, therefore, to turn my qualifications to practical account. For a month or two I remained in Edinburgh, acting as locum tenens, earning a few guineas wherever possible. Owing to the Professor's influence, I at length obtained a permanent post as resident surgeon in a local hospital. Meanwhile, of course, I had been studiously reading up for my final degree.

"The old adage, 'The course of true love never runs smooth' justified itself in my case, for my imperturbable spirit, for once, was one day put out of its habitual equanimity by hearing that my colleague at the hospital—a sinister-looking individual, I think of Spanish extraction—was paying undesirable attentions to my fiancée. Naturally, I was furious, and at once called on him and demanded an explanation. He said he was unaware of there being any contract between us; then attempted to excuse himself on the grounds of our engagement being informal. He prevaricated, and I told him so. He treated the matter with a sang froid air that amounted to insolence. He even went so far as to infer that Agnes had encouraged him. In answer to this I said nothing, but on the impulse of the moment I seized the Spanish wretch by the throat and from his lying lips forced an apology. He gave it, and at the same time swore I should live to regret my violence. I flung him from me, and with a contemptuous shrug of the shoulders, I left him. I laughed at his threats, little dreaming at the time that he would pursue his vendetta to such a cruel conclusion. I was not surprised next morning to hear that he was taking a short holiday!

"When he returned, a week later, we studiously avoided each other; if we met in the hospital, our conduct one to another was one of constrained civility.

"All went fairly smoothly for about two years; at the end of that time I went up to London to see if I could pull off my M.D. One morning I was greatly surprised to learn in a letter from Agnes that, during my absence, that scoundrel was again persecuting her with his hateful addresses—he had even gone so far as to ask her to become his wife! I swore to myself that the next time I met him I would thrash him within an inch of his life. I sat for the examination, and ultimately heard that I had passed with honours. After the examination, I intended spending a short holiday at Brighton, but judge my consternation, the morning I should have begun my holiday, when I received a telegram which briefly said:

"'Come at once; Agnes is dying!'

"Twenty-four hours later I was back again in Edinburgh. With all kinds of dread anticipations, hailing a hansom, I soon arrived at the professor's residence. The sight that met my eyes made my heart sink. All the tell-tale blinds were drawn. My worst anticipations were realised. My beautiful Agnes was dead!

"It is useless for me to dwell upon my grief, for as befits a doctor, I endeavoured to bear it all with a stoical calm. Time has proven no one else has ever taken her place in my heart, and that is why I am still a bachelor.

"In the company of the Professor, her grief-stricken father. I had my last look on her sweet form—beautiful even in death. Afterwards, when we had left the chamber of death, I stood for a few minutes discussing the professional points of the case with her father. In reply to my enquiry as to what she complained of, he said: "'Feelings of languor, debility, sickness, and headache; occasionally she complained of shivering and chilly sensations, besides soreness of the throat.'

Digitized by Google

"These, as you will recognise at once, are the symptoms of diphtheria.

"'And when did she first shew signs of illness?' I asked.

"'About a fortnight ago—the day you sent her those roses!'

"'I never sent her any roses!' I exclaimed quickly.

"The Professor eyed me critically for a moment.

"'Did you not instruct Macfarland, the florist, to send Agnes a bunch of her favourite flowers—the Gloire-de-Dijon?'

"'No, indeed, I did not,' I cried hotly.

"The Professor looked at me as though he thought my poignant sorrow had taken away my memory.

"'Where are the roses?' I demanded.

"'I understand from the maid that directly she opened the box she picked them up and held them to her face, inhaling their sweet perfume. Suddenly she caught sight of a note which was attached to the flowers. Uttering a little scream, she at once threw them into the fire. I thought nothing of it at the time, but now you say you did not have them sent—well, I don't know what to make of it.'

"For a moment I was half-dazed, for a most horrible suggestion seemed to have taken possession of me. Collecting together my scattered nerves, I asked:

"'And to what does your physician attribute the cause of her death?'

"'He ascribes it to a complication of diseases; the chief of which is diphtheria.'

"'Now, Professor,' I said, striving hard to keep firm and collected, 'Do you believe her death was natural?'

"My question seemed to stagger him.

"'Natural! what do you mean?'

"Why," I thundered, 'because I do not. I firmly believe she has been murdered!'

"The Professor looked at me, then shook his head in despair; he evidently thought I was bereft of my reason.

"I said no more, but resolved to myself to do all that lay in my power to what I had said, and to bring the accusation home to her murderer.

"My theory was that she had been the victim of a diabolical experiment. You know at that time, the study of bacteria was not by any means an organised science; there was no method, and everyone was left to his own devices and experiments. It was a subject upon which I was not over keen, but still, I was well acquainted with the dread possibilities of pathogenic bacillus.

"The next day I called upon Macfarland the florist.

"'You received an order from me a little while ago for some roses?'

"'Yes, I did, doctor,' he replied.

"'Do you remember what kind?'

"He referred to his order book.

"'A bunch of Gloire-de-Dijons,' he answered, 'they were ordered by the hospital porter, who also paid for them and took them away with him, but shortly afterwards he returned, bringing an address, and asked me to let my man leave them with Dr. Bartlett's compliments.

"'Have you another of the same description?'

"The florist produced one very similar to the one you were wearing to-night; I paid for it, thanked him for his trouble, then went round to the hospital, and interviewed the porter. From him I learned that my Spanish rival had told him he had received a letter from me, asking him as a favour, to get the roses, and send them with my kind regards to Agnes. The man at once recognised the flower I shewed him. When he came back from the florist's, the Spanish doctor took them up into the laboratory, but shortly brought them down again and sent them back to the florist's to be delivered. I had now sufficient evidence to work upon.

* * * * * *

"A week later. During the past few days I learned more about bacteria than I had during the whole of my medical career. You know that all pathogenic bacteria produce poisons, known as toxine, which give rise to disease and determine its cause. No one was better acquainted with this than that scoundrel of a Spaniard; but to what a terrible end had he used his knowledge!

"While I had been in London a patient had died in the hospital suffering from a number of allied complaints, one of which was diphtheria. From this poor sufferer he had procured the deadly germs, and on Agnes refusing to be his wife, had conveyed the fatal bacillus of diphtheria into the hearts of the roses, then sent them to her as a present from myself.

Digitized by Google

"THE SPANISH DOCTOR WAS FOUND DEAD IN HIS ROOM."

"In all innocence, when she had smelled the flowers, she had inhaled the bacillus, and in a short time its virulent poison was disseminated all through her system in its most fatal form. Although the most skilful man in the city was called in immediately, the case from the earliest stage was obviously hopeless; for you must remember at that period there was no thought of using anti-toxins, for the reason they were as yet undiscovered.

"But now I had proved that the Spanish Doctor was the Criminal, I could take no legal proceedings. For had not the most eminent doctor of Edinburgh duly certified the cause of her death? And this to the world was perfectly natural.

"I carefully weighed the matter up, then decided upon my course of action. I would write to the vile wretch, charging him with the crime; proving the accusation; and threatening him with exposure. Unless he at once tendered his resignation at the hospital, I would do my uttermost to get his name struck off the rolls, and get him hounded out of the profession. To escape this, I offered him the alternative of his leaving the country at once, and for ever. The letter was despatched, and I eagerly looked forward for the answer, which came sooner than I expected, for the next morning great consternation prevailed throughout the hospital. The Spanish doctor was found dead in his room.

"He had poisoned himself!

"There now, my lad," finished the Doctor, "you have the impulse which urged me on with the study of bacteriology, and perhaps you can understand my natural repugnance to roses; and why this one in particular, the beautiful Gloire-de-Dijon, is known to me as the 'Rose of Death'—but, hark! there goes the surgery bell; it's nearly eight o'clock, and I must not keep my patients waiting."

Saying this, Dr. Jordan Bartlett, the great philanthropist and eminent bacteriologist, walked off to his consulting room.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

A Scientific . . . . Discourse.

FOR

THOUGHTFUL MINDS.

A RECORD OF FACTS,
PRINCIPLES, AND DISCOVERIES.

Free (or unoxidised) Phosphorus in its relation to the Improvement and Preservation of Human Life on Earth.

"THAT our medical men of every school, our greatest chemists, physiologists, philosophers, and men of science generally; as well as the inventors of, and those who deal in and adopt the numberless methods and preparations which are advertised in all directions and in every conceivable manner for the cure of the "Ills that flesh is heir to," suffer almost as greatly, and decay and die as quickly as the least educated in society, is matter of positive fact as well as of regret; and although it may be conceded that much good has been done by every system which has yet been proposed, there is certainly still a deficiency; still humanity suffers; and it is painfully evident that something more is urgently wanted—something more simple, more decided in its action, less of the character of ordinary physic or medicine, and more of the nature of a preserving and protecting aliment. This important desideratum medical science has, so far, failed to supply."

"Let us hope that the preparation now described is the beginning of a series of improvements in the right direction and of victories over the natural world."

These were the words of the late Dr. Samuel Birley, M.D., when introducing to the world, a few years ago, the results of his investigations, which had been the outcome of a lifetime's work and study.

What the medical world of to-day is beginning to recognise, he had many years ago satisfied himself upon: namely, the supreme control which the nervous system exercises, not only over the main functions, but over the most minute and apparently insignificant processes taking place in the body.

Dr. Birley's great rule is, therefore:—"Look after the nervous system; keep it well-nourished, and in perfect working order, and disease will little affect us."

Dr. Birley devoted many years to the discovery of some remedy that would fulfil the above indications. He carefully analysed the brains of persons who had died from various diseases, as well as of those who had been killed by accident whilst in the full vigour of health. He was struck by the deficiency of Phosphorus found in the brain matter of the weak and ailing, compared to what normally existed in the strong and healthy. From this fact the suggestion naturally arose that perhaps the loss of phosphorus had much to do with the weakened nerve force, and that its artificial administration might help to give back what had been lost. Such a thought was no less that prophetic, but simple as it appeared to be in this early stage of the investigation, it was found impossible to carry it out with any satisfactory result, for the following reason:—

Ordinary phosphorus, as understood by the chemist, cannot, by any known method, be made to be PERFECTLY SOLUBLE in the blood. It may be finely powdered and given in pills, etc., or dissolved in oil, alcohol, ether or chloroform, but in all these forms it is precipitated into a fine dust immediately on mixing with the juices of the stomach.

Many of these particles do not pass into the blood at all, but of those that do, they are completely stopped when they arrive at the liver, through which organ everything passes from the stomach before entering the general circulation. Hence Phosphorus administered in this form cannot possibly reach the nervous system, and cannot therefore aid in its restoration.

Knowing these facts, and convinced of the necessity of phosphorus as a Food, rather than a medicine, for the Brain and Nervous System, Dr. Birley experimented in many ways for the purpose of discovering a means of preparing it so that it would be free from these drawbacks.

His aim was to find out a form which would not precipitate in this manner, but remain in perfect solution throughout the system.

In the end he was rewarded by the discovery of a new process of preparation (by distillation) which rendered it, when taken by the mouth, absolutely soluble in the blood, and was perfectly satisfactory in its effects in every way. It could pass through the liver in a fluid state and thus reach the nerve tissues, which alone were in need of it.

No better proof of the value of this new form of phosphorus could be required than the very severe tests to which Dr. Birley put his invention. That it really does pass into the circulation, and enter into the composition of the Brain and Nervous System cannot be better discussed than in the inventor's own words:—

"The question has often been put to us—What proof have you that your PHOSPHORUS, when taken into the stomach, actually reaches and combines with the substance of the brain?

As it is truth only, and not opinion or hypothesis that we care for, our answer must be perfectly candid, and such only as practical investigation permits us to give. Because we cannot, or rather have no opportunity to, analyse the living human brain, before a course of PHOSPHORUS has been entered upon, we

Digitized by Google

admit that the evidence is not direct and positive. We are obliged to depend upon implication and analogy. The following items, however, force the conclusion we have maintained upon us :—

1ST.—PHOSPHORUS is a constant element of the brain and nervous system of all animals.

2ND.—The amount of PHOSPHORUS is different in persons of different mental and physical powers.

3RD.—In the brain and nerve-matter of those who have during life been characterised by great powers of mind and body and who have been in the prime of health suddenly killed in battle, or accident, or by other violence, a much larger amount of PHOSPHORUS has been discovered than is ever found is the brain-matter of ordinary persons who have been killed in a similar manner.

4TH.—The brain-matter of idiots contains the least amount of PHOSPHORUS. A little more PHOSPHORUS is found in that of persons not completely imbecile, but physically and mentally weak, languid in action, deficient in pluck and energy, full of apprehension, weak in memory and in application of thought and purpose, who hesitate in their resolves, and shrink from the general bustle of commercial life. The same may be said of persons who are fretful, low-spirited, anxious, fidgety, and odd-tempered, and of the positively ill-tempered and disagreeable.

5TH.—Persons who in early life have enjoyed a fair amount of mental and physical power, but who have suffered many years from great anxiety and sorrow consequent upon family bereavement and other losses and trials, have been found after death to have lost a great portion of the PHOSPHORUS which is common in the brain of similar persons who have not suffered in the same way.

The same may be affirmed of those who, beginning life with a good constitution, have excessively indulged in alcoholic preparations. Alcohol has the property of dissolving and carrying away the PHOSPHORUS of the brain and nervous system. We have personally known and carefully watched the career of many who in the "prime of life" were brilliant, energetic, first-class men of business, full of dash and assurance, carrying all before them, and succeeding in almost every undertaking. We have observed some of these to gradually wane in their mental and physical powers; little by little to have become anxious and apprehensive; matters which once were trifles, unworthy of attention, have seemed to be of great consequence; enterprise and speculation have become less and less; a fear of losing or failing has gradually crept in, until a general tameness and insipidity have been observed. A few years longer, and the once bright, confident, venturesome business man has dwindled to an eccentric, nervous, despondent, and miserable human remnant, incapable of concentrating his powers, vacillating, absent-minded, forgetful, and almost heedless of the world or its pleasures. Deafness, failing sight, impaired susceptibility, necroencephalus (softening of the brain) and general inanition, have gradually terminated in death. In some cases we have been enabled to procure the brain and a portion of the spinal cord, and have found by analysis that the PHOSPHORUS has been greatly deficient and much less than has been found in the brain-matter of persons who had the same vigorous character during early life, but who have died suddenly by violence in the midst of their career, and when all their powers of mind and body were most intense. In several instances different parts of the brain have been found to contain different proportions of PHOSPHORUS.

Striking as are the foregoing examples, and forcible as they are in the way of evidence, they are not in themselves sufficient. We require a synthetical process before we can form a satisfactory conclusion.

We have treated with PHOSPHORUS cases of every class. We have seen the prematurely old, the worn and exhausted, the nervous and miserable of every position in life, gradually restored to a most vigorous and perfectly healthy state. From a lean and cadaverous condition they have become full in flesh, the countenance clear and ruddy, the eyes bright, sight improved, deafness overcome, the hair become abundant, the step and gait again elastic and determined, the spirits high and generous, the temper cheerful, the love of song and harmony returned, the brain again active, perception quick, memory tenacious, and the whole system and character changed from the most pitiable condition to the highest state of existence.

In several instances the stir and excitement of mercantile life have created a longing to return to business. Some have done so, and are now as keen and successful as at any former period.

If then in all cases of mental and physical debility where we have been able to analyse the brain after death, we have found a deficiency of PHOSPHORUS, and if in precisely similar cases during life we have administered PHOSPHORUS, and found such conditions pass away, what other conclusion is it possible to arrive at than that this new form of Phosphorus gradually assimilates with the brain and nervous system, and brings up the depressed and wasted constitution to the normal standard?

The preparation which has repeatedly produced such results as those above described, we have called 'Plain' Syrup of Free Phosphorus, because it is the simple solution formed by distillation, combined with sugar and without the admixture of any other substance or medicament."

Free Phosphorus in combination with other Medicaments.

The Phosphorus prepared as above described permits of our taking advantage of the well-known principle in medical science, that different articles of the materia medica have the property of acting specially on different organs of the body. These various properties are very valuable in cases of special diseased action, and we are able to take advantage of them in using the syrup of phosphorus here described. It will combine with many remedial agents, and thus the power of the phosphorus may be determined to different organs of the body as local conditions may require.

Where the heart is weak, and the whole muscular system flabby and greatly debilitated, in addition to great nervous debility and exhaustion, the best combination is that of protoxide of iron with the "Plain," and which we have named the "Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus."

In the course of many years' private practice Dr. Birley was enabled to considerably modify and perfect a number of combinations of his Phosphorus in addition to the "Ironised" above named. For debility of the muscular and general system in LADIES particularly; when "Below Par," and suffering from poorness of blood and lack of colour, a special preparation called the "Sub-Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus" has been found to be wonderfully successful.

Hence the fifteen standard kinds enumerated in the adjoined list have been formulated and have earned a unique reputation for the complaints named therein.

Digitized by Google

DETAILED LIST.

The result of over Half a Century's Experience. All have been proved in a Large Private Practice before being offered to the public.

PLAIN. SYRUP OF FREE PHOSPHORUS. A Vitalising food for all Brain and Nervous Affections from whatever cause—worry, late hours, overwork, &c.; and for Hysteria, Vitus' Dance, Headache, &c., &c. A sustaining and life-giving element. The basis of all Dr. Birley's Preparations. Of especial value to Professional Men, Clergymen, Solicitors, Barristers, Literary Men, Schoolmasters, and all engaged in mental occupations 4/6

IRONISED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Muscular Debility, Heart Disease, Paralysis, Rupture, Sciatica, Lumbago, Scrofula, Obesity, Dropsy, and General Debility. Of great value also as a restorative after an attack of "influenza" .. 4/6

SUB-IRONISED. Especially prepared for Ladies and Delicate Persons suffering from the above, instead of the "Ironised." And for Bright's Disease, Mumps, Varicose Veins, and when "Below Par" 4/6

MAGNESIAN. SPECIAL REMEDY for Pulmonary and other forms of Consumption 4/6

BRONCHIAL. SPECIAL REMEDY for Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Quinsy, Congestion of the Lungs, Diphtheria, and Throat Affections generally 4/6

GASTRIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Indigestion and Liver Complaints 4/6

ANTI-RHEUMATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for every form of Rheumatism and Gout. (In some cases the Ironised or Sub-Ironised will aid the action of this preparation when taken on alternate days with it) .. 4/6

ANTI-STIPATIO. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Constipation, Flatulence, Piles, Spasms, Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, &c. 4/6

ACIDIFIED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak, Fading, and Falling Off of Hair, and for Actual Baldness (internal use only) 4/6

VIRILITIC. Prepared for men suffering from Nervous Debility and Loss of Vitality 4/6

TOMATINED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak and Partial Loss of Sight, Deafness, Defective Taste or Smell 4/6

ANTI-NEURALGIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Neuralgia, Pleurisy and Erysipelas .. 4/6

CUTANEOUS. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Skin Diseases, Eczema, Psoriasis, &c. 4/6

The 4/6 Bottles contain between 70 and 80 Doses and are sufficient for nearly ONE MONTH'S USE

A SPECIAL OFFER.

We have the fullest confidence that where we can introduce these medicines into a household we are assured of a firm footing, and of recourse to them on all future occasions of illness or indisposition.

This coupon entitles you to a 4/6 Trial Bottle of any one kind of Dr. Birley's Phosphorus Compounds at 2/6; but if forwarded by parcel post, 4d. per bottle extra must be enclosed to cover cost of carriage within the United Kingdom. We guarantee safe delivery. Should a Trial Bottle also be required for a friend or relative, we will extend the offer to them if ordered at the same time.

Orders may be sent with the Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these Trial Bottle Coupons, and if we are not the money will be returned,

For Residents abroad the date will be extended sufficiently to allow of ordering. Postage of 1/4 per bottle is required for abroad.

COUPON.

4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/6

Or by Parcel Post 4d. extra—viz.: 2/10

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Available until Nov. 30th, 1902.

The above Coupon to be cut out and sent with order. These Trial Bottles can be had direct only from the

Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers:

GORDON, MURRAY, & Co., Ltd.,

10, ADAM ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

STRONGLY RECOMMENDED.

Among some hundreds of others we may mention the following Reverend Gentlemen, who have proved the value of the medicine, and from whom we hold some excellent reports:

REV. C. H. SPURGEON, London, S.E.
REV. DR. COCKREM, London Orphan Asylum, Watford.
REV. W. T. CRANFIELD, Stoke.
REV. R. FLETCHER, Hull.
REV. J. JAMES, Abercanaid.
REV. J. W. MORRIS, Gly Neath.
REV. C. EARLE, Langford.
REV. F. CLEMENTS, Hanham, Bristol.
REV. GABRIEL MOLLAN, Clonmetham.
REV. E. I. DEVENISH, Teignmouth.
REV. G. COOK, Church Gresley.
REV. G. DALE COPELAND, Pudsey.
REV. A. A. BROOKS, Wigan.
REV. A. E. REALFF, Leicester.
REV. F. JONES, Malton.
REV. W. BARTON, Hull.
REV. G. HOMEYER, Claycross.
REV. J. B. GRATTON, Leominster.
REV. W. FRY, Blandford.
REV. J. D. WOODHALL, Bolton.
REV. R. FRAME, Birkenhead.

THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN AGE" says:—"Doubtless the 'Christian Age' enters many a home where there is some weakly one whose feeble health makes existence a burden, or perhaps it is a disease considered incurable which is wasting away life. Wherever there is such a case, we sincerely wish one of Dr. Birley's Preparations of Phosphorus might have a fair trial. These preparations are the result of scientific studies and experiments extending over many years, and the success which has already attended their use has been almost marvellous. We have seen hundreds of letters (not copies, but the original documents), some from persons well known to us, all testifying to the curative effects of one or other of these preparations. And more than this, we know of cases in which they have been the means of restoring to health when to all appearance recovery was almost impossible."

EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."—"Our readers know quite well how careful we are not to recommend anything but what is thoroughly trustworthy, but so many voluntary testimonials of unmistakable genuineness are before us that it is simply impossible to question the efficacy of the Medicines to which we are calling attention; hundreds of letters from all classes of people, including titled nobility, clergymen, physicians, &c., among which we notice several well-known names, all bearing remarkable testimony to the benefits derived from them."

EDITOR OF THE "FAMILY DOCTOR."—"One Thousand Original Letters of Testimony have been submitted to us by the Proprietors of Dr. Birley's Preparations."

Digitized by Google

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Write for our WINTER SKETCH BOOK. Patterns Post Free. Hundreds of Illustrations of the latest Novelties for present season in Costumes & Jackets sent post free

10/6

10/6

A SPECIAL LINE of ALPACA SKIRTS In all Colours. COSTUME SKIRTS, 6/6; 7/11, 9/11 each. Carriage 5d.

DESIGN NO. 434.

14/9.

Design No. 434, 14/9.
Stylishly and handsomely trimmed Costume in Allen Foster and Co's Serge and Venetian Cloth, all colours. The bodice is cut in the Russian style, lined throughout, and stylishly trimmed rows of cording and bands of stitched silk. Full flounced skirt, trimmed silk and cording. Extraordinary Value for 14/9; carriage 6d. extra. When ordering costumes please give bust measurement (under arms), size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

Design No. 1262, 10/6.
The Fashionable Three-quarter Sacque Jacket for Winter wear, direct at first cost from the "Alfosco" Factories. This marvellous Jacket is produced in several excellent cloths, Black or Grey Vicuna and Frieze, also in pretty Grey Tweeds, and in Black, Fawn or Brown Beaver. Write at once for patterns. The Jacket is cut with the full sacque back and trimmed with tailor stitching and pearl buttons, smart cuffs and lapels. Price, 30 inches long, 10/6; 33 inches long, 11/6; 36 inches long, 12/6; 39 inches long, 13/6; or 42 inches long, 14/6; carriage 6d. extra. This Jacket can be ordered single breasted if preferred. Send bust measurement under arms and length required.

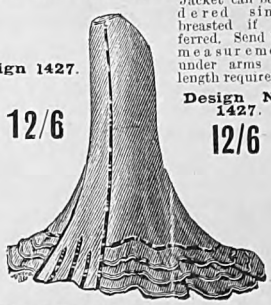
DESIGN NO. 1518

11/6

Design No. 1518, 11/6.
Chesterfield Coat and Skirt direct from the "Alfosco" factories. Splendid Value for 11/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra. Made in a good, hard-wearing Serge, or in ALLEN FOSTER & Co.'s celebrated Venetian Cloth. Colours: Light and Dark Grey, Navy, Royal, Brown, Green, Black, &c. The Jacket is single-breasted, trimmed tailor stitching, full, bell-shaped Skirt, well made and finished. Costume complete, 11/6. Best Value in London. This Costume in good Melton Coating will be 19/6, or in the "Alfosco" Tweed, 21/9. Patterns Post Free on application. This Costume can be lined throughout, Coat and Skirt, for 4/- extra.

Design 1427.

12/6



Design No. 1427.

12/6

CALL. OR WRITE.

CALL OR WRITE.

This skirt is made in Allen Foster & Co's world renowned Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth. Colours: Grey, Black, Navy, Brown, Royal, Light Grey, Oxford, Green, Fawn, etc. The Skirt is lined throughout and made in the new Bell shape, trimmed rich Satin strappings, three straight frills and silk buttons. A great bargain for 12/6; carriage paid 5d extra.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

See Special Offer at foot to all Readers of this Paper.

DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS

GUARANTEED
PERFECTLY HARMLESS

(Medical Certificate accompanies each box.)

THESE Wafers have long been known to possess the "wizard's touch" in producing, preserving, and enhancing beauty of person in male or female, by surely developing a transparency and pellucid clearness of complexion, brilliant eyes, soft and smooth skin, where by Nature the reverse exists.

The great difficulty hitherto has been how to make this beautifying principle safely available, and at the same time avoid what is detrimental and injurious. Dr. Mackenzie's Wafers are prepared expressly as a "Beautifier of the Complexion and Skin," and are guaranteed harmless. In the direction for which they are intended their action and effect is simply magical, the most astonishing transformations in personal appearance being brought about by their steady use. Even the coarsest and most repulsive skin and complexions, marred by freckles and other disfigurements, slowly change into an unrivalled purity and texture, free from any spot or blemish whatever, the pinched features become agreeable, the form, before angular, gradually transforms itself into the perfection of womanly grace and beauty Used by men, the favourable result is the same. In the Complexion Wafers as prepared by the undersigned all danger is averted, and the remedy, taken in the manner directed on each box, is absolutely innocuous, while the peculiar virtues of the remedy remain unimpaired and intact. Powders, enamels, so called "blood purifiers," &c., &c., are a delusion and a snare. From the use of these Wafers FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, VULGAR REDNESS, ROUGH, YELLOW, or "MUDDY" SKINS, and other facial disfigurements are permanently removed, and a deliciously CLEAR COMPLEXION is assured

Wonderful TESTIMONY to their efficacy:

59, BEAUMONT SQUARE, MILE END, LONDON.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. The others have done me a great deal of good."
H. MASON.

31, EVINGTON ROAD, LEICHSTER.—"Please send me a box of Wafers. I have derived great benefit from the others I have taken."
Yours truly. M. E. WARD.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Dear Sir: I find your Soap so good, I now want you to send me three cakes of it, also a box of Complexion Wafers."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. I am much pleased by the effects produced by the first."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

MELBECKS, KIRKBY STEPHEN, WESTMORELAND.—"Kindly send me another box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers. The last has worked wonders."
SARAH G. PAGAN.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF THE "TEMPLE MAGAZINE."

T.M.
COUPON
NOV. 1ST, 1902.

A 4/6 TRIAL BOX FOR 2/-

Any reader sending this Coupon and Postal Order or Stamps for Two Shillings will receive immediately a 4/6 Trial Box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers, this great reduction being made to induce our readers to give this wonderful preparation a fair trial, as we know one trial will convince all of their unique merits. This coupon must be sent in within 10 days of this date. Address all orders to

S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5. Denman St., London Bridge.

Digitized by Google

MELLIN'S FOOD

FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS,

is a perfect substitute for mothers' milk, and yields a highly nutritious and sustaining diet for all.

SAMPLE BOTTLE POST FREE. Mention this Magazine.

MELLIN'S FOOD WORKS, PECKHAM, S.E.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System.—Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. (Removing shortly to 74, Southampton Row.) PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO, 40 & 42, Southampton Row, London W.C. (Removing shortly to 74, Southampton Row.)

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS, AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

DELICIOUS

RED WHITE & BLUE

COFFEE.

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary coffee.

Delicious Flavour.

"BONGOLA"

1/6 & 1/9 TEA.

DOUBLE THE STRENGTH OF ORDINARY TEA.

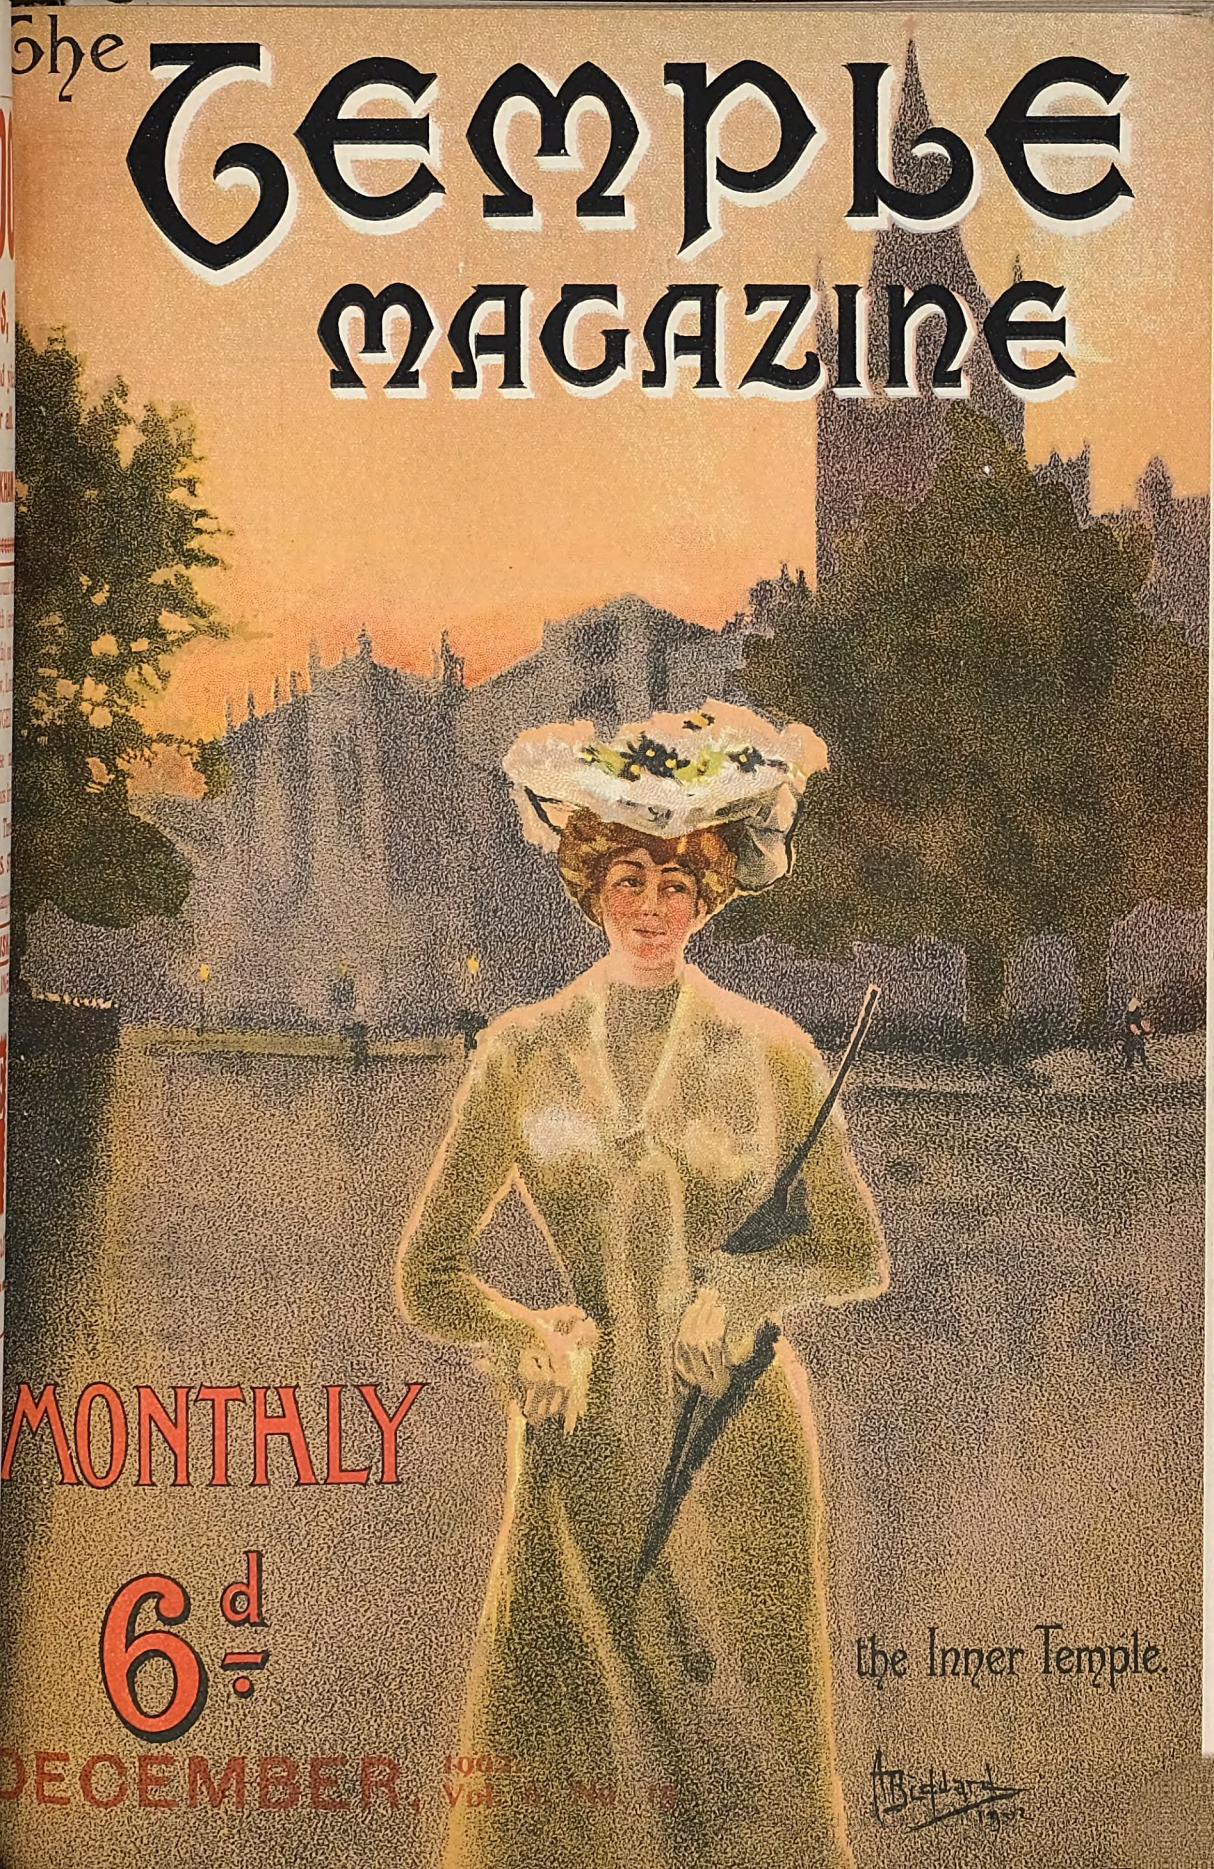
ENGLAND'S BEST VALUE!

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. Thompson & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

London: Printed and Published for the Proprietors at 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Temple Magazine



MONTHLY

6d

the Inner Temple.

DECEMBER, 1902 Vol. X No. 2

TO THE DEAF

If you suffer from deafness or head noises, and desire a complete and permanent cure, write at once to Professor G. Keith-Harvey, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C., for pamphlet fully describing an entirely new self-applied method, which he will send you gratis and post free on mentioning "Temple Magazine."

READ THE FOLLOWING WONDERFUL TESTIMONY:

"My hearing is now perfect."

"I am pleased to say that since using your remedies my hearing is now perfect, and I shall be glad to recommend your marvellous Treatment to anyone suffering from deafness, &c." —Yours truly, A. W. WRIGHT, 26, Charles Street, Maidstone.

"My hearing is as perfect as ever it was."

"I am pleased to inform you that since using your 'Aural Battery' my hearing is as perfect as ever it was. The noises in my head have almost entirely disappeared, and I also feel a great deal better in my general health. You are quite welcome to make use of these few words in any way you think fit."—Wishing you every success, Yours faithfully, THOMAS COFFEY, 1, Sudley Road, Aigburth, Liverpool.

"I can now hear anything that is said to me."

"I am very pleased to say that since using your remedies I can hear very much better. I can now hear anything that is said to me, and the noises in the head are also quite gone. I shall always be very pleased to recommend your Treatment to others, as it has done me such a lot of good."—Yours truly, (Miss) ELLEN WEBSTER, 44, Carpenters Road, Stratford.

"I can now hear perfectly."

"I am very glad to say that after using your remedies I can now hear perfectly, and even if I catch cold it does not affect my hearing. I consider your remedies are excellent, and I shall recommend them at any time.—Yours truly, H. MUTIMER, 151, Otley Rd., Framsden, Suffolk.

"My hearing is completely restored."

"I am very pleased to say that after using your 'Aural Battery' the noises in the head have passed away, and my hearing is also completely restored. You may mention my name in any way you please."—Yours faithfully, FREDERICK BARKER, Elwall, near Derby

Prof. G. KEITH-HARVEY, 49, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 15 JAN 1902

Digitized by Google

Hovis Food

Trade Mark.

is the health food for Babies and Invalids.

IT is a perfect food. Analysis shows it the same as mothers' milk. So do babies brought up on it. They grow strong and healthy and keep healthy. They get sturdy little bodies and constitutions fit to meet life. It is in Two Strengths. No. 1 is a complete food for Babies before weaning. No. 2 is for older Babies and Invalids. It is digested nutriment. In 1/1 and 1/9½ bottles from Chemists, Grocers, Bakers and Stores. Booklet, with BABY HEALTH HINTS, and any information from HOVIS LTD., Macclesfield.

F. 4-2

28
YEARS' SUCCESS.
THE UNIVERSAL REMEDY FOR Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis,
Influenza, Whooping-
Cough, Hoarseness, &c.

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

IMPORTANT NOTICE:
SUBSTITUTION — There are so many imitations of this successful, and therefore popular, remedy that it is of the utmost importance you should use the word "OWBRIDGE" when buying Lung Tonic, and TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

Sold everywhere in bottles at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., & 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

FOR HOME USE AND WHEN TRAVELLING.

Insist on having HARTMANN'S

HARTMANN'S HYGIENIC

(Antiseptic and Absorbent)

Superior to any Sanitary Towel.

TOWELETTES

Obtainable at less than the cost of washing, from all Ladies' Outfitters, Drapers, Stores, and Chemists, in 6d. packets (one doz.); 1/- (6d. per half-doz.); 1/4, and 2/- per doz. A Useful Booklet, "Advice on Accouchement and the Management of Babies," will be sent post free on application. Address—

THE MANAGERESS, HARTMANN'S DEPOT, 26, Thavies Inn, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE THREE GREAT SCOURGES,

ALCOHOL, MORPHINE, COCAINE.

The Hutton-Dixon Vegetable Antidote,

A HIGH-CLASS, UP-TO-DATE, PHYSICAL HOME CURE FOR

ALCOHOL and DRUG ADDICTIONS.

Also of great value in cases of Insomnia, Neurasthenia and Nerve Exhaustion. Can be carried in the Pocket and taken Privately—thus obviating the Publicity, Expense, and loss of time of an Institute treatment.

WARRANTED FREE FROM NARCOTICS.

Patronised by the Nobility and All Classes.

AN IDEAL HOME CURE.

This humane discovery has been publicly endorsed before the Congress of Bishops, and at Father Matthew's Anniversaries, also by Clergymen from their Pulpits, and by Officials of Temperance Societies of all Denominations in nearly every quarter of the Globe. Over Six Thousand Cases have been treated successfully.

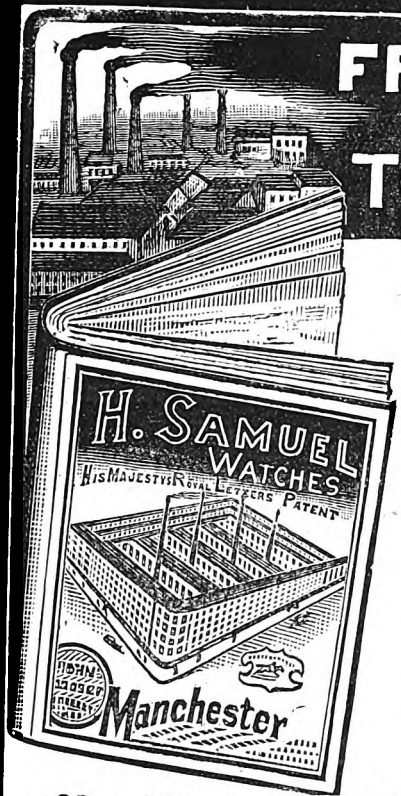
In this treatment there are no hypodermic injections, it being a purely vegetable medicine taken by the mouth, can be carried in the pocket, and taken in perfect privacy at home or anywhere. In from one to three days, and often in as many hours, after commencing this treatment the desire or crave will have so completely disappeared that the victim would not give a penny for all the liquor or drugs in the country for his own use. Among the immediate effects of this treatment are calm, restful sleep, steady nerves, clear brain, increased appetite for food and pronounced benefit in every way physically and mentally, with a positive guarantee that there shall be only good after effects and a permanent removal of all appetite for intoxicating liquors or drugs of any kind, all of which is indorsed by scores of physicians, clergymen of every denomination, and men and women in all phases of life in many parts of the world. This is an absolutely harmless home treatment, and an up to date physical cure backed by and vouched for by testimonials unapproached by any other treatment for these habits.

Full particulars and indisputable testimony sent free in a plain sealed envelope. All correspondence strictly confidential.

N.B.—The Testimonials published in my circulars are unique, inasmuch as I print (by kind permission) the full names and addresses of the subscribers thereto, so that the genuineness of the certificates can easily be verified. Glowing letters of recommendation may readily be written and left unsigned, or signed with initials only, but what the public need now-a-days are the hard facts which cannot be denied or controverted, and these I furnish.

Address :—ALEX. H. DIXON, 37, Silverdale, SYDENHAM, LONDON, S.E.

Digitized by Google



FROM THE WORKSHOP TO THE WORLD

SEND A POSTCARD NOW FOR

H. SAMUEL'S

GREAT FREE BARGAIN ALBUM

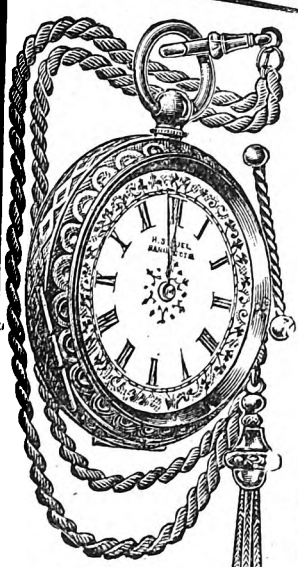
The most perfect money-saver ever produced. Literally brings the factory to your own door. Incredible advantages to the shrewd buyer. You do your shopping at your own fireside, obtain goods of the highest possible value and quality, fresh from the workshop, and

POCKET MIDDLE PROFITS YOURSELF

This magnificent volume contains nearly 200 pages illustrated by over 3,000 engravings of astonishing bargains.

Ladies' Gold Watches, 21/-; Gent's Silver Watches, from 8/6; Real Gold Gem Rings, set with real stones, 3/6; Handsome Polished Wood Clocks, 7/6; Strong Alarm Clocks, 1/6; Gold Brooches, 2/9; Silver Brooches, 1/-; Cutlery, Plate, Silverware, and all Household Requirements. This splendid book, which will save you pounds, is sent you

FREE BY RETURN MAIL!



The "Ladies' Acme" has beautifully engraved cases, and is supplied with cream or tinted dial as preferred.

H. SAMUEL,

WILL SEND HIS WORLD-FAMOUS

'ACME' LEVER

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN

on receipt of P.O.

5/- ONLY

Test it free for a week, and then remit balance, 20/-, when you will receive H. Samuel's Free Gift. If not satisfied, return watch, and your 5/- will be refunded.

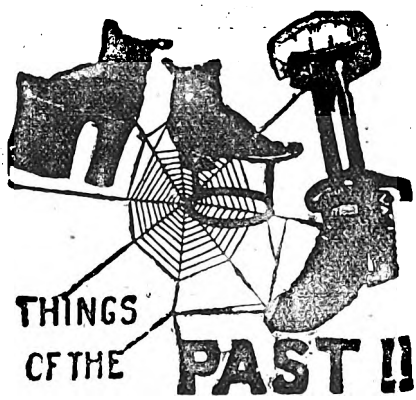
Solid Silver cases, fine ¾-plate movement, jewelled, dust-and-damp-proof cap, and the latest patented improvements. Written warranty for 7 years. Price 25/-. Full amount returned if you are dissatisfied.

A SILVER ALBERT FREE!

To all sending full amount, 25/-, with order. Write now for Free Guide.

H. SAMUEL [Dept. 64], MARKET STREET, MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google



A WONDERFUL INVENTION . .

for the

LAME.

As Supplied to the War Office for the Wounded from South Africa.

THE O'CONNOR EXTENSION Co.'S PATENT APPLIANCES

Enable those with Shortened Limbs and Weak Ankles to dispense with Unsightly Instruments, to Wear Ordinary Shoes, and to look like other people.

FLAT FOOT.

The New Patent . . Arch Support

CAN BE ADAPTED TO HELP ANY CASE OF FLAT FOOT.

A New Book on the Mechanical Treatment of Flat Foot will be sent FREE.

TENDER FEET.

The New . . Patent Socks

CAN BE MOULDED TO FIT THE SOLE OF ANY FOOT.

Describe the case, send a pair of old boots or shoes and 5/- A pair of Socks will be sent POST FREE. (United Kingdom).

GOLD MEDAL, LONDON; HIGHEST AWARDS, CHICAGO AND PARIS.

ADDRESS:

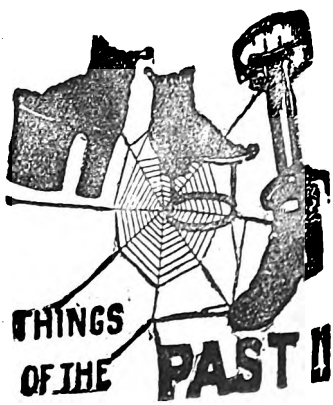
The O'Connor Extension Co.,

SURGICAL APPLIANCE MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT,

2, BLOOMSBURY STREET,

LONDON, W.C.

PAMPHLETS FREE on mentioning The Temple Magazine. Please give particulars of the case.



Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR DECEMBER, 1902.

		PAGE
Frontispiece—"The Alarm"
Smuggling Yarns Re-told	Illustrated	1289
The Czar's Simple Life	Illustrated	1297
A Run on Rothmore Bank	Illustrated	1305
How Fashions are Set	Illustrated	1310
The Ruined Chateau	Illustrated	1319
The Fascination of Fast Motion	Illustrated	1329
How Rats Saved London		1343
Diversions of Some Millionaires	Illustrated	1349
The Needle's Eye—Illustrated.	Serial Story by Florence Kingsley.	1358
The Education Bill	Rev. J. Monro Gibson	1369
In the Public Eye		1371
Seeing by Touch		1376
The Gargoyle		1383
Management of British and Foreign Bible Society.	Reply and Rejoinder.	1387
To-Day		1396
Contents of Volume

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. The Editor will be obliged if, before sending any manuscript, a letter is sent him describing the purport of the article or enclosing a precis of the story. They must be addressed to THE MANUSCRIPT EDITOR, "THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE," 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to THE MANAGER, 6A, TUDOR STREET, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. MATHER AND CROWTHER, BRIDEWELL PLACE, E.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s.

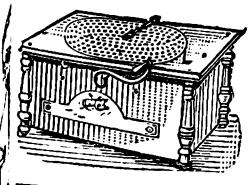
HAND ORGANS FROM 20/-



Three sizes, Ebony and Gold Case. Full organ tone, with six metal tunes. Plays Songs, Hymns Dance Music. Sent on receipt of P.O. 4s. Can be paid 4s. monthly. Write for terms, prices, and list of tunes.—ATLAS CO., 182x, High Street, Camden Town; 63, Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14, High Road, Kilburn, London.

To Asthma Sufferers

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough by the use of Potter's Asthma Cure. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send postcard to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E. for Free Sample. Kindly mention this paper.

Makes the Skin as Soft as Velvet!

BEETHAM'S "Lanola" Regd

will very soon remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, CHAPS, IRRITATION, &c., and render THE SKIN delicately SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE. Try a 6d. bottle. Its effect will delight you! Bottles 6d., 1/-, 2/6, of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

BEST IN 1894. THE BEST NOW.

PALMER TYRE

The ONLY HIGH GRADE TYRE

NOW ON THE MARKET.

For Durability, Palmer Tyres stand alone.

FULLY GUARANTEED.

Write for Manual containing 11 Sectional Road Maps and 1 Key Map of the British Isles.

The PALMER TYRE, Ltd.,

Dept. T.M., BIRMINGHAM.

These Tyres are manufactured under license from the North British Rubber Co., Ltd., under Bartlett's Patent.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

These Stories, which are from the Journal of Lieutenant Warneford, R.N., are no mere fancy pictures of the high-souled, dashing smuggler, but comprise some of the exciting adventures of a preventive officer in the wild days of the early part of the past century, when smuggling was carried on with a boldness and daring now almost incredible.

THE SMUGGLER'S REVENGE.

WHEN I joined the Scorpion, sloop of war, then (1812) on the West India Station, there were a father and son amongst the crew, whose names appeared on the ship's books as John Somers and John Alice Somers. The oddity, in this country, of giving a boy a feminine name had been no doubt jestingly remarked upon by those who were aware of it; but with the sailors, the lad passed as Ally Somers. The father (who had attained to the rating of boatswain) was a man approaching fifty; a stern, hard, silent man with a look as cold and clear as polished steel, and a cast-iron mouth indicative of inflexible, indomitable firmness of will and resolution. He formed a striking contrast to his son, who could not have been more than seventeen, and was of effeminate appearance. I was not long in discovering that, obdurate and self-engrossed as the man seemed, the boy was really the idol of his affections and hopes. His eyes continually followed the motions of the lad; and it appeared to be his increasing aim and study to lighten the duties which the youngster had to perform, and to shield him from the rough usage accorded to lads in his position by the motley crew of those days. Several times I was an unintentional auditor of scraps of conversation between the two, and I gathered that Ally was the sole issue of a marriage that had left bitter memories in the mind of the father; but whether arising from the early death of his wife, or from other causes, I did not ascertain. Somers was, it appeared, a native of the West of England, and it was quite evident that he had received a much better education than usually falls to individuals of his class. He was a man who knew no fear; and on one occasion, in a skirmish, he saved my life by sending a timely bullet through the head of an unruly negro who held me for a moment at his mercy. At the close of the war, Somers and his son were, with thousands of others, turned adrift from the Royal service.

Some months after my appointment to the command of a revenue cutter, I chanced to meet the father in the village of Totton, about four miles out of

Digitized by Google

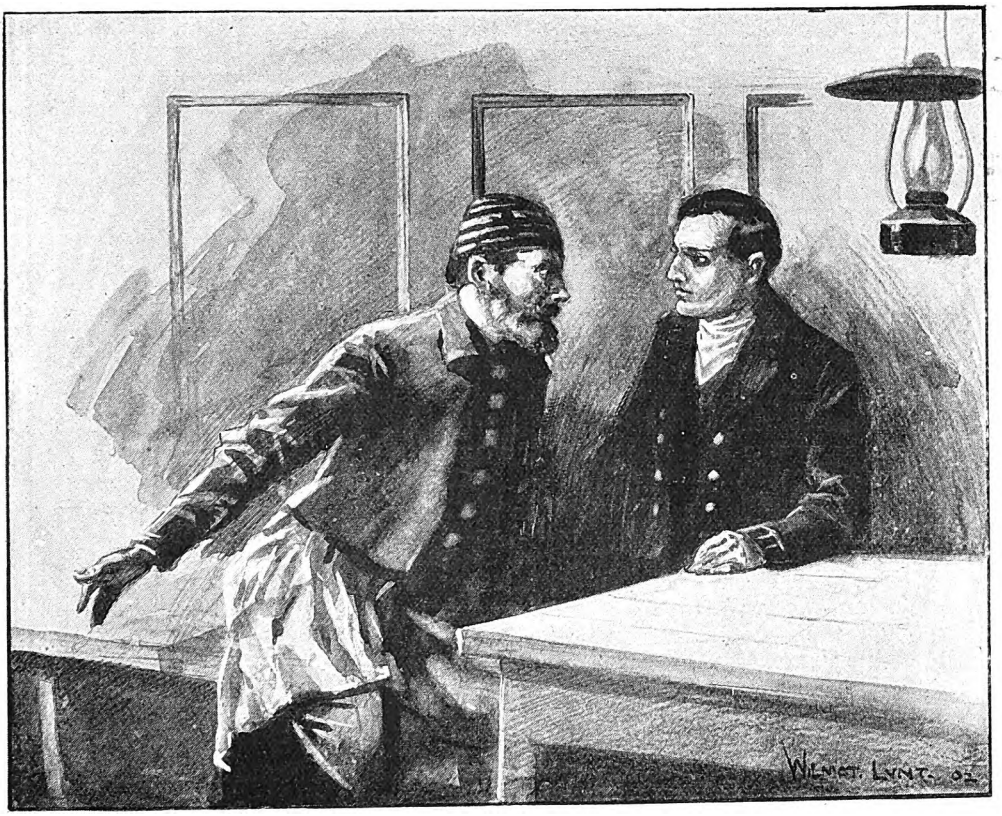
Southampton, on the New Forest Road. He had, I found, re-entered the Navy; but having met with an accident, had been invalided and given a small pension. Ally, he informed me, was the skipper of a small craft purchased with his prize-money, and trading between Guernsey and Southampton.

About a couple of months after this meeting with the father, I fell in with the son. I was strolling, at about eleven in the forenoon, along the front of the Southampton Custom House, when my glance fell upon a young man in a seaman's dress, busily engaged in loading a cart with bundles of laths which had been landed alongside the quay. It was Ally Somers; and so much improved in looks since I last saw him, that, but for a certain air of fragility, he might have been pronounced a handsome, fine young fellow.

The laths which he was so anxiously assisting his three men to cart, he had brought from Guernsey. They were then a very common importation from that island, as it had the right to send its own produce customs-free to England. Only a slight duty, tantamount to what the foreign timber of which the laths were made would have been liable to, was levied upon them. This was ascertained by the proper officer simply measuring the length and girth of the bundles. This had been done, and the labels marked as "passed." It struck me, however, that Ally Somers was

"AS HE WAS LED OFF INTO CUSTODY HE LOOKED THE PICTURE OF DESPAIR."

Digitized by Google



"HE IS THE MAN WHO SOLD ALLY'S SECRET TO THE REVENUE OFFICERS."

greatly flurried and very much excited. When he saw me approaching with the intention of speaking to him, this agitation perceptibly increased. He turned deadly pale, and quite trembled under ill-concealed apprehension. He was somewhat reassured by my frank salutation; and, after a few commonplace enquiries, I walked away. Evidently greatly relieved, he, with his sailors, continued the work of re-loading the cart.

I could not help suspecting that something was wrong, though I could not make up my mind to verify the surmise his perturbed and excited manner suggested. Besides, I might be wrong after all, and I had no right to presume that the officer, who had passed the laths, had not made a sufficient examination of them. The flurry of the young man might arise from physical weakness, and the severe labour he was performing in such hot weather. These reasons, or more truly, these excuses, for doing nothing were passing through my brain, when I observed the hasty approach towards the cart of the collector of customs himself, followed by several of his subordinates. Young Somers saw him as quickly as I did. His first impulse, it was quite plain, was flight. A thought, no doubt, of the hopelessness of such an attempt arrested his steps, and he stood quaking with terror by the side of the cart.

"One of you lend me a knife," said the collector, addressing his officers.

A knife was quickly opened and handed to him. He severed the strong cords, which bound one of the bundles of laths together, and they flew asunder, disclosing a long tin tube, of considerable diameter, closely rammed with tobacco! All the other bundles contained a similar deposit. So large was the quantity of heavily-taxed weed, thus unexpectedly made a lawful prize of, that a profit, I was assured, of not less than £500 or £600 would have been made by the audacious smuggler, had he succeeded in his bold and ingenious attempt. The ends of the bundles had been filled up with short pieces of lath, so that, except by the process adopted, it was not easy to detect that the cargo was not bona fide what it had been declared to be. The penalties to which Somers had rendered himself liable were immense.

Digitized by Google

The vessel also was forfeited, and the unfortunate young man's liberty at the mercy of the Crown. As he was led off in custody, he looked the very picture of despair, and I felt that ruin, utter and complete, had fallen upon him.

The consequences which I chiefly feared came to pass even more speedily than I had apprehended. It was impossible to liquidate the penalties incurred, and Ally Somers was imprisoned as a Crown debtor. The prospect of an indefinite term of imprisonment, with other causes of grief and depression—he was to have been married had the venture succeeded—broke down the always fragile health of the prisoner.

The tidings were brought to me by the old man himself. I was seated in the cabin of the Rose cutter when it was announced that John Somers was alongside in a boat, and wished to see me. I directed that he should be allowed to come on board, and presently the old man, with despair visible on every line of his countenance, in every glance of his restless, flaming eyes, entered the cabin.

"I come to tell you, sir, that Ally's dead."

"I was somewhat prepared for this bad news, Mr. Somers," I answered. "It's hard upon you, but it should be bravely borne with."

He laughed strangely. "To be sure—to be sure," he said, "that is wise counsel—very wise; but that which I want now more than wise counsel is ten pounds, which I shall never be able to pay back!"

"Ten pounds!"

"Yes; you may remember that I once saved your life. If that piece of service was worth the sum I have named, you can now discharge the obligation. I have parted with everything, and Ally's last prayer was to be buried beside his—beside a grave—an early and untimely one like his own, many miles away."

"I understand; it is a natural and pious wish, and you shall have the money."

"Thank you. The funeral over, I have one more thing to do in life, and that is to assist you in securing Cocquerel whilst running one of his most valuable cargoes.'

"Cocquerel, the Guernseyman, you mean?"

"Ay, so he calls himself; but I fancy he at one time hailed from another port. He is the man who sold Ally's secret to the inland-revenue officers!"

"Are you sure?"

"As death! He was Ally's only confidant, and Ally's father is now in Cocquerel's confidence. It is but natural," he added, and a bitter smile curled his ashy lips, "it is but natural, you know, that I should be eager in pillaging a government which caged my son, and held him under its iron bars till life had fled. Cocquerel understands this, and trusts me fully; but that which he does not understand, know, or suspect," continued the fierce old man, sinking his voice into a whisper, and leaning forward with his face close to mine, "is that John Somers has found out who it was that sold his boy's life! Did he know that, know me too, there would be sounder sleepers than he in these dark nights."

"What do you mean?"

"Nothing more, of course," he added, in a more checked and guarded tone, "than to retort the trick he played Ally—something after his own fashion."

"That is fair revenge enough, and I'll not baulk you, Now, then, for your plan."

Various details were discussed, and it was settled that on that day week, Somers was again to communicate with me. He then took his leave.

At the appointed time Somers returned, and appeared to be in quite high spirits. Everything was, he said, arranged, and success all but certain. His scheme was then canvassed, and finally agreed upon, and he again left the vessel.

Cocquerel intended running a large cargo on the coast of Dorsetshire, to the north of Portland, at a place where the cliffs are high, precipitous, and abrupt, and, at that time, very inefficiently watched by a shore force. Near the spot selected is, or was, a kind of cavern, worn by the action of the sea in the chalky stratum, which at neap-tides was partially dry, and at the time of our enterprise would effectually conceal a boat from the observation of anyone who did not actually peer into its mouth. Cocquerel was to leave Guernsey the next day in a large boat, with two lug sails, but chiefly depending for speed upon its sweeps. It was calculated that he would reach his destination about midnight. Somers had taken the duty of shore-signalman, and if danger was apprehended, was to warn the smugglers that "hawks" were abroad by burning a blue light.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

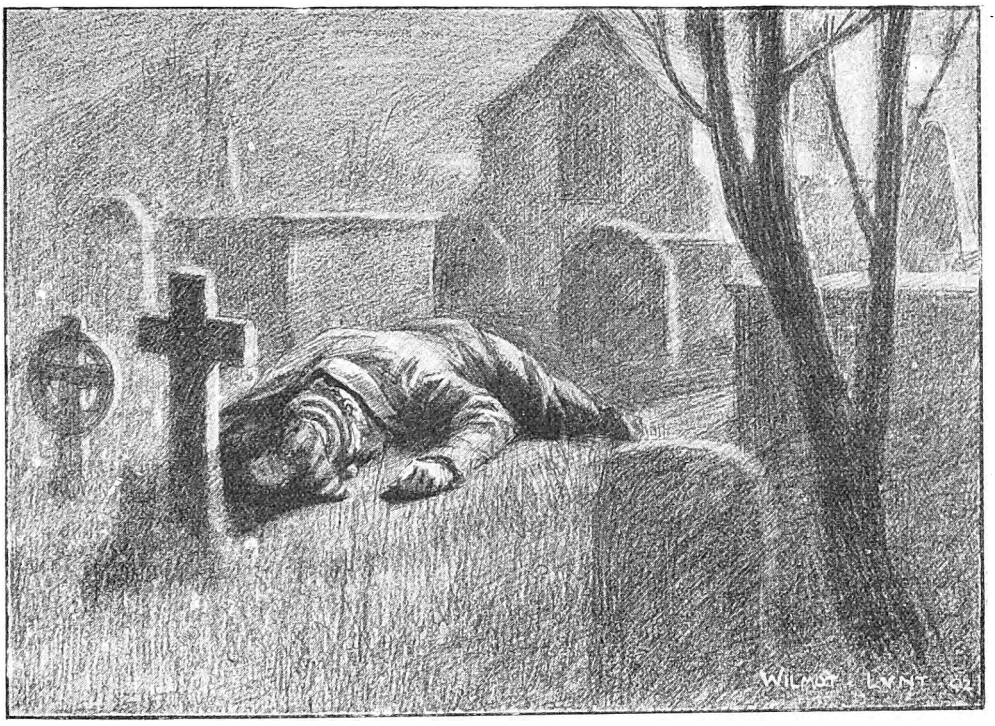
The manner of running the cargo was to be this: Somers was provided with a windlass and sufficient length of rope to reach the boat, with a kind of rope-cradle at the end of it, in which a man could sit, or a couple of kegs be slung. The windlass he was to secure firmly to the edge of the cliff, and two or three of the men having been drawn up, other windlasses were to be fixed. It was calculated that in about half-an-hour the entire cargo would be landed and safely carried off by the carts which Somers had undertaken to have in readiness. The signal for our appearance on the scene of action, the positive old man insisted should be that agreed upon for warning the smugglers—a sudden ignition of a blue light. This did not seem the best possible mode of procedure; but, as the cavern in which we were to conceal ourselves was but a few yards northward of the spot marked out for the landing of the cargo, and Somers promised he would only give the signal when the smugglers were in full work, I had little fear that, barring accidents, they would be able to escape us.

The next afternoon, the largest boat belonging to the Rose was fully manned; and leaving the cutter quietly at anchor in the Southampton river, just above Calshot, we pulled with the tide to our hiding place, which we reached about eight o'clock in the evening.

The hours crept very slowly and dismally away, amidst the darkness and hoarse echoes and moanings of the cavern, into which the sea and wind, which were gradually rising, dashed and howled with increasing violence. Occasional peeps at my watch, by the light of a lantern carefully shaded seaward, warned us that ten, eleven, twelve, one o'clock had passed, without bringing the friends we were so anxiously expecting; and fears of ultimate disappointment were chilling us, far more than the cold night-breeze, when a man in the bow of the boat said, in a whisper, he could hear the dash of oars. We all instantly listened with eager attention; but it was not until we had brought the boat to the entrance of the opening that the man's assertion was verified. There it was clear enough, and the near approach of a large boat, with the regular jerk of the oars or sweeps, was distinctly audible. The loud, clear

JOHN SOMERS.

Digitized by Google



THE BODY OF AN AGED MAN WAS FOUND FROZEN TO DEATH IN THE CHURCHYARD OF—— NEAR TWO ADJOINING GRAVES, ONE OF WHICH WAS THAT OF ALICE MAYNARD.

hail of their shore-signalman, answered by the "All right" of the smugglers, left no doubt that the expected prey was within our grasp. I had a mind to pounce upon them at once, but was withheld by a promise, which I had been obliged several times to repeat, that I would not, under any circumstances, do so till the signal-flame sent its light over the water.

As soon as the noise and bustle of laying in the sweeps, lowering in the sails, and unstepping the masts, had subsided, we heard Somers hail the boat, and insist that the captain should come up before any of the others, as there was a difficulty about the carts which he could not settle. The reply was a growl of assent, and we could hear, by the click of the windlass-pall, that Somers was paying out the rope. Presently Cocquerel was heard to get into the cradle I have spoken of, to which a line was fastened in order to steady his ascent from below. The order was given to turn away, and the renewed click, click, announced that he was ascending the face of the cliff.

This manœuvre considerably puzzled me. It seemed to indicate the escape of the very man we were most anxious to secure, and the order to shove off was just on my lips, when a powerful blue-light flamed suddenly forth, accompanied by a fierce, but indistinct shout, or roar rather, from Somers. My men replied with a loud cheer, and we shot smartly out; but, having to row in a straight direction for about a cable's length, to avoid a line of reef, the smugglers, panic-stricken and bewildered as they were, had time to get away on their lugger, and were plying their sweeps with desperate energy before our boat was fairly turned in pursuit. The frantic endeavour to escape was vain, as was the still more wild effort at resistance offered when we ran alongside. We did not hurt them much; one or two were knocked down by the sailors' brass butted pistols; and, after being secured, they had the leisure to vent their rage in curses, part French, part English, and part Guernsey patois, while I looked round to see what had become of Cocquerel.

Digitized by Google

The blue light still shed a lurid radiance all round, and, to my inexpressible horror and dismay I saw that the unfortunate man was suspended in the rope cradle, within about a fathom's length of the brow of the cliff. Here Somers was standing gazing at his victim with looks of demoniacal rage and triumph. There was no mistaking the deadly trap contrived by the inexorable old man; and to Cocquerel's frenzied screams for help I replied by shouting to him to cut himself loose at once, as his only chance, for the barrel of a pistol gleamed distinctly in the hands of Somers.

"Lieutenant Warneford!" cried the exulting maniac—he was nothing else—"I have caught this Cocquerel for you nicely—got him swinging in the prettiest cradle he was ever rocked in in all his life. Ha! ha! ha!"

"Cut loose at once," I again shouted; and the men, as terribly impressed as myself with the horror of the wretched smuggler's position, swept the boat rapidly towards the spot.

"Somers, if you shoot that man, you shall die on the gallows!"

"Cut himself loose, do you say, lieutenant?" screamed Somers, heedless of my last observation, "he can't! he has no knife—ha! ha! ha! And if he had this pistol would be swifter than that. But I'll cut him loose presently, never fear. Look here, Jacques Cocquerel," he continued, laying himself flat down on to the cliff, and stretching his right arm over it till the mouth of his pistol was within a yard of Cocquerel's head, "This contains payment in full for your kindness to Ally Somers—a debt which I could in no other manner completely repay!"

At this moment the blue light suddenly expired; and we were involved in what by contrast was total darkness. The frantic laughter and exulting gibes of the merciless old man, Somers, in answer to Cocquerel's shrieking appeals for mercy, could still be heard. Then, after a while, we heard the words, "One, two, three!" followed by the report of a pistol, and a dark body shot down the white face of the cliff, disappearing beneath the waters.

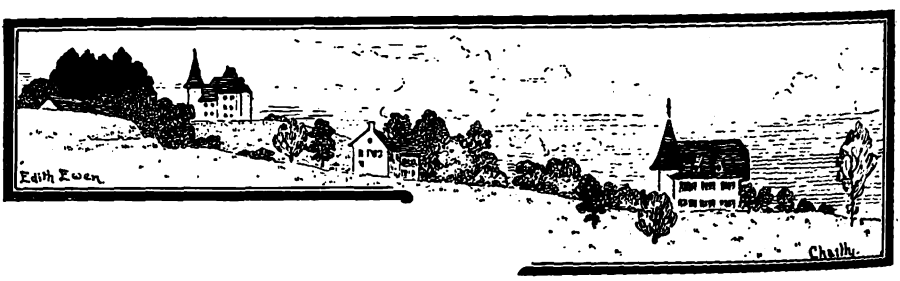
* * * * * *

The body of Cocquerel never reappeared, nor did I ever see Somers again. But some years afterwards I was glancing through the Hampshire Telegraph, when I came across the following paragraph:—

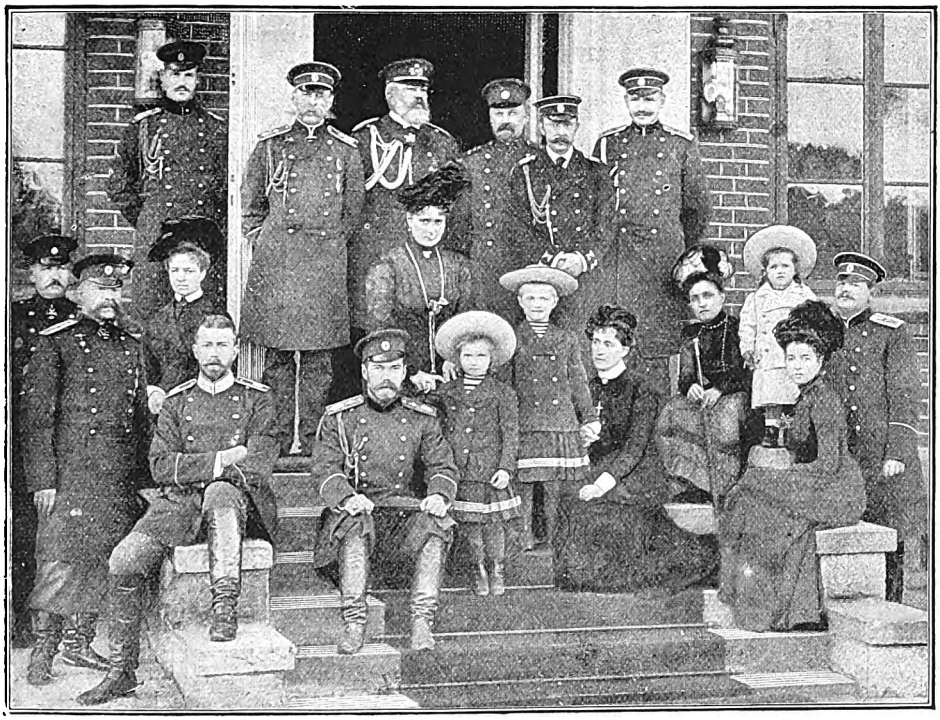
"The body of an aged man was found frozen to death in the churchyard of—on Wednesday morning last, near two adjoining graves, one of which, that of Alice Maynard, recalls the painful circumstances connected with the sad story of the death of that ill-fated, and, as we believe, entirely innocent woman. At the inquest held on Friday, it was ascertained beyond a doubt that the deceased is John Maynard, who after his wife's untimely death, assumed the name of Somers, and was, we believe, the person who shot a French smuggler. with whom he had quarrelled, at the back of the Isle of Wight, under somewhat peculiar circumstances, about seven years ago. He was buried in the grave that contains the body of his son, John Alice Maynard, which was interred there shortly before the commission of the homicide just alluded to. There has never been, to our knowledge, any regular investigation of that affair; but we believe now, as we did then, that Maynard's pistol was pointed by a frantic and causeless jealousy."

There are several mistakes in this paragraph, sufficiently obvious to the reader; but of the main fact that John Somer alias Maynard, perished as described the can be no reasonable doubt.

[THE END.]



Digitized by Google



THE CZAR AND THE CZARINA AND PRINCE HENRY OF PRUSSIA.

THE CZAR'S SIMPLE LIFE.

By Fritz Morris.

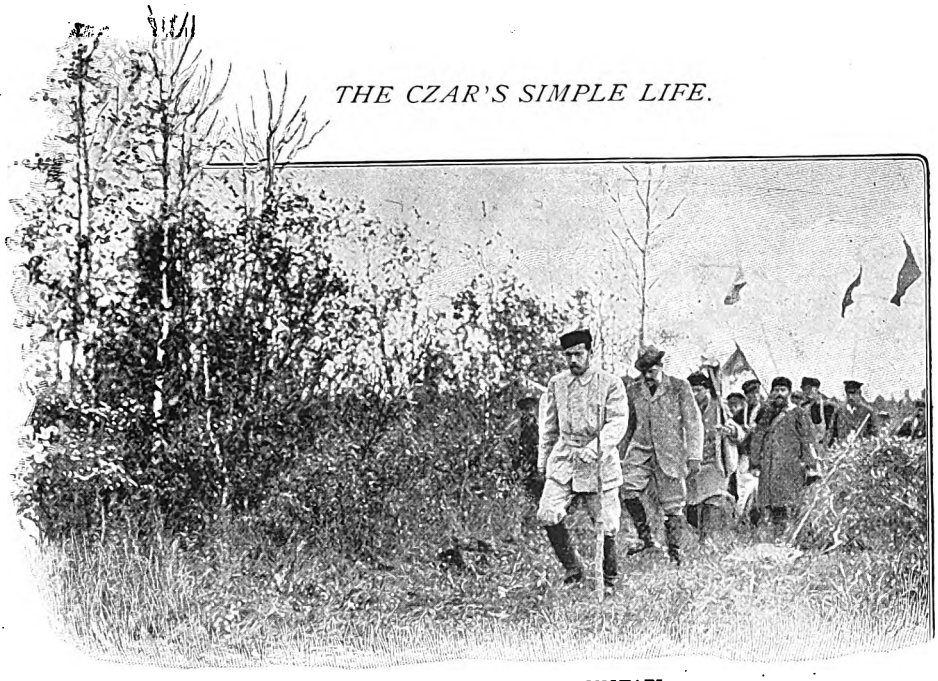
THOUGH the Czar of Russia is the richest man in the world, and the disposal of every penny raised for the government is absolutely in his control, and though he draws upon it to as great an extent as he pleases, as if it were his private purse, the home life of the imperial couple of Russia is very simple, and almost without ceremony. The Czarina in manner is charming and diffident, more like a very young girl, perhaps, than an empress. She blushes very easily, and has a trick of drooping her head. She dresses as an English lady and looks English.

Although she has wonderful pearls, star-sapphires, and cabochon rubies, she seldom wears jewels. The Czar generally dresses in simple Russian costume in the palace. He, too, has a very quiet and gentle manner, but great determination, and both he and the Czarina are held in great awe by those around them.

The Czar rises at eight, and his toilet lasts until nearly nine o'clock, when he sits down at his writing-table to discharge such important matters of state as do not admit of delay. From ten until eleven o'clock he enjoys a short rest, during which he

Digitized by Google

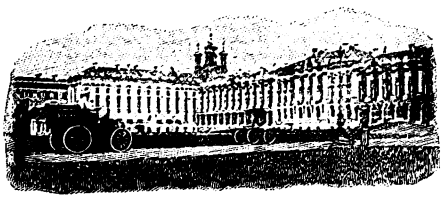
Digitized by Google



THE CZAR AND THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL.

and festivities interfere now and then with the daily routine of his life, but the ministers try as much as possible to keep his working hours uninterrupted.

Czar Nicholas is a curious contrast to his father. In disposition, as well as in bodily presence, he differs strangely from his parent. Alexander was not a highly educated man. His elder brother Nicholas had been carefully taught and trained for the responsibilities he was to bear, but his death, at the age of twenty-two, placed Alexander in the position of heir to the throne, and he was then too old to learn, nor could he afford the necessary time. Before he succeeded to the throne, a very unfortunate incident occurred which proved how cruel he could be. An officer of Swedish origin had been sent to the United States to order rifles for the Russian army. On his return he had to report to the Czarewitch, who was appointed to superintend the re-arming of the troops. During the interview the Prince lost his temper and began to scold sharply. The officer replied with dignity, whereupon Alexander fell into a fit of fury, and loaded the man with insult. The man bowed himself out of the royal presence, went home and wrote a letter to the heir-apparent, asking him to apologize within twenty-four hours, adding that if the apology did not come he would shoot himself. The Czarewitch took no notice, sending neither excuse nor apology, and the officer kept his word. The Czar heard the story and was very angry with his son, and ordered him to follow the hearse of the officer to the grave. But even this terrible lesson failed to cure Alexander of his haughtiness. The gentle ways of the present Czar, and his unwillingness to hurt the feelings of any one, are in sharp contrast to the cruelty of the father.



THE PALACE AT TSARSKOYE SELO.

THE CZAR ENTERING HIS CARRIAGE.

Digitized by Google

THE CZAR AND CZARINA, AND THE GRAND DUKE VLADIMIR AND WIFE.

Unlike his father, he makes a point, whenever it is possible, of driving out alone with the Empress and with a small attendance. He does not give notice of his drives and walks abroad, and is often quite unnoticed. The late Czar, when he drove out, had the streets lined with troops, and always drove in a splendid equipage surrounded by his guards and attendants, while the police now seldom know in what direction their Emperor means to drive. The etiquette of the Russian court also has become much less strict since the accession of Nicholas II., and all his subjects are allowed admission to his presence. The peasants will travel hundreds of miles to bring their petitions to him, for they know that the Czar will personally receive them and will himself read what they have written. He is grave in public, but in private he is full of fun, and very fond of chaffing the members of his intimate circle. The Czarina exactly suits her husband, and a happier family life cannot be imagined. Her Majesty is almost always with the Czar, even when he is at work, and when statesmen come to see him His Majesty often begs her to stay with them. By the Russian people the present Czar and Czarina are greatly beloved, but among the members of the court there are many who sigh for the times when the Czarina Marie Feodorowna was reigning Empress, because she was conservative and fondly cherished all the tradition of court ceremonials.

The Czar has many palaces, but those he most frequently occupies are the winter palace in St. Petersburg, Peterhof in the suburbs of the city which is copied after Versailles, and Livadia in the Crimea. The winter palace can accommodate about six thousand persons and contains some magnificent apartments; but the rooms of the Czar and Czarina are very plainly furnished in English fashion, and look more like the apartments of a middle-class family. Like all Russian palaces, the winter palace is a combination of splendor and seediness. Visitors are shown through many chambers, where everything is adapted for the most gorgeous ceremonials of state, but other parts of the palace are in a state of positive neglect. The balls and banquets at the winter palace are celebrated for their magnificence, especially the fêtes of the first of January, and have always been worthy of the ruler of so vast an empire. At the suppers

THE CZAR'S SUBURBAN PALACE.

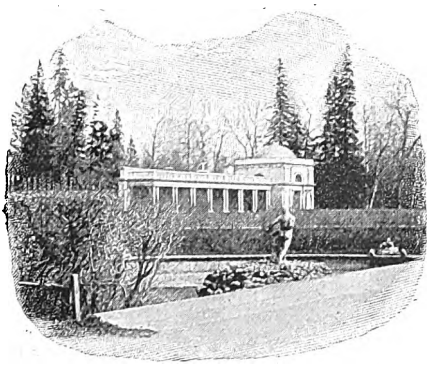
Digitized by Google

for three or four hundred guests a unique decoration is often introduced. Immense orange trees, planted in tubs, are placed upon the ground, and so arranged as to come up between the compartments of the long tables, in which a space is cut out to admit of the trunk, allowing the rich foliage and fruit to shadow the tables. Soon after his accession, the Czar laid out four hundred thousand dollars in remodeling and refurnishing the royal kitchens at the winter palace. All the cooking utensils are of solid silver. The spice-boxes are of solid gold, engraved with the royal arms, and the ranges and ovens are edged with silver. The actual cost of rebuilding the kitchens was one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the purest black marble being used throughout. Among the cooking utensils there is a gold gridiron that belonged to the great Catherine.

The chief cook draws a salary of forty thousand dollars a year and he has six assistants and an army of hundreds of supernumeraries. The "leavings" must be considerable, for every day a large quantity of wines and cigars is furnished for the imperial dinner, and there is a strict rule that no bottle, whether opened or not, shall be presented twice at the Czar's table. It is said that this rule is rigidly enforced and if so it can readily be seen that the lot of a chef in the Russian Royal Palace is by no means unhappy.

The Czar owns the greatest collection of china in the world. He has the china belonging to all the Russian rulers as far back as Catherine the Great, and it is stored in immense closets in the winter palace. As the Czar's suite is immense the winter palace is generally well peopled. The suite consists of one hundred and seventy-three persons, of whom seventy-three are generals, and seventy-six extra aides-de-camp; to the suite belong fifteen members of the imperial family, seventeen princes not of imperial birth, seventeen counts, nine barons, and one hundred and eleven other noblemen.

THE DOWAGER EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.



A PAVILION IN THE IMPERIAL PARK.

The favorite sojourning place of the imperial family is at Tsarskoye Selo, a suburb of St. Petersburg. There is a large lake with miniature craft of all nations sailing on its waters, and in a summer house on the grounds the Czar and Czarina frequently dine without any attendants being present. When a course is finished a bell is touched, and the table sinks through the floor immediately, returning with the next course upon it, in Arabian Nights fashion.

Digitized by Google

The languages used by the Czar and Czarina in their private intercourse are English and German—French and Italian being seldom spoken by their Majesties when alone. The Czarina did not learn Russian until after her betrothal, and though as yet she speaks it very slowly, it is with a good accent and great distinctness. Nicholas II. is a very religious man and his attendance at the orthodox services is quite regular. He prefers the service of his own private chapels, though on state occasions he is obliged to put in an appearance at the Kremlin in Moscow, where his coronation took place. This church is a most remarkable building. The walls and pillars are overlaid with gold; frescoed angels and saints picked out with real diamonds and rubies add to the brilliance, and the roof is gay with gold and scarlet.

THE CZAR AND THE CZARINA.

It has been said that no sovereign is as wealthy as the Czar, and it must be added that no sovereign is under greater expense. The Grand Dukes Vladimir, Alexis, Serge, Paul and the Grand Duke Michael Nicholajevitch, as the sons of Emperors of Russia, receive from the head of the house an annual sum of one hundred and eighty-five thousand roubles, which, added to their private means, makes them very rich. The wives and widows of Russian grand dukes receive forty thousand roubles, their sons one hundred and fifty thousand roubles. A rouble is equal to about seventy-seven cents. It was the late Emperor Alexander III. who made the rule that every member of the Russian imperial family must spend a part of the year in Russia, or else lose a third of his allowance.

More than one good story is told of the Czar's sarcasms and repartee. On one notable occasion he reduced a Russian general to a frightful state of consternation. It happened soon after his accession, and before his coronation, that he was cycling in the park at Gatschina, wearing, as was his wont, the uniform of a colonel. Something having gone wrong with his chain he got off to adjust it, and, just at that moment, a pompous general from a distant province passed. Not receiving the salute due to him, the officer stepped up to the supposed colonel and peremptorily requested an explanation of the seeming discourtesy. "I am so sorry," said the Czar, sweetly, "I have not yet had the honor of becoming acquainted with you, owing to the shortness of my reign, or I should, of course, have done so."

A prominent Russian statesman is such a perfect double of the Czar that he is often taken for his imperial ruler. "Count

Digitized by Google

THE CZAR RECEIVING PRESIDENT LOUBET ON HIS RECENT VISIT TO RUSSIA.

——" said the considerate ruler of Russia, to his double, "why don't you alter your appearance somewhat—shave off your beard, for instance? You, knocking about as you do, and so resembling your unfortunate Emperor, run terrible risks—frightful risks." "What!" exclaimed the faithful count. "What, I resembling Your Imperial Majesty as I do, alter my face? Never, sir, never!" "Ah, well, Count ——" replied the Czar, smiling and shrugging his shoulders, "as you will not alter your face yourself, some of my Nihilist subjects will alter it for you, I fear."

A characteristic story of the Czar's love of simplicity has been going the rounds of St. Petersburg lately. A certain lieutenant who was in a perpetual state of impecuniosity was one day seen riding in a street car. The other officers of the regiment were furious at what they called an insult to the uniform and intimated to the culprit that he had the option of sending in his papers or being cashiered, and the unlucky subaltern took the former alternative. Before he had time to do so, however, the Czar heard of the affair, and without a moment's delay donned a colonel's uniform of the regiment in question, and sauntering out of his palace hailed a car, entered it and sat calmly down until it stopped in front of the barracks. He desired the officers to be called, and addressed them thus: "Gentlemen, I have just ridden from the palace in a street car, and I wish to know if you desire me to send in my papers? I presume I have disgraced my uniform." "Sire," replied the major, nervously, "Your Majesty could never do that." "Then," replied the Czar with an amused smile, "as I have not degraded the uniform, Lieutenant D. cannot have done

THE CZAR GIVING ORDERS TO AN AIDE-DE-CAMP. THE GRAND DUKE CONSTANTINE STANDS IN THE REAR.

Digitized by Google

LIVADIA IN THE CRIMEA, ONE OF THE CZAR'S FAVORITE PALACES.

so, and will thus retain his commission in this regiment, even if he, like me, dares to ride in a public conveyance."

The Czarina is as fond of a joke and a prank as is her lord. During last summer's visit to Kiel she and her sister, Princess Heinrich, were paying a visit on Sunday morning to an art shop in the Danische Strasse. A crowd of inquisitive citizens waited outside to see the ladies come out, and it was a crowd which increased every minute. Half an hour, and an hour went by, and still the expectant ones waited in vain, until a whisper went round that the Czarina and the Princess were back at the Schloss. On perceiving the denseness of the crowd Her Imperial Majesty asked the manager if he had not a back exit to his house. She was told the way was barred by a low wooden fence. "Oh, we can manage that," laughed the Russian Empress, "if you can lend us a ladder." That useful article was found and placed against the boarding, and over sprang the royal ladies, thoroughly enjoying the fun. They went through the court, reached the street on the other side, and regained the Schloss, not far away, in a few minutes.

THE IMPERIAL PARTY ON A STROLL THROUGH THE FOREST.

Digitized by Google

A Run on the Rothmore Bank.

By RALPH RYHAN.

BRIGGS sank back with a sigh of relief and satisfaction into a seat in a compartment of the luxurious class which he always patronized when travelling in the interests of the Bank. He nestled into the softness of the upholstery and realised that there were some compensations for an early rise and a hurried breakfast, and a scramble to catch the train.

At the first stopping place the only other occupant of the compartment alighted, and Briggs decided that it would not be beneath his dignity to dispose of the balance of his breakfast to a more suitable place than his pocket. Thus occupied, the journey passed quickly, and, as he crumpled up the greasy paper and brushed the crumbs off his coat, the train drew up at Rothmore.

He opened the door slowly to enable any acquaintance who might be within view to observe from whence he came, and descended in the staid manner befitting the occupant of a first-class compartment.

As fifteen minutes still remained before the hour for opening, he wended his stately way towards the Bank as though time were of the slightest possible importance.

The branch office of Glynchild's Bank at Rothmore was but a small establishment and the attendance of one clerk and an office boy once a week was amply sufficient to meet the needs of the inhabitants. The work suited Briggs. It was easy, and nevertheless he occupied an important position there in the eyes of the outside world. "A cashier of Glynchild's Bank is no mean thing," said Briggs.

He walked up the steps as the boy was unbolting the door, and jerking a nod in the direction of the bolt, he passed into the office. Unlocking the safe, he took out the books, gave with their assistance a business-like appearance to the counter, and then sat himself down before the till.

The till—as his eyes fell upon it, a horrible thought flashed across his mind, and his hands darted vigorously from pocket to pocket. A cold, creepy sensation came over him. Surely he had not left behind him the hundred pounds for making the payments out during the day. He fingered through his pockets again, searching every crevice, and then in desperation he took down his hat and twirled it in his fingers, whether in the forlorn hope of finding the money inside, or of solving the difficulty by putting it on his head, and quitting Glynchild's Bank for ever, would be difficult to say.

If the former was the case he was disappointed by finding that on this occasion he had not used his head-gear as a temporary strong room; and, if the latter, he apparently thought better of it, for, replacing the hat on its peg, he returned to his seat by the till and gazed fiercely at the entrance door.

"I shall be all right, yet," thought Briggs, "if only someone will pay in first.' The matter did not remain long in doubt. A lady, tall and of a severe type of countenance, entered the Bank. Adjusting her pince-nez she drew a cheque from her handbag and presented it for payment. A cold sweat broke out on Briggs' forehead, and he took up the cheque with fingers which trembled.

His eyes raced up and down the paper, seeking for a flaw.

"Pay to Miss Amelia Spearpoint or order, the sum of twenty pounds (£20)."

He turned it over; yes, endorsed, "Amelia Spearpoint." There could be no question about it. But it was drawn upon another branch of the Bank, and, although

Digitized by Google

Briggs was aware that this cheque came regularly each week, and that the branch had special instructions to honour it, he clutched at the opportunity, and expressing great regret pointed out the defect.

"Dear me," said Miss Spearpoint, "I've never had the cheque questioned before. I must strongly protest against mere boys coming here who know nothing of what they ought to do." Looking him up and down as though he were a cabby and she was intent on getting his number, Miss Amelia Spearpoint bounced out of the Bank.

On any other occasion, Briggs would probably have forcibly expressed his indignation regarding the epithet, but under present circumstances he was thankful to get off so lightly. By this time a broad smile enveloped the face of the junior, and Briggs' sense of propriety was so shattered, by his position, that he smiled vacantly in return.

But the time for smiling passed away, and Briggs braced himself to repel another attack as the door opened, and a lad stepped up to the counter and slapped down a cheque.

Briggs smiled again. The fates are propitious, thought Briggs.

"I'm sorry I can't cash this," said he, "It's crossed you see, and can only be paid into an account."

"Just what I want to do, there's the paying-in slip, don't you see," said the boy. "All the same, you don't seem sorry at not having to cash it; is the Bank going broke?"

Briggs realised that his anxiety was mastering his prudence, and pulling himself together, he had the sense to say nothing, and instead cast a look of withering scorn upon the clerk.

The doors swung open again, and a girl entered and presented a cheque for payment.

"Oh, I am very sorry but this cheque has to be endorsed. You see it is payable to Mr. John Hunnybun, and he must sign it on the back." Briggs took care not to smile this time, but his spirits were quite braced up, and he was beginning to enter into the fun of the thing now that the fates were so clearly on his side.

"Of course, how silly of me," said the girl. "I'll get pa to sign it. We live just round the corner, you know."

"Oh, I don't know," gasped Briggs.

The bolt had fallen. Three pounds ten! The irony of it, to be beaten for a paltry three pounds ten. No, he would not be beaten. He caught up his hat and telling the junior to apologise to the girl for his absence, on an appointment for a few minutes, Briggs sped off down the street.

One or two of the shopkeepers came out to gaze after him. It was an event to see the stately Briggs run, and novelties were few and far between in Rothmore.

The butcher nodded across the street to Potts the greengrocer.

"There ain't been the like o' that seen here before, and maybe won't be seen again," and the two worthies felt an inward complacency, for they were in advance of some of their less fortunate neighbours in having witnessed so strange and interesting a sight.

At the shop above which three balls were suspended, Briggs slackened his pace, and after a nervous glance right and left, he hastily entered.

"Good morning, Mr. Briggs," said the pawnbroker, who well recollected the cashier, and Briggs on his side recalled with regret a certain stormy interview in which he and the pawnbroker had taken part. The man had rushed up to cash a cheque as the doors of the Bank were being closed, Briggs remembered. He could, however, only trust that the pawnbroker did not cherish malice, for Rothmore had no room for more than one merchant of this class.

It would probably have suited Briggs' purpose better if he had opened proceedings with some of the commonplaces of conversation, but his agitation was too extreme. "I want this changing," said he, taking out his watch and pushing it into the pawnbroker's hand.

"Changing?" said the pawnbroker, idly turning the watch over and over.

"I only want three pounds ten for it," explained Briggs, "until to-morrow—quite a temporary embarrassment."

The pawnbroker smiled good-humouredly. He saw that Briggs was desperate.

"I will do anything to oblige you, Mr. Briggs, but of course, three pounds ten is impossible, quite ridiculous."

"How—what—why—" said Briggs at intervals.

"Well, you see this would only cost two pounds or two pounds ten, perhaps, when it was new." He stopped a coming

Digitized by Google

"BRIGGS SPED OFF DOWN THE STREET," exclamation from Briggs, and proceeded, "But Mr. Briggs, seeing as you are a friend, I'll let you have two pounds on it."

"Two pounds! You might as well offer me two shillings. I must have three pounds ten."

The pawnbroker lifted up his hands deprecatingly.

"Only until to-morrow," pleaded Briggs.

"Links?" queried the pawnbroker, mysteriously.

Briggs tore at his shirt-cuffs, and handed over a pair of gold links to the critical examination with a sigh of relief.

"I'm in rather a hurry," said Mr. Briggs.

The remark was fully borne out by appearances, and was in fact needless, but it did not seem to affect the pawnbroker, who after much thought and deliberation, agreed to stretch a point and make it three pcunds if the llnks were thrown in.

Briggs groaned aloud. and even the pawnbroker looked worried. "It must be three pounds ten," Briggs could only repeat.

At last a happy thought seemed to strike the pawnbroker. "I wouldn't do this for no other person, but I'll do it for you, Mr. Briggs; add your coat and waistcoat, and it's a bargain!"

"Give me back my things," said the indignant Briggs, and seizing his watch and links he made for the door.

But no welcome appeal to him to stop came from the rear. At the doorway he lingered fidgeting with his cuffs, but no sign came from the pawnbroker.

Briggs slunk back to the counter.

"Just put this in," said he, attempting to re-open the negotiations by holding out his cuff for the link to be inserted.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, certainly, sir," said the smiling one.

"Here dash it, take the coat," said Briggs, breaking away and removing that garment.

"And the waistcoat, you remember, sir!"

The waistcoat followed, a button torn away in the process.

"I'm very sorry, sir," said the obsequious pawnbroker, "but you know, sir, business in business."

"You had better take my hat too," said the wretched Briggs. "With a hat and without a coat, I should look a fool!"

The pawnbroker might have observed that a hat more or less would not affect his appearance. But he had obtained his triumph and could afford to be merciful.

"Quick with the Three ten," said Briggs, and the pawnbroker, after the necessary formalities, handed him the money, and Briggs sped away up the street.

The passers-by stared. The butcher carving a joint barely escaped cutting off his thumb in his excitement, but he glowed with satisfaction as he noted how he had scored over the greengrocer, who was too busy with a customer to witness the phenomenon, and the landlord of the Blue Dragon rubbed his hands at the thought of the thirst likely to be engendered by the strife of tongues in the bar-parlour that evening.

Never had Briggs found the street so full. He fixed his eyes on the friendly haven of the Bank, and raced up the hill. His grip on the gold almost forced the pieces through the skin. It perhaps made him speed the faster At last, at last—oh, never had the way seemed so long—at last the Bank grew big before him, and as the folding doors received him the crowd breathed again.

Within the Bank the appearance of things had changed but little. In the absence of his senior, the office boy had been making himself agreeable to the girl who was now seated upon a stool brought from behind the counter.

She started up, and the stool fell over as the apparition glided in between the folding doors. The office boy started up in sympathy with her, and his stool reeled with excitement.

With the little breath remaining in him, Briggs blurted out something relating to "an engagement—very sorry—detained longer than any reason to anticipate," and then in answer to the questioning glance at his shirt sleeves he was proceeding to assure her that his desire not to keep her waiting accounted for their being in view, as he had found that a jacket and waistcoat would have seriously impeded his speedy return, when the doors opened once more and the form of an old gentleman tottered up to the counter.

This was the last straw! The distracted Briggs pushed the hard-gained coin across the counter to the girl, and dashed into the back room.

"It is the only way," the wretched Briggs decided, as hastily pulling down the register of the fire-grate, and adding some paper and straw to the summer ornamentations it contained, he applied a match to the heap. For a moment he watched to see it well alight. He must have no mistake this time. Then closing the door he returned to his place.

"It is a lovely morning, sir," said Briggs, referring doubtless to the old gentleman's point of view.

"Indeed so," said the old gentleman, taking out his pocket-case, and placing upon the counter some notes and gold. The old gentleman was going to pay in!

Why, oh why had he struck that fatal match. He glanced apprehensively in the direction of the door.

The old gentleman, noting the look, glanced also. "Fire" he quavered, and wildly snatching up his notes and gold toddled towards the exit as smoke came pouring out through the chinks and crevices.

Briggs was over the counter at a bound. Safety was within his grasp.

"It is all right, pray do not alarm yourself, sir. I will go and see to it in a moment, but I need not keep you waiting. Only the steam from my jacket drying before the fire. Caught in the rain, you see," said he, exhibiting his shirt sleeves.

The old gentleman looked bewildered.

"Rain?" said he, for there had been no rain at Rothmore for weeks.

"Yes, very wet—thunderstorm, you know," said Briggs. He was in for it now, and he must see it through somehow. The sooner the better, for the smoke was increasing.

"Thunderstorm?" repeated the old gentleman, feebly.

Digitized by Google

"HERE, DASH IT, TAKE THE COAT," SAID BRIGGS.

"Perhaps you didn't get it here. Very local, I believe, very local," said Briggs, gaining courage as the old gentleman hesitated.

"It smells very like burning," said the old gentleman.

"Perhaps it is my coat; but it's of no consequence. Pray don't let me keep you, sir," said Briggs, gallantly. "I can see to that afterwards."

And the old gentleman handed over the notes and gold.

"That young man is getting quite civil," thought he, as he was bowed through the folding doors.

"Don't sit gaping there, you little simpleton," screamed Briggs to the boy as the old gentleman vanished. "There's a pail of water behind the door."

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

How Fashions are Set.

By Nancy M. W. Woodrow.

"So many worlds: so little done!" cries the poet distractedly, and for once the materialist agrees with him.

So many worlds in this mutable, inconstant, kaleidoscopic cosmos of ours!—the worlds of art, of religion, of letters, of politics, of science, of philanthropy, with their innumerable subdivisions and ramifications; while distinct from all, yet trenching upon each, is that Olympus of earth, the World of Fashion. For the fiats of its sovereigns rule the arbiters of those lesser worlds, and even invade the great silent realm beyond them all.

"Betty, give this cheek a little red;
One need not sure look ugly, tho' one's dead."

It is no workaday world, this, shadowed by the cares and pains of toiling humanity; but a dainty, bonbon, spun-sugar realm where all unpleasant occurrences are relegated to the background, and the stage is always set for the drawing-room.

One may describe it and its suzerains unlimitedly; but the thing itself, Fashion, which to the worldly-minded always conveys the last supreme grace—what is it? It is a bauble, a toy, a trifle light as air; but, to him who possesses it, a scepter of infinite power. Millions have been bartered for it, lives lost; yet to most of its great leaders it has come as a birthright, a divine gift, "like Dian's kiss, unasked, unsought."

The satirical question rings down the ages, "Can a man by taking thought add one cubit to his stature?" Undoubtedly not; still, in some marvelous way, when the mode demands it we can make ourselves curiously plastic. Was not every woman a "Mrs. Cimabue Brown" when the Pre-raffaelites first achieved their conquest of England? Recall how the "Gibson man" sprang up like Mlle. Cavalieri.

Digitized by Google

Jonah's gourd all over the country as soon as that artist's clever conception was accepted as a model of masculine form.

We are tall and lithe and lissom, or short and round and plump, just as fashion dictates. This year, one's hair may be dark and one's cheek exhibit a distinguished pallor; next year, we see nothing but golden tresses and the bloom of perpetual roses.

A generation ago, a cartoon appeared in one of the comic papers representing a darky beau inquiring solicitously of his coal-black lady, "W'ich does yo' prefer, Miss Johnsing—blarnds er bluenettes?"; and, when Fashion decides the momentous question for a particular season, we at once become dusky as creole beauties, or dazzlingly fair as Norse maidens, according to her latest edict.

Yes, beyond peradventure, Fashion rules: but who rules Fashion? What is the impalpable, intangible quality which makes a woman a leader among her sisters, an authority on modes? There are many great ladies, but they do not all set fashions.

What, then, is this attribute of the chosen few, which causes their appearance, manners, gestures, and tricks of speech to be so slavishly copied, not only within the confines of their own charmed circle, but equally, if in somewhat exaggerated fashion, by every village belle and city shop-girl in the land?

COUNTESS OF ANNESLEY.

Portrait by Hall.

COMTESSE DE BRISSAC.

It is a quality as elusive, as difficult to define, as unassertive yet as potent, as the taste of a strawberry, the scent of a violet or the fascination of a woman. Perhaps, after all, it may be largely interpreted by that hackneyed phrase, personal magnetism.

There are, for instance, in the world of Fashion hundreds of rich, prominent and beautiful women yet among them all there are only one or two who are able to exclaim with the positive assurance of a Louis XIV., "I am the state!"

It is these last who are the arbiters in all matters of dress and decorum. They are the women who leave a definite mark on their day; whose sayings, doings, manner of wearing the hair and of carrying a sunshade, invite notice and command imitation. They possess the

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Portrait by Hall. DUCHESSE DE B——.

The same authority dresses her hair low; and it is a trifle amusing to note how in this coronation year women are almost universally coiling their locks about the napes of their necks, entirely regardless of the suitability of the style to the contours of differing heads.

The historical examples of queens and great ladies who have held sway in the world of Fashion are very numerous, and in most cases very trite. Some of the stories we of the present day are apt to find extremely ludicrous; as, for instance, that of the introduction of linen chemises by Isabella of Bavaria, wife of Charles VI., and a lady who was widely noted for her extravagance in dress.

Previous to her day, the grandes dames of that period had deemed it no disgrace to wear a garment of humble woolen stuff; but when Isabella proudly exhibited two linen smocks as the crowning glory of her gorgeous wardrobe, every lady of the court immediately followed suit; and although they shivered wofully in the chill and slippery linen, yet with touching naïveté they wore their gowns open from waist to hem, and their sleeves flowing, in order that they might demonstrate to all the world that they were truly of the very elect.

The home of Fashion, the Mecca for its devotees, has shifted during the centuries, with the esthetic ascendency of various races, from one gay capital to another. At different times, its laws, equally with those of earth's great conquerors, have been sounded forth from Memphis, and Babylon, and Carthage, and Athens, and Rome, and Byzantium, and Alexandria, and Madrid, and Venice. In our own era, until recently, "Made in Paris" was the hall-mark of good taste, and it must be confessed that to a great extent the old preference still obtains. Of late years, however, there has been a growing tendency in both English and American society to cast off the thraldom of French dictation and establish a school of essentially domestic ideals.

How far afield we have wandered from these erstwhile omnipotent mandates, is aptly shown in the portraits of the three great ladies of Paris herewith presented. Mark the differences in style between Photograph by Lafayette.

MARCHIONESS OF LONDONDERRY.

Digitized by Google

Photograph by Histed.
MRS. EDWIN GOULD.

them and their English and American compeers.

One notes, too, with surprise that the aim here, as in the toilets of all the best-gowned women of Paris, is toward a greater simplicity of effect, despite the well-known fact that the Paris fashions are largely originated by famous actresses and demimondaines. Some petted favorite of the footlights or famous figure of the half-world will tilt her hat at a certain angle, or devise a new cut of coat, and instantly the fad is taken up by the most irreproachable matron and the severest prude.

Still, the French are not entirely singular in this respect. Stage women of all nations are potent factors in the establishment of modes. The "Langtry bang" was more prevalent in America than the grip, and the "Hading veil" raged with an almost equal virulence. Ada Rehan, Georgia Cayvan, Mrs. "Pat" Campbell, Ellen Terry, Lillian Russell, Maude Adams, Hilda Spong and Edna May have each been more or less responsible for cults which from time to time have made their appearance in May-Fair and along Fifth Avenue.

In England Queen Alexandra is now, and has been ever since her first introduction to British society, lady paramount on all questions of style. There are, however, in the United Kingdom many noblewomen and society queens who exert a powerful, if less extended, influence. Among these, Lady Gordon-Lennox, noted as the best-dressed woman in England, Lady Annesley and Mrs. Keppel are names to conjure with.

In American Society they have no official arbiter of modes, no courts or royalties to determine the disputed issues of fashion. The temporary occupant of the White House, it is true, rejoices in the title of "First Lady of the Land"; but the wives of Presidents have been for the most part such quiet, stay-at-home bodies, interested more in the political careers of their husbands than in laces and chiffons, that no one would seriously think of following their lead, even should they attempt to head the procession. In questions of social precedence at the capital they have often prescribed the law within certain limits and their favor has been much sought, but there is no instance of a President's wife having become a dictator of fashions.

Nevertheless, there is in America, a standard as fixed as that of England or of France, and to which every woman heedful

Photograph by Histed.
HON. MRS. GEORGE KEPPEL.

Digitized by Google

COUNTESS OF ANNESLEY.

of appearances unhesitatingly subscribes. In fact, there is no more rigid stickler for what she considers good form than this same American woman.

See how they wear their hair in the style first set by La Pompadour, because Fashion has decreed that such shall be the reigning mode. An English writer, in noting this uniformity of head-apparel among American women, has recently said, "The American woman has practically made the pompadour an article of national faith"; and it seems hardly an exaggerated statement, when one considers that nearly every woman from Maine to California, no matter what her age, color or previous condition of servitude, wears her hair rolled back from her brow without even a suspicion of the frivolous curls so dear to the heart of her cousin across the seas.

Who, then, regulates these all-important questions for the sisterhood of America? What is the tribunal of final jurisdiction in our land? Who first bestows the cachet of approval on a fabric, a color or a mode which all the world thereupon hastens to accept and adopt as its own?

There are in each of the large cities one or more women recognized as social leaders, whose fiat on questions of etiquette and precedence is all-supreme; but it is to a little coterie in the metropolis, whose wealth, position, beauty and taste render them independent of cavil or criticism, that we look for guidance in the matters of fashion.

As much at home on one side of the Atlantic as on the other, these women are entirely free from the diffidence of provincialism; and, gifted with unerring discrimination, they invariably select what best accords with their own preferences, serenely regardless of how the rest of the world may look upon the innovation. As a matter of fact, the rest of the world usually tumbles over itself in its haste to follow in their footsteps.

These are the women who form the oligarchy of fashion in America, the supreme council before whose bar the conceptions of tailor and milliner and bootmaker must stand, to be either adjudged worthy or ruthlessly condemned and cast into outer darkness. These are they who settle for the other millions

LADY ALGERNON GORDON-LENNOX.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Photograph by Histed.

MRS. JOSEPH WIDENER.

the questions of fashions. There may be other authorities; but it is the example of the smartest group in the metropolis which stamps the prevailing tone of good society throughout any country.

As has been said before, these women or their dressmakers create fashions with the sole purpose of suiting the individual. Why then should the well-dressed woman not hit upon a style with which she is so well pleased that change would be undesirable? Whether or not there is a logical reason, it is a fact that the desire for novelty of style and a reputation for "smartness" is forever driving women on, step by step, in fashion's train, and those who can anticipate a style or originate it are at once the center of attention.

We say they originate the fashions; yet, after all, do they? Is it not rather that they decide what fashions of a bygone day shall be revived? For modes, like periodic diseases or cataclysms of nature, recur in cycles. Years may elapse, but the vogue which once was seems sure to return again. The high ruff of Queen Elizabeth has time after time been resurrected and laid away again, and since her day the more pronounced styles of the court circle, as depicted by the most famous painters of the period, have been subject to waves of sudden popularity. It is only a year or two ago that we went back to 1830, and none may predict what is likely to be our next requisition upon the past.

Men can never understand the place which fashions hold in the feminine heart. With them it is almost a code of honor to sneer at the mode.

Portrait by Hall.

MME. DE MAVIÉ.

Digitized by Google

and to deride the haste with which each new fad is adopted, only to be as speedily discarded when the next one makes its appearance. Yet, in its final analysis, is not this lightning-change habit simply one manifestation of the great art of pleasing?

For masculine taste has never been characterized by stability. It has a tendency to butterfly flutterings from flower to flower; and has an unconcealed longing for condiments, demanding to be piqued and tantalized. Its insistent demand is for novelty, always novelty. And therefore woman, complaisant woman, attempts to charm her lord's fancy by keeping herself before his eyes in such a kaleidoscopic whirl of new presentments that he shall be perpetually beguiled into the belief that he has found all women in one.

Portrait by Hall. Copyright, 1902, by Davis & Sanford.

MRS. ALFRED VANDERBILT.

ET EGO IN ARCADIA.

By Aldis Dunbar.

Swept onward through the somber pines
The night-wind, whispering: "Dreams are free
At moon-dawn. Hush all thoughts to rest
And careless-hearted pass with me
The moonlight path that leads across
The sleeping hills—to Arcady."

Beneath the waving, sun-warm leaves I lay,
A dreamer, on a hillside clad with vines,
Each vine ablossom. Sure, the breeze at play
Caught fragrance rarer than celestial wines.
Idle, I watched the silent sungleam pass
A marble pillar, fallen in the grass.

Soft! was it music? Then a footstep near?
A staff thrown down? A low bough bent aside
By stalwart arm? A sound of piping clear?
A shaggy head—not grim, but kindly-eyed?
Ay, in the noon hush, to the shadows deep
Came mighty Pan, and laid him down to sleep.

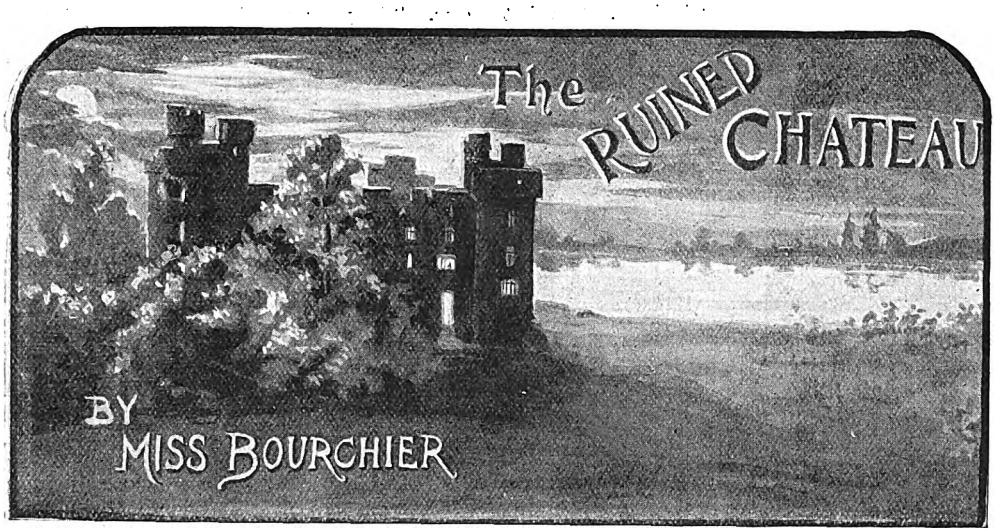
Then up the hill slope clambered—half afraid,
Half daring, hiding where tall grasses grew—
His train: a chubby, witching little maid,
With wondering laughter in her eyes of blue;
A tiny faun, with wayward feet adance,
Wee pointed ears, quaint mischief in his glance.

A flowery tendril crowned each baby head;
Her dimpled fingers holding his—more brown—
As trustingly she followed where he led,
And by the broken column nestled down.
Gleeful, yet timid still, she saw him grasp
The mute pipes, fallen from the wood-god's clasp.

Screened by the vines, cheek pressed to roseleaf cheek,
They tried to stir the music hidden there;
Laughing to find each effort all too weak,
Yet striving on, a merry, breathless pair.
At last one tremulous note the syrinx sighed,
And o'er the hills the tender echo died.

A sudden stir! Their prize unheeded fell.
They clung in mingled terror and delight
To shaggy Pan—— I heard a far-off bell:
The swaying of the pines—and—it was night.
But through each dream, with rippling laughter ran
The baby faun who stole the pipes of Pan

Digitized by Google



CHAPTER I.

AT DEAD OF NIGHT.

"HUSH! What was that?" he whispered.

"I heard nothing," she whispered back.

"It sounded like someone moving out there in the shrubbery," he said.

"There can't be anyone there, dear, at this time of night," she answered.

"I have a very uncomfortable presentiment this evening, as if something disagreeable was going to happen," he went on. "I hardly like to go away and leave you alone here, darling."

Eileen laughed softly. "My dear boy," she said, "what on earth should happen to me here in my father's house? There is nothing more disagreeable before us than the very real trouble of having to say good-bye to each other till to-morrow. I really think, Bernard dear, you should go now; my father would be quite annoyed if he found you here so late."

"Well, I am coming up to-morrow morning to speak to him, and when we are properly engaged, no one can find anything to say, however late I am here."

"I told him to-day that you were coming up to speak to him in the morning," she said, "but he only listened in that absent way of his, as if his thoughts were miles away, and said nothing."

"He cannot refuse his consent, then, anyhow," said Bernard. "He must have seen for weeks what I have been coming to the house for, and he has never made any attempt to show disapproval."

"He never sees anything," said Eileen, sadly. "When he comes out of his laboratory he always seems to have left his eyes and ears in there behind him. I daresay he will be immensely surprised to-morrow, when you ask him for his daughter's hand. We really must say good-bye now, dear."

He drew her out into the moonlight to take a last tender farewell look, that should last him until the morrow, for fear, perhaps, that he should forget the "blue-black Irish hair and Irish eyes" of his beloved lady, the cream and roses of her smooth, soft skin, or the incomparable curves of her tall and supple figure. She wore a black lace dinner dress, covered with showers of jet, that shone and twinkled in the moonlight like fairy dew-drops; on one shoulder there was a great splash of orange, and on one side, from the waist downwards, where the lace and fairy dew-drops fell aside, they showed a broad panel of the same glowing warmth. Her full round throat and shoulders rose milk-white from the dusky background, and her long loose sleeve fell back, as she stole one milk-white arm about his neck.

"My beautiful white Queen!" he said, raising her hand to his lips with reverent homage. A few moments later he turned the corner of the house, walking towards the avenue that led down to the front gate. Before she turned to go within, a shadow came out of the deeper shadows beyond the lawn, and crossed the moonlight towards her.

"Who is there?" she cried, hastening to retreat into the darkness of the room behind.

Digitized by Google

The shadow came on across the lawn. "Is that you, Eileen?" it said.

"Oh, father! how you startled me!" she answered.

"Come out here a moment, my dear," he said; "I have something to say to you."

She went out and joined him, hanging on his arm with all the affectionate demonstrativeness of her race. "What is it, father dear?" she asked.

"Has the young lover gone?" said he.

"Oh, yes, dear," she answered.

"He is not lurking there in the darkness in your own particular den, is he?"

Sir Denis O'Hara was strangely wide awake and alert this evening, his daughter thought: but she answered him gaily, "No, no! He is quite gone. He must be back at home by this."

"Well, then, I have something to say to you, my dear Eilie. Important affairs, concerning others as well as myself oblige me to cross over to France to-night."

"To-night, father?"

"It is rather a short notice, I know. But there is no time to delay. It is most important that I should go at once."

"SEND NORAH HERE," SAID SIR DENIS TO THE MAN-SERVANT.

Eileen considered for a moment, stroking her father's arm gently with her delicate hand, as they strolled backwards and forwards across the moonlit lawn. "You remember dear," she began shyly, "I told you about Bernard Vereker to-day. He meant to come and see you to-morrow, about our being engaged, you know. You will not mind his coming here while you are away, will you? We can be engaged, can't we?"

"My dear girl, anyone who likes is welcome to come here when we are away," her father answered. "All the more that I have given up the place, and am not likely to come back here. No. I fancy it is good-bye to England for some time to come."

The words smote with cruel surprise on Eile 's ears. "Do you mean that I am to go with you?" she asked in great consternation.

"What else? I may not be a very attentive father in a general way, Eilie, I confess; but I am not quite such an unnatural parent as to run off and leave my only child behind me."

"But, father, I do not understand! I could not possibly be ready to go with you to-night. Why, it is past ten o'clock now. And to France! You cannot mean that?"

"That is exactly what I do mean. We leave here, you and I, in three hours' time. You needn't trouble about your things; they will be brought on after us. But even if you had to come as you are, without even a hat or a wrap, we should have to go to-night."

"What has happened?" she whispered, trembling. This looked very like flight.

"Nothing has happened, child. I am not flying from justice, if that is what you think. But, as I told you just now, urgent affairs, in which others are interested as well as myself, call me to France at once."

"Where are we going?" she asked. "I must send a message to Bernard at once."

Sir Denis stood still, and raised his hand impressively. "You must not do that my dear," he said. "I am very sorry to interfere in this affair of yours, very sorry indeed. But it must be laid aside for the present. Why, we should have him rushing round here directly, and upsetting everything. No, no. We will see all about that later on. Meanwhile you had better go in and pack up the things you will require for the next few days. But mind, no messages or letters are to be left or sent to Mr. Vereker."

She clasped her hands imploringly, and there were tears in her voice. "Oh, father!" she said, "don't ask me that! He will come here to-morrow, and it will be dreadful for him to find me gone and no word of why or where we have gone. I cannot do it. Let me send him a line, just one word to say I cannot help going, but I will not forget him."

Digitized by Google

"No, my dear; I cannot allow it," her father answered irritably. "Now, be a good girl, and just go and do as I tell you."

"Oh, father dear!" she began, but he interrupted her. "Now, Eileen, I really have no time for any more nonsense," he said. "I cannot listen to any more of this. Nothing you can say would alter my determination in this matter. Now run away and get ready. And promise me first that you will not write to this young lover of yours."

"I cannot promise that, father," she said.

He pressed her hand more tightly to his side, as if to prevent her breaking away from him; and drawing out a whistle with his free hand, blew a shrill blast upon it. A servant came running round the corner of the house, as if he had been waiting for this summons.

"Send Norah here," said Sir Denis. Norah was Eileen's nurse, who had been promoted to be her maid when that young lady left the nursery.

Eileen choked back her sobs, and stood quietly by her father with a certain stately dignity that well became her noble form. The maid came running out, with a glance of anxious pity at her young mistress.

"Bring a cloak and hat for Miss Eileen," said Sir Denis, speaking with more prompt decision than was at all usual with him. "We are going down to the boat at once, as Miss Eileen wishes to go on board now, before it gets later. You can put up her things and bring them after us in an hour or two. Miss Eileen will not wait now to pack anything herself." The maid avoided looking again at her mistress before she went back into the house.

"You are very, very cruel!" Eileen whispered, when they were alone again. The beautiful colour had quite faded out of her cheeks; she looked white and wan in the moonlight. "I can't help it, my dear child; indeed, I can't. No one must know of our going to-night. And, after all, it is better for you that you should be able to tell the young man some day that you were taken away against your will. He can't blame you then, anyway."

At this plausible and very Irish statement, a gleam of humour shone between Eileen's long dark lashes, and seemed to dry up the tear-drops that glistened on them. She lifted her face impulsively to her father, and he, stooping, kissed her warmly and frankly on the mouth.

Nevertheless, as she walked down to the bank of the river on her father's arm, with her long dark cloak covering her shining dress, and the dark plumes of her wide hat concealing her face, she never ceased to cudgel her brains for some means of warning Bernard, when he should come in the morning, of the way they had taken. The result of her cogitations was that, after she had passed through the shrubbery that bordered the lawn, a splash of orange flowered on one of the last bushes, close by the bank of the river—a strange blossom that had not been there a little earlier in the evening.

"Now, if Bernard has only sense enough to remember what I wore this evening," she thought, "he will be able to see that we have gone by way of the river, and can perhaps follow us. But men don't seem so clever about women's clothes, somehow."

Her father put her in the boat, with one of the women-servants in attendance. "I will join you presently, my dear," he said; and went back to the house. He did not see the orange-splash on the holly-bush, and would certainly not have understood it if he had; fathers being even less clever about women's clothes than other people.

The boatman rowed Eileen down the river in the cool moonlight. It was not very far to the mouth, where it flowed away into the sea. She sat silent in her place, her heart bursting with grief and anxiety: grief at leaving Bernard, perhaps for ever, without even a word of farewell; anxiety as to what all this mystery and this sudden flight by night might portend. She had never paid very much attention to her father's strange ways and hermit-like habits, accepting them without comment, as young people do accept any surroundings to which they have been always accustomed. She and her father had lived for many years in the old English manor-house by the river; and in all that time she always remembered her father passing his days and often his nights, in his laboratory at the top of the house, locked in with his German assistant. From time to time he had gone away for short periods; no one seemed to know whither or on what errands. The assistants had been changed sometimes during those years, but to Eileen's eyes they had all been equally ugly and dirty and generally detestable, whether they called themselves Gottlieb, or Wilhelm, or Franz.

There was another boat waiting down there by the boat-house at the end of the garden; and, after Eileen's departure, Sir Denis and his sallow-faced long-haired German carried down various small cases and bags and stowed them in the boat, making many journeys backwards and forwards to the laboratory for this purpose. Up in the laboratory there was much burning and destroying of property, at which Franz looked on with much surly regret. "It is a great pity," he said once, in German. "Why not bury some of it in the garden?'

"We shall never come back here, my friend," Sir Denis answered in the same language. "It is much safer to leave no trace. Gardens are never very secure places for that which one wishes to keep hidden; but that which does not exist is difficult to find."

Digitized by Google

A couple of hours after Eileen's departure they made their last journey, and finally embarked themselves, with Norah, in the waiting boat, and followed down the river to the sea, where a dirty little fishing smack, manned by French sailors, awaited them.

CHAPTER II.

THE MYSTERIOUS CHATEAU.

To a vast, half-ruinous chateau on a desolate, lonely Breton coast, Sir Denis O'Hara brought his daughter. There was no other habitation nearer than a wretched little fishing village, five miles away upon the coast. It was a bleak and rock-bound shore, where the great Atlantic rollers roared and thundered with a ceaseless surging boom; a land that, in its majesty and its solemn loneliness, brought home to the hearts of its dwellers the eternal majesty of its Creator, where, indeed, it seemed always that the Spirit of God brooded upon the waters.

Sir Denis and his party landed by torchlight, late at night, in a little cove. None of them was sorry to leave the evil-smelling fishing-boat that had brought them across from England. They walked up a steep rocky pathway to the Chateau, which almost overhung the sea, and so through a little narrow door and up a winding stone staircase to the great hall. They were evidently expected, although neither host nor servants were visible, for great fires blazed in the hall, and at one end of the long table that ran down its length a rough but plentiful meal was spread. A couple of branched candlesticks with lighted candles stood on the table, and seemed to throw into greater relief the mysterious shadows that lurked about the distant corners and under the roof. Though it was a summer evening and the fires at each end blazed generously, the air of the hall struck chill, as though memories of long, northern winters lingered there. Eileen shivered with something more than cold as she stepped across the threshold of that stern and gloomy hall.

"Well, this looks bright and pleasant," said Sir Denis, cheerily, as he hastened up to the cheerful, lighted end of the room. "Come to supper, Eilie."—Eileen sank into a chair. "Bright and pleasant! Oh, father!" she said, and broke into hysterical weeping.

"Good gracious, child! What is the matter now?" he cried. "Here Norah, put a chair by the fire for Miss Eileen, and get her some hot soup or something. Why, Eilie, I thought you would be quite pleased to get out of that smelly boat into a decent house again."

"I beg your pardon, father," she answered, falteringly. "I suppose I am cold and tired, but this seems such a gloomy, terrible place."

"Not a bit of it, my dear," he answered. "You will soon get used to it." And then Eileen knew that this sinister abode was to be her home.

In the morning she started to explore the Chateau, which looked hardly less forbidding by daylight than it had done in the darkness of the night before. On the inland side, where the real entrance was situated, stretched a dense forest, dark and sombre where a shadowy twilight brooded even at noo day. A great part of the Chateau was in a ruinous condition; in one wing, indeed, the roof had fallen in, and great windows stared blankly, like eye-sockets from which the eyes have withered away. There were narrow stone staircases running up to the turret chambers; there were long, many-roomed galleries, full of ghostly whisperings, of creaking floors and weird echoes; there gusts of wind blew suddenly, and doors banged, or swung silently open on their ancient hinges, as Eileen passed; there was one staircase she came upon unexpectedly that seemed to wind down like a corkscrew into the very bowels of the rock on which the Chateau was built, but down that staircase Eileen did not venture. In the course of her ramblings she came upon a second great hall, built apparently on a higher plateau of the same rock as the rest of the Chateau, as there was a short flight of rough steps cut in the living rock itself that led up to it. The door stood ajar, and through it she could hear the thundering of the surf that broke and tossed at the foot of the cliff; she heard a low murmur of voices, too, and, pushing the door, she would have entered, but at the threshold the German Franz met her.

In her surprise she hardly saved herself from falling backwards down the steep flight of steps. "I suppose that is going to be the laboratory," she thought; and with that thought of her father and the ugly German toiling at their secret labour up there, within sound of the roaring of the sea, in the dead hours of the night, perhaps, a great horror seized her. It was not very easy to find her way from that remote corner of the Chateau, through the rambling corridors and up and down the bewildering staircases, but at last she came out to the great entrance-door, that stood open. A broad flight of shallow steps led down to the gravel drive, much overgrown with weeds, that wandered down into the darkness of the forest.

"Does anyone ever come up that drive," Eileen thought, noting idly that there were deep wheel-marks in the neglected gravel. Later, when she went in to the mid-day meal, she had her answer.

Standing by the fire talking to her father was a stranger. A curious contrast they made standing thus together—Sir Denis with his venerable white beard and straight high features, with the slight stoop in his shoulders and the vague far-away look in his grey eyes that told of the scholar and the dreamer; the stranger, in the prime of life, erect, alert, with smooth shaven face, and pale brown hair, and the piercing deep-set pale blue eyes of the Russian from Little Russia.

Digitized by Google

"This is my daughter," said Sir Denis. "My dear, let me present to you my friend, M. Galovitchoff, who is kind enough to come here and enliven our solicitude."

"I am very glad to see you," said Eileen with ready Irish hospitality, "though I am afraid we shall not be able to make your visit as pleasant as we should like to do." The stranger only bowed, and it seemed to Eileen that he looked at her with keen, unfriendly eyes.

"M. Galovitchoff is a scientific man, Eileen,' said Sir Denis. "We shall have work to do in my laboratory together, and when people have plenty of work they are not dull."

The stranger said something in Russian, which, being interpreted, meant, "Are you wise to have a woman here at this juncture?"

But Sir Denis was too courteous to notice or answer this speech before his daughter, who did not understand Russian.

"Does not M. Galovitchoff speak English?" she asked.

"Certainly, certainly. Monsieur is an accomplished linguist, like all his countrymen," said Sir Denis, with a courteous bow to the foreigner.

Said Eileen to herself, with a mutinous smile:

"'I do not like you, Dr. Fell;
The reason why I cannot tell;
I do not like you, Dr. Fell.'"

Then, she said sweetly to the guest, "I am sorry I do not understand your language, monsieur."

"Mademoiselle, pray do not let that trouble you," said Monsieur, speaking English without any foreign accent, as Russians do. "I hope we shall have many pleasant conversations in your own language." His voice was thin and weak and rather high, and, coming from so tall and fine a man, gave a curious and disagreeable impression of falsehood and untrustworthiness. A moment before Eileen had not known why she disliked this man; now she told herself it was on account of his voice. In the days that followed she saw very little of him or her father. They were eternally shut up together.

Eileen tried only once to write to Bernard. She put her letter into the post bag that one of the Breton under-servants took every day somewhere out into the world beyond the forest; but her father came to her, after the man was gone, with the letter in his hand.

"Here is your letter, Eileen," he said giving it to her. "I am sorry, my dear, that it cannot go now. You must try to be patient a little longer. I will let you know directly you may write. Just now it is not convenient. We don't want to have him rushing down here upon us."

"Is that Monsieur's advice?" she asked, impulsively.

Sir Denis coloured a little. "It is better so, my dear," he said evasively. But Eileen knew that of his own accord he would not have thought of looking into the post-bag, still less of taking any letter out of it.

In those days nothing but the buoyancy of her Irish temperament saved her from sinking into a profound melancholy. She was entirely without companions; and the gloom and mystery of the Chateau seemed to haunt her. She could only escape from it by going down into the forest. There she spent much of her time, learning to observe the ways and habits of the wild shy creatures that peopled its eternal twilight. She never ventured out of sight of the neglected and overgrown gravel road that wound through it.

She wandered there one day, singing to herself under the trees a hymn that seemed to suit the solemn aisles of that vast cathedral:

"Holy, holy, holy! Lord God Almighty!
All Thy works shall praise Thy name, in earth and sky and sea:
Holy, holy, holy! Merciful and Mighty!
God in Three Persons! Blessed Trinity!"

As her hymn ended, shrilling sweetly through the solemn aisles of the forest, she became suddenly aware of some one running swiftly through the green shadows towards her.

CHAPTER III.

IN THE FOREST.

Eileen stood for a moment, ready to faint with terror; then, with a glad cry, she ran forward to meet the new-comer. "Oh, Bernard! Can it be really you?" she cried. "How did you find me here?"

Bernard caught her to him. "My darling!" he said breathlessly. "At last I have found you. I heard your dear voice singing. There is no voice in all the world like my Eileen's."

Then they sat down together on a fallen tree-trunk, in one of the aisles of the great green cathedral, and stared at each other speechlessly. They had so many questions to ask each other that they did not know where to begin. They kissed each other again and again with a lingering fondness born of their long separation.

"You have thought of me and loved me all the time?" he asked anxiously. There were many other questions he must ask presently, but this was one of the most vital and immediate importance.

Digitized by Google

"Can you doubt it, darling!" she said. "I have thought of nothing else since that evening when we said good-bye. I have been heart-broken at the separation, and at not being able to let you know where I had gone. And you, Bernard,—do you love me as much as ever, in spite of this separation?"

"My dearest heart, I love you better than ever, if that is possible," he answered fervently. "But tell me, Eileen, what is the meaning of your sudden and mysterious flitting from the manor-house? I can assure, you, darling, when I went there the next morning and found the place deserted, not a creature there, and all the doors and windows open, I felt as if I must just go and hang myself on the nearest tree." She leaned closer against him. "Oh, Bernard, dearest!" she said.

"It was only the thought that you must have been carried off against your will, and that you might need my protection, that made me hesitate."

"Go on," she said. "How did you know where to look for me?"

"I hunted the whole place over for some sign, and at last, down by the water's edge, I came upon this." He drew a dirty and disreputable-looking bunch of orange silk from his pocket and showed it to her. "I took that for a sign that you must have gone away from there in a boat."

GOD BLESS YOU, DEAR, AND TAKE CARE OF YOU TILL TO-MORROW"

"I thought you would understand," said Eileen.

"It was very clever of you to think of leaving it there," he said.

"And you were a clever old darling to find it," said she.

"I went down the river as soon as I saw that," he went on, "and the coastguard told me that a French fishing-boat had put out to sea the evening before. Ever since then,—these last two months,—I have been hunting for you all along the coast, landing in very little creek, making enquiries at every little fishing village. Yesterday I landed at that little village over there, and they told me that there were some foreign people living in this old Chateau who had come here many weeks ago,—they could not tell how many. And now, dearest, what does it all mean?"

"I know no more than you do, Bernard," she answered. "After you were gone that evening, my father came and said that we were to leave the house at once. He would not let me send to you, or even leave a note for you. He brought me straight away here, and we have been here ever since; and I have not been allowed to write to you even. I don't know what his reason can have been. At first I was afraid he must be flying from the police, but that was a silly idea, of course. I think he just fancied that this place was more convenient for his work than the manor. He spends all his time in his laboratory, as he always did. And, oh, Bernard! he has such a horrid friend working with him, — a Russian. He and my father and Franz are always hidden away up there in the laboratory, and they don't allow anyone else to go in. I think they must be making some wonderful discovery, and they are afraid of anyone else finding it out before they do. But I am really rather afraid of that Russian—the Count Galvitchoff my father calls him."

"He doesn't annoy you, I hope," said Bernard jealously. "Is he old or young?"

"Oh, about forty I should think, or more. We shall have to be very careful, Bernard, that he doesn't find out you are here. My father was so anxious that you should not follow us; and though, of course, dear old dad wouldn't hurt a fly, I do not trust the Count. It all seems so secret and so uncomfortable that sometimes I feel quite frightened. I am so thankful you have come. But you will be very careful, dearest, won't you? We don't know what the Count might do if he found out you were here."

Digitized by Google

Bernard laughed. "He doesn't make love to you, Eileen, does he?" he asked.

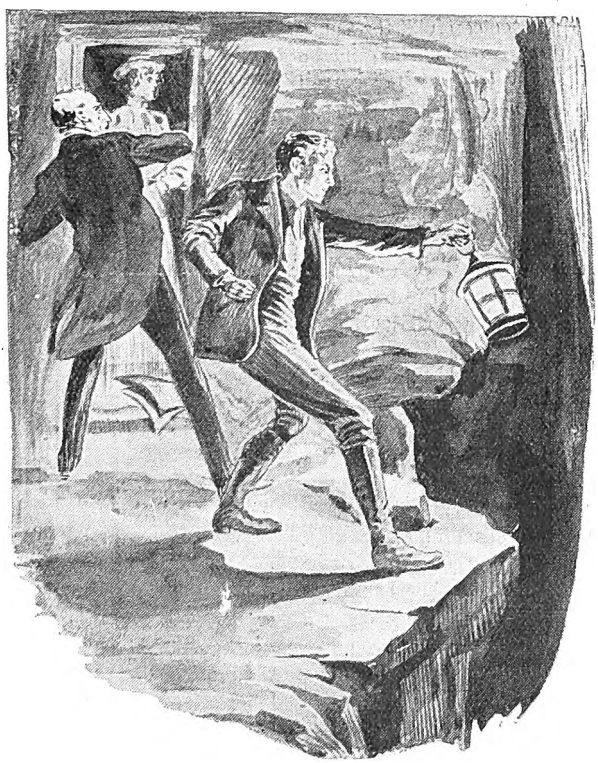
"Oh, dear no!" she said. "I think he was quite annoyed, that first evening he came, to find that dad had brought me with him. He would rather have had the whole place to himself, I am sure. He never takes any notice of me, except to scowl at me sometimes. They very seldom come into my part of the Chateau. It is such a curious old place, Bernard; I should like to show it to you; but I'm afraid we mustn't risk it."

"You can come here as often as you like, I suppose," said Bernard.

"Oh, yes! I can spend the whole day here, if I like; I very often do," she answered.

"Then I shall be able to see you every day. I left my yacht at that fishing village. I suppose I had better send it away so that they may not hear of it and suspect anything. And by-and-bye, my sweet, we will sail away in it together."

"No no! I cannot do that," she said, shrinking away from him. "I could never run away and leave my dear old dad, who has been always most affectionate, indulgent, and good to me."



HIS SHRILL SCREAM AS HE SPRANG BACK UNNERVED THEM.

"Well, there is no particular hurry," said he, soothing her. "Of course, we shall do exactly as you like. You will come out here to-morrow morning, won't you?"

"Yes, of course. But where are you going to sleep to-night? There are no houses about here, and I am afraid you ought not to stay at that fishing village. It is only five miles from here, you know and some of the servants might tell Franz that there was a foreigner staying there."

"There must surely be some place where you can hide me in the chateau," he said, "if it is such large place, and so old, as you say."

"I don't know; I am half afraid," she said doubtfully; "and yet we must find some place. There are such dreadful storms here sometimes—thunder and lightning, and frightful gales; you could not stay out of doors in them." The shadows had been growing deeper and deeper; it was almost as dark as night in the sombre forest.

"I must be getting back to see about the yacht, I suppose," he said reluctantly. "We must settle exactly where we are to meet to-morrow. Is this the path that leads up to the Chateau?"

"Yes, this goes straight up to the great entrance. I will come down here to-morrow morning. What time do you think you will be here?" she asked. "I shall be here by nine o'clock, and then we can have a good long day to settle our plans. Look here, Eileen, I shall climb up into that big horse-chestnut; you can't mistake it; it is the only one there. And when you come out, if you are alone and the coast is clear, you just come singing down the path, and I will climb down and meet you. I wish I could see you again this evening, but I must get back to arrange about the yacht. It would never do for them to get hold of that, would it? Good-bye, dear love. Tell me again that you are glad to see me here."

"I was never so glad of anything in my whole life as I was when I saw you running down that path," Eileen answered with conviction.

"God bless you, dear, and take care of you till to-morrow."

He strolled down with her almost to the border of the forest, where he could peep behind the trees and see the dark, forbidding pile of the grim and ancient Chateau. There they parted tenderly, and he went back towards the fishing village, guiding himself by his compass, and whistling cheerfully as he strode along. He kept to the fringe of the forest as long as he was likely to be visible from the Chateau; but he did not venture into its depths in the darkness, and presently he left it altogether and followed the cliffs along the shore.

Digitized by Google

Eileen went back to the house, a song of thankfulness in her grateful heart to the God who had guided her lover safely to her in this strange and desolate land.

Her father and Count Galovitchoff were waiting for her, in the great hall where dinner was served, when Eileen went in. They seemed to be arguing rather loudly together; she heard their voices as she came along the corridor.

"I tell you we cannot be too careful," the Count was saying. "It was the greatest mistake in the world to bring the girl here with you. Lovers will come after a girl like that.—like wasps round a honey-pot. You would do much better to send her away from you,—for a time, at any rate."

"I think you take the man's gossip too seriously," Sir Denis said impatiently.

"I don't believe it is gossip," the other began violently, when Eileen appeared at the door, and the argument was dropped at once. But the Count looked at her with the dark and evil look that always made her tremble.

"I am afraid I have kept you waiting," she said, gently, "but you so seldom come to any meal that I am getting into unpunctual ways."

"Yes, yes, my dear. It is our own fault," Sir Denis hastened to say. "Not that you are really unpunctual; I fancy we are rather early."

"And how have you been spending this lovely day, Miss O'Hara?" the Count asked. He tried to make his voice pleasantly friendly, but his small pale eyes were hostile.

"There is going to be a storm, I think," said Sir Denis; "it looks very black over towards the north."

"A storm! Oh, dear, I hope not!" said Eileen, imprudently.

The Count laid down the spoon, full of soup, that he was raising to his lips. "Why do you hope not?" he asked, with a ring of menace in his thin falsetto voice.

"My daughter, like most ladies, dislikes thunderstorms," Sir Denis said shortly. He never allowed his strange guest to annoy Eileen when he was aware of it, but then, unfortunately, as his daughter said, he very seldom was aware of what was passing before him.

The black clouds that had gathered in the northern sky came up over the Chateau that night and burst above it in lightning, thunder, and torrents of rain. The Chateau rocked with the deep reverberations of the storm. And Eileen, wakeful in her turret chamber, went often to the window to look out over the desolate stormy sky and the wind-tormented trees of the forest, wondering whether Bernard could have had time to reach the village before the storm broke.

CHAPTER IV

AN UNDERGROUND CHASE.

The rain was still pouring in torrents when Eileen came down to breakfast next morning. She was very much surprised to find the Count waiting for her in the dining-room. He and his host invariably had breakfast taken up to them in the laboratory, or prepared for them there, generally, as Eileen believed, at some unearthly hour before ordinary mortals were out of their beds.

"You are surprised to see me," he said, bowing to her. Very early in their acquaintanceship Eileen had discouraged his shaking hands with her, for his sudden unnatural grasp had impressed her very disagreeably. "I am very glad to have a companion," she said pleasantly; "I have so much of my own undiluted company. Is my father coming to breakfast?"

"I have persuaded Sir Denis to have his breakfast in bed," M. Galovitchoff answered. "We were working very late last night."

Eileen was alarmed at once. "He must be ill!" she said, rising hastily from her seat. "I must go to him at once. Please excuse me."

He had stood up too. "I can assure you there is nothing whatever the matter with him," he said, impatiently. "He has only gone to lie down in his room at once, instead of waiting till after he had had his breakfast. Good heavens! Miss O'Hara, don't look at me as if you thought I had murdered Sir Denis and hidden his body under the flooring. Ah, here he is! I am glad you have come down, O'Hara. Here is Miss O'Hara suspecting me of all kinds of crimes and violence. Perhaps you will explain to her that I have not been attempting to murder you."

Eileen said nothing. She had betrayed herself, incautiously, but her dislike of the man was so great that she could not bring herself to make him any apology. Sir Denis looked at them both vaguely in his unseeing way, and began his breakfast.

"What do you say to exploring the Chateau this morning?" the Count said presently, apparently laying aside his irritation. "It is too wet for you to go out; and as we finished our experiment last night, or this morning rather, we may allow ourselves a few hours' relaxation before we begin another."

Eileen looked wistfully out at the pouring rain and leaden sky. She was sure that Bernard would be in the woods in spite of the rain; and, if she had not overheard those words of the Count's yesterday evening, she would have made her escape after breakfast and joined him there, but she felt now that it would not be prudent.

Digitized by Google

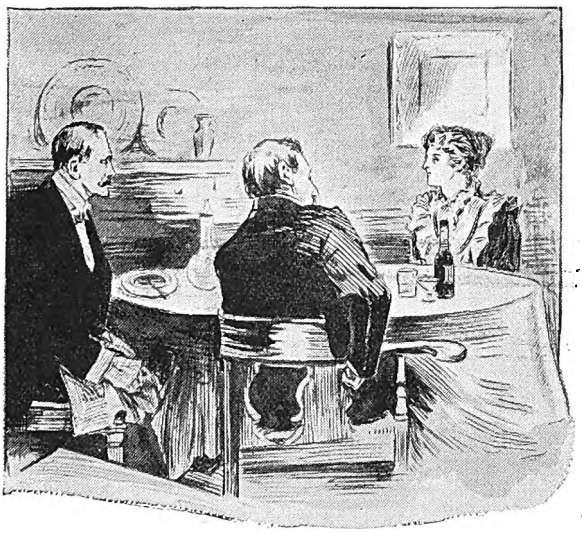
"Certainly; I think it would be very interesting," she said. "Are you coming too, dad?"

"No, thank you, no," said Sir Denis.

"I have tried exploring it once or twice by myself," said Eileen, "but it is such a rambling old place, and there seem to be so many staircases, and some parts are so dark, that I soon gave it up."

"I have a plan of it upstairs," the Russian said. "If you will wait for me a moment, I will go and get it, and we will take a lantern."

Eileen stood at the window while he was gone, wondering what was the meaning of this new departure of his. Was it possible that he knew of Bernard's presence in the country, and suspected that he was hidden somewhere in the Chateau? And was he going to use her to find her lover's hiding-place? She felt very thankful that Bernard had been obliged to return to the village last night. It was dreadful to think of what might have happened if she really had tried to hide him in the Chateau.



THE COUNT, SIR DENIS AND EILEEN AT DINNER.

They began their exploration. The Count carried his plan of the Chateau in his hand, and Franz accompanied them, carrying a lantern. Mons. Galovitchoff was evidently determined that the thing should be done very thoroughly. They came out of the great hall into the long corridor, which Eileen knew well enough. It ran the whole length of the building, from one side to the other; in the middle of its length, at right angles to it, was the broad passage or hall that led to the great entrance; at each end were other long corridors running down the wings, with many doors opening into rooms, in a more or less ruinous condition. The plan of the ground floor, vast as it was, seemed simple enough. Eileen took keen note of everything, thinking her knowledge might be useful later on. She saw that entrance would be easy enough through any of the ruinous, unshuttered windows. The doors at the top of the corridors were locked, but the keys remained in the locks on the inner side. They found several staircases leading down into the underground cellars and old dungeons, and one that brought them out, suddenly and unexpectedly, on to the very face of the rock; indeed, Franz, who went first with the lantern, had almost stepped down two or three hundred feet into the sea. His shrill scream as he sprang back from the opening unnerved the two who were following him, and the Count dropped his plan at Eileen's feet. She picked it up and studied it for a moment by the light that came in through that great opening into the void, and in that moment she understood, partly by some quick intuition, that it was not a plan of the Chateau at all. She turned quite sick for a minute when she made this discovery. What motive could that evil-eyed Russian have had in trying to deceive her in such a matter?

"I shall not go any further," said Franz, rudely thrusting the lantern into the Count's hand. "I have seen death enough to-day." He went back up the short passage, and they heard him stumbling up the stairs as he made his way to the upper air.

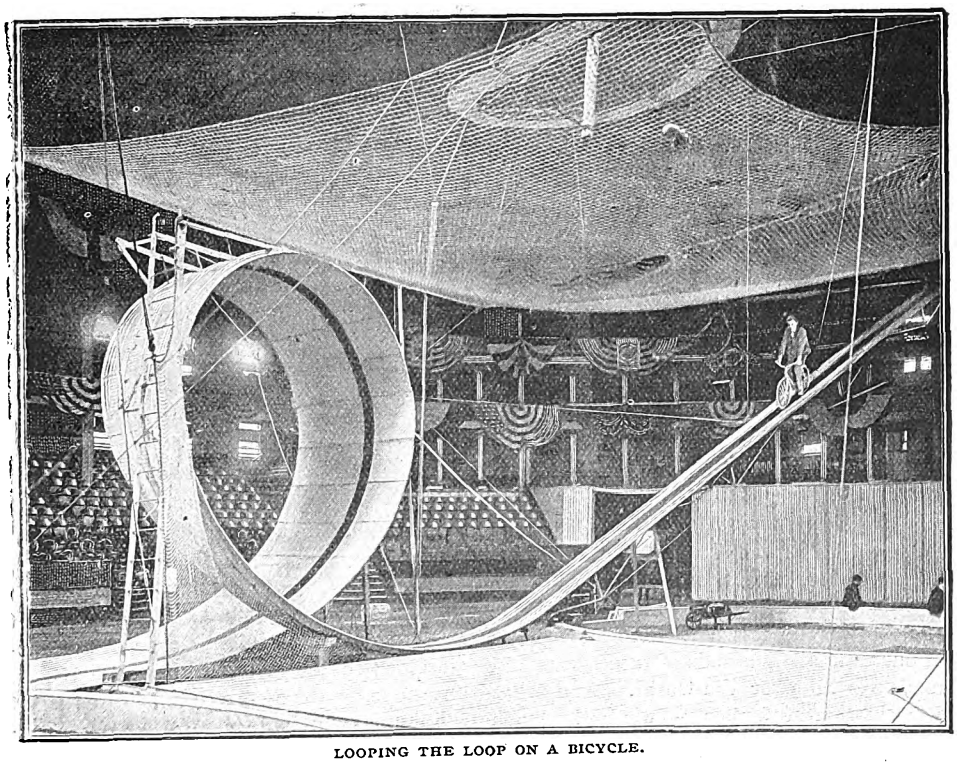
Besides that dangerous opening there was another stairway, leading deep down into the heart of the living rock. The Count, forgetting his map, began to descend it, and Eileen, because she was afraid of being left alone, followed him. The staircase wound and wound, till they seemed to be going down into the depths of the earth. At last they came out into a perfect network and labyrinth of passages and rooms.

"Dear me, I have forgotten my plan," said the Count, "I don't think we had better go on any further without it. We might lose our way down here. What do you say? Shall we turn back?"

As he spoke, a light shone out at some distance down the nearest passage, and then suddenly disappeared. "I thought so!" cried the Count, and, without a moment's hesitation, darted down the passage. Eileen flew after him, dreading she knew not what. Half-way down the passage he stopped. "I think it went down here," he said.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



LOOPING THE LOOP ON A BICYCLE.

The Fascination of Fast Motion.

By William J. Lampton.

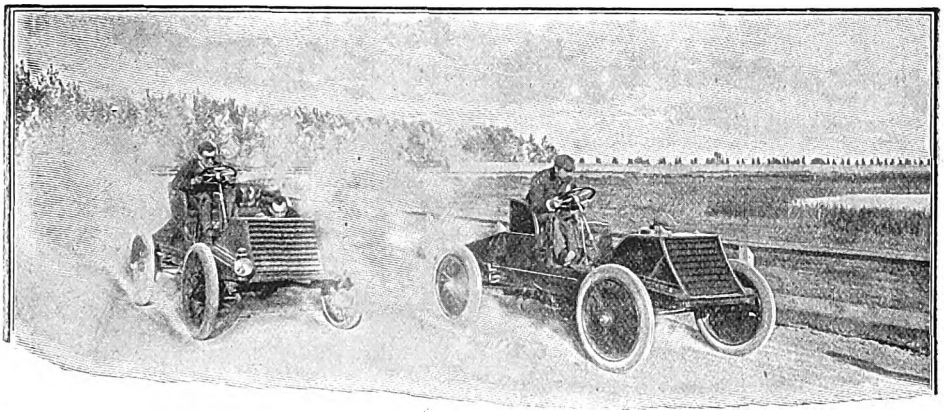
TIME flies. Time was before man was; and when man came, a creature of time, although intended for eternity, he took on the nature of his environment and promptly proceeded to improve it—to get ahead of time, as he expresses it in these later days of his marvelous progress. The fascination which fast motion holds for man may therefore with justice be said to be one of his inherent qualities, for which he should not be held strictly to account; and if at times he exceeds the speed allowance, leniency should be exercised in the judgment of his offending.

This logical and inevitable deduction from a natural premise should not, however, be construed into license to "scorchers," who are prone to run over foot-passengers whose motion is not sufficiently fast to get them beyond the danger-line in time.

With merely a bare mention of the earliest record of speed, namely, that of Lucifer falling from heaven with such rapidity as to produce, by atmospheric friction, a temperature so great that it has not perceptibly cooled to this day (see Orthodox Reports), we plunge at once into the rush of those exponents of speed which at present exert an irresistible fascination over all sorts and conditions of men, women and children.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

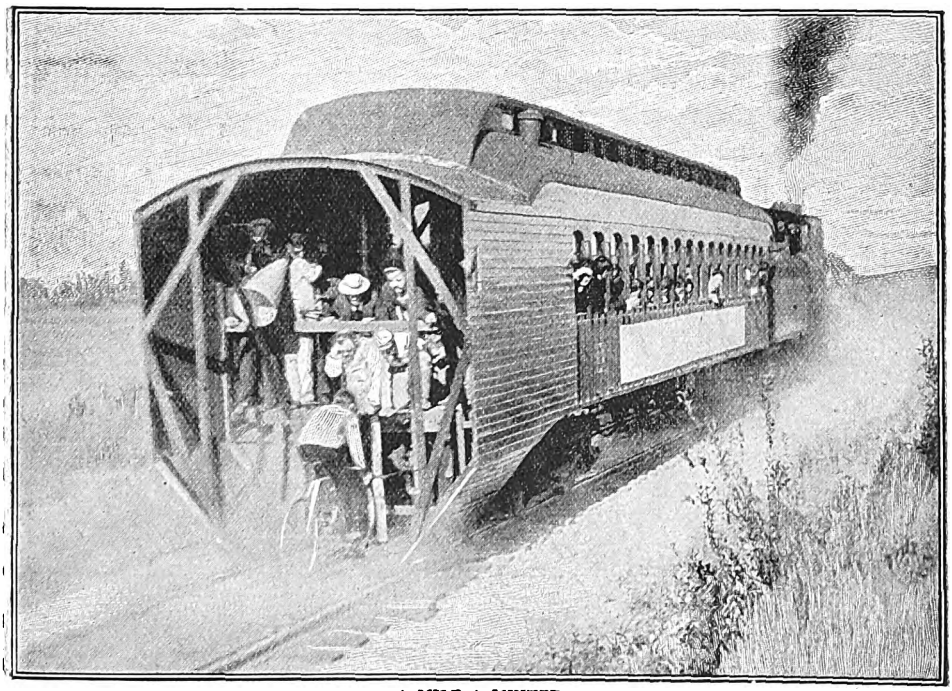


Copyright, 1901, by C. M. Hayes & Co. BREAKING THE WORLD'S RECORD.

the less fascinating, is the drive behind the rapid roadster, when one may feel the physical force of the power that lifts the flying feet and sends the great horse down the way in strides that devour distance and spin the wheels until the whirling spokes actually sing songs of motion through the retarding air.

All horseback-riding is a pleasure, more or less. When the horse is put to the run, it becomes a fascination. To feel the bunch of muscles settling for the forward spring; to feel the rise, the flight, the gathering for the next; to hear the hurrying hoof-beats; to catch the whistling wind, and see the trees along the road blurred into a string of green—all this combines into a fascination that neither time nor accident can quite destroy. But exceeding this is the fascination of the cavalry charge in battle. Poets have sung and painters have painted the spirit of it; and soldiers who have witnessed it and have been part of it unite in describing it as the most impressive of all battle-scenes.

There is an element of danger in all fast



A MILE A MINUTE.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

indistinguishable flash of color, with death on the side always. When he adds to this sudden shooting downward through the air a great loop around the inner circle of which his impetus carries him, head down, contrary to the law of gravitation, a thrill whose fascination is almost mesmeric is given to an audience. As the wheel whizzes down toward the loop, gathering velocity at every revolution, the spectators sit spellbound, and a silence which is painful falls as the loop is reached and the wheel whirls upside down and around the circle. Then out from the other side the rider safely dashes, and is greeted with an outburst of applause as grateful to him as it is relieving to the pent-up feelings of those who give it.

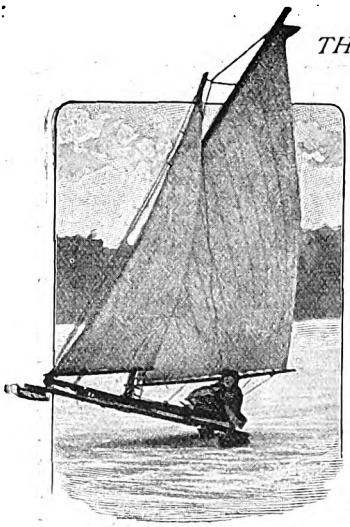
A NOVEL FORM OF FAST MOTION.

Less fascinating, perhaps, than other forms of fast motion, because distance weakens the direct influence, and yet more beautiful to the eye because of its surroundings, is yacht-racing. To experience the fascination at its best, one should be aboard the yacht, where the draw of the wind may be felt and the sound of the rushing waters may be heard. At a distance across the glistening bay, hedged in by green hills, it is the beauty of the wide white sails bulging against the sun and the shapely keel caressing the waves which appeals to the eye, rather than the fascination of speed, which appeals to a profounder sense. Yet when one can run in close and have a near view of a yacht flying under all sail, smashing the waves from her prow, dashing the spray high over her sides, and leaving a great white trail in her wake, his blood tingles in his veins, his eyes dance with the dancing vessel, and the fascination of fast motion has laid its mystic hands upon him.

The tremendous speed of the large ocean steamers loses its effect on the mind by reason of the greater immensity of the sea, and the spectator is unable to realize fully what their motion is. He may, however, have a most vivid realization of the fascination of fast motion in mass, if he will make a journey by steamer through the rapids of the St. Lawrence. Here, through the angry waters, smashing and foaming over sunken and dangerous rocks, the huge bulk of the vessel is hurled at railway speed—thirty-five miles an hour in places, it is said. The voyager on deck clutches the rail, watching fearfully the rocks to the left, the tree-girt shore to the right, almost in touch of him; he is fascinated and frightened, yet glad to be there, and only too glad when he is safely through and into the quieter waters below.

Another steamer whose speed the observer may enjoy is the torpedo-boat, the fastest thing that goes in water except a fish. These little, low, long, lithe, steel-scaled serpents of the sea weave their way through the waters, curling the huge, rolling waves back from their bows and dashing out of vision so quickly that one has scarcely time to know what strange charm it was that held him for an instant and was gone so soon.

Digitized by Google



FASTER THAN THE WIND.

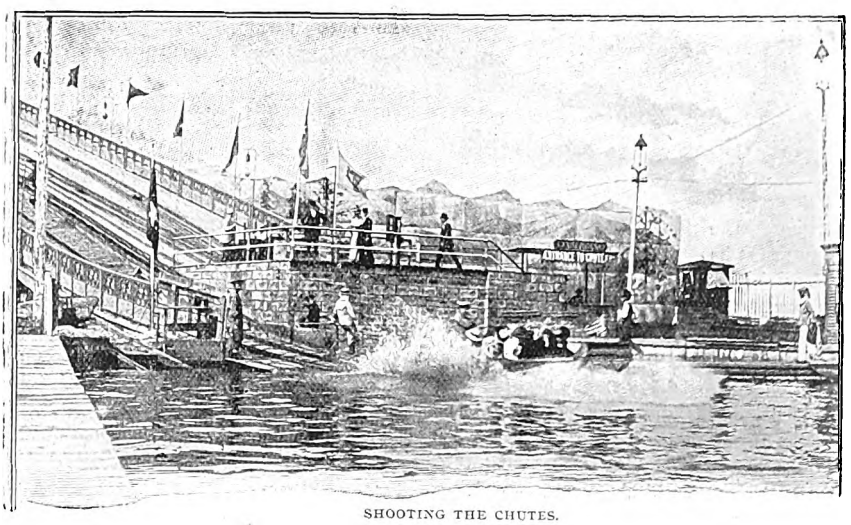
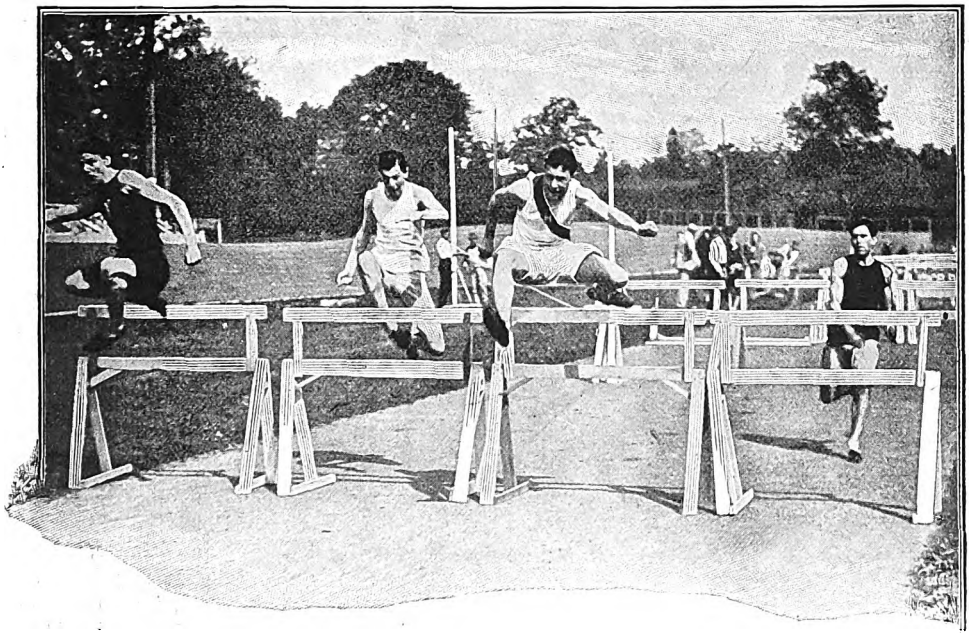
To the railway-train the record of the highest speed belongs, and while the fascination of its fastness may not be so powerful as that of some other forms of motion, it is more widely distributed and more frequently exerts its influence. Day in and day out, year after year, the best of us, the worst of us, the old of us, the young of us, wait to watch a train whiz by, and the charm of it is as fresh and as strong with the last one that passed as it was with the first. The old man, bent on his staff, stops to look, and the toddler by his side lifts up its chubby hands and shouts its delight, each entranced by the same witchery. A train standing on a siding would not be noticed, but when it is imbued with the spirit of speed and rushes along its iron course, it makes all the world subject to its charm. In the moving-picture exhibitions, the most popular form of presenting pictures, there is none more popular, none that more catches and holds an audience, than the picture of the lightning express. Merely a bit of smoke at first, far up the track, then growing larger as it comes rushing on, it fills the canvas an instant and dashes out of sight, followed by the applause of its willing slaves. Any other picture may be omitted and there will be no protest from an audience, but if the fast flier does not appear, everybody thinks he has missed the best part of the show. Such is the fascination even in this mimic motion.

TOBOGGANING.



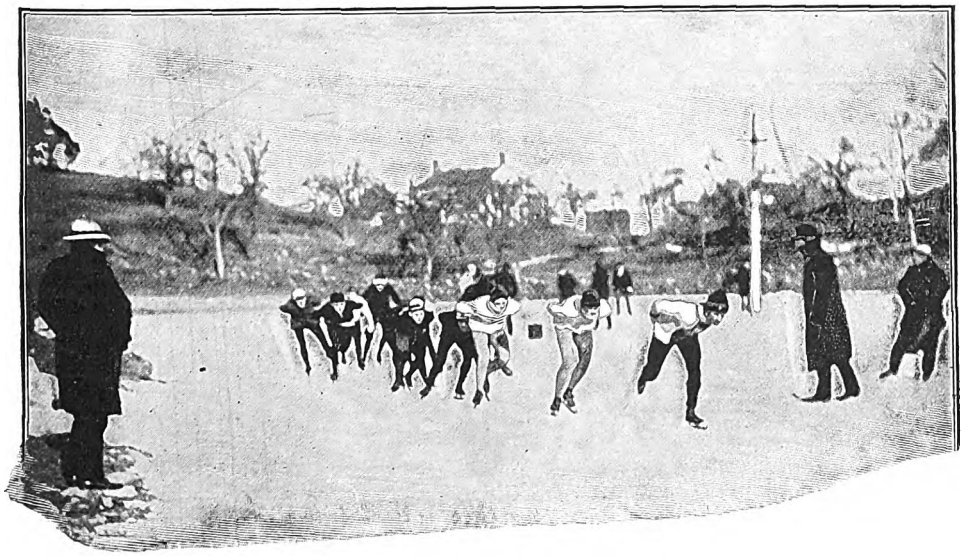
SHOOTING THE CHUTES.

Digitized by Google



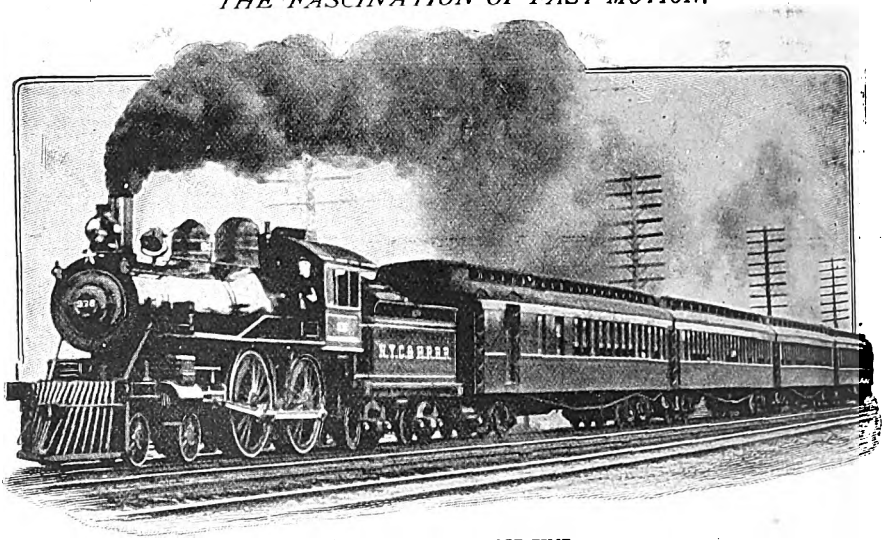
A HURDLE-RACE.

To the traveler on a train, the charm of speed, though the spell is reversed, exerts its power and holds him fast at the car window, watching the circling cyclorama of hill and valley, river and plain, town and country, hour after hour, unwearied by the strain. Or if wearied, he is not conscious of it until the train stops and the spell is off. But what the fascination is at a car window is nothing compared with the thrilling sensation of speed the novice experiences when he is fortunate enough to get a seat at the cab window and looks about him from the locomotive. There all the hurry and roar and power of the train are centered, and he seems to be in the very core of the magic circle that carries his brain in a whirl and transfixes every sensory nerve. On each side the landscape is a confused continuity of objects,



SPEED ON SKATES.

Digitized by Google



MAKING UP LOST TIME.

and as he gazes ahead he feels that the twin strips of shining steel, stretching far away until they meet, are being rolled up under the quivering engine that hides them in its swiftness. Other motions fascinate by their beauty and grace; this fascinates by its strength and savagery. Walt Whitman has written:

"O the engineer's joys,
To go with the locomotive;
To hear the hiss of steam—the merry shriek—
the steam whistle—the laughing locomotive!
To push with resistless way and speed off in distance."

But the locomotive, pushing with resistless way and speeding off in distance, does not charm with its smile. It may laugh, but, to the novice at least, its laugh is one that curdles the blood. Its fascination is of a sterner sort which seeks to break its subject rather than to bend him.

Competing in speed with railway-trains, yet lacking their powerful fascination because embodying so much less of strength, are the graceful ice-yachts, whose steel runners, under the pressure of wide-expanding sails, skim lightly over the frozen plain at the rate of a mil a minute—faster even than the wind that blows them. These are the white pigeons of flight, as the locomotive is the black eagle. Thousands brave the winter's cold and wind to watch them sail, and they hold the watchers to them, but with a gentler influence. It is not until one takes his place, flat down beneath the sails, and feels himself whirled along at terrific speed, so near the surface over which he glides that he involuntarily shrinks from contact with it, that he feels the true fascination of an ice-yacht's fast motion.

AN AUTOMOBILE ROAD RACE.

Digitized by Google

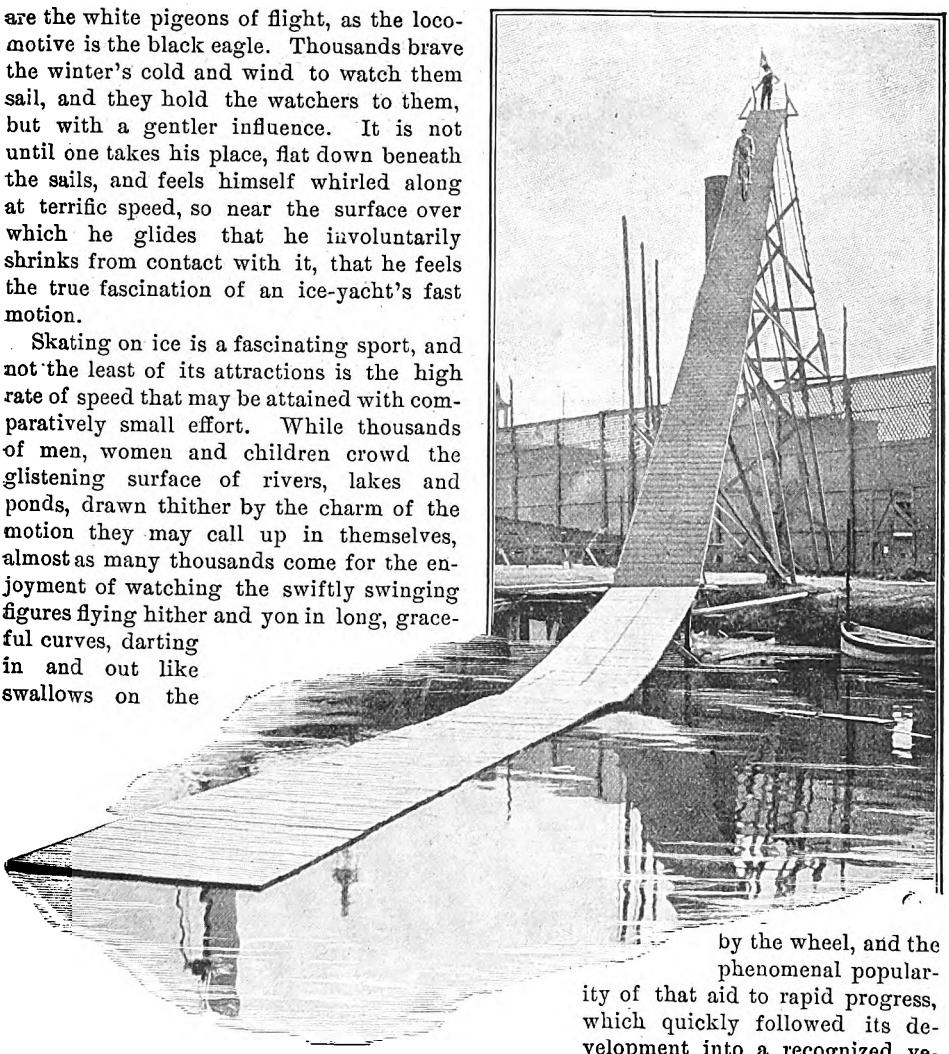
Skating on ice is a fascinating sport, and not the least of its attractions is the high rate of speed that may be attained with comparatively small effort. While thousands of men, women and children crowd the glistening surface of rivers, lakes and ponds, drawn thither by the charm of the motion they may call up in themselves, almost as many thousands come for the enjoyment of watching the swiftly swinging figures flying hither and yon in long, graceful curves, darting in and out like swallows on the wing and dashing straight away across the open like an arrow from the bow.

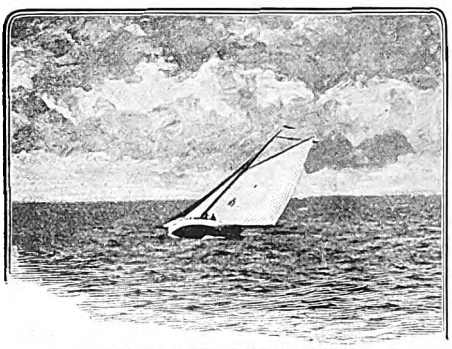


A DANGEROUS EXPERIMENT IN FAST MOTION.

Foot-racing, another form of leg-propulsion, excites deep interest, and at a college foot-race crowds of students, with the pretty maids they adore, gather about the cinder-track and watch, entranced, the runners striving for the goal. Equal interests might be at stake in a walking-match, but the fascination of fast motion is lacking in that, and such races are as wanting in the spell that binds as is a piece of putty. Fast motion is the thing, and the sprinter's speed is the sorcery of his success.

The speediest form of leg-propulsion is by the wheel, and the phenomenal popularity of that aid to rapid progress, which quickly followed its development into a recognized vehicle of movement, was no more than an additional demonstration of the fascination of fast motion. Millions of people who had never gone out of a walk, fascinated by the speed of the bicycle, provided themselves with wheels and flew all over the country from lake to gulf, from sea to sea, and some went clear around the world. They were not content with seeing others spinning over the smooth roads: the fever of the fascination burned in their blood, and they must spin themselves; and they did. Never in the history of man's progress was there anything like it, and so strong was its hold that one of the great manufacturing industries of this and other countries has laid a permanent foundation upon a fascination which was little less than an infatuation. Bicycle-racing was a natural sequence, for fast motion was the impelling spirit of it all, and the very highest speed that was in man and machine was demanded by eager thousands. A mile a minute was attained by one rider, a rate faster than ever flesh and blood had propelled itself at. It was second only to the speed of steam, and human strength and endurance have not yet exceeded that limit. It was the result of the cry, "Faster! faster!" from the fascinated ones whose imagination compassed the infinite. Is it any wonder that we have now a tribe of "scorchers," which many of us heartily wish was among the "lost tribes"?

Digitized by Google



RACING WITH A STIFF GALE.

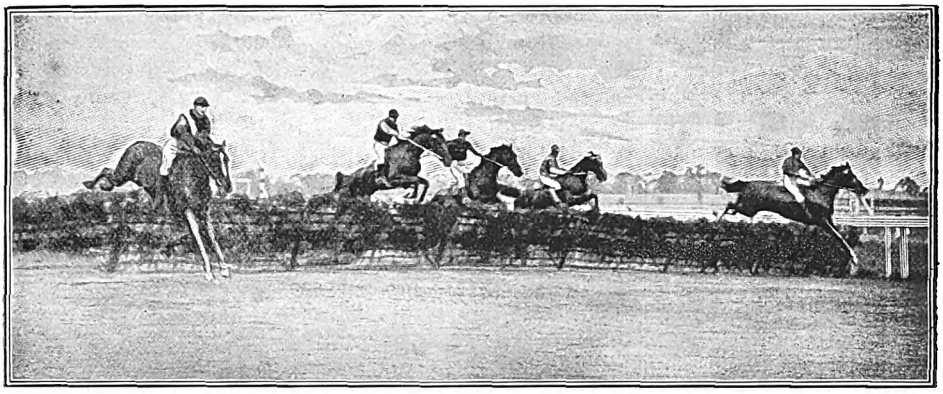
Next of kin to the bicycle is the automobile, urged by steam or electricity or gas. Leg-propulsion was too slow; the horse was a back number. What was needed to satisfy the craving for greater speed was a carriage run by machinery. More than a mile a minute the auto may go—and still maker and driver and spectator are not satisfied. There is a universal desire for a higher speed, manifested anywhere and everywhere when two autos are near each other on the road to test their pace. "Let her go! let her go!" is the shout from the friends of each, all eager to see the race, all fascinated by the sight of these railless locomotives rushing pell-mell along the highway.

The mere riding in an auto over the roads exercises a peculiar charm on those who have indulged in it, even to a limited extent. Not only does the easy elasticity of the motion please, but the speedy travel with no visible effort exhilarates and attracts as that of no other vehicle does.

Related to the auto on one side of the family and to the locomotive on the other is the trolley-car, also one of the later expressions of speed. The trolley-car may not be "the fastest thing on wheels," but the faster it dashes down grades, across valleys, by waving fields of grain, past pleasant farm-houses and along the roadside, leaving slow-going carts and wagons in its wake, the more powerful is the charm to those who pay the lowest price for the longest hauls known to transportation. It may be denied by some that speed is a factor in its attractiveness, but the records will disprove the denial. Almost invariably in localities where the old-fashioned horse-cars could scarcely find patrons enough to pay running expenses the adoption of the trolley has revolutionized passenger traffic. The people were the same, their number had not been materially increased, nor had they fallen heir to fortunes; but the fascination of fast motion fell upon them when they saw the scurrying trolley-car go by with a saucy flirt around the corner, where before the horse-car plodded its weary way, and forthwith they quit walking and took the trolley.

A SCENIC RAILWAY.

Digitized by Google



AN EXCITING STEEPLECHASE.

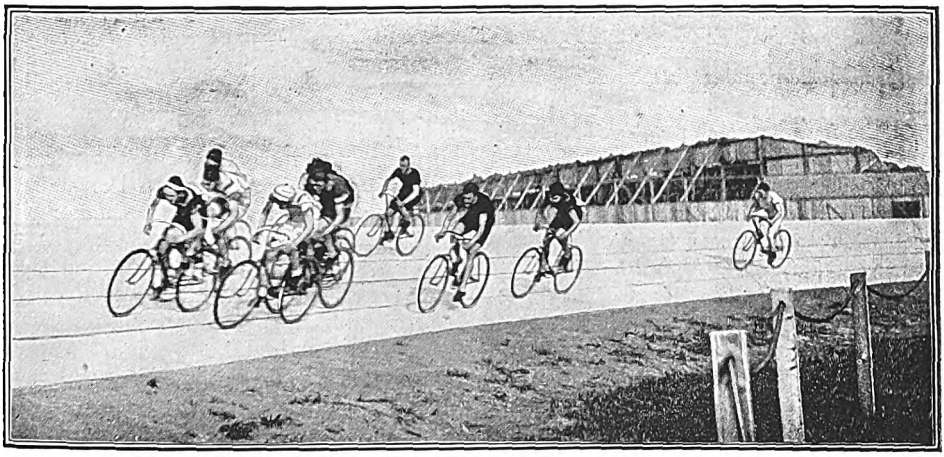
Every year the banks of our rivers, at certain favorable points, are lined with thousands of spectators intently watching far across the water the rhythmic rise and fall of oars and the measured motion of "eights" or "fours" who pull. A boat-race is on, and they are there to see which crew has the greater speed. They are interested from the start, of course, but the interest is tame until the finish approaches and the swaying bodies move to quicker impulses and the oars rise and fall in faster time. Quicker, faster—quicker, faster—ten thousand hearts throb with the beating oars in strained silence till the stake is passed, then the spell is broken in a burst of shouts that echoes away in the valleys and rebounds upon the hills that touch the far horizon.

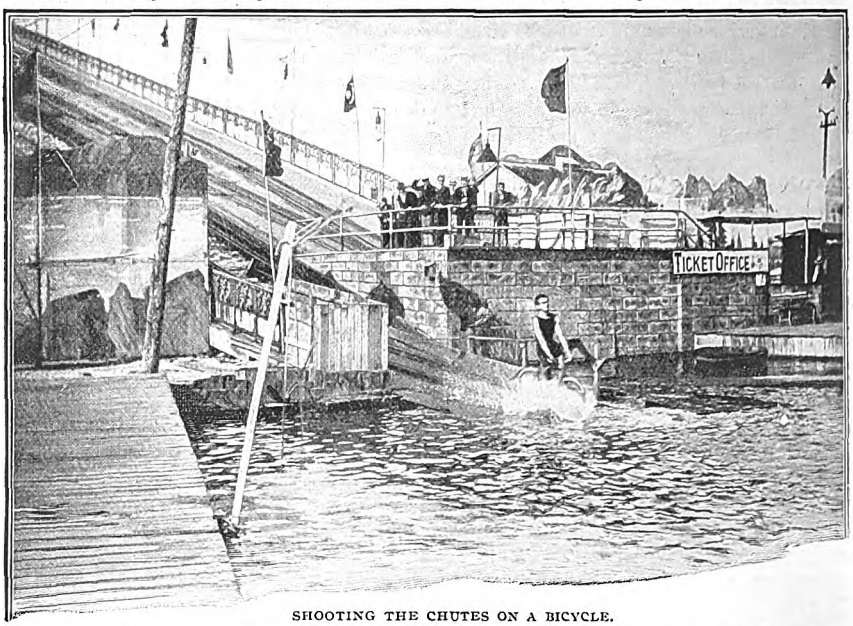
It is true enough that in all contests the element of superiority in strength, skill and endurance enters largely into the interest of the spectators, but there must be speed to insure the fascinating interest which makes racing contests the most attractive of all sports. If it were not so, there would be contests of slowness, and we should have canal-boat-races and cow-



SPRINTING ON THE LAST LAP.

Digitized by Google

races and truck-races and scow-races. No matter how great the prizes offered and how long the pedigrees of such contestants, nor how fiercely they might struggle to win, such contests would never attract. In former times long-distance horse-races, three, five, ten, and even twenty miles, were run, and there were famous long-distance horses—the best type of horse ever bred, too—but endurance is not fascinating. The horses must go faster. Flesh and blood and bone could not meet the demand for twenty miles, nor ten, nor five, nor three; the noble animal could do his best for a mile, for a minute and a half or two minutes, according to his gait, and a mile or less is now the popular distance for a horse-race.

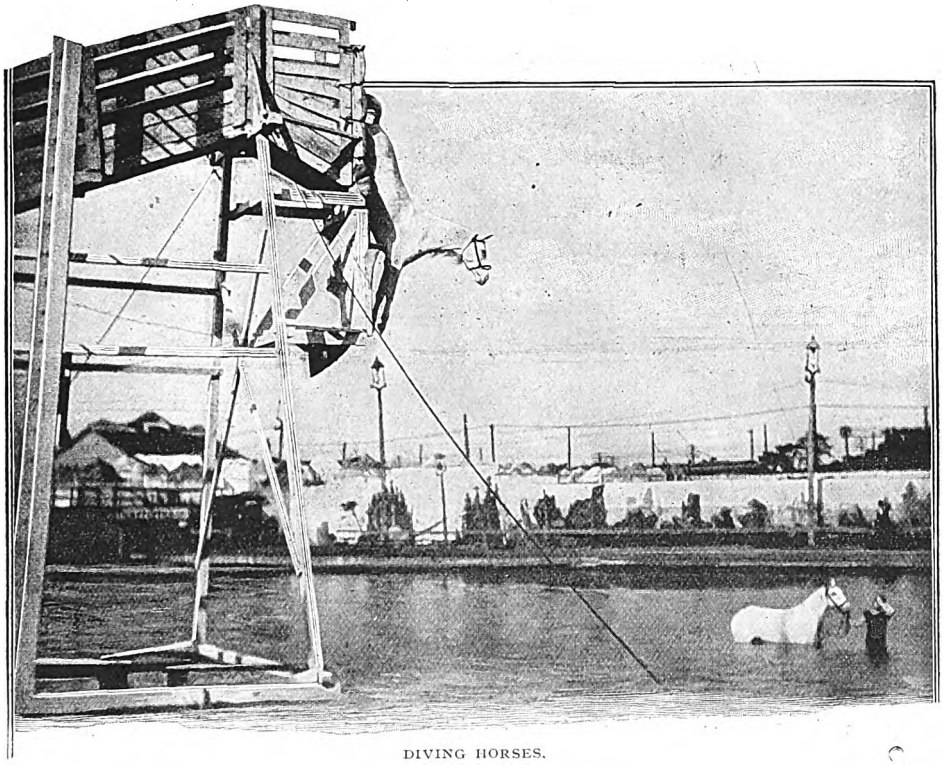


SHOOTING THE CHUTES ON A BICYCLE.

Of the family of "chutes" and "loops" and "roller coasters"—that is, of uncontrolled speed whose power is gravity—is tobogganing, which exerted its powers of fascination to a considerable extent some years ago. But it had such limitations that general popularity was impossible to it, albeit those who had once gone down a toboggan slide, especially those of the feminine gender, readily admitted that it was "perfectly fascinating." The element of danger was strong, but the wild speed of the toboggan plunging down the steep incline held slider and spectator enthralled by its reckless rush. Some left-handed admirer of tobogganing has described it as: "Z—z—zt; and walk back half a mile up a hill." There is, no doubt, some truth in this description of the quick descent and the labor to return to the point where one may take flight again, but thousands forget this in the fascination of the sport, and toil backward and upward for that one magic moment of "Z—z—zt."

The terror of all fast motion is the fierce, wild rush of a fire-engine through the thronging thoroughfares of a great city. The tearing speed of the horses among their slow-moving brethren; the intense face of the driver, strapped to his seat and bent far forward straining at the drawn reins in his hands, guiding his team in and out among the hundreds of vehicles in his way; the firemen clinging to the engine; the flying sparks and trailing smoke; the beating of the cylinders; the desperate haste of it all, furnish a fascination that never fails in its effects. However long a man has lived in the midst of alarms, however strenuous his life, he stops always when he hears the clang of the gong and takes his place along the curb with hundreds as helpless as he to watch the engine go by. It represents the combined energy and speed of man and horse and steam in their frenzied race to fight an enemy whose power to destroy can be paralyzed only by promptness, and the fascinating force of this combination of man, horse and steam cannot be withstood.

Digitized by Google



DIVING HORSES.

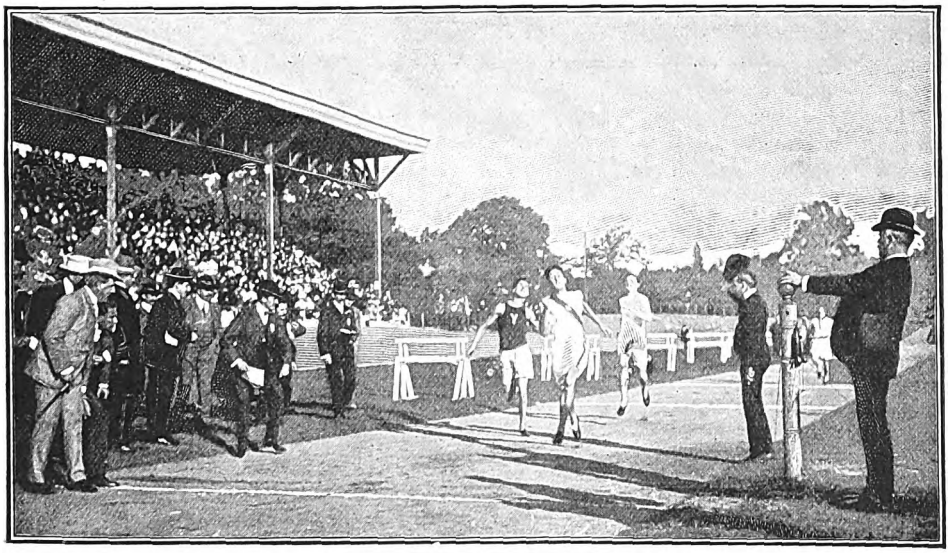
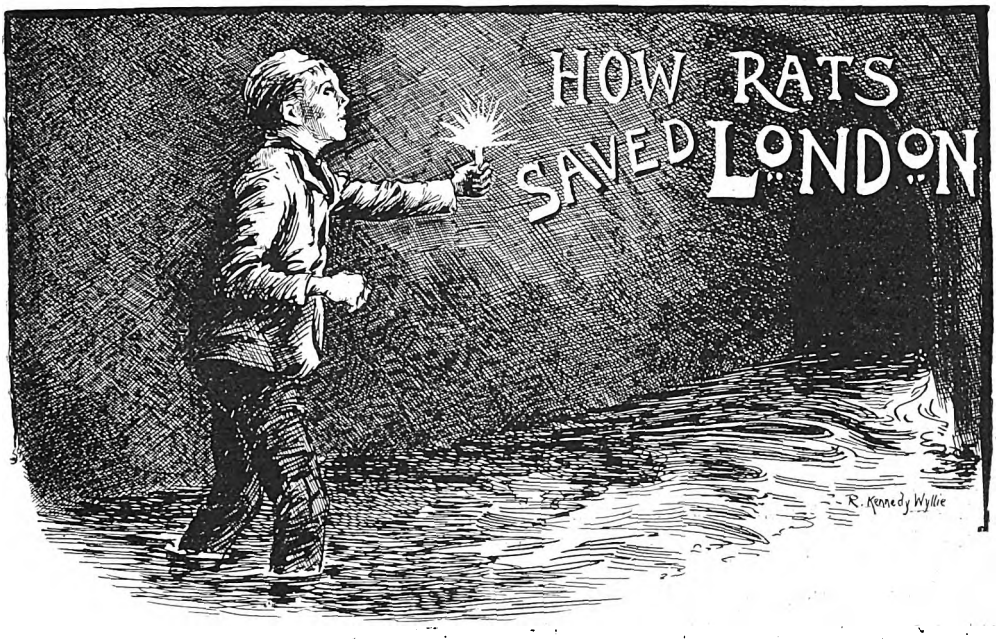
Leaving the land and the sea for a moment, we float into the air in a balloon for a new sensation. Of all motions, this is the one motion that is imperceptible, and yet it is strangely fascinating. There is no throbbing of machinery, no rolling of wheels, no panting of lungs, no jar of road or rail, no sense of push or pull, no fixed



THE FINISH OF A FOOT-RACE.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



RATS SLOWLY MADE HIS WAY ALONG THE BED OF THE SEWER.

RATS was a lad, not a rodent. A tall, slimly built lad, who had in him more of the wild animal than of a human being, even of the lowest type.

The boy was called Rats because of his habit of lurking in out of the way holes and corners, his red, ferrety eyes, and his savagery when by chance he was brought to bay. It was seldom, however, that the roughest Hooligan ventured to tackle Rats in close quarters. Those scourges of London had learnt by experience to respect his brutal courage, which was supplemented by tenacity equal to that of a weasel, and the cunning of the creatures whose name he bore. If the lad had any other name than Rats, which was doubtful, he never answered to it.

No one, not even Rats' most intimate associates, knew where he had his diggings. They supposed that because he lived as most of them did, upon whatever might casually be picked up, so he slept where he could, a mere son of chance, in lodgings that were changed nightly.

Those waifs of humanity were familiar with all the runs open to their tribe—empty barges, disused warehouses, the stairways of common-lodging houses, Salvation Army Shelters, market baskets at Covent Garden, and that most repellent refuge of all, the Thames Embankment, where sleep was banished by the policeman.

It was wonderingly admitted that Rats had never been met late at night in any of those haunts; but that might reasonably be supposed an accident. The wastrels, were, however, mistaken. The lad was independent of casual refuges, because he owned a home which had a local habitation, if not a name.

Rats' place of business was London generally, which he exploited for his own benefit. What his business was, not even he himself could have explained; for it comprised all the usual occupations of the youthful loafer, and many other questionable ones besides. He was an adept in every calling for the destitute, from mud-larking, to acting as runner for cabs; with newspaper hawking, and petty larceny thrown in to fill up spare time, and also for the more material purpose of attempting to fill a chronically empty stomach. In short, Rats was an incorrigible young ruffian. His home, if that could be called a home where he only slept, was in the neighbourhood of Hackney Marshes. Here he had found a shelter in a shed attached to one of those huge naphtha works which add so considerably to the wealth, as, also, to the disagreeableness of the district. Probably if the workmen had known, they would have ejected the squatter tenant, for boys of Rats' class are unfortunately addicted to smoking; and a naked light in the vicinity of such inflammable works, might have resulted in the cremation of the smoker, and widely-spread disaster to the district. They were, however, ignorant of the extra and unwarrantable use to which the shed was put; for its occupant retired late, and rose early. Hence his domicile was not discovered.

Digitized by Google

Rats was going home. After the cautious manner of his race, he had already made a circuit of the naphtha works, as a precautionary measure to ensure that they were deserted by the workmen; and was furtively watching to discover whether or no he had been followed, when an indistinguishable shadow fell on the line of gas-light, and as suddenly disappeared.

The street arab's suspicion was aroused at once, and he crept stealthily along under the screen of the wall, until the spot was reached. Here two men were standing in the shelter of an angle, talking earnestly together.

"Toffs! What's their game? Swell mobsmen, maybe, dividing up their plunder," Rats remarked to himself, his thoughts naturally reverting to dishonesty. As he had no more confidence in systematic law-breakers than in honest labourers, he wormed himself closer.

The appearance of the men who, whatever their business and position in life might be, kept themselves carefully concealed from the observation of any passers-by, did not support the lad's conclusion, for they were roughly dressed as navvies, but their speech was not that of genuine working men.

"To-morrow, at midnight, all will be in order, and then—!" one of the men said with a low sniggering laugh, which had something creepy in it. Rats, who possessed the bump of curiosity, listened with both ears.

"And then, at three of the clock, we shall insert the apparatus. It will do its work within an hour, by which time, if fortune is propitious, we shall have caught an early train for the north; and the first fool who lights his pipe near to a man-hole, or some early sewer-men, will ignorantly serve the brotherhood, and do the trick for us!"

"And good-bye to London!" the laugher said.

"Good-bye to London, or any way, the greater portion of it. Those who live in the country, and are early awake, will see a great light."

"Hist! someone comes! By all that is sacred, we are watched!" The man who seemed unable to speak without that suppressed titter of laughter, appeared to be as keen of hearing as a cat. Rats had not stirred, but he was breathing quickly, and the fellow must have overheard his long-drawn breaths.

"COME NOW, TELL THE TRUTH, NO LIES."

The men separated, and Rats, fearful of being discovered, for although ignorant of their purpose, he was shrewd to comprehend that they would show no mercy to a detected eaves-dropper, fled to his haunt in the shed; his naked feet making no noise as he ran.

Not frightened, for Rats had no conception of the meaning of fear where the police were not concerned, yet thankful that these men of the dirty clothing and cultured speech (for such their conversation was to him, whose habitual language was that common to the gutter) had not caught him, the lad slunk into his lair, and threw himself upon a pile of sacks which was to serve the purposes of a bed for him. All was dark inside, except for the moonlight which shone through the numerous crevices. Rats had lain awake for upwards of an hour, vainly striving to piece and solve the mystery which surrounded the fragmentary remarks he had overheard, when he excitedly sprang to his feet and listened intently, dubiously rubbing his forehead the while. Thud! thud!! the sound was heard at regular and frequent intervals, and suggested the use of a pick-axe. It was an alarming disturbance of Rats' meditations. For a full minute he imagined that the workmen had returned, and were labouring outside on some emergency employment, digging close to his quarters. If that were so, they would be likely to enter the shed for some reason or another. Then there would be no means of escape for him, since the only way of exit was by the rickety door. He would be found trespassing, and the result would be a drubbing, unless—and at the thought of such a catastrophe the lad shuddered—they gave him into the custody of the police.

Digitized by Google

As Rats listened, standing at attention, his coolness returned. The noise of digging did not come from outside, but from beneath, as if some one were excavating directly under the shed. He was safe unless the midnight labourers worked their way through the hard, earthen floor, and even if they did so he would have time enough in which to clear out. But what could it mean?

Rats went to bed again, but he could not sleep; his active brain, which compensated for its educational deficiencies with cunning, was busily endeavouring to unravel this tangle of adventure. Meanwhile, the delver continued to ply his occupation. So time passed for upwards of two hours longer, the lad hearkening, and thinking hard, but without any satisfactory result. Then the digging ceased.

"'Twasn't any o' them sewer chaps, for they don't work o' nights! Blow me, an' s'help me, I'll have a squint at 'em!" Rats exclaimed. So saying, he ran out, and having first closed the door behind him, posted himself conveniently near the corner of the street in which, as he remembered, the nearest man-hole was fixed. "They're certain to come up that way!" he said, talking to himself.

The street was deserted, the gas-lights burned dimly, and the moon was intermittently obscured by clouds which flitted across the sky.

Rats was not mistaken in his conclusion. Presently the cover of the man-hole was raised, and a man's head appeared. After peering cautiously around to see that he was not observed, he came up; and a second followed. They closed the outlet and went hastily away, leaving a trail of liquid evil-smelling slime behind them.

"Them chaps aren't up to no good. I'll go down now, and see what's their little game. Likely they've bin a hidin' plunder. If so, it's a prime piece of luck for me, and I'm the boy to scoop it in!"

Rats chuckled over his prospective good fortune, and edging himself across the street, as if he were going in any direction except that of his intended goal, he, with as many turnings and windings as a fox employs when approaching its earth, reached the man-hole.

He, being a powerful lad for his years, and his natural strength being stimulated by curiosity and hope of gain, found it a matter of no difficulty to raise the iron cover. He gazed downward into a pitchy black cavity. Fearlessly entering this, he descended the steps sufficiently to enable him to close the cover, thus shutting himself in, and descended into the sewer. Rats did not mind the stench, nor the filthy swirling water which ran in a swift current over his bare feet, and was so deep as to reach nearly up to his knees. It was not the first time by many that he had visited these subterranean regions. A scuffling noise not many feet distant, accompanied by loud squeakings, reminded him that the sewer rats, large villainous brutes whose bites are dangerous, and which in their overwhelming numbers would not for long hesitate to attack a man, were watchful and alert.

Rats understood the habits of the foul creatures, and was aware that they would not face a light. Also he was in an impenetrable darkness, unable to see a foot in front of him, and to pursue his investigations a light was indispensable. So he produced a scrap of guttered tallow candle, and a match, from some hole in his rags, which served instead of pocket, and lit it.

Digitized by Google

There was a rush of cold wind in the sewer, and the candle flickered so that Rats was obliged to screen it with his cap; but the flowing filth and the slimy fœtid walls were dimly discernible. He slowly made his way along the bed of the underground stream, slipping more than once, and shivering with the cold and wet. He gripped his candle end tightly, for if that were lost he might be lost. It would be difficult for him to find his way out again in that gross darkness.

At a short distance up the sewer Rats came upon an opening in the dark wall, sufficiently large to admit a stooping man, which to all appearance did not form part of the original work; for it was not bricked and had been freshly excavated. Uttering an exclamation, for the mystery was thickening, he entered this by-path tunnel, and soon found himself, as he calculated, beneath the shed. The tunnel now turned sharply to the right. Rats stumbled onward to the end of it, where his nostrils were assailed by a pungent stench of naphtha, which nearly suffocated him.

Once more Rats scratched his head, as it was his habitual custom to do when puzzled; and then light dawned upon him. There was an end to his hope of finding hidden treasure, but he had made another discovery. He was close to one of the immense vats sunk in the ground, wherein thousands of gallons of naphtha would be stored. The midnight workmen had designs upon these stores of inflammable spirit, and to reach them they had dug this enormous hole.

What could their object be? Rats' first thought was that they intended to steal the naphtha, but that was immediately dismissed. The commodity was so cheap, that the gain would not compensate them for so much toil and trouble in obtaining it. Also, if they broke through into the vat, there would be an outrush of the stuff which would swamp and drown them, if they were not suffocated by its fumes before that event could happen. Rats did not reason exactly in this manner, but these were his conclusions. Explanation did not lie along the line of larceny.

"I am a drivelling idiot!" he exclaimed. "The chaps said that the first person who lit a pipe would do the trick for them, and the whole place would be in a blaze. Those fellows must be — that's it — they're Anarchists. Their little game is to flood the sewers with naphtha, and then, s'help me, there would be a wholesale blow up. The murderous scoundrels!"

Rats was undecided what to do; but as the plotters had unintentionally informed him that they would not resume their fiendish work for nearly twenty-four hours more, he resolved to doss it again. That would give him time for thinking, and in the morning his head would be clearer. So he groped his way back to the man-hole, and, across the yard, into the shed.

He was abroad again before daybreak, wandering around the works, and as befogged as when he left the sewer. He was on the track of villains who had projected a crime of gigantic proportions, and the discovery was valueless; excepting in so far as it might enable him to take measures for the preservation of his own worthless life. For he could tramp, and put miles between himself and doomed London.

Rats, however, possessed certain rudimentary instincts of sympathy, rough as as he was, he was not destitute of chivalry, and the reflection that thousands of unoffending citizens were doomed to death by those two heartless ruffians appealed to the softer side of his nature.

The lad entertained no feeling of reverence for the law, its hand had always been against him, and his lot had, as long as he could remember, been thrown in with that of the law-breakers. Yet neither he nor his associates had in them anything of the murderer's kidney. They would pilfer, but not kill; steal and burn a builder's planks, but not make a holocaust of a great city and its inhabitants.

Whilst Rats was watching and thinking of the conversation he had overheard, a burly workman, whose clothes bore evidence of a close acquaintance with the clay brickfields, came sauntering along. Rats looked keenly at the hulking figure, and whistled. It was his chance. "Sergeant!" he ejaculated in a sibilant whisper.

The man took no notice. Rats turned, executed a Catherine wheel, and again said, "Sergeant!"

The brickmaker dived and gripped the impudent Rats, who, making no effort to

Digitized by Google

free himself, remarked, "You wouldn't ha' caught me, if I hadn't wanted you to. I'm yer fortune, sergeant."

The repetition of the word, which denoted a grade in the police force, apparently annoyed the workman, who said, gruffly, "I don't fathom you, youngster. There aren't no bobbies here.'

"Blimey, that's good. As if a feller couldn't spot Sergeant Dullen. Why yer can't disguise yerself from us lads." And Rats grinned mischievously.

"Then as you have spotted me, I'll take you along to the station," and the herculean detective nearly lifted Rats off his feet.

"If that's yer lay, I'm 'greeable; but I've summat for yer privit ear. You once gived me a breakfast, and now that is going to be paid for."

"Speak up then, and tell me no lies."

"Not here!" Rats glanced apprehensively around. "Somewhere on the quiet. You won't be sorry."

Sergeant Dullen, holding his nose in the air, strode towards a dirty little coffee shop, and pushing the lad inside, followed. There, over a steaming cup, three slices and an egg, Rats hurriedly told his story.

The sergeant did not eat, he watched the lad closely, questioning him at intervals about the appearance of the men, while busying himself with a stumpy pencil and a note-book. "Is that all?" he laconically asked, when Rats had concluded.

When the lad replied that it was, so far as he could jolly well remember, the detective laughed a guffaw which was in keeping with his assumed character, and answered, "You have had your breakfast and we will let it go at that. I'm not the duffer who is to be caught by such a tale." As if disappointed with Rats' communication, and regretting the countenance he had given to the lad, he stamped noisily out of the coffee-house.

THE TWO FELLOWS TURNED AT BAY.

Rats dropped his lip, and uttered an uncomplimentary expression of his opinion of the detective's ability. His scheme had foundered upon the rocks of Sergeant Dullen's stupidity.

The policeman, however, was not such a victim of red tape as Rats supposed. More than once information which had reached him through unorthodox channels had proved to be a good thing ; and he was not a man who neglected his opportunities. The Sergeant was a rising young officer. Rats got through the day somehow, and night found him again in the vicinity of the naphtha works, but not disposed to sleep. So far from that, he gave the shed a wide berth, and watched for the coming of the conspirators. If the lad had faith in nothing else, he had faith in their unscrupulous determination to blow up London.

Digitized by Google

A little before midnight the men again appeared. Rats recognised them at once. After reconnoitering, they descended the sewer as before. "I'll see them back again, and then mizzle. If there's time for them to get away I shan't be in no 'mediate danger," Rats said to himself.

Rats was running ahead of events. In sporting phraseology he was out-riding the hounds. A policeman coming out of an alley so surprised him that he was within an ace of giving himself away. Another officer followed, and yet another, to the number of six. Then the man-hole was opened, and they noiselessly descended into the underground river. As the hindmost disappeared, it dawned upon Rats that Sergeant Dullen had not been so slow witted after all ; and the detective's shrewdness in keeping his own counsel considerably raised him in the lad's estimation.

Rats, scenting fun, followed the representatives of the law, moving more stealthily than they had done, for he was familiar with the sewer, and cunning came as naturally to him as breathing.

The policemen, guided only by the feeble glimmer of a dark lantern, having reached the sewer, plodded through its filth, until the excavation which the desperate enemies of all the human race had made, and Rats had discovered, was reached. There they paused, and glanced meaningly at one another. It was not only that they overheard sounds of labour. A long black,snaky thing stretched away from where they stood, its other extremity being lost in the darkness. It was a length of firemen's hose.

They moved forward once more, and again halted, standing in blackness, gazing into a ring of light in front of them. A horn lantern was hung upon a peg driven into the earthen wall, and by its light two men were busy at work. One of them was holding an iron tube, which the other was driving into the soil with blows of a sledge hammer.

Sergeant Dullen's eyes sparkled; he comprehended their purpose and would frustrate it. He saw himself already a made man, an inspector at least.

That tube was a tap, with a spigot. The rogues were tapping the naphtha vat, through which the steel end of the tube would cut as easily as a knife through butter. They would attach the hose to the tap, without the spigot, allowing the naphtha to flow into the sewer,and London would be a burnt-up city of the dead. That was their scheme, but they forgot they had to reckon with him. Already he had forgotten his indebtedness to Rats.

With a sudden movement he flashed his lantern upon the scene, and exclaimed, "You are our prisoners!"

The fellows turned at bay. There was a flash from a pistol, a policeman staggered ; another, and a bullet sped close to Rats' ear, burying itself in the wall.

The police made a rush, but not quickly enough ; the pistols again rang out, and two dead men lay at their feet.

Rats had witnessed more than he bargained for, he had been in at the death, and felt sick. Thoroughly cowed, he scuttled back into the deserted street; leaving the baffled law face to face with the carrion of disappointed anarchy. It did not occur to him that he had saved London from a destruction as complete as that which overtook the doomed cities of the plain.

Digitized by Google

MR. HARRY PAYNE WHITNEY AND FRIENDS OFF FOR A COUNTRY CLUB.

DIVERSIONS OF SOME MILLIONAIRES.

By Walter Germain Robinson.

BY inheritance, the American is a true sportsman. He has it in his blood. He derives his love of the open, of hunting and of fishing, of horses, and of life on the sea, from ancestors who over a century ago were famous with gun and rod, were excellent horsemen and splendid sailors. But the sport of those days came of necessity. The explorer, the settler and the backwoodsman had new regions to discover, food to provide and wild animals to keep away from the freshly built home. In the years which followed the gradual settling of the country, and the Indian and colonial wars and the Revolution, the people of the United States were too busy in building up a commonwealth to take up sport as a pastime. Even as late as the sixties, millionaires were not plentiful, and those who had money, or who had made it, were not generally of the class that cared for life in the open. There were occasional trips to the Adirondacks, or to the Rockies or other parts of the West, for big game; racing was being established more as a business than a pastime; and there had been a few men who had taken up yachting. But no one seemed to have the leisure to indulge in sport to any great extent, and to possess a trotter who could make two-forty was considered to be about the limit in sporting life among gentlemen.

MR. CHARLES R. FLINT PUTTING OFF TO HIS YACHT.

Charles Astor Bristed, who published a

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

coast is unrivaled. To those who are devoted to aquatics, a steam-yacht hardly comes within the definition of sport. At the time of the building of the "America," and indeed for years afterward, there was not a steam-yacht owned by an American. To those who went last year to the race between the "Columbia" and "Shamrock II.," the superb fleet of large ocean-going steam-vessels owned by Americans was one of the most inspiring and interesting sights of the day. Here was the "Nahma," in which the Robert Goelets had traveled all around the world, and which last summer was considered a wonder in the line of yachts owned by private individuals at St. Petersburg, and which later was visited by the Emperor of Germany at Kiel. Here was the "Nourmahal" of John Jacob Astor; the "Narada" of Mr. Walters, of Baltimore; the immense "Niagara," owned by Mr. Howard Gould; the "Varuna" of Mr. Eugene Higgins; the "Conqueror" of Frederick Vanderbilt, and more than fifty others. All of these ships, although called by the sportsmen "steam-ferries," are perfectly appointed ocean steamships. They are most luxuriously fitted up and their owners have sailed all over the world in them. A steam-yacht is perhaps the costliest of the millionaire's playthings. When she is in commission, there are the captain and crew and cooks, stewards and a large staff of servants, to be employed; entertaining is done on a lavish scale; and a single season costs a small fortune. Each year sees improvements in the building of steam-yachts. They are now constructed to make the voyage across the Atlantic in as short a time as any of the liners.

But the millionaire is never content with one yacht. His great steam-yacht proper is for ocean travel. He generally has an auxiliary cruising-yacht propelled by gasoline for the coast. This is, of course, a sailing-yacht in which the propelling power is used only in case of a calm or of an emergency. He is sportsman always and he must have his racing-yacht; his catboat, which has come much into favor at Newport and other seaside resorts for racing limited distances, and a still smaller craft introduced at Newport last summer for like contests. To the large steam-yachts belong yawls of different descriptions, including those propelled by naphtha and gasoline; to the summer home by seaside, on the Sound, lake or river, the steam, electric and naphtha launches are a necessity.

MR. W. K. VANDERBILT, JR., AT THE START OF AN AUTOMOBILE RACE.

Digitized by Google

Here, for one millionaire sportsman, is a fleet of vessels of various kinds. The American is not content with having one or two habitations. He must, so to speak, have a home in every place where there is a chance for his favorite sport. But the American is catholic in his tastes. He is not absolutely devoted to one kind; he is interested in several different fads and he wants to be the "king-pin" in each of them.

An Englishman once wrote a flamboyant patriotic song in which he described his country as "Queen of the Earth," and, he cried, "wide as the world is her kingdom of power." This might apply also to the American sportsman. Having conquered the seas, he looks very naturally toward the earth. Five years ago an automobile, now smartly called a "motor," elicited curiosity in New York city. People would stop to see it pass by, just as they would gaze in the air to-day if one of Santos-Dumont's flying-machines went whizzing by. The motor had first gained its popularity in France; the United States took it up before England adopted it. To-day it is alike the toy of the millionaire and the absolute necessity of travel. It is odd how soon one adapts oneself to a new invention and wonders how one could ever have got along without it.

MR. CORNELIUS VANDERBILT ON HIS YACHT.

The automobile suggested vast possibilities to the American millionaire sportsman. It is true that he "ruled the seas" in more ways than one. He was the victor of the yacht-races and with his luxurious yacht he could go anywhere. But on the land, he had to trust to the mercy of special cars and special trains. If he was a railroad director, the latter were obtainable, but if not, even at a vast expense, he could never be sure of gaining a given point at a given time.

The automobile club has been in existence only a few years. From a sportsman's point of view, there are fewer pastimes more exhilarating or more satisfactory. To those who have participated in motor races or even motor timing contests, other sports seem tame. The bicycle in one way was the precursor of the motor. Both have done wonders for the highways of this country. The owners of automobiles and those interested in the development of this most luxurious and comfortable means of locomotion, have prevailed upon the various states to pass laws concerning their roads. In Europe there is an advantage, as the old Roman highways on the Continent have always been kept up and one can travel with comparative ease through the principal countries of Europe on horseback, driving, awheel or with a motor.

Thackeray and all the brilliant writers of a generation ago have described the very refinement of travel as that which allowed a man to go over the Continent in his own coach and four. Railways were democratic. The motor, however, combines the speed of the railway and the privacy of the old coach.

Digitized by Google

But it is not alone as a convenience that the motor presents itself in a favorable light to the millionaire sportsman. The recent speed trials and races have suggested a new form of sport most exciting and exhilarating. In the great race from Paris to Vienna, there were three American competitors. One of these, Mr. William Elliott Zborowski, came in fourth. He married the great-granddaughter of the first John Jacob Astor. Mr. William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., and Mr. Foxhall Keene, both American millionaires, would have made splendid records if an accident had not happened to their tires. Mr. Vanderbilt had made phenomenal records in France during the spring.

MR. HARRY PAYNE WHITNEY WITH HIS BEAGLES.

With an automobile club, with numerous millionaires like the Vanderbilts, Colonel John Jacob Astor, David Wolfe Bishop, Albert Shattuck, Clarence Mackay, Luther Kountze, Edward R. Thomas, Oliver H. P. Belmont, Van Rensselaer Kennedy, William C. Whitney and many others, the present status of the motor as a pleasure-vehicle is established. As a racer its popularity is increasing day by day, and it ranks with a horse in its general utility.

The motor has been considered by some a rival to the horse. In one way, perhaps it is. The most modern automobile and the blood race-horse are both objets de luxe. The performance by the motor of many tasks enables the horse-owner to keep the animals he owns simply for the purposes of sport and consequently to improve the breed.

Racing has always been a fad of the American. There have been jockey-clubs and racing-stables flourishing as far back as the thirties. In the North, however, racing never had the fashionable vogue that it did in the South. Race-week in Lexington, Kentucky, in the heart of the Blue Grass region, or in New Orleans, at the old Metarie Ridge course, was a social institution. The horses were owned by gentlemen and ridden by them. In the North and East, a certain puritanical prejudice prevailed against racing, which is only gradually disappearing. Putting aside all question concerning the morality or immorality of wagers, horse-racing per se has always been a sport of gentlemen, and the Ascot in England and the races at Baden-Baden, Paris, and various other Continental cities have taken the place of the tournaments of old. At the present writing, the breeding of race-horses, and the spring and autumn meets, have grown to be among the favorite diversions of the millionaire sportsman. Private race-tracks were, however, unknown, except in one or two instances in the South and in California, until within a very few years. Mr. William C. Whitney, one of the most distinguished of American millionaires, has been called the "Prince of Horsemen." At Wheatley Hills, Westbury, where he has a summer residence, he has also built a racing-establishment and a private course. The situation is picturesque, and there is no private stable in the world which can equal it to-day in its appointments. It is a great building which is prominent in the landscape for miles. The stable alone measures eight hundred and seventy feet in length. On the course, in the autumn, take place the famous steeplechases of the Meadowbrook Hunt. Mr. Whitney has also another commodious stable at Sheepshead Bay, near the club and race-track, a breeding-farm in Kentucky and a large stable at Saratoga, and he has just purchased a vast area of pine-lands near Aiken, South Carolina, where he intends to have a wintering-place for his stud. His horses are conveyed from racing center to racing center on special trains and in charge of a great army of grooms, stablemen, jockeys, and other employees.

MR. GEORGE GOULD AT POLO.

Digitized by Google

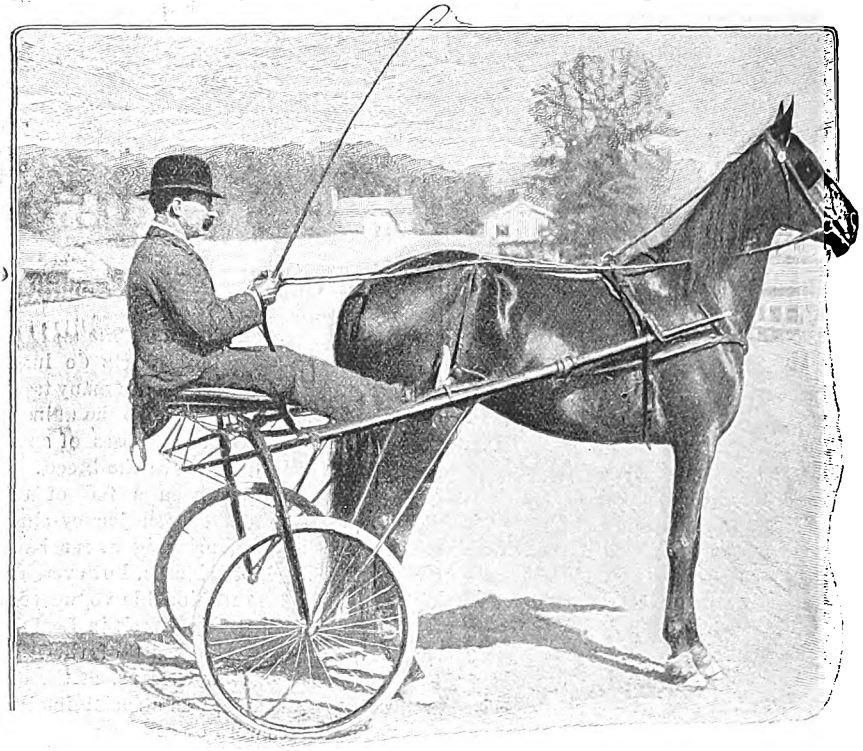
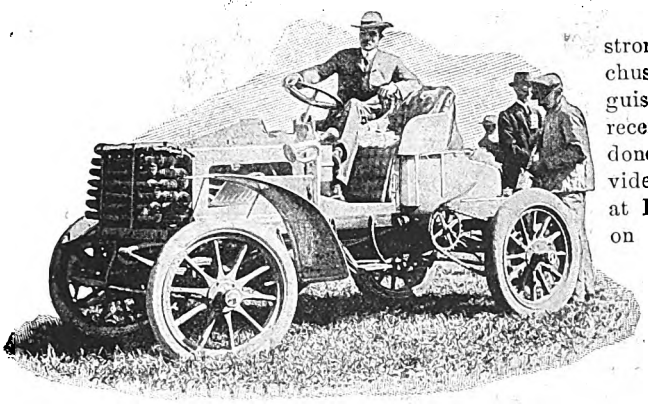
With the name of Mr. Whitney are associated those who also have large racing interests—August and Perry Belmont, Clarence Mackay, James B. Haggin, William K. Vanderbilt, R. T. Wilson, Jr., A. H. and D. H. Morris, James R. Keene, Foxhall P. Keene and Arthur Featherstone. Mr. Whitney and Mr. Mackay are specially interested in Saratoga, and they have taken hold of the racing there and have changed the nature of the sport to such a degree that to-day, instead of being a place where racing was merely professional, it has again become a Mecca for wealthy and fashionable Americans.



MR. E. H. HARRIMAN BEHIND HIS FAVORITE TROTTER.

Mr. Alfred G. Vanderbilt has entered seriously into the various sports in which the horse is the factor. He has purchased a large farm at Portsmouth, on which he has a private polo-field and a small track. For two years he has made a special study of coaching. This sport was introduced into

Digitized by Google



MR. DAVID WOLFE BISHOP IN HIS RACING-MACHINE.

this country as a recreation for gentlemen by Colonel Delancey Kane and the late Mr. Leonard Jerome, thirty years ago. The Coaching Club was established in New York, and at the old Jerome Park races as many as thirty and forty brakes could be seen drawn up in line in the field. The parades took place in the spring at New York and in the summer at Newport. For a time, however, fashionable interest, sometimes fickle, grew dull, and it looked as if coaching would be abandoned as a sport. But the last three years have seen a wonderful revival. The Coaching Parade of last May, with the veteran Colonel Jay in the lead, and the coaching season in the early spring, were both veritable successes. At present, all over the country, coaching-routes are being established and coaching-stables organized. The fad of tooling public coaches to and fro between the city and suburban resorts, a fad founded on an old-time English usage, has found in America no more enthusiastic exponent than Mr. Vanderbilt. It is told that a social struggler from Brooklyn was much chagrined to find that the purchase of a ticket entitled the holder merely to a trip on the coach without including a social acquaintance with the whip.

With coaching has also come a revival of interest in polo. This is practically an East Indian diversion, made fashionable in England twenty-five years ago and imported here a few years after. It is a diversion that only the rich can afford. Westchester County and the Country Club on the shores of the Sound introduced the game on this side of the water. The clubs at Cedarhurst and at Meadowbrook took it up, and a very strong team was formed in Massachusetts. Like coaching, it languished a little, only to be revived recently. Mr. George Gould has done much for polo. He has provided a private field at his place at Lakewood. The field is open on match-game days to the public. This is the sport which Mr. Gould prefers to all others. He not only has entered into it with zest himself, but has trained his young sons so that to-day the family quartet is a very formidable one for any polo team to tackle. The last American team sent to England played splendidly and won many laurels, although it was competing with East Indian officers who had been literally "brought up" on the game.

With racing and coaching and polo, has come naturally a desire for the improvement of the breed of the horse. Fashion finds an ever-constant diversion in the horse-shows. In winter these take place in New York; in spring in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Baltimore and Washington, and in summer at Southampton, at Newport, at Bar Harbor and at almost all the smaller resorts. In fact, there is hardly a community which has a country club and an interest in the horse which fails to have its little show.

Many of these affairs are practically private. They are simply the diversions of millionaire sportsmen, who give the prizes, have the show on their own grounds and foot the bills.

MR. CLARENCE MACKAY AT THE RACES.

The hunt is another form of sport which belongs exclusively to people of wealth and fashion. Near New York,

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

and Mr. William Rockefeller, own large estates of over fifty thousand acres in the Adirondacks. Doctor Seward Webb is also a large landholder, and much interested in this scheme, as are the owners of camps—luxurious modern dwellings—such as Pierpont Morgan, William C. Whitney, Anson Phelps Stokes, Frederick Vanderbilt, Levi P. Morton, Whitelaw Reid, Mrs. Collis P. Huntington and J. Roosevelt Roosevelt.

The cultivation of deer is another fad of the millionaire sportsman, as are also artificial trout-streams and salmon-fisheries. One club in Nova Scotia is the most exclusive in point of wealth of any in this country. It is on the Restigouche, and it numbers among its members the Vanderbilts, Webbs, Pierpont Morgan, William C. Whitney and others. The Southside Club, near Babylon, Long Island, has a small deer-forest and miles of trout-streams. Mr. W. Bayard Cutting and Mr. William K. Vanderbilt, who live near by, both have vast estates, the greater portion of which is devoted to the breeding and preservation of wild game. Mr. William Rockefeller has also a large deer-preserve at his estate in Westchester.

Falconry, which has now a small following in England; otter-hunting, which is a possibility; coursing, and boar-hunting, are as yet practically unknown in this country, but there is nothing to prevent the millionaire sportsman, if he chooses, from introducing any one of these—and entering into it "au prince," as he would certainly feel it would be his bounden duty, as an American, to do.

There is but one word as to the future. Is everything to be exclusive? Are the millionaires of this country selfishly to keep their sports to themselves, to run horse-races on private tracks, to have polo-matches on private fields, to hunt on exclusive territory, to fish on rivers owned by them, and to acquire gradually vast estates, much larger in area than those in England or on the Continent, and in fact to "own the earth"?

MR. HOWARD GOULD ON HIS YACHT "NIAGARA."

It is well for wealth to promote certain sports, but it is to be hoped that the tendency to exclude the public from the enjoyment of those sports will be replaced by a spirit more democratic. Money lavishly spent for the edification of a few indifferent friends never brings the return it would if used in providing and maintaining a healthy form of sport which the many can admire and enjoy.

Digitized by Google

The Needle's Eye

by

FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

The story opens with the discovery of a dead woman, by Farmer Erastus Winch, in his barn. His wife finds a baby there also, and insists, much against his will, on adopting it, as she has never had a child of her own. On the burial of its mother the child is adopted by 'Liz'beth Winch and called Manuel, from the Bible-name "Immanuel." When the child is six years old the farmer ruthlessly sets him to work. He is treated in a heartrending way for a long time by the farmer, and idolised by his wife. Manuel betrays a great desire to find out who is his father, and with child-like simplicity absorbs the idea that God is his Father, and wanders off to find Him. In his rambles he meets a little girl named Hilda, who takes him home to her granny, but during a pause in their conversation he runs away again. Arriving at the homestead of "Ol' Mose" Armitage, 'Manuel thinks he has at last found his "Father," and is taken in and cared for by "Ol' Mose," a man who has lived alone for many years. During the stay of Manuel, Old Moses fancies he discovers a trace that leads him to believe that 'Manuel is heir to considerable wealth, and he is bringing him back, bent on an errand of investigation, and arrives in time to witness Mrs. Winch's death. Mr. Smalley, the lawyer, follows up investigations, which confirm the view that Manuel is Old Moses Armitage's grand-nephew and heir to an enormous fortune. Erastus Winch secures a handsome sum for "befriending" (!) the waif, and Manuel's training is undertaken by Moses in a singular manner, the object being that the Armitage millions, acquired by injustice to the poor, shall be spent in their amelioration.

CHAPTER XVIII.—(continued.)

"I HAVE seen enough, uncle," whispered the boy, after several hours spent in their explorations. His face was white, his dark eyes dilated with horror. When they were once more in the open air, he looked up into the narrow strip of blue sky visible between the tops of the tall buildings." "Why does God let such things be?" he asked in a stifled voice. "Are these people wicked because they are poor, or poor because they are wicked?"

"Some people would tell you both," said Moses Armitage, thoughtfully; "they say the pendulum swings betwixt the two; they are poor because they are wicked, and wicked because they are poor."

"But the children—there are thousands of them. They have done nothing wrong."

"If the children could be saved from being wicked, they would also be saved from being poor," said his guardian slowly. "There is enough for all."

Digitized by Google

"But," replied Manuel, "we ourselves have too much—far too much!"

"THEY WOULD SPEND IT THERE," MANUEL SAID.

"That may be true, my lad, but suppose I should bring down to this place every day a barrel of gold coin and give it to these people; what do you think would happen then?"

The screen door of a vile saloon near by swung open to admit a couple of frowsy women. The boy glanced aside, then turned his face away. "They would spend it there," he said with a gesture of loathing; "it would do them no good. What can we do?"

"One who had money—a great deal of money — and who loved his fellow-beings, these poor little babies, these boys and girls—yes, and these wretched men and women—more than his dollars—could do much." The old man's voice was low and anxious; he looked down into the child's face beseechingly.

"I cannot do much," answered Manuel, meeting the look with one of full confidence. "But I can give what I have. Let us come down here to live, you and I, uncle; we can find a clean place near the school. It would not cost much—not so much as our great house. We do not need so many servants, nor so much to eat, nor the carriage; we can walk just as we used to do. Will you, uncle? Oh, say that you will! I just hate our fine, costly house! It makes me sick to look at our table and remember the miserable, pinched faces at school. If we lived near them, uncle, couldn't we do something to help?"

Digitized by Google

And Moses Armitage, mindful of that other Lad, who at twelve years of age was fain to be about His Father's business, could not say him nay.

And now began a new chapter in this singular education of a capitalist. Moses Armitage had come to believe during his years of contact with the pure young life that had come into his keeping, that as the Man of Nazareth was sent into the world to seek and to save that which was lost, so also is every true Christian to rescue others. To this end they did as Manuel had proposed; they left the palace on the avenue and went to live among that class which has been so truly termed "the submerged."

THE WIDOW SAT PROPPED UP IN A BROKEN ROCKING CHAIR.

"We will make friends with publicans and sinners," said Moses Armitage, as they looked about the plainly-furnished room in No. 15, one of the tallest tenements in the neighbourhood of Mulberry Street.—And the boy understood his meaning.

At first this seemed an impossible life. Filth holds aside its skirts at the approach of purity, guilt eyes innocence with a frown, ignorance despises wisdom; but love is the talisman before which all barriers fall. In the course of a month, the quiet old man and the handsome boy in No. 15 had passed through the successive stages of suspicion, curiosity and acquiescence, to a point where a woman ventured to "borrow a skillet off the boy with the big black eyes."

This individual reported astonishing sights seen through the half-open door—a geranium with red flowers, a tall white lily, a canary trilling in a gilded cage, snowy muslin curtains over shining sashes. Other and bolder visitors began to knock at the door of No. 15. Little Paulina Schmidt—crippled by falling through the fire-escape at the age of three—begged a couple of clothes-pins one day, and came away with a picture-book and an orange. After this event there was danger of a siege; the entire juvenile population of the tenement, amounting to some seventy boys and girls of varying nationalities, began to hang about the staircase leading to No. 15. There were babies of course, but they didn't count. for they came as the invariable attachments to small, anxious-faced little girls, who never seemed to drop their burdens for an instant.

It presently became known that the roof of this particular tenement was open to the children. The like had never been heard of in Mulberry Street. After some cautious investigations by the suspicious mothers, the roof was voted a good thing. There was a high parapet on all sides, sheltered nooks for small babies, sand piles, games, swings, picture-books, and very often mysterious heaps of apples and oranges, presided over by two smiling deaconesses, who also preserved order in marvellous fashion.

Digitized by Google

The boy Manuel was frequently to be seen there, playing quietly with the young children. The old man, too, in his faded, shabby coat, sometimes talked with the mothers of the babies. Yes, he even "minded" little Sally Baxter, while her mother went out to do her marketing with some small change borrowed of the afore-mentioned shabby old man. When the warm spring days began to come, boxes of rich earth appeared, one for each child, and labelled with the name of the owner. These boxes soon became the centres of a joyous activity; seeds were furnished by the deaconesses, who by this time had become justly popular in the house. These very accomplished young women supervised the efforts of the youthful gardeners, with their accustomed tact; the enthusiasm was unbounded, and the appearance of the first green shoot in Timmy Haskin's box was greeted by a shout that could be heard in the street.

The quiet old man and the black-eyed boy disappeared from No. 15 about this time. It was noised abroad, however, that the deaconesses would occupy their rooms. This intelligence was received with general satisfaction; these young persons could and would scrub floors, nurse sick women and babies, cook nourishing food, lend small sums of money, obtain tickets for sea and country excursions, mediate successfully between the inexorable agent and the distracted tenant while conducting other industries too numerous to mention. In the stifling heats of July they were replaced by two others, as smiling and indefatigable.

Meanwhile, Moses Armitage and his ward were pursuing their studies in sociology in other quarters. They moved often in these days, alternating weeks in some shut-in court, with short ocean voyages or a sojourn in some cool mountain œrie. Wherever they lived in the city slums, they were followed by brave cheerful women who devoted themselves to the interests of the women and children.

Messrs. Trent and Smalley frowned perplexedly over the demands of the now insatiable Moses Armitage. "He's making up for lost time, I should say," remarked Mr. Smalley, after forwarding an unusually large cheque.

"The boy's growing up," replied Mr. Trent, composedly. "Good thing they're leasing the Van Spuyten place."

"Humph!" growled his partner. "Do you know what they've done with it? Hicks is just back; I sent him down to see. They have filled the old historic mansion of the Van Spuytens with sick children from the New York slums. The Lorimer place, near Boston—they leased that, you remember, in June—they've filled with sick children from the Boston slums! That's where the money is going."

Mr. Trent threw back his head and laughed. "Our excellent client has never inquired very strictly into all the investments of the Armitage estate—eh?"

"No, the old fool! he couldn't touch them if he did!"

"There's a young fool coming on," observed his partner, dryly; "and he'll know in good time that something like half of the Armitage money is invested in those same slums—and a mighty good investment it is. Twenty per cent. on the original sum expended, and piling up higher every year!"

The legal firm who managed the Armitage property soon learned that it was not safe to count on Mr. Moses Armitage being blind to the nature of the investments. The old fool—as Mr. Smalley uncivilly termed him—did find out the truth of the matter, and in the following way: An interesting case had just been brought to his attention by a certain zealous agent in his employ; it was that of an English woman, widowed, of course, who lived with her four children in two rooms at the top of a North End tenement. The story was perfectly commonplace. This particular widow, like thousands of her kind, had been engaged in an unsuccessful attempt to keep the wolf from the door with a needle. The tiny weapon had fallen from her fingers during a fit of sickness; the wolf had entered and was proceeding to devour.

Moses Armitage climbed the dark staircases of the tenement on an August day, when the temperature stood at 98° outside; inside, and under the low, sloping roof of the attic room, where the wolf had entered, it might have been 120°. The widow sat propped up in a broken rocking chair before her machine, and one of her little girls was laboriously operating the treadle, obeying the motions of her mother's livid lips.

Digitized by Google

"READ THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT!" SAID MOSES ARMITAGE.

"When I am well," she said in answer to the tall old man who stood in her presence with bared head, "I make overalls. Yes, I suppose the man who gives me work is what they call a sweater. He pays me sixty cents a dozen pairs. If I work hard, I can make five dozen pairs a week. Last week I only made three dozen; this week, I don't know what I shall do. I cannot make my feet go. I cannot see very well. The agent was here this morning for the rent, but I have nothing. To-morrow we are to be put out."

The woman gasped out these short sentences with a curious indifference, as if she were completely paralyzed by her misery.

"Who is the agent?" demanded her visitor. The woman told him.

To relieve the immediate necessities of this case was an easy matter. Nevertheless, the old man's heart was heavy as he made his way through the reeking halls and staircases to the street. It occurred to him dully that this building was more vile, more hopeless, than many of its class. He resolved to find out the owner and beg him to do something to make the place habitable. Death was busy here in these dog-days. The dingy white streamer, mutely telling of a child more fortunate than its wretched fellows, was in evidence at one of the closed doors; the smothered sound of a woman's sobs reached him as he strode past. The task of ameliorating the ceaseless and horrible suffering to be found in every large city of America began to appear to him like the labors of Sisyphus. The roots of this gigantic evil of greed cropped out here in the sweating system, there in the saloon, and yonder in the crushing competition of trade. How was one man to hew his way through this impenetrable thicket of the world's miseries? he asked himself. The words that One who spake as never man spake, answered him out of the silence, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." Truly if one but wrought in the power of that understanding, all things were not only possible, but assured.

From the agent who collected the rents of that tall, evil-smelling tenement he learned that the building belonged to the Armitage estate.

"Fix it up?" quoth the agent. "No; I have my orders from way back. Besides the folks like it just as it is. They would not keep it clean if it was fixed."

After this interview, Moses Armitage made haste to acquaint himself with the list of securities in which the money was invested. "You will not, you are of course aware, be able to make use of more than the heir's allotted income in any case," Mr. Trent informed him politely. "As for repairing or re-building the tenements, we must tell you that it would not pay. This class of building forms an excellent investment—excellent, if properly managed. Our late esteemed client found them so; but his policy was to spend as little money on them as possible. We have endeavoured to carry on the business of the estate according to his wishes, which, of course, is entirely right.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Smalley joined the conversation at this point. "It has been found impossible, my dear Mr. Armitage, to unite philanthropy with business," he said impressively. "And however worthy your aims, I must say to you that your course in regard to the education and upbringing of the late Mr. Armitage's grandson is open to considerable censure. May I ask if you regard it as wise, or even kind, in the ordinary sense of the word, to subject so young a person to the contaminating influence of such places as, I understand, you have chosen of late as residences? Have you any right to give this boy's character such a peculiar bias that he will be positively unable to take his proper place in the world hereafter? I put these plain questions to you, Mr. Armitage, in the most friendly spirit. You are an old man now, and I hope I may add, without offence, that you have always been regarded as a man of the most peculiar views."

Moses Armitage glowered at his mentor from under his bushy brows. "Are you a member of the Church of Christ, sir?" he demanded at length.

"A member of the Church!" echoed Mr. Smalley; "why certainly, my dear sir, I have belonged to a most respectable denomination for many years."

"Respectable denomination!" quoth the guardian of Manuel Rossi. "Read the Sermon on the Mount!" With that he took his leave, and did not again darken the doors of Lawyer Smalley's office. Notwithstanding the fervid protests of Messrs. Trent and Smalley, the Armitage tenements were repaired, and as great a number of ameliorating adjuncts introduced as the income of the heir warranted. In order that the amount used for this purpose might be as large as possible, and also because Moses Armitage had been somewhat smitten in conscience by certain words of the lawyer, the two shortly disappeared from their city haunts, and on a certain warm day in the latter half of September, found themselves once more ankle deep in the dusty blossoms of the mayweed before the little, half-forgotten house on the back-hill road.

The smiling valley, wrapped from the world's tumult by fold on fold of vapourous blue hills, stretched east and west beneath them. The crickets chirped pleasantly in the kindly light of the afternoon, the bees hummed about the weather-beaten hives.

THE HOMELY WOMAN WAS CHARMED WITH HER LODGER

"I am glad to be at home," sighed Moses Armitage.

And Manuel, gazing up into the deeply-lined face—which was not so ruddy as in the days past, nodded his dark head soberly, "I am glad, too," he said.

CHAPTER XIX.

ALONE IN THE WORLD.

Life in the old house on the back-hill road went on after the old fashion. "I must rest awhile from the world and from people," said Moses Armitage. In pursuance of this end he relapsed for a time into his hermit ways, spending hours alone on the hills.

Digitized by Google

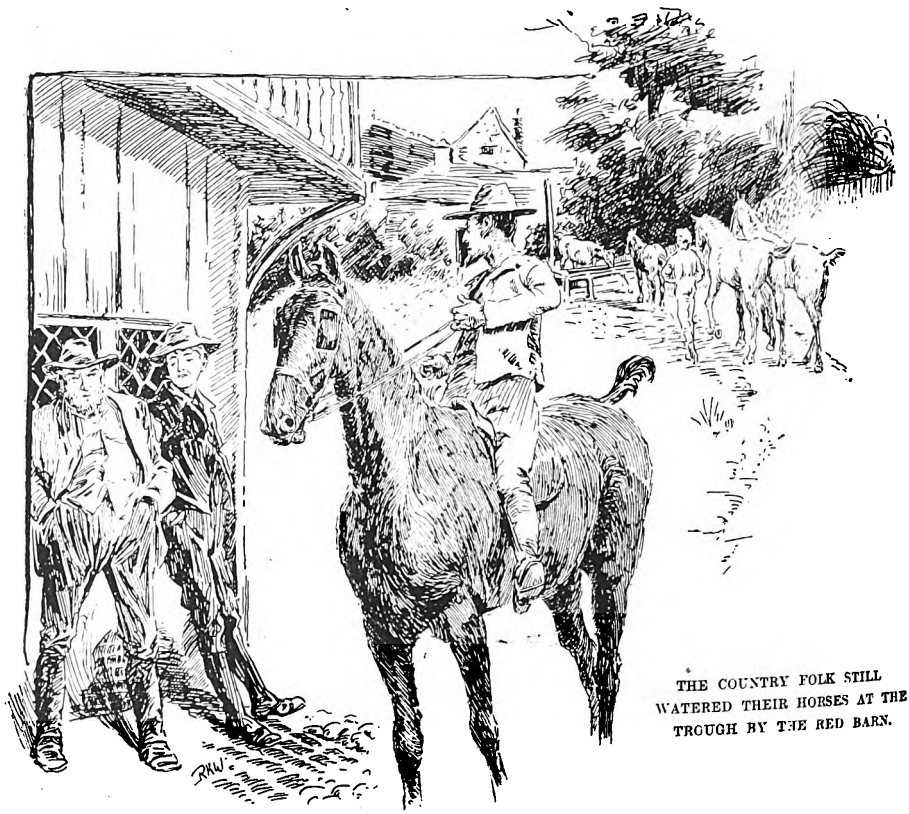
"If you have a problem to work out, my lad," he said to Manuel, "carry it if you can, into the country, under the open sky. The soul easier clears a breathing space about it there than in the smothering world-fog. One needs elbow-room, and the sight of the Infinite overhead to realise that one is free from all man-made laws and conventions. There is but one law, thank God, which touches your life and mine, and that is the law of Love!"

By which it may be inferred that Moses Armitage had succeeded in finally ridding his mind of the ideas which the sagacious Mr. Trent had so laboriously attempted to implant. Subsequent attempts to mould the destiny of the Armitage heir which were made by this and other well-meaning gentlemen, met with similar results. They were compelled to witness his education carried on after a fashion which they were pleased to term "suicidal"! They watched his career in a certain university of note with a curiosity which slowly merged into unqualified contempt for the sole survivor of the Armitage name. Manuel Rossi was not installed in luxurious quarters; he engaged a simply-furnished room; he was not furnished with unlimited spending money and a tacit permission to sow large crops of wild oats. Moses Armitage held with regard to wild oats that it was an obsolete doctrine yet to be disproved, and which is embodied in the words of an ancient book: "Be not deceived, God is not mocked, whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."



THE COUNTRY FOLK STILL WATERED THEIR HORSES AT THE TROUGH BY THE RED BARN.

The young heir to ill-gotten millions was modestly housed, soberly clothed, and encouraged by frequent visits from his watchful guardian to hard study, not only of books, but of men; not only of words but of thoughts; not only of things, but of the eternal realities which lie back of things, and whose roots strike deep into eternity.

Digitized by Google

Vacations were spent in sociological researches along the old lines. The slums were still visited regularly. The two had made friends with publicans and sinners, and the friendship was not broken as the years advanced. More than ever was the wise old man—termed also "that senile old fool"—convinced of this, that if a man would realise the highest ideal of humanity there is but one way—the way taken by Christ Jesus, who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister.

During all of this period the little house on the back hill-road remained the Mecca to which the two came back at frequent intervals. While they were there they were simply "Ol' Mose Armitage an' the Winch boy 'at he 'dopted."

The country folk who still stopped to water their horses at the trough by the red barn, "guessed 'at Ol' Mose didn't git much prop'ty after all." There was certainly no sign of affluence visible about.

It was on the little farm that Manuel Rossi developed a pair of shoulders, a depth of lung and a sheath of muscle which won him divers cups and medals in the 'Varsity field. He learned to plough and cultivate; to sow and to reap, and on more than one occasion received flattering offers from surrounding farmers to "hire" for the summer months.

It was a request of this sort from a certain astute individual, who had stopped to water his horse at the trough, that sent Manuel Rossi to his guardian with a clouded brow. "What am I to do, any way, uncle?" he asked, fixing his eyes anxiously on the placid face of the old man. "I must have a vocation of some sort, I suppose. I—I am different from the other fellows somehow," he added, after a pause. "All of them have known from the first. There is Lorimer, he is to be a lawyer, Brenton a doctor; and so with all the others."

Was it time now for the old man to take his nephew into his confidence? Manuel must certainly be told soon how large a fortune he would have at his disposal.

Moses Armitage looked at the young man with honest pride and joy shining in his blue eyes. Here was one who had never done anything to hurt either his soul or his body, he thought, as his glance wandered happily over the dark handsome head, the well-knit athletic figure, and clean-cut noble features.

"Manuel," he said, "Manuel." Something unusual in his tone and look brought the young man to his side, an anxious question in his eyes.

"Manuel," repeated Moses Armitage almost in a whisper; then he added, "God with us—yes, that is what it means, and that is what I want you to be to the world—one who will help to save and to heal the poor and needy."

"Yes, uncle," said the young man, simply, "I shall always try to do that; but ought I not to have a profession—a business; one must be a producer of some sort." He stopped short and hesitated, then added with a half-embarrassed laugh, "Si Collins stopped me as I was coming up to the house. 'See yere, young man,' he drawled, 'ain't yer a-goin' to git down to work purty soon; thar ain't anythin' yere to keep a feller like you a-goin' as you'd ought to. You'd better come an' cut hay for me next week; I'll give ye a dollar an' a half a day an' yer board.'"

Moses Armitage laughed: "Collins has a sapient eye for brawn and muscle, lad," he said, laying his hand fondly on the other's knee.

Young Rossi dropped his eyes to this caressing hand, then started and raised his eyes questioningly to his guardian's face.

"Yes," said Moses Armitage, quietly, "my hands tell the story without words. I am an old, old man, my child; my days on earth are almost told. No--do not look at me like that; you will not be left desolate. You know by this time as well as I can tell you, that your Friend and Guide is always with you. Then, too, there are possibilities——" The old man's head had sunken upon his breast; his eyes were fixed dreamily upon the wide prospect of the sunlit valley, flecked with drifting cloud shadows. "I have come to see," he continued in a low voice, "that the veil is very thin—nay, there is no veil; we are spirit—living the spirit life now as truly as we ever shall, and there are spirits sent forth to minister. As we reach up through the silence we touch them in the thought world—at times, as we grow old, we almost think that we can hear their voices."

He stopped short and recalled himself to the present with a visible effort. "But it was not of this that I wished to speak. The time is come when you must choose your course; but I have no fears for you; the Pilot has been long at the helm."

Digitized by Google

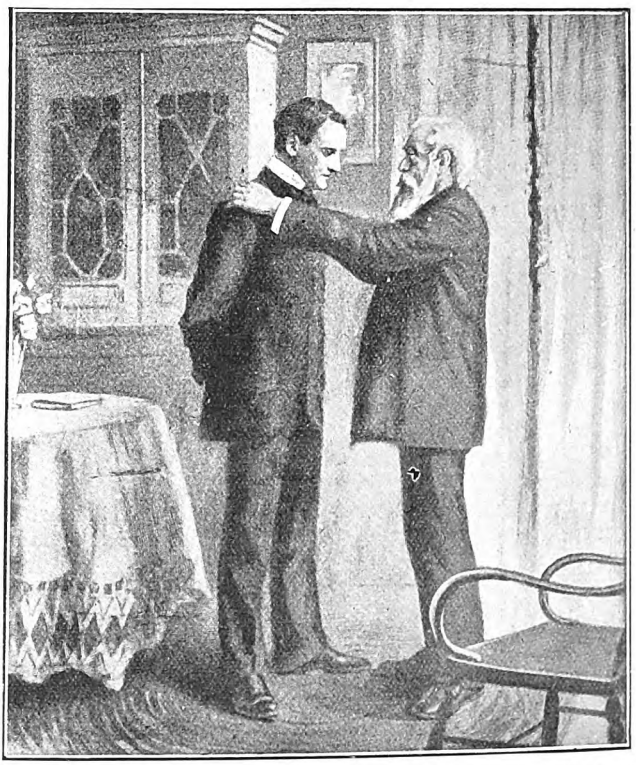
Then he told him all. The talk between them lasted far into the night, and when it was ended Moses Armitage kissed and blessed his adopted son, kissed and blessed him after the manner of the patriarchs of old. And, when all was said, he laid down in his bed, the young man assisting him tenderly. "I am tired," he said, and slept almost on the instant like a little child.



WHEN THE TALK WAS ENDED, MOSES ARMITAGE BLESSED HIS ADOPTED SON.

In the morning, Manuel, coming quietly into his room in the rosy dawn, found him still asleep, a smile of unspeakable content on his features. As he bent over him, he perceived that there was indeed no veil between the longed-for dead and that loving spirit. Moses Armitage, his kind and ever-watchful guardian, had entered into the rest that remaineth.

The young man met his sorrow alone in the little house, as Moses Armitage had met his. But solitude and tender thoughts of the past could not hold him long; he must stoop his young shoulders to the huge burden of wealth which awaited them. Messrs. Trent and Smalley found little to criticise in the conduct of the heir to the Armitage millions during the long wearisome days when the necessary steps were being taken to establish him in his possessions. His questions were few and to the point; and his comments brief.

At the conclusion of this period, Mr. Smalley took it upon himself to administer some paternal advice on the management of affairs. "You understand, of course, my dear Mr. Rossi, that we are always at your service in every possible way. We have facilities, which may possibly be of use to you for the securing of a proper establishment. You will, we trust, wish to mingle with your equals in a manner—ah—as you have not been able to do heretofore, with a view—er—well, to put it briefly—you will, of course, wish to marry in due time. And—I hope you will pardon an old man for speaking quite plainly and bluntly; your late guardian was a man of peculiar views—very peculiar; but his opinions are not necessarily binding upon you. For example, these eccentric ideas of his about the tenement properties—very singular—very singular, indeed. Both Mr. Trent and myself have regretted that you have been compelled to forego so many of the proper pleasures of youth on account of all this—well, I may say, this straight-laced and——"

"You will pardon me, Mr. Smalley," said Manuel, coldly, "if I decline to discuss my uncle's character with you."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, ah—pardon me; of course—perfectly proper in view of recent bereavement, I am sure," began the lawyer, fussily. "But am I to understand that you have become so imbued with your—ah—estimable guardian's views that you"—Mr. Smalley paused to cough interrogatively; but as his client preserved a frigid silence, he went on, "that—er—well, to be brief, may I ask what are your views regarding the—tenements—say?"

"I shall tear them down at once," said young Rossi, briefly.

"What!" exclaimed Mr. Smalley. "But, yes, yes, you may be right! The frontage in some cases has become valuable for business purposes. You will put up office-buildings in their places—eh?"

"I shall build decent houses for the poor, in the room of everyone on the indecent rookeries that stand as my property," said the young man, conclusively.

"But, my dear sir, I beg you to consider just briefly, before you take this—ah—very disastrous step. You are probably not aware of the facts in the case; but I can make it clear to you in just one minute."

Mr. Smalley's pencil was exceedingly busy for several minutes; he then submitted to his client's attention a number of groups of neat figures. "Now this will just serve to give you a little insight into the matter of tenement investments," he said earnestly. "The outcome from only one block of these houses, as they stand, in spite of the depletion caused by late repairs and improvements, is twenty-two per cent. on the original investment; twenty-two per cent.—do you quite understand me? You will readily see that no class of investments compares with it; it is a veritable gold-mine! But to tear them down! Only consider the poor friendless families you would render homeless; where can they go?"

Manuel Rossi smiled.

"And then, too," continued Lawyer Smalley rapidly, "I can prove to you in ten minutes that the interest on the re-investment which you propose would be but five per cent, possibly not over four, if you insist upon this very—yes, I will say it—very foolish and ill-advised step!"

"Government bonds yield but three-and a-half," observed the young man, rising. "We will talk this over some other time, if you like, Mr. Smalley," he added, kindly, as he noted the trembling of the old lawyer's fingers. "I shall do nothing unbusiness-like, you may depend upon it."

And with this scant comfort his legal adviser was forced to be content.

Busy months followed this conversation, in the course of which the heir to the Armitage millions discovered that the path of the rich man does not lie in green pastures, nor by the side of still waters. He carried his point, however, in spite of the skilful opposition of his lawyers.

Before the first year had passed, Mr. Smalley informed his partner that he would now wash his hands of the whole business. This was, of course, a mere figure of speech, as he manifested no intention of relinquishing his very lucrative post as legal adviser to the estate. "Old man Armitage wasn't a circumstance to this obstinate boy," said Mr. Smalley, plaintively. "When I remember how I advised the grandfather of this misguided young man with regard to tenement investments, and how eagerly he received my suggestions—why, it was I who purchased those valuable blocks in Boston, acting as my esteemed client's agent. It was I who secured options on all the north and east side properties in this city, which have since proved such a mine of wealth. And now—"—

Mr. Smalley's narrow lids reddened; he seemed actually on the verge of tears. It was Mr. Trent who suggested optimistically, that it would take a long time to make an appreciable hole in such a huge property, and after all, it was only a matter of reinvestment at a lower rate per cent.

"But he might become one of the richest men in America—and that means the richest in the world," cried Mr. Smalley passionately. "Why, I spoke to him yesterday about a proposed combine which would inevitably double the property within five years; and what do you suppose he said?"

Mr. Trent shrugged his shoulders and smiled.

"If I didn't know better, I should say that the fellow must be lacking in an ordinary amount of intellect," pursued Mr. Smalley, gloomily. "He actually said, 'I don't wish to be richer; I intend to be poorer—much poorer in five years.' Now what do you think of that?"

Mr. Trent shrugged and smiled again.

Digitized by Google

"Not perhaps so very surprising in so very young a person," he said guardedly. "He has not—we must remember—seen much of the world as yet. I believe the two of them lived once for a month or so in the Vanderworter house on Fifth avenue. But they didn't exactly see Society at that time. It has occurred to me that as our esteemed client is a very personable young man, possibly——"—

"Ah, I see what you mean," interrupted Mr. Smalley excitedly. "Yes—that's the idea. But I don't know how to bring it about; these cliff-dwellers guard their approaches pretty carefully." Mr. Smalley rubbed his hands and smiled complacently at his witty allusion to the impregnable heights of society. "I'm getting pretty well up, myself," he continued, "but we're outclassed when it comes to young Rossi. Now what I would like and what would be advantageous to a certain law firm I have in mind, would be to see our client marry into one of these way-up families. With such a wife as Miss Livingstone, for example, he wouldn't care about being 'much poorer in five years'—eh?"

"Much richer would be about the way of it, I imagine," observed Mr. Trent with a sagacious smile. Then he pursed up his lips. "I think we could get hold of young Livingstone by helping him carry some of his present holdings," he said in a lower tone. "He's likely to get a hard squeeze unless somebody gives him a lift."

Mr. Smalley nodded his gray head vigorously. "We'll do it," he said briefly.

(To be continued.)

A recent photo of an old Irish woman named ESTHER MEIGHAN, who is aged 101 years, and who walked 6 miles on the day this photo was taken by our artist, Mr. Fitzgerald. Her hair, as can clearly be seen, is still quite brown. Her mother, who lived to be over 100, was alive a few years ago.

Digitized by Google

THE EDUCATION BILL.

By the Rev. J. MONRO GIBSON, D.D.

 This Article, through press of matter, has been held over since last month.

THE subject of the Education Bill is too large to be dealt with in the space which you kindly place at my disposal; but I may be able within the limits to show how the issue is confused in Mr. Balfour's recent speech at Manchester, which has been so eagerly welcomed by our friends in the opposite camp.

1. Anyone reading Mr. Balfour's speech would infer from it that what we object to, is the putting an end to the one-man regime of the Voluntary Schools by a regulation that in every case there shall be six managers, two of whom shall represent the Education Committee appointed by the Council. I am not aware that anyone has ever questioned that this is an improvement upon the old arrangement, but it is not a sufficient alteration in the management to justify the new policy of full maintenance of the denominational schools from the public funds. Up to this time these have been dealt with as schools supported by voluntary contributions, though aided by Government grants as a recognition of their contribution to the general education of the country. These grants, it is true, have been increased so much that the voluntary contributions have been receding into the background; still, there has been no essential departure from the principle that schools privately managed must be privately supported. The new Bill, by undertaking the entire support of the schools, takes them quite out of the category of schools supported by voluntary contributions, and on this account does away with the claim to private management, which so far has been allowed. We say that public schools supported by the public funds ought to be under public control, and so long as there is an insistence upon a statutory and perpetual majority for the denomination on the management, the principle is violated.

Mr. Balfour suggests that we speak of the Bill, which really dilutes clerical control, as increasing it. No one is in a position to deny that such things may have been blunderingly said or even written, but I cannot remember to have either heard them said, or seen them written. What we do say is, that the Bill rivets clerical control, because when you extend the Government grant from one third, not merely to two thirds, or three-fourths, but to the whole, you reach finality. So long as voluntary contributions were insisted on, the principle was saved; but now that the whole support is granted, the principle is gone: the people formally surrender their rights, and sectarian control is riveted on the nation.

2. Mr. Balfour's speech suggests the idea that Nonconformists are eager to get some favour for themselves which all the while they are grudging to the Church of England. We ask no favour and wish none. What we want is justice to the public. We are not asking that our denominations should be permitted to have schools of their own supported by the public funds. If, therefore, we did not count it a misapprehension, we should consider it an insult, to be expected to hail a Bill which would allow us to do what we object to others doing. There has just been sent to me, to convince me how ungrateful we are to a generous Prime Minister, a report of Mr. Balfour's speech, with special attention called to this sentence: "Should they (that is the Nonconformists) not, above all, hail with acclamation a Bill which enabled them for the first time in their history to build out of public funds according to their views?" How can we hail a provision which is directly contrary to the policy we advocate? And this provision, bad at the best, is made as bad as it can be, by rendering it possible for a number of parents as small as thirty to impose their school upon the public funds. Just imagine for a moment what a serbonian bog of education we should have, if the suggestion of this mischievous clause were followed out to any large extent. The issue is not between one denomination and another, it is between one denomination and the public. It is between a system that would split up the schools of the country into miserable fragments all competing with each other and frittering away our educational resources, and a great national system in which all our resources would be united to secure the most efficient teaching possible. It is admitted that we cannot all at once have such a system pure and simple. The denominational schools now in existence ought by all means to have fair treatment It is quite too much to insist on their being still privately managed and privately staffed, but I do not believe there would be any objection to give all needed guarantees for the continuation of the denominational teaching at certain convenient hours, and for paying a liberal rent for the use of the buildings for secular instruction. And surely our friends, when they had their Catechism, etc., in the denominational hour, would not object to the use of the Bible in the school, if the public expressed a wish for it, as there seems every reason to believe would be the case in an overwhelming number of instances. If we cannot yet have the ideal national system, we should at all events work towards it, and not towards the interminable confusion and strife of sectarianism in the schools of the nation.

Digitized by Google

J. Monro Gibson.

22nd October, 1902.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, the Colonial Secretary, according to published arrangements of his tour to South Africa, will sail via Suez to Durban, and then proceed direct from that port to Johannesburg and Pretoria.

The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, M.P., was born in Camberwell in July 1836, his father being a member of the Cordwainers' Company. When about sixteen years old, he engaged in his father's business, but when, in 1856, his father removed to Birmingham and became a partner in the firm of Nettlefold and Chamberlain, screw-makers, Joseph threw his whole energy into the new business, and did much towards making it the success it turned out. Soon after settling in Birmingham, Mr. Chamberlain became a member of a debating society, at which he speedily developed his remarkable powers of debate and criticism. He soon began to take part in political and municipal matters, and in 1868 he was appointed Chairman of the first Executive Committee of the Education League, and, in November of the same year, a member of the Birmingham Town Council. When the Education Bill was passed in 1870, to the surprise of everyone, the Birmingham School Board had a Church majority, and Mr. Chamberlain was elected a member of the minority. By the defeat of his party, he learned the lesson that organisation was neccssary to their success, and under his powerful leading the National Liberal Federation was formed, with Mr. Chamberlain as its first president. At the second School Board election, in 1873, the Liberal Party obtained the victory, and Mr. Chamberlain was appointed chairman. The same year he was made an alderman, and was three times in succession—in 1874-5-6 — elected Mayor of Birmingham, during which period he distinguished himself by his statesmanlike reforms in the municipality. While he was mayor, it fell to his lot to entertain the King and Queen, then the Prince and Princess of Wales.

THE RIGHT HON. J. CHAMBERLAIN.

In June, 1876, upon the retirement of Mr. Dixon, Mr, Chamberlain was elected M.P. for Birmingham, and soon became a power in Parliament. Having, left the Liberal Party owing to the Home Rule Bill, in 1895, Lord Salisbury appointed him Secretary for the Colonies.

Our portrait is from a photo by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, Baker Street, London, W

Digitized by Google

LIEUTENANT PEARY.

LIEUTENANT PEARY, born in 1856, was for some time in the New York Navy Yard, and was granted a long leave to enable him to carry on his Polar explorations. He sailed in June, 1898, touching at Smith Sound in August of the same year, to take on board the Esquimaux and sledge dogs necessary to an expedition of this kind. He has recently returned, and thus has been out of touch with civilisation for four years, and although it is to be regretted that he has not succeeded in his object—that of finding the North Pole—perhaps he will remember the old proverb, and "try, try, try again!" If he does, we hope he will reap the reward of his skill, pluck and endurance.

THE NEW LORD MAYOR OF LONDON, Sir Marcus Samuel, is the son of the late Mr. Marcus Samuel, a prominent member of the Jewish community, and was born in 1853. The firms of M. Samuel and Co., Leadenhall Street, and Samuel Samuel and Co., Japan, negotiated the first Japanese gold loan, of £4,500,000, in the London market, and have also done much to develop the coal industry in Japan. Sir Marcus was knighted in 1898, and six years previously built up a great petroleum trade by introducing the plan of carrying the oil in bulk through the Suez Canal. This business became incorporated in the Shell Transport and Trading Company, which has a fleet of thirty-eight steamers, and of which Sir Marcus is now chairman. He is also a director of the Alliance Marine Assurance Company. He is an active City Magistrate, is on the commission of the peace for Kent, and is one of the King's lieutenants for the City of London. For three years he served on the Thames Conservancy Board as the shipowner's representative. In politics Sir Marcus is a Conservative, and he was Sheriff of London in 1894-95. He is a man of distinguished capacity in business. He has travelled considerably, and resided in Japan for several years. His election as Lord Mayor of London is particularly gratifying, not only to English Jews, but to members of his race the world over. He is popular alike among the Gentiles and among his co-religionists. The latter were particularly pleased by his arranging for the Lord Mayor's Show on November 9th, to move through the Jewish quarter of the City, including the famous "Petticoat Lane," now called Middlesex Street. Great enthusiasm was shown on this occasion, the only one on which a Lord Mayor's "Show" has been seen in that quarter of London. The show itself was an interesting one, including a beautiful floral car sent by the Gardeners' Company, and several models of ships from the "Great Harry" of the 14th century to the present day. Altogether the Show was a success, and was witnessed by vast cheering crowds.

SIR MARCUS SAMUEL,
THE NEW LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

Digitized by Google

MRS. JOHN CORY.

MR. JOHN CORY opened the new Sailors' and Soldiers' Rest bearing his name in Bute Street, Cardiff, on October 6th. This institution was started twenty-five years ago by his liberality, and at first consisted of one room in Bute Street, used as a Rest for Seamen, but it was so highly appreciated that it became necessary to enlarge the premises. Mr. Cory came to the rescue, and at his own expense added a large hall to the existing building, but even that was soon quite inadequate to accommodate the numbers who resorted to the "Rest," and there being no Soldiers' Rest in the town, "Tommy Atkins" was made welcome, and the Institution took up additional responsibilities and also its present title. At the beginning of 1901 it was seen that the premises were unable to meet the requirements of the case, and again Mr. Cory came forward, and offered to build a new institution more suited to the needs of the Mission at a cost of £6,000, and that offer has resulted in the present building, one of the best of its kind in the world.

Mrs. Cory has subscribed £1,000 for furnishing the building, and Mr. Sidney Robinson, of Fairwater, has made himself responsible for further sums required for the site and other expenses.

Over half-a-million men have attended the meetings since the inception of the work, and fully one-a-half-millions have used the rooms for reading, writing, and recreation.

The working expenses of the new Rest will necessitate an additional outlay of £100, so that the Treasurer will be always grateful for additional contributions.

MR. JOHN CORY.

Digitized by Google

THE REV. H. PRICE HUGHES, whose death on Monday, November 17th, was directly attributed to apoplexy, doubtless the result of his incessant toil for many years past in religious and social movements, had been already laid aside for some few months owing to a severe breakdown, and he was obliged to relinquish all ministerial work. After a long holiday in Switzerland, during the summer months, he returned to England in September, and resumed his labours at St. James's Hall, early last month. He had preached there only the evening before his death, and on the previous Sunday night, when sixty persons came out for salvation in the after-meeting, he addressed two services with great earnestness.

The Rev. Thos. Law, who, at Mr. Hughes' request, came up from Brighton for a special conversation with him at noon of the day he died, says: "He was then looking much better, and for the first time since his illness, I came to the conclusion that he was becoming his old self again. But after attending a meeting at Zion College, Thames Embankment, in the afternoon, he was seized with sudden illness during the journey home, and died in an hour and a half.

THE LATE REV. H. PRICE HUGHES M.A.

Mr. Hughes, the son of Mr. John Hughes, surgeon, was born at Carmarthen in 1847. He was educated privately, and afterwards attended lectures at University College, London, and at the Wesleyan Theological College, Richmond. At the age of 22, he, at his own request, entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry, and obtained his first pastoral experience at Dover. The itineracy system took him in turn to Brighton, Stoke Newington, East Dulwich, Oxford, and Brixton Hill. After this Mr. Hughes entered upon his long and devoted labours in connection with the West London Mission, and soon became the leading exponent of what was known as the Forward Movement in Methodism. But his religious duties, arduous as they were, did not exhaust his activities, and he threw himself with the utmost energy into social and political problems. He was deeply impressed with the idea that the Christian churches would be a mighty power if only they would pull together. His scheme brought forward at Grindelwald in 1892, for the reconciliation of Church and Dissent, proved a failure, but later on he became one of the prime movers in the union of the Free Churches, and one of the first Presidents of the National Free Church Council.

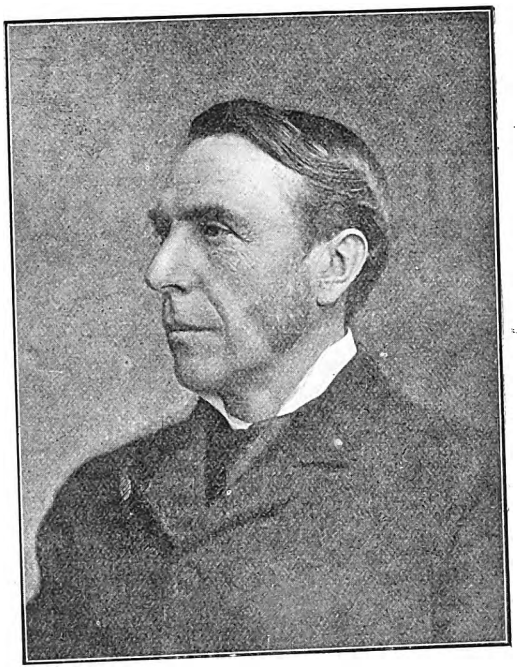
The highest honour which it is in the power of the Wesleyan Denomination to bestow came to Mr. Hughes in 1898, when he was elected to the position of President of the Conference.

Mr. Law considers that his fame in time to come will rest on two things. First, he was the man who revolutionised modern Methodism, and second, he played the most conspicuous part in forming the Federation of the Free Churches.

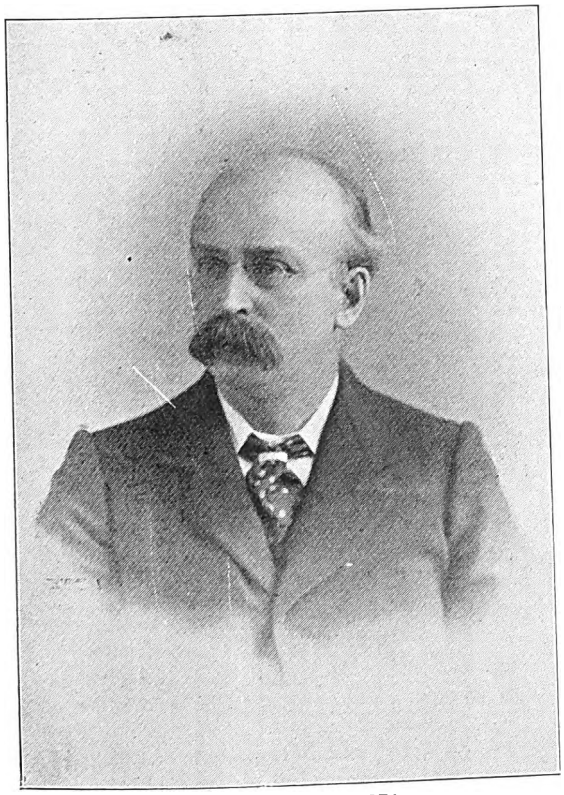
The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes was the Editor of the Free Church Catechism.

Digitized by Google

IT is not given to many men to be the father of a great idea that is likely to be creative; and at the same time to live to superintend its realisation. This, however, has fallen to the lot of Mr. Ebenezer Howard, in whose fertile brain, the conception of what is now known as "The Garden City" first originated. Emerson long ago said that "when God let loose a thinker into the world, nothing was safe." And it is true, "the old order ever changeth," but the change is initiated by the thinker. "New conditions teach new duties," but it is the thinker who observes the lesson; and in this case the thinker has been Mr. Howard, and the "new duty"—the proper and better housing of the people. For a long period Mr. Howard has been seeking to understand (i.e., to stand under, at their roots)—the problems connected with our great cities. He saw their overcrowding, the intemperance practised within, the vested interests that grow up, the ever-increasing burden of rates if improvements are attempted, and the discomfort of the people if they are not, the waste of money



RALPH NEVILLE, ESQ., K.C.
Chairman of the Garden City Pioneer Co.



MR. EBENEZER HOWARD:
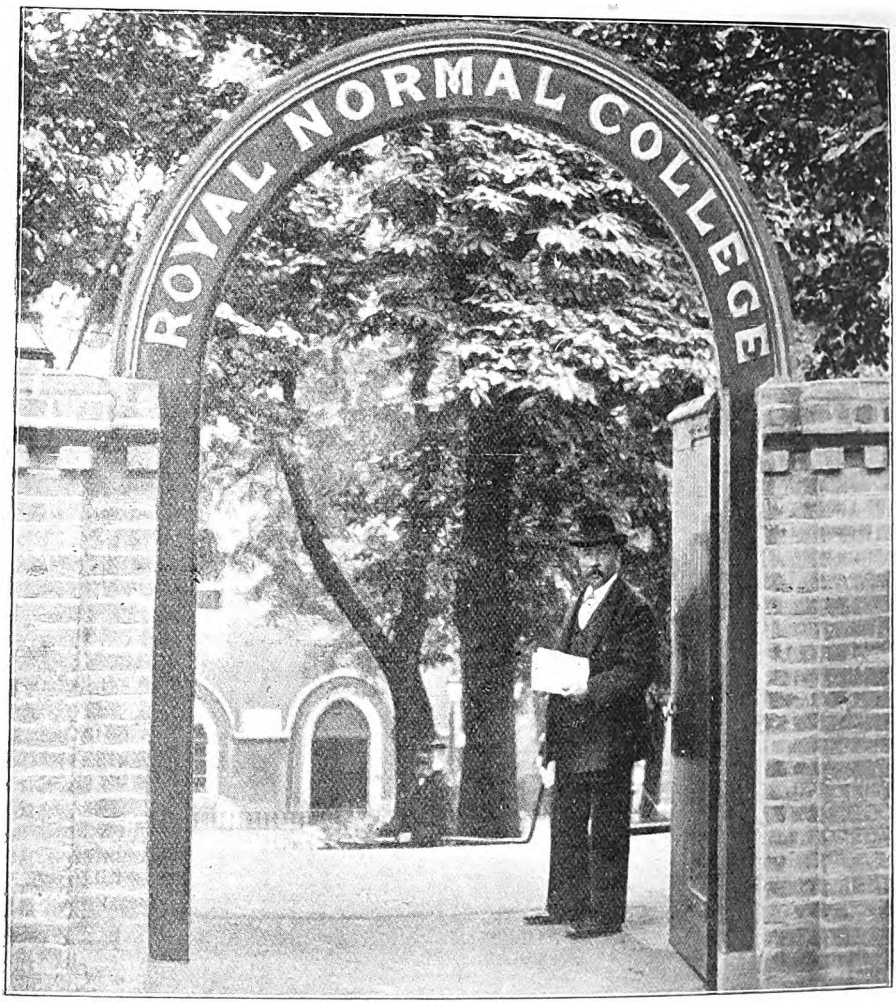
Originator of the Garden City Movement necessitated in undertaking alterations, which as the city progresses have to be re-altered; so he set to work to think out a remedy. The result was the issue of his book, "The Garden City of To-morrow." This book has attracted great attention, and gradually keen business men have perceived that its contentions are sound, while its inventions and suggestions are workable. The great idea has already existed in bricks and mortar and land, (before it appeared in print) at Bourneville, Birmingham (Mr. Cadbury's), and Port Sunlight (Lever Bros.), both firms having studied the problem on their own account, and having reached similar conclusions to those of Mr. Howard. At last, the idealist and the realist came together, and the result was the formation of the Garden City Pioneer Co., with a capital of £20,000, most of which has been immediately subscribed.

Mr. Howard is 52 years of age, and has mainly during his life pursued the calling of a professional shorthand writer.

We give also the portrait of Mr. Ralph Neville, King's Counsel, who is the Chairman of the new company.

Digitized by Google



"SEEING BY TOUCH."

A Visit to the Royal Normal College for the Blind.

BY W. PERCY HICKS

(Author of the "Life of the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D.," etc.)

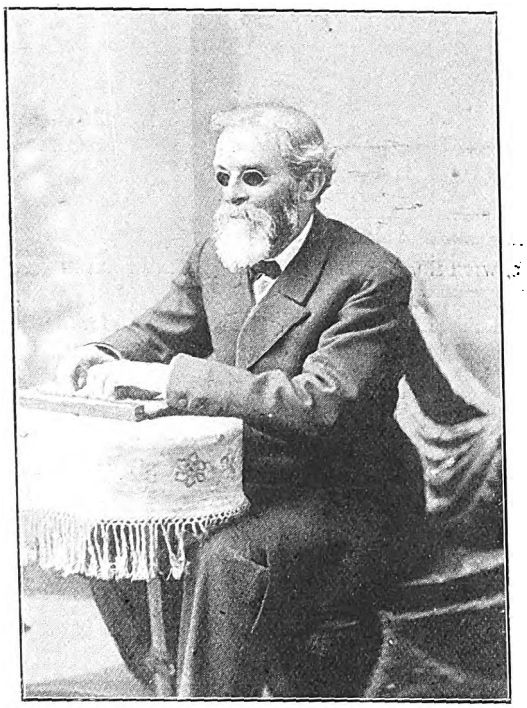
UNTIL comparatively a few years ago, nothing seemed more hopeless than the task of enabling a blind child to make its own way in the world. Such an unfortunate was allowed to grow up as an object of charity, repaying something, possibly, "with harp, or song, or story," but always dependent, more or less, upon the kindness and forbearance of other people. The Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind situated at Upper Norwood, in close proximity to the Crystal Palace, has, however, been the instrument of an almost miraculous transformation

Digitized by Google

The sightless students of this remarkable institution pass out into the world to take their place in the stern competition of life, and 89 per cent. of them are enabled to earn their own living. Indeed, in some cases, they support their aged parents as well. The following item of news which went the round of the London papers last month, is but a particularised specimen of the work done at this college :—

"A blind Armenian girl who has been trained at the Royal Normal College, Upper Norwood, is returning to Armenia to act as a Christian teacher for the blind. The Bible Society kindly supplied her with an English Bible in Braille type for herself, and with copies of St. John in Armenian for the pupils whom she will have to teach."

The late Dr. Moon, who invented an embossed system of reading for the blind, once wrote:—"Numerous instances both in ancient and modern times might be adduced in support of the fact that great mental vigour and ability are not infrequently associated with blindness. Scarcely any department of human knowledge or science is without its representative amongst the blind. They have adorned literature and art; in many instances they have manifested eminent engineering skill. The blind also number among them, philosophers, mathematicians, philanthropists, divines, poets, musicians, and others of commanding intellect."



DR. F. J. CAMPBELL, THE SIGHTLESS PRINCIPAL OF THE ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE FOR THE BLIND.

Dr. Campbell, the blind Principal of the Royal Normal College is himself an illustration of the truth of these words, and he has been the moving spirit in all that the College has achieved since its establishment in 1872, its aim throughout being the training of its sightless students in the art of "seeing by touch"—an apt way of expressing the work, coined and used by Mr. Charles F. F. Campbell, the talented son of the Principal, for the purposes of an excellent lantern lecture upon the College which he is giving this winter in various places in and around London.

Before looking into this fascinating work to see how it is done, it will be well to get a glimpse of the Principal himself, and his truly romantic life-story.

Francis Joseph Campbell has been described as an American by birth, presumably Scotch by origin, English by residence; "but his real fatherland is the kingdom of the Blind, where he reigns supreme as the great expert of the sightless seers." He was born in a little log cabin in Franklin County, Tennessee. The old home stood in the midst of the fields, and a famous orchard, rich with store of peach, apple, cherry and plum trees, stood near. He could see until nearly four years of age, when the curtain gradually fell, leaving fadeless memories of the red and white clover, and the spring splendours of the orchard. Even to this day — sixty odd years later—"the residence of the southern spring, with its gorgeous floral beauty, dwells with him as a kind of drop scene, which remains visible when all the stage is buried in impenetrable darkness."

The dread event occurred in this way. Young Joseph was playing in the yard, and, boy-like, began cutting a branch of an acacia tree, when suddenly one of the twigs pierced his eye-ball. It was a painful accident, but if a skilful optician had been at hand the results would have been different. Inflammation set in. From one eye it spread to the other, and his sight faded steadily day by day until ere he was five years of age, he was totally blind. Every night, during that trying period, before he went to bed, his mother took him to see the stars from the piazza. But one night when he looked up, there was not even one twinkling light in the firmament. "Why is it so dark?" he asked his mother. "Why does not God light up the stars for your little boy?" His mother's tears fell fast on the child's face as she carried him with aching heart to his bed.

The curtain had fallen until that Day when every eye shall claim the fadeless vision.

It was a strange and inscrutable providence, but

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Joseph." His father took the hint, and from that time began to teach him how to do all kinds of work about the farm.

There was no school for the blind in Tennessee, and the lad often felt very dull. Long before the evening he would wander along the road toward the day-school, and sit listening with anguish to the voices of the happy boys and girls coming home from their lessons. But at last, when he was twelve years old, a Mr. Churchman opened a school for the blind at Nashville, and Joseph's parents, looking upon it as a answer to their prayers, sent the blind months after that, Joseph gained the prize for pianoforte playing, and was generally looked upon as a musical prodigy.

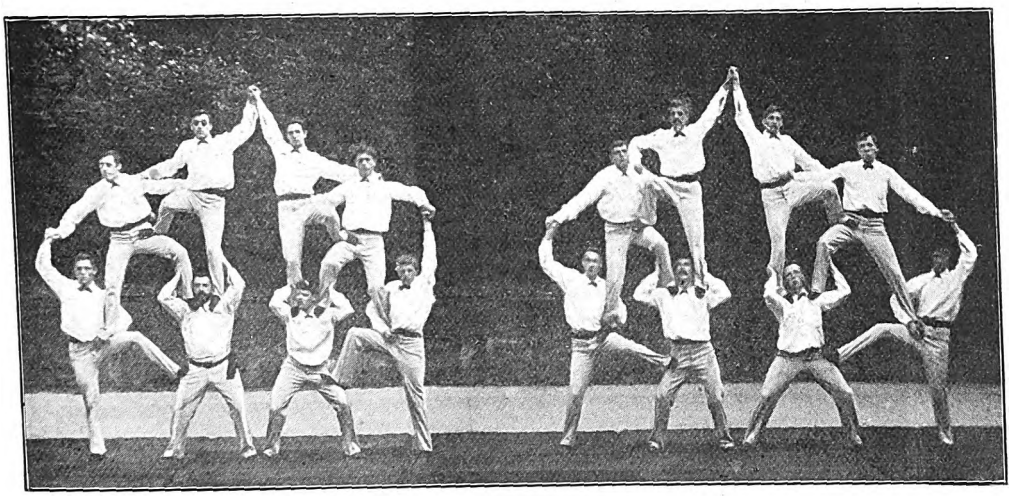
Now he began to pine after a University education, and as his father was too poor to afford such a luxury, the blind pianist determined to earn the needful money. He began giving lessons to other pupils, and when he was barely eighteen was appointed teacher of music in the very school where he was once told he had no ear for the art. Thereupon he set himself to work at other branches of study, including mathematics, Latin and Greek.



BLIND STUDENTS FORMING A PYRAMID DURING A GYMNASTIC DISPLAY.

pet of the house to begin his education. The parting he felt keenly, but no sooner had he arrived than the passion for learning devoured all other emotions, and his climb up the ladder of knowledge was very rapid.

Music has always been one of Dr. Campbell's fortes, yet, strange to say, he showed at first such utter incapacity to sound his notes or hum a tune that his teacher summarily decided the boy had no ear for music. So he was relegated to brush and basket-making, and was actually forbidden to touch the piano. This immediately put him on his mettle. He determined that, ear or no ear, music he would learn. He hired one of the other boys to give him secret lessons and practised whenever he could. Three months later, the music-master, also blind, accidentally entering the room, said, "Who is that playing the new lesson so well?" "I sir!" "You, Josie, you cannot play! Come here; what have you learnt?" "All that you have taught the other boys." The teacher laughed. "Well, then, sit down and play the instruction book through from beginning to end." Fifteen

Not long after this, young Campbell scoured the State of Tennessee on his favourite little nag in search of additional pupils for the blind school, and brought in a score—surely a remarkable achievement for a blind youth to accomplish.

Another dark day was soon to dawn in his checquered life. He went to Harvard University and married his first wife, but the firm with whom he had deposited his savings failed, and he had to start afresh. It was in 1856, when he was 24, that he settled down with his young wife as musical director of a large girls' school in the State of Tennessee. But the anti-slavery agitation was beginning at that time, and Dr. Campbell, against what appeared to be his best interests, sided strongly with the Abolitionists. For this he was threatened by a committee of leading citizens with hanging. As he was a blind man, there was a popular outcry against this, but a systematic boycott was commenced which resulted in his being driven from the land of his birth, and ultimately landed him at Norwood, where he found his life-work.

The immediate events which culminated in the formation of the Royal Normal College at Norwood were as strange and unforeseen as many other things in Dr. Campbell's life. He was returning from the Continent, where after studying for two years in the Conservatoires of Leipzig and Berlin, he had been visiting the leading European Blind Schools with the object of establishing a first-class Conservatoire of Music for the Blind in connection with one of the American Universities. On his way back to the United States, he arrived in London on Jan. 20, 1871, intending to sail from Liverpool on the 23rd. But those three days have lengthened into thirty-one years, and still he is with us. A stranger staying at the same hotel in London invited him to a charitable tea-party for the blind. That was all! But it turned the current of Dr. Campbell's career. In conversing with the blind guests, he realised, as perhaps never before, the hopelessness of their lot. Of 3,150 sightless persons in London, 2,300 were dependent upon charitable relief. "Before I left the meeting," says Dr. Campbell, "the burden of the blind poor of this great metropolis rested heavily upon me."

Digitized by Google

The following day Dr. Campbell met Dr. Armitage, founder of the British and Foreign Blind Association, who was himself almost sightless, and had for years devoted his time and his fortune to the improvement of the conditions of the less fortunate blind. These two enthusiasts spent months in comparing notes, visiting blind classes, etc., and considering what could be done for the blind of London. At length, as one day they were walking across Hyde Park, Dr. Armitage suddenly turned to his companion and asked. "What will it cost to start a small school, and try the experiment for two years?" "£3,000," replied Dr. Campbell. "Then," said Dr. Armitage, "I will give £1,000 if the other £2,000 can be raised" Dr. Campbell at once set to work, and, with the help of Mr. Wm. Mather, M.P., Professor Fawcett, and others, in six months the money was raised, and three houses near the Crystal Palace purchased in which to make a start. Before long the institution attracted to its aid many of the philanthropists of the country, and Queen Victoria became interested in it. The College was subsequently removed to its present site and extended. It is now one of the "sights" of the district upon which stands the famous palace of crystal.

The Blind College is an assemblage of schools, standing in charming grounds, and all arranged and laid out on scientific principles. Even the paths are en suite. There are many steps and stairs, but these and the many crossings are indicated by a slight raising of the footpaths, and by means of a few simple signs the blind students can traverse the grounds freely from end to end, and find their way about without the slightest difficulty. Indeed, it is hard for a visitor to believe that the pupils whom he sees walking about or cycling or swimming, or amusing themselves under the trees, or in the playground, can really be sightless. The happy students will even wax eloquent about the appearance and situation of the pretty flower-beds which they have never seen, and it is related that on one occasion, when it was proposed to cut down a tree on the lawn, it was spared in deference to the urgent entreaty of the students that its removal would so much spoil the view! That is the education of imagination par excellence.

STUDENTS' AFTERNOON TEA IN THE GROUNDS OF THE ROYAL BLIND COLLEGE, NORWOOD.

Digitized by Google

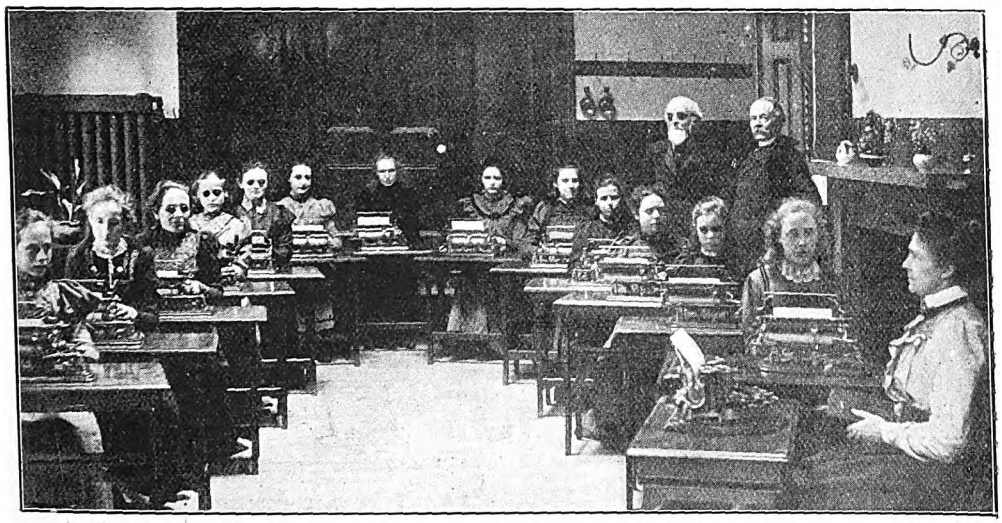
Dr. Campbell trains his pupils to do everything as far as possible as if they had the most perfect vision, and in this respect he has given example as well as precept. For, incredible as it may appear, guided by a sighted oarsman or oarswoman, as the case may be.

But the College curriculum is not all made up of recreation, important as that undoubtedly is. In the various class-rooms we witnessed the actual process of teaching, which embraces all the usual subjects of elementary and secondary education. But the ones that interested us most were the kindergarten classes There were little blind boys and girls modelling in clay, learning to draw by the aid of bent wires, taking their first lessons in plaiting, or being introduced to Mother Nature herself



BLIND GIRL-STUDENTS WORKING THE TYPE-WRITER.

Dr. Campbell is an enthusiastic mountaineer. He is the only blind man who has ever ascended Mont Blanc, and "there are few snow-clad peaks in the play-ground of Europe which are not almost as familiar to him as the asphalted walks in the grounds at Norwood." Few blind people in pursuit of healthful exercise, can climb mountains, however, and so Dr. Campbell has introduced into the College grounds one of the most perfect gymnasia in London, and an admirably laid-out roller-skating rink. In the swimming-bath, too, the pupils are taught to swim, to dive, and to rescue persons from drowning by the latest approved methods, while along the cycle track winding round the lower grounds, a serpent-like machine bearing twelve riders (the leader being sighted) dashes merrily along in most exhilarating fashion. Among the many privileges of my life I shall number the pleasure of a brief cycle trip at the head of a party of blind students. Inside the cycle track is a small lake on which sightless crews may be seen rowing, but by means of a branch from a beech-tree, with its leaves and nuts. As an object lesson to encourage observation, it was enlightening even to some of the visitors.

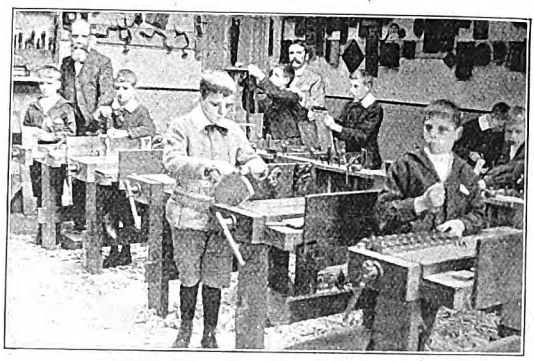
The Swedish Sloyd class, designed to give manual dexterity and accuracy in the manipulation of tools, looks like a joiner's shop. Here the blind pupils are taught the use of all kinds of tools, except the chisel, and the boys gave evidence of being apt scholars.

Perhaps one of the most wonderful items of "Seeing by Touch" is to be found in the typewriting rooms, where boys or girls were manipulating the Hammond machines as if to the manner born. They read their Braille notes with the left hand, if not being dictated to.

The typewriter has two rows of keys, each key operating three characters, and every third key is raised about half-an-inch above its fellows, somewhat after the principle of the raised black notes on a pianoforte keyboard. It is thus easy to locate each letter, as they are all in sets of three.

Digitized by Google

The sewing, arithmetic and geography classes have all their wonders for visitors. Whether the blind pupils are threading needles, stitching or darning; whether they are giving examples in fractions on their tin perforated slates, or hunting for Mount Vesuvius or "the seven hilled city" on their raised maps, the smart little students seem never at a loss.



BLIND BOYS IN THE SLOYD SHOP.

But of all the classes, the most practical, perhaps, are those devoted to pianoforte tuning and the teaching of music, for in these departments many of the students expect to earn their living. The thoroughness of the musical training has been testified to by Sir John Stainer, and many pupils of the College have achieved successes in which sighted aspirants failed. Every blind child is taught to read his own music from the first exercises that he or she learns. All the pupils read and write music by the Braille system of notation, and I have it on the authority of Dr. Campbell himself that his blind choir—whose singing has delighted multitudes of people in all parts of London—can read any vocal composition such as chants, hymns, part-songs, madrigals, or grand choruses, and immediately sing them from the notes. Indeed, he is confident that they could successfully compete in sight-reading with the best sighted choirs in the country.

DR. CAMPBELL MOUNTAINEERING.

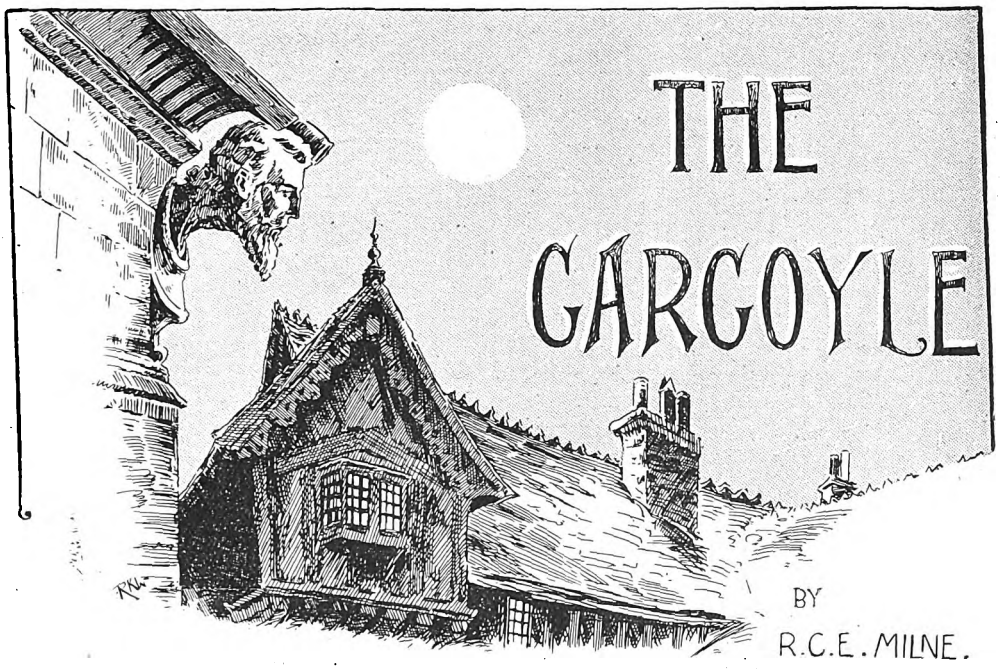
The instruction in pianoforte tuning is equally efficient, as I can personally testify, and the tuners sent from this College to any part of the Metropolis may always be relied upon.

In conclusion, it is interesting to know that there are now 156 pupils in residence in the College, but many applicants are seeking admission, the great majority of them being poor. As it is, 2,000*l.* in annual subscriptions is needed to keep the institution on a sound financial basis, and considering its value as a necessary part of the education of the country, it deserves all the help that can be given to it.

Our portrait of Dr. Campbell on page 1377 is from a photograph by Wright, Upper Norwood.

A KINDERGARTEN CLASS IN THE BLIND COLLEGE.

Digitized by Google



THE GARGOYLE

BY R.C.E. MILNE.

ONCE upon a time, high up under the eaves, there lived a Gargoyle.

He was old—how old he could not exactly remember, so long ago it was since the sculptor had fashioned him; but for hundreds of years he had watched the world passing to and fro beneath his eyrie. For hundreds of years he had looked on the old moss-grown church, had marked the rooks nesting in the elms, and the breeze ruffling the surface of the village pond. Many, many generations of men and women had he seen. Knights and squires in glittering armour, monks with shaven crown, wandering jongleurs with their lutes; gentlemen in periwigs and brocaded coats, ladies with their hoops and patches; and, now to-day he watched the rustic in his smock and the soberly-clad citizens going leisurely about their business.

But the Gargoyle missed the pomp and pageantry of the olden days, and he yearned bitterly for the banners and the trumpets and the clank of armour, the noise of the knights riding to the joust and the jingling of the harness. The world had surely grown duller, thought the Gargoyle, since he was young.

One thing, however, was unchanging. Through all the years, as the evening shadows fell long and slanting across the grass, the young men and girls walked in pairs along the path beneath him. And the Gargoyle observed that though the fashion of their clothes might change, and the manner of their speech, yet they talked ever of the same thing—of Love; and much the Gargoyle marvelled what this might be. And he was very sad, because of the happiness of the young men and the girls; for he greatly desired to share in it, yet he could not, because he did not know what "Love" was.

"I really wish I knew what this 'Love' can be," said the Gargoyle to himself. "I will certainly ask the rooks."

So he asked the rooks, as they gathered twigs for their nests, what this "Love" was, of which all mortals seemed to talk. The rooks only shook their heads wisely.

"We do not know," they said. "We lead the strenuous life; we have no time to bother about such things. If 'Love' is not building nests and laying eggs, and collecting worms, we do not know what it can be."

"Dear me," sighed the Gargoyle, "it is very certain that I can never build a nest or lay eggs. Undoubtedly that cannot be 'Love'; but I will ask the Wind; he is a great traveller, and will certainly know."

Digitized by Google

So the next evening, as the Wind came softly through the leaves, the Gargoyle told him what the Rooks had said. But the Wind laughed scornfully, dancing in little eddies about the Gargoyle's head.

"The rooks are fools," he said. "They think only of business; how should they know what 'Love' is? But I am a great traveller, and I will tell you. 'Love' is to go all over the world, and to kiss all that is most beautiful, and to forget. In Persia, whence I have just come, I kissed the roses as they hung upon their stems, but I have forgotten it all. And to-morrow I shall kiss the lilies, and perhaps on the next day again the violets; but I shall forget it all—I shall forget it all."

But the Gargoyle was old-fashioned, which was very natural considering his great age; and, though he did not know why, he was very much shocked by the lightness of the wind.

"I am sure that cannot be 'Love,' he said. "In fact, I know that it must be something very different from what you say."

Of course the Gargoyle did not know any such thing; but he did not approve of the Wind's speech, and so he said that it was not true. This was not very logical, but the Gargoyle had listened to the talk of lovers for so many years that he had lost his sense of logic altogether.

"Very well," said the Wind, indifferently, "if you do not believe me you had better listen carefully to your lovers. Perhaps they will tell you."

"That is a very sensible suggestion," said the Gargoyle. "I will certainly listen carefully."

And that evening he saw a Girl coming towards him on the path below. Her chestnut hair shone like a golden glory in the setting sun. By her side walked a Poet; one of his arms was around the Girl's waist, and their heads leaned close together.

"Ah," said the Gargoyle to himself, "without a doubt they will be able to tell me what I want to know."

So he listened to the words which the Poet was reading from a page of verses which he held in his hand. And although the Poet's voice was low, the Gargoyle could hear something of what he was saying, and he was reading about the fire of Love."

"Well, that is something, at any rate," said the Gargoyle. "I know now that 'Love' is a fire. I wonder how I could get some of that fire? Perhaps they will tell me when they come again."

So the next evening he watched, and presently the lovers came, walking hand-in-hand.

"Sweetheart," the Poet was saying, "sweetheart mine, I love you, oh, so dearly. My heart is breaking for Love of you; my sighs rise eternally to heaven, words can never tell you how I love you."

"Dear, dear," thought the Gargoyle, "this 'Love' seems to be a very complicated emotion. His heart is breaking, and he sighs eternally, yet he is undoubtedly happy. I wish that words had been able to tell her how he loved her, for then I too might have known how to love."

And again the next night he watched for the lovers, but they did not come. And so for many evenings; but at length, after weary waiting, he saw them coming down the grass-grown path. But they were not walking hand-in-hand, as the Gargoyle had seen them before, and the girl's face was turned away, and the Poet walked moodily, with a frown upon his brow.

"I was a fool to waste my love on you," he said. "You cannot love, because your heart is stone."

"Ah," thought the Gargoyle, "now at last I understand why I cannot love. My heart is undoubtedly of stone, and therefore I cannot love."

And he was very sad.

But one evening when the Gargoyle was feeling very melancholy from much thinking about his stone heart, he saw the lovers coming once again. And they were walking hand-in-hand as of yore.

"I was cruel to use such words to you, beloved," the Poet said. "Can you forgive me—for, indeed I love you, and always will."

The Girl laughed shyly, with a sidelong glance from heavy-lidded eyes. The roses in her cheek grew of a deeper crimson as she spoke.

"Love can conquer even a heart of stone," she said.

The Poet took the Girl in his arms, gazing into her tear-gemmed eyes. "They look like violets touched with dew," thought the Gargoyle. Which, for a Gargoyle, was really very poetical.

Digitized by Google

"GENTLEMEN IN PERIWIGS AND BROCADED COATS, LADIES WITH THEIR HOOPS AND PATCHES."

"And will you love me always?" said the Poet.

The Girl hid her face on his shoulder with a sob.

"Love is for ever and ever," she said softly.

"Why do you cry, dearest?" asked the Poet. "Are you not happy?"

"Very" said the Girl.

The Gargoyle smiled, for he too was happy. He did not know why the Girl should cry if she was happy. But then there were a great many things which the Gargoyle did not know.

Early the next morning the Wind came blowing round the corner of the house, making little whirlwinds in the dust.

"Well," he asked, "have you found out yet what 'Love' is?"

"Yes," said the Gargoyle. "'Love' is a fire, and it conquers even a heart of stone, and it is for ever and ever. Two lovers, one of whom is a Poet, come here every evening, and they have said so, and without doubt they must know."

The Wind laughed airily.

"Poets always say that sort of thing," he said. "But I am a man of the world, and I tell you that 'Love' is to go about the world and kiss all that is most beautiful, and that it only lasts for a very little time."

"I must decline to argue the subject," replied the Gargoyle. Which was very wise of him, for the truth was that he had no arguments to bring forward, because he did not really know what 'Love' was, only that it was a fire, and was for ever and ever. And every morning the Wind asked the Gargoyle if he had yet been able to love. And the Gargoyle answered nothing, but waited patiently, for he told himself that "Love" could conquer even a heart of stone, and that some day it would come to him too.

Now in the house under the eaves of which the Gargoyle lived there resided a learned man. And so learned and so clever was he, that in his concern for the great thoughts which he was always thinking, he sometimes forgot the little things which men less learned, and less clever, remember. And one night one of the things which he forgot was to blow out the candle before he went to sleep. So the candle fell over and set the curtains on fire; and, by the time the learned man woke up, the whole room was in a blaze.

Digitized by Google

"How very warm I am getting," thought the Gargoyle outside, "I wonder if this can be 'Love' coming on?"

Then the heat grew greater and greater, and the Gargoyle saw little tongues of flame licking out of the window at his feet.

"My insides are red-hot," cried the Gargoyle. "This is certainly the fire of 'Love' of which the Poet spoke. And, hark, how I am sighing; I am undoubtedly very much in love."

And indeed he was hissing, but that was because of the water from the fire-engine. But the Gargoyle was so excited that he did not feel the water, and thought only that he was sighing.

"Ah!" cried he again, "without a doubt this is 'Love'; my heart is breaking—my heart is breaking!"

And in very truth the heat and the water had cracked him across the middle. But the Gargoyle was very proud, for he thought that "Love" had done it.

"See!" he cried to the Wind, "my heart of stone is broken with love, and it is for ever and ever!"

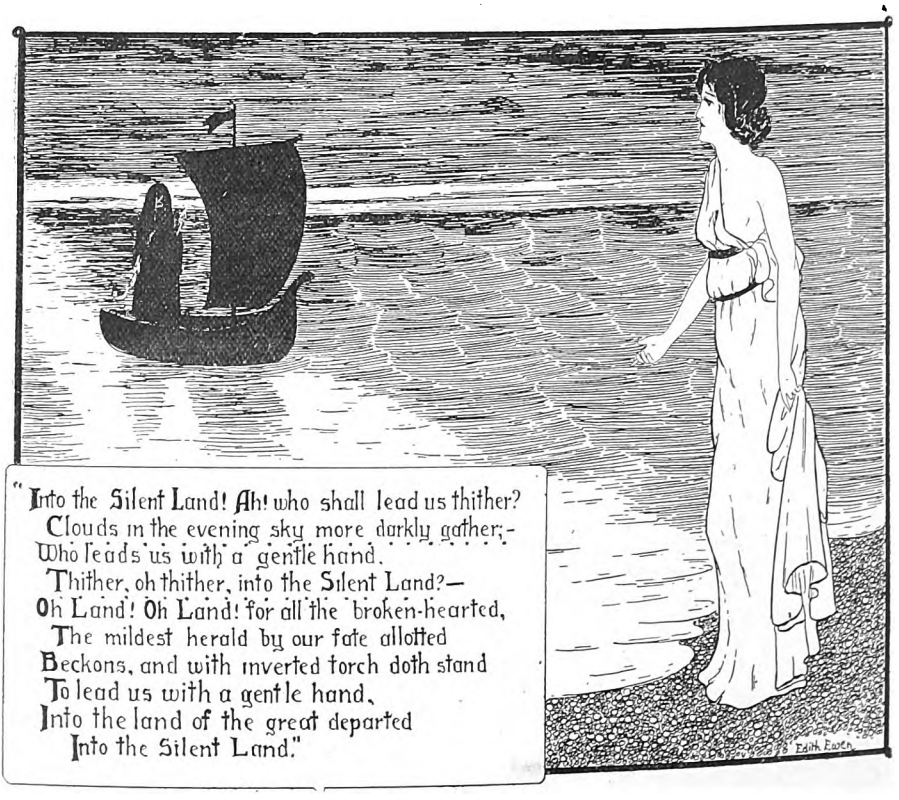
"Nonsense," said the Wind breezily, "that was not love. That was a fire."

"Exactly," said the Gargoyle, firmly. "The Poet said that 'Love' was a fire, and it has conquered and broken my heart of stone."

"Well, well," said the Wind, as he flew away, "if that is so, time will heal it."

"Never," said the Gargoyle; "it is for ever and ever!"

And so it was. And if you do not believe me, you can go and look at the Gargoyle for yourself, for he is still there, and he is broken right across the middle. And if nobody mends him, it will be for ever and ever. And if this is not quite what the lovers meant—it makes no difference to the Gargoyle!



Digitized by Google

REPLY TO A CRITICISM ON THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY IN THE "TEMPLE MAGAZINE" FOR NOVEMBER.

By the Rev. T. H. DARLOW, Literary Superintendent of the Society.

AN unsigned article to the Temple Magazine for November severely criticised the Bible Society, more particularly in regard to the management of the Agencies in France, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, and Italy. By the courtesy of the Editor, I am permitted to reply to this criticism, which is based on the facts and figures contained in the Society's last Annual Report. As compiler of the Report, I shall endeavour to show from its pages that our critic has misinterpreted the statistics which he cites, as well as, no doubt unintentionally, misrepresented their bearing on the question at issue between us.

Let me begin by stating precisely what that question is. Our critic does not disguise the real ground of his complaint. He girds at the Bible Society because it steadily endeavours so far as possible to sell the Scriptures, and because under ordinary circumstances, it discourages their wholesale and indiscriminate free distribution. This policy of the Bible Society is no new departure. It is the result of nearly a century's experience in circulating God's Word in all parts of the world. It is ratified by the experience and practice of the great Bible Societies in other Protestant countries, like Scotland, Germany and America. It is, moreover, sanctioned by the verdict of an immense majority of missionaries in heathen lands. Surely our critic might at least pause before he attacked it so vehemently, and ask himself whether he had fully grasped all the conditions of the problem with which he attempts to deal.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has for its sole object "to encourage the wider circulation of the Holy Scriptures." (Report, page xii.). We desire, quite as ardently as our critic, that God's Book shall be read by everyone of God's children. The only difference between us is, how we can most effectually bring this about. The Committee of the Bible Society are a body of Christian laymen, versed in the conduct of affairs. As trustees for the Society's subscribers, they spare no pains to administer its funds to the best possible advantage. They certainly do not (as the critic suggests) obtain subscriptions by concealing a policy which (as he elsewhere admits) is perfectly plain from the Report. They ask themselves the question—What is meant by "circulation" of the Scriptures in the proper sense of that term? They believe that "to circulate" means not simply to disperse or to scatter abroad, but to put into use. And experience has taught them—not that it is wrong to give away the Scriptures—but that wholesale, indiscriminate, gratis distribution is a mistake*; it does not fulfil the good intentions of those who carry it out; it cannot be accompanied by personal commendation of the Book: it means, as a rule, wholesale waste: it leads to the desecration and destruction of the sacred volume; it gives rise, too often, to contempt for the printed Scriptures.

I might cite painful instances of the abuse of wholesale free distribution which have come to the knowledge of the Bible Society. But I frankly admit that even such abuses, though they must make us pause, do not settle the point at issue.

Again, it may be pointed out that the critic argues as though everybody in Western Europe could read. Yet, the

* The critic quotes from the Report, page 70 "As a rule our Society does not favour indiscriminate gratis distribution. In Italy, such distribution does more harm than good," but he has carefully omitted the qualifying close of the sentence, which runs, "especially when carried out by persons who cannot speak the language, and therefore cannot recommend the Book to those who accept it."

Digitized by Google

Report which he quotes will tell him that in Italy, for instance, every third man is illiterate and every second woman (Report, page 67), while in Portugal only twenty per cent. of the whole population can read and write (Report, page 91). The policy of indiscriminate giving must surely take account of such deplorable and widespread ignorance. How many of those who accept your free copies can put them to the use which you intend?

The real question remains—What is the most effectual method of getting the Gospel into the hands and hearts of people who do not possess it? Now the Bible Society recognises one elementary and universal fact in human nature. It is a matter of common experience that people everywhere—white men and brown men, red men and black men—will value and preserve that which they have paid even a small coin to secure. Our great object is not simply that a Spaniard shall have a Spanish New Testament somewhere in his house, but that he shall be interested enough to read it. The Bible Society believes that this end is best reached by placing a price on its Scriptures, and by taking pains to induce people to buy for themselves. These prices in foreign countries are so low that the Book in its cheaper editions is brought within reach of the poorest. And each of our Colporteurs has instructions that whenever he finds anyone who really desires a copy, and who is too indigent to pay the price, the colporteur may present it to him as a free gift from the Bible Society. The critic makes play with a sentence from page 72 of the Report—"We discourage such distributions," i.e., such as are wholesale and (as the context shows) made by English visitors in Italy who cannot commend and explain the Books they scatter. If the critic had read on, he would find that the very next page records how colporteur Scurti "met forty emigrant families starting for Brazil and offered his Books for sale. 'If we had money to buy books', they answered, 'we would not emigrate to America.' The Colporteur could not find it in his heart to allow these poor folk to leave their country without a copy of God's Word, so he gave a Gospel in large type to each one who could read, but alas! these were not many" (Report, pages 73 and 74).

And so also a few lines below the sentence (already cited) which the critic selects for attack on page 70, the Report describes how the Society's colporteurs last year again visited the islands where Italian convicts are interned, and carefully distributed 1,784 Gospels gratis among these unhappy, neglected criminals. "As no books were given except to men who really wished for them and promised to make good use of them, we trust that through these little books some poor sinners may have found their Saviour" (Report page 70).

It must be remembered that a Colporteur of the Bible Society is chosen, not for his cleverness as a hawker, but because he has learnt to know and love the Book he carries. When he sells a Gospel, he can always add his warm personal word of witness to the Redeemer whom it proclaims. His best work is often done in dealing with individuals, or in scattered hamlets where large sales are impossible. And the critic forgets that outside these islands, population is not as a rule congested into great cities. Eight Russians out of every nine live in villages; the Austrian Empire, with forty-seven millions of people, has only six cities larger than Norwich; whilst of the teeming millions of India 93 per cent. are villagers. Even if you give books away gratis to everybody you meet, you cannot possibly reach these widely dispersed multitudes as if they were walking in procession down the Strand. A Society which attempts to organise systematic distribution of the Scriptures abroad, must perforce adopt very different methods from any individual holiday-maker, who is responsible to no one but himself.

The further objection to wholesale distribution—that it hinders the colporteurs in their attempts to sell—does not mean that the Bible Society makes money (it loses money!) by the copies which its agents dispose of. But consider the situation. A benevolent English Christian tourist drives into some Italian town, deals out Italian Testaments wholesale to everyone he can find, and drives off the same afternoon. A week later a colporteur comes to stay in the town, and goes from door to door and tries in the dialect of the people to interest them in the Book. Naturally they suspect him and denounce him as a swindler, because he asks a small price for books such as were dealt out gratis and indiscriminately the week before. Yet who can doubt that a few copies explained and purchased one by one, will achieve their purpose more effectually than many copies given away wholesale? To sow the Seed, we have not to fling it broadcast and at random among the rocks, but to introduce it into every crevice of good soil which can be discovered even on stony ground.

Digitized by Google

The plea for indiscriminate free distribution in Europe must apply also to Asia and Africa. But this is diametrically opposed by the judgment of the wisest and most experienced Christian workers in non-Christian lands. As a matter of fact the price at which the Society's Scriptures shall be sold in heathen countries, is settled by agreement with the missionaries at work there. Thus, a Bengali Gospel which (apart from any editorial expenses) costs the Society a penny to produce, is sold to natives in the Calcutta bazaars for a farthing. And the missionaries testify that in the long run it is better to charge this farthing, than habitually and indiscriminately to give the Book away for nothing. The Bible Society is sustained in its policy by the emphatic approval of all the highest authorities in the Foreign Mission field.

It grows plain that the critic has confined his study to a few opening chapters of the Report which he attacks. He seems not to know that the Bible Society does habitually distribute the Scriptures without charge, though not without care, in all cases of special opportunity or exceptional necessity. Free distribution of this kind goes on in every Agency of the Society (cf. Report, pp. 35, 50, 103, 104, 117, 150, 241). To the sick in hospitals, to the criminals in prisons, to the children in orphanages, to visitors at Exhibitions, and especially to inhabitants of provinces stricken by famine or pestilence or persecution, the Society always relaxes its normal rule and gives the Scriptures freely and generously to those who so sorely need their consolation.

Two examples will illustrate how the Bible Society carries out its policy. Let me first refer to students in Asia.

In China, at the provincial examinations held for the first degree, and at the triennial examination for the second degree, the Society arranges for a periodical free distribution of Gospels in Classical Chinese to all candidates who will accept them. In 1901 China was in chaos, but during this present year over 20,000 Gospels have been thus placed in the hands of the prospective officials of the Chinese Empire. In India, the Society regularly offers an English Bible, Testament, or copy of the Four Gospels to all graduates and undergraduates of Indian universities on passing their examinations (Report, pp. 208, 209, 213). The gift is accepted by about 6,000 Indian students every year.

The other example I take from South Africa. During the recent war, the Bible Society has given away many tens of thousands of Bibles, Testaments, and Gospels in English and Dutch, to soldiers, to prisoners, and to refugees, both Boers and British (Report, p. 187). In prospect of the re-settlement of the country, it has just reduced the price of its cheapest Dutch Bible to 6d. throughout South Africa. And it believes that to sell that Bible at its Depots and by its colporteurs for so trifling a fee, will promote a genuine circulation more effectually than could be done by wholesale free gifts.

This brings me to the figures which the critic has cited, and which he so egregiously misapprehends. He complains that "the total money value of the various Scriptures sold by the British and Foreign Bible Society" in France, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and Italy during 1901 is only £3,428. This sum was, indeed, the total price received by the Society for the Scriptures which it sold in those countries (Report, pages 13, 28, 67, 81, 91). But the charges incurred last year by the Bible Society for binding and printing alone in the same countries amounted to £4,809; and even that by no means represents the "money value," i.e., the original cost to the Society of producing the Scriptures which it circulated there—still less the total cost of putting them into the hands of the people.

If the Bible Society were an ordinary publishing and bookselling firm, working on commercial lines, it would reckon the cost of its business in a foreign country to be made up as follows:—

(i.) The initial expense of copyrights.
(ii.) Cost of printing and binding.
(iii.) Rent, taxes, etc., of shops.
(iv.) Salaries of travellers.
(v.) Expenses of management.

Now in the case of the Bible Society,

Digitized by Google

(i.) represents the cost of translations and revisions—often very considerable in the past, but not included among the annual expenses of the five Agencies referred to.

(iii.) represents expenses of depots.

(iv.) corresponds with colportage.

(v.) answers to agents' expenses.

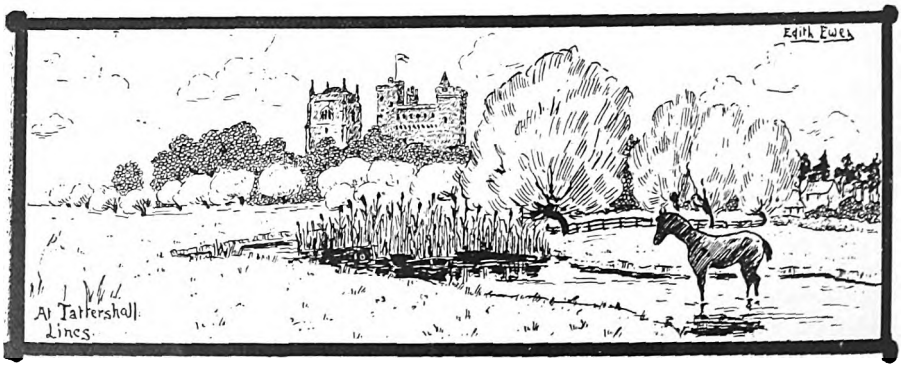
To produce a variety of popular editions of the Bible and parts of the Bible, to keep these stocked, often in many different languages† and on sale at convenient central towns, and especially to carry them by Colporteurs from door to door through the innumerable scattered villages of a foreign country, is a serious task which requires most careful supervision and entails considerable expense. Speaking from intimate knowledge, I believe that the Society's work in Western Europe cannot be carried on more economically if it is to be done effectively. Surely the critic is inconsistent when he complains that the pecuniary results from our sales are small compared with the expenses incurred. Why are they so small? Partly because the prices of our popular editions are systematically reduced, thus bringing the Gospel within the reach of all, whilst at the same time guarding against those abuses which accompany wholesale and indiscriminate free distribution. The critic is really finding fault with the Society because it proceeds as far as is wise and efficacious in the direction of that free distribution which he so warmly commends.

Depots and colportage are necessarily expensive and unremunerative, from a commercial point of view. If, however, the Bible Society were to shut the doors of all its continental depots, many evangelical agencies and missions on the Continent would find themselves in a widely different position as regards obtaining cheap copies of the Scriptures; for these, instead of being—as the critic suggests—exported direct from London, are generally printed for the B. and F. B. S. in the country where they circulate, and are supplied from the depots to local missions at prices considerably below the cost of printing and binding (Report, pp. 18, 35, 71, 93, 132).

Space fails me to follow the critic in his comparison between the sums spent last year by the Society on its different foreign fields of work. He appears to think that these should be determined by rule of three,‡ according to the population concerned. But in deciding what sum it ought to devote to some particular foreign agency in any year, the Society must obviously take account of many facts besides population. Such are the political conditions of the country in question, the state of popular education, the facilities which already exist for obtaining the Word of God, the claims of the missions already at work there, as well as, in many countries, the activities of the Scotch and American Bible Societies, with whom it is the happiness of the British and Foreign Bible Society to co-operate in amity and concord.

† Last year Scriptures were sold in more than twenty different languages by the Society's Austrian Agency (Report, Appendix, page 16).

‡ Even when you embark on simple proportion, it is necessary to be accurate in your data. The critic arrives at the result of his last paragraph but one, by assuming that India (which, by the way, is certainly not a "colonial dependency of Great Britain") contains 581,000,000 people; whereas the returns of the new census show that the population of India is almost exactly half that number (Report page 202).



Digitized by Google

The Critic's Rejoinder to the Rev. T. H. DARLOW'S Explanation on behalf of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

THE officials (but not the subscribers) of the B. and F. Bible Society have by Mr. Darlow's foregoing article, clearly re-affirmed their uncompromising hostility to the gratuitous distribution of portions of God's Word.

In paragraph 3 they say: "Experience has taught them that wholesale, indiscriminate gratis distribution is a mistake; it cannot be accompanied by personal commendation of the Book; it means, as a rule, wholesale waste; it leads to desecration and destruction of the sacred volume; it gives rise, too often, to contempt for the printed Scriptures."

This statement is simply an imaginary phantasmagoric hallucination. "Wholesale waste"!! "Desecration and destruction" of the Book!!

The origin of this mistaken idea may be that in France, Belgium and Italy parcels of 200 to 400 Gospels were on certain occasions pilfered by the hired men who carried them for a distributor in the past few years, and afterwards taken by them to the Bible Society Depots in the hope of getting money for them, with the lame story that they had been picked up after being dropped by people to whom they had been given.

But what about the 400,000 little Gospels given away by the Bible Society at the Paris Exhibition of 1900, as well as their former Exhibition distributions. The 400,000 were largely given away to the crowds pouring out of the gates of the Exhibition at closing time, because the authorities forbade their distribution inside the Exhibition. And certainly, ft was not possible to discriminate much or select recipients in such crowds, or give words of commendation. Among them, there were, and always will be, a certain percentage of bigoted recipients (2 to 5 per cent.) who will tear up or fling away Gospels, but this is no argument against giving to the other 95 per cent.

A measurable percentage of destruction accompanies the sale of Scriptures by colporteurs, as stated over and over again in Bible Society Reports, e.g., in Report for 1902 on page 24, colporteur Galibert relates how a lady bought all his books for nine francs, and then bade her servant throw them all into the fire. And, in many instances priests go round villages after sales by colporteurs, and gather all the Scriptures and burn them. What is this but wholesale waste—desecration and destruction of the Book?

We read on page 30 of the Report: "The Roman Catholic clergy manage to get a number of these Books given up to them," and on page 20, "The priests order the Books to be burnt," and on page 35 "The innkeeper had a Bible but the priest burnt the Book as bad," and on page 36, "At Tembleque, a Bible was publicly burnt in honour of the Virgin, because it spoke ill of her," and on page 46, a colporteur writes: "The priests are now visiting all the houses, and wherever my books are found, they are flung into the stove. One priest showed four Bibles which he had taken from his flock, to throw into the fire." The same colporteur was fiercely assailed with the accusation of slandering St. Peter, by selling a book which said that the Apostle had thrice denied Christ.

As the priests have more power in small villages and little towns where the colporteurs chiefly sell, there is more chance of the Scriptures being destroyed in such places, than in greater towns where we urge large distributions of Gospels should be made.

Experienced distributors in French and Italian cities know perfectly well that 95 per cent. of passers-by accept Gospels gladly, and the accusation of "wholesale waste, desecration and destruction" of such Gospels is an utter delusion and chimera. The opinion of the Rev. S. H. Anderson of 37, Avenue Grande Armeé, Paris, and other helpers of the McAll Mission should be asked on this point.

Let Pastor Lortsch, the head of the Bible Society in Paris, watch for fifteen minutes a competent distributor giving away Gospels in the Rue du Havre, fronting the Gare St. Lazare, or outside the Pygmalion in the Rue de Rivoli or on the crowded Boulevards, or in the streets through which many business people come in the morning and return in the evening, and he will be able to report that 95 per cent. of the Gospels given away are kept by the recipients.

Digitized by Google

In the autumn of this year, altogether, nineteen thousand Gospels were given away on four Sundays by the Editor of the Christian Herald in Lille, in front of the Grand Hotel, to excursionists passing continuously for hours, from the railway station to the Exhibition. Not five per cent. of the little Books were thrown down by the recipients when their contents were perceived, although many Socialists live in that manufacturing centre. Nearly a million people are computed to be living in Lille, Tourcoing, Roubaix, and the surrounding neighbourhood in which there is no Bible Society colporteur or depot.

For two-and-a-half million Catholics of Paris, only seven hours' journey from London, the British and Foreign Bible Society, with £145,000 of annual contributions, has no colporteurs, and does nothing (except in Exhibition years), beyond having a little shop in a narrow street, the local customers of which are rarely Catholics, but mostly Protestant Societies and congregations.

The vast masses of Parisians cannot be reached except by gratuitous distribution of Gospels. A colporteur a few miles from Paris says on page 37 of the Report, "The nearer I get to Paris the less I sell."

The Bible Society unreasonably refuses to insert pictures of Bethlehem, Jerusalem, Nazareth, or other eastern scenes in its Gospels, although its original laws contain no prohibition of such pictures, and hence the pictorial Gospels of the Scripture Gift Mission at 15, Strand, London, are more eagerly received and preserved by the French and Italians. The arbitrary refusal of the B. and F. Bible Society to supply Gospels with pictures in them, is a serious drawback to their colporteurs who would sell many more if they were illustrated. Then again, the French Gospels they have issued since 1899 are only in paper covers instead of cloth covers as previous to 1899, and are therefore far less valuable and lasting. It is reported that two pounds per thousand are being paid for the production of these paper-covered Gospels in France, whereas M. Yalla of Florence or Mr. Walters of 15, Strand, London, could produce them for thirty shillings per thousand.

The fact of a small proportion of people on the Continent being unable to read, does not interfere with gratuitous distribution, because a practised distributor will only give to well-dressed people who in towns can all read. The illiterate are poor people and chiefly in country places.

The rule mentioned by Mr. Darlow that "every colporteur may freely give a copy to anyone who desires it, but has not money to buy it," seems to be generally a dead letter. The Report for 1902 states that only one Bible, 150 Testaments, and 350 little Gospels (!) were thus given away in 10 months by 43 colporteurs, among 39 million Frenchmen Each colporteur must have met in the course of ten months with scores of poor persons too poor to buy a Gospel—at least, if they had looked for them.

Similarly in Siberia, on page 125 of Report, colporteur Tzvethoff says: "At Derinski, a village containing 70 huts, I visited every hut. Many would have bought if they had money. I did not sell a single book; I gave three copies gratis!!!" How does this agree with the above-mentioned rule, "to give a copy to everyone who cannot buy it."

Mr. George Muller's distributors at the Paris Exhibition of 1867, and the Havre Exhibition of 1868 gave Testaments and Gospels to soldiers, sailors, policemen, and poor country peasants, but sold to well-dressed people who could afford to pay. In like manner the subscribers to the Bible Society would certainly wish Scripture portions to be given to all sailors, soldiers, gendarmes, prisoners, and peasants, who can read.

Mr. Darlow says: "The plea for gratuitous distribution in Europe must also apply to Asia and Africa." There is no MUST in this matter whatever. Western Europe, to which the Temple Magazine article solely referred, is Roman Catholic, and most of its people know that the Gospels contain the life of Christ in whom they nominally believe, but Hindoos, Mahommedans, Malays, and Chinese do not nominally believe in Christ, and to many of them a Gospel is of no more value than Donelly's Cryptogram would be. Moreover, they are uncivilised heathen vastly inferior to intelligent educated Frenchmen and Italians. In some parts of India not more than one person in a hundred can read.

Digitized by Google

It must be left to the judgment of every subscriber to the Bible Society to decide whether the EXPENDITURE OF £43,324 IN ORDER TO SELL £6,028 OF SCRIPTURES in fourteen countries, is satisfactory. Here are the figures from the British and Foreign Bible Society's Report printed at the head of each section. We give the expenses of the Society in each country first and the value of the Scriptures sold second :—Persia : £2,271—£247 ; Burma : £1,072—£112 ; N. Malaysia, £2,203—£365 ; S. Malaysia, £4,859—£287 ; China : £9,448—£1,004 ; Korea : £1,541—£298 ; Argentine : £1,647—£503 ; Brazil : £4,554—£485 ; Central America, £1,102—£223 ; Morocco : £1,588—£68 ; Algeria : £940—£117 ; Egypt, etc. : £6,002—£1,153 ; Turkey : £5,729—£1l154 ; West Africa : £368—£12.

Total £43,324 spent in effecting sales of Scriptures of the total value of £6,028 in the above-mentioned 14 countries.

There are two ways in which the sale of Scriptures in France might be greatly increased. First, by sending colporteurs, who are fluent speakers, to fairs which are held all the year round in various places, and there with his books displayed on a stall (for the standing room of which he would pay a rent) each colporteur at a different fair could discourse on the excellencies of the Bible and sell many Gospels. Secondly, by engaging such a man as M. Sainton to organise a brigade of some motor cars to travel in different parts of France just as he does, as reported in the B. and F. Bible Society's Report on page 17 :—" M. Sainton, a Baptist, is doing splendid service in Brittany. He goes from place to place in a motor car, loaded with Bibles and New Testaments, selling Scriptures and preaching the Gospel by the wayside and in the market places. His orders to our Paris Depot run thus—' Please send one thousand New Testaments.' "

If M. Sainton has given only three such orders in one year, his sales amounting to 3,000 are one-fourth of the total of nearly 12,000 New Testaments sold by the Society's Depots, in the whole of France and as many as were sold altogether by eight colporteurs. Such a man in the service of the B. and F. Bible Society would indeed be the right man in the right place. Corporteurs are indispensable to sell the Scriptures in small towns and villages and scattered hamlets, but they are inadequate to reach the tens of thousands in large cities, many of whom leave their homes at 6 a.m. or 7 a.m. to go to work, and do not return until 8 p.m. Such large aggregations of human beings can only be adequately supplied with Gospels by gratuitous distribution.

Digitized by Google

Three Years' Distribution of Gospels in Paris.

By the Rev. Dr. JOHN ROBERTSON, of Glasgow.

I WAS greatly interested in the critique in the November Temple Magazine, of the methods of the British and Foreign Bible Society in their circulation of the Word of God, and I write to confirm some of the statements made in that article.

About 1884 to 1887, I happened to be a helper of the late Dr. R. W. McAll, in his Paris Mission, and about three years spent in the evangelisation work of the gay French capital should enable me to give at least a personal impression of what I considered, and consider, the right method of reaching the people there with the Word of God. If you wait till the Parisians come to your kiosk on the boulevard, or in the street, to buy your Gospel, their generations will pass into a dark eternity with very few Bibles in their hands. The little newspaper which scatters its kind in a daily snow-fall, is the only thing the masses will purchase.

In Paris, with the desire I trust to reach some of its people with the Word of God, I used almost nightly on my way to the McAll halls, to take my stand for a short time at places like the Rue Royale, and the Place de la Concorde, the Arc de Triomphe, and the Champs Elysees, with the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, and evangelical booklets, in my hand, and give them to the passers-by.

Now, in our commission to preach the Gospel to every creature, how could the wait-till-you-sell-plan of the British and Foreign Bible Society have reached those French people I thus met, many of whom must now have passed into the other world? It is true that here and there the acceptor of the Word accepted it to destroy it. Indeed, one man I remember took the trouble to take the Gospel,and stand before me, while he slowly tore the book to pieces, and placed them beneath his heel, and ground his foot upon them with a set of his teeth and a profane execration from his lips. What does it prove? Not that I should cease my "wholesale and indiscriminate gratis distribution of the Scriptures," and wait for the happy time—certainly easier to the flesh—when that raging French atheist will come along with his little coin in his hand and buy the book to keep it and read it and not tear it up. No, that action just showed me the man down in the bottom of his heart was interested in the question of religion to oppose it, and with a strange peace in my heart, I got in a word about a Scotchman like me always being received in ages past by a Frenchman like him, and how our two countries were once the bosom comrades on the tented field, and how my Edinburgh and his Paris had their courts in common, and for that reason, would he now take another Gospel? He at once held out his hand, and another book, the facsimile of what he had already destroyed was received, but this time it was to turn over the leaves rapidly, and to put it quickly in his pocket with a "Merci, mon frére Ecossais!" before he moved away.

I do not like to speak harshly of any method of circulating the Scriptures, nor would I minimise in the very least the great work the British and Foreign Bible Society is doing, but I must say with all the solemn emphasis I can command, that as regards Paris as known to me, their method of wait-till-the-sale is absolutely foolish and mistaken and abortive, while the only possible method of getting the Word of God into the hands and hearts of the people is the method they seem to condemn, "of wholesale and indiscriminate gratis distribution" of the Bible and Gospel Books, especially as from recent enquiry, it appears that they have no colporteur at work among the two and a half millions of Paris itself.

Are we to let generations pass into eternity without the Word, because, forsooth, some instances of destruction happen, which, as in the case I related, may, in the goodness and overseeing of the Holy Ghost, be only the evidence, like Paul's persecution, of prevenient grace.

Digitized by Google

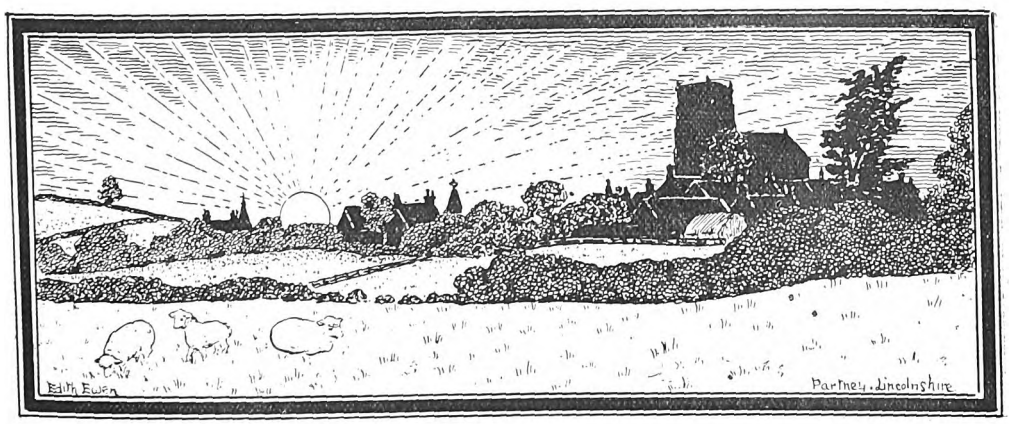
I should like to know how many of the officials of the British and Foreign Bible Society have stood in the busy crossings of a Continental city distributing free Gospels and booklets, and then as a result of true experience have brought in their verdict of condemnation. I must say I consider the wait-till-the-sale method of that Society quite contrary to the first principle of Christian evangelisation as laid down by Dr. Thomas Chalmers, when he said that the Gospel is to be taken to the people in a way intrinsically opposite to the ordinary commercial law of demand bringing the supply. The Word of God is to be supplied most where there is least demand. The non-demand is the call for the supply.

The seed of the kingdom is to be sown in no other fashion than broadcast on the fields of the world; for the vital germ is in the Word, wherever it goes, whether bought or gifted, and the more copies of the Word are multiplied and scattered, surely in the nature of the holy verities of the Christian faith, there rises the ratio of likelihood of the dews of blessing descending on the broadcast-sown truth.

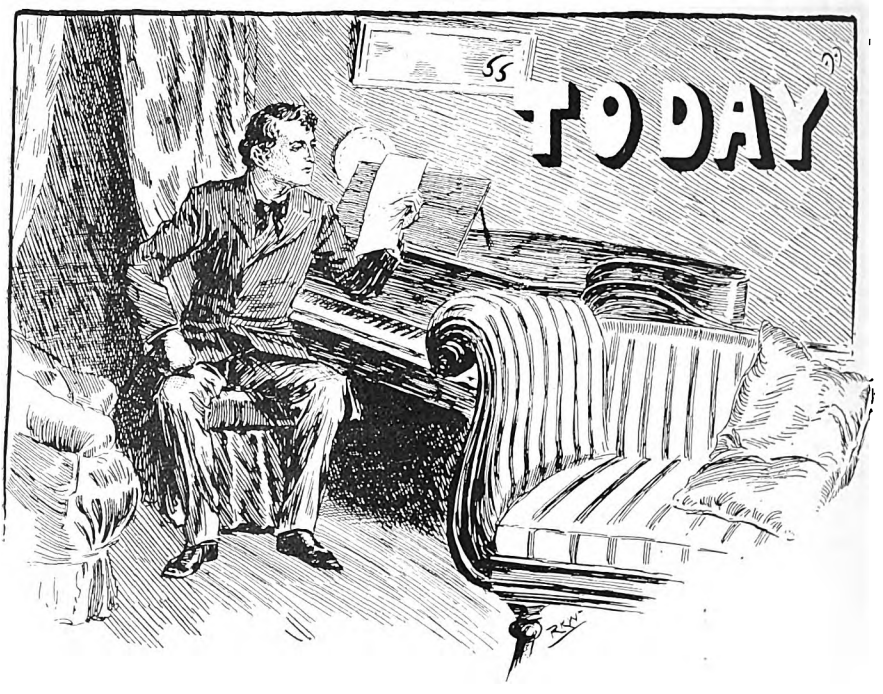
If the Bible be circulated at all, it needs no word of commendation from us, for it carries its own witness to heart and conscience. The Divine life is in it; and "the entrance of Thy Word, not ours, giveth life."

Gospel work, be it never forgotten, is emergency work; the King's business requireth haste. When the sun is setting, and the generations passing, if I had any influence with a Bible Society like the one referred to, I should with feverish earnestness use it for the modification of the plan which results in "the expenditure of £43,324 in order to sell £6,028 of Scriptures" and for the adoption of the method seemingly condemned, "wholesale and gratis distribution of the printed Scriptures," especially in crowded cities, without any interference with the admirable agency of colporteurs, whose untiring labours in country districts are of the utmost value.

"Jean!" said the eager French mother, as she started her little son for the heights where the Huguenot conventicle was being held, with the message that the armed soldiers of the Government were on their way, "Jean, run now, the safety of God's elect depends upon thy speed." So, with the message of the Saviour of sinners, O let us scatter it the most widely possible, and at once, for the safety of God's elect and the evangelisation of our generation depend instrumentally upon our speed.



Digitized by Google



HE was sitting before an open grand piano. A bundle of programmes lay on the top, and another programme stood open on the music-rack, with the words "Recital by Herr Germain Edelstein" in big ornamental letters. Music-scores of all sorts and editions lay about the room, while a neat little pile, evidently sorted for a purpose, had been placed on the bench beside him. The top sheet was lying title upwards, and one saw that the name upon it corresponded to the first on the open programme. Neither the piano nor the scores, however, were claiming his present attention, for he was gazing right through "Recital by Herr Germain Edelstein," apparently into futurity. He was in an engrossing brown study.

A knock at his door disturbed him. He jumped up and answered it, finding one of the hotel servants waiting with a note.

"For me?" briefly.

"Yes, sir, and a carriage is waiting below."

He motioned the man into a seat, and went over to the window, looking curiously at the small crested envelope in his hand. It was plainly a lady's missive. He tore it open.

"I know that I am making a bold request. Only urgent necessity compels me to do so. It is to ask you, if your time permits before your recital, to play to my only child. He has always had one ambition—to play like yourself; but a year ago his spine was fatally injured; to-day he is dying. You may wonder at my presuming to ask you, but he has begged patiently and incessantly that I would do so. He says he knows you will; and at least I take up my pen to ask you. It seems an insult to speak of remuneration; but should you not feel it so, and you find it possible to come, I shall think no sum too great to repay you for your time and kindness. Pardon my troubling you; but could I do otherwise? He is longing for music—for your music; nothing else can satisfy him.

"Believe me to be yours sincerely,

"MARY TERENCE."

He read it again, and then returning it to its envelope, said: "You say a carriage is waiting?"

"Yes, sir; the man said his mistress sent it in case you might come."

"Tell him that I shall be ready in a minute."

Digitized by Google

He took up the tidy bundle of music, and ran, two stairs at a time, to his room. He made a few little arrangements, and then, hat in hand, raced down again, and through the entrance to the wide stone steps. A trim green brougham stood there, and the footman touching his hat, enquired, "Herr Edelstein?"

He bowed, and stepping in, drew a long breath of satisfaction as the carriage whirled off. The house was in one of the suburbs, "The Chestnuts," so he thought; but he pulled the note out of his pocket to make sure. Yes, that was the name. He leaned back, and for the second time that day fell into a brown study. "He has always had one ambition —to play like yourself." His thoughts wandered over his own life. He was only eighteen, but playing was as easy as breathing to him; and it seemed as though he had played for much longer. "Poor little fellow," he said out loud. He would play better than ever—there was plenty of time before the recital. The letter had touched him deeply; there was a restraint about it that was infinitely more pathetic than any open expression of sorrow.

The carriage passed through some large stone gates, as he murmured. "Shall I be too late?" and presently he was set down opposite a flight of steps leading up to the great door. The house was hushed. The door stood open, and the cool green lights of the trees outside glanced and deepened in the cool wide hall. A great bowl of yellow roses stood on the oaken table; by them, a roll of music. Beyond, there were big glass doors, and, again beyond, a garden of soft green, with flowers of brilliant colour. He was fascinated, and stood listening, hat in hand, to the rustle of the trees and the cooing of the wood pigeons, waiting for he knew not what. Suddenly there was a sound beside him, and he turned to meet "Mary Terence." She was very beautiful, and so white that he feared for her. A glory of golden hair crowned a face which was lighted by wonderful violet eyes. She wore a small widow's cap, and her dress of a black clinging silk, was heavily trimmed with crape. As he looked at her, he could not help thinking how young and frail she was to bear such crushing sorrows.

He surprised her too—but pleasurably. There was something winning in his kind brown eyes; and his face was one she felt glad to have seen. He looked very boyish for such a genius; and though they had always told her that he was utterly unspoiled by the world, she had not expected to see such goodness in his expression. She made no apologies for asking him. He had come. The present would soon be over, and she would soon be childless, so she simply said,

"This is the room; there is a piano there; he is there too—he is very weak."

He stepped into a room of heavy oak furniture; the French windows were open, and outside the trees were laughing, and and the sunbeams dancing on the soft green lawn. There were the same great Dresden bowls of roses placed all over the room in careless profusion. Beside one of the windows was a grand piano, and by the other was a couch on which lay the child who was so soon to leave the cool, silent room. A nurse sat not far from him, as if she were a reminder of another world, in her dark stuff dress and white cuffs, apron and cap—a reminder that Germain resented, as spoiling the harmony of the perfect room. The child was smiling to himself, and he held out his hand to the great boy-pianist as though he had known him all his life.

"I knew you would come; I knew you were nice, and I do thank you so much, for I am so wanting to hear you play; I haven't much longer, you know—please play."

"Is there anything you want very much to hear?"—he paused—"I do not know your name."

'Chopin's Berceuse,' please—only not if —you would rather play—anything else." He was terribly weak, and the nurse got up and fetched something to revive him.

"Thank you, nurse; isn't it just beautiful?"

"Certainly, John; anything you like," said Germain softly, and opened the piano. John turned and held out his hand to his mother, and she knelt beside him.

"Mother, he is really going to play; oh, mother darling, let's enjoy it together. Kiss me; now please."

Germain never knew how he played then. The rocking melody ran on, ever rocking the tender ripple of the little rhyme the mother sings, laughing gently, and yet so full of rest. There are few

Digitized by Google

"THROUGH THE SILENCE, GOD CAME FOR HIM."

things so full of rest as is the "Chopin Berceuse," if only one knows how to find it there. Germain knew by instinct it was part of his genius; yet he only saw the little life ebbing away, and the deathly white of Mary Terence's face as she saw it—slipping out of her agonised grasp. The "Berceuse" was only a sigh now—a sweet melodic breath. The mother still croons gently, gently, very gently, and presently her child sleeps.

Germain got up; he stood perfectly still, feeling almost an intruder now; he had no right to see this. John looked up, his eyes full of tears, and he put his hand into Germain's.

"I love you. I can't thank you; I have wanted it all my life. I could never play so. It is very good of God to take me. It was 'to-day' wasn't it, Germain? To-day means soon—now. It was to be 'to-day' Germain?"

Germain looked at John's mother. He thought the boy was wandering, and could not tell exactly how to answer. Her lips formed rather than said, "Yes."

"Yes, John, it was 'To-day.'"

A silence, broken by John's murmuring, "He said, 'To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.' Read it, please."

There was a Revised Testament lying near. Some instinct bade Germain take it up, and it opened at Luke xxiii.; some roses lay in the place. There was a faint pencil line drawn from verse 39 to verse 43, and the same instinct bade Germain read that paragraph.

"And one of the malefactors which were hanged, railed on him, saying, 'Art not Thou the Christ? Save Thyself and us.' But the other answered and rebuking him, said, 'Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but, this man hath done nothing amiss.' And he said, Lord remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom.' And He said unto him, 'Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise.'"

Germain's pleasant and quaint English ceased, and he looked up, still holding the book in his hand. He saw the end was near now, and a stillness unbroken, save by the rustling of the trees outside, held that little group—John, the great boy-pianist, Mary Terence, and the nurse—truly a deathlike stillness. Suddenly John spoke to his mother.

Digitized by Google

"Lean down, dearest," he said faintly. "I am very tired, please kiss me." And, after another pause, "Thank—Germain." Then through the silence and sunlight of that cool still room, God who had been so very good to him, came for him, and there was only the small circle of three left. Mary's lonely life had begun.

Germain turned and was going away without a word. He could not break the silence that showed the depth of the mother's sorrow—she did not even sob. His hand was upon the door, when Mary came forward. "Let me speak to you," she said steadily. So they went together into the hall. It was a superb evening; the grass outside was ruddy in the fading sunshine; it seemed a mockery, and Germain turned away. His eyes sought hers. They were bright and tearless; her face was white to the lips, yet her voice was as sweet and firm as ever when she spoke.

"He said I was to thank you—I cannot I am sure you will understand; I shall never forget, for he had hungered for that all his life—"——

Germain stood silent; he was almost afraid of breaking her self-control by saying anything, though had he but known it, his eyes were full of a pity dangerously intense. He took her hand and said gently—his mind was full of its meaning—"To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise."

"Yes," she said, and taking a rose from the bowl, a great white Marshal Niel, gave it to him. "It was his favourite flower," she said again. "Good-bye—and—thank you—" —

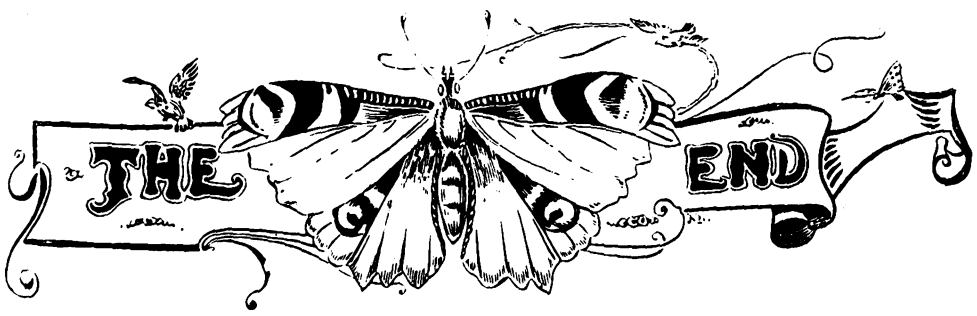
The same trim brougham hurried him back to his hotel. Life was the same; his rooms were the same; the usual costly flowers adorned his table, and his piano, his overmantel; the same customary offerings at the shrine of his genius; yet, all was different. The morning papers were enthusiastic above precedent of the recital of the previous night; he had exceeded all his former achievements; "he was divine." He smiled a little sadly when he saw that word. It was the kind of divinity that only comes by pain.

* * * * * *

On his table lies a well-worn Revised Testament; it opens at Luke xxiii., for there are rose leaves at that page. On the title-page is written, "To John, with his father's love. New Year's Day." It is Germain's most treasured book, and when he opened the parcel bearing his name in Mary Terence's clear handwriting, and saw what it contained, he felt he had never realised what true sacrifice meant before.

SHOPPING BY POST.

Lovely Large Dressed Doll, 12 Stamps, Boxed; 12 Toys Boxed 12 stamps; Sweetly Pretty Kerchief Boxes of Green, Gold, and Pink Floral Stationery, also Coloured Child Pictures Stationery, 6 stamps; Airships and other Mechanical Clock-workers. Trains, etc., 12 stamps; Picture Post Cards, 12 Assorted, Large Size, plenty space, 3 stamps; Raphael Tuck's Choice Christmas Cluster, 20 Beautiful Cards, 3 stamps. Recommended.



Digitized by Google

TO OUR READERS.

The "TEMPLE MAGAZINE" enters upon a New Series with the New Year, and will be Enlarged to 128 pages of reading matter and illustrations by the Best Authors and Artists, making it the largest and most interesting Magazine of its kind.

Digitized by Google

A Scientific . . . . Discourse.

FOR

THOUGHTFUL MINDS.

A RECORD OF FACTS,
PRINCIPLES, AND DISCOVERIES.

Free (or unoxidised) Phosphorus in its relation to the Improvement and Preservation of Human Life on Earth.

"THAT our medical men of every school, our greatest chemists, physiologists, philosophers, and men of science generally; as well as the inventors of, and those who deal in and adopt the numberless methods and preparations which are advertised in all directions and in every conceivable manner for the cure of the "Ills that flesh is heir to," suffer almost as greatly, and decay and die as quickly as the least educated in society, is matter of positive fact as well as of regret; and although it may be conceded that much good has been done by every system which has yet been proposed, there is certainly still a deficiency; still humanity suffers; and it is painfully evident that something more is urgently wanted—something more simple, more decided in its action, less of the character of ordinary physic or medicine, and more of the nature of a preserving and protecting aliment. This important desideratum medical science has, so far, failed to supply."

"Let us hope that the preparation now described is the beginning of a series of improvements in the right direction and of victories over the natural world."

These were the words of the late Dr. Samuel Birley, M.D., when introducing to the world, a few years ago, the results of his investigations, which had been the outcome of a lifetime's work and study.

What the medical world of to-day is beginning to recognise, he had many years ago satisfied himself upon: namely, the supreme control which the nervous system exercises, not only over the main functions, but over the most minute and apparently insignificant processes taking place in the body.

Dr. Birley's great rule is, therefore:—"Look after the nervous system; keep it well-nourished, and in perfect working order, and disease will little affect us."

Dr. Birley devoted many years to the discovery of some remedy that would fulfil the above indications. He carefully analysed the brains of persons who had died from various diseases, as well as of those who had been killed by accident whilst in the full vigour of health. He was struck by the deficiency of Phosphorus found in the brain matter of the weak and ailing, compared to what normally existed in the strong and healthy. From this fact the suggestion naturally arose that perhaps the loss of phosphorus had much to do with the weakened nerve force, and that its artificial administration might help to give back what had been lost. Such a thought was no less that prophetic, but simple as it appeared to be in this early stage of the investigation, it was found impossible to carry it out with any satisfactory result, for the following reason:—

Ordinary phosphorus, as understood by the chemist, cannot, by any known method, be made to be PERFECTLY SOLUBLE in the blood. It may be finely powdered and given in pills, etc., or dissolved in oil, alcohol, ether or chloroform, but in all these forms it is precipitated into a fine dust immediately on mixing with the juices of the stomach.

Many of these particles do not pass into the blood at all, but of those that do, they are completely stopped when they arrive at the liver, through which organ everything passes from the stomach before entering the general circulation. Hence Phosphorus administered in this form cannot possibly reach the nervous system, and cannot therefore aid in its restoration.

Knowing these facts, and convinced of the necessity of phosphorus as a Food, rather than a medicine, for the Brain and Nervous System, Dr. Birley experimented in many ways for the purpose of discovering a means of preparing it so that it would be free from these drawbacks.

His aim was to find out a form which would not precipitate in this manner, but remain in perfect solution throughout the system.

In the end he was rewarded by the discovery of a new process of preparation (by distillation) which rendered it, when taken by the mouth, absolutely soluble in the blood, and was perfectly satisfactory in its effects in every way. It could pass through the liver in a fluid state and thus reach the nerve tissues, which alone were in need of it.

No better proof of the value of this new form of phosphorus could be required than the very severe tests to which Dr. Birley put his invention. That it really does pass into the circulation, and enter into the composition of the Brain and Nervous System cannot be better discussed than in the inventor's own words:—

"The question has often been put to us—What proof have you that your PHOSPHORUS, when taken into the stomach, actually reaches and combines with the substance of the brain?

As it is truth only, and not opinion or hypothesis that we care for, our answer must be perfectly candid and such only as practical investigation permits us to give. Because we cannot, or rather have no opportunity to, analyse the living human brain, before a course of PHOSPHORUS has been entered upon, we

Digitized by Google

admit that the evidence is not direct and positive. We are obliged to depend upon implication and analogy. The following items, however, force the conclusion we have maintained upon us:—

1ST.—PHOSPHORUS is a constant element of the brain and nervous system of all animals.

2ND.—The amount of PHOSPHORUS is different in persons of different mental and physical powers.

3RD.—In the brain and nerve-matter of those who have during life been characterised by great powers of mind and body and who have been in the prime of health suddenly killed in battle, or accident, or by other violence, a much larger amount of PHOSPHORUS has been discovered than is ever found is the brain-matter of ordinary persons who have been killed in a similar manner.

4TH.—The brain-matter of idiots contains the least amount of PHOSPHORUS. A little more PHOSPHORUS is found in that of persons not completely imbecile, but physically and mentally weak, languid in action, deficient in pluck and energy, full of apprehension, weak in memory and in application of thought and purpose, who hesitate in their resolves, and shrink from the general bustle of commercial life. The same may be said of persons who are fretful, low-spirited, anxious, fidgety, and odd-tempered, and of the positively ill-tempered and disagreeable.

5TH.—Persons who in early life have enjoyed a fair amount of mental and physical power, but who have suffered many years from great anxiety and sorrow consequent upon family bereavement and other losses and trials, have been found after death to have lost a great portion of the PHOSPHORUS which is common in the brain of similar persons who have not suffered in the same way.

The same may be affirmed of those who, beginning life with a good constitution, have excessively indulged in alcoholic preparations. Alcohol has the property of dissolving and carrying away the PHOSPHORUS of the brain and nervous system. We have personally known and carefully watched the career of many who in the "prime of life" were brilliant, energetic, first-class men of business, full of dash and assurance, carrying all before them, and succeeding in almost every undertaking. We have observed some of these to gradually wane in their mental and physical powers; little by little to have become anxious and apprehensive; matters which once were trifles, unworthy of attention, have seemed to be of great consequence; enterprise and speculation have become less and less; a fear of losing or failing has gradually crept in, until a general tameness and insipidity have been observed. A few years longer, and the once bright, confident, venturesome business man has dwindled to an eccentric, nervous, despondent, and miserable human remnant, incapable of concentrating his powers, vacillating, absent-minded, forgetful, and almost heedless of the world or its pleasures. Deafness, failing sight, impaired susceptibility, necroencephalus (softening of the brain) and general inanition, have gradually terminated in death. In some cases we have been enabled to procure the brain and a portion of the spinal cord, and have found by analysis that the PHOSPHORUS has been greatly deficient and much less than has been found in the brain-matter of persons who had the same vigorous character during early life, but who have died suddenly by violence in the midst of their career, and when all their powers of mind and body were most intense. In several instances different parts of the brain have been found to contain different proportions of PHOSPHORUS.

Striking as are the foregoing examples, and forcible as they are in the way of evidence, they are not in themselves sufficient. We require a synthetical process before we can form a satisfactory conclusion.

We have treated with PHOSPHORUS cases of every class. We have seen the prematurely old, the worn and exhausted, the nervous and miserable of every position in life, gradually restored to a most vigorous and perfectly healthy state. From a lean and cadaverous condition they have become full in flesh, the countenance clear and ruddy, the eyes bright, sight improved, deafness overcome, the hair become abundant, the step and gait again elastic and determined, the spirits high and generous, the temper cheerful, the love of song and harmony returned, the brain again active, perception quick, memory tenacious, and the whole system and character changed from the most pitiable condition to the highest state of existence.

In several instances the stir and excitement of mercantile life have created a longing to return to business. Some have done so, and are now as keen and successful as at any former period.

If then in all cases of mental and physical debility where we have been able to analyse the brain after death, we have found a deficiency of PHOSPHORUS, and if in precisely similar cases during life we have administered PHOSPHORUS, and found such conditions pass away, what other conclusion is it possible to arrive at than that this new form of Phosphorus gradually assimilates with the brain and nervous system, and brings up the depressed and wasted constitution to the normal standard?

The preparation which has repeatedly produced such results as those above described, we have called 'Plain' Syrup of Free Phosphorus, because it is the simple solution formed by distillation, combined with sugar and without the admixture of any other substance or medicament."

Free Phosphorus in combination with other Medicaments.

The Phosphorus prepared as above described permits of our taking advantage of the well-known principle in medical science, that different articles of the materia medica have the property of acting specially on different organs of the body. These various properties are very valuable in cases of special diseased action, and we are able to take advantage of them in using the syrup of phosphorus here described. It will combine with many remedial agents, and thus the power of the phosphorus may be determined to different organs of the body as local conditions may require.

Where the heart is weak, and the whole muscular system flabby and greatly debilitated, in addition to great nervous debility and exhaustion, the best combination is that of protoxide of iron with the "Plain," and which we have named the "Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus."

In the course of many years' private practice Dr. Birley was enabled to considerably modify and perfect a number of combinations of his Phosphorus in addition to the "Ironised" above named. For debility of the muscular and general system in LADIES particularly; when "Below Par," and suffering from poorness of blood and lack of colour, a special preparation called the "Sub-Ironised Syrup of Free Phosphorus" has been found to be wonderfully successful.

Hence the fifteen standard kinds enumerated in the adjoined list have been formulated and have earned a unique reputation for the complaints named therein.

Digitized by Google

DETAILED LIST.

The result of over Half a Century's Experience. All have been proved in a Large Private Practice before being offered to the public.

PLAIN. SYRUP OF FREE PHOSPHORUS. A Vitalising food for all Brain and Nervous Affections from whatever cause—worry, late hours, overwork, &c.; and for Hysteria, Vitus' Dance, Headache, &c., &c. A sustaining and life-giving element. The basis of all Dr. Birley's Preparations. Of especial value to Professional Men, Clergymen, Solicitors, Barristers, Literary Men, Schoolmasters, and all engaged in mental occupations 4/6

IRONISED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Muscular Debility, Heart Disease, Paralysis, Rupture, Sciatica, Lumbago, Scrofula, Obesity, Dropsy, and General Debility. Of great value also as a restorative after an attack of "influenza" .. 4/6

SUB-IRONISED. Especially prepared for Ladies and Delicate Persons suffering from the above, instead of the "Ironised." And for Bright's Disease, Mumps, Varicose Veins, and when "Below Par" 4/6

MAGNESIAN. SPECIAL REMEDY for Pulmonary and other forms of Consumption 4/6

BRONCHIAL. SPECIAL REMEDY for Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Quinsy, Congestion of the Lungs, Diphtheria, and Throat Affections generally 4/6

GASTRIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Indigestion and Liver Complaints 4/6

ANTI-RHEUMATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for every form of Rheumatism and Gout. (In some cases the Ironised or Sub-Ironised will aid the action of this preparation when taken on alternate days with it) .. 4/6

ANTI-STIPATIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Constipation, Flatulence, Piles, Spasms. Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, &c. 4/6

ACIDIFIED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak, Fading, and Falling Off of Hair, and for Actual Baldness (internal use only) 4/6

VIRILITIC. Prepared for men suffering from Nervous Debility and Loss of Vitality 4/6

TOMATINED. SPECIAL REMEDY for Weak and Partial Loss of Sight, Deafness, Defective Taste or Smell 4/6

ANTI-NEURALGIC. SPECIAL REMEDY for Neuralgia, Pleurisy and Erysipelas .. 4/6

CUTANEOUS. SPECIAL REMEDY for Chronic Skin Diseases, Eczema, Psoriasis, &c. 4/6

The 4/6 Bottles contain between 70 and 80 Doses and are sufficient for nearly ONE MONTH'S USE

A SPECIAL OFFER.

We have the fullest confidence that where we can introduce these medicines into a household we are assured of a firm footing, and of recourse to them on all future occasions of illness or indisposition.

This coupon entitles you to a 4/6 Trial Bottle of any one kind of Dr. Birley's Phosphorus Compounds at 2/6; but if forwarded by parcel post, 4d. per bottle extra must be enclosed to cover cost of carriage within the United Kingdom. We guarantee safe delivery. Should a Trial Bottle also be required for a friend or relative, we will extend the offer to them if ordered at the same time.

Orders may be sent with the Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these Trial Bottle Coupons, and if we are not the money will be returned.

For Residents abroad the date will be extended sufficiently to allow of ordering. Postage of 1/4 per bottle is required for abroad.

COUPON.

4/6 Trial Bottle for 2/6

Or by Parcel Post 4d. extra—viz.: 2/10

TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

Available until Dec. 21st, 1902.

The above Coupon to be cut out and sent with order. These Trial Bottles can be had direct only from the

Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers:

GORDON, MURRAY, & Co., Ltd.,

10, ADAM ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

STRONGLY

RECOMMENDED.

Among some hundreds of others we may mention the following Reverend Gentlemen, who have proved the value of the medicine, and from whom we hold some excellent reports:

REV. C. H. SPURGEON, London, S.E.
REV. DR. COCKREM, London Orphan Asylum, Watford.
REV. W. T. CRANFIELD, Stoke.
REV. R. FLETCHER, Hull.
REV. J. JAMES, Abercanaid.
REV. J. W. MORRIS, Gly Neath.
REV. C. EARLE, Langford.
REV. F. CLEMENTS, Hanham, Bristol.
REV. GABRIEL MOLLAN, Clonmetham.
REV. E. I. DEVENISH, Teignmouth.
REV. G. COOK, Church Gresley.
REV. G. DALE COPELAND, Pudsey.
REV. A. A. BROOKS, Wigan.
REV. A. E. REALFF, Leicester.
REV. F. JONES, Malton.
REV. W. BARTON, Hull.
REV. G. HOMEYER, Claycross.
REV. J. B. GRATTON, Leominster.
REV. W. FRY, Blandford.
REV. J. D. WOODHALL, Bolton.
REV. R. FRAME, Birkenhead.

THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN AGE" says:—"Doubtless the 'Christian Age' enters many a home where there is some weakly one whose feeble health makes existence a burden, or perhaps it is a disease considered incurable which is wasting away life. Wherever there is such a case, we sincerely wish one of Dr. Birley's Preparations of Phosphorus might have a fair trial. These preparations are the result of scientific studies and experiments extending over many years, and the success which has already attended their use has been almost marvellous. We have seen hundreds of letters (not copies, but the original documents), some from persons well known to us, all testifying to the curative effects of one or other of these preparations. And more than this, we know of cases in which they have been the means of restoring to health when to all appearance recovery was almost impossible."

EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."—"Our readers know quite well how careful we are not to recommend anything but what is thoroughly trustworthy, but so many voluntary testimonials of unmistakable genuineness are before us that it is simply impossible to question the efficacy of the Medicines to which we are calling attention; hundreds of letters from all classes of people, including titled nobility, clergymen, physicians, &c., among which we notice several well-known names, all bearing remarkable testimony to the benefits derived from them."

EDITOR OF THE "FAMILY DOCTOR."—"One Thousand Original Letters of Testimony have been submitted to us by the Proprietors of Dr. Birley's Preparations."

Digitized by Google

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Write for our WINTER SKETCH BOOK. Patterns Post Free. Hundreds of Illustrations of the latest Novelties for present season in Costumes & Jackets sent post free

10/6 10/6

A SPECIAL LINE OF ALPACA SKIRTS In all Colours. COSTUME SKIRTS, 6/6. 7/11. 9/11 each. Carriage 5d.

Design No. 1261. 10/6.

Chesterfield Three-quarter Sacque Jacket. This Jacket is produced in Black, Fawn and Brown Beaver Cloth, also in pretty Grey Tweeds, and in Light and Dark Grey and Black Coating. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d. extra. This Jacket can also be ordered 33 inches long, 11/6; 36 inches long, 12/6; 39 inches long 13/6; and 42 inches long, 14/6. Carriage paid 6d. extra.

This Jacket can be ordered double-breasted if required.

DESIGN NO. 434.

14/9

Design No. 434. 14/9.

Stylishly and handsomely trimmed Costume in Allen Foster and Co's Serge and Venetian Cloth, all colours. The bodice is cut in the Russian style, lined throughout, and stylishly trimmed rows of cording and bands of stitched silk. Full flounced skirt, trimmed silk and cording. Extraordinary Value for 14/9; carriage 6d. extra. When ordering costumes please give bust measurement (under arms), size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

DESIGN NO. 1518

11/6

Design No. 1518. 11/6.

Chesterfield Coat and Skirt direct from the "Alfosco" factories. Splendid Value for 11/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra. Made in a good, hard wearing Serge, or in ALLEN FOSTER & Co.'s celebrated Venetian Cloth. Colours: Light and Dark Grey, Navy, Royal, Brown, Green, Black, &c. The Jacket is single-breasted, trimmed tailor stitching, full, bell-shaped Skirt, well made and finished. Costume complete, 11/6. Best Value in London. This Costume in good Melton Coating will be 19/6, or in the "Alfosco" Tweed, 21/6. Patterns Post-Free on application. This Costume can be lined throughout, Coat and Skirt, for 4/- extra.

Design 1427.

12/6

Design No. 1427.

12/6

CALL. OR WRITE.

CALL OR WRITE.

This skirt is made in Allen Foster & Co's world renowned Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth. Colours: Grey, Black, Navy, Brown, Royal, Light Grey, Oxford, Green, Fawn, etc. The Skirt is lined throughout and made in the new Bell shape, trimmed rich Satin strappings, three straight frills and silk buttons. A great bargain for 12/6; carriage paid 5d extra.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47, GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

See Special Offer at foot to all Readers of this Paper.

DR. MACKENZIE'S COMPLEXION WAFERS

GUARANTEED
PERFECTLY HARMLESS

(Medical Certificate accompanies each box.)

THESE Wafers have long been known to possess the "wizard's touch" in producing, preserving, and enhancing beauty of person in male or female, by surely developing a transparency and pellucid clearness of complexion, brilliant eyes, soft and smooth skin, where by Nature the reverse exists.

The great difficulty hitherto has been how to make this beautifying principle safely available, and at the same time avoid what is detrimental and injurious. Dr. Mackenzie's Wafers are prepared expressly as a "Beautifier of the Complexion and Skin," and are guaranteed harmless. In the direction for which they are intended their action and effect is simply magical, the most astonishing transformations in personal appearance being brought about by their steady use. Even the coarsest and most repulsive skin and complexions, marred by freckles and other disfigurements, slowly change into an unrivalled purity and texture, free from any spot or blemish whatever, the pinched features become agreeable, the form, before angular, gradually transforms itself into the perfection of womanly grace and beauty Used by men, the favourable result is the same. In the Complexion Wafers as prepared by the undersigned all danger is averted, and the remedy, taken in the manner directed on each box, is absolutely innocuous, while the peculiar virtues of the remedy remain unimpaired and intact. Powders, enamels, so called "blood purifiers," &c., &c., are a delusion and a snare. From the use of these Wafers FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, VULGAR REDNESS, ROUGH, YELLOW, or "MUDDY" SKINS, and other facial disfigurements are permanently removed, and a deliciously CLEAR COMPLEXION is assured

Wonderful TESTIMONY to their efficacy:

59, BEAUMONT SQUARE, MILE END, LONDON.—"Please send me another box of Wafers. The others have done me a great deal of good."
H. MASON.

31, EVINGTON ROAD, LEICESTER.—"Please send me a box of Wafers. I have derived great benefit from the others I have taken."
Yours truly, M. E. WARD.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Dear Sir: I find your Soap so good, I now want you to send me three cakes of it, also a box of Complexion Wafers."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

54, KENSINGTON MANSIONS, EARL'S COURT, S.W.—"Please send me another box of Wafers, I am much pleased by the effects produced by the first."
BEATRICE SELWYN.

MELBECKS, KIRKBY STEPHEN, WESTMORLAND.—"Kindly send me another box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers. The last has worked wonders."
SARAH G. PAGAN.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF THE "TEMPLE MAGAZINE."

T.M.

COUPON

DEC. 1st, 1902.

A 4/6 TRIAL BOX FOR 2/-

Any reader sending this Coupon and Postal Order or Stamps for Two Shillings will receive immediately a 4/6 Trial Box of Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Wafers, this great reduction being made to induce our readers to give this wonderful preparation a fair trial, as we know one trial will convince all of their unique merits. This coupon must be sent in within 10 days of this date. Address all orders to

S. HARVEY, Ltd., 5, Denman St., London Bridge.

Digitized by Google

MELLIN'S FOOD

FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS,

Prepared as directed, is rich in those substances which nourish and sustain children and sick persons. Always uniform, easily prepared, speedily digested and absorbed.

SAMPLE BOTTLE POST FREE. Mention this Magazine.

MELLIN'S FOOD WORKS, PECKHAM, S.E.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System.—Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 74 and 76, Southampton Row, London, W.C. (Removed from 40 and 42, Southampton Row.) PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 74 & 76, Southampton Row, London W.C. (Removed from 40 & 42, Southampton Row.)

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS, AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

DELICIOUS

RED WHITE & BLUE COFFEE.

For Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary coffee.

Delicious Flavour.

"BONGOLA"

1/6 & 1/9 TEA.

DOUBLE THE STRENGTH OF ORDINARY TEA

ENGLAND'S BEST VALUE!

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. Thompson & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town etc.
London: Printed and Published for the Proprietors at 6, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google